A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the leather-workers and says: "Venerable one, a certain monk said to you, 'Venerable one, where is the conduct of an ascetic in you? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the leather-workers — the venerable one should do his own work with hides, small hides, straps, hide-knives, fleshing tools, and scrapers, and whatever other occupations belong to them.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the potters and says:

"The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the potters — the venerable one should do his own work with wheels, spindles, cords, wheel-frames, and whatever other occupations belong to them.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the barbers and says: "The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the barbers — the venerable one should do his own work with razors, scissors, combs, lancets, and nail-knives.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the carpenters and says: "The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the carpenters — the venerable one should do his own work with chisels, adzes, planes, augers, and mallets.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the bamboo-workers and says: "The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the bamboo-workers — the venerable one should do his own work with bamboo, knives, dye, bamboo hammers, and splitting-thorns.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to one who has gone forth from the servants and says: "The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from the servants — the venerable one should do his own work with massaging, washing clothes, bathing, running errands, and carrying out orders.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such. If he says these words, naming the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to a monk and says: "The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from among those who are lame, dissolute, vagrant, with stumps for fingers, hunchbacked, dwarfish, pot-bellied, foolish, mute, bent, deaf, epileptic, and flat-footed.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if these words are spoken, stating the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to a monk and says these words: "The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has gone forth from among those who are lepers, those with small pox, those who are exhausted, those with skin diseases, those with mange, those with a dog's stench, those with convulsions, those with flat feet, those with rickets, those who are nauseating, those who are consumptive, those with fever, those with severe fever, those with mucus, those with difficult breathing, those with wasting disease, those who are forgetful, those tormented by hunger, those who are pale and puffy, those who are very fat, those with tumors, those with blood disease, those with bile disease, and those who go out in the middle of the night.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if these words are spoken, stating the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to a monk and says these words: "The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one has incurred a defeat, a Saṅgha remainder, a transgression, a downfall requiring individual confession, or a downfall.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if these words are spoken, stating the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to a monk and says these words: "The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin? The venerable one is wrathful, holds grudges, is deceitful, speaks at the wrong time, is envious, is miserly, is dishonest, is crafty, is without shame, is without embarrassment, desires evil, and holds wrong views.'" Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if these words are spoken, stating the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

A monk, with the intention of sowing discord, goes to a monk and says these words: "The venerable one has a monk who says to him: 'Where is the conduct of a śramaṇa in the venerable one? Where is the conduct of a brahmin?'" — and reviles him with insults such as "The venerable one is like a corpse," and so forth. Which monk? His name is such-and-such, his clan is such-and-such, his lineage is such-and-such — if these words are spoken, stating the name constitutes a transgression, while stating the clan and lineage constitutes a downfall.

In the same way, however much a monk speaks divisive words among monks with the intention of sowing discord, whether true or false, in all cases it constitutes a transgression. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one overcome by feelings of pain.

This concludes the third transgression of sowing discord among monks.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the group of six monks, knowing that a dispute had been lawfully settled by the harmonious Saṅgha, said: "This dispute has not been settled by arbitration, has not been properly settled by arbitration — it must be settled by arbitration again."

"This dispute has not been investigated, has not been properly investigated — it must be investigated again. This dispute has not been pacified, has not been properly pacified — it must be pacified again." In this way they again cause weariness with the act. When monks repeatedly pacify disputes, they have many duties and many things to do, and this causes them to neglect recitation of scripture, reading, chanting, meditation practice, contemplation of meaning, and the inner calm abiding of the mind.

Monks of few concerns — why should monks, knowing that a dispute has been lawfully settled by the harmonious Saṅgha, saying "This dispute has not been settled by arbitration, has not been properly settled by arbitration — it must be settled by arbitration again; this dispute has not been investigated, has not been properly investigated — it must be investigated again; this dispute has not been pacified, has not been properly pacified — it must be pacified again," again cause weariness with the act? — reproach them, revile them, spread slander about them.

At that time the monks reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, on account of this occasion and this circumstance, convened an assembly of the community of monks — and so forth as before. The Blessed Buddhas, knowing full well, act without feigning ignorance — and so forth as before.

The Blessed Buddha reprimanded the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you, knowing that a dispute has been lawfully settled by the harmonious Saṅgha, again cause weariness with the act?"

"Venerable One, it is so."

The Blessed Buddha censured them: "This is not in conformity with the conduct of a renunciant, is not befitting, is not appropriate, is not in accord with proper conduct — it is not something to be done by one who has gone forth."

Having censured them in many ways, the Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Therefore, having seen ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If any monk, knowing that a dispute has been lawfully settled by the harmonious Saṅgha, again causes weariness with the act, he commits a transgression."

"Any monk" refers to the group of six or any other of that sort. "The Saṅgha" refers to the Saṅgha of hearers of the Tathāgata. "Harmonious" means harmonious in intention. "Lawfully" means in accordance with the Dharma as it is, the Vinaya as it is, and the teaching of the Teacher as it is. "Dispute" refers to the four disputes: dispute for the sake of quarreling, dispute for the sake of teaching, dispute on account of transgressions, and dispute on account of affairs. "Settled" means pacified and brought to rest. "Knowing" means either recognizing this oneself or having been told by others. "If he again causes weariness with the act" means if he does so again. "He commits a transgression" means it burns him, boils him, and causes him to fall into the hells of sentient beings, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower realms, and into the states of wrong downfall. Furthermore, if that transgression is not confessed and individually confessed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — that is why it is said "he commits a transgression."

As to how this becomes a transgression:

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of fighting as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of fighting, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of fighting as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of not advising, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of fighting as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of causing a downfall, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of fighting as a quarrel undertaken for some other purpose, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of not advising as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of not advising, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of not advising as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of fighting, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of not advising as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of causing a downfall, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of not advising as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of causing a downfall, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of causing a downfall as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of causing a downfall, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of causing a downfall as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of fighting, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of causing a downfall as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of not advising, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of causing a downfall as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of an act, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression.

If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of an act as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of fighting, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, perceiving a quarrel undertaken for the sake of an act as a quarrel undertaken for the sake of a transgression, perceives what has been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he is doubtful about what has been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he commits a transgression. If he perceives what has not been purified by confession as having been purified by confession, and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he is doubtful about what has not been purified by confession and yet again causes weariness with that act, he incurs a wrongdoing.

These are the five kinds of persons: one who is present from the beginning, one who performs the act, one who presents a motion, one who states a view, and one who arrives suddenly. Of these, who is the person present from the beginning? It is one who knows the beginning, the middle, and the end of that quarrel. Who is the person who performs the act? It is one who has performed an act in order to bring that quarrel to peace. Who is the person who presents a motion? It is one who has presented a motion in order that act to be performed. Who is the person who states a view? It is one who has stated his own view with respect to that quarrel. Who is the person who arrives suddenly? It is one who does not know the beginning, the middle, or the end of that quarrel.

Of these, the first three persons — the one present from the beginning, the one who performs the act, and the one who presents a motion — if those three, knowing that the quarrel has been resolved in accordance with the Dharma by a harmonious Saṅgha, yet again cause weariness with that act, they commit a transgression. The last two persons — the one who states a view and the one who arrives suddenly — if those two, knowing that the quarrel has been resolved in accordance with the Dharma by a harmonious Saṅgha, yet again cause weariness with that act, they incur a wrongdoing. There is no transgression for one who is acting for the first time, one who is insane, one who is mentally disturbed, or one who is afflicted by painful sensations. The fourth transgression of causing weariness is complete.

The blessed Buddha (Bhagavān) was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Cārkāśa was skilled in the science of signs and marks. One morning he put on his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and Dharma robe, and went out to beg alms in Śrāvastī. He went to the homes of brahmins and householders, taught the Dharma, and having taught the Dharma, asked the daughter-in-law: "Sister, what is your daughter-in-law like?" She replied: "Noble one, she is like a rabbit struck by an arrow." Cārkāśa said: "Sister, do you consider that a fault of hers? She has flesh wounds, pimples, moles, red marks, and curling hairs from the tops of her breasts down to her navel and from her navel down to her waist — that is her fault." After that, he went to the daughter-in-law's room and asked: "Sister, what is your mother-in-law like?" She replied: "Noble one, her faults are that she is polished smooth as fine silk, yet lazy, incapable of effort, fierce, harsh, and given to abuse." Cārkāśa said: "Sister, do you consider that a fault of hers?"

She has, in those very regions from the tops of her breasts down to her navel and from her navel down to her waist, the definite marks of auspicious signs: vases full to the brim, marks of good fortune, and swastikas. These, therefore, are her qualities." Afterwards, he went to the daughter-in-law's room and asked: "Sister, what is your mother-in-law like?" "Noble one, she is just as a daughter or younger sister would be described." "Sister, those are not her qualities. For she has, in those very regions from the tops of her breasts down to her navel and from her navel down to her waist, the definite marks: vases full to the brim, marks of good fortune, and swastikas. These, therefore, are her qualities."

Then on another occasion, when those women were massaging, rubbing, and bathing one another, they began examining each other's private bodily marks. They observed auspicious and inauspicious marks exactly as the venerable Cārkāśa had described them. When a quarrel broke out among them, they began to speak against one another: "You too were speaking with her, or you were doing such and such with other men." "How shameful!" "But then, how would other men know the auspicious and inauspicious marks in the private regions of your body? If that is so, why does she not speak? You too were speaking with her, or you were doing such and such with other men." "How shameful!" "But then, how would other men know the auspicious and inauspicious marks in the private regions of your body?"

When they then sought forgiveness from one another, each asked the other: "Who told you?" "It was the noble Cārkāśa." "And who told you?" "It was the noble Cārkāśa." They then denounced him, saying: "The noble Cārkāśa deliberately set us against each other." They spoke ill of him, cast blame upon him, and slandered him. Filled with doubt, when the elder monks went on their alms round, those women asked them: "Noble ones, what kind of monk is the noble Cārkāśa, the bhikṣu?" "Sisters, he is a monk who went forth from a family of chanters and is endowed with moral discipline." "Noble ones, if he is a monk endowed with moral discipline, how did he come to examine flesh wounds in the private regions of women's bodies?" They replied: "Sisters, he knows the science of reading bodily marks, and through that knowledge he discerned these things." "Noble ones, would you really reveal everything he was looking for?" And so they denounced him, cast blame upon him, and slandered him.

At that point, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then reflected: "Since all these slight faults and whatever else has arisen have come about from monks teaching Dharma in the domain of women, a monk must not teach Dharma in the domain of women." Having so reflected, he declared: "A monk must not teach Dharma in the domain of women."

After the Blessed One had declared that a monk must not teach Dharma in the domain of women, when monks went out on alms rounds, the women of those households said to them: "Noble ones, please teach us the Dharma." The monks replied: "Sisters, the Blessed One has not permitted it." The women then said: "If you will not teach us the Dharma, we will not offer you alms." At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Dharma may be taught in five statements: 'Sisters, form is impermanent; feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness are impermanent.' " When monks went on alms rounds and the women of those households said, "Noble ones, please teach us the Dharma," the monks taught them the Dharma in those five statements: "Sisters, form is impermanent; feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness are impermanent." But the women said: "Noble ones, please teach us more Dharma." The monks replied: "Sisters, the Blessed One has for the time being permitted only that much." The women then said: "Noble ones, very well — we will also offer you a little in the way of alms." The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Dharma may be taught in six statements: 'Sisters, the eye is impermanent; the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body, and the mind are impermanent.' " When monks went on alms rounds and the women of those households said, "Noble ones, please teach us the Dharma," the monks taught them in those six statements: "Sisters, the eye is impermanent; the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body, and the mind are impermanent." But the women said: "Noble ones, please teach us more Dharma." The monks replied: "Sisters, the Blessed One has for the time being permitted only that much." The women then said: "Noble ones, very well — we will also offer you a little in the way of alms." The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "With a man present, you may teach Dharma to whatever extent you wish." When monks went on alms rounds and the women of those households said, "Noble one, please teach us the Dharma," the monks replied: "Sisters, bring along some man and come." The women asked: "Noble ones, what need is there of a man?" The monks replied: "Sisters, the Blessed One has laid down a rule of training that with a man present, one may teach Dharma to whatever extent one wishes." The women said: "Noble ones, that is good — we too will be very well concealed and well guarded, and the noble ones will be able to teach the Dharma without fear." So they brought a man and came, and the monks taught as much Dharma as they wished and then departed.

Now when the group of six monks went on alms rounds, they said to the women of those households: "Sisters, sit down — we will teach you the Dharma." The women replied: "Noble ones, please bring a man and wait just a short while." The group of six said: "What need is there of a man? There is a dog, a monkey, a calf, an old man lying on his back, a cripple, and a boy sitting here — what more of a man do you need?" And having said this, they taught them the Dharma and departed.

When senior monks of long standing went on alms rounds and the women of those households said to them, "Noble ones, please teach us the Dharma," the senior monks replied: "Sisters, bring a man and then come back." The women said: "Noble ones, is there not a dog, a monkey, a calf, an old man lying on his back, a cripple, and a boy right here?" The senior monks said: "Sisters, we do not teach the Dharma in the presence of a man like that. Who then is it that teaches you the Dharma in the presence of a man like that?" The women replied: "It is the group of six." And that is why it was said that the circumstances of those monks were as they were.

The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One should seat a trustworthy man and then teach the Dharma as one wishes." The Blessed One had declared: "In the presence of women, one should teach the Dharma using five or six sentences." But when the group of six were teaching the Dharma using five sentences, they would deliberately proceed to a sixth sentence, and when teaching using six sentences, they would deliberately proceed to a seventh. The monks said to them: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has declared that one should teach the Dharma using five or six sentences in the presence of women. When you teach the Dharma using five sentences, do you deliberately proceed to a sixth, and when teaching using six sentences, do you deliberately proceed to a seventh?" They replied: "Venerable ones, for whomever five sentences are appropriate, six are also appropriate; and for whomever six are appropriate, seven are also appropriate. Does teaching six or seven sentences consume all the food or drain all the drink? By what reason should it be prohibited?" The monks said: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has declared that in the presence of women one should teach the Dharma using five or six sentences — so why, when you teach the Dharma using five sentences, do you deliberately proceed to a sixth, and when teaching using six sentences, do you deliberately proceed to a seventh?" And they reproached them, rebuked them, and spoke ill of them, and the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, in accordance with the precedent and the origin story, convened the community of monks — and so forth as before. "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, while knowing, pretended not to know" — and so forth as before.

The awakened one, the Blessed One, asked the group of six monks: "Monks, I declared that in the presence of women one should teach the Dharma using five or six sentences. Is it true that when you teach the Dharma using five sentences, you deliberately proceed to a sixth, and when teaching using six sentences, you deliberately proceed to a seventh?" They replied: "Blessed One, it is true." The awakened one, the Blessed One, rebuked them: "That is not in keeping with the conduct of a renunciant, it is not in accord, it is not proper, it is not consistent with the rule — such a thing should not be done by one who has gone forth." Then the Blessed One rebuked them in many ways and addressed the monks: "Monks, in light of this, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training should be established for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before.

"My hearers should recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Any monk who, in the presence of women, teaches the Dharma using more than five or six sentences — unless a trustworthy man is present — commits a transgression."

Now, "any monk" refers to a member of the group of six or any other such person. "In the presence of women" means in the presence of a woman or a young girl who is capable of understanding fully the meaning of teachings spoken well or spoken poorly.

"More than five or six sentences" means that when teaching the Dharma using five sentences, one intentionally lets it spill over into a sixth; and when teaching the Dharma using six sentences, one intentionally lets it spill over into a seventh.

"The Dharma" refers to what has been spoken by a buddha or explained by a śrāvaka of a buddha. "Teaching" means expounding. "Unless a trustworthy man is present" means setting aside the case where a trustworthy man is present.

"Commits a transgression" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinies of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower rebirths, and the miserable states. Furthermore, if that transgression is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome Dharmas. Therefore it is said to be "a transgression."

As to how a transgression arises in this matter: if a monk is teaching the Dharma to women on an upper floor, he should teach the Dharma using five or six sentences. If while teaching with five sentences he intentionally lets it spill over into the sixth, he commits a transgression. If while teaching with six sentences he intentionally lets it spill over into the seventh, he commits a transgression. If, after teaching, he enters the middle level of the building and she follows behind him, saying, "Noble one, please teach the Dharma," he should respond, "Sister, the Dharma has already been taught to you." If she then says again, "Noble one, please teach the Dharma here as well," then here too he should teach using five or six sentences. If while teaching with five sentences he intentionally lets it spill over into the sixth, he commits a transgression. If while teaching with six sentences he intentionally lets it spill over into the seventh, he commits a transgression. The same applies equally to the ground floor, the entranceway, and the staircase landings.

When a woman of discerning character asks one question after another in order to settle a point, to learn, to request recitation, to inquire about a specific matter, to estimate the time, or to discuss offerings, there is no transgression. There is no transgression when a monk speaks as much as he wishes to say in response to a prohibition, or when he speaks in an abbreviated way or speaks quickly. There is no transgression for a first offender, for someone who is mad, for someone whose mind is disturbed, or for someone afflicted by painful sensations.

The fifth transgression concerning teaching is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the group of six monks were reciting the Dharma in verse together with persons who had not received full ordination. This caused a high and loud noise to arise at the edge of the garden — a sound like the clamor of a great common crowd — like brahmins reciting their brahminic formulas, or like astrologers speaking in the place of calculation, and it became widely known. The Blessed One, at the edge of the garden, heard that high and loud noise, that sound like the clamor of a great common crowd. Having heard it, he addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, what is this high and loud noise at the edge of the garden — this sound like the clamor of a great common crowd — like brahmins reciting their brahminic formulas, or like astrologers speaking in the place of calculation?" "Venerable sir, the group of six monks are reciting the Dharma in verse together with persons who have not received full ordination. This has caused a high and loud noise to arise at the edge of the garden — a sound like the clamor of a great common crowd — like brahmins reciting their brahminic formulas, or like astrologers speaking in the place of calculation. That is what has become known."

"Ānanda, are monks reciting the Dharma in verse together with persons who have not received full ordination?" "Venerable sir, they are."

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence and this founding case and this circumstance, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth as before. "The Blessed Ones, the buddhas, while knowing, act as though unknowing" — and so forth, also as before. The Blessed One then rebuked the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you are reciting the Dharma in verse together with persons who have not received full ordination?" "Venerable sir, it is true." The Blessed One rebuked them, saying that this was not in keeping with the way of a renunciant, was not appropriate, was not fitting, was not in accord with proper conduct, and was not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Then the Blessed One, having rebuked them in many ways, spoke to the monks:

"Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My śrāvakas are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk recites the Dharma in verse together with a person who has not received full ordination incurs a transgression."

Now, "whatever monk" refers to the group of six or any others of that kind. "Together with a person who has not received full ordination" — those who have received full ordination are of two kinds: monks and nuns; anyone other than these has not received full ordination. "In verse" means with simultaneous words, with words spoken first, with simultaneous syllables, or with syllables spoken first.

How is it simultaneous words? When a teacher recites "Avoid all evil" and the attendant at the same moment recites "Avoid all evil" — that is simultaneous words. How is it words spoken first? When, before the teacher has yet recited "Avoid all evil," the attendant recites "Accomplish all that is wholesome" — that is words spoken first. How is it simultaneous syllables? When the teacher recites the syllable "a" and the attendant at the same moment also recites "a" — that is simultaneous syllables. How is it syllables spoken first? When the teacher has not yet recited the syllable "a" and the attendant recites "a" first — that is syllables spoken first.

"The Dharma" refers to what has been spoken by a buddha or explained by a śrāvaka of a buddha. "Reciting" means leading someone in memorization. "Incurs a transgression" means it causes one to burn, to fall, and to descend into hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, evil destinies, and places of miserable rebirth. Moreover, if that transgression is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome phenomena; hence it is said to incur a transgression.

As for how the transgression arises: if a monk, perceiving a person who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using simultaneous words, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, perceiving a person who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using words spoken first, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, with doubt about whether a person who has not received full ordination has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using simultaneous words, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, with doubt about whether a person who has not received full ordination has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using words spoken first, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, perceiving a person who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using simultaneous syllables, he incurs a transgression.

If a monk, perceiving a person who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using syllables spoken first, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, with doubt about whether a person who has not received full ordination has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using simultaneous syllables, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, with doubt about whether a person who has not received full ordination has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using syllables spoken first, he incurs a transgression.

If a monk, perceiving a person who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using simultaneous words, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk, perceiving a person who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using words spoken first, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk, with doubt about whether a person who has received full ordination has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using simultaneous words, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk, with doubt about whether a person who has received full ordination has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using words spoken first, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk, perceiving a person who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using simultaneous syllables, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk, perceiving a person who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using syllables spoken first, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk, with doubt about whether a person who has received full ordination has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using simultaneous syllables, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk, with doubt about whether a person who has received full ordination has not received full ordination, recites the Dharma with that person using syllables spoken first, he incurs a wrongdoing.

There is no transgression for one who stammers, or for one who speaks quickly. There is no transgression for one who causes another to join in a recitation, or for one who causes another to inquire into it. There is no transgression for one who publicly announces and then gives a Dharma transmission. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, or for one who is insane, or for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations. This completes the sixth section on transgressions related to recitation.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the forty-first fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Because certain monks had not abandoned their afflictions and were not free from attachment, they were causing the expulsion of offences in the Saṅgha, and some had gone astray in their conduct as they aged. When monks who were masters of the sūtras, masters of the Vinaya, and masters of the Mātṛkā heard of this, they caused those offenders to restore the transgressions in accordance with the Dharma, and while those monks were observing their rehabilitation and conducting themselves in a manner to be approved, at the time of the Saṅgha's alms round, faithful brahmin householders said: "Those who understand what is precious also examine what lies nearby and gather up those precious things." And the elder monks who were undertaking the alms round on behalf of the Saṅgha also began the alms gathering for the Saṅgha. But the group of six, those pot-bellied ones, ate and remained seated. When others reproached them, the group of six heard this and said: "Friends, do you think that these others are providing for the Saṅgha with the Dharma of good conduct? Not so — these ones are the ones doing the work of those who have been suspended." When asked, "What have these others done?" the group of six replied, "They have done what should not be done with the hand, and they have done such and such." And they spoke ill of the circumstances even of those who were elders among the monks, saying: "If the situation of even the senior elder monks is like this, what will become of the situation of the middle monks and the junior monks?" They disparaged them, they spread slander, and they spoke maliciously against them.

Now the monks who were performing the restoration ceremony were, in the late afternoon, anointing the stūpas of the Blessed One's hair and nail relics with a soft, fragrant ointment. At that time the group of six questioned their fellow residents and attendants, saying: "Novices, where have your preceptors and teachers gone?" Those attendants replied: "They have gone to do meritorious deeds — they are anointing the stūpas of the Blessed One's hair and nail relics with a soft, fragrant ointment. You too should perform such meritorious deeds." The group of six then said: "Do you suppose they are anointing the stūpas of the hair and nail relics because they are people of good conduct? Not so — these are the ones doing the work of those who have been suspended." When asked what those monks had done, the group of six replied: "They did what should not be done with the hand, and they did such and such." And when the monks who had been performing the restoration ceremony arose from that transgression, the group of six then directed the novices: "You novices, do this and that." But those novices replied: "Why don't you do it yourselves? It is not fitting for us to do it." The group of six said: "If it is fitting for you to do it in this way, then why is it not fitting?" The novices replied: "Even so, we have already repaired that transgression in accordance with the Dharma." The group of six asked: "Who told you that?" The novices replied: "The group of six told us."

Thereupon certain monks of little consequence began to reproach, revile, spread slander, and speak maliciously against those monks, saying: "Why do these monks report infractions involving degrading offenses to one who has not received full ordination?" This matter was then reported by the monks to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared that this should be answered with the following words:

Who is without fault,
who is the person who does no wrong,
who will never be utterly bewildered, who is said to be ever steadfast —
it is one liberated through perfect knowledge, the fully awakened Buddha, the supremely knowing one.
That one is without fault,
that one is the person who does no wrong, that one will never be utterly bewildered, that one is said to be ever steadfast.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, with this as the occasion, and in these circumstances, convened an assembly of monks — and so forth, as before. And as before: the Blessed Buddhas know and yet feign not to know — and so forth. The Blessed Buddha then questioned the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you reported an infraction involving a degrading offense to one who had not received full ordination?" They replied: "Blessed One, it is true." The Blessed One rebuked them, saying that such conduct is unworthy of a renunciant, is not in accordance with the rules, is not fitting, is not in harmony with proper discipline, and is not something that one who has gone forth should do. After rebuking them in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks and said that, seeing the ten benefits, he would establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall proclaim this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Any monk who reports an infraction involving a degrading offense to one who has not received full ordination commits a transgression." Thus did the Blessed One establish this rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

At Śrāvastī, a monk acted impulsively and —

There was a nun named Gsalma who behaved in households in such a way that the congregation of ordinary people would come to know of it and lose faith. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you shall appoint a monk to make individual announcements in households, doing so alongside the impulsive monk and the nun Gsalma. A monk who lacks the following five qualities shall not be appointed to make individual announcements in households, and if he has already been appointed he shall be removed. What are the five? He goes with desire, he goes with aversion, he goes with delusion, he goes with fear, and he does not know which households have been informed and which have not. A monk who possesses the following five qualities shall be appointed to make individual announcements in households, and if he has already been appointed he shall not be removed. What are the five? He does not go with desire, he does not go with aversion, he does not go with delusion, he does not go with fear, and he knows which households have been informed and which have not.

"He shall be appointed in the following manner. Having prepared the seat and struck the gong, one shall properly inform the monks using the words of inquiry, and when the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in harmony, one shall first ask for consent. 'Venerable monk, called such-and-such, do you consent to making individual announcements in households, together with the impulsive monk and the nun Gsalma? If you consent, say: I consent.'"

After that, one monk shall make the motion and perform the formal act. "Venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear this. The impulsive monk and the nun Gsalma have been behaving in households in such a way that the congregation of ordinary people would come to know of it and lose faith. The monk called such-and-such wishes to make individual announcements in households together with the impulsive monk and the nun Gsalma. If it is the right time and the Saṅgha approves, may the Saṅgha grant permission. The Saṅgha is appointing the monk called such-and-such to make individual announcements in households. The monk called such-and-such will make individual announcements in households together with the impulsive monk and the nun Gsalma. This is the motion.

"The formal act shall be performed as follows: Venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear this. The impulsive monk and the nun Gsalma have been behaving in households in such a way that the congregation of ordinary people would come to know of it and lose faith. The monk called such-and-such wishes to make individual announcements in households together with the impulsive monk and the nun Gsalma. For that purpose, the Saṅgha is appointing the monk called such-and-such to make individual announcements in households. The monk called such-and-such will make individual announcements in households together with the impulsive monk and the nun Gsalma. Those venerable ones who consent to the appointment of the monk called such-and-such to make individual announcements in households shall remain silent; those who do not consent shall speak. The Saṅgha has consented and granted permission, and the Saṅgha has appointed the monk called such-and-such to make individual announcements in households. Since no one has spoken, it is taken to be so."

"Monks, I shall now establish the rules of conduct for a monk who makes individual announcements in households. The monk who makes individual announcements in households shall speak as follows: 'Venerable ones, hear this. There are those who disgrace households —

— those who disgrace households are of the following kind. Consider, for example, a prosperous rice field upon which an overwhelming hailstorm descends: that very rice is utterly ruined, wasted, and rendered unfit in an improper manner. Or again, consider a prosperous sugarcane field in which a disease called the red blight appears: that very sugarcane is utterly ruined, wasted, and rendered unfit in an improper manner. In just such a way, venerable ones, you should take note of the standard demonstrated by this monk and this nun. For this monk and this nun are, like a scorched barley-seed, possessed of a quality that makes them unfit to remain in this Dharma and Vinaya. Look to the elder monks, the elders: to the Blessed One, and to the Elder Kauṇḍinya, and to Vāṣpa, and to Aśvajit, and to Bhadrīka, and to the Elder Yaśas, and to Vimala, and to Gavāmpati, and to Subāhu, and to Śāriputra, and to Mahāmaudgalyāyana, and to Mahākauṣṭhila, and to Mahākappina, and to Mahākātyāyana, and to Nadī Kāśyapa, and to Nadāśvajit Kāśyapa, and to Gayā Kāśyapa, and to Kubjita Kāśyapa, and to Mahā Kāśyapa, and to Nandaka, and to Kimbila, and to Bhadrāpāla, and to Rāhula, and to Svāgata, and to Upananda, and to Doṣāpratiyāta Rāhula, and to Sthavira, and to Upasthāyin, and to Vīmāṃsaka, and to Mahāpanthaka, and to Yaśodatta, and to those and all the other elder monks among the elder monks — look to them!'

When the monk who makes individual announcements in households has gone out to make individual announcements in households, and a certain monk, having quickly heard that the Saṅgha has appointed the monk called such-and-such to make individual announcements in households, goes to him and says: 'Are you going to go and expose us in households? You should comply with the lawful instruction of the Saṅgha. If you do such and such, your belly shall be split open and your intestines shall be used to wind around the Jetavana, and as for your head, there is no reason why it should not be hung, like a vessel of sesame oil, at the gate of the Jetavana.' And having immediately denounced himself to the monks, saying: 'It was I who said to him: if you do such and such, your belly shall be split open and your intestines shall be used to wind around the Jetavana, and as for your head, there is no reason why it should not be hung, like a vessel of sesame oil, at the gate of the Jetavana — and therefore I am unwilling to go and make individual announcements in households' — at that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: 'Monks, that foolish person is capable of killing an individual, but he is not capable of killing the Saṅgha. Therefore the Saṅgha should make individual announcements in households. It should be done as follows: it should be carried out as a single-motion act of the Saṅgha. And it should be done in this way: having arranged the seats and struck the wooden signal-board, and having duly informed the monks with the proper words of inquiry, when the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in harmony, one monk should make the motion: "Venerable Saṅgha, please hear this. The monk called such-and-such and the nun called such-and-such have behaved in households in such and such a way as to cause the multitude of common people to become faithless and aware of it. The monk called such-and-such and the nun called such-and-such, having caused the multitude of common people to become faithless and aware of it by behaving in households in such and such a way, and the monk called such-and-such and the nun called Gsal ma are eager to be proclaimed separately in households — if there is no one who is willing, and if the time is right for the Saṅgha and it consents, let the Saṅgha grant its permission. Let the Saṅgha separate the monk such-and-such and the nun Gsal ma, and wherever someone sees the monk called such-and-such and the nun called such-and-such behaving in households in such and such a way as to cause the multitude of common people to become faithless and aware of it, let that person, in that very household, take note of the extent of what this monk and this nun have been shown to be. This monk and this nun, like a burned-out grain-stalk, have qualities that make them unfit to be planted in this teaching and discipline. Look to the Blessed One and to the elder monks, the elders." This is the motion.

The Blessed One then declared that they were to be proclaimed separately in households that were known, and so they went about proclaiming separately in households. While they were proclaiming separately in households both in those that were known and those that were unknown, there came a time when they were reduced to want in their alms-rounds, and the monks reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "They may proclaim separately in households that are known, but they shall not proclaim separately in households that are not known. Therefore, this is subject to the permission of the Saṅgha."

Thereupon the Blessed One, having spoken words of praise for those who desire training, who are respectful toward training, and who have proper equipment for training, and having given a teaching that was in accord with that, that was its greater part, and that was endowed with qualities befitting it, declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore what came before was the rule, and this is the permission. My hearers are to recite the following as the foundation of training in the Vinaya: furthermore, if any monk discloses a grave offense to one who has not received full ordination, except with the permission of the Saṅgha, it is an offense entailing expiation."

The term "any monk" refers to the group of six, or any others of that kind. The phrase "one who has not received full ordination" is explained as follows: those who have received full ordination are of two kinds — fully ordained monks and fully ordained nuns; anyone other than these has not received full ordination. The term "grave offense" is explained as follows: grave offenses are of two kinds — those that provoke a defeat, and those that provoke the remainder of the Saṅgha's offenses. Why are these called grave? Because of their very nature and because of the provocation they entail. The phrase "discloses it" means to speak it. The phrase "except with the permission of the Saṅgha" means that the Saṅgha's permission is set aside. The phrase "it is an offense entailing expiation" means that it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the states of hell-beings, animals, and hungry ghosts, into the wretched realms, and into states of wrong downfall. Furthermore, if that offense is not confessed and not individually confessed, it obstructs virtuous qualities — therefore it is said to be an offense entailing expiation.

As for how the transgression arises: if a monk, perceiving as unknown the households that are unknown, proclaims separately to a monk, an offense entailing expiation arises. If a monk, being of two minds about whether the households that are unknown are unknown, proclaims separately to a monk, an offense entailing expiation arises. If a monk, perceiving as unknown the households that are known, proclaims separately to a monk, a wrong deed arises. If a monk, being of two minds about whether the households that are known are unknown, proclaims separately to a monk, a wrong deed arises. When the announcement is made publicly by drum, there is no transgression.

When drawn as a picture on a surface, and thereafter, there is no transgression. If one thinks, "Just as I myself know it, so too does everyone in the world know it," there is no transgression. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, who is insane, who is mentally disturbed, or who is overwhelmed by painful sensations. The seventh offense of declaring disgraceful conduct is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was residing at Vaiśālī, in the Peaked House in the Monkey Pool. At that time five hundred fishermen were encamped along the banks of the delightful river. Among them there were two nets called the Standard Net and the Great Net. Sometimes they would cast the Standard Net, and sometimes they would cast the Great Net. When there were no fish to be bought, they would cast the Standard Net; and when there were fish to be bought, they would cast the Great Net. Then on a certain occasion a festival arose at Vaiśālī, and they cast both nets together — two hundred and fifty men casting the Standard Net, and two hundred and fifty men casting the Great Net. Those who had cast the Standard Net piled up great heaps of fish, tortoises, frogs, young crocodiles, catfish, and many other creatures, like great mounds of sesame, thick rice porridge, pine needles, and beans heaped up together. Those who had cast the Great Net caught a creature that had entered the delightful river from the great ocean — a huge creature of the crocodile-fish species, as large as a donkey lying down — and they began to haul it in. When they hauled it, it awoke, and carrying the two hundred and fifty fishermen along with the Great Net, it plunged off in the direction of the current. Those fishermen called out to the other two hundred and fifty fishermen: "Friends, the Great Net and we ourselves are being carried away — turn back and help!" Hearing this, the other two hundred and fifty fishermen also hurried over and applied themselves to the same task, yet even so all five hundred fishermen, together with the Great Net, were carried off in the direction of the current and could not hold it. Helpless, they called out on all sides: "Friends, the Great Net and we are being carried away — come to our aid, turn back!" Herdsmen tending cattle and livestock who had not witnessed the event, woodcutters, grass cutters, those who earned their living on the roads, those who earned their living by detours, and many hundreds of thousands of other living beings turned back, and by battering and striking it with their bodies the net was torn and badly torn, until that creature of the crocodile-fish species was pulled from the water onto dry land. It had eighteen heads and thirty-six eyes. Among its heads, some resembled the head of an elephant, some the head of a horse, some the head of a she-camel, the head of a donkey, the head of a bull, the head of a monkey, the head of a lion, the head of a tiger, the head of a bear, the head of a yak, the head of a snake, the head of a cat, the head of a goat, the head of a sheep, the head of a deer, the head of a buffalo, the head of a pig, and the head of a dog. Word spread everywhere among the five hundred fishermen along the banks of the delightful river that the Great Net had caught a huge creature of the crocodile-fish species — as large as a donkey lying down — that had entered the delightful river from the great ocean, that it had been pulled from the water onto dry land, and that it had eighteen heads and thirty-six eyes. Hearing this, many hundreds of thousands of living beings gathered on the banks of the delightful river.

Some were struck with wonder at the sight. Others were stirred by the roots of virtue they had planted in former lives. The six teachers, Pūraṇa and the rest, who were dwelling and residing in Vaiśālī, were likewise seized with curiosity and came there. The great crowd of people was filled with amazement, staring wide-eyed, and those with discernment began to examine and discuss it: "Some of the heads on this creature resemble the head of an elephant," they said, "and then they went on to examine it further. Others said, "Some of the heads resemble the head of a dog, and then from that they examined further."

Now, since the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, possess not even the slightest trace of unknowing, unseeing, ignorance, or failure of clear comprehension — from that point up to the Blessed One causing those five hundred fishermen to go forth and receiving their full ordination, all of this is to be set out in full in the manner already taught in the earlier section on the fourth case of defeat.

Then at another time, those five hundred monks on the banks of the delightful river, delighting in, striving at, and applying themselves to their practice of robes and bowl, dwelling alone in seclusion, heedful, composed, and self-contained — for the sake of that very purpose on account of which young men of good family shave off hair and beard, put on the saffron robes, and go forth from home into homelessness through faith in nothing but the truth — had in that very lifetime, through their own direct knowledge, directly realized and accomplished the supreme pinnacle of the holy life, and had come to understand: "Birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is nothing more beyond this existence." They had become arhats, free from attachment to the three realms, with minds equal toward a clod of earth and toward gold, equal in their regard for sky and for the palm of a hand, who, like sandalwood set out for use, had split open the cave of existence through insight, and who had attained insight, direct knowledge, and individual perfect understanding. They had turned their backs on existence, on the gains of desire, and on honors, and were worthy of veneration, reverence, and open praise by the gods — both those with faculties and those accompanied by their lesser faculties.

At that time there was a terrible famine in the wilderness, and even parents found it exceedingly difficult to feed their own children — to say nothing of what had come to pass for wandering beggars who had difficulty obtaining food. Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, now there is a terrible famine in the wilderness; wandering beggars find it difficult to obtain food, and even parents find it exceedingly difficult to feed their own children — still less what has come about for beggars. Therefore, monks, come here and, with such invitation as is fitting, with such words of welcome as are fitting, and with such companionship as is fitting, agree to spend the rains retreat in the village of Śoṅgyeday on the outskirts of Vaiśālī. I too shall accept the invitation to spend the rains retreat here in this very village of Odmachen, together with the venerable Ānanda who is attending me. It would not be proper for all of you to be troubled by going on alms rounds."

The monks replied, "Venerable sir, we shall do as you have commanded," and having heard this from the Blessed One, they accepted the invitation to spend the rains retreat in the village of Śoṅgyeday on the outskirts of Vaiśālī, with such invitation as was fitting, with such words of welcome as were fitting, and with such companionship as was fitting. The Blessed One too accepted the invitation to spend the rains retreat in that very village of Odmachen together with the venerable Ānanda who was attending him.

Thereupon those five hundred monks thought to themselves: "Since the Blessed One has given this instruction, there is no relative of ours here, but our relatives are settled in the fishermen's village. Let us go to the fishermen's village, visit our relatives, and spend the rains retreat in the environs of the fishermen's village for a year, along with the leaves and — — flowers and leaf-huts for the rains retreat, without fail."

Then those five hundred monks on the bank of the delightful river thought to themselves: "In the past, when we went to the fishermen's village and visited our relatives, we proclaimed to one another's relatives qualities that were not genuine. Now let us proclaim to one another genuine qualities." With that thought, those five hundred monks went to the fishermen's village, visited their relatives, and formally undertook the rains retreat in the environs of the fishermen's village, making leaf-huts of leaves and flowers.

When their relatives came to visit them, the monks said to those relatives who had come: "Relatives, those relatives in whose village a community of monks has undertaken the rains retreat in a place worthy of offerings in such a manner as this — those relatives have obtained good fortune indeed. For this monk has attained the perception of impermanence, the perception of suffering in what is impermanent, the perception of no-self in what is suffering, the perception of disenchantment with food, the perception of non-delight in the entire world, the perception of fault, the perception of abandonment, the perception of freedom from attachment, the perception of cessation, the perception of death, the perception of the unattractive, the perception of the bloated corpse, the perception of the festering corpse, the perception of the livid corpse, the perception of the gnawed corpse, the perception of the devoured corpse, the perception of the blood-stained corpse, the perception of the scattered corpse, the perception of the skeleton, and the perception that individually examines emptiness. This monk has attained the first meditative concentration, the second, the third, and the fourth; loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity; the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothingness, the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception; the fruit of stream-entry, the fruit of once-returning, the fruit of non-returning; the domain of miraculous powers, the divine ear, thorough knowledge of others' minds, recollection of former lives, knowledge of death and rebirth, and the attainment of the exhaustion of all defilements. This monk is accomplished in the eight liberations of an arhat. This monk is one who is liberated in both respects."

The relatives said to them: "Noble ones, have you yourselves attained such an accumulation of qualities?" "We have." The world delights in qualities, and so the relatives, taking even from their own children, resolved to give alms to the monks.

Now, while a buddha, a Blessed One, is alive, dwelling, living, and abiding, it is by the very nature of things that there are two great assemblies of śrāvakas: the first is at the time of approaching the rains retreat at the full moon of the middle summer month, and the second is at the full moon of the middle autumn month. Those who, having received instruction at the time of approaching the rains retreat at the full moon of the middle summer month, undertake the rains retreat in villages, towns, districts, and royal residences — when the full moon of the middle autumn month comes around, they report what they have attained and undertake to mix together in fellowship for the sake of attaining what they have not yet attained.

Then those monks who had undertaken the rains retreat in the villages surrounding Vaiśālī, when the three months of the rains had passed, possessed of Dharma-robles and holding their Dharma-robles, thin, humble, lean, and dried out, their bodies fallen away, with their almsbowls —

— holding their Dharma-robles, they wandered and walked toward that place, Vaiśālī. As they wandered and walked along, stage by stage, they arrived at the town of Vaiśālī. And the Venerable Ānanda saw those very many monks from a great distance. Seeing them, and delighted with those who dwell in the holy life (brahmacarya), he welcomed them with warm and friendly words, and took their almsbowls, Dharma-robles, carrying-straps, head-cloths, round pouches for pouring over the head, vessels of oil and grain, hats, worn-out sandals, and leather sandals, and spoke these words as well: "Welcome, venerable ones! Come, come! Venerable ones, from where have you come here just now? Where did you undertake the rains retreat?" "Venerable Ānanda, we have come here from the village of Spongbyed. We undertook the rains retreat in the village of Spongbyed." "Venerable ones, did you undertake the rains retreat in the village of Spongbyed in comfort and ease? Were you not wearied by the alms-round?" "Venerable Ānanda, we did indeed undertake the rains retreat in the village of Spongbyed in some comfort and ease, but we were wearied by the alms-round." "Venerable ones, it appears to be so. For thus, harassed and exhausted by the alms-round, you have become thin, humble, lean, and dried out, your bodies fallen away, your skin, flesh, and blood depleted."

Now those monks who had undertaken the rains retreat in the villages surrounding the fishermen's village — they too, when the three months of the rains had passed, possessed of Dharma-robles and holding their Dharma-robles, their complexions, skin, flesh, and blood full and flourishing, holding their almsbowls and Dharma-robles, wandered and walked toward that place, Vaiśālī. As they wandered and walked along, stage by stage, they arrived at the town of Vaiśālī. And the Venerable Ānanda saw those very many monks from a great distance. Seeing them, and delighted with those who dwell in the holy life, he welcomed them with warm and friendly words, and took their almsbowls, Dharma-robles, carrying-straps, head-cloths, round pouches for pouring over the head, vessels of oil and grain, hats, worn-out sandals, and leather sandals, and spoke these words as well: "Welcome, venerable ones! Come, come! Venerable ones, from where have you come here just now? Where did you undertake the rains retreat?" "Venerable Ānanda, we have come here from the fishermen's village. We undertook the rains retreat in the fishermen's village." "Venerable ones, did you undertake the rains retreat in the fishermen's village in comfort and ease? Were you not wearied by the alms-round?" "Venerable Ānanda, we undertook the rains retreat in the fishermen's village in full comfort and ease, and we were not wearied by the alms-round either." "Venerable ones, it appears to be so indeed. For thus, free from the trouble of the alms-round, your complexions, skin, flesh, and blood have become full and flourishing."

"Venerable ones, right now there is a terrible famine, a place of desolation fit for wandering ascetics, where food is hard to come by, and parents find it difficult even to feed their own children — to say nothing of wandering mendicants, how much more would anything further be needed. Here then, venerable ones, what was the cause and what was the condition for your having been free from the trouble of the alms-round?"

"Venerable Ānanda, among us, in the presence of our relatives, we proclaimed one another's genuine qualities, each the qualities of the other, saying: 'This monk has the perception of impermanence, and the perception of suffering in what is impermanent, and the perception of selflessness in what is suffering, and the perception of what is adverse in food, and —'" the perception of non-delight in the entire world, the perception of danger, the perception of abandonment, the perception of freedom from attachment, the perception of cessation, the perception of death, the perception of the unattractive, the perception of the bloated, the perception of the festering, the perception of the worm-infested, the perception of the gnawed, the perception of the eaten, the perception of the blood-smeared, the perception of the scattered, the perception of bones, and the perception that individually examines everything as empty. This monk had attained the first meditative concentration (dhyāna), the second, the third, and the fourth, as well as loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity, as well as the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothingness, the sphere of neither perception nor non-perception, the fruit of stream-entry, the fruit of once-returning, the fruit of non-return, the domain of supernormal powers, the divine ear, knowledge of others' minds, recollection of previous lives, knowledge of death and rebirth, and the attainment of the exhaustion of all defilements. This monk was one who meditates on the eight liberations of an arhat. This monk was one liberated in both respects.' In this way they proclaimed one another's genuine qualities. Was this proclamation genuine or not genuine? It was genuine. Venerable ones, is it permissible to declare the supreme human Dharma — a truth — to one who has not received full ordination? It may be permissible, and it may be impermissible; yet we spoke as we did. Why do monks of few virtues censure, rebuke, and slander other monks, saying they declared the supreme human Dharma — a truth — to one who has not received full ordination? At that point, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident and with this as the basis of the case, assembled the community of monks — and so forth, exactly as before. The Awakened Blessed Ones, though knowing, cause it to be asked — and so forth, also as before. The Awakened Blessed One questioned the monks who were dwelling on the banks of the delightful river: "Is it true, monks, that you declared the supreme human Dharma — a truth — to one who has not received full ordination?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Awakened Blessed One rebuked lack of effort, lack of application, and acting without due reflection. Then the Blessed One praised effort, application, and acting with due reflection, and declared to the monks: "Monks, having rightly seen the ten benefits, one should lay down the rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, exactly as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Furthermore, whatever monk declares the supreme human Dharma — a truth — to one who has not received full ordination, that constitutes a transgression.

Now, 'whatever monk' refers to one who belongs to this teaching. 'One who has not received full ordination' — full ordination here is of two kinds: a fully ordained monk and a fully ordained nun; anyone other than these has not received full ordination. 'The supreme human Dharma' (uttaramanuṣyadharmā) means the nirvāṇa of human beings — the state attained by humans, but not attained by those who are neuter, hermaphrodites, or persons of indeterminate sex; and as for hell-beings, animals, and hungry ghosts, that goes without saying.

"Superior" means: the form realm is superior to the desire realm, and the formless realm is superior to the form realm. Alternatively, "the human Dharma" refers to the five hindrances, and "the superior" refers to the abandonment of those hindrances. "True" means that the thing in question is genuinely real. "If one speaks" means if one utters it. "That constitutes a transgression" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the states of woe — into the hells, the animal realm, the hungry ghost realm, the lower destinies, and the realms of utter downfall. Furthermore, if that transgression is not confessed and not individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — and that is why it is said to constitute a transgression.

Now, as to how a transgression comes about, the intermediate summary states:

Without altering one's perception, in hermitages and in households, spreading out one's seat, claiming one's own distinguishing marks, and presenting oneself as superior.

If a monk, without altering his perception, his patience, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "I have seen the gods" — that constitutes a transgression. From nāgas and yakṣas, continuing in the same way down through putrefying corpses — if he says "I have seen them" — that constitutes a transgression. Even if he says "I have seen the carrion-eaters of the charnel ground" — that constitutes a misdeed.

If a monk, without altering his perception, his patience, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "I have heard the voice of the gods" — that constitutes a transgression. From nāgas and yakṣas, continuing in the same way down through putrefying corpses — if he says "I have heard their voice" — that constitutes a transgression. Even if he says "I have heard the voice of the charnel-ground carrion-eaters" — that constitutes a misdeed.

If a monk, without altering his perception, his patience, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "I am going to visit the gods" — that constitutes a transgression. From nāgas and yakṣas, continuing in the same way down through putrefying corpses — if he says "I am going to visit them" — that constitutes a transgression. Even if he says "I am going to visit the charnel-ground carrion-eaters" — that constitutes a misdeed.

If a monk, without altering his perception, his patience, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "The gods are coming to see me" — that constitutes a transgression. From nāgas and yakṣas, continuing in the same way down through putrefying corpses — if he says "They are coming to see me" — that constitutes a transgression. Even if he says "Even the charnel-ground carrion-eaters are coming to see me" — that constitutes a misdeed.

If a monk, without altering his perception, his patience, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "I converse with the gods, I speak with them as they arrive, I take delight in them individually, and I dwell together with them constantly" — that constitutes a transgression. From nāgas and yakṣas, continuing in the same way down through putrefying corpses — if he says "I converse with them, I speak with them as they arrive, I take delight in them individually, and I dwell together with them constantly" — that constitutes a transgression. Even if he says "I converse with the charnel-ground carrion-eaters, I speak with them as they arrive —

I take delight in them individually, and I dwell together with them constantly" — that constitutes a transgression. If a monk, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "The gods converse with me, they speak with me as they arrive, I take delight in them individually, and I dwell together with them constantly" — that constitutes a downfall. From nāgas and yakṣas, continuing in the same way down through putrefying corpses — if he says "I converse with them, I speak with them as they arrive, I take delight in them individually, and I dwell together with them constantly" — that constitutes a downfall. Even if he says "I converse with the charnel-ground carrion-eaters, I speak with them as they arrive, I take delight in them individually, and I dwell together with them constantly" — that constitutes a transgression. If a monk, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "While still in the process of attaining, I have attained the perception of impermanence" — that constitutes a downfall. From the perception of suffering in what is impermanent, continuing in the same way down through the perception that individually discerns emptiness — if he says "I have attained it" — that constitutes a downfall. If a monk, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "While still in the process of attaining, I have attained the first meditative concentration" — that constitutes a downfall. Likewise for the second, third, and fourth, continuing in the same way down through claiming "I am an arhat, one who meditates on the eight liberations, and one who is liberated from both sides" — that constitutes a downfall.

Consider the following case: a great many monks are dwelling in a remote forest hermitage, and they are being harmed there by non-human beings. Among them there is a monk who is a stream-enterer, a once-returner, a non-returner, or an arhat, and these non-human beings do not harm that monk. If another monk, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "I too am dwelling in that remote forest hermitage, and the non-human beings there do not harm me" — that constitutes a downfall.

Consider the following case: a great many monks have been invited as guests to households and are being fed there, and in that place striped seats have been set out for them. Among them there is a monk who is a stream-enterer, a once-returner, a non-returner, or an arhat, and a striped seat is offered in close attendance to that monk. If another monk, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "I too have been invited as a guest to that household and have eaten there, and a striped seat is offered in close attendance to me as well" — that constitutes a downfall.

Consider the following case: a great many monks dwelling in a hermitage, relying on a small sign, a particular characteristic of the cause of calm abiding, suppress afflictions through a worldly path, such that attachment to sense pleasures and malicious intent do not arise pervasively in their mindstream. If a monk, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "I too am dwelling in that remote forest hermitage, and while dwelling there, relying on a slight grasp of the particular characteristic that is a cause of calm abiding, through a worldly path I suppress afflictions, such that attachment to sense pleasures and malicious intent do not arise pervasively in my mindstream either" — that constitutes a downfall.

If a monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk who sees the gods" while not saying "That monk is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. If he says "There exists one who sees them" — ranging from the nāgas and yakṣas down through decomposing corpses, as before — while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. And even if he says "There exists a monk who sees the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

If a monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk who hears the sounds of the gods" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. If he says "There exists one who hears their sounds" — ranging from the nāgas and yakṣas down through decomposing corpses, as before — while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. And even if he says "There exists a monk who hears the sounds of the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

If a monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk who goes in order to see the gods" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. If he says "There exists one who goes to see them" — ranging from the nāgas and yakṣas down through decomposing corpses, as before — while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. And even if he says "There exists a monk who goes to see the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

If a monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk to whom the gods come in order to be seen" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. If he says "There exists one to whom they come to be seen" — ranging from the nāgas and yakṣas down through decomposing corpses, as before — while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. And even if he says "There exists a monk to whom the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground come in order to be seen" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

If a monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk who converses together with the gods, speaks with them pleasantly, rejoices with each of them individually, and dwells together with them constantly" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. And ranging from the nāgas and and ranging from the yakṣas, just as before, down to the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground — saying "There exists a monk who converses together with them, speaks with them pleasantly, rejoices with each of them individually, and dwells together with them constantly" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. And even saying "There exists a monk who converses together with the flesh-eaters of the charnel ground, speaks with them pleasantly, rejoices with each of them individually, and dwells together with them constantly" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

If a monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk who has attained the perception of impermanence" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. Just as with the perception of impermanence, so also ranging through those who have, just as before, attained the perception of individual analysis of emptiness — saying this while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

If a monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk who has attained the first meditative concentration" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall. Just as with the first meditative concentration, so also ranging through those who have, just as before, attained the second, the third, and the fourth, down to the monk who meditates on the eight liberations of an arhat and who is liberated in both ways — saying this while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

Now, in the following case: many monks are dwelling in a remote wilderness hermitage, and there non-human beings are harming them. In that place, there is a monk who is a stream-enterer, a once-returner, a non-returner, or an arhat, and the non-human beings there do not harm him. Then another monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk dwelling in that remote wilderness hermitage whom the non-human beings there do not harm" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

Here is another case: a great many monks are invited as guests to households and eat there, and in those places striped cushions are spread out for them. There, a monk who is a stream-enterer, a once-returner, a non-returner, or an arhat is made to clear away the striped cushions from that place. Then another monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk who is invited as a guest to that household and eats there, and in that place too is made to clear away the striped cushions" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

Here is another case: a great many monks dwelling in a hermitage, relying on even a slight degree of the characteristic mark of the cause of calm abiding, suppress the afflictions through a worldly path, such that attachment to desirable objects and ill will do not arise throughout their mental continuum. Then another monk, presenting himself in a certain way, without having altered his perception, his forbearance, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view, says "There exists a monk dwelling in that remote wilderness hermitage who, relying on even a slight degree of the characteristic mark of the cause of calm abiding, suppresses the afflictions through a worldly path, such that attachment to desirable objects and ill will do not arise throughout his mental continuum" while not saying "That is myself" — that constitutes a downfall.

This completes the eighth offense of speaking a superhuman quality of a person.

The Vinaya Analysis (Skt. Vibhaṅga), the forty-second fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in Rājagṛha, in the Bamboo Grove of Kalandaka, in the Cool Forest. At that time, the venerable Gyabu Norné was appointed to arrange lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food. He was a person of faith, of good and virtuous intention, and he was diligent in the work of serving the Saṅgha in accordance with the Dharma. There was nothing at all that he did not offer or fully give to the buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, or to the monks he approved of. Having offered and given in full in this way, his three robes were poor, made of patched cloth, and thoroughly worn out. The monks said: "Venerable ones, this venerable Gyabu Norné is a person of faith, of good and virtuous intention, and he is diligent in the work of serving the Saṅgha in accordance with the Dharma. There is nothing at all that he has not offered or fully given to the buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, or to the monks he approved of. Having offered and given in full in this way, his three robes are poor, made of patched cloth, and thoroughly worn out. If the Saṅgha were to obtain some large bolts of cloth, let them be given to the venerable Gyabu Norné." Having said this, when the Saṅgha did obtain large bolts of cloth, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "If the request is made and then given, it will be unimpeachable. This is how it should be done: having prepared the seats, strike the gong, and having properly informed the monks with the words of the inquiry, once the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in harmony, let one monk make the request: 'May the venerable Saṅgha please hear. This venerable Gyabu Norné, being a person of faith and of good and virtuous intention, is diligent in the work of serving the Saṅgha in accordance with the Dharma. There is nothing at all that he has not offered or fully given to the buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, or to the monks he approved of.

Having thus offered and fully given in that way, his three robes are poor and patched and utterly worn out, while the Saṅgha is abundantly supplied with large bolts of cloth. If it is the right time for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha grant this, and let the Saṅgha bestow a large bolt of cloth upon the venerable Gyabu Norné. This is the motion.

Later, after the Saṅgha had given him the large bolt of cloth, two monks — the monk Dzawo and the monk Salékye — who had had a connection with the venerable Gyabu Norné across many lifetimes, stood before the assembled monks and spoke critically, saying: "These venerable ones are in this manner, out of personal friendship, dedicating to an individual all the gains obtained by the Saṅgha at once. How could the Saṅgha's acquisition of gain possibly succeed in this way?" They reviled them, they stirred up trouble, and they spread malicious talk. At that time the monks reported this matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One assembled the Saṅgha of monks on account of this occurrence, this basis of discussion, and this occasion — and so forth, just as before. The passage beginning "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, make inquiry" likewise proceeds just as before.

The awakened Blessed One then addressed the monk Dzawo and the monk Salékye: "Is it true, monks, that after having first properly consented, you subsequently said 'The venerable ones dedicated to an individual what had been dedicated as Saṅgha gain, doing so out of personal friendship,' and spoke in condemnation?" "Venerable One, it is true." The awakened Blessed One then rebuked them, declaring: "This is not the conduct of an ascetic; it is not fitting; it is not proper; it is not in accordance with the Vinaya; this is not what those who have gone forth should do." Then the Blessed One, having rebuked them in many ways, addressed the monks:

"Monks, therefore, perceiving ten genuine benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, just as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk, having first properly consented and thereafter saying 'The venerable ones, acting out of personal friendship, dedicated to an individual what had been dedicated as Saṅgha gain' — if he speaks in such a way, it is a transgression."

Now, the phrase "whatever monk" refers to either Dzawo or Salékye, or any other monk of similar conduct. The phrase "having first properly consented" means having previously offered assent. The phrase "thereafter" means at some other time. The phrase "saying the following" means if he says these words. Regarding the phrase "acting out of personal friendship," who counts as a monk's friend? The preceptor's friend is his co-resident; the co-resident's friend is the preceptor. The teacher's friend is the attendant; the attendant's friend is the teacher. The friend of one who shares the same preceptor is one who shares the same preceptor. The friend of one who shares the same teacher is one who shares the same teacher. A close companion's friend is a close companion. The phrase "Saṅgha" refers to the Saṅgha of hearers of the Tathāgata.

Regarding the word "acquisition," there are two kinds of acquisition: acquisition of robes and acquisition of food. In this context, it is intended to mean acquisition of robes. The phrase "dedicated" means established within the Saṅgha. The phrase "dedicated to a person of mine" means for my own benefit. The phrase "it causes a downfall" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies, and into the states of wrong falling. Furthermore, for as long as that downfall has not been confessed and individually confessed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities. Therefore it is said to cause a downfall. As for how the downfall arises in that case: if a monk, having first made a small amount of preliminary and suitable preparation, subsequently says the following — "Venerable ones, having acted out of personal friendship, they have dedicated to the Saṅgha an acquisition, and I have dedicated it to a person of mine" — in every such case a downfall arises. If it is true that, having acted out of personal friendship, they dedicated the Saṅgha's acquisition and that he dedicated it to a person of his own, there is no downfall. There is no downfall for one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one who is overcome by painful sensations. The ninth downfall-producing rule, that of calumny, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One declared that the Prātimokṣa sūtra was to be recited each fortnight. When the monks were reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra every fortnight, the group of six, when the four defeats were being recited, remained completely silent. When the thirteen rules entailing suspension were being recited, they spoke as follows: "Venerable ones, while there are cases where the matter is determined and the person can be clearly identified, why do you tear open our healed wounds? What use is it to those who have recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra that these minor and trivial rules of training cause the monks regret, anxiety, and harm?" Likewise, when the two indefinite rules, the thirty rules involving forfeiture and downfall, the ninety downfall-producing rules, the four rules requiring individual confession, the many rules of training, and the seven rules for settling disputes were being recited, they again said: "Venerable ones, while there are cases where the matter is determined and the person can be clearly identified, why do you tear open our healed wounds? What use is it to those who have recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra that these minor and trivial rules of training cause the monks regret, anxiety, and harm?" The monks replied: "Venerable ones, we do not recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra for your sake; we recite it by the scriptural command of the Teacher. If it causes you suffering and mental discomfort, why do you engage in higher conduct? Why, with so little benefit, monks — when the four defeats are recited, you remain utterly silent; yet when the thirteen rules entailing suspension are recited, you say: 'Venerable ones, while there are cases where the matter is determined and the person can be clearly identified, why do you tear open our healed wounds? What use is it to those who have recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra that these minor and trivial rules of training cause the monks regret, anxiety, and harm?' "

And when the two cases of indeterminate offence, the thirty rules entailing forfeiture and confession, the ninety rules entailing confession, the four rules requiring individual acknowledgment, the many rules of training, and the seven rules for the settlement of disputes are recited, they speak in just the same way: "Venerable ones, while there are cases where the matter is determined and the person can be clearly identified, why do you tear open our healed wounds? What use is it to those who have recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra that these minor and trivial rules of training cause the monks regret, anxiety, and harm?" And so speaking, they disparage, they mock, and they slander. It was in this context that the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, for this reason, and on this occasion, convened a gathering of the monastic Saṅgha — and all the rest proceeds as before. And the passage beginning "The blessed buddhas knowingly do what is uncharacteristic" also proceeds as before. Then the Blessed One rebuked the group of six monks: "Monks, when the four defeats are recited, you remain utterly silent; yet when the thirteen rules entailing suspension are recited, you say: 'Venerable ones, while there are cases where the matter is determined and the person can be clearly identified, why do you tear open our healed wounds? What use is it to those who have recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra that these minor and trivial rules of training cause the monks regret, anxiety, and harm?' And likewise, when the two cases of indeterminate offence, the thirty rules entailing forfeiture and confession, the ninety rules entailing confession, the four rules requiring individual acknowledgment, the many rules of training, and the seven rules for the settlement of disputes are recited, you speak in just the same way: 'Venerable ones, while there are cases where the matter is determined and the person can be clearly identified, why do you tear open our healed wounds? What use is it to those who have recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra that these minor and trivial rules of training cause the monks regret, anxiety, and harm?' Did you truly say this?" "Venerable One, we did."

The blessed Buddha then reproved them: "That which is not the conduct of a contemplative, that which is not fitting, not proper, not in accord with proper conduct — that is not something to be done by one who has gone forth." Having thus reproved them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, having seen ten good reasons, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and all the rest proceeds as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Furthermore, if any monk, while the Prātimokṣa sūtra is being recited every half-month, says: 'What use is it to those, venerable ones, who cause the monks regret, anxiety, and harm — that these minor and trivial rules of training cause the Prātimokṣa sūtra, which is recited every half-month, to be recited at all?' — if he denigrates the training in this way, it is a transgression."

The phrase "furthermore, if any monk" refers to the six groups of monks, or to any other such individual. The phrase "every half-month" means every half-month. The phrase "the Prātimokṣa sūtra" refers to: the four rules entailing defeat, the thirteen rules entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha, the two undetermined cases, the thirty rules entailing forfeiture and confession, the ninety rules entailing confession, the four rules to be confessed individually, the many rules of training, and the seven rules for the settlement of disputes.

The phrase "the sūtra" means either a discourse composed in connection with it, or else a properly compiled discourse. The phrase "while it is being recited" means while it is being formally taught. The phrase "says thus: 'What use is it to those, venerable ones, who cause the monks regret, anxiety, and harm — that these minor and trivial rules of training cause the Prātimokṣa sūtra, which is recited every half-month, to be recited at all?' — and denigrates the training in this way" means that with the intent to denigrate the training, one gives utterance through speech, words, common expressions, sounds, statements, definitive terms, the course of words, the sound of words, vocal action, and verbal communication.

The phrase "it is a transgression" means it causes one to be burned, scalded, and cast down into the hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of ruin. Furthermore, for as long as that transgression remains unconfessed and unacknowledged individually, it acts as an obstruction to wholesome phenomena — and it is for that reason that it is called a transgression.

As to how a transgression comes about in detail: when the four rules entailing defeat for a monk are being recited, if one says, "What use is it to recite these, venerable ones, which cause the monks regret?" — that is a transgression. When the four rules entailing defeat for a monk are being recited, if one says, "What use is it to recite these, venerable ones, which cause the monks anxiety?" — that is a transgression. When the four rules entailing defeat for a monk are being recited, if one says, "What use is it to recite these, venerable ones, which cause harm to monks?" — that is a transgression. When the four rules entailing defeat for a monk are being recited, if one says, "What use is it to recite these, venerable ones, which cause monks distress?" — that is a transgression. When the four rules entailing defeat for a monk are being recited, if one says, "What use is it to recite these, venerable ones, which cause monks thorough distress?" — that is a transgression. When the four rules entailing defeat for a monk are being recited, if one says, "What use is it to recite these, venerable ones, which cause monks complete distress?" — that is a transgression. When the four rules entailing defeat for a monk are being recited, if one says, "What use is it to recite these, venerable ones, which cause monks regret?" — that is a transgression. When the four rules entailing defeat for a monk are being recited, if one says, "What use is it to recite these, venerable ones, which cause monks manifest displeasure?" — that is a transgression. When the four rules entailing defeat for a monk are being recited, if one says, "What use is it to recite these, venerable ones, which cause monks to wander in distraction?" — that is a transgression.

In the same way, when the thirteen rules entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha are being recited, and the two undetermined rules, and the thirty rules entailing forfeiture and confession, and the ninety rules entailing confession, and the four rules to be confessed individually, and the many rules of training, and the seven rules for the settlement of disputes are being recited, if one says, "What use is it, venerable ones, to recite these, which cause monks remorse, mental distress, harm, anguish, deep anguish, thorough anguish, longing, manifest displeasure, and wandering in distraction?" — that is a transgression.

In the same way, when the monk's basic rules, the minor rules, the origin narratives, the supplementary sections, the fifth portion of the Vinaya, the sixth portion of the Vinaya, the Vinaya mātṛkā, and the other sūtras belonging to the Vinaya are being recited, if one says, "What use is it, venerable ones, to recite these, which cause monks remorse, mental distress, malicious intent, anguish, deep anguish, thorough anguish, longing, manifest displeasure, and wandering in distraction?" — that is a transgression.

When sūtras other than those belonging to the Vinaya are being recited, if one says, "What use is it, venerable ones, to recite these, which cause monks remorse, mental distress, harm, anguish, deep anguish, thorough anguish, longing, manifest displeasure, and wandering in distraction?" — that is a misdeed.

There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, who is insane, whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful feelings.

This concludes the tenth transgression entailing defeat in respect of the training — the undermining of the training.

A summary verse:

Scorning the seed, causing another to instruct,
the seat, the hammock, and the expulsion, implanting that harm will come later — these are arranged in two successive groups.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, an old, inexperienced, foolish, dim-witted, and unskilled carpenter caused a tree to be felled and had it used for building the Saṅgha's assembly hall.

The deity who had dwelt in that tree, being of exceedingly surpassing radiance, came to where the Blessed One was at the break of dawn that very night. Having arrived, she prostrated her head at the two feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. By the power of that deity's radiance, the entire Jeta Grove was suffused with a great, broad light. Sitting to one side, that deity addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable One, an old, inexperienced, foolish, dim-witted, and unskilled carpenter has cut down the tree that was my abode, my grove, my protection, my refuge, my ally, my resting place, my ground, and my support, and has had it used for building the Saṅgha's assembly hall. Venerable One, the winter nights are long; now in the latter part of winter, up until the eighth day, the morning frost rises with an unbroken sheen — and Venerable One, my children and little ones are young: how shall I manage for them?"

Then the Blessed One spoke to a deity: "Deity, grant this deity her dwelling in your own abode." That deity, by the command of the Teacher, granted the other deity her dwelling in his own abode.

Then, after that same night had passed, the Blessed One took his seat on the prepared seat before the assembly of monks. Having taken his seat, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, last night a deity of exceedingly surpassing radiance, at the break of dawn, came to where I was. Having arrived, she prostrated her head at my two feet and sat to one side. By the power of that deity's radiance, the entire Jeta Grove was suffused with a great, broad light. Sitting to one side, that deity addressed me thus: 'Venerable One, an old, inexperienced, foolish, dim-witted, and unskilled person cut down the tree that was my home, my island, my protector, my refuge, my ally, my resting place, my foundation, my support — and has given it over for the building of a Saṅgha hall. Venerable One, the winter nights are long. At the time of the latter part of winter, in the days up to the eighth, the unmelted frost lifts in the early morning, and I do not know what I shall do for my children and infants when they are small.' On hearing this, the monks said: 'Alas, the monks who are disciples of the Śākya are like this — they will be utterly ruined through virtuous qualities,' and they blamed them, derided them, and spoke disparagingly of them. That is ugly and unseemly."

Then the Blessed One reflected thus: "Whatever fault of any kind has arisen here, it has come about from monks cutting down trees." Having reflected thus, he addressed the monks: "Monks, for that reason a monk must not cut down a tree. If he does, it becomes an offence of grave consequence."

The Blessed One was dwelling in a pastoral district, in the finest forest of that pastoral region. The Blessed One having declared that a monk must not cut down a tree, the carpenters among the monks, having no timber, sent back refusals of work. The Blessed Ones, though knowing, act as though unknowing, and so the Blessed One asked the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, why did the carpenter monks send back refusals of work?" "Venerable Blessed One, having declared that a monk must not cut down a tree, the carpenter monks, having no timber, sent back refusals." "Ānanda, I shall establish rules of conduct for the carpenter monks. When a carpenter monk is about to cut down a tree after seven or eight days, he should first make a maṇḍala at the foot of that tree, offer incense, flowers, and a tormā, recite the third chapter of a tantra, proclaim its virtues, establish the paths of the ten virtuous actions, and also recite the discouragement of the paths of the ten non-virtuous actions. He should say this: 'Whatever deity dwells in this tree, let that deity seek another abode. This tree will be made to perform service for a stūpa, the Dharma, or the Saṅgha.' After that, after seven or eight days, that tree may be cut down. If it shows signs of change, it must not be cut. But if it does not show signs, it may be cut. If a carpenter monk does not properly receive and follow the rules of conduct so established, it becomes an offence of grave consequence."

Now this was a matter that arose before the time: the Blessed One did not yet at this period establish rules of training for the hearers in the Vinaya. The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the group-of-six monks were themselves cutting down trees and causing them to be cut down, digging up green grass and causing it to be dug up, picking flowers and causing them to be picked. When other tīrthikas (non-Buddhist adherents) of learning learned of this, they said: "These monks who are disciples of the Śākyan themselves cut down trees and cause them to be cut down, dig up green grass and cause it to be dug up, pick flowers and cause them to be picked. Brahmins and householders likewise, with their own hands, cut down trees and cause them to be cut down, dig up green grass and cause it to be dug up, pick flowers and cause them to be picked. So what difference is there between these ascetic disciples of the Śākyan, and these brahmins and householders? What intention is there? What distinction is to be made? Who would think to give alms to these shaven-headed ascetics?" And so they criticized them, mocked them, and spoke ill of them. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this original ground, and this occasion, convened the assembly of the community of monks, and so forth, just as before. And "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, feign not to know," and so forth, also just as before. The awakened Blessed One questioned the group-of-six monks: "Monks, is it true that you yourselves, with your own hands, cut down trees and cause them to be cut down, dig up green grass and cause it to be dug up, and pick flowers and cause them to be picked?" "Venerable One, it is true." The awakened Blessed One then reproved them, declaring that this conduct is unbecoming of a renunciant, not in accordance with the teaching, not proper, not in keeping with the rules. Then, having reproved them in many ways, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, perceiving ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya," and so forth, also just as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If one destroys or causes the destruction of a seed-community or the dwelling of a sentient being, there is a transgression. A seed-community is to be understood as five kinds of seeds: root seeds, stem seeds, node seeds, joint seeds, and the fifth, seeds that are themselves seeds proper.

What are root seeds? They include bladder campion, white turmeric, ginger, water lily roots, white atis root, and whatever else, when a root is planted, grows from that root itself.

What are stem seeds? They include the kañcana tree, the kapittha, the aśvattha (sacred fig), the udumbara (cluster fig), the nyagrodha (banyan), and whatever else, when a stem is planted, grows from that stem itself.

What are node seeds? They include sugarcane, cane grass, bamboo, sea-born plants, and whatever else, when a node is planted, grows from that node itself.

What are joint seeds? They include ārdaka, sarjaka, phaṇīnarjaka, bhustrina, jambhārī, and whatever else, when a joint is planted, grows from that joint itself.

What are seeds that are themselves seeds? They include rice, barley, wheat, large black lentils, small black lentils, mustard, and whatever else, when a seed is planted, grows from that seed itself.

As for the dwellings of sentient beings: the sentient beings in question are ants, flat insects, small insects, sesame-eating insects, snakes, scorpions, insects called tremapuka, and trailataka. Their dwellings are trees and the like.

As for destroying or causing the destruction of these: this refers to uprooting, trampling, cutting, piercing, scraping, or causing to be scraped.

A transgression: this means a hell being, an animal, a hungry ghost, an evil destiny, a bad rebirth, burning, scorching, and falling — it causes one to fall into these. Furthermore, so long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs virtuous qualities. For that reason it is called a transgression, so it is said.

Now, as for how one incurs a transgression in this regard, the intermediate rule states:

The five seeds and what damages them, cutting trees, grass roots,
green plants, walking on vegetation, a line of grass, fish scales, mushrooms, and dampness itself.

If a monk perceives a root-seed as a root-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a root-seed as a trunk-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a root-seed as a node-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a root-seed as a germinated-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a root-seed as a seed-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

Likewise, if a monk perceives a trunk-seed as a trunk-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a trunk-seed as a root-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a trunk-seed as a node-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a trunk-seed as a cutting-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a trunk-seed as a plant-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

Likewise, if a monk perceives a node-seed as a node-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a node-seed as a root-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a node-seed as a trunk-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a node-seed as a cutting-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a node-seed as a plant-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

Likewise, if a monk perceives a cutting-seed as a cutting-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green as green but with doubt, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression.

If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a cutting-seed as a root-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a cutting-seed as a stem-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a cutting-seed as a joint-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a cutting-seed as a seed-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

Likewise, if a monk perceives a seed-seed as a seed-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a seed-seed as a root-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a seed-seed as a stem-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a seed-seed as a joint-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk perceives a seed-seed as a joint-seed and perceives something green as green, and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something green with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a transgression. If he perceives something dry as green and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he perceives something dry with doubt and cuts it or causes it to be cut, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk, thinking "May the seeds be damaged, may the seeds be utterly ruined," causes the five kinds of seeds to be put into fire, and the seeds are damaged and utterly ruined, he incurs five transgressions. If the seeds are not damaged and not utterly ruined, he incurs five wrongdoings.

If a monk, thinking "May the seeds be damaged, may the seeds be utterly ruined," causes the five kinds of seeds to be put into water, and the seeds are damaged and utterly ruined, he incurs five transgressions. If the seeds are not damaged and not utterly ruined, he incurs five wrongdoings.

If a monk, thinking "May the seeds be damaged, may the seeds be utterly ruined," pours the five kinds of seeds into a mortar and pounds them with a pestle, and the seeds are damaged and utterly ruined, he incurs five transgressions. If the seeds are not damaged and not utterly ruined, he incurs five wrongdoings.

If a monk, thinking "May the seeds be damaged, may the seeds be utterly ruined," places the five kinds of seeds on dry ground, and the seeds are damaged and utterly ruined, he incurs five transgressions. If the seeds are not damaged and not utterly ruined, he incurs five wrongdoings.

If a monk, thinking "May the seeds be damaged, may the seeds be utterly ruined," covers the five kinds of seeds with salt, or with a fermenting agent, or with dung, or with soil, and the seeds are damaged and utterly ruined, he incurs five transgressions. If the seeds are not damaged and not utterly ruined, he incurs five wrongdoings.

If a monk, thinking "May the seeds be damaged, may the seeds be utterly ruined," boils the five kinds of seeds in broth, or in rice-water, or in bean-water, and the seeds are damaged and utterly ruined, he incurs five transgressions. If the seeds are not damaged and not utterly ruined, he incurs five wrongdoings.

If a monk cuts one tree with a single act of preparation, he incurs one wrongdoing and one transgression. If a monk cuts two trees with a single act of preparation, he incurs one wrongdoing and two transgressions. If a monk cuts very many trees with a single act of preparation, he incurs one wrongdoing and very many transgressions.

If a monk cuts one tree with two acts of preparation, he incurs two wrongdoings and one transgression. If a monk cuts two trees with two acts of preparation, he incurs two wrongdoings and two transgressions. If a monk cuts very many trees with two acts of preparation, he incurs two wrongdoings and very many transgressions.

If a monk cuts one tree with very many acts of preparation, he incurs very many wrongdoings and one transgression. If a monk cuts two trees with very many acts of preparation, he incurs very many wrongdoings and two transgressions.

If a monk cuts very many trees with very many acts of preparation, he incurs very many wrongdoings and very many transgressions.

If a monk tramples one blade of grass with one act of preparation, he incurs one wrongdoing and one transgression. If a monk tramples two blades of grass with one act of preparation, he incurs one wrongdoing and two transgressions. If a monk tramples very many blades of grass with one act of preparation, he incurs one wrongdoing and very many transgressions. If a monk tramples one blade of grass with two acts of preparation, he incurs two wrongdoings and one transgression. If a monk tramples two blades of grass with two acts of preparation, he incurs two wrongdoings and two transgressions. If a monk tramples very many blades of grass with two acts of preparation, he incurs two wrongdoings and very many transgressions. If a monk tramples one blade of grass with very many acts of preparation, he incurs very many wrongdoings and one transgression. If a monk tramples two blades of grass with very many acts of preparation, he incurs very many wrongdoings and two transgressions. If a monk tramples very many blades of grass with very many acts of preparation, he incurs very many wrongdoings and very many transgressions.

The same analysis is to be applied in full to blue lotus, lotus, and the like.

If a monk, with the intention of causing vegetation to wither or to deteriorate, throws salt, a caustic substance, something heavy, or a needle in the direction of the vegetation, and the vegetation does wither and deteriorate, he incurs a transgression. If the vegetation neither withers nor deteriorates, he incurs a wrongdoing. If his intention was merely to stick it in, there is no transgression.

If a monk, with the intention of causing vegetation to wither or to deteriorate, scatters hot water, fruit juice, or legumes in the direction of the vegetation, and the vegetation does wither and deteriorate, he incurs a transgression. If the vegetation neither withers nor deteriorates, he incurs a wrongdoing. If his intention was merely to discard them, there is no transgression.

If a monk, with the intention of causing vegetation to wither or to deteriorate, walks through the vegetation, and the vegetation does wither and deteriorate, he incurs a transgression. If the vegetation neither withers nor deteriorates, he incurs a wrongdoing. If his intention was merely to walk there, there is no transgression.

If a monk, with the intention of causing vegetation to wither or to deteriorate, drags a branch, a bundle of kindling, or a rake through the vegetation, and the vegetation does wither and deteriorate, he incurs a transgression. If the vegetation neither withers nor deteriorates, he incurs a wrongdoing. If his intention was merely to drag it, there is no transgression.

If a monk, with the intention of causing cotton plants to wither or to deteriorate, walks through the area where cotton plants are growing, and the cotton plants do wither and deteriorate, he incurs a wrongdoing. If the cotton plants neither wither nor deteriorate, he still incurs a wrongdoing. If his intention was merely to walk there, there is no transgression.

If a monk, with the intention of causing cotton plants to wither or to deteriorate, scatters hot water, fruit juice, or legumes in the area where cotton plants are growing, and the cotton plants do wither and deteriorate, he incurs a wrongdoing. If the cotton plants neither wither nor deteriorate, he likewise incurs a wrongdoing. If his intention was merely to discard them, there is no transgression.

If a monk, with the intention of causing cotton plants to wither or to deteriorate, pours brine, applies a caustic substance, applies a heavy substance, or drives stakes into the area where cotton plants are growing, and the cotton plants do wither and deteriorate, he incurs a wrongdoing. If the cotton plants neither wither nor deteriorate, he still incurs a wrongdoing. If his intention was merely to drive in stakes, there is no transgression.

If a monk severs the sap-channel of a living tree, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk pulls out the roots of a living tree, he incurs a defeating offense. If a monk strips the bark of a living tree, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk scrapes away the cambium of a living tree, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk extracts the heartwood of a living tree, he incurs a defeating offense. If a monk plucks the fresh leaves of a living tree, he incurs a defeating offense. If a monk plucks the yellowed leaves of a living tree, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk plucks the unopened flowers of a living tree, he incurs a defeating offense. If a monk plucks the opened flowers of a living tree, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk plucks the unripened fruit of a living tree, he incurs a defeating offense. If a monk plucks the ripened fruit of a living tree, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk draws out fish scales, for as long as he has not removed them from water onto dry land, he incurs a wrongdoing; once he removes them from water onto dry land, he incurs a defeating offense. If a monk removes a fish nest, for as long as he has not removed it from water onto dry land, he incurs a wrongdoing; once he removes it from water onto dry land, he incurs a defeating offense.

If a monk picks mushrooms, he incurs a wrongdoing. If a monk picks puffball mushrooms, he incurs a wrongdoing.

If a monk disturbs a mold-covered earthen vessel, a spout, a pill, a piece of cloth, or the lining of a garment, he incurs a wrongdoing. If he makes it usable and then uses it, there is no transgression.

For one who is a novice, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is tormented by painful sensations, there is no transgression.

This completes the eleventh chapter on the defeating offenses of destroying seeds and growing things.

Here begins the Vinaya, volume Ja.

The Vinaya Analysis, the forty-third fascicle.

The buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove of the Cool Forest. At that time, the venerable Gyabu Norgé had been appointed by the Saṅgha to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food. A friendly monk and a youth born of the earth — the venerable Gyabu Norgé — had harbored animosity toward one another across many lifetimes, and when the friendly monk and the youth born of the earth, together with a companion, were gathered in conversation, the venerable Gyabu Norgé arrived there. The two said to the companion: "Venerable companion, if you too were appointed by the Saṅgha to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food, you too would be as highly regarded by us as the venerable Gyabu Norgé." The companion replied to the two of them: "You two — knowing full well which monk has been appointed by the Saṅgha to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food — are you affronting him to his face?" The two replied: "What, are we not even at liberty to whisper among ourselves?"

The monks of few wants criticized them, asking why monks who knew full well that a certain monk had been appointed by the Saṅgha to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food would affront him to his face, would slander him openly, and would speak ill of him behind his back. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, let the case of the venerable Youthful One and the Born-of-the-Earth — or of any others like them — be also classified as the offense of affronting to the face. The procedure for classifying it shall be as follows: after the lodgings have been arranged, the wooden sounding board has been struck, and the monks have been properly assembled by the prescribed summons, and when the entire Saṅgha is seated in harmony, one monk shall make the following motion: 'Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. The venerable Youthful One and Born-of-the-Earth, while knowingly affronting to his face the monk — namely the venerable Gyabu Norgé — who has been appointed by the Saṅgha to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food, if the time is right for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha approve it. The Saṅgha hereby classifies the venerable Youthful One and Born-of-the-Earth as having committed the offense of affronting to the face.' This is the motion."

Now at the time when the Saṅgha had classified the two of them under the offense of affronting to the face, those two were again seated together with the venerable companion in conversation, when the venerable Gyabu Norgé arrived there once more. The two said to the companion: "Venerable companion, if you too were appointed by the Saṅgha to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food, you would be as highly regarded among us as the likes of certain others." The companion replied to the two of them: "You two — knowing full well which monk has been appointed by the Saṅgha to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food — are you affronting him sideways, behind his back?" The two replied: "What, did we even mention anyone by name or clan?" The companion said: "If speaking ill behind someone's back is to be permitted without naming a name or a clan, then I could speak ill behind the back of everyone in the entire world without naming names or clans."

The monks of few wants criticized them, asking why monks who knew full well that a certain monk had been appointed by the Saṅgha to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food would speak ill of him behind his back, would slander him openly, and would speak ill of him to his face. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, let the case of the venerable Youthful One and the Born-of-the-Earth — or of any others like them — also be classified as the offense of speaking ill behind the back. The procedure for classifying it shall be as follows: after the lodgings have been arranged, the wooden sounding board has been struck, and the monks have been properly assembled by the prescribed summons, and when the entire Saṅgha is seated in harmony, one monk shall make the following motion: 'Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. The venerable Youthful One and Born-of-the-Earth, while knowingly speaking ill behind the back of the monk — namely the venerable Gyabu Norgé — who has been appointed by the Saṅgha to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food, if the time is right for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha approve it. The Saṅgha hereby classifies the venerable Youthful One and Born-of-the-Earth as having committed the offense of speaking ill behind the back.' This is the motion."

Now at the time when the Saṅgha had classified the two of them under the offenses of affronting to the face and speaking ill behind the back, those two proceeded to affront the venerable Gyabu Norgé to his face and to speak ill of him behind his back, and —

Some monks of little virtue asked: "Why do monks, knowing full well that the Saṅgha has harmoniously appointed a certain monk to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food, affront him to his face, speak ill of him behind his back, spread rumors, and disparage him?" The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, with this as the basis for the rule, and on this occasion, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth, as before. The Blessed Buddhas act with full knowledge — and so forth, as before. The Blessed Buddha addressed the two monks, the Youthful One and Born-of-the-Earth: "You two, did you knowingly affront to his face and speak ill behind the back of the monk Gyabu Norgé, whom the harmonious Saṅgha had appointed to allocate lodgings and to oversee the distribution of food?" They replied: "Venerable One, it is true." The Blessed Buddha then rebuked them: "That which is not the conduct of an ascetic, not in accord with the teachings, not fitting, not in harmony with the precepts — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth." And so the Blessed One rebuked them in many ways. He then declared to the monks: "Monks, seeing precisely ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers — and so forth, as before. My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If one affronts to the face or speaks ill behind the back, it is an offense entailing a transgression."

Now, "if one affronts to the face or speaks ill behind the back" means: with the intention of affronting or of speaking ill behind the back, one utters speech — words, terms, names, sounds, expressions, definitive statements, linguistic formulations, vocal sounds, and verbal declarations.

"It is an offense entailing a transgression" means: it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, states of woe, bad destinies, and downfall states. Furthermore, for as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs wholesome phenomena. Thus it is said to be an offense entailing a transgression.

As to how the transgression comes about: if a monk affronts to his face a monk who has been classified by the Saṅgha and formally appointed as one of twelve persons, and who has not been released from that appointment — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression. If one speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression. If one both affronts him to his face and speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression.

If a monk affronts to his face a monk who has been classified by the Saṅgha and formally appointed as one of twelve persons, and who has been released from that appointment — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression. If one speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression. If one both affronts him to his face and speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression.

If a monk affronts to his face a monk who has been classified by the Saṅgha but not appointed as one of twelve persons, and who has not been released from that appointment — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression. If one speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression. If one both affronts him to his face and speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression.

If one speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression. If one both affronts him to his face and speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes an offense entailing a transgression.

If a monk affronts to his face a monk who has not been classified by the Saṅgha but who has been appointed as one of twelve persons and has not been released from that appointment — it becomes a misdeed. If one speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes a misdeed. If one both affronts him to his face and speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes a misdeed.

If a monk affronts to his face a monk who has not been classified by the Saṅgha, who has not been appointed as one of twelve persons, and who has been released from that appointment — it becomes a misdeed. If one speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes a misdeed. If one both affronts him to his face and speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes a misdeed.

If a monk affronts to his face a monk who has not been classified by the Saṅgha, who has not been appointed as one of twelve persons, and who has not been released from that appointment — it becomes a misdeed. If one speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes a misdeed. If one both affronts him to his face and speaks ill of him behind his back — it becomes a misdeed.

There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, who is insane, who is mentally disturbed, or who is overwhelmed by painful feelings. The twelfth rule entailing a transgression through affronting is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in Kauśāmbī in the grove of Ghaṇṭā. At that time the venerable Dundubha, having incurred a transgression, was not making amends for it in the proper manner. The monks who sought his welfare, who sought his benefit, who sought his happiness, who wished to reach happiness, who sought his accomplishment and happiness, said to him: "Venerable Dundubha, a transgression has arisen for you — make amends for it in the proper manner." He replied: "Who, when a transgression has arisen, will then make amends? When a transgression has arisen for you, who will make amends for it? Who will feel remorse? When a transgression has arisen for you, who will feel remorse? If a transgression arises for any of you venerables, do not come before me — go before someone else. You venerables have gone forth from various castes, various clans, and various households. Just as leaves from various trees, carried by the wind, fall together and settle together, so too have you gone forth from various castes, various clans, and various households — whereas my noble one has fully understood awakening."

When he made the monks who were instructing him stop up their ears in this way, some monks of few wants began to criticize, complain, and murmur, saying: "Why does a monk make the monks who are instructing him stop up their ears?" The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you should count the monk Dundubha, and others like him, among those who stop up their ears against instruction. The counting is to be done in this way: having arranged seats and struck the wooden gong, having properly informed the monks with the words of inquiry, when the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in concord, one monk should make the motion: 'May the venerable Saṅgha please hear. The venerable Dundubha, having incurred a transgression, does not make amends for it in the proper manner. If the monks who seek his welfare, seek his benefit, seek his happiness, wish to reach happiness, and seek his accomplishment and happiness speak to him about this matter, and if he stops up his ears against the monks' instruction — if the time has come for the Saṅgha and if the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha grant it: the Saṅgha hereby counts the venerable Dundubha among those who stop up their ears against instruction.' This is the motion."

When the venerable Dundubha had been counted among those who stop up their ears against instruction, he thought to himself:

"Whatever fault has come upon me arose from my having spoken words to those monks." He recalled that someone had said:

A person endowed with wisdom should guard all four aspects of speech.
Look at the fire burning the forest above — observe how it is seized by the one who makes a sound.

He considered that this had been well said. Yet when the monks spoke to him he said nothing at all; he stopped up his ears against the monks' instruction. And when monks of few wants blamed him, reproached him, and spoke critically of him, saying, "Why do you, venerable, say nothing at all when the monks address you, and instead stop up your ears against their instruction?" — at that occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you should count any monk such as Dundubha, or any other like him, who says nothing at all and stops up his ears against instruction, among those who stop up their ears against instruction. This is how it is to be done: having prepared the assembly hall and struck the wooden signal board, having duly informed the monks with the motion formula and with the entire Saṅgha present and in agreement, one monk shall make the motion: 'Let the noble Saṅgha hear. The venerable Dundubha, though a transgression has arisen, will not rectify it in accordance with the Dharma. When monks who seek his welfare, seek his benefit, seek his happiness, wish to reach happiness, and seek his accomplishment and happiness raise this matter with him, he stops up his ears against the monks, saying nothing at all. If the time has come for the Saṅgha and if the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha grant it: the Saṅgha hereby counts the venerable Dundubha among those who stop up their ears against instruction.' This is the motion."

When the Saṅgha had then counted the monk Dundubha among those who both stop up their ears against instruction and say nothing at all and stop up their ears — he then stopped up his ears against instruction and said nothing at all. When monks of few wants blamed him, reproached him, and spoke critically of him, saying, "Why do you, venerable, stop up your ears against the monks' instruction and say nothing at all, stopping up your ears?" — at that occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, in reference to this matter, on this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and everything else proceeds as before. "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, though they know, pretend not to know" — and so forth, also as before. The awakened one, the Blessed One, asked the monk Dundubha: "Monk, is it true that you stop up your ears against the monks' instruction and say nothing, stopping up your ears?" "Blessed One, it is so." The awakened one, the Blessed One, rebuked him: "What is not the conduct of a renunciant, what is not in accordance, what is not fitting, what is not conforming — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth." Having thus rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, perceiving ten benefits, a rule of training is to be laid down for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and everything else as before. "My śrāvakas are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Stopping up one's ears against instruction is an offence."

As for the phrase "stopping up one's ears against instruction" — it means expressing, with the intention of stopping up one's ears against instruction, a speech, a word, a conventional expression, a sound, an utterance, a definitive statement, a path of words, the sound of words, a verbal action, or a verbal communication.

As for the phrase "is an offence" — it means hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, the miserable states, and the states of falling — it burns one, it scorches one, it causes one to fall. Moreover, for as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs virtuous qualities. For that reason, it is called a transgression.

As for how it becomes a transgression: a monk comes before another monk and says, "Venerable sir, did you see a monk — one who had shaved his hair and beard not long ago, wearing a reddish-yellow patched robe, with an alms-bowl repaired with a hemp-leaf patch or bound around the neck with a withy, coming along with a bowl of melted butter, or a bowl of grain oil, or a bowl of honey, or a bowl of molasses?" And in reply the other monk says, "Venerable sir, I did not see a monk coming in that manner with a bowl of melted butter, or a bowl of grain oil, or a bowl of honey, or a bowl of molasses — rather, I saw a monk coming along on two feet." Should he speak in that way, it becomes a transgression.

A monk comes before another monk and says, "Venerable sir, did you see a nun — one who had shaved her hair not long ago, wearing a reddish-yellow patched robe, with an alms-bowl repaired with a hemp-leaf patch, coming along with a bowl of melted butter, or a bowl of grain oil, or a bowl of honey, or a bowl of molasses?" And in reply the other monk says, "Venerable sir, I did not see a nun coming in that manner with a bowl of melted butter, or a bowl of grain oil, or a bowl of honey, or a bowl of molasses — rather, I saw a nun coming along on two feet." Should he speak in that way, it becomes a transgression.

The same applies accordingly to a novice monk, a novice nun, and a female novice.

A monk comes before another monk and says, "Venerable sir, did you see a layman coming along with a load of sugarcane, or a load of bamboo, or a load of reeds, or a load of wood, or a jar of melted butter, or a jar of grain oil, or a jar of honey, or a jar of molasses?" And in reply the other monk says, "Venerable sir, I did not see a layman coming with a load of sugarcane, or a load of bamboo, or a load of reeds, or a load of wood, or a jar of melted butter, or a jar of grain oil, or a jar of honey, or a jar of molasses — rather, I saw a layman coming along on two feet." Should he speak in that way, it becomes a transgression.

A monk comes before another monk and says, "Venerable sir, did you see a laywoman whose garments were all blue, or all yellow, or all red, or all white, coming along with a jar of melted butter, or a jar of grain oil, or a jar of honey, or a jar of molasses?" And in reply the other monk says, "Venerable sir, I did not see a laywoman coming in that manner with a jar of melted butter, or a jar of grain oil, or a jar of honey, or a jar of molasses — rather, I saw a laywoman coming along on two feet." Should he speak in that way, it becomes a transgression.

Whatever another monk asks, if a different answer is given to any of it, it becomes a transgression in every case. If one says nothing at all in response to any of those categories and simply ignores it by turning a deaf ear, that becomes an offense.

Now, someone fleeing from an executioner who is about to kill him comes to a monk and asks, "Noble one, did you see the one who is about to kill me?" If it is cold weather, the monk should say to the executioner, "Friend, enter the warm room and light a fire." If it is hot weather, he should say, "Friend, enter the cool room. Drink some water. Rest a while." If the executioner then says, "I am not cold. I am not hot. I am not thirsty. I have not stopped. I am asking about the one who is to be killed," the monk should look at his own fingernails and say, "I see my fingernails." He should look at the sky and say, "I see the sky." If the executioner then says, "I am not asking about your fingernails. I am not asking about the sky. I am asking about the one who is to be killed," then that monk, having looked in the four directions, should call to mind that all formations are without self, and then say, "In the ultimate sense, I see no sentient being." In so saying there is no transgression. There is no transgression for one who speaks with care and for one who holds to wholesome remedies. There is no transgression for a novice, for one who is mad, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations.

The monks then made a request to the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable One, please look into the matter of the instances of turning a deaf ear by ignoring instructions, and of turning a deaf ear by saying nothing, that have been assigned in the case of those who live the holy life in the same community with the senior venerable ones and who do not listen to their words."

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, not only now, but in times gone by as well, this very failure to listen to the words of good spiritual friends led, through wrongful conduct, to suffering. Listen to this.

Monks, in a time long past, in a certain pond there lived one turtle and two geese. Then on another occasion, a drought lasting twelve years arose and began to dry up the pond. It is the nature of things that in the early age of the world, when it had not yet been long established, even animals could speak. So the two geese said to the turtle, 'Friend, the two of us are going to another pond.' The turtle said, 'Friends, take me with you and go.' The two geese said, 'How shall we take you and go?' The turtle said, 'I will grip the middle of a stick in my mouth, and the two of you take hold of each end and lift off.' The two geese said, 'Since you are one who wants to talk and cannot guard your words, we will not carry you — the two of us will not go with you.' The turtle said, 'I will guard my words.' So the two geese took the turtle and flew up into the sky above, and as they were passing over a rocky cliff, some boys and girls saw them and called out, 'Look, everyone! Two geese are carrying a turtle!' At that, the turtle was pleased with himself. Then as they passed over another rocky cliff, once more some boys and girls saw them and called out, 'Look, everyone! Two geese are carrying a turtle!' The turtle thought to himself, 'I must hold my dignity for as long as I am able,' and said, 'It is not the two geese who are carrying me — I am going of my own accord!' And with that he lost his grip on the stick and fell to the ground. Those below seized him and caused him suffering through wrongdoing. At that moment a god spoke these verses:

Those who wish to benefit a friend and speak words of counsel — whoever does not hold to them will fall and come to grief, like the turtle that let go of the stick.

Monks, the eldest of the two geese at that time and on that occasion was myself. The other goose at that time and on that occasion was Ānanda. The turtle at that time and on that occasion was this very Dundupā. Even then, this one did not listen to the words of his good spiritual friends and, acting wrongly, fell into suffering. And now too, not listening to the words of those who live the holy life, he has been placed in the category of one who wears a censure on his ear — for saying nothing when a censure is pronounced is itself counted as wearing a censure on one's ear. This completes the thirteenth offense that occasions the wearing of a censure on the ear.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time a certain householder invited the community of monks, with the Buddha at its head, to another house at midday. The community of monks went and took their seats. The Blessed One, however, remained behind in the building and engaged in his alms round. The Blessed One, the Buddha, had five reasons for remaining in the building and engaging in his alms round. What are those five? He wished to enter into inner composure; he wished to teach the Dharma to the gods; he wished to visit the sick; he wished to inspect the lodgings; and he wished to establish rules of training for the hearers in the Vinaya. In this instance, the Blessed One remained in the building and engaged in his alms round because he wished to inspect the lodgings and to establish rules of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

Then, not long after the community of monks had departed, the Blessed One perceived this in his mind, took up his key, and passed from courtyard to courtyard, from shrine hall to shrine hall, from room to room, from walking-path to walking-path through the monastery, and proceeded on his way. Eventually he came to the shrine hall of a great house. At that time, in the shrine hall of that great house, very many bedding articles and cushions had been left out without cover, and a great unseasonable storm-cloud had gathered. The Blessed One saw the many bedding articles and cushions left uncovered in the shrine hall of that great house, and the great unseasonable storm-cloud that had massed. Having seen this, he exclaimed, "Ah!" and was displeased. He reflected thus: "Devout brahmin householders and laymen squeeze and press out skin and flesh and blood to give their gifts and make merit, and yet the monks enjoy these things without warmth of feeling and without discernment." Then the Blessed One, through his miraculous power, held back that great unseasonable storm-cloud. Through the exercise of that miraculous power it came to hover in the sky overhead like a water-pot, remaining at the edges while the greater part of it stayed still, directed toward the Blessed One. The Blessed One then covered those many bedding articles and cushions so they were protected, took up his summer robe of fine cloth, wishing to cool himself, and sat down upon the steps. Then the Blessed One, through his miraculous power, withdrew that very intervention that had held back the great unseasonable storm-cloud. When the Blessed One withdrew that miraculous power, thunder rolled and rain fell, filling every valley and plain to satiation. The Blessed One then cooled his body and washed both feet, and went into the shrine hall in order to enter into inner composure. Then a monk who had been out gathering alms returned with his alms, went to where the Blessed One was. It is the natural way of buddhas, of Blessed Ones, to gladden individually each monk who has been out gathering alms by asking, "Monk, how was the food you gathered? Did you satisfy the community of monks?" And so the Blessed One did gladden that monk who had been out gathering alms by asking him, "Monk, how was the food you gathered? Did you satisfy the community of monks?" The monk replied, "Venerable One, the food was gathered in abundance, and the community of monks was satisfied."

Then, after the Blessed One had taken his meal, he washed both feet on the steps outside the shrine hall and went inside for the sake of entering into inner composure. Later that afternoon the Blessed One arose from inner composure and took his seat upon the prepared throne before the community of monks. Seated there, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, not long after the community of monks had departed, I took the key and went from pleasure garden to pleasure garden, from shrine hall to shrine hall, from dwelling to dwelling, from walking path to walking path, going about in a wandering way, gradually making my rounds, until I came to where a certain great shrine hall was. There I saw a great many beds and seats in that great shrine hall left uncovered, while a great unseasonable storm-cloud had gathered. Seeing this, I was displeased and thought to myself: 'The faithful brahmins and householders who give gifts, pressing out as it were their very skin, flesh, and blood in order to make merit — the monks consume what is given through faith carelessly, without mindfulness and without due reflection.' Therefore, monks, it is well if you consume what is given through faith with warmth, consume it with restraint, consume it in proper time, consume it with examination, and consume it with frugality."

The summary verse reads:

With warmth and with restraint, likewise in proper time, with examination, and with frugality one should consume.

Then, after the Blessed One had spoken in praise of consuming with warmth, with restraint, in proper time, with examination, and with frugality, he addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing these ten benefits, one should establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers," and so forth as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk leaves uncovered and unprotected — without collecting them or causing them to be collected — a seat cushion, a small seat, a mat with a cover, a mat with a fringe, a rug, or a cushion belonging to the community, and then departs from that place, that constitutes a transgression." Thus did the Blessed One establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

Now, a large number of monks who were of one purpose set out together to travel through a region, and when they had come to a certain cliff-face they began to make their lodging there. At that cliff-face there was a shrine hall, and someone said to them there, "Noble ones, will you not stay in the shrine hall? It would not be right to stay outside — we rely on your being of one purpose with us. If you were to stay in the shrine hall, being of one purpose might cause them to abandon us and go." That man said, "Noble ones, please go in and sleep in the shrine hall. At the time when your companions of one purpose arrive, I will come and rouse you, noble ones."

They went into the shrine hall, arranged their bedding, and lay down. Meanwhile, the caravan had set out, the last ox already loaded and on its way. Then that man awoke, went to the monks, and said to them, "Noble ones, the companions of one purpose have set out — come quickly! For as long as they are still stretching their limbs, discarding their tooth-sticks, and rolling up their bedding, the purpose is still shared. Follow along behind them." And as they were walking along behind, they were set upon by robbers, and in due course the monks arrived at the shrine hall. When they were seen by the monks there, the monks said to them, "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! How have you fared? Did you travel well, venerable ones?" They replied, "We fared poorly. What has happened?" They said, "Venerable ones, we have been attacked by robbers." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "The matter is to be entrusted to the resident monks."

Having declared that it was to be entrusted to the resident monks, the Blessed One went on to speak of the following situation. In Śrāvastī, two householders were lodging together who had a quarrel with each other, one of them being a man of faith and the other faithless. The faithful one thought, "What is the use of prolonging this quarrel? Let me settle it, take leave of the household, and go forth." And so he went to the Jeta Grove and took ordination as a monk under a monk there. The faithless householder asked someone, "Where has that householder called Śīlabhadra gone?" The man replied, "He has gone forth." "Where?" "Into the community of the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākyan." The faithless man thought, "Is that a city without danger? I shall go there too and do him harm." Now, in this world there are friends, enemies, and those who are indifferent, and so another man went to that monk and said, "That householder is hostile to you." The monk thought, "Whatever faults led me to go forth — those very faults have now followed me." He went to his preceptor and said, "Preceptor, the very faults for which I went forth have followed me here. Please send me away." "My son, where will you go?" "To Rājagṛha." "Then go." And so the monk departed for Rājagṛha.

The hostile householder arrived at the Jeta Grove and asked a monk, "Noble one, has the monk called such-and-such gone forth?" "He has." "Where has he gone?" "To Rājagṛha." The man thought, "Is that a city without danger? I shall go there too and do him some harm." And so he also departed for Rājagṛha.

A monk travels at proper times and not at improper times, while a layman travels both at proper times and at improper times. The monk had entered a cliff-face shrine hall, and when that householder caught sight of him, he thought, "If I say even a word to him here, his many monk companions will do me harm. Let me get to know him better tomorrow." Then the monk rose early in the morning and said to the monks, "Venerable ones, I am going — please keep this bedding for me," and he entrusted his bedding to them. The monks asked, "Where are you going?" "To Rājagṛha." "Venerable one, that road is dangerous — do not go by this road. There is another road; go by that one instead." He went by that other road.

The householder also rose early in the morning, went to the shrine hall, and asked a monk, "Noble one, where has the monk called such-and-such gone?" "To Rājagṛha." "Which way did he go?" "He went by such-and-such a road." The man followed after him, and when the monk saw him approaching, he said to him:

"Handsome one, be at peace!" The man replied, "Now I will make you be at peace!" — and with that, the householder beat the monk severely, smashed his alms bowl, tore his robes, and finally left him for dead. The monk barely survived; he recovered from near death and made his way back to that very shrine hall. When the monks saw him, they asked, "Venerable one, why have you come to be in such a state?" He then related the whole matter in detail to the monks, and added, "If I had not done as the venerable ones instructed me, I would not have come to be in such a condition." The monks thereupon reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Except in such circumstances." Then the Blessed One, having praised the desire for training, respect for training, and the placing of training above all else, spoke words in harmony with this, further elaborating upon it, and in accordance with it and what was most germane to it, he addressed the monks and declared:

"Monks, what came before was the rule; what is now established is the permission. My hearers are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk leaves behind, without covering, a seat — whether a high seat, a low seat, a cushioned seat stuffed with wool, a reclining seat, a mat, or a square cushion — belonging to the Saṅgha, either by abandoning it himself without putting it away, or by having another abandon it without having it put away, and who departs from there without entrusting it to a monk who is present — except in such circumstances, he incurs a transgression."

"Now, 'whatever monk' refers to one who is a member of this community. 'Of the Saṅgha' means of the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's hearers. 'A high seat' means precisely a high seat. 'A low seat' means precisely a low seat. 'A cushioned seat stuffed with wool' means one filled with wood-wool. 'A reclining seat' means precisely a reclining seat. 'A mat' means something spread out as a mat. 'A square cushion' means something four-cornered. 'Without covering' means without having it wrapped up. 'He abandons it himself' means by his own act. 'Having another abandon it' means by the act of another. 'Without putting it away himself' means by his own neglect. 'Without having it put away' means through another's neglect. 'A monk who is present' means whatever monk happens to be staying there. As for 'without entrusting,' entrusting is of five kinds: 'Watch over this shrine hall,' or 'Look after the shrine hall'; 'Watch over this lodging,' or 'Collect the bedding'; and 'Fasten the lock' — that last makes the fifth. If no monk is available, one may entrust it to a novice. If no novice is available, one may entrust it to a layman. If no layman is available, one should look in all four directions, hide the key, and then depart. If a monk is encountered along the road, one should say, 'I have hidden the key in such-and-such a place — please go and take charge of it.' 'Departs from there' means having left the vicinity behind. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Blessed One being present: 'Venerable one, what constitutes the vicinity of a monk's lodging?' Upāli said, 'I was born as a brahmin and was shown seven mango trees — each abundantly blossoming, richly fruiting, and lavishly branched, and spaced seven fathoms apart from one another — and it was indicated that among those seven trees there are forty-nine fathoms: that is the vicinity of a monk's lodging.' 'Except in such circumstances' means: with such conditions being duly set aside. 'He incurs a transgression' means: he is burned, scorched, and caused to fall into the hells, into the animal realm, into the wretched realm of hungry ghosts, into bad destinations, into lower states of existence."

Furthermore, for as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it creates an obstruction to virtuous qualities. That is why it is called a "causing of a downfall." Now, how does one come to incur such a downfall? Consider the following. If a monk leaves the Saṅgha's bedding and furnishings unattended and then departs, for as long as he has not removed what lies within the vicinity it constitutes a wrongdoing, and once he has removed the vicinity it becomes a downfall-causing offence.

If, while on the road, a monk recalls, "I have left such-and-such a piece of Saṅgha bedding or furnishing in such-and-such a place," and if he thinks, "My fellow practitioners of the pure life who are skilled will come to gather it," then that monk must generate the intention, expressed also in words, "I shall not do so again henceforth," and must properly confess that transgression according to the Dharma.

If, while on the road, he sees another monk approaching and thinks, "He will gather it," he should say to that monk: "Venerable one, please gather the piece of Saṅgha bedding and furnishing that I have left in such-and-such a place." And that monk must also generate the intention, expressed also in words, "I shall not do so again henceforth," and must properly confess that transgression according to the Dharma. The other monk, for his part, having accepted the request, must respectfully go and collect it. If he does not collect it, he incurs a serious offence.

If, upon arriving at the destination, a monk recalls, "I left a piece of Saṅgha bedding or furnishing in such-and-such a place," and if he thinks, "My fellow practitioners of the pure life who are skilled will come to gather it," then that monk must generate the intention, expressed also in words, "I shall not do so again henceforth," and must properly confess that transgression according to the Dharma.

If, upon arriving at the destination, he sees another monk about to set out, and thinks, "He will gather it," he should say to that monk: "Venerable one, please gather the piece of Saṅgha bedding and furnishing that I have left in such-and-such a place." And that monk must also generate the intention, expressed also in words, "I shall not do so again henceforth," and must properly confess that transgression according to the Dharma. The other monk, for his part, having accepted the request, must respectfully go and collect it. If he does not collect it, he incurs a serious offence.

If a monk has left the Saṅgha's bedding and furnishings unattended and then enters a temple, thinking either "I will now settle my unsettled mind" or "I will liberate my already settled mind," and enters it properly for the purpose of inward composure — and if he then rises from that meditative absorption at the first night-watch or at the midpoint of the watch — then, if the bedding and furnishings have not been put in order, it constitutes a wrongdoing; and if they have been put in order, it becomes a downfall-causing offence.

If a monk has left the Saṅgha's bedding and furnishings unattended and then enters a temple, thinking either "I will now settle my unsettled mind" or "I will liberate my already settled mind," and enters it properly for the purpose of inward composure — and if he then rises from that meditative absorption at the middle night-watch, or at the final night-watch, or before dawn breaks, or at dawn's breaking, or before sunrise, or at sunrise, or when an eighth part of the sun has risen, or when a quarter of the sun has risen, or before midday, or at midday, or when a quarter of the day remains, or when an eighth of the day remains, or before sunset, or at sunset, or before the stars have appeared, or when the stars have appeared — then, if the bedding and furnishings have not been put in order, it constitutes a wrongdoing; and if it is in disarray, it constitutes a defeat.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Reverend One, there are two kinds of disarray of bedding and furnishings: disarray caused by wind, and disarray caused by rain. What is disarray caused by wind? It is when things have been scattered and blown from one layer to a second. What is disarray caused by rain? It is when things have been soaked and muddied from one layer to a second."

Summary verse: teaching the Dharma, the invitation of guests, the assembly hall and hearing the Dharma, sitting and both of them together, an image and the sick, a seat and five and one becoming two, going behind another and accompanying, recitation and requesting, the offering of a seat and the cutting off of food, fumigation and entrusting, fire and water likewise. Brahmins and faithful householders came to the monks and said: "Noble ones, please teach the Dharma." The monks replied: "The Blessed One resides here. Go to the Blessed One today — the Blessed One will teach." The brahmins and householders said: "Noble ones, the Teacher is but one; for now he teaches the Dharma to gods, or to nāgas, or to yakṣas, or to gandharvas, or to human beings — whoever is teaching it, you too should teach." Upon hearing them say that the Blessed One had not permitted this, the monks appealed to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit it — monks too shall teach the Dharma."

After the Blessed One had declared that monks too should teach the Dharma, when monks were teaching the Dharma while standing and were surrounded by a great crowd of ordinary people, the faithful brahmins and householders said: "Have these ones come to offer gifts?" Thereupon the monks appealed to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Sit down and teach the Dharma."

When monks took up their own individual seats and were walking along, and those without faith saw them and began to jeer, asking whether they were parading about like a troupe of musicians, the monks appealed to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit it — seats of the Saṅgha shall be placed in readiness." When the householder Anāthapiṇḍada heard that the Blessed One had permitted seats of the Saṅgha to be placed in readiness, he donated five hundred thrones to the Saṅgha. When all of them were teaching the Dharma simultaneously and a commotion arose, the monks appealed to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One person shall teach the Dharma."

Since they did not know who among them should teach, the Blessed One declared: "Beginning from the elders of the Saṅgha and extending down to the most recently ordained, each shall teach the Dharma in turn."

When all of the most recently ordained were teaching the Dharma and all of the elders became discomfited, the Blessed One declared: "Let the elders sit apart and teach the Dharma."

When the elders of the Saṅgha became discomfited, the Blessed One declared: "Let two or three seats be arranged separately for the elders, and let the Dharma be taught from there."

When the Dharma teacher in that arrangement too became discomfited, the Blessed One declared: "Let two or three seats be arranged separately for the elders and a lion throne set up."

When the Dharma teacher found it difficult to ascend, the Blessed One declared: "If the direction is fixed, steps shall be made by the novices."

If the direction is not fixed, wooden steps shall be made.

When the Dharma teacher became discomfited by spitting, the Blessed One declared: "A spittoon shall be set out."

When insects gathered there, the Blessed One declared: "A cover shall be placed over it."

When the monks did not know what to place as a cover, the Blessed One declared: "Sand or ash shall be placed over it."

When it became foul-smelling, the Blessed One declared: "It shall be cleaned and dried from time to time."

When those seats, being arranged in a single row only, extended so far that those at the far end could not hear, the Blessed One declared: "The seats shall be arranged in two forms: either in the shape of a crescent moon or in the shape of a small pond."

When faithful brahmins and householders invited the monks as guests to another home and the monks did not accept, the faithful brahmins and householders said: "Noble ones, at the time when a buddha had not appeared in the world, the non-Buddhists were worthy recipients of offerings. But now the Blessed One has appeared in the world, and you are the worthy recipients of offerings. If you do not accept, shall we pass from this world to the next without any virtuous roots?" Hearing this, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Accept the invitation."

When those hosts wished to borrow seats after the monks had eaten and the monks refused to lend them, the Blessed One declared: "Lend the seats."

After the monks had eaten and were leaving, taking the seats with them, the hosts said: "Noble ones, please go, and we shall bring them back to you." The monks, out of reluctance, did not leave the seats behind, and the Blessed One declared: "Leave them."

When the hosts said: "Noble ones, we are thirsty — please wait here a moment until we depart," the monks did not stay, and the Blessed One declared: "Stay."

When because of circumstances like these the seats were not being brought back to them, the Blessed One declared: "Take them back."

After the Blessed One had declared they should take them back, the monks did not know by whom they should be taken back, and the Blessed One declared: "Those who are staying shall strike a small wooden sounding board and then take them back."

When faithful brahmins and householders came to the monastery and invited the monks as guests and the monks did not accept, the Blessed One declared: "Accept the invitation."

After the monks had eaten, when those hosts wished to borrow seats and the monks refused to lend them, the hosts said: "Noble ones, we have offered you a meal — will you not lend us your seats?" The Blessed One then declared: "Lend the seats."

When the hosts left those seats right there and departed, and some thieves stole them by taking what had not been given, the Blessed One declared: "A monk shall be appointed as guardian."

When a thief entered into the midst of those people and they said to him: "Noble one, do you need anything?" he replied: "I need nothing — I am guarding these seats." They said: "Noble one, do you think we are stealing your seats? If you have no suspicion, then be at ease and go." At this, the Blessed One declared: "One shall not enter into their midst but shall sit to one side. If one is a reciter, one shall recite and should also direct attention to that. If one is a meditator, one shall also sit to one side, cultivate mental application, and direct attention to that as well. When the time comes to leave, one shall strike the sounding board."

When those rattan seats became unfit for use on account of mother-of-pearl inlay, oil, excrement, and urine, the monks discarded them. The Blessed One then declared: "They are not to be discarded. Those that have become unfit on account of mother-of-pearl inlay shall be cleaned with water. Those that have become unfit on account of oil shall be cleaned with ash. Those that have become unfit on account of excrement and urine shall be cleaned with earth, or with cleaning substances, or with dung." The Blessed One then declared: "One shall listen to the Dharma."

After this declaration, when the monks remained without any shade and the sun grew hot, the Blessed One declared: "A canopy shall be erected." When wind and rain came and the monks abandoned their resting places and departed, and this became improper, the Blessed One declared: "A shelter shall be made." But they did not know who was to make the shelter, and when whoever happened to be sitting there made it, and all the comfortable resting places at the end of the elder monks' section had been laid out but the senior monks could not make the shelter themselves, the Blessed One declared: "At the end where the elder monks sit, the juniors shall make the shelter; and at the end where the junior monks sit, the elders shall make it." When, after making the shelter, they put everything together in one heap and this became improper, the Blessed One declared: "They shall be arranged each according to its match."

When the monks afterwards failed to listen to the Dharma, the Blessed One declared: "One shall sit either draped or in the open." When listening to the Dharma in this way, faithful brahmins and householders set out lion thrones adorned with jewels and decorated with cloth of gold and silver, and the monks, feeling discomfort, did not sit on them. The Blessed One then declared: "They are lay robes. One shall press them down with the thought of impermanence and take one's seat — one should feel no discomfort in this." When monks neither sheltered the seats of the Saṅgha nor abandoned them right there, and this became improper, the Blessed One declared: "Those too shall be sheltered."

A certain householder had two temple residences, one in a forest monastery and one at the edge of a town. In the town-edge temple there were many resting places, while in the forest temple there were few. On one occasion a festival took place at the forest temple, and the forest monks went to borrow resting places from the town-edge temple, but the town monks refused to give them. The Blessed One declared: "They shall be lent." However, if rain was falling or was expected to fall, they were not to be lent. When wind and rain fell along the road and the resting places were damaged, the Blessed One declared: "One shall take shelter beside a tree or at the foot of a wall, covering oneself with a single cloth." When they covered themselves with fine cloth, the Blessed One declared: "One shall cover oneself with coarse cloth." When the festival was over and the monks, thinking that the temple also belonged to that householder, did not return the resting places, the Blessed One declared: "They shall be reclaimed by authority." When it was not clear whose they were, the Blessed One declared: "One shall write an inscription stating 'This resting place belongs to the forest temple of such-and-such a householder' or 'This belongs to the town-edge temple,' and it shall be used in accordance with however the resting place has been designated."

The householder Anāthapiṇḍada then went to where the Blessed One was, approached him, bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One, and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada addressed the Blessed One in these words:

When the Blessed One was residing at the old-age home, the old-age home was honored; and when the Blessed One was not residing at the old-age home, the old-age home was without honor. The householder therefore addressed him: "If the Blessed One would permit it, I would have a statue of him made, seated in the shade of a rose-apple tree, to be placed there." The Blessed One declared: "Permission is granted; let it be done." And so he had a statue made, seated in the shade of a rose-apple tree, and it was placed at the old-age home.

When wind and rain came, the monks abandoned it and left, and faithful brahmins and householders reproached them saying, "You have even abandoned the Teacher." The Blessed One then declared: "A layman or a novice monk shall be invited to attend to it." When there was no layman and no novice monk available, the Blessed One declared: "The monks shall generate the perception of the Teacher and invite him in." When monks fell ill and no one was attending to them, the Blessed One declared: "The sick shall be attended to three times a day." When the Blessed One had given this instruction to attend to the sick three times a day, and it was not known who should do the attending, the Blessed One declared: "Beginning from the elder of the Saṅgha down to the most junior member of the Saṅgha, all shall attend to the sick."

When the Blessed One had thus instructed that the sick be attended, the elder monks went to see the sick but did so standing up, and the sick became distressed. The Blessed One declared: "One shall sit and attend to the sick." When the Blessed One had instructed that one should sit to attend to the sick, the monks each took their own seats and went to the sick, and faithless people remarked: "Do these noble ones go about like wandering minstrels?" At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One shall not carry one's seat along; rather, the sick attendants shall arrange seats." When the group of six monks went to attend to the sick, they lingered there for a long time engaged in chatter, and the attendants of the sick said to them: "Venerable ones, the business of caring for the sick is quite ruined now; please come later." Those monks replied: "Then do that, and also check on the bedding, for in that way you will receive the six possessions of a deceased monk." They further said: "Otherwise, do not ruin the care of the sick; go now, and we shall attend to it ourselves." The attendants then left without entrusting anything to the sick, and the group of six also departed. When wind and rain came, the sick were unable to get their bedding under cover, and things became disordered. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, care of the sick shall not be entrusted to these five: one who is shameless, one who is himself ill, one who is aged and frail and feeble, one who cannot endure the exertion of attending the sick, and anyone who has not received full ordination."

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the forty-fourth bundle.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, if two monks are on one seat-frame, which of them should get up to give way? The one who got up last." "If both rise at the same time, the junior one." "If both are equally junior, both together shall give way." When ācāryas and preceptors go for a walk, the monks who reside with them and the attendants who dwell in the monastery do not grow in wholesome qualities — like lotuses without water. The Blessed One declared: "The resident monks and attendants shall follow behind the ācāryas and preceptors." When ācāryas and preceptors carry their own seat-frames and go out for a walk, while the resident monks and attendants walk along with arms stretched out. The Blessed One declared: "The resident monks and attendants shall carry the seat-frames of the ācāryas and preceptors."

When those ācāryas and preceptors are pacing back and forth and sweeping, the resident monks and attendants stand by with arms stretched out. The Blessed One declared: "The resident monks and attendants shall take up the broom and assist the ācāryas and preceptors with small tasks from the heart. If appointed to sweep in their place, there is no transgression."

When the ācāryas and preceptors are sewing robes, the resident monks and attendants stand by offering small assistance. The Blessed One declared: "The resident monks and attendants shall thread the needle and assist the ācāryas and preceptors with small tasks. If appointed to do the sewing in their place, there is no transgression."

When resident monks and attendants, having received scriptural transmission from their ācāryas and preceptors, recite those texts in the presence of those very teachers — the Blessed One declared: "Monks who are learning recitation shall, having received the scriptural transmission, sit within hearing distance, free from any distraction, and recite it within range of the teacher's voice. Monks who are practitioners of renunciation shall receive the instructions and then go apart to a secluded place and give rise to contemplation."

When those resident monks and attendants go off on an assigned task, having taken leave of their ācāryas and preceptors, and other work then arises for them at the place they have gone to, and they come back again asking permission — the Blessed One declared: "If other work arises for those who have gone there, they shall not return again and again to ask permission; rather, they shall do that work right there. That single leave-taking they gave at the outset counts as permission for everything."

When they carried seat-frames there and then came back without bringing the seat-frames with them — the Blessed One declared: "They shall bring the seat-frames back when they return."

When they had gone ahead earlier carrying seat-frames, and a circumstance arose for the ācāryas and preceptors such that those teachers would not be coming — the Blessed One declared: "They shall ask the ācāryas and preceptors whether they are going for a walk or not. If they say they are going, the seat-frames shall be sent. If they say they are not going, the seat-frames shall not be sent."

A certain householder invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to a meal at another house. A certain young monk, earnestly devoted to virtue, thought to himself: "Today I need not go out on alms-round. Until the time set by the shadow of the sundial arrives, I shall apply myself to virtue." With that thought he took up his seat-frame, went outside, and proceeded. The monks had gathered early and set out, having closed the door of the assembly hall. He too, having marked the time, came when he should — but when he arrived he saw that the door of the assembly hall was closed. He thought: "It is better for me to miss the meal; if I am with a transgression it will not do." So he fasted. And for as long as there was energy in his body he continued to apply himself to virtue. When the energy finally left his body, he lay down and reclined.

The monks then said to him: "Venerable one, do you suppose this food and this meal belong to someone else? Why did you go so far in your effort toward virtue that you could not manage even that much to eat? Who ate? You did not eat?" "I did not eat." "Why?"

He then explained the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks should ascertain the time and, rather than entering another house too early in the assembly, they should beat the gong and then enter. Teachers of discipline and preceptors should each keep watch over their own assemblies. If someone arrives unexpectedly, the senior elder of the Saṅgha should look after that person. If a monk arrives to find the door closed, he should place his mat near a wall or at the foot of a tree and depart. A monk should not out of hesitation cut his meal short. If a monk cuts his meal short out of hesitation, it becomes a transgression."

Brahmin householders and faithful laypeople came to the monastery, sat down on the seats, and then left, abandoning them there. Since no one had put those seats away, the place became disordered. The Blessed One declared: "Whoever sees them should put them away."

Elderly monks who were bent with age and frail, and sick monks who were too weak for physical effort, saw the seats left uncovered and were unable to put them away themselves. The Blessed One declared: "They should inform the monastery steward, and he in turn should respectfully put them away."

The monks left the bedding and furnishings of their quarters unprotected, entrusted them to a single monk, and went out for alms-round. Others too entrusted their things to that same monk, and while he had gone out on alms-round, wind and rain came and he was unable to cover them. The Blessed One declared: "A great many monks should not entrust their things to a single monk. If such circumstances arise, he should beat the gong, and all the monks who are present should respectfully come and cover the things. Those who hear the gong should go with due care."

A monastery situated in a forest caught fire, and the fire spread to a village, to a town, to the royal palace, and to the surrounding countryside. The monks' walking grounds, the paths through the walking grounds, the cloister, the storeroom, the gatehouse, and the monastery itself were consumed in the fire. The monks each retrieved their own bowls and robes, but the bedding and furnishings of the Saṅgha burned. A householder came and asked the monks: "Noble ones, was nothing spared? Nothing at all? And what of the Saṅgha's bedding and furnishings?" "Those burned." "Nothing was spared? Was it like that — nothing of ours burned either?" Then he said: "Alas, they could not even manage to save the Saṅgha's furnishings."

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "The Saṅgha's furnishings too should be carried out. While they are carrying out the Saṅgha's furnishings, the individual monks' personal furnishings, their bowls, and their robes burned, and those individuals were left destitute."

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Since individuals will be destitute but the Saṅgha will not, first carry out the individuals' bowls and robes, and after that carry out the Saṅgha's."

As they were being carried out, those who take what is not given stole them. The Blessed One declared: "A monk should be stationed there as a guard." They posted monks who were powerful, and the Blessed One declared: "Appoint one with modest strength." Those guards were made to enter when the fire was too intense to endure. The Blessed One declared: "If the fire is too intense to endure, they should not enter, and even if the things burn, they should have no regrets about it."

While a monastery was situated in the midst of heavy hail, when a torrent of thick rain fell from the hillside above, water entered the monastery and reached the village, the town, the royal palace, and the surrounding district. When it reached the walking grounds, the walking paths, the covered hall, the gateway buildings, and the monastery itself, the monks each took out their own bowls and robes, and carried off the Saṅgha's furnishings. When the householders came and asked the monks, "Noble ones, what did you not take out?" they answered, "We did not take out anything." "Then what about the Saṅgha's furnishings?" "Those we did take out." "And whatever you did not take — was it like that? We too did not take out anything of our own." One of them then said, "Alas, we did not even dare to remove the Saṅgha's furnishings" — and on that occasion the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "The Saṅgha's furnishings too should be removed." While they were removing those Saṅgha furnishings, some people took the individual monks' furnishings, their bowls, and their robes, and those monks were left destitute. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Since an individual may be left destitute but the Saṅgha will not be, first remove the individual monks' bowls and robes, and only after that carry out the Saṅgha's." As they were being carried out, those who take what is not given stole them. The Blessed One declared: "A monk should be stationed there as a guard." They posted monks who were powerful, and the Blessed One declared: "Appoint one with modest strength." Those guards were made to enter when the water was too intense to endure. The Blessed One declared: "If the water is too intense to endure, they should not enter, and even if the things are swept away, they should have no regrets about it." There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, who is mad, who is mentally disturbed, or who is beset by painful sensations.

The fourteenth rule on furnishings transgressions is complete.

Summary verse: the southern road; not discarding; discarding without asking; discarding by force; the well; taking; the covered hall; the walking path; and placing a heavy load — these are the last.

The Blessed One, the Buddha (Skt. buddha), was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Two monks — one senior and one junior — came from the southern road to Śrāvastī to pay homage at the Blessed One's feet. The senior monk was assigned to a monastery that had furnishings; the junior monk was assigned to a monastery that had none. The junior monk, being industrious, gathered much grass and laid out bedding about knee-high. The senior monk thought, "I shall go and see what kind of monastery the junior fellow has been assigned to," and went there. When he saw how excellent a bed had been laid out, he thought, "For as long as I am busy looking after the furnishings, going tomorrow will be delayed — I shall just stay here." So he handed over the monastery that had the furnishings to the monk in charge of lodgings there, and the two of them spent the night in that monastery, then rose early the next morning and departed. As that region was an oily, greasy land, fleas had bred in the grass that had been spread out, and the entire interior and exterior of the monastery became infested with fleas.

At that time a certain householder invited the Saṅgha of monks, with the Buddha at the head, to another house for a midday meal. The Saṅgha of monks went and took their seats. The Blessed One, however, remained among the material things that had arisen and concentrated on obtaining alms food.

The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, remain among material things that have arisen for five reasons, and it is for those five reasons that they set about obtaining alms food. What are the five? They wish to place themselves properly in inner composure; they wish to teach the Dharma to the gods; they wish to look after the sick; they wish to inspect the lodgings; and they wish to establish, in the Vinaya, the rules of training for the hearers. In this particular instance, the Blessed One remained among the material things that had arisen and set about obtaining alms food because he wished to inspect the lodgings and because he wished to establish in the Vinaya the rules of training for the hearers.

Then, not long after the Saṅgha of monks had departed, the Blessed One perceived this in his mind, took up the key, and went from courtyard to courtyard, from monastery to monastery, from room to room, from walking-ground to walking-ground, passing through them one by one in succession, until he came to that particular monastery building. There the Blessed One saw that the entire interior and exterior of the monastery was overrun with fleas. And having seen this, he uttered the exclamation "Ah me!" and, with disapproval in his heart, he thought: "Faithful brahmin and householder donors give and give again, squeezing out skin and flesh and blood to make their gifts and to make merit — and these monks enjoy it all without feeling gratitude and without individual discernment." Then the Blessed One thought to himself: "I should by all means perform such a display of miraculous power as would cause the fleas to go off to one side and the ground to become clear to one side." And so the Blessed One performed just such a display of miraculous power as would cause the fleas to go off to one side and the ground to become clear to one side.

Then, with his two hands adorned with a web of fingers — bearing the marks of the wheel, the auspicious knot, and the swastika hook, and arisen from many hundreds of meritorious deeds — the Blessed One carefully gathered up those fleas and set them to one side in a cool place. Then the Blessed One swept out the monastery, sweeping it thoroughly, cast the sweepings outside the monastery building, washed his two hands and feet, and entered the monastery in order to settle into inner composure.

Then the monk who had been gathering alms, having received the alms food, came to where the Blessed One was. Now it is the nature of things that the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, always delight each monk individually who is gathering alms by asking: "Monk, how was the alms round? Did the monk satisfy the Saṅgha of monks?" And because this is how they individually delight them, the Blessed One individually delighted the monk who had been gathering alms by asking: "Monk, how was the alms round? Did the monk satisfy the Saṅgha of monks?" And he replied: "Venerable One, the alms round was good, and the Saṅgha of monks was satisfied." Then the Blessed One performed the act of eating, washed his two feet at the threshold of the monastery building, and entered the monastery in order to settle into inner composure. Then in the afternoon the Blessed One rose from inner composure and took his seat on the mat that had been spread out before the assembly of monks. Seated there, the Blessed One addressed the monks:

"Monks, here, not long after the Saṅgha of monks had departed, I understood what had happened, took the key, and went from courtyard to courtyard, from monastery to monastery, from room to room, from walking-ground to walking-ground, going from place to place in order, until I came to one particular monastery building and saw that it was entirely covered inside and out with grass droppings. Seeing this, I was displeased, and reflected: "The faithful householders and brahmins who, squeezing and squeezing their very skin, flesh, and blood, give gifts and make merit — the monks are consuming what those people have given without feeling any warmth of gratitude, without discerning it individually." Thinking thus, I declared: "Monks, it would be good if you were to make use of what is offered in faith in these five ways: with warm gratitude, with restraint, in a timely manner, with discernment, and without excess."

The summary verse runs:

With warm gratitude and with restraint, likewise in due time and with discernment, and making use without excess —

Then, after the Blessed One had spoken in praise of making use with warm gratitude, restraint, timeliness, discernment, and without excess, he addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing these ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established," and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: 'Whatever monk spreads out a grass mat or a leaf mat in the Saṅgha's monastery building, or causes one to be spread, and then departs without gathering it up or causing it to be gathered up — this constitutes a transgression.'" Thus did the Blessed One establish that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

Now, a great many monks were traveling together on a regional tour when they came to a certain rocky mountain. There they went to a householder and asked him to lend them lodging, and the householder said: "I will lend it on a pledge: if you will accept an alms meal from me, I will lend it." The monks replied: "Householder, we depend on mutual agreement. If we reach agreement, we will stay and eat." The householder asked: "Are there any beds or seats here? Noble ones, there are none." Many laymen and novices were present with those monks, and they gathered a great deal of grass and spread out mats reaching to about knee height. During the night or at dawn, the group departed, and those monks left without removing the mats. The householder thought: "If the noble ones are still here, I will prepare a canopy to their measure and check on them," and went there, only to see that the monks had departed before dawn. When the householder and his wife went to remove those mats, they had already rotted away by morning.

Then yet another great many monks were traveling together on a regional tour and came to that same rocky mountain. There they went to that householder and asked him to lend them lodging, and the householder said: "Noble ones, I will lend it on a pledge: if you do not spread out your own adequate mats, I will lend it." The monks said: "Householder, where shall we sleep? There is nowhere here for us to lie down — no bed, no seat. Noble ones, how are we to sleep on the bare ground?" The householder replied: "It seems that fellow practitioners of your own pure conduct came here, spread out their own adequate mats, and departed without removing them, and when I and my family went to remove them in the morning, they had completely rotted away."

Those monks passed the night on the bare ground and rose early the next morning and departed. Traveling onward by stages, they eventually arrived at Śrāvastī. When the other monks there saw them, they said: "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! How did you fare on the journey?" "How did we fare? We passed the night turning from side to side on the bare ground." "Where did you stay in that rocky place?" "At a certain spot." "In whose courtyard?" "At a certain householder's." Then some of the monks said: "As for us, we came having slept on the mats laid out in that householder's courtyard." "And where did you leave those mats?" "We left them right there." At this, they said that the householder was blaming them — and on that occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "One may discard mats at other people's houses as well." Having so declared, the Blessed One went on.

When a large company of monks traveling together on tour went to a certain rocky place, a householder there, for the benefit of wandering ascetics (śramaṇas) and brahmins who arrived unexpectedly, had fetched a great quantity of grass from far away and spread out mats. The monks went to that householder and asked him to lend them lodging, and the householder said: "Noble ones, I have fetched a great quantity of grass from far away for the benefit of wandering ascetics and brahmins who arrive unexpectedly, and I have spread out these mats — please sleep here." They slept there, and then, before dawn, without asking the householder, they discarded the mats and departed. The householder rose early the next morning and, seeing that they had gone and left the mats behind, he thought: "So they have gone. If they have discarded them in a clean place, I will pick them up." He went and looked, but seeing that they had been discarded in an unclean place, he did not pick them up.

Then another large company of monks, also traveling together on tour, came to that same rocky place. They went to that householder and asked him to lend them lodging. The householder said: "Noble ones, please be seated. Householder, are there any chairs or seats here?" "Noble ones, there are none." "Householder, how are we to sleep on this bare ground?" "Noble ones, for the benefit of wandering ascetics and brahmins who arrived unexpectedly, I had fetched a great quantity of grass from far away and spread out mats — but fellow practitioners of your own pure conduct came, slept there, and then before dawn, without asking me, discarded those mats in an unclean place and departed. They slept on the bare ground there and left." Traveling onward by stages, these monks eventually arrived at Śrāvastī. When the other monks there saw them, they said: "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! How did you fare on the journey?" They replied: "How did we fare? We spent the night on bare ground turning from side to side until dawn came." "Where did you stay in that rocky place?" "At a certain spot." "In whose courtyard?" "At a certain householder's." Then some of the monks said: "As for us, we came having slept on the mats laid out in that householder's courtyard." "And where did you leave those mats?" "We discarded them outside." At this, they said that the householder was blaming them — and on that occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "One should ask the householder if he is present, and if he says 'Please discard them,' then one may discard them. If he says 'Do not discard them,' then one may not discard them."

At a certain cliff-face there was a monastery that had no bedding. The monks there had gathered much grass from a great distance and laid out grass mats for the benefit of monks who might arrive unexpectedly.

A large group of monks traveling together on a tour of the countryside came to that cliff-face, entered the monastery, and asked the resident monks: "Venerable ones, is there any bedding here?" They replied: "There is. We ourselves gathered much grass from a great distance and laid out mats for the benefit of monks who might arrive unexpectedly — please sleep here tonight." Those monks slept there, and early the next morning they rose before dawn and were about to discard the mats. The resident monks said to them: "Venerable ones, do not discard these mats. We gathered much grass from a great distance and laid them out for the benefit of fellow celibates who arrive unexpectedly." The visiting monks replied: "Venerable ones, you have just now made yourselves liable to a transgression." "How have we made ourselves liable to a transgression?" At that, those monks abused them and forcibly threw away the mats and left.

Another large group of monks traveling together on a tour came to that same monastery, and finding themselves short of bedding, the resident monks said to them: "Venerable ones, does this monastery have no bedding? We gathered much grass from a great distance and laid out mats for the benefit of fellow celibates who might arrive unexpectedly — yet when other celibates traveling together on tour came to this monastery, slept on those mats, rose early the next morning, and were about to discard them, and we said 'Do not discard them,' those monks abused us and forcibly threw them away and left." These monks too then slept on the bare ground, rose early the next morning, and departed.

In due course, as they continued on their tour, they arrived at Śrāvastī. When the monks there saw them, they said: "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! How was your journey?" They replied: "How was our journey? We spent the whole night on the bare ground, turning this way and that, and so the night passed." "Venerable ones, at which cliff-face did you stay?" "At a certain monastery." Then some of the monks said: "As for us, we came having slept on the mats in that monastery." "And where did you leave those mats?" "The senior monks there kept telling us not to, but we forcibly threw them outside and left." And so they were blaming those fellow celibates.

On that occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One should not discard them in that way; one should ask the monks who are present."

A large group of monks traveling together on tour spent the night beside a well, and they gathered much grass and laid out grass mats. Not far from them a brahmin also spent the night. The monks traveling together rose early the next morning and departed, and the returning group of traveling companions also arrived. The brahmin, having concluded his business with that group, returned together with them, and that same group then spent the night at that very well on the mats just as they had been laid out. Together with that group there also came some naked ascetics (Jainas), and those ascetics slept on the very same mats on which the monks had been sleeping. Then one of the naked ascetics said:

"It has been seized by a knowing being." Another naked ascetic said: "You ate a great many sugar-cane joints, and so you have been seized by a mental proliferation of desire." He looked at the mat and, seeing that it was full of insects, said: "Who was it who slept on this mat? Not far from them, the brahmin who had been sleeping there heard this being said, and he said: "It was the monks, the ascetics who are sons of the Śākya, who slept on this mat." The naked ascetics then said: "O wise ones, the ascetics who are sons of the Śākya consider themselves experts in the world, and yet they do not even know enough to discard a grass mat in an open place like this." At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Grass mats are to be discarded even when in open country."

After the Blessed One had declared that grass mats were to be discarded even in open country, a large number of monks were traveling together as a company through a region. They stopped for a night at a place in the open country, and that company rose before dawn. As long as the monks were in the act of discarding the mats, the company waited, but then they went ahead. As the monks followed behind and traveled along, they were attacked by bandits. Eventually the group continued traveling and arrived at Śrāvastī. The monks there, seeing them, said: "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! How was your journey? Did you travel comfortably?" The venerable ones replied: "Venerable ones, we did not travel comfortably. We were attacked by bandits." "Who? How did this come about?" They then recounted the circumstances to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "They are not to be discarded in every case without exception; rather, one should gather them up and proceed."

Then, monks who worked with dyes would spread out grass on the ground in their dye-yards to dry their robes, and they would not discard that grass, and insects came to appear there. The Blessed One declared: "The grass is to be discarded." Other monks who wished to work with dyes said: "Venerable ones, do not discard this grass — we too wish to dry robes here." But the monks did not give it to them. The Blessed One declared: "Give it to them." When those monks had dried their robes there in one place or another, they would not discard the grass, saying, "We did not spread it out." The Blessed One declared: "One should ask them whether they intend to discard the grass or not. If they say they will discard it, then give it to them. If they say they will not discard it, then do not give it to them."

When monks were walking in their walking-places and the ground there was rough and heated the soles of their feet, the Blessed One declared: "Grass is to be laid down there." When the grass had been laid down and insects appeared there, the Blessed One declared: "Discard it." When they would discard it every single day, the Blessed One declared: "It is not to be discarded every single day; rather, one should examine it from time to time. If one is going out completely, then one should gather it up before departing."

When monks in their walking-places would set down bundles of grass on the ground and insects appeared there, the Blessed One declared: "Tie them with cord and hang them from the trees and leave them there."

When monks set down heavy objects on the ground and insects appeared in those places, the Blessed One declared: "Put them on a rack."

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire training, who respect training, and who are furnished with the requisites of training, and in accordance with that, and going further,

Having delivered a discourse containing teachings related to that matter, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, what came before was a rule, and this is a permission. My hearers are to recite the following as a training basis in the Vinaya: Furthermore, whatever monk lays down or has laid down a bundle of grass or a bundle of leaves in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha and does not gather it up himself, or does not have it gathered up, and departs from there without entrusting it to a monk who is present — except in such circumstances — commits an offense."

The phrase "whatever monk" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. The phrase "of the Saṅgha" means of the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's hearers. The phrase "in the assembly hall" refers to any place suitable for the four modes of conduct — walking, standing, sitting, and lying down. The phrase "a bundle of grass" refers to grass. The phrase "a bundle of leaves" refers to leaves. The phrase "lays down" means doing so oneself. The phrase "has laid down" means having another do so. The phrase "does not gather up himself" means doing so oneself. The phrase "does not have it gathered up" means through another. The phrase "a monk who is present" means whichever monk is there at that place. The phrase "without entrusting" means without delegating. The phrase "departs from there" means having left the immediate vicinity.

The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Reverend one, what is the immediate vicinity of a bundle? I, Upāli, was born a brahmin, and in the case of seven mango trees, each abundantly flowered, abundantly fruited, and abundantly branched, standing at intervals of seven fathoms from one another — those trees having been shown to have forty-nine fathoms between them — that is the immediate vicinity of a bundle."

The phrase "except in such circumstances" means that such circumstances have been set aside. The phrase "commits an offense" means it causes one to burn, to be scorched, to fall into the states of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, evil destinies, and states of ruin. Furthermore, as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of wholesome phenomena — and therefore it is called "commits an

As to how one incurs that transgression: if a monk lays down or has laid down a bundle of grass or a bundle of leaves in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha, and does not gather it up himself, and does not have it gathered up, and departs without entrusting it to a monk who is present — then for as long as he has not left the immediate vicinity, it constitutes an infraction; when he leaves the immediate vicinity, it becomes a downfall-offense.

If while walking along the way a monk recollects: "I laid down a bundle of grass or a bundle of leaves in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha" — and if he thinks: "Skilled practitioners of the celibate life will gather it up" — then that monk should generate the thought "I will not do so again in the future" and also state it in words, and that transgression is to be confessed according to the Dharma.

If, while walking along the way, one sees another monk going in that direction, and one thinks: "He will gather it up," then one should say to him: "Venerable one, I placed a bundle of grass or a bundle of leaves somewhere in the direction of the assembly hall of the Saṅgha — please gather it up." That monk should generate the thought "I will not do so again in the future" and also state it in words, and that transgression is to be confessed according to the Dharma. That monk, for his part, should respectfully accept the charge and gather it up. If he does not gather it up, he incurs an offense of wrongdoing.

If, having gone there, one recalls: "I laid down a bundle of grass or a bundle of leaves in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha" — and if one thinks: "Skilled practitioners of the celibate life will gather it up" —

That monk should generate the thought "I will not do so again in the future" and also state it in words, and that transgression is to be confessed according to the Dharma. If, having gone there, he sees another monk approaching and thinks "That one will gather it up," he should say to him: "Venerable one, I myself laid down a bundle of grass or a bundle of leaves in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha — please gather it up." That monk should generate the thought "I will not do such a thing again in the future" and also state it in words, and that transgression is to be confessed according to the Dharma. That monk, for his part, should respectfully accept the charge and gather it up. If he does not gather it up, he incurs an offense of wrongdoing.

If a monk has laid down a bundle of grass or a bundle of leaves in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha, or has had one laid down, and has neither gathered it up himself, nor had it gathered up, nor entrusted the matter to a monk who was present — and then, thinking either "I will now settle my mind, which has not yet been settled" or "I will liberate my mind, which has already been settled," he enters within in order to practice proper meditation, and then rises from that meditative absorption at the first watch of the night or at the midpoint of the first watch: if harm has not resulted, it is an offense of wrongdoing; if harm has resulted, it constitutes a downfall.

If a monk has laid down a bundle of grass or a bundle of leaves in the assembly hall of the Saṅgha, or has had one laid down, and has neither gathered it up himself, nor had it gathered up, nor entrusted the matter to a monk who was present — and then, thinking either "I will now settle my mind, which has not yet been settled" or "I will liberate my mind, which has already been settled," he enters within in order to practice proper meditation, and then rises from that meditative absorption at the middle watch of the night, the last watch of the night, before dawn appears, after dawn has appeared, before the sun has risen, after the sun has risen, when an eighth part of the sun's course remains, when a quarter part remains, at the midpoint before noon, past the midpoint, when a quarter of the sun's course remains, when an eighth part remains, before the sun has set, or after the sun has set, or before the stars have appeared, or after the stars have appeared: if harm has not resulted, it is an offense of wrongdoing; if harm has resulted, it constitutes a downfall.

The venerable Upananda (Nyēba Khor) asked the Blessed One the Buddha: "Venerable One, what kinds of harm arise from a bundle?" He replied: "There are two kinds of harm from a bundle: harm from wind and harm from rolling. What is harm from wind? It is when it is blown from one layer up to a second layer. What is harm from rolling? It is when it rolls from one layer down to the point of a second layer." On ground that is rocky or sandy, where such harm of that kind does not arise, there is no downfall. For a person who is a beginner, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensations, there is no downfall. The fifteenth rule entailing a downfall concerning bundles is complete.

The Blessed One the Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Udāyin was encouraging young, newly ordained monks, saying: "Venerable ones, come here! Go traveling through the provinces! There we will overcome our opponents, proclaim our own reputations, and acquire gains. As for yourselves, do not be preoccupied with your alms bowls, Dharma robes, nets, begging cups, belts, recitation of scriptural transmission, reading, oral recitation, yoga, or mental activities." Upon hearing this, those monks asked their preceptors and abbots: "Venerable abbots, we are going to travel through the provinces. With whom should we go?"

"Venerable ones, Udāyin is a person of thoroughly bad conduct — he will be a burden to you." But those monks dismissed these words, saying, "The abbot, the venerable Udāyin, dwells among us like a father and mother — why would he be a burden to us?" And so they disregarded what their preceptors and abbots had said and set off to travel through the provinces together with him.

When Udāyin had passed beyond the outer boundary, he said to them: "Venerable ones, why do you set out to travel through the provinces without having established lodgings? Come here — settle down first!" And with that he had them sit in a row before him and made them find lodging.

He assigned some of them carrying-poles, some he assigned alms bowls, some he assigned shoulder-bags, some he assigned begging cups, some he assigned round balls for washing the head. Then, stretching out both his arms himself, wearing nothing but a sweat-cloth, he walked along putting on airs before the world. They came to a rocky cliff, and there those monks rested beside a well. Now at that cliff there was a monastery, and the wooden sounding board was struck. Hearing it, those monks said: "Teacher, the sounding board has been struck at the monastery — let us go in." Udāyin said: "Those who have nothing but black-stained alms bowls have struck the work-sounding board, meaning that we, who are tired, will have to work. That is how it will be." "Teacher, is it not perhaps the sounding board for gains? If so, we will receive something when we go to that boundary district." "The teacher has great fame and much merit — he will receive; but who will give anything to us? If there are gains today, take them for me." As soon as they entered, the sounding board for lodgings was struck, and the monks said: "Venerable ones, claim lodgings!" Those monks said: "There is one among us who is senior to us all." "Who is that?" "It is the teacher Udāyin." "Then claim lodgings for him too." And so those monks claimed lodgings.

Now the venerable Udāyin was sitting there engaged in idle talk — whose is this rocky cliff, whose is this monastery, whose is this shrine, whose is this pleasure grove, whose is this park, whose is this well, whose is this field, whose are these cattle, whose are these buffalo — and so he sat on in idle talk. Those monks thought to themselves: "The teacher Udāyin is going to stay here for a long time." So they conferred among themselves and, making up the venerable Udāyin's bed, they set out together the foot-water and the foot-washing cloth at one side, washed his two feet, entered the fire room, and went to sleep.

The venerable Udāyin, for as long as he had a partner in idle talk, stayed on and on; but when there was no longer a partner for his idle talk, at the time when his line of sight was cut off — at dusk — he came to the monastery and began calling out: "Venerable ones! Venerable ones!" The monks said to him: "Venerable Udāyin, why do you call out like someone who has fallen into thick mud?" Udāyin said: "Are some of my young disciples here? Has anything happened to any of them?" Hearing that, they said: "Teacher, do not call out. A bed has been spread in the outer room of the lodging-house; foot-water and foot-washing cloth have also been set there — go and sleep there." Udāyin said: "Venerable ones, at whose request did you wash your feet?" "Teacher, you were delayed for a long time, so we conferred among ourselves and washed our own feet." Udāyin was furious and said: "Get out of the monastery! Go to those who provide lodging to people who have no respect and no sense of station like this, and take up residence with them!" And with that he drove them out of the monastery.

Those monks, having arrived that night with no covering overhead, were in danger. The next morning they rose early and said: "Teacher, we pay our respects. We are leaving." "Where are you going?" "To Śrāvastī." "Stay — I will nurse you when you are sick." "Teacher, since you made us sick in the first place, nursing the sick would only be fitting." With that they departed for Śrāvastī.

When the monks there met them, they said: "Venerable ones, welcome, welcome! How was your journey? Was the road comfortable?" "We arrived in the middle of the night without any overhead shelter, having set out at dawn, and so we fell ill." "Why is that?" The monks recounted the whole matter in detail, and those monks, over this trifling affair, condemned and upbraided and reviled Udāyin, saying: "Why does a monk expel other monks from the Saṅgha's monastery?" The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, on account of this occasion, and in relation to this matter, convened the assembly of monks — and all that follows is as before. The passage beginning "The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though they know, yet ask" is likewise as before. The Blessed One then questioned Udāyin: "Udāyin, is it true that you expelled a monk from the Saṅgha's monastery?" "Blessed One, it is so." The Blessed One rebuked him, saying that what is not in keeping with the conduct of a renunciant, not in accord with propriety, not fitting, and not in conformity with the rule is not something that one who has gone forth should do. The Blessed One then rebuked him in many ways, and having done so, he addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and all that follows is as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, in anger, disturbed and enraged, displeased and resentful, expels a monk from the Saṅgha's monastery or causes him to be expelled, commits an offense."

Thus did the Blessed One establish that rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

The Blessed One was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In Śrāvastī there was a certain monastery of the earth, and in it a sick monk was staying. Seeing that heavy five-colored storm-clouds had gathered, the monks said to him: "Venerable one, since five-colored storm-clouds have gathered, the monastery may collapse — come out." "I am unable to get up on my own." The monks, out of reluctance to act and regretting it afterward, did not bring him out. Rain fell, the monastery collapsed, and it fell upon that monk, and he died at his appointed time. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire training, who are respectful toward training, and who are well-furnished with the requisites of training, and then addressed the monks with a teaching that accorded with that theme, that surpassed it, and that was endowed with the qualities appropriate to it. He then said to the monks: "Monks, therefore, the earlier rule was established, and now this is permitted. My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, in anger, disturbed and enraged, displeased and resentful, expels a monk from the Saṅgha's monastery or causes him to be expelled — except in a circumstance such as this — commits an offense."

The phrase "whatever monk" refers to Udāyin or to any other monk of the same kind. "In anger, disturbed and enraged, displeased and resentful" means being angry and overwhelmed by the force of that anger.

The phrase "of the Saṅgha" means of the Saṅgha of śrāvakas of the Tathāgata. The phrase "from the monastery" means from a place where it is suitable to perform the four bodily comportments: walking, standing, sitting, and lying down. The phrase "a monk" means one who belongs to this Dharma. The phrase "expels" means doing so oneself. The phrase "causes him to be expelled" means through another. The phrase "except in a circumstance such as this" means that such a circumstance has been set aside. The phrase "commits an offense" means that it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the wretched destinations — the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower rebirths, and the states of utter downfall. Furthermore, for as long as the offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities. That is why it is said "commits an offense." As for how an offense is incurred: whenever a monk, in anger, disturbed and enraged, displeased and resentful, expels a monk from the Saṅgha's monastery or causes him to be expelled, in every such case an offense is committed. There is no offense for one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by feeling. This completes the sixteenth offense of expulsion.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Udāyin kept encouraging young monks, saying: "Come here, venerable ones — travel through the provinces, go about the countryside, and we will cut down our opponents, spread our own fame, acquire gains, and you yourselves need not be troubled by the alms bowl, the Dharma robe, the net, the cup, the belt, reciting scriptures, reading, chanting, yoga, or mental work." Those monks went to their preceptors and teachers and said: "Venerable preceptors, we are going to travel through the provinces. With whom?" "With the venerable Udāyin." The preceptors replied: "Venerable ones, he is a person of wretched habits who indulges in them everywhere — he will be a bad influence on you." But those monks dismissed the preceptors' words as worthless and set off through the countryside together with him. When Udāyin had passed beyond the outer boundary, he said: "Venerable ones, why do you travel through the provinces without having established a dwelling? Come, let us settle somewhere." He then had them sit cross-legged before him and assigned them their lodgings. He gave some of them a water-strainer, some a vessel for the alms bowl, some a razor case, some a cup, some a pill-box for pouring together, and then, stretching out both arms and carrying nothing but a sweat-cloth, walking along loftily with the world at his back, they all went to a rocky cliff. There they rested beside a certain well. Near that place there was a monastery on the cliff, and the wooden signal-board was struck. Hearing it, those monks said: "Teacher, the signal-board has been struck at the monastery — let us go in." Udāyin said: "Those who have nothing better to do than strike the work signal-board on account of their black alms bowls will find that we who are weary will end up having to do the work. Is that signal-board for gains, teacher? If so, we will get our share when we go to the boundary. As for the teacher, since he is of great fame and merit, he will receive some — but who will give any to us? For today, if there are any gains, take my share as well." When they arrived and the signal-board for lodgings had been struck, the monks said: "Venerable ones, take your lodgings." Those monks replied: "There are some who are even senior to us."

"Who is it?" "It is the teacher Charka." "Then take his lodging as well." So they had claimed the lodging. The venerable Charka was also sitting there engaged in conversation about possessions, asking: "Whose is this cliff? Whose is this temple? Whose is this shrine? Whose is this garden? Whose is this pleasure grove? Whose is this well? Whose is this field? Whose are these cattle? Whose are these buffaloes?" — and so he sat on, deep in talk about possessions. Those monks thought: "The teacher Charka is going to be delayed for a long time." So they conferred with one another, spread the venerable Charka's bed, set out the foot-water and the foot-ointment in one place, washed both his feet, and then entered the fire-room and lay down to sleep.

The venerable Charka remained sitting for as long as his conversation about possessions had a partner; but when his conversation about possessions no longer had a partner — at the time when the last light of evening had faded — he came to the temple and began calling out: "Venerable ones! Venerable ones!" The monks said to him: "Venerable Charka, why do you call out like a man who has entered a thicket of dense reeds?" Charka said: "Are there some of my younger ones here? Has any one of them perhaps fallen ill?" When they heard this, they said: "Teacher, do not call out. In the lodging room we have spread your sleeping mat, set out the foot-water and the foot-ointment, and washed your feet — go and sleep there." Charka said: "Venerable ones, whose feet did you wash by asking whom? The teacher was delayed for a long time, and so you conferred with one another and washed your own feet." Charka grew angry and said: "I have a small matter to settle with you — open the door." When they did not open the door, he grew angry, struck the door panel with his fist, and shook the entire fire-room. They were frightened and thought: "He is a man of great strength. If the Saṅgha's temple were to collapse, that would be wrong — let us open the door." So they opened the door, and he entered and threw himself down in their midst, jabbing some of them with his elbow and others with his knee. They said: "Teacher, forgive us! Forgive us!" Charka said: "Let the harm go to whoever caused it." The monks said among themselves: "Venerable ones, this man is powerful. There exists the possibility that he might deprive us all, entirely, of our lives — therefore let us leave." So they went outside. That night, lying exposed with no covering overhead, they were in danger of the cold.

In the morning they rose early and said: "Teacher, we pay homage to you. We are leaving." "Where are you going?" "To Śrāvastī." "Wait, and I will nurse you sick ones." "Teacher, because you have made us who were not sick into sick ones, nursing the sick is only fitting." And so they departed for Śrāvastī.

The monks said to those who arrived: "Welcome, venerable ones. Welcome. Have you traveled comfortably? How did you travel?" "We were struck with cold in the night by the teacher Charka." "Why?" They then related the matter in full, and the monks of few wants began to reproach, criticize, and complain: "Why do monks, knowing full well that monks were already present earlier in the Saṅgha's temple, come later, use the threat of harm as a pretext, then press in afterward and lie and sit down on seats?" The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this basis of rule, and this occasion, convened the community of monks — and so on, as before. The passage beginning "The blessed buddhas, though they know full well, act as though they do not know" also proceeds as before. The blessed Buddha then addressed the venerable Charka: "Charka, is it true that, knowing full well that monks were already seated earlier in the Saṅgha's temple, you came later, used as your pretext the very fact that whoever would cause harm would go away, then pressed in afterward and lay or sat down on a seat?" "Blessed One, it is true." The blessed Buddha then rebuked him, saying: "That is not the way of a contemplative, it is not fitting, it is not appropriate, it is not in conformity with the rule — it is not something one who has gone forth ought to do." The Blessed One rebuked him in many ways and then declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so on, as before. "My hearers shall proclaim

Whatever monk, knowing full well that monks were already seated earlier in the Saṅgha's temple, comes later, uses as his pretext the very fact that whoever would cause harm would go away, then presses in afterward and lies or sits down on a seat — that is an offense."

Now, the phrase "whatever monk" refers to Charka or any other monk of the same sort. "Of the Saṅgha" means the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's hearers. "In the temple" means any place where it is suitable to perform the four bodily deportments: walking, standing, sitting, and lying down. "Monks" means those who belong to this Dharma. "Were already seated" means were present there earlier. "Knowing full well" means either that he himself was aware of it or that others informed him. "Comes later" means arrives after them. "Whoever would cause harm" means whoever will not be able to rest comfortably. "Would go away" means that person will depart from that place to somewhere else. "Uses as his pretext" means using nothing other than that as his reason. "Presses in afterward" means having overwhelmed them by means of that harm. "On a seat" means on a resting place. "Lies down" means reclines the body. "Sits down" means places himself on his haunches. "An offense" means it scorches, torments, and causes one to fall into the bad destinations — into the hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of ruin. Furthermore, for as long as that offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome factors of virtue — therefore it is said to be an offense.

As for how the offense is incurred: whenever a monk, knowing full well that monks were already seated earlier in the Saṅgha's temple, comes later, uses as his pretext the very fact that whoever would cause harm would go away, then presses in afterward and lies or sits down on a seat — in every such instance the offense is incurred.

Verses summarizing the intermediate rules:

The bad guest, the meritorious, the cold and the warm,
The impure, the washed-clean, the medicinal,
Suitable for practice, the recitation,
The fearful, together with the fearless.

The blessed Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. At that time the venerable Charka was saying to various newly ordained monks: "Venerable ones, come here. Go out to tour the provinces. We shall also cut down our opponents there, and spread our own renown, and secure gains — and you will also obtain alms bowls, Dharma robes, nets, cups, belts, and texts for recitation, and —"

— and reading, recitation, yoga practice, and mental cultivation without distraction." Having thus encouraged them, those monks went to their teachers and preceptors and said: "Venerable preceptors, we are going on a tour of the provinces. With whom? With the venerable Charka."

The elder monks replied: "Venerable ones, that one habitually practises every kind of base conduct. He will bring shame upon you."

The young monks answered: "The venerable Charka is like a father to us. Why would he bring shame upon us?" And having thus dismissed the words of their seniors as empty, they set out on the provincial tour together with him.

When Charka had passed beyond the outer boundary markers, he said: "Venerable ones, why are you setting out on a provincial tour without having established a residence? Come here — settle down first." He had them sit cross-legged before him and assigned them their lodgings. He assigned some of them a leather bag, some an alms bowl, some a copper vessel, some a cup, some a communal ball of medicinal pills. Then, with both arms extended and wearing nothing but a sweat-cloth, he went about making himself known to the world. They proceeded to a certain cliff-face, and there they rested beside a well. At that place there was a monastery on the cliff, and its signal gong was struck. On hearing it, the monks said: "Teacher, the gong has been struck at the monastery — let us enter."

Charka said: "Those who have no work — idlers — strike the gong for the sake of work. People such as we who are weary would only be required to do tasks there. That kind of place exists."

The monks replied: "Teacher, is it not the gong for the receipt of gains? If that is what it is, if we go to the boundary we shall obtain them."

"The teacher has great fame and merit, so he will obtain them. But who would give to us? If there happen to be gains today, take his share as well." When they entered, the gong for the distribution of lodgings was struck, and the monks said: "Venerable ones, select your lodgings."

Those monks said: "There is someone elder than us."

"Who is that?"

"The teacher Charka."

"Then take his share as well." And so they selected lodgings.

Now the venerable Charka was also there, sitting and engaging in gossip: "Whose cliff is this? Whose monastery? Whose shrine? Whose pleasure grove? Whose park? Whose well? Whose field? Whose cattle? Whose buffalo?" — sitting there engaged in such gossip.

Those monks, for their part, thought: "The teacher Charka is going to be delayed for a long while." So they consulted one another, and having prepared the venerable Charka's sleeping place and set out washing-water and foot-ointment all in order, they said to one another: "Venerable ones, today we have eaten poor food, so we cannot recite. For now, let us cultivate mental application." They entered a room with a meditation platform, sat cross-legged, and began to practise meditative concentration.

The venerable Charka, for his part, sat on and on as long as he had conversational partners for his gossip. When at last there was no one left to talk with, and at the time when sight was failing in the dusk, he came to the monastery and began calling out: "Venerable ones! Venerable ones!"

The monks said to him: "Venerable Charka, why are you calling out like someone plunging into the middle of a thick swamp?"

Charka replied: "If some of my young charges are lodged here, have any of them fallen ill?"

On hearing this, they replied: "Teacher, do not call out. The caretaker of the lodgings has spread out your sleeping mat in the inner chamber, along with washing-water and —"

"— and foot-washing water has also been set out. Go and sleep there. Today, as we were seeking poor food, our recitation fell behind, so for the time being we are doing meditation here in this waiting hall." Charka said: "Venerable ones, did the Blessed One (the Buddha) not declare that one who does not read has no wisdom? Come, apply yourselves to recitation." With that he seated the two of them together and had them recite through the night.

In the morning they rose early and said: "We pay homage to the teacher. We are leaving. Where are we going? To Śrāvastī." "Stay — I shall nurse those among you who are ill." "Teacher, since you made us, who were not ill, into sick people, and then nursed the sick, that is quite enough nursing." And with that they set off for Śrāvastī.

When the monks there greeted them — "Venerable ones, welcome, welcome! How did the journey go? How did it go in comfort?" — they replied: "Our teacher Charka kept us reciting through the entire night." "How did he keep you reciting?" And the monks there recounted it all in detail to the resident monks.

Now at that point certain monks of small virtue began to censure, ridicule, and reproach, saying: "Why does a monk, out of deliberate intention, exalt himself over other monks?" On the occasion of this censure and reproach, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "However little a monk exalts himself over another monk, that becomes a transgression in every case."

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the forty-fifth fascicle.

The buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At that time the venerable Charka was urging newly ordained monks: "Venerable ones, come! Let us go touring the provinces. There we shall also silence our adversaries, spread our own fame, and acquire gain. And as for you — be free from distraction in alms-bowl, in robe, in nets, in small bowls, in girdles, in recitation of scripture, in reading, in oral recitation, in yoga, and in applying the mind." Having so exhorted them, those monks went to their teachers and preceptors and said: "Venerable preceptors, we are setting out to tour the provinces." "With whom?" "With the venerable Charka." "Venerable ones, that one habitually engages in bad conduct, and he will bring harm upon you." "But venerable preceptors, the venerable Charka is to us as a father and mother in his manner of dwelling — why would he bring harm upon us?" And with that they dismissed what had been said to them, and set out on tour through the provinces together with him.

When Charka was outside and the boundary time had passed, he said: "Venerable ones, why do you set out on tour without establishing a lodging-place? Come — observe the practice of the dwelling." And he had them sit down in a row before him and set them to keeping the lodging. He assigned some of them a strainer, some a vessel for the alms-bowl, some a cylindrical container, some a small bowl, and some a bottle for pouring medicines over the head. Then, stretching out both his arms and wearing nothing but a sweat-cloth, he went about exalting himself before the world, while they, having arrived at a certain cliff, were resting by a well when a gandhī (a wooden sounding board) was struck at a monastery there upon the cliff.

On hearing it they said: "Teacher, the gandhī has been struck at the monastery — let us go in." Charka said: "Those who have nothing but a blackened alms-bowl will strike the work-gandhī, and we who are weary will have to do work — such a situation will arise." "Teacher, is it not the gandhī for receiving gifts? If it is, then if we go to the boundary we shall obtain something."

"Teacher, you are of great renown and great merit, so you will obtain it — but who will give it to us? If today there is something to be had, then take our share as well." When they had gone there, after a little while the lodging-gandhī of that place was struck, and the monks said: "Venerable ones, take your lodgings." They replied: "There is someone among us who is even more senior." "Who is it?" "It is Teacher Charka." "Then take his share as well." And so they accepted the lodging.

Now Venerable Charka was still there, passing the time in idle chatter: "Whose is this cliff? Whose is this temple? Whose is this shrine? Whose is this pleasure grove? Whose is this park? Whose is this well? Whose is this field? Whose are these cattle? Whose are these buffalo?" — so he sat about in idle talk. The others thought to themselves, "Teacher Charka is going to be delayed for a long time," and so they consulted one another, prepared Venerable Charka's bed, set out the foot-water and the foot-washing basin together, and said to one another: "Venerable ones, today we have eaten our fill of good food — let us for a while chant together in pairs." And so they began chanting together in pairs.

Venerable Charka, for as long as his idle chatter found an answering companion, sat on and on. But when his idle talk found no more partner, he came to the monastery at the time when the light was failing, and asked them: "Venerable ones, what are you doing?" "Teacher, today we went seeking good food, and for a while we are chanting together in pairs." Charka said: "Venerable ones, did the Blessed One not declare that one who does not meditate lacks wisdom? Come here, all of you — sit in meditation!" And with that he ushered them into the back room, sat them down cross-legged, and kept them awake through the entire night.

In the morning they rose early and said: "Teacher, we pay homage to you. We are leaving." "Where are you going?" "To Śrāvastī." "Wait — I will nurse the sick ones among you." "Teacher, you who made those of us who were not sick fall ill are now proposing to nurse the sick — that is quite something!" And with that they set off for Śrāvastī.

When the monks met them, they said: "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! How was your journey? How did you travel?" "We traveled well enough. Our Teacher Charka kept us awake the whole night." "How did he keep you awake?" And they then recounted the whole affair in detail to the monks.

Thereupon, certain monks of little virtue began to criticize, defame, slander, and speak ill of him, saying: "Why does a monk deliberately set out to make himself equal to senior monks?" When the monks brought the matter before the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Whenever a monk makes himself out to be equal to even a slightly more senior monk, it becomes a transgression in every case."

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time Venerable Charka was urging the newer and newer monks: "Come, venerable ones — travel through the provinces. There we shall crush our opponents, proclaim our own renown, and also secure gains. As for yourselves, you need not trouble yourselves with your alms-bowls, your robes, your nets, your bowls, your waistbands, reciting scripture, reading, chanting, yoga, or mental application." And when those monks made request of their teachers and preceptors: "Preceptors, we are going to travel through the provinces — with whom shall we go?"

"Venerable ones, Venerable Charka is a person of thoroughly bad conduct — he will bring disgrace upon you."

But those monks dismissed their words as no words at all, saying, "Preceptor Venerable Charka abides toward us just as a father and mother would — why would he bring disgrace upon us?" And they went off to travel through the provinces together with him.

When Charka had passed beyond the outer boundary, he said, "Venerable ones, why do you set out to travel through the provinces without having first established a base? Come here — settle down." And he had them sit down in a row before him and established a base.

He assigned to some among them a small bag; to some, an alms-bowl vessel; to some, a small pot; to some, a cup; and to some, a round water vessel for pouring over the head. Then, with both arms extended and wearing nothing but a sweat cloth, he went about the world presenting himself with an air of superiority. When they arrived at a rocky cliff, they rested there beside a well. Now at that cliff there was a monastery, and the wooden sounding board was struck. When they heard it, they said, "Teacher, the sounding board has been struck at the monastery — let us enter."

Charka said, "Those who have nothing but black alms-bowls are striking the work sounding board, and we who are tired would then have to do work — that is the sort of situation it would be." They said, "Teacher, might it not be the gains sounding board? If so, we will get something when we go to the boundary." Charka replied, "The teacher has great renown and great merit, so he will receive something — but who is going to give to us? If there are any gains today, he should take them for himself as well." They went in.

After some time had passed there, the sounding board for lodging was struck, and the monks said, "Venerable ones, claim your lodgings." Those monks replied, "There is someone among us who is more senior." "Who is that?" "It is Teacher Charka." "He should claim for himself as well." And so they did claim their lodgings.

Venerable Charka remained there, passing the time in idle gossip: "Whose is this rocky cliff? Whose is this monastery? Whose is this shrine? Whose is this grove? Whose is this pleasure garden? Whose is this well? Whose is this field? Whose are these cattle? Whose are these buffalo?" — and so he remained in idle chatter.

Those monks thought to themselves, "Teacher Charka is going to hold us up for a long time," and so they consulted one another. They spread out Venerable Charka's bedding, set out foot-water and foot-ointment in one place, and said to one another, "Venerable ones, the cold season has now arrived — let us go into the fire room and sleep." And they went into the fire room and slept.

As long as Venerable Charka had a counterpart in his idle gossip, he remained there; but when there was no longer anyone to reciprocate his idle talk, he came to the monastery at the time when his sight failed him in the dark, and began calling out, "Venerable ones! Venerable ones!"

The monks said to him, "Venerable Charka, why do you call out like someone who has entered deep into a thicket of mud?"

Charka said, "Some of my young ones were here — have any of them perhaps fallen ill?"

When they heard this, they said, "Teacher, do not call out. In the inner chamber of the lodging, the bed has been made up and foot-water and foot-ointment have been set out — sleep there. As for us, the cold season has now arrived and we have gone into the fire room to sleep. Venerable ones, if you should come down with a blood disorder or a bile disorder, how would we be able to nurse you for that long? Come out." And with that he drove them outside without any shelter, doused them with cold water, and fanned them with a cooling fan in the middle of the night.

At dawn, when night had lifted, those monks said, "Teacher, we pay homage to you. We are here. Where are you going?" "To Śrāvastī." "Then stay, and we shall nurse those among you who are sick." "Teacher, you have made healthy monks into sick ones, so it is only fitting that you nurse those who are ill." And with that, they set off for Śrāvastī. When they arrived, the monks greeted them saying, "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! Have you traveled comfortably? How was your journey?" "Our teacher Chārkā struck us with blows in the middle of the night." "How did he strike you?" And so they recounted the whole affair in detail to the monks there.

Some monks of little account began to criticize, denounce, and reproach, saying, "Why does the monk Chārkā deliberately humiliate his fellow monks?" And so the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, to whatever degree a monk humiliates another monk, that act becomes an offense in every case."

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Chārkā would urge newly ordained monks, saying, "Come, venerable ones — come and go on circuit through the provinces. There we shall silence our opponents, proclaim our own reputation, and secure offerings. And as for you, you need not trouble yourselves with alms bowl and robe, with nets, with bowls, with belts, with receiving transmissions, with recitation, with chanting, with yoga, or with mental practice." When those monks were thus encouraged, they went to their preceptors and teachers and said, "Preceptors, we are going on circuit through the provinces." "With whom?" "With the venerable Chārkā." "Venerable ones, he lives by improper conduct, and he will bring humiliation upon you." "Preceptors, the venerable Chārkā abides toward us as a father and mother would — why would he bring humiliation upon us?" And dismissing their words, they set off on circuit together with him.

When Chārkā had led them out beyond the outer boundary, he said, "Venerable ones, why are you going on provincial circuit without having settled your lodgings? Come, take your lodgings now." And having made them sit down before him on their haunches, he assigned them their lodgings. To some he assigned a gourd; to some he assigned an alms bowl; to some he assigned a gourd dish; to some he assigned a small bowl; to some he assigned a broad-spouted jug for pouring liquid over the head. Then, stretching out both arms and wearing nothing but a sweat-cloth, he went about the world in haughty display.

They made their way to a rocky cliff, and while they were resting beside a well there, they heard the wooden board being struck at a temple on top of the cliff. They said, "Teacher, the board is being struck at the temple — let us go in." Chārkā said, "Those who have nothing but black alms bowls will strike the work-board, and we who are weary will have to do labor — such will be our situation." "Teacher, is this not the board for receiving offerings? In that case, if we go to the boundary, we shall obtain some." "The teacher is famous and has great merit, so he will receive them — but who will give them to us? If today there happen to be any offerings, then take some for me too."

When they went there, as soon as they arrived the board for announcing lodgings was struck. The monks said, "Venerable ones, take your lodgings." They replied, "There are those among us who are senior." "Who are they?"

"The teacher Charka!" "Then take his lodgings." And they took those lodgings.

Now the venerable Charka was there at that time, sitting engaged in various conversations — asking whose was this rocky slope, whose this monastery, whose this temple, whose this pleasure grove, whose this park, whose this well, whose this field, whose these cattle, whose these buffalo. Thinking "The teacher Charka will be delayed a long while," the monks conferred among themselves and, having prepared the venerable Charka's bed and set out his foot-water and foot-ointment together in one place, they said to one another, "Venerable ones, the evening hour is now upon us; let us enter the dormitory and sleep." And they entered the dormitory and slept.

The venerable Charka, for as long as his various conversations had a partner to keep them going, sat on and on in conversation; and when at last the conversations had no partner left, then at the hour of dusk he came to the monastery and began calling out: "Venerable ones! Venerable ones!" The monks said to him, "Venerable Charka, why do you call out like one who has entered deep into a thicket of reeds?" Charka said, "If some young disciples of mine are lodged here, might one of them not have fallen ill?" When they heard this, they said, "Teacher, do not call out. In the main lodging-house a bed has been prepared for you, and foot-water and foot-ointment have been set out — go and sleep there. We, for the evening hour has come upon us, have entered the dormitory and are sleeping. Venerable ones, if you were to be afflicted by wind or phlegm, how could we attend upon your illness for so long? Come inside." And with that they brought him inside, covered the windows, lit a fire, closed the door, wrapped him in as many blankets as there were, piled them on top of him, and sat with him.

When dawn broke the next morning, they said, "Teacher, we pay you homage. We are leaving." "Where are you going?" "To Śrāvastī." "Stay, and I will nurse your sick ones among you." "Teacher, you have made us, who were not sick, into sick men — enough of nursing the sick!" And they departed for Śrāvastī.

The monks said to them when they arrived, "Venerable ones, welcome, welcome! Have you traveled comfortably? How did you travel?" "The teacher Charka tormented us through the night from the very first watch." "How did he torment you?" And they recounted the whole incident to the monks in full.

Then certain monks who were men of little virtue began to scold, saying, "Why do monks, with deliberate intent, set themselves up as superior to other monks? They make disparaging remarks, they spread reproaches, they speak slander." With that the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Whenever a monk sets himself up as superior to another monk even to the slightest degree, it shall everywhere constitute an offense."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Charka was saying to the newly ordained monks: "Venerable ones, come here. Go on a circuit of the district; we shall there demolish our adversaries, proclaim our own fame, and secure offerings. And you, do not trouble yourselves with alms-bowl, robes, net, cup, girdle, textual study, recitation, chanting, yoga, or mental application."

He also encouraged them, saying, "You should also attend to the sick among you." When the monks came to know that he engaged in all manner of base conduct, none of them were willing to go on a circuit of the district with him, and so he went alone. On his circuit he came to a shrine built into a rocky cliff. That shrine had no shelter for defecation and no shelter for urination, and so the monks would place their chamber-pots there, defecate and urinate in them, and leave them behind. When Charka entered that shrine, and when the monks came to know that he engaged in all manner of base conduct, not one of them waited upon him. He thought to himself, "I shall make these black-bowl men displeased," and so he climbed up onto the shrine. When he saw that chamber-pots had been placed there, he said, "Is this shrine made of bronze?" and seizing those pots by their rims with his toes, he hurled them outside. During the night, when the monks rose and could not find their pots, they defecated and urinated at the mouth of a fox's den. Then when dawn broke at the end of the night, faithful brahmins and householders arrived, and he said to them, "Wise ones, look at how these monks of base conduct who carry black alms-bowls have fouled every shrine with their defecation and urination." At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Whenever a monk sets himself up as superior to another monk even to the slightest degree, it shall everywhere constitute an offense."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Charka was saying to the newly ordained monks: "Venerable ones, come here. Go on a circuit of the district; we shall there demolish our adversaries, proclaim our own fame, and secure offerings. And you, do not trouble yourselves with alms-bowl, robes, net, cup, girdle, textual study, recitation, chanting, yoga, or mental application. You should also attend to the sick among you."

When the monks came to know that he engaged in all manner of base conduct, none of them were willing to go on a circuit of the district with him, and so he went alone. On his circuit he came to a shrine built into a rocky cliff. When Charka entered that shrine, and when the monks came to know that he engaged in all manner of base conduct, not one of them waited upon him. He thought to himself, "I shall make these black-bowl men displeased," and so he swallowed a purgative pill, entered the hot room, and sat there. While he was sitting there, he began to have loose bowels. Now the Blessed One had instructed that sick monks should be attended to three times a day, and so elder monks came to inquire after his illness. They asked him, "Venerable one, are you at ease?" He said, "I am at ease." The elders sat a while and then began to leave. He said, "Elders, please wait just a moment." They sat a while again and began to leave, and once more he said, "Elders, please wait yet another moment. Venerable ones, have I not deliberately set myself up as superior?"

When he said, "You there with the black bowl, you should not be displeased in that way," the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "However much a monk sets himself up as superior over another monk, in every case that becomes a transgression."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Chārka began urging the newer monks, saying: "Venerable ones, come here, let us go on the alms round together. There we will also silence our opponents, proclaim our own fame, and secure offerings. And you too should concern yourselves with the alms bowl, the Dharma robe, the net bag, the bowl stand, the belt, the recitation of scriptures, the reading, the chanting, the yoga practices, and the mental contemplations without distraction. You should also nurse the sick among you." When the monks came to understand that this was reprehensible conduct being practiced throughout, no one wished to go with him on the alms round, and so he went alone. Going along on his rounds, he came to a certain temple built into a rocky cliff. In that temple there dwelled only ascetic monks. When Chārka entered that temple, the monks learned that he was one who engaged in such reprehensible conduct throughout, and so not a single monk attended to his needs. He then thought to himself, "These ones with the black bowls should be made displeased," and he saw that the temple was already half-completed. So the venerable Chārka went to the householder who was the patron of that place, arrived there, and said: "Householder, why do you not complete the temple? Has not the Blessed One himself said,

Enter quickly into virtue, turn the mind away from evil deeds.
If one makes the offering of merit, the mind comes to delight in evil.

Noble one, I have the kārṣāpaṇa coins but I have no laborers." The householder said: "Has not the Blessed One declared that monks should do building work? If the noble one is willing to do the building work, that would be excellent." So Chārka went to the temple and struck the wooden sounding board (gaṇḍī). The Blessed One had praised striking the gaṇḍī to summon monks, and so the monks came when the gaṇḍī was struck. Then, as the monks saw how many planks the venerable Chārka had begun to shape, those monks too began to shape planks. Chārka set those monks to producing planks all day long, and they said: "Venerable ones, this temple was formerly suited to yoga practice, but now it has become suited to building work. We are going to Śrāvastī." They went to Śrāvastī, and when they arrived the monks said to them: "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! We are glad to see you, but we are not glad that you have come away. If that temple was suited to yoga practice, why did you abandon that temple and come here?" They replied: "Venerable ones, that temple was formerly suited to yoga practice, but now it has become suited to building work." "How so?" "The venerable Chārka came there and started the building work." When this was reported to the Blessed One by the monks, the Blessed One declared: "However much a monk sets himself up as superior over another monk, in every case that becomes a transgression."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. At that time the venerable Chārka said to various newly ordained monks: "Venerable ones, come here and go on a district round with me. There we shall also silence our opponents, proclaim our own fame, and secure gains. And you yourselves need not be troubled with the alms bowl, the Dharma robe, the strainer, the bowl-stand, the belt, studying scripture, recitation, chanting, yoga, or mental application. You shall also nurse those among you who are sick." Having thus encouraged them, when the monks came to know that this was base conduct that he was habitually practising, none of them were any longer inclined to go on the district round with him. So he went on the district round alone, and arrived at a temple set in a rocky cliff. In that temple there were only monks who engaged in recitation. When Chārka entered that temple, knowing from the monks that this was base conduct that he habitually practised, none of them ministered to his needs. He then thought: "I will make these monks with their black alms bowls displeased." Now that temple had already been half built, and so the venerable Chārka went to the householder who was its patron and, having gone there, said: "Householder, why do you not complete the temple? Has not the Blessed One also said:

Engage swiftly in what is virtuous, and turn the mind away from evil deeds.
If one offers up merit,

the mind will come to delight in evil."

"Noble one, I have the kārṣāpaṇa coins, but I have no workmen."
"Householder, has not the Blessed One said that monks should do building work in return?" "If the noble one is willing to do building work in return, that would be excellent." Chārka went to the temple and struck the gaṇḍī. The Blessed One had said that one should respond to the gaṇḍī, and so the monks responded to the gaṇḍī. When they saw how many planks the venerable Chārka was beginning to set in place, the monks too began setting planks in place. Chārka had those monks doing the plank-work from morning until midday, and then they said: "Venerable ones, this temple was formerly suited to recitation, but now it has become suited to building work. Go to Śrāvastī." Those monks went to Śrāvastī, and the monks said to them: "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! We are glad to see you, but we are not glad that you have come away. If that temple was suited to recitation, why did you abandon that temple and come here?" "Venerable ones, that temple was formerly suited to recitation, but now it has become suited to building work." "How so?" "The venerable Chārka came there and started the building work." When this was reported to the Blessed One by the monks, the Blessed One declared: "However much a monk sets himself up as superior over another monk, in every case that becomes a transgression."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. At that time the venerable Chārka said to various newly ordained monks: "Venerable ones, come here and go on a district round with me. There we shall also silence our opponents, proclaim our own fame, and secure gains. And you yourselves need not be troubled with the alms bowl, the Dharma robe, the strainer, the bowl-stand, the belt, studying scripture, recitation, chanting, chanting, meditation, and mental application. You shall also tend to the sick among you." Having thus urged them with enthusiasm, when the monks came to know that this was the conduct of one who takes up an inferior dwelling place and practices accordingly, none of them were willing to go on the district round together with him. So Chārka went on the district round alone and came to a monastery built into a cliff face. That monastery was a place of danger, for it was frequented by robbers. When Chārka entered that monastery, the monks came to know that this was the conduct of one who takes up an inferior dwelling place, and so not a single monk rendered him any service. He thought to himself, "I shall make these black-bowled ones unhappy," and so he opened the gate and sat down in the gateway. The duty monk said, "Venerable Chārka, I am going to close the gate — please sit over to this side." Chārka replied, "You close your own cell door properly and sit down," and he did not give way so the gate could be closed. The monks, being in a place of danger with the monastery gate unclosed, spent the night in fear and alarm, and in that state they passed the night until dawn. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "However much a monk sets himself up as superior over another monk, in every case that becomes a transgression."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. At that time the venerable Chārka said to various newly ordained monks: "Venerable ones, come here and go on a district round with me. Having thus urged them with enthusiasm, when the monks came to know that this was the conduct of one who takes up an inferior dwelling place and practices accordingly, none of them were willing to go on the district round together with him. So Chārka went on the district round alone and came to a monastery built into a cliff face. That monastery was a place without danger. When Chārka entered that monastery, the monks came to know that this was the conduct of one who takes up an inferior dwelling place, and so not a single monk rendered him any service. He thought to himself, "I shall make these black-bowled ones unhappy." And since that monastery was without danger, the monks went out to relieve themselves, and while they were out, Chārka barred the gate, laid out his bedding in the gateway, and went to sleep. When the monks went out again in the night to relieve themselves, they said, "Venerable Chārka, we are going outside — please move over to this side." Chārka replied, "Go outside from the back corner of each of your own cells." The monks, needing to relieve themselves, had some of them relieve themselves in the courtyard, and others relieve themselves beside the pond. Then at dawn brahmin householders who were devotees arrived at the monastery, and Chārka said to them, "Wise ones, just look at how these black-bowled ones of inferior dwelling and conduct have befouled the entire monastery with their excretions." At that the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"If a monk demeans another monk even slightly, he commits an offense in all cases. Moreover, monks, there are these six further places that are not to be assigned: the gatehouse, the base of the steps, the corridor, the lumber storage building, the fireroom, and the refuse pit. There is no offense for one who is a beginner, one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is afflicted by pain."

Thus the seventeenth rule on suppression-offenses is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the Venerable Ānanda encouraged the newer monks, saying, "Venerable ones, come here and let us go on a wandering tour of the region. There we can also refute our opponents, proclaim our own renown, and acquire material gains. And you yourselves need not be burdened with alms-bowl, robes, net, bowl-stand, waistband, recitation, reading, chanting, yoga, or mental work. You will also serve as nurses for those among you who are ill." When the monks came to know that this dwelling was a place of corrupt conduct all around, none of them felt any enthusiasm for going on the wandering tour with him. Then a wandering ascetic said, "Venerable Ānanda, I will go on the wandering tour with you." The monks said to that wandering ascetic, "That wandering ascetic is one who practices corrupt conduct everywhere — it will demean you." The wandering ascetic replied, "I am a man of years past, and there remains not even a little that he needs to look after for me in the way of lodging, recitation, reading, chanting, yoga, or mental work — so what can he do to me?" And having made nothing of those monks' words, he set off on the wandering tour together with Ānanda.

When Ānanda had passed beyond the outer boundary, he said, "Wandering ascetic, carry this waterpot for a while." The wandering ascetic replied, "Venerable Ānanda, have you not seen the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha? What use is this worthless implement?" Ānanda said, "Wandering ascetic, if you refuse to carry it, do you think you are more learned than I?" The wandering ascetic replied, "I may not be learned, but I speak what is reasonable." Ānanda thought, "I will make this wandering ascetic uncomfortable," and the two of them continued on their wandering journey. Eventually the two arrived at a rocky cliff, and while they rested beside a well there, a wooden sounding board was struck at a monastery on the top of that rocky cliff. Upon hearing it, the wandering ascetic said, "Venerable Ānanda, the sounding board is being struck at the monastery — let us go." Ānanda said, "At such a place as this, those who have no black-bowled ones strike the work-board and we weary ones will have to do the work — that is the kind of place it will be." The wandering ascetic said, "Venerable Ānanda, is it not the sounding board for material gains?" Ānanda replied, "If that is so, when we arrive at the boundary we will receive them." "But Venerable Ānanda, you have great renown and merit, so you will receive them — who will give to me?" Ānanda said, "Go, and if there are material gains, collect them on my behalf as well."

So the wandering ascetic went, and shortly thereafter the sounding board for lodging was struck. The monks said, "Wandering ascetic, receive a lodging." He replied, "There is one who is older than I." "Who is that?" "The Venerable Ānanda." "Then receive it on his behalf as well." So he received the lodging.

Meanwhile the Venerable Ānanda was sitting there engaged in worldly conversation, "Whose is this rocky cliff? Whose is this temple? Whose is this shrine? Whose is this pleasure grove? Whose is this garden enclosure? Whose is this well? Whose is this field? Whose are these cattle? Whose are these buffalo?" — so he sat there engaged in worldly conversation.

The wandering ascetic thought to himself, "The Venerable Ānanda is going to be delayed for a long time," and so he spread out Ānanda's bedding on the upper floor, set out the foot-washing water and the foot-wiping cloth in one place, washed his own two feet outside the temple, and then went down to the lower room, made up his own bed, and lay down to sleep.

The Venerable Ānanda, for as long as he had company in his worldly conversation, remained sitting. When at last his companions in conversation had gone and the time came when the lamps were extinguished, he came to the temple and began calling out, "Wandering ascetic! Wandering ascetic!" The monks said to him, "Venerable Ānanda, why do you call out like someone plunging into a thicket of reeds?" Ānanda said, "There is a wandering ascetic friend of mine here — has he been troubled?" The wandering ascetic heard this and said, "Venerable Ānanda, do not call out. I have made up your bed on the upper floor, set out the foot-washing water and the foot-wiping cloth in one place — go up there and rest." Ānanda said, "Wandering ascetic, there is a little door lamp — open the door." "Venerable Ānanda, I am exhausted; I will open it tomorrow morning." "Wandering ascetic, I will keep the lamp burning with you through the entire night until dawn — open it." "Venerable Ānanda, I am exhausted; I will not open the door for you."

Ānanda climbed up to the upper floor, washed his two feet, entered the lodging room, and called out, "Wandering ascetic!" The wandering ascetic replied, "What is it, Venerable Ānanda?" Now Ānanda was skilled in acoustics, and he directed a chair-leg to a point directly above the wandering ascetic's forehead — in such a way that if he pressed down hard enough, the chair-leg would break through the ceiling and come down onto the wandering ascetic's forehead — and he pressed down with great force. It struck the wandering ascetic's forehead and broke the skin of his forehead.

The wandering ascetic said, "Venerable Ānanda, I forgive you. I forgive you." "Hey, wandering ascetic, what are you saying?" The wandering ascetic thought to himself, "If I make a sound, he will claim seniority and take away my bed as well," and so he said nothing more and lay still.

The next morning he rose early and said, "Venerable Ānanda, I pay homage to you. I am leaving." "Wandering ascetic, where are you going?" "To Śrāvastī." "Wandering ascetic, stay — I will nurse you in your illness." "Venerable Ānanda, you have made someone who was not ill into someone ill, and now you offer to nurse him in his illness — what a fine nurse that would be!" And with that he departed for Śrāvastī.

The monks said to him, "Venerable wandering ascetic, welcome, welcome! How have you fared on your journey?" "Noble ones, how have you fared? The Venerable Ānanda has broken my forehead." "How did he break it?" And he then recounted the whole incident in full to the monks.

The monks of few wishes then reproached Ānanda, saying, "Why does a monk knowingly press down heavily on a chair or a chair-leg that is projecting out into the open space above the assembly's temple, and sit and lie there?" They reproached him, spoke out against him, and complained of it. Then the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, in connection with this case, and on this occasion, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth, as before.

The phrase "the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, feign ignorance" and so forth proceeds as before. The Blessed One questioned the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that you, knowing that a chair or a chair-leg was projecting out into the open space above the assembly's temple, pressed down heavily upon it and sat and lay there?" "Reverend One, it is so." The Blessed One rebuked him, saying that this was not in keeping with the conduct of a renunciant, was not fitting, was not proper, was not in accord with the discipline — this is not something one who has gone forth should do. Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits and so forth, I shall establish a training rule in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and this proceeds as before. "My hearers are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, knowing that a chair or a chair-leg is projecting out into the open space above the assembly's temple, presses down heavily upon it and sits or lies there — that is a transgression."

Now as for the phrase "whatever monk": this refers to a son of the Śākyas such as Ānanda, or to anyone else of that kind. "Of the assembly" means the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's hearers. "Temple" means any place suitable for the four modes of deportment — walking, standing, sitting, and lying down. "Into the open space above" means into the space above the building. "Projecting out" means projecting over a thatched or leafed roof. "Chair" means a chair proper. "Chair-leg" means a chair-leg proper. "A leg projecting out" means a leg that protrudes. "Knowing" means that he himself has understood it, or that others have told him. "Presses down heavily" means that he presses upon it with force. "Sits" means that he rests upon it with his haunches. "Lies" means that he stretches his body out upon it. "A transgression" means that it scorches, torments, and causes one to fall into bad rebirths: the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the states of wrongful falling. Furthermore, for as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs wholesome phenomena — hence it is said to be a transgression.

As for how the transgression is incurred: to whatever extent a monk, knowing that a chair or a chair-leg is projecting out into the open space above the assembly's temple, presses down heavily upon it and sits or lies there — in all such cases a transgression is incurred. If, however, the seat is covered with a flat board, covered with a small flat board, covered with a flat plank, covered with a plank that has a raised portion, or if the seat tilts and gives way, there is no transgression. If a footrest has been installed, or if a brace has been put in place, there is likewise no transgression. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is beset by painful sensations. The eighteenth transgression concerned with sitting when a leg is projecting out is complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Kauśāmbī in the park of Ghositārāma. At that time the venerable Udāyin, knowingly, was watering grass, dung, and earth with water containing living creatures, and was having others water them. The monks said to him: "Venerable Udāyin, do not knowingly water grass, dung, and earth with water containing living creatures, and do not have others water them." Udāyin replied: "Has anyone counted these and entrusted them to me? If I were to go to the great eastern ocean, what harm would there be?"

"What harm would there be in going to the great southern ocean? What harm in going to the great western ocean? What harm in going to the great northern ocean? What harm in going to a river, a lake, or a pond?" The monks rebuked him, saying: "Monks, why do you, for such a trivial matter, reproach, humiliate, and speak ill of a monk who knowingly waters grass, dung, and earth with water containing living creatures, and has others water them?" This matter was then reported by the monks to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, in relation to this origin-story and in this connection, convened the assembly of monks, and so on, just as before. And the passage beginning "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, knowingly do remarkable things" proceeds likewise as before.

The Blessed One then questioned the venerable Udāyin: "Udāyin, is it true that you knowingly watered grass, dung, and earth with water containing living creatures, and had others water them?" "Venerable One, it is true." The Blessed One rebuked him: "That is not the conduct of a renunciant; it is not fitting, not proper, not in accordance with the rule. What has gone forth from the household life ought not to do such a thing." Having thus rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so on, just as before.

"My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk knowingly waters grass, or dung, or earth with water containing living creatures, or has others water them, incurs a transgression."

Now, as to the words of this rule: "Whatever monk" refers to Udāyin or anyone else of that kind. "Knowingly" means either that he himself has recognized it, or that others have told him. "Containing living creatures" — living creatures are of two kinds: those that are visible to the eye, and those that are caught by a water-strainer. "With water" means with water itself. "Grass" means grass itself. "Dung" means dung itself. "Earth" means earth itself. "Waters" means doing it oneself. "Has others water" means having another do it. "Incurs a transgression" means it burns him, scorches him, and causes him to fall into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies, into the states of misfortune. Moreover, as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities. That is why it is said to be a transgression.

Now, as to how a transgression arises in each case: If a monk, perceiving water that does contain living creatures as containing living creatures, waters grass, dung, or earth with it, or has others do so, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, being uncertain about water that does contain living creatures, waters grass, dung, or earth with it, or has others do so, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, perceiving water that does not contain living creatures as containing living creatures, waters grass, dung, or earth with it, or has others do so, he incurs a misdeed. If a monk, being uncertain about water that does not contain living creatures, waters grass, dung, or earth with it, or has others do so, he incurs a misdeed.

If a monk pours out a large bucketful of water containing living creatures, he incurs as many transgressions as the number of living creatures that are killed, and as many misdeeds as the number of living creatures that are not killed.

If a monk cuts through a large bucketful of water containing living creatures, he incurs as many transgressions as the number of living creatures that are killed, and as many misdeeds as the number of living creatures that are not killed. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, who is insane, who is mentally disturbed, or who is overcome by feeling. The nineteenth transgression regarding conduct involving living creatures is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Kauśāmbī in the Ghosita Park. The Group of Six were residing in temples that had been built by others, and while they were living there in those places, they began to mock Nanda and Upananda, saying: "This temple has fallen into disrepair. This one has cracks. This one has deteriorating joints. This one has a deteriorating surface. This one is like a widow's house." The monks then said to them: "Venerable ones, you are living in temples that were built by others, you cannot so much as set up a stone yourselves, and yet you taunt others." When those words were spoken, the Group of Six became filled with arrogance and began to say to one another: "These black-bowled ones, Nanda and Upananda, are pressing down hard on us by saying, 'You are living in temples built by others, you cannot so much as set up a stone yourselves, and yet you taunt others.' Come now — let us commission the building of a temple such as those temples that black-bowled ones have never commissioned before. If all of us apply ourselves to manual labor, the black-bowled ones will constantly be looking for an opportunity against us, and they will find the opportunity to say that all of the Group of Six have taken to manual labor. And then at the households where we beg, they will point out our faults to the lay supporters and set them against us. Therefore, among ourselves there is one who is learned, whose conduct is clear, and who is capable of threading a needle, drawing the awl through: we should go to him and rouse his enthusiasm. Let us go to the one among us who is learned, whose conduct is clear, and who is capable of drawing an awl through to thread a needle — the venerable one who is learned, whose conduct is clear, capable of drawing an awl through to thread a needle — and rouse his enthusiasm for going to that one." So they went to that one who was of like mind and said: "Venerable one, these black-bowled ones press down hard on us by saying, 'You are living in temples built by others, you cannot so much as set up a stone yourselves, and yet you taunt others.'" And pressing down on him exceedingly hard, those among us thought to themselves: "These black-bowled ones press hard on us by saying, 'You are living in temples built by others, you cannot so much as set up a stone yourselves, and yet you taunt others — come here! Let us commission a temple such as those temples that black-bowled ones have never commissioned before.' If all of us apply ourselves to manual labor, the black-bowled ones will be constantly looking for an opportunity against us, and they will find the opportunity to say that all of the Group of Six have taken to manual labor."

"Moreover, at those households where we go for alms, they will find fault with us for being a burden and turn people against us. Therefore, if we could manage to go to whichever one among us is learned, whose conduct is pure, who is able to thread a needle — and rouse his enthusiasm — that would be the right course of action. For this reason, whichever one among us is learned, whose conduct is pure, who is able to thread a needle: the Venerable Dundubhissara is learned, his conduct is pure, and he is able to thread a needle — so let us go to him and rouse his enthusiasm."

So they thought to themselves: "We should rouse the Venerable's enthusiasm for the sake of the temple, and we will entreat you — use this limb to overwhelm the black-bowled ones." Dundubhissara said: "That is a good plan; let it be done so." They went away in good spirits.

Now the Venerable Dundubhissara, having washed both feet outside the temple, entered the temple, sat down, and entered into the thought: "By whatever means it may be, let the Saṅgha's temple be accomplished." He began to reflect on who might be devoted to whom, and he thought to himself: "For the time being, the world with its gods is devoted to the Blessed One. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Ājñātakauṇḍinya. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Mahākāśyapa. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Śāriputra. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Aniruddha. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Aśvaśāvaka. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Bhadrīka. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Vāṣpa. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Mahānāman. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Pūrṇa. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Vimala. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Gavāmpati. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Ānanda. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Sundarananda, the son of the Blessed One's younger sister. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Rāhula, the son of the Blessed One. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Nandaka. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Nanda. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Upananda. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Śīghragāmin. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Cūḍapanthaka. One great householder is devoted to the Venerable Nābhasa — so it will not be possible to engage those. But in Kauśāmbī there dwells a brahmin who is wealthy, with abundant possessions and great resources, whose domain of dependents is broad and extensive — yet he is a miser, of narrow eye, one who would not give so much as a scrap to a crow, a man who hoards all his goods. But he possesses much silver and gold, and if he could be made to engage, the Saṅgha's temple would be accomplished."

Having entered into this thought, he passed the night with great effort. In the morning he put on his lower robe, took his bowl and outer robe, and entered Kauśāmbī for alms. After passing through two or three houses for alms and collecting a small amount of flour, he began to enter the brahmin's house — and the doorkeeper stopped him, saying: "Noble one, stay there! Do not enter!"

He said:

"Fair one, the Blessed One has taught five kinds of places that are not our proper domain: the dwelling of musicians, the dwelling of a woman of loose conduct, the dwelling of a liquor seller, the dwelling of an outcaste, and the royal palace. Now, is this house a dwelling of musicians? Or is it a dwelling of a woman of loose conduct? A liquor seller's dwelling? An outcaste's dwelling? Or the royal palace? Why then do you stop me?" The doorkeeper said: "Noble one, you may well have much to reproach, yet this is not a dwelling of musicians, nor a dwelling of a woman of loose conduct, nor a liquor seller's dwelling, nor an outcaste's dwelling, nor the royal palace. Rather, this is the house of a certain great brahmin."

The Venerable Udāyin thought: "Where there is not even the chance of a face-to-face meeting, what else can there be?" And so, blocked at the gate, he sat absorbed in thought. Just then it happened that the son of a householder arrived there, and with him entered a company of twelve gathered for celebration, with dance, song, and the music of cymbals. As the doorkeeper began to examine them one by one, and his attention was turned away from the gate, the Venerable Udāyin seized the opportunity to enter, and once inside, he set about purifying the ground of attachment through his conduct.

When that brahmin saw him, he said: "The Venerable Udāyin has come. Please be seated on this cushion." Udāyin sat down purposefully, but finding no opening for conversation, he spoke: "Brahmin, permit me to have this small amount of alms-flour I obtained kneaded and offered." The brahmin instructed his daughter: "Daughter, gather the noble one's alms-flour and offer it." As the daughter began to knead it, the Venerable Udāyin started to inspect the flour. The brahmin asked: "Noble one, what are you examining?" "A living creature." "If one is present, what should be done?" "It must not be eaten." "If it were to be consumed, what fault would there be?"

"Brahmin, the Blessed One has taught that one who habitually resorts to killing, practices it repeatedly, and does it many times will, after the dissolution of this body at death, be reborn in a miserable realm, an evil destiny, a place of downfall, in the hells. And even if one were to come to a state equal to that of human beings, one would be short-lived." And he went on to teach extensively the ten paths of non-virtuous and virtuous action, and so forth.

The brahmin thereupon became filled with sincere faith, and himself filled a vessel with clean, pure food and drink, and said: "Noble one, out of compassion please accept this."

The Venerable Udāyin thought: "If I accept it, it will be like boiling something in a wooden vessel — what began as first will become last for me." Knowing this, he said: "Brahmin, let this small amount of alms-flour I obtained be fully enjoyed as it is. How could I take what is offered in faith and discard it?"

The brahmin said: "Noble one, it is the custom among us brahmins that if we obtain something inferior and then come by something superior, we set aside the inferior and enjoy the superior fully. What fault could that be for you?"

"Brahmin, we have properly undertaken the rules of training, whereas you brahmins have not properly undertaken the rules of training, and so you brahmins may do as you please. As for us, the Blessed One has proclaimed for us the four noble lineages. What are the four? The noble lineage of being content with whatever robe one happens to have; the noble lineage of being content with whatever alms-food one happens to receive; the noble lineage of being content with whatever lodging and bedding one happens to have;

and the noble lineage of delighting in renunciation and delighting in meditation. That brahmin, becoming filled with deep faith, said: "Noble one, please visit this household of yours from time to time." "Brahmin, that gatekeeper of yours is like the staff of Yama, the Lord of Death — do not let anyone past him; keep good watch at the gate, and then he will be no obstacle to me." The brahmin called the gatekeeper over and gave him careful instructions: "Ho there, steward! This household is one where a noble one comes to visit — see that you do not bar him. And instruct the household staff as well: you are not to show disrespect to anyone the noble one wishes to visit." The venerable Dundubhissara thought to himself: "This brahmin has become faithful. Nevertheless, if some black-bowled one were to enter here, that person would cause endless trouble — I must find a skillful approach." So he said to the gatekeeper: "Ho there, steward! Did you see how that brahmin became so full of faith toward me?" "Yes, noble one, I saw it." "Then let only me enter here, and do not allow any other black-bowled one inside. If you let some black-bowled one enter, I will have you brought before a great court."

"Noble one, please proceed with full ease of mind. While you yourself are away and have not yet arrived, how much more would that mean that a black-bowled one of another sort might enter — that goes without saying." The venerable Dundubhissara arose with a glad heart and departed, and from then on he would go to that brahmin's house from time to time. And when the brahmin repeatedly made the same invitation over and over, the venerable Dundubhissara would not accept it but simply gave him teaching on the Dharma of generosity and took his leave.

Then on another occasion the venerable Dundubhissara praised to that brahmin the seven bases of merit-making arising from material things, and explained them fully at length. The brahmin said: "Noble one, I too would like to perform some basis of merit-making arising from material things." "Then do so, brahmin." "Noble one, what should I do?" "Have a temple built for the Saṅgha." The brahmin thought: "I have paid court to the noble Dundubhissara in many ways, and each time he did not accept — yet now he has accepted, and this too must be for the sake of the Saṅgha." Struck with wonder, he said: "Venerable sir, I have the kārṣāpaṇa coins, but I have no helper in the work of merit. You have acted as my helper in merit — in this way please have the noble Saṅgha supervise me with the work of building by entrusting it to their hands." The householder went to the temple, sat down at the far edge among the elders, and said: "Noble ones, I wish to build a temple for the noble Dundubhissara. For that purpose, out of affectionate care for me, I entreat the noble Saṅgha to appoint the noble Dundubhissara to supervise the building of my temple, entrusting it to his hands."

Now within the Saṅgha there was the venerable Śāriputra, who acted as the Saṅgha's presiding elder. He thought: "Even without being appointed by the Group of Six, he already tends to exalt himself over the monks — if he were appointed as supervisor, he would exalt himself over the monks all the more." And so the venerable Śāriputra said to Dundubhissara: "Venerable Dundubhissara, when I had the enclosure wall of the Jeta Grove built, no one appointed me as supervisor by entrusting it to their hands. And when the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana had the enclosure wall of the Ghositārāma built, no one appointed him as supervisor by entrusting it to their hands either."

The venerable Dundubhissara thought: "Those of the black-bowled ones do not even like to see us — how could they entrust anything into our hands?" So he went to that brahmin and, having obtained kārṣāpaṇa coins, went to the brickmakers and said: "Good sirs, can you in a single day provide the bricks for a three-storied temple?" They replied: "Noble one, give us the kārṣāpaṇas and we shall return and supply them." He gave them the kārṣāpaṇas. He went to the tilers and said: "Good sirs, can you in a single day complete the roofing of a three-storied temple?" "Noble one, give us the kārṣāpaṇas and we shall return and do the work well." He gave them the kārṣāpaṇas. He went to the carpenters and said: "Good sirs, can you in a single day set the timbers for a three-storied temple?" "Noble one, give us the kārṣāpaṇas and we shall return and fix them in place." He gave them the kārṣāpaṇas. He went to the plasterers and said: "Good sirs, can you in a single day plaster a three-storied temple?" "Noble one, give us the kārṣāpaṇas and we shall return and plaster it." He gave them the kārṣāpaṇas. He went to the painters and said: "Good sirs, can you in a single day paint a three-storied temple?" "Noble one, give us the kārṣāpaṇas and we shall return and paint it." He gave them the kārṣāpaṇas. Then Dundubhissara went to the labourers' quarter, hired many labourers, and came to the temple site, and in a single day had the three-storied temple completed. Yet in building it he left no space for doorways, no space for pillars, no windows, and no space for drains — he had it built all solid throughout, in the very same uniform way.

He then went to the brahmin and said: "Brahmin, your temple is finished. Come, offer it to the Saṅgha." The brahmin replied: "Noble one, today I have not made preparation of food; tomorrow I shall make preparation of food and come." The Blessed One reflected: "This temple will collapse today itself. If it were to collapse without ever having been properly used, this brahmin, who has vomited hot blood, would come to such a pass as to die." Having reflected thus, the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks in these words: 'Although I have instructed you, monks, not to accumulate virtue and to confess wrongdoing, nevertheless, whichever among you dwells in a state of meditative attainment and has entered into and obtained a particular absorption — let that one, by means of that meditative state and that absorption, spend the first watch of the night in that brahmin's temple.'" The venerable Ānanda, having heard the Blessed

One, replied: "As you command, venerable sir," and he said to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has spoken thus: 'Although I have instructed you, monks, not to accumulate virtue and to confess wrongdoing, nevertheless, whichever among you dwells in a state of meditative attainment and has entered into and obtained a particular absorption — let that one, by means of that meditative state and that absorption, spend the first watch of the night in that brahmin's temple.'"

Those monks, saying to the venerable Ānanda, "As you command," listened to the venerable Ānanda and, whichever among them dwelt in a state of meditative attainment and had entered into and obtained a particular absorption, by means of that meditative state and that absorption spent the first watch of the night in that brahmin's temple.

Then, at the middle watch of the night, the Blessed One went there, and the Blessed One aroused a worldly intention. It is the nature of reality of the blessed buddhas that if they arouse a worldly intention, then even insects and worms come to know the Blessed One's mind and thoughts; whereas if they arouse a supramundane intention, then even pratyekabuddhas cannot know the Blessed One's mind and thoughts — to say nothing of śrāvakas and others.

Then Brahmā and Śakra (Indra) and the other gods thought to themselves: "Why has the Blessed One aroused a worldly intention?" And they perceived that the Blessed One intended to teach the Dharma to the gods at the middle watch of the night in that brahmin's temple.

Then Śakra and Brahmā and the rest of the gods, having understood the Blessed One's mind and thoughts, vanished from the divine world — just as a person stretches out a bent arm or bends back an outstretched arm — and appeared before the Blessed One. They prostrated with their heads at the Blessed One's two feet and stood to one side. The Blessed One then taught them the Dharma. They rejoiced and expressed their delight in what the Blessed One had declared, prostrated with their heads at his two feet, and vanished on the spot.

The Blessed One also passed the middle watch of the night there and then departed.

At the last watch of the night, a five-colored cloud gathered and discharged rain upon that temple — exactly as much rain as would fill it to the brim, as if it were a vessel filled with rinsing water — and by that water the entire temple was flooded to such a depth that it collapsed. The Group of Six heard that the temple had thus collapsed entirely. Hearing this, they fled in terror.

The brahmin, the following day, loaded a carriage with pure and fresh food and provisions, came to the temple, and asked the monks: "Noble ones, where is my temple?" Now there was an elder among the Group of Six who bore a grudge against them, and he said: "Brahmin, your temple is as flat as if a she-fox had been rolling in it. Take care not to dash your forehead against the doorpost as you enter."

The brahmin thought: "I dedicated such an enormous mass of wealth to this temple, and yet it has collapsed without ever having been used at all." He fainted and fell to the ground.

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go to that brahmin and say this to him: 'Many gods and humans, having dedicated temples to the Tathāgata, have caused them to be put to use — those the Tathāgata has not left unused. As for your temple here, the elder monks fully made use of it in the first watch of the night, and the Blessed One himself together with Śakra, Brahmā, and the other gods also fully made use of it at the middle watch of the night. Therefore, you have obtained a fine acquisition indeed.'"

The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Blessed One," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he went to where that brahmin was, and said to him the following: "Brahmin, the Blessed One has declared: 'Many gods and humans, having dedicated temples to the Tathāgata, have caused them to be put to use — those the Tathāgata has not left unused. As for your temple here, the elder monks fully made use of it in the first watch of the night, and the Blessed One himself together with Śakra, Brahmā, and the other gods also fully made use of it at the middle watch of the night. Therefore you have obtained a fine acquisition indeed.'"

The brahmin asked, "Venerable Ānanda, did the Blessed One make full use of my temple?"

"Brahmin, he did make full use of it."

"Venerable Ānanda, if the Blessed One has made full use of my temple, then I would gladly cause to be built for the Blessed One one such temple for each and every parasol — just like this one. But where are those good spiritual friends of mine?"

He had heard that the Group of Six monks had questioned the brahmin in that manner, and so he quickly and hastily arrived. That brahmin then presented each of them with a large bolt of fine cloth and furnished them with all manner of requisites as well. The monks then said to them, "It was the Group of Six who had a temple like this one built." The Group of Six responded, "Even though we did indeed cause all that wealth of that brahmin to be wasted in just that way, nevertheless he has now presented each of us with a large bolt of fine cloth and furnished us with all manner of requisites. In this way we have won that brahmin's admiration."

The monks of few wants asked why monks who boasted by means of the very limb that should be a cause for shame, criticizing and disparaging and backbiting — why they acted thus. And at that occasion the monks reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this basis, and this occasion, convened the community of monks, and so forth, just as before. And it is likewise just as before regarding the passage beginning "The blessed buddhas know yet feign not to know," and so forth. The Blessed Awakened One then questioned the Group of Six: "Monks, is it true that you have done something so unseemly?"

"Blessed One, it is true."

The Blessed Awakened One declared, "It is unseemly," and proceeded to censure them. Then, having censured them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, for that reason, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established," and so forth, just as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Should a monk undertake to have a large temple built — measuring it from when the site is examined with an eye to the gateway recess, the foundations, and the extent of the area for windows and light — the successive courses of bricks, including the plaster, are to be laid two or three. If more than that are laid, it is an offense. 'A monk' refers to one of the Group of Six or any other who is similarly disposed. 'A temple' is any place suitable for the four modes of deportment: walking, standing, sitting, and lying down. 'Large' is large in two senses: in terms of what it is to be given and in terms of measure — and in this context both are intended. 'Undertake to have it built' means either by oneself or through another."

"The door socket and the lintel" means that a door socket and a lintel are to be installed. "With the perception of how much space for light" means with the perception of how much space is to be left at the beginning for windows and for drainage openings. "From the inspection of the ground, the successive courses of bricks together with the plaster, two or three" — "successive courses of bricks" means layers of bricks stacked one upon another; "together with the plaster" means together with the clay plaster; "are to be laid" means are to be placed; "if more than that are laid" means if more than that are placed.

"It is an offense" means: it causes one to be burned, scorched, and to fall into the bad destinations of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts (pretas), the lower realms, and the states of ruin. Moreover, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually confessed, it obstructs wholesome Dharma qualities — and that is why it is said to be an offense. As for how the offense arises: if a monk lays even so much as a single course of bricks beyond two or three, it becomes an offense in every case. If the construction is of stone alone, or of brick alone, or entirely of wood, or if the donor says "Build it and then we shall see" or "We shall look into it once it is complete," there is no offense in that.

The monks then petitioned the Blessed One, the Buddha: "The venerable Śāriputra observed the venerable Udāyin trying to appoint himself as the presiding officer of the assembly." The Blessed One said: "Monks, not only now — in the past as well, this one forestalled that one from being consecrated as king of the birds. Listen carefully to this.

"Monks, once upon a time, long ago, in the Himalayan foothills there was a great assembly of birds gathered together. As the proper time had come to appoint a king of the birds, the birds began to harm one another. They said: 'Friends, let us consecrate as king of the birds one among us who is able to govern us with judgment and to benefit us. Whom shall we consecrate as king of the birds?' Not far away there sat an old owl, and the birds said: 'Let us consecrate this old owl as king of the birds.' Not far from there sat an old myna bird. The birds said: 'First let us also ask the old myna bird about this,' and they went to the myna and asked.

The old myna bird spoke in verse:

That you birds would consecrate the owl as king —
this does not please me.

Look at his face when he is not angry;
what will he do when he is angry?

The birds did not consecrate the owl, and they consecrated that very old myna bird as king of the birds. Monks, the one who at that time, in that age, was the old myna bird is this very Śāriputra. The one who at that time, in that age, was the old owl is this very Udāyin. And just as at that time Śāriputra forestalled Udāyin from being consecrated as king of the birds, so now too Śāriputra has forestalled Udāyin from being appointed as presiding officer.

There is no offense for one who is a first offender, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by feeling."

The twentieth offense pertaining to a temple is complete.

Summary verse: Not appointed, the sun setting, food and Dharma-robles, those of shared purpose, the boat, and the two solitary places — these are what the nun enabled. Intermediate summary verse: the discourse teaching joy, the six groups, the road sūtra, the corpse sūtra, the three treasures, the noble trader, the perception of no self, the life-giver, the horse, and the aspiration prayer.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At that time, the noble nun, the great hearer, the elder among elders, along with others of her kind, accepted the rains retreat at Śrāvastī, in the nuns' retreat hall in the royal pleasure grove — namely Kulamātā, Nandā, Madavā, Paṭhacārā, Droḡanāsa, Sukhā, Candā, Gautamī Śyāmā, Utpalavaṇṇā, the nun Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the great mistress of beings, and still others besides — all these noble nuns, great hearers, elders among elders, accepted the rains retreat at Śrāvastī, in the nuns' retreat hall in the royal pleasure grove.

Then the great mistress of beings, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, together with her retinue of five hundred nuns, went to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, she bowed her head to the two feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One instructed the great mistress of beings, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, fully and properly with Dharma-endowed words; he led her to fully receive it; he fully praised her; he made her fully rejoice. In many ways, with Dharma-endowed words, he fully instructed, fully led her to receive it, fully praised her, made her fully rejoice, and then urged her saying, "Gautamī, it is your time — you may go."

Then the great mistress of beings, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, delighted and gladdened by what the Blessed One had declared, bowed her head to the two feet of the Blessed One and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

After the great mistress of beings, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī had gone, the Blessed One reflected on it before long, and then declared to the monks: "Monks, I am now old, aged, advanced in years, and it would be wearisome for me to teach the fourfold assembly — monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen. Therefore, monks, from this day forward, let the elder monks, in turn, teach the nuns."

Thereupon the elder monks taught the nuns in turn. But the venerable Ānanda, when his turn came around, was unable to teach the nuns.

Then the great mistress of beings, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, together with her retinue of five hundred nuns, went once more to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, she bowed her head to the two feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One again instructed the great mistress of beings, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, fully and properly with Dharma-endowed words; he led her to fully receive it; he fully praised her; he made her fully rejoice. In many ways, with Dharma-endowed words, he fully instructed, fully led her to receive it, fully praised her, made her fully rejoice, and then urged her saying, "Gautamī, it is your time — you may go."

Then the great mistress of beings, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, delighted and gladdened by what the Blessed One had declared, bowed her head to the two feet of the Blessed One and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

After the great mistress of beings, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī had gone, the Blessed One reflected on it before long, and then declared to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, those elder monks who teach the nuns in turn —

"Venerable one, most of the elder monks do teach the nuns in turn, but the venerable Ānanda, even when it is his turn, is unwilling to teach the nuns." Now at that time the venerable Ānanda was sitting right there in that assembly and heard this.

Then the Blessed One declared to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, you should instruct the nuns. Ānanda, you should teach the nuns. Ānanda, you should speak to the nuns words endowed with Dharma. Why is that? Because, Ānanda, whether it is I or you who instructs them is fitting; whether it is I or you who teaches them is fitting; and whether it is I or you who speaks words endowed with Dharma to the nuns is fitting."

The venerable Ānanda, saying nothing, accepted the instruction from the Blessed One in silence. Then the venerable Ānanda, delighted and gladdened by what the Blessed One had declared, bowed his head to the two feet of the Blessed One and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Then, when that same night had passed, the venerable Ānanda, in the early morning, put on his lower robe, took up his bowl and outer robe, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Having gathered alms throughout Śrāvastī and completed the business of the meal, he returned from his alms round for the afternoon meal, put down his bowl and outer robe, washed his two feet, and entered the assembly hall in order to settle into inner stillness.

Then, when the venerable Ānanda had risen from his inner stillness in the cool of the morning, he took up his sitting cloth and, accompanied by a wandering monk walking behind him, went to where the nuns' rains-retreat quarters were in the royal pleasure grove.

The nuns saw the venerable Ānanda from a great distance. Seeing him, they prepared seats for the venerable Ānanda and said these words: "Venerable Ānanda, come! Venerable Ānanda, welcome! Venerable Ānanda, please be seated on the seat that has been prepared." The venerable Ānanda sat down on the prepared seat.

Then those nuns bowed their heads to the two feet of the venerable Ānanda and took their places to one side. When they had taken their places to one side, the venerable Ānanda spoke to those nuns as follows:

"Sisters, ask your questions, and let there be talk endowed with Dharma. Among you, those who understand everything, let them say, 'We understand everything.' Those who do not understand everything, let them say, 'We do not understand everything.' Whoever speaks and fully understands the meaning of what is said, let that one take it exactly as it is. Whoever speaks and does not fully understand the meaning of what is said, let that one ask of oneself: 'What is the meaning of what the venerable Ānanda has said? What is it like?'

"Venerable Ānanda — for whatever reason the venerable Ānanda has said, 'Sisters, ask your questions, and let there be talk endowed with Dharma; among you, those who understand everything, let them say, We understand everything; those who do not understand everything, let them say, We do not understand everything; whoever speaks and fully understands the meaning of what is said, let that one take it exactly as it is — whoever speaks and does not fully understand the meaning of what is said, let that one ask of oneself: 'What is the meaning of what the venerable Ānanda has said? What is it like?' — that very declaration has gladdened us and filled us with joy. We shall say: 'Venerable Ānanda, speak the Dharma, and among us those who understand everything shall say, We understand everything; those who do not understand everything shall say, We do not understand everything; whoever speaks and fully understands the meaning of what is said shall take it exactly as it is; whoever speaks and does not fully understand the meaning of what is said shall ask the venerable Ānanda himself: Venerable Ānanda, what is the meaning of what the venerable Ānanda has said? What is it like?'"

"Sisters, do you rightly see the inner sense base of the eye as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Sisters, do you rightly see the inner sense bases of the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body, and the mind as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, from the very beginning we have seen with right wisdom, truly as it is, that these six inner sense bases are without self, and our minds too are devoted to them in just that way — as being without self."

"Sisters, excellent! Excellent! Indeed, the meaning of what was said is this: these six inner sense bases are to be seen truly as they are — as being without self."

"Sisters, do you rightly see the outer sense base of visible forms as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Sisters, do you rightly see the outer sense bases of sounds, smells, tastes, tangible objects, and mental phenomena as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, from the very beginning we have seen with right wisdom, truly as it is, that these six outer sense bases are without self, and our minds too are devoted to them in just that way — as being without self."

"Sisters, excellent! Excellent! Indeed, the meaning of what was said is this: these six outer sense bases are to be seen truly as they are — as being without self.

"Sisters, with respect to eye-consciousness — the eye-consciousness that arises in dependence upon the eye and visible forms — do you rightly see that eye-consciousness as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Sisters, with respect to mind-consciousness — the mind-consciousness that arises in dependence upon the mind and mental phenomena — do you rightly see that mind-consciousness as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, from the very beginning we have seen with right wisdom, truly as it is, that these six groups of consciousness are without self, and our minds too are devoted to them in just that way — as being without self."

"Excellent, sisters! Excellent!" he said. "That being so, these six groups of consciousness are to be seen truly as they are — as being without self.

Sisters, with respect to eye-consciousness — the eye-consciousness that arises in dependence upon the eye and forms, and from the coming together of these three there arises eye-contact — do you rightly see that eye-contact as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my very self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Sisters, with respect to ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind — the mind-consciousness that arises in dependence upon the mind and mental phenomena, and from the coming together of these three there arises mind-contact — do you rightly see that mind-contact as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my very self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, from the very beginning we have seen with right wisdom, truly as it is, that these six groups of contact are without self, and our minds too are devoted to them in just that way — as being without self."

"Excellent, sisters! Excellent!" he said. "That being so, these six groups of contact are to be seen truly as they are — as being without self."

Sisters, with respect to eye-consciousness — the eye-consciousness that arises in dependence upon the eye and forms, and from the coming together of these three there arises contact, and from contact as condition there arises feeling: the feeling that arises from eye-contact — do you rightly see that feeling as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my very self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Sisters, with respect to ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind — the mind-consciousness that arises in dependence upon the mind and mental phenomena, and from the coming together of these three there arises contact, and from contact as condition there arises feeling: the feeling that arises from mind-contact — do you rightly see that feeling as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my very self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, from the very beginning we have seen with right wisdom, truly as it is, that these six groups of feeling are without self, and our minds too are devoted to them in just that way — as being without self."

"Excellent, sisters! Excellent!" he said. "That being so, these six groups of contact are to be seen truly as they are — as being without self."

Sisters, with respect to eye-consciousness — the eye-consciousness that arises in dependence upon the eye and forms, and from the coming together of these three there arises contact, from contact as condition there arises feeling, and from feeling as condition there arises craving: the craving that arises from eye-contact — do you rightly see that craving as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my very self'?"

"Sisters, with respect to ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind — the mind-consciousness that arises in dependence upon the mind and mental phenomena, and from the coming together of these three there arises contact, from contact as condition there arises feeling, and from feeling as condition there arises craving: the craving that arises from mind-contact — do you rightly see that craving as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my very self'?"

"Venerable Ānanda, we do not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, from the very beginning we have seen, just as it is, with genuine wisdom, that these six groups of craving are without self, and our minds are devoted to that understanding — that these six groups of craving are indeed without self."

"Excellent, sisters, excellent! He said: The meaning of this is that one should look at these six groups of craving exactly as they are — as being without self."

"Sisters, consider this example: an oil lamp burns in dependence upon the oil and the wick. The oil of that oil lamp is impermanent. The wick, the flame, and the vessel are also impermanent. Now, sisters, if someone were to say: 'Even though the oil is absent, and the wick, the flame, and the vessel are absent, the light that depended on them would nonetheless remain — permanent, stable, everlasting, of a nature that does not change, abiding as suchness' — would such a statement be well spoken?"

"Venerable Ānanda, it would not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, the oil of that oil lamp is impermanent, and the wick, the flame, and the vessel are also impermanent. When the oil is absent, and the wick, the flame, and the vessel are absent, the light that depended on them will not arise at all. That is why."

"Sisters, in the same way, if someone were to say of these six impermanent internal sense bases: 'Whatever pleasure and mental happiness arises in dependence on these six impermanent internal sense bases — that is permanent, stable, everlasting, of a nature that does not change, abiding as suchness' — would that statement be well spoken?"

"Venerable Ānanda, it would not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, from the very beginning we have seen, just as it is, with genuine wisdom, that these six internal sense bases are impermanent, and our minds are devoted to understanding that when those phenomena arise, such phenomena come to arise, and when those phenomena cease, such phenomena come to cease, subside, cool, and pass away."

"Excellent, sisters, excellent! He said: The meaning of this is that one should look at these six internal sense bases as being impermanent — as things such that when those phenomena arise, such phenomena come to arise, and when those phenomena cease, such phenomena come to cease, subside, cool, and pass away — seeing them exactly as they are.

"Sisters, consider this example: a great tree possessed of roots, a trunk, heartwood, branches, leaves, flowers, and fruit — its roots are impermanent, its trunk, heartwood, branches, leaves, flowers, and fruit are also impermanent. Now, sisters, if someone were to say: 'Even though the tree's roots, trunk, heartwood, branches, leaves, flowers, and fruit are all absent, the shadow that depended on them would nonetheless remain — permanent, stable, everlasting, of a nature that does not change, abiding as suchness' — would that statement be well spoken?"

"Venerable Ānanda, it would not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, it is like this: a great tree possessed of roots, a trunk, heartwood, branches, leaves, flowers, and fruit — its roots are impermanent, and its trunk, heartwood, branches, leaves, flowers, and fruit are also impermanent. If those roots are absent, and the trunk, heartwood, branches, leaves, flowers, and fruit are absent, then the shadow that depended on them would not arise at all, in any way whatsoever. Sisters, in just the same way, these six outer sense sources are impermanent. If someone were to say: 'These six outer sense sources are impermanent, yet the pleasure and mental ease that arose in dependence on them would remain — permanent, stable, everlasting, of a nature that does not change, abiding as suchness' — would that statement be well spoken?"

"Venerable Ānanda, it would not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, because from the very beginning we have seen, through authentic wisdom and in accordance with the correct view, that these six outer sense sources are impermanent — and our minds, too, are so inclined: that when such and such phenomena arise, such and such phenomena come to arise; and when such and such phenomena cease, such and such phenomena come to cease, to be pacified, to be cooled, and to subside."

"Excellent, sisters! Excellent! What was said means this: one should see with clear insight that these six outer sense sources are impermanent, and that when such and such phenomena arise, such and such phenomena come to arise; and when such and such phenomena cease, such and such phenomena come to cease, to be pacified, to be cooled, and to subside. That is how one should look at things exactly as they are.

Sisters, wise people here come to understand the full meaning conveyed by a simile — so listen now to a simile. Sisters, it is like this: a skilled butcher, or a butcher's skilled apprentice, slaughters a cow with a sharp butcher's knife. Without damaging the inner mass of flesh and without damaging the outer mass of hide, he slices through, cuts apart, and pierces all the inner channels — the interior blood vessels, the interior lungs, the interior liver, and all the interior veins — slicing through them all, cutting them apart, striking through them, and piercing them, before once again wrapping the whole in the cow's own hide. Now, sisters, if someone were to say of that cow: 'This cow is still joined to its hide; it is not separated from it' — would that statement be well spoken?"

"Venerable Ānanda, it would not."

"Why is that?"

"Venerable Ānanda, it is like this: the skilled butcher, or the butcher's skilled apprentice, slaughtered the cow with a sharp butcher's knife. Without damaging the inner mass of flesh and without damaging the outer mass of hide, he sliced through, cut apart, and pierced all the interior blood vessels, the interior lungs, the interior liver, and all the interior veins — slicing through them all, cutting them apart, striking through them, and piercing them — and then wrapped the whole in the cow's hide. That cow, Venerable Ānanda, is not joined to its hide; it is separated from it."

"Sisters, this simile has been given in order to convey a meaning clearly, so let it be understood in this way:

"Sisters, here is the meaning that is to be understood: 'The cow' is a designation for this gross physical body, composed of the four great elements, born from the impure seed of one's parents, built up by cooked grain and warm food, subject to constant anointing, washing, massaging, rubbing, dispersal, and disintegration. 'The inner mass of flesh' is a designation for the six inner sense bases. 'The outer mass of hide' is a designation for the six outer sense bases. 'The interior blood vessels, the interior lungs, the interior liver, and the interior veins' are a designation for attachment bound up with delight. 'The skilled butcher or the butcher's apprentice' is a designation for a noble śrāvaka who is endowed with learning. 'The knife' is a designation for the weapon of wisdom. Sisters, a noble śrāvaka endowed with learning, with the weapon of wisdom, slices through, cuts apart, strikes through, and pierces all the engagements, bonds, latent tendencies, secondary afflictions, and enwrappings without exception.

"Sisters, therefore you should train yourselves in this way: that toward those phenomena which are prone to arouse attachment, your minds shall not become attached — in order to abandon attachment; that toward those phenomena which are prone to arouse aversion, your minds shall not become aversive — in order to abandon aversion; that toward those phenomena which are prone to arouse delusion, your minds shall not become deluded — in order to abandon delusion.

"Sisters, therefore you should train yourselves in this way: you shall dwell in continuous contemplation of the arising and passing away of the five appropriated aggregates. You shall dwell in continuous contemplation of the arising and ceasing of the six sense bases of contact. You shall dwell with minds firmly established in the four foundations of mindfulness. And when you dwell with minds well established in the four foundations of mindfulness, you shall cultivate, develop, and repeatedly practise the seven limbs of awakening. Thus shall you train.

"Sisters, by the cause of cultivating the seven limbs of awakening, by the cause of developing them, by the cause of practising them repeatedly, and by the cause of taking them thoroughly to heart, your minds shall become free from attachment and fully liberated from the defilement of desire, free from attachment and fully liberated from the defilement of becoming and from the defilement of ignorance. Sisters, when you are fully liberated, there shall arise in you the knowledge and vision of liberation: 'Our birth is exhausted, the holy life has been lived, the task is done; we know that there is nothing further beyond this existence.' Sisters, thus shall you train."

Then the Venerable Ānanda, having thoroughly instructed those nuns with Dharma-connected discourse, having made them take it to heart, having praised them, and having filled them with joy, rose from his seat and departed.

Then the great Progenitrix Gautamī, together with her retinue of five hundred nuns, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, prostrated at the Blessed One's feet with her head, and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One thoroughly taught the great Progenitrix Gautamī with Dharma-connected discourse, made her take it to heart, praised her, and filled her with joy.

Then, having thoroughly instructed her with Dharma-connected discourse in many ways, made her take it to heart, praised her, and filled her with joy, he urged her: "Gautamī, it is your time — go now."

Then the great Progenitrix Gautamī, delighting and rejoicing in what the Blessed One had declared, prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with her head, and departed from the presence of the Blessed One.

Not long after the great Progenitrix Gautamī had gone, the Blessed One, having reflected on the matter, spoke to the monks: "Monks, if the noble son Ānanda were to counsel and thoroughly instruct those five hundred nuns well, and they were to pass away in this very life without having attained liberation and finality, I see not a single conditioning factor among the conditioning factors by which, possessed of those factors, they would come again to this world. Monks, consider this illustration: when the waxing moon falls on the fourteenth day, people dispute over the moon, saying 'is it full, or is it not yet full?' And because it is not yet full, it has not reached finality. In just the same way, if Ānanda were to counsel and thoroughly instruct those five hundred nuns well, and they were to pass away in this very life without having attained liberation and finality, I see not a single conditioning factor among the conditioning factors by which, possessed of those factors, they would come again to this world."

Thus the Blessed One prophesied that those five hundred nuns would be non-returns.

Then the Blessed One spoke a second time to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, you should guide the nuns. Ānanda, you should give instruction to the nuns. Ānanda, you should speak words connected with Dharma to the nuns. And why? Because whether I or you counsel the nuns, whether I or you instruct the nuns, whether I or you speak Dharma-connected words to the nuns, it is equally fitting."

The venerable Ānanda said nothing, and in silence accepted it from the Blessed One.

Then the venerable Ānanda, delighting and rejoicing in what the Blessed One had declared, prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with his head, and departed from the presence of the Blessed One.

Then, when that very night had passed, the venerable Ānanda dressed in the early morning, took up his bowl and robes, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Having made his alms round in Śrāvastī and completed the meal, he returned from the alms round for the later meal, put away his bowl and robes, washed his two feet, and entered the assembly hall in order to settle properly into meditation. Then the venerable Ānanda rose from that period of inward settling in the assembly hall, took up his outer robe, and went to the place in the royal garden where the monks and nuns had their rains retreat dwelling.

Those nuns, from quite far away, saw the venerable Ānanda coming. Seeing him, they made ready seats for the venerable Ānanda, and said these words: "Venerable Ānanda, please come here. Venerable Ānanda, welcome."

"Venerable Ānanda, please be seated on the prepared seat." The venerable Ānanda sat down on the prepared seat. Then those nuns bowed their heads at the venerable Ānanda's feet and took their places to one side. Having taken their places to one side, the venerable Ānanda thoroughly instructed those nuns with Dharma-endowed discourse, thoroughly guided them in taking it up, thoroughly encouraged them, and thoroughly gladdened them. With many categories of Dharma-endowed discourse he thoroughly instructed them, thoroughly guided them in taking it up, thoroughly encouraged them, and thoroughly gladdened them; then he rose from his seat and departed.

Then the great Progenitress Gautamī, together with her retinue of five hundred nuns, went to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, they bowed their heads at the Blessed One's two feet and took their places to one side. Having taken their places to one side, the Blessed One thoroughly instructed the great Progenitress Gautamī with Dharma-endowed discourse, thoroughly guided her in taking it up, thoroughly encouraged her, and thoroughly gladdened her. With many categories of Dharma-endowed discourse he thoroughly instructed her, thoroughly guided her in taking it up, thoroughly encouraged her, and thoroughly gladdened her; then he urged her, saying: "Gautamī, it is now your time — you may go."

Then the great Progenitress Gautamī, rejoicing and delighting in the Blessed One's words, bowed her head at the Blessed One's two feet and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Then, not long after the great Progenitress Gautamī had gone, the Blessed One, having reflected on the matter, declared to the monks: "Monks, the noble son Ānanda gave excellent instruction and excellent guidance to those five hundred nuns, and they attained liberation and reached the final consummation. If he were to pass away at this time, they would have no one to point out the path — and look upon this: it is the culmination of suffering.

"Monks, it is just as when, on the full-moon night that is precisely the fifteenth day of the waxing moon, people do not make two things of the moon by saying 'Is it the new moon?' or 'Is it not the new moon?' — for this reason, being the full moon, it has reached its consummation. In exactly the same way, the noble son Ānanda gave excellent instruction and excellent guidance to those five hundred nuns, and they attained liberation and reached the final consummation. If he were to pass away at this time, they would have no one to point out the path — this itself is the culmination of suffering."

In this way, the Blessed One then gave the highest prophecy to those five hundred nuns.

Now this took place at a time when the Blessed One, the Buddha, had not yet established training rules for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya. The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

The Blessed One had declared: "Monks shall teach nuns in rotation, elder by elder." When it came to the turn of the group of six monks to teach the nuns, they taught them a little, and then behaved with them in an overly familiar manner — playing about, making noise, leaning on them, acting distracted, and moving their bodies. Those among them who were possessive behaved with the nuns in this overly familiar way — playing about, making noise, leaning on them, acting distracted, and moving their bodies. Those who were not possessive withdrew to their own walking-meditation paths and settled at their meditation places and gatehouse cells, saying: "These people are displaying to us every sort of misconduct of this kind." They scorned them, denounced them, and spread word against them. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "The group of six shall not be appointed as teachers of nuns."

Having thus declared that the group of six shall not be appointed as teachers of nuns, those monks appointed one another and proceeded to teach the nuns — and the very same fault arose again. The Blessed One then declared: "One shall not teach nuns without having been appointed."

Those monks then went outside the boundary and appointed one another, and proceeded to teach the nuns — and the very same fault arose again. The Blessed One declared: "One appointed outside the boundary shall not teach nuns."

Those monks then, within the boundary, obtained the consent of the sick monks and sent the remaining monks off on errands, and then appointed one another and proceeded to teach the nuns — and when that very same fault arose again, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "One shall not, within the boundary, obtain the consent of the sick monks, send the remaining monks off on errands, and then appoint one another to teach nuns. Instead, the appointment of a teacher for the nuns is to be made thus: on the very day of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, when the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in harmony, a teacher for the nuns shall be appointed.

The appointment is to be made in this manner. First, willingness is to be ascertained: 'You, called so-and-so — are you willing to be teacher of the nuns? If you are willing, say: I am willing.' After that, one monk shall make a formal motion and perform the act. The venerable Saṅgha, please hear. This monk called so-and-so is willing to be teacher of the nuns. If it is the right time for the Saṅgha and if it consents, let the Saṅgha grant approval, and let the Saṅgha appoint the monk called so-and-so as teacher of the nuns, so that the monk called so-and-so may teach the nuns. This is the motion.

The act is to be performed thus. The venerable Saṅgha, please hear. The monk called so-and-so is willing to be teacher of the nuns, and for that purpose the Saṅgha appoints the monk called so-and-so as teacher of the nuns, so that the monk called so-and-so may teach the nuns. Those venerable ones who consent to the appointment of the monk called so-and-so as teacher of the nuns — let them remain silent. Those who do not consent — let them speak. The Saṅgha has consented and approved, and the Saṅgha has appointed the monk called so-and-so as teacher of the nuns. Since no one has spoken, so it is held to be."

Having declared that teachers of nuns are to be appointed in this way, the Blessed One then declared: those monks — whether experienced or inexperienced, whether obscure or unskilled — were appointed without distinction. And now, for the time being, that one who has not disciplined himself should discipline others — that is impossible. That one who has not calmed himself should calm others — that is impossible. That one who has not crossed out of the mire himself should free others from the mire — that is impossible. And that one who has not himself fully passed into nirvāṇa should lead others to fully pass into nirvāṇa — that too is impossible. Therefore the Blessed One declared:

A nun who possesses five qualities should be appointed as an instructor. What are the five? She possesses moral discipline; she is learned; she is like a senior elder (sthavira) and a regent; she is proficient in the language of the city; and she has not shamed any nun through bodily contact — or, if she did once cause shame, she has properly remedied that transgression in accordance with the Dharma.

How does she possess moral discipline? She has not committed any of the four defeats. That is how she possesses moral discipline.

How is she learned? She has fully recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra at length and has mastered it. That is how she is learned.

How is she like a senior elder and a regent? She has been fully ordained for twenty years or more. That is how she is like a senior elder and a regent.

How is she proficient in the language of the city? The palace and its environs are called the city, and she is proficient in the language of that place. That is how she is proficient in the language of the city.

How has she not shamed a nun through bodily contact? She has not drawn close to a nun's body with her own body. That is how she has not shamed a nun through bodily contact.

One who possesses these five qualities should be appointed as an instructor of nuns.

After the Blessed One declared that one who possesses these five qualities should be appointed as instructor of nuns, the group of six monks — without having been appointed at all — went on instructing nuns. Some monks of few wants then censured, complained of, and disparaged them, saying: "Why do these monks instruct nuns without having been appointed?" The monks then reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, in relation to this incident and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth, just as before. The Blessed Ones, the buddhas, act with full knowledge — and so forth, just as before.

The Blessed One then rebuked the group of six monks: "Monks, I have said that one should not instruct nuns without having been appointed. Is it true that you were instructing nuns without having been appointed?" They replied: "Venerable One, it is true." The Blessed One, the buddha, censured them, saying that this was not proper conduct for a renunciant, not consonant with right conduct, not fitting, not in accordance with proper form, and was not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

Having censured them in many ways, the Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, having seen these ten benefits, one should lay down a rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so forth, just as before. "My śrāvakas should recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk instructs nuns without having been appointed by the Saṅgha commits a transgression."

Thus did the Blessed One lay down that rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One was residing at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At that time there was a brahmin residing at Śrāvastī who had taken a wife from an equal family, and he would play with her, make merry with her, and enjoy himself with her. She bore him children one after another, and then in due course his wife became pregnant. The brahmin then placed his hand under her arm, feeling tender in his heart as he sat with her.

Not far from there an old woman was sitting, and she saw this and said to him, "Brahmin, why do you sit holding your hand under her arm, so troubled in your heart?" The brahmin replied, "Every child my wife has borne has died in due time. And now that a being has entered into my wife's womb and another child is about to be born, that one too will die in due time, and so I shall have much grief and go on in sorrow." The old woman said, "When the time comes for your wife to give birth, let me know."

Then, at another time, when his wife's time to give birth arrived, the brahmin summoned that old woman and she came. As soon as the birth took place, a boy was born. The old woman bathed the boy, wrapped him in white cloth, filled his mouth with clarified butter, and gave him into the hands of a young girl. She said to the girl, "Take this boy to the crossroads of the great road, and if any renunciant or brahmin should notice him, bow at his feet with reverence and humility, and say to him: 'This boy pays homage at the feet of the noble ones.' At sunset, if he is still alive, bring him back home; but if he has died, leave him there."

The girl was diligent, and being capable, she took the boy and went to the crossroads of the great road and sat there. Now the daily practice of the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) was to rise early in the morning and go to the riverbank for ritual contact with the water, and so the tīrthikas who were going to the riverbank for this purpose came by that spot. The girl bowed at their feet with reverence and humility and said, "Noble ones, this boy pays homage at the feet of the noble ones." They replied, "May he live long! May he be sustained for a long life! May the heartfelt wishes of both his parents be fully accomplished!"

Then the elder monks — the senior monks — having put on their lower robes in the early morning and taken up their bowls and outer robes, set out for alms in Śrāvastī. The girl bowed at the feet of the venerable elders with reverence and humility and said, "Noble ones, this boy pays homage at the feet of the noble ones." The venerable elders replied, "May he live long! May he be sustained for a long life! May the heartfelt wishes of both his parents be fully accomplished!"

The girl then carried the boy along the path leading to the Jeta Grove, and the Blessed One — having also put on his lower robe in the early morning, taken up his bowl and outer robes — was on his way into Śrāvastī for alms. The girl bowed most reverently and humbly at the feet of the Blessed One and said, "Blessed One, this boy pays homage at the feet of the Blessed One." The Blessed One declared, "May he live long! May he be sustained for a long life! May the Dharma-endowed heartfelt wishes of both his parents be fully accomplished!"

When the girl looked at sunset, she saw that the boy was still alive, so she took him and came home. They asked her, "Is the boy alive?" The girl said, "He is alive." They asked, "Where did you hold him?" "At a pleasant crossroads on the great road." They asked, "What name shall be given to the boy?" "Since this boy was held on the great road, let his name be Mahāpanthaka — Great Road — and so that became his name."

The boy Mahāpanthaka was raised and grew up. When he had grown up, he mastered writing, arithmetic, calculation, finger-counting, casting up accounts, carrying forward, setting down, dividing, and reading. And at that time, in accordance with brahmanic customs of conduct, conduct, cleanliness, daily practice, the taking of ash, the taking of a water vessel fashioned like a bird, the taking of clay, hand gestures, topknot wearing, the recitation of praises, the utterance of the sacred syllable kye, the Vedic science of definitive expression, the Vedic science of sacrifice, the Vedic science of poetic composition, the Vedic science of polity and protection, and the six duties of brahmins — performing sacrifice, officiating at the sacrifices of others, reciting the Vedas, teaching others to recite them, giving gifts, and receiving gifts — he became a brahmin learned in the Vedas and the ancillary sciences of the Vedas, one who had reached the far shore of those disciplines, able to set forth his own position clearly and to refute the positions of others.

At that time the brahmin Mahāpanthaka had some five hundred young brahmin students reciting brahminic sacred formulas. Then at a certain time that brahmin was amusing himself, rejoicing, and sporting together with his wife, and his wife conceived. When the time came for her to give birth, that brahmin summoned the old woman, and she came. In due course the birth took place, and a boy was born. The old woman bathed the boy, wrapped him in white cloth, filled his mouth with clarified butter, and placed him in the hands of a girl, saying to her: "Girl, hold this boy at a pleasant crossroads on the great road. If any ascetic or brahmin happens to pass by, bow down with veneration and reverence at his feet, and say to him: 'Noble one, this boy pays homage at the feet of the noble ones.' At sunset, if he is still alive, bring him home. If he should die, leave him there on the spot." Now that girl was foolish and lazy, so she took the boy and went and sat down on a side path.

It was the custom among non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) to rise before dawn and go to touch the riverbank. So a group of tīrthikas who were setting out to touch the riverbank arrived there. The girl bowed down to them with veneration and reverence at their feet, and said: "Noble ones, this boy pays homage at the feet of the noble ones." They said: "May he have a long life. May he be sustained for a long time. May the wishes in the hearts of both his parents be completely fulfilled." The girl looked at sunset and saw that he was still alive, and so she took him and came home. They asked the girl: "Is the boy alive?" The girl said: "He is alive." They asked: "Where did you hold him?" "On a pleasant side path." They asked: "What name shall be given to the boy?"

"Since this boy was held on a side path, let his name be Cūḷapanthaka — Little Road." And so that became his name.

The boy Cūḷapanthaka was raised and grew up. When he had grown up, when he was put to writing, if he said the syllable sid he would forget dhāṃ, and if he said dhāṃ he would forget sid. His teacher said to the brahmin: "Brahmin, I have many other brahmin students to teach, and I am unable to teach Cūḷapanthaka to read. Mahāpanthaka, with just a little instruction, is able to retain a great deal; but this Cūḷapanthaka, when he says sid he forgets dhāṃ, and when he says dhāṃ he forgets sid." The brahmin thought: "Not every brahmin is learned in letters and syllables. This one may yet become a brahmin of the Vedas." And so he gave him to a reciter to read the Vedas. But when that one said oṃ he forgot bhū, and when he said bhū he forgot oṃ. So the reciter said to the brahmin:

"Brahmin, I have many other brahmin students to teach, and I am unable to teach Cūḷapanthaka to read. Mahāpanthaka, with just a little instruction, is able to retain a great deal; but this Cūḷapanthaka, when he says oṃ he forgets bhū, and when he says bhū he forgets oṃ." The brahmin thought: "Not every brahmin reads the Vedas. Whether learned or unlearned, whether pure or impure, whatever is born a brahmin is by that very birth a god — so this one will at least belong to the brahmin caste alone." Since the younger was the very least of offerings and the very least of the little, his name came to be Cūḷapanthaka, meaning "Little Road." Wherever that brahmin was invited as a guest for any small occasion, he would take Cūḷapanthaka along with him.

Then at another time the brahmin fell ill, and though he was attended with medicines derived from roots, stems, leaves, flowers, and fruits, he only grew worse. He summoned Mahāpanthaka and said to him: "Son, after I am gone you need not grieve. Take care of your younger brother Cūḷapanthaka and provide him with what he needs." Then, having said:

All that is accumulated comes at last to exhaustion;
the lofty must fall in the end;
all meeting ends in parting;
and the end of the living is death —

he passed away in accordance with the law of his time. The two of them wrapped him in robes of blue and yellow and red and white, carried him to the charnel ground, and cremated him. After that they performed the mourning rites and departed.

Vinayavibhaṅga, the forty-seventh fascicle. Now that brahmin Mahāpanthaka dwelt beside a certain tree in a village between Śrāvastī and the Jeta Grove, where some five hundred brahmin students were assembled and being taught the secret brahmin recitations. The Venerable Śāriputra and the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, having completed their Vinaya duties, were traveling through the Kosala regions with a retinue of five hundred and came to Śrāvastī. When the great assembly of ordinary people at Śrāvastī heard that the noble Śāriputra and Mahāmaudgalyāyana were journeying through the Kosala regions with a retinue of five hundred and had arrived at Śrāvastī, many hundreds of living beings began to go forth from home into homelessness. When Mahāpanthaka saw them going forth, he said: "You who are wise, where are you going?" They replied: "The noble Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana have come to Śrāvastī while traveling through the Kosala regions, and we are going to meet them." Mahāpanthaka said: "Those two have abandoned the highest caste and gone forth under the śramaṇa Gautama of the second caste — what is the point of seeing them?" But there was among the brahmin students one who had faith, and he said: "Teacher, please do not speak so. Those two are great beings. If the Teacher were to hear the Dharma from them, there is indeed a basis on which the Teacher's mind could come to genuine confidence." Mahāpanthaka thought: "I shall investigate. For now, when the brahmin students stop their recitation I too shall go." The students' custom was that whenever they paused from recitation, they would sometimes walk toward the town and sometimes go down to gather firewood. Then one day it happened that they stopped reciting and went down to gather firewood, and at that very time Mahāpanthaka himself set out toward the Jeta Grove.

A monk was walking and sitting beneath a tree at the gate of the Jeta Grove. The brahmin saw him from quite a distance, went over to him, and said: "O monk, please speak a few words of the Buddha's teaching."

The monk thought: "This brahmin is a disputant, so I cannot speak expansively to him for his benefit." He therefore taught the brahmin extensively on the ten pathways of virtuous action and the ten pathways of non-virtuous action.

The brahmin said: "O monk, I myself have fallen short in my own affairs, and if you too are failing in the domain of virtue, that is not good. As for me, I shall go — but I will return again later." With that, he departed.

Then on another occasion, the brahmin students stopped their recitation and went down to gather firewood, and Mahāpanthaka set out alone along the great road toward the Jeta Grove. The monk saw the brahmin from quite a distance. Seeing him, he thought: "Earlier I taught this brahmin extensively on the ten pathways of virtuous action and the ten pathways of non-virtuous action. Now I shall teach him extensively on the twelve links of dependent origination in their forward order and in their reverse order."

The brahmin went to where the monk was, arrived, and bowed his head to the monk's two feet, then sat to one side. When he had sat to one side, the monk taught the brahmin extensively on the twelve links of dependent origination in their forward order and in their reverse order.

The brahmin, filled with faith, said: "O monk, I request to go forth under you."

The monk thought: "This brahmin is a disputant — if I ordain him, he will be a credit to the teaching." And so he said: "Brahmin, do so."

The brahmin said: "O monk, I am a brahmin of good repute, and if I go forth here without preliminary steps, I will be set apart from my community. Let it be done properly."

The monk led the brahmin away to a suitable place, had him go forth, and conferred upon him full ordination. Then he said: "Good sir, the tasks of a monk are two: meditative concentration and recitation. Which of the two do you wish — concentration or recitation?"

Mahāpanthaka replied: "Preceptor, I shall do both. By day I shall recite, and at night I shall meditate." "Son, do so."

Then the Venerable Mahāpanthaka, through recitation and oral study by day, came to master all three collections of scripture. He became one possessed of the three collections, a Dharma preacher, endowed with the eloquence of knowledge and liberation.

Through meditation by night, he attained progressively refined states of mental application, recognized the moving and unmoving aspects of the fivefold wheel of cyclic existence for what they are, and, overwhelmed by the very nature of all formations — their deterioration, their downfall, their dispersion, their disintegration — he abandoned all afflictions. Thus, noble sons, for the sake of which one shaves off hair and beard, dons the ochre robe, and goes forth from home into homelessness in genuine faith — that supreme end of the holy life — he realized directly through his own direct knowledge in this very life itself. Having accomplished it, he understood: "My birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is no further existence beyond this."

He became an arhat freed from attachment throughout the three realms — mind equal to earth and gold, equal to sky and the palm of one's hand — and with his wisdom he split open the hollow of the gateway of ignorance. Endowed with knowledge — — endowed with direct knowledge and individual perfect understanding, he turned his back on the gains and honors of existence and desire, and became a worthy recipient of worship, esteem, and open praise from the gods who possess both gross and subtle sense faculties.

Now, at the very time when the venerable Mahāpatha had gone forth on the great path, the livelihood that went with the lesser path had grown thin, had been fully exhausted, and had been completely used up, and so he began to sustain his life with great hardship. Then the venerable Mahāpatha thought to himself: "Whatever I ought to obtain through learning, that I will obtain; and I will go to Śrāvastī and attend upon the Blessed One."

So the venerable Mahāpatha set out toward Śrāvastī, traveling through the Kosala countryside with a retinue of five hundred. While in Śrāvastī, a great gathering of common people heard that the noble Mahāpatha was traveling through the Kosala countryside with a retinue of five hundred and had arrived at Śrāvastī. Having heard this, a crowd of common people began streaming out, and a traveler on the lesser path saw them and asked: "Good people, where are you going?" They replied: "The noble Mahāpatha, traveling through the Kosala countryside with his retinue of five hundred, has arrived at Śrāvastī — that is where we are going." The traveler on the lesser path thought: "These people are neither his brothers nor his relatives, yet they go to him like that. If he were my elder brother, why would I not go in the same way?" And so the traveler on the lesser path also set out to see the noble Mahāpatha.

When the venerable Mahāpatha saw him, he asked: "Traveler, are you well?" "I am well, noble one." "How are you faring?" "With great hardship, noble one." The venerable Mahāpatha said: "How is it that you have not yet gone forth?" The traveler on the lesser path replied: "Noble one, I am among the poorest of the poor, the least of the least — could someone like me go forth in the teaching of the Blessed One?" The venerable Mahāpatha looked to see whether he had even a small root of virtue, and saw that he did. He asked himself who it depended upon, and saw that it depended on himself alone. He then said: "Traveler, in the scriptural teaching of the Lord of Sages (the Buddha), birth is not what is cherished, nor lineage, nor learning — in the scriptural teaching of the Lord of Sages what is cherished is practice. So if you wish, go forth."

"Noble one, I will go forth."

The venerable Mahāpatha gave that traveler on the lesser path the going-forth and full ordination, and then began to have him recite the following verse:

Do no evil with body, speech, or mind, and be free from the wish to grasp hold of all the world.
With mindfulness and vigilance, do not approach whatever suffering brings harm.

Yet even in three months he had not managed to learn it. Cowherds and other herdsmen heard it and learned it, and he went to them with respect and humility, bowed before them, asked them about it, and they taught it to him.

Just as it is the natural way of things that during the lifetime of the Blessed One, the buddhas — while living, present, and abiding — there were two great assemblies of hearers: one at the time of the rains retreat near the middle month of summer, and the second on the middle month of autumn. And so too it was for the great hearers. Those who, near the middle month of summer, had received instructions for the rains retreat and had undertaken the rains retreat in villages, towns, districts, and royal palaces — these would, at the time of the full moon of the middle month of autumn, report what they had attained.

And so, in order to attain what had not yet been attained, they would inquire further of the venerable Mahāpanthaka. Those attendants who had undertaken the rains retreat in the districts — once the three months of the rains retreat had passed, having made and received their rains-retreat robes and taking up their bowls and robes — they set out and went to where the venerable Mahāpanthaka was. They prostrated at his feet and stood to one side. Standing to one side, some of them reported what they had attained. Others sought recitations and inquiries in the sūtras, the Vinaya, and the Abhidharma.

Now among them, those who were utterly wretched — the most wretched of the wretched, the most petty of the petty — they attended upon the Group of Six, grew close to them, and rendered them service. And so the venerable Panthaka too, attending upon the Group of Six, growing close to them, and rendering them service — his companion said to the venerable Panthaka: "Panthaka, these others who share one and the same preceptor with you are also seeking recitations and inquiries from the preceptor. You too should go and for a time seek recitations and inquiries from the preceptor."

Panthaka replied: "I have read nothing at all. In three months I learned one verse, and even that I could not master. How then should I seek recitations and inquiries?" His companion said: "Did not the Blessed One declare that the stain of secret teachings is not to be recited? Come now, why could you not at least master one verse? Go and seek."

Panthaka went and said: "Preceptors, please give me for a time some recitations." The venerable Mahāpanthaka thought to himself: "Is this one now asking out of his own initiative, or has he been sent by someone else?" Seeing that he had been sent by another, Mahāpanthaka thought: "Is this one to be tamed by criticism, or is he to be tamed by praise?" Seeing that he was to be tamed by criticism, Mahāpanthaka seized him by the neck, expelled him outside the Jeta Grove, and said: "You are nothing but utterly wretched — the most wretched of the wretched, the most petty of the petty. You went forth into the Blessed One's teaching, and to what end? Stay right here."

Panthaka thought: "Now I am neither a wanderer nor a brahmin," and he began to weep. The Blessed One saw the venerable Panthaka weeping outside the Jeta Grove. Then, moved by great compassion, the Blessed One went to where the venerable Panthaka was and, coming to him, spoke to him thus: "Panthaka, why are you weeping outside the Jeta Grove?"

Panthaka replied: "Blessed One, my preceptor seized me by the neck, expelled me outside the Jeta Grove, and said: 'You are nothing but utterly wretched — the most wretched of the wretched, the most petty of the petty. You went forth into the Blessed One's teaching, and to what end? Stay right here.' And so now I am neither a wanderer nor a brahmin."

Then at that moment the Blessed One spoke this verse:

What a fool praises and what a wise one criticizes — here it is the wise one's censure that is supreme;
it is not the fool's praise.

Then the Blessed One declared:

"My son, your preceptor completed the six perfections through many hundreds of thousands of difficult deeds performed over three immeasurable eons, and thereby fully accomplished this scripture of the Lord of Sages — and yet he did not truly establish it in practice. Now I, having completed the six perfections through many hundreds of thousands of difficult deeds performed over three immeasurable eons, and thereby fully accomplished this scripture of the Lord of Sages — can you read it from the Tathāgata?" Panthaka replied: "Blessed One, I am wretched, supremely wretched, insignificant, supremely insignificant."

Then the Blessed One spoke this verse on the occasion:

One who knows a fool to be foolish — in that very knowing, he is wise.
A fool who fancies himself learned:
he, here, is the truly foolish one.

It is not possible, it is not the right occasion, for the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, to teach the Dharma word by word. There being no such occasion, the Blessed One then addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, have Panthaka taught to recite."

The venerable Ānanda began to have Panthaka recite, but Panthaka was unable to do so. The venerable Ānanda then said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, for my part I would attend upon the Teacher, I would retain what I hear, I would have assemblies recite, I would teach the Dharma to brahmins and householders who come — and so I find no point in being asked to have Panthaka recite."

The Blessed One then gave him just the two words, "Dispel the dust! Remove the stain!" — and Panthaka could not retain even those two words. The Blessed One, thinking "I shall purify his karma," then addressed the venerable Panthaka: "Panthaka, can you clean the sandals and strapped shoes of the monks?" He replied: "Blessed One, I can manage that." "Then go and clean the monks' sandals and strapped shoes." Panthaka began to clean the monks' sandals and strapped shoes, but the monks would not hand them over to him. The Blessed One then said: "Monks, let Panthaka clean the sandals and strapped shoes — for it is in order to purify his karma. And have him learn the recitation of these two words as well."

As Panthaka was cleaning the monks' sandals and strapped shoes, the monks also taught him the recitation of the two words, "Dispel the dust! Remove the stain!" He learned them, and at another time he came to know those two words by heart.

Then, at the break of dawn one night, the venerable Panthaka reflected: "When the Blessed One said 'Dispel the dust! Remove the stain!' — was he speaking with inner dust in mind, or outer dust in mind?" As he was thinking this, three verses he had never heard before arose clearly in his mind:

This "dust" here — desire is not physical dust;

"Dust" is the name for desire, not for grime.

Those wise ones who have fully cast off that dust will become heedful in the teaching of the Sugata.

This "dust" here — aversion is not physical dust;

"Dust" is the name for aversion, not for grime.

Those wise ones who have fully cast off that dust
will become heedful in the teaching of the Sugata.

This "dust" here — delusion is not physical dust;

"Dust" is the name for delusion, not for grime.

Those wise ones who have fully cast off that dust
will become heedful in the teaching of the Sugata.

With joy, with effort, and with with striving, ever advancing, attaining an excellence of mental application, knowing this very wheel of saṃsāra in its five parts — moving and unmoving — and being overwhelmed by the very nature of reality of all formations: their decay, their falling away, their dispersal, and their dissolution, and having abandoned all afflictions — noble sons, for whatever reason one shaves hair and beard, dons saffron robes, and with sincere faith goes forth from home into homelessness: that supreme culmination of the holy life, in that very life, one directly realizes and accomplishes through one's own direct knowledge, and understands: "Birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is no further existence beyond this." And one becomes an arhat, free from attachment, beyond the three realms, with a mind equal toward a clod of earth and gold, equal toward the sky and the palm of the hand, having set sandalwood aside — one's door of faculties has been burst open by gnosis — having attained gnosis, direct knowledge, and individual discriminating awareness, turned away from becoming, from gain through desire, and from honor, and become worthy of being venerated, revered, and proclaimed by gods with and without their retinues.

The venerable Lāmpa was seated cross-legged, and when the venerable Lāmachenpa saw him, since arhats know without deliberating, and since seeing does not require engagement, the venerable Lāmachenpa took the venerable Lāmpa by both hands and said: "Lāmpa, first recite your lessons, and after that go into meditative concentration."

The venerable Lāmpa extended his arm like an elephant's trunk, and the venerable Lāmachenpa, turning to look back, saw this, and said: "Venerable Lāmpa, have you realized such an accumulation of qualities?" "I have."

Everywhere it was heard proclaimed that the Blessed One had fully ordained the lesser Lāmpa. In Rājagṛha, a young man named Tsojezhönnu (who tended to the living) heard that the Blessed One had fully ordained the lesser Lāmpa, and he thought: "If the Blessed One comes to Rājagṛha, the monastic Saṅgha of monks, led by the Buddha — with the exception of the venerable Lāmpa — will be invited to other homes for the midday meal."

Other learned non-Buddhist (tīrthika) thinkers began to slander, dismiss, and speak ill of this, saying: "This ascetic Gautama says, 'My teaching is deep, appears deep, is hard to see, hard to realize, beyond examination, not the domain of logic, subtle, to be known by the wise and discerning' — yet he fully ordains those of this sort: a lesser Lāmpa, a greater, a lesser, and an even lesser — how can his teaching be deep?" And they mocked, derided, and disparaged.

The Blessed One, considering that the great śrāvakas, like Mount Meru, were spoken of by the crowd of ordinary people as "producing unwholesomeness," intended to proclaim the elder's qualities. Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and tell Lāmpa from the Tathāgata's own lips, saying as I say: 'Teach the nuns.'"

The venerable Ānanda, having heard from the Blessed One, replied "As you command, Venerable One," and went to where the venerable Lāmpa was. Having arrived, he said to the venerable Lāmpa: "Venerable Lāmpa, the Blessed One has commanded, 'Teach the nuns.'"

The venerable Lāmpa reflected:

He thought: "Why has the Blessed One set aside the elder monks and commanded me?" Then, understanding that the Blessed One wished to proclaim his qualities, he thought: "I must fulfil the Teacher's intention completely," and said: "Venerable Ānanda, I shall do as the Blessed One has commanded."

Two nuns coming to offer the restoration ceremony arrived at the Jeta Grove. The two of them said: "Who has been appointed as our teacher of nuns?" The monks said: "The venerable Lāmpa." They replied: "Is it the noble great Lāmpa, or the venerable Lāmpa?" The monks answered: "The venerable Lāmpa." The two said: "Brothers, look at that despised woman's territory — he could not even learn a single verse in three months — and yet he is to teach the nuns, who are versed in the second and third Piṭakas, who proclaim the Dharma, who possess knowledge and the eloquence of liberation. We shall go and see how he manages to teach the nuns." So saying, they went to where the venerable Lāmpa was, and arriving there, they prostrated with their heads at the venerable Lāmpa's feet and said: "Venerable Lāmpa, please attend. The community of nuns of the pleasure grove of the king prostrates with their heads at the feet of the community of monks of the Jeta Grove. Are there few hardships? Are there few difficulties? Is movement easy? Are you alive? Do you have strength? Are you at ease? Are you free of fault? Do you dwell in comfort?" So they inquired after his health. "We request teachings and instructions every fortnight. We request that you preside over the ceremony and the restoration. Please know this request as well. It is convenient." The two of them said: "It is convenient," knowing even that much, and they went off toward the summer dwelling. When the nuns saw them, they said: "Who has come as our teacher of nuns?" The two replied: "The noble Lāmpa." The nuns asked: "Is it the noble great Lāmpa?" They answered: "Not the noble great Lāmpa — it is simply Lāmpa." Those nuns said: "Sisters, look at that despised woman's territory — he could not even learn a single verse in three months — and these nuns are versed in the second and third Piṭakas, who proclaim the Dharma, who possess knowledge and the eloquence of liberation. How is he going to teach the nuns? And we — just as the Blessed One has overpowered us — not one of those ninety-six wonders has overpowered any woman's territory at all."

When the groups of twelve nuns heard that the noble Lāmpa was coming as teacher of the nuns in this way, they said: "Sisters, by all means, from this point forward, however little we have heard, let us not teach even a single thing to a nun" — meaning, let that child of the womb-eater be displeased. Then they said: "Sisters, six of us shall prepare a lion throne from branches twelve cubits long, and six of us shall enter Śrāvastī and proclaim to the great crowds in the main roads, the market streets, the crossroads, and the junctions: 'Tomorrow our teacher of nuns, a great śrāvaka of such quality, is coming; among you, whoever has not yet seen the truths — let that person know they will have to wander in saṃsāra for a very long time.' Let this be announced!" Six of those women prepared the lion throne from branches twelve cubits long, and six of them entered Śrāvastī and went through the main roads, the market streets, the crossroads, and the junctions, and proclaimed to the great crowds of people: "Tomorrow our teacher of nuns, a great śrāvaka of such quality, is coming; among you, whoever has not yet seen the truths — let that person know they will have to wander in saṃsāra for a very long time." When this proclamation was made, many hundreds of thousands of living beings gathered there — some drawn by curiosity, and some stirred by the roots of virtue they had planted in the past.

Then the Venerable Lampā, when that very night had passed, dressed in her inner robe at dawn, took up her bowl and outer robe, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Having finished her almsround through Śrāvastī and completed the business of her meal, she returned from the afternoon almsround, set aside her bowl and outer robe, washed both feet, and entered the assembly hall in order to settle properly into inner equipoise. Then the Venerable Lampā rose from her inner settling, took up her patchwork robe, and went to where a certain wandering monk walking behind was staying, and to the nuns' rain-retreat quarters — the king's pleasure grove.

When the great crowd of people saw her, they said among themselves: "Who is this teacher of nuns? Is she a former wandering ascetic, or is she a wandering monk who follows behind?" Then they said: "Have you ever heard that some wandering monk following behind teaches nuns? No — this very former wandering ascetic is herself the teacher of nuns." Then others said: "If she takes three months to read a single verse and still cannot master it, how will she teach nuns who are masters of the second and third collections of scripture, Dharma proclaimers, possessed of the confidence of knowledge and liberation? These wretched little female ascetics are going to humiliate us — let us leave!" But others said: "Whatever she does, let us wait a while and watch."

Then the Venerable Lampā entered the midst of that assembly and went to where the lion throne had been prepared. When she saw the lion throne made from branches twelve cubits long, she thought: "Was this prepared by those of faithful mind, or by those of presumptuous mind?" — and she perceived it had been prepared by those of presumptuous mind. Then the Venerable Lampā, stretching out a hand like an elephant's trunk, pressed down the lion throne just as it had been set in place, and seated herself upon the lion throne in such a manner that some among the crowd could see her and others could not.

Then the Venerable Lampā entered meditative absorption (samādhi) of this kind: as she settled her mind in equipoise, she became invisible from her own seat and rose manifest into the sky above the eastern direction, performing the four modes of conduct — walking, standing, sitting, and lying down. She also entered absorption upon the fire element, and from the body of the Venerable Lampā as she remained in absorption upon the fire element there came forth rays of light of various kinds — blue ones, yellow ones, red ones, white ones, crimson ones, and ones resembling the color of crystal and silver. She displayed also paired miracles: from the lower part of her body flames blazed forth while from the upper part of her body streams of cool water poured down; from the upper part of her body flames blazed forth while from the lower part streams of cool water poured down. Just as she did in the eastern direction, so likewise in the south, the west, and the north —

Having displayed in each of those four directions four forms of miraculous display, the Venerable Lampā withdrew the manifestation of those miracles and took her seat upon a lion throne that had been arranged in front of the assembly. Seated there, the Venerable Lampā addressed the nuns, saying: "Sisters, I took up a single verse for three months. For seven days and nights I shall delight in analyzing the meaning of that verse by means of other words, other letters, and other words and letters combined.

"Sisters, in that verse: the word 'body' indicates what the Blessed One taught — that the three bodily non-virtues are not to be committed. The word 'speech' indicates what the Blessed One taught — that the four verbal non-virtues are not to be committed. The words 'by mind' indicate what the Blessed One taught — that the three mental non-virtues are not to be committed. The words 'abstaining from evil' indicate what the Blessed One taught — that all evil whatsoever is not to be done. The words 'for all the world' indicate what the Blessed One taught — namely, all the appropriated aggregates (skandhas). The word 'clinging' indicates what the Blessed One taught — the three kinds of clinging: the clinging of attachment, the clinging of aversion, and the clinging of delusion."

By as much as the Venerable Lampā had analyzed even half the meaning of the verse, twelve thousand living beings saw the truths. Some of them actualized the fruit of stream-entry; some actualized the fruit of once-returning; some actualized the fruit of non-returning; and some went forth, abandoned all afflictions, and actualized arhatship itself. Some generated the mind set upon the awakening of a hearer; some generated the mind set upon the awakening of a pratyekabuddha; and some generated the mind set upon unsurpassable, perfectly complete awakening. The greater part of the assembly was directed toward taking refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha.

Then, having directed the greater part of that assembly toward taking refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, the Venerable Lampā rose from her seat and departed.

Now, those monks who were walking about and standing near the gate of the Jeta Grove, upon seeing the Venerable Lampā approaching from a great distance, said among themselves: "Venerable ones, if the Venerable Lampā has not failed to inspire confident faith in a great multitude of people today, since it is painful to speak of something openly disappointing, let us ask the attendant monk who is following behind her." And so they said to the monk who was following behind her: "Venerable one, how great a multitude of people did the Venerable Lampā inspire with confident faith today?"

He replied: "As for who it was that inspired faith — it was the one who, at Vārāṇasī in the Deer Park of the Sages (R̥ṣipatana), recited three times and turned the wheel of Dharma in twelve aspects, endowed with the Dharma. Whatever the Blessed One did then, that same thing today the Venerable Lampā has continued in turn. By as much as the Venerable Lampā had analyzed even half the meaning of the verse, twelve thousand living beings saw the truths. Some of them actualized the fruit of stream-entry; some actualized the fruit of once-returning; some actualized the fruit of non-returning; and some went forth, abandoned all afflictions, and actualized arhatship itself."

Some aroused the mind set upon the awakening of a śrāvaka. Some aroused the mind set upon the awakening of a pratyekabuddha. And some aroused the mind set upon the unsurpassed, perfectly complete awakening. The greater part of the assembly was established in going for refuge to the Buddha, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha.

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Among those of my śrāvakas who are skilled in transforming minds, Lampā is supreme. One who lacks qualities such as these is therefore excluded."

Thereupon the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of desiring the training, of reverence for the training, and of equipping oneself with the requisites of the training, gave a discourse to the monks in accordance with that praise, going further into it and suited to it. He then addressed the monks: "Therefore, what was formerly prescribed is prescribed, and this is now permitted. My śrāvakas are to learn this as a rule of the Vinaya training: if any monk, without having been appointed by the Saṅgha, teaches a nun, then — unless he possesses qualities such as these — he commits a transgression.

"As for the phrase 'any monk,' this refers to the group of six and anyone else of that kind. 'By the Saṅgha' means by the Saṅgha of śrāvakas of the Tathāgata. 'Without having been appointed' means without the act of the motion and the second proclamation. 'Nun' refers to a nun of this Dharma community. 'Teaches' refers to the higher moral discipline, the higher mind, and the higher wisdom. 'Unless he possesses qualities such as these' means excepting one who does possess such qualities and is accordingly established. 'Commits a transgression' means he is scorched, cooked, and fallen into the lower realms of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the states of wrong falling. Moreover, for as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs the wholesome dharmas. Therefore it is said 'commits a transgression.'

"As to the question of how a transgression arises: if a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha outside the boundary but not within the boundary, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he too commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, yet the appointment was not made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, and the appointment was indeed made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, yet the entire Saṅgha is not present and in harmony, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, and the appointment was made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, and the entire Saṅgha is present and in harmony, yet he does not possess moral discipline, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, and the appointment was made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, and the entire Saṅgha is present and in harmony, and he does possess moral discipline, yet he is not learned, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, and the appointment was made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, and the entire Saṅgha is present and in harmony, and he does possess moral discipline and is learned, yet he is not like a senior elder acting as a deputy, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, and the appointment was made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, and the entire Saṅgha is present and in harmony, and he does possess moral discipline and is learned and is like a senior elder acting as a deputy, yet he does not know the local dialect, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, and the appointment was made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, and the entire Saṅgha is present and in harmony, and he does possess moral discipline and is learned and is like a senior elder acting as a deputy and knows the local dialect, yet he has been expelled by a nun through physical contact and has not properly reversed that transgression according to the rule, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, and the appointment was made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, and the entire Saṅgha is present and in harmony, and he does possess moral discipline and is learned and is like a senior elder acting as a deputy and knows the local dialect, and he has not been expelled by a nun through physical contact, or even if he has been expelled, he has properly reversed that transgression according to the rule, yet he is unable to recite in full the eight rules entailing defeat, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, and the appointment was made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, and the entire Saṅgha is present and in harmony, and he does possess moral discipline and is learned and is like a senior elder acting as a deputy and knows the local dialect, and he has not been expelled by a nun through physical contact, or even if he has been expelled, he has properly reversed that transgression according to the rule, and he is able to recite in full the eight rules entailing defeat, yet he is unable to recite in full the eight weighty rules, those who make the appointment incur an offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he commits a transgression. If a monk is appointed by the Saṅgha within the boundary but not outside the boundary, and the appointment was made on that very fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, and the entire Saṅgha is present and in harmony, and he does possess moral discipline and is learned and is like a senior elder acting as a deputy and knows the local dialect, and he has not been expelled by a nun through physical contact, or even if he has been expelled, he has properly reversed that transgression according to the rule, and he is able to recite in full the eight rules entailing defeat and is also able to recite in full the eight weighty rules, then those who make the appointment incur no offense, and if that appointed monk teaches a nun, he likewise incurs no offense.

The subsequent rule regarding teaching nuns runs as follows. "Sisters, is your community of nuns assembled? Is it pure? Is it in harmony? Is there no offense? Is it the case that no one who has not been appointed by the Saṅgha teaches you? The person who teaches you is one who comes from the Saṅgha. No monk whatsoever will be dispatched to teach you without appointment. Your instruction and guidance come from the Saṅgha. Sisters, practice with heedfulness" — this much he is able to teach.

The monks then made a request to the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable One, please look upon the fact that twelve groups of nuns, intending to harm the venerable Lampā, instead brought him benefit. And not only that — monks, even in times past, those same groups, though intending to harm him, ended up bringing him benefit. Listen to this.

Monks, long ago in a time gone by, there lived a brahmin dwelling in a rocky mountain fastness. He took a wife of equal birth, and together they sported, took pleasure, and enjoyed themselves in delight, and a son was born to them. Now, sensual pleasures are like salt water — the more one partakes of them, the greater one's thirst becomes — and so he again and again sported, took pleasure, and enjoyed himself in delight with her, until twelve sons were born, and he settled them all into his household.

In time, his wife passed away, and the brahmin, now old and stricken with grief, was afflicted in both eyes and became blind. His twelve daughters-in-law were thoroughly dissolute, and whenever their husbands went out of the house, they would revel in merriment with other men. The brahmin, being skilled in the sounds of voices, would think, 'This is the voice of my sons; this is the voice of other men.' Thus, hearing the voices of other men, he reproached his daughters-in-law. They thought to themselves, 'This brahmin has set himself against us to do us harm — let us do him an injury,' and so they served him coarse grain husks and dishwater.

The brahmin said to his sons, 'Sons, your wives have served me coarse grain husks and dishwater.' The sons then said to their wives, 'Why did you serve father coarse grain husks and dishwater?' They replied, 'It is on account of father's pure merit that when a vessel of thick śāli rice is offered to him it turns to coarse husks, and when broth is offered it turns to dishwater. Why would it be otherwise?' The sons said, 'If you doubt us, we shall demonstrate it right before your eyes.' They said among themselves, 'We must bring to fulfillment the plan we made with our husbands,' and so they summoned a potter and said to him, 'Good man, can you make a single pot with two separate compartments inside?' He replied, 'I can,' and he made a pot with two compartments. Into one compartment of the pot they put coarse grain husks, and into the other they put thick śāli rice. Into one compartment of another pot they put whey, and into the other they put rich broth. They stirred everything together and then spoke to the husbands: 'Young masters, shall we first serve father, or shall we serve the young masters first?' They replied, 'Serve father first, and after that give us ours.'

They then opened one compartment of a pot before the fathers-in-law and gave them coarse grain husks, and from another pot opened one compartment and gave the husbands the broth they had skimmed off the boiling whey. After that, they opened one compartment of another pot and filled it with the thick śāli rice broth, and opened one compartment of yet another pot and filled it with whey soup, which they gave to the husbands. The sons then said to their father, "Father, it is on account of your merit that, right before our very eyes, one compartment of a pot was given over to thick śāli rice and another compartment to fresh whey broth to stir together, while into your mouth went coarse grain husks and boiled dregs. The women have done no wrong."

The brahmin then thought to himself, "I built up all these provisions through a hundred hardships of my own hands — why has my merit now been exhausted?" And so, without their noticing, he secretly went in great numbers through their pantry, feeling about by hand, and when his hands came upon pots that each had two compartments inside, he hid those pots away. When the sons arrived and came in, he said to them, "Look at the exhaustion of my merit," and he showed them those pots and then spoke in verse:

In other men's houses,
a single pot has but a single mouth.
For us who are without fortune, a pot with two compartments inside still has but a single mouth.

They then struck those daughters-in-law soundly, and the daughters-in-law thought to themselves, "This brahmin has set himself against us to cause us harm. We must kill him." And so a snake-charmer came by that way, and they asked him, "Good man, do you have a snake?" He replied, "What kind of snake do you want — a dead one or a live one?" They said, "A dead one." He thought, "What do these people want with a dead snake? It seems clear they want to kill this brahmin." Now, it is the nature of things that the venom of an enraged snake travels to two places — the head and the tail. So he took a black snake and made it angry, then cut off its head and tail and gave them only the middle part of the body. They made a broth of the snake flesh and said to the brahmin, "Father, will you drink some snake broth?" The brahmin thought, "Why would they be offering me snake broth? It seems clear they want to give me some poison." But then he thought, "Whatever happens, I will drink it," and they poured out for him the snake broth, and he drank it. The fumes of it cleared the film from his eyes, and the brahmin's sight became clear. He thought, "I must find a way to make this even more potent," so he threw himself down on the ground and said, "I am near death, I am near death." They thought, "May he die quickly," and said, "Father, drink some more and you will recover." He said, "I'll drink it," and they poured him yet more of the snake broth. He drank it again, and its fumes cleared the film from his eyes even further. His eyes saw as clearly as before, and he sat there saying nothing.

Now, those daughters-in-law, in the time when the brahmin had previously been blind, had treated him with contempt and behaved carelessly — and they began to carry on in exactly the same way as before. The brahmin then rose, took up his staff, and said, "What are you thinking? Do you suppose that I cannot see?"

"Now, the fumes of that snake-flesh broth have struck my eyes and cleared away every last film, so that I see everything clearly, just as in former times. Daughters-in-law, from this day forward, conduct yourselves with care."

O monks, the brahmin who lived at that time and in that age was none other than the elder Lampa himself. The twelve daughters-in-law who lived at that time and in that age are these very twelve communities of nuns. Even then, instead of intending to harm him, they acted for his benefit alone.

Then the monks addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Reverend Blessed One, see how by teaching the elder Lampa with just a few words of instruction, you drew him out of the wilderness of cyclic existence and established him in the utterly final attainment — in nirvāṇa, the unsurpassed state of bliss and peace."

The Blessed One declared: "O monks, not only now — even thus, in times long past, I set him upon the great lord of mastery by guiding him with just a few words of instruction. Now listen well.

O monks, long ago in a past age, in a certain mountain gorge, there lived a wealthy householder of great riches and abundant possessions, whose holdings were broad and extensive. He took a wife from a family of equal rank, and with her he played, rejoiced, and sported in happiness. As they were playing, rejoicing, and sporting in happiness together, a son was born to them. The householder then said to his wife: 'My dear, debtors who steal and plunderers who take our wealth have arisen, so I shall take up a cargo and set out to sea on the great ocean. Act accordingly, O son of a noble lord.' The householder then thought: 'If I were to entrust a large sum of kārṣāpaṇas to this wife of mine, she would turn and consort with another man.' So he gave her only a small quantity of kārṣāpaṇas.

Now, in that mountain gorge there also lived a merchant, and this merchant happened to be the householder's intimate younger friend. The householder therefore placed a large sum of kārṣāpaṇas in the merchant's hand and said: 'If my wife falls short of food and clothing, supply her with whatever food and clothing she needs.' Having said this, he took up his cargo and went out upon the great ocean — and right there, in that very place, he came to grief through misfortune.

The wife raised and nurtured their little son through the strength of her kinsmen and through the labor of her own hands. When the boy had grown, he asked his mother: 'Mother, what work did my father and grandfather do?' The mother thought: 'If I tell him, "They sailed great ships upon the great ocean," then this one too will go out upon the great ocean, and he too will come to grief through misfortune in that very place — such a danger would arise.' So instead she said: 'Son, your father and grandfather carried on trade right here in this very place. Mother, give me the kārṣāpaṇas, and I shall trade here as well.' The boy said: 'Mother, where would you get kārṣāpaṇas? You nurtured and raised me through the strength of your kinsmen and the labor of your own hands — how could you have an abundance of kārṣāpaṇas? However, this merchant is your father's intimate younger friend; go to him, obtain kārṣāpaṇas from him, and set to work.'

The boy went to the merchant. Now, another man had been pressing the merchant three times over the matter of a failed trade, and while the merchant was sitting there being pestered by him, a servant girl came out from inside his house carrying a dead rat on a piece of cloth, and she started to throw it away. At that moment, the merchant said to that man: 'Anyone with ability can make a livelihood from even this dead rat.'

When the boy heard this, he thought:

'This merchant is a great man, and therefore he will not go about boasting of what has happened here; I can certainly take this dead rat for myself without missing my chance.' The boy followed right behind that servant girl, and when she threw down the piece of cloth, the boy picked up the dead rat and went off to the marketplace. Now, in a certain shop there was a cat tied up, and when the boy showed the dead rat to that cat, the cat lunged toward it. The shopkeeper said to the boy, 'Give that dead rat to this cat.' The boy replied, 'How can I give it without a price? Give me a price and I will give it.' The shopkeeper filled the boy's cupped hands with beans and gave them to him.

The boy thought: 'If I eat these up, that will cut off my capital.' So he soaked the beans and roasted them, filled a pot with cool water, and went to the rocky hills to a place where the woodcutters would come to rest, and he sat down there. When the woodcutters arrived, the boy said to them, 'Good fellows, set down your loads of wood and rest a while.' The woodcutters set their loads down, and the boy gave each of them a small portion of beans and let them drink of the cool water. The woodcutters said, 'Young man, where are you going?' 'I am going to sell wood.' 'However far ahead we go, we still come back the same day — if you go now, when will you return?' And each of them gave him a piece of wood. One piece from each of them thus made up the boy's load of wood, and he carried it away and came back. He sold those pieces, bought beans with the proceeds, roasted them, filled a pot with cool water, and went again to that same place and sat down. Those woodcutters came along as well, and he said to them, 'Good fellows, set down your loads of wood and rest a while.' The woodcutters set their loads down, and again he shared beans among them and let them drink their fill of cool water. They said to him, 'Young man, stay here every single day with beans and water, and we will bring you the price of a load of wood and give it to you.' The boy began to do just that, day after day, and then he said to them, 'Good fellows, do not take your loads of wood to the market; leave them in my storehouse, and I will reckon the price for you and pay it all at once.' They left their loads of wood at his house.

On another occasion, a famine lasting seven days came upon the land, and the boy sold that wood and earned a great many profits. Then the boy thought: 'Among the trades, this one — selling wood — is a dead end; for even if one lives by sandalwood, one lives by wood alone. I should set up a provisions stall.' He set up a provisions stall and traded in it with honesty and fairness, so he earned a great many profits there as well.

Then he thought again: 'Among the trades, selling provisions is a dead end. I should set up a perfume and incense stall.' He set up a perfume and incense stall and traded in it with honesty and fairness, and there too he earned a great many profits.

Then he thought again: 'Among the trades, selling perfume and incense is a dead end. I should set up a jewellery stall.' He set up a jewellery stall and traded in it with honesty and fairness, and he surpassed every jeweller there was, so that his name came to be known as 'Byi-dbyi-pa — the Rat Boy, the Jeweller.'

The jewellers all said, 'This Rat Boy has surpassed us all — they will find a way to send him into the great ocean, and when things go wrong there he will suffer — let us stir up his pride.' Saying this, one of them went and stood not far from him and began to speak idle words of provocation. 'Wise friends, consider this example: a man who has ridden an elephant dismounts to ride a horse, and having ridden a horse dismounts to ride a donkey, and having ridden a donkey goes on foot. In just the same way, this Rat Boy here — while his forebears sailed great ships across the ocean — now ekes out a hard living by mere small trade in goods.' When he had said this, Rat Boy heard it.

Rat Boy said, 'Wise friends, what is that you say? My forebears sailed great ships across the ocean, and now they are dead, and I earn my living in hardship through petty trade?'

Rat Boy went home and asked his mother: 'Mother, is it true that my forebears sailed great ships across the great ocean?' His mother thought: 'He must have heard this from someone. I should not let him down, for it would not be in keeping with my own character to speak false words to him.' And so she said, 'Son, it is true.'

Rat Boy said, 'Mother, give me your blessing to enter the great ocean myself.'

His mother said, 'Son, stay right here.'

Rat Boy said again and again that he would go, and his mother, knowing that the time had come when she must yield, gave her consent.

Rat Boy announced to the great assembly of merchants: 'Whoever among you wishes to go with the caravan-leader Rat Boy into the great ocean — without casting lots, without a lottery, without squabbling, without wrangling — let him prepare provisions for the voyage into the great ocean.'

Then some five hundred merchants prepared their provisions for the voyage into the great ocean.

Thereafter the caravan-leader Rat Boy performed rites of good omen, auspiciousness, and blessing, and loaded many cargoes onto wagons, onto draft animals, onto riding horses, onto mules, onto she-camels, onto oxen, and onto donkeys, and set out for the great ocean together with those merchants.

Now in that company there were five men: one who gathered, one who resolved disputes, one who bailed, one who drew water, and one who read the winds. The gatherer was the one who prepared food and drink. The one who resolved disputes was the one who settled all quarrels and conflicts as they arose. The bailer was the one who caulked and repaired the ship. The one who drew water was the one who drew up water. The one who read the winds was the one who observed the constellations.

In due course they arrived at the shore of the ocean. When those merchants saw the great ocean they were frightened, and no longer felt eager to board the great ship. The caravan-leader Rat Boy said to the wind-reader, 'My dear captain, proclaim the praises of the great ocean exactly as they are.'

Then the wind-reader began to proclaim: 'Hear, O wise merchants of Jambudvīpa! In this great ocean there are great and precious jewels of such kinds as these: gems, pearls, beryl, white crystal, coral, silver, mother-of-pearl, the essence of stones, conch, carnelian, and right-whorled shells. With such precious things as these, each one of you may bring perfect happiness and contentment to yourselves, your fathers and mothers, your sons, your wives, your male servants and female servants, your workers, those who live on your charity, your friends and companions, your ministers, your relatives and kinsmen by blood, and, from time to time, to renunciants and brahmins, in order to rise to a high station, to become one of the fortunate, to attain a pleasant karmic maturation, and to go to a higher realm in the next life — let such a one enter the great ocean. Now, it is the way of the world that the many ordinary folk who board the great ship are driven by desire for wealth; and when they and the ship were beyond what could be endured, the ship's captain considered: "Now I should cry out — what shall I say to turn them back?" Thinking this, he spoke to the one who held the wind-rope: "Proclaim inside the hold a fitting proclamation about the great ocean, not as praise but as it truly is." Then the one who held the wind-rope began to make the proclamation: "Wise merchants of Jambudvīpa, listen! In this great ocean there are such great and terrible dangers as these: the danger of great fish, the danger of fish-swallowing great fish, the danger of fish-swallowing-fish-swallowing great fish, the danger of great waves, the danger of whirlpools and eddies, the danger of the water-monster the kumbbhīra, the danger of the young-child-killing water-monster, the danger of striking against mountains that have risen up from within the water, and the danger of black winds. And here there will also come dark-clad and white-clad pirates who steal wealth, and they will in every way separate each and every one of you from your lives. Therefore, whoever among you is unwilling to be parted from all of these — yourself, your father and mother, your sons, your wife, your male servants and female servants, your workers, those who live on your charity, your friends and companions, your ministers, your relatives and kinsmen by blood — let that one not enter the great ocean." Now, it is the way of the world that the brave are few and those who have gone before are many; so the great mass of ordinary folk turned back. The ship having become bearable, thereafter the one who held the wind-rope made three cries of proclamation. Then, releasing one cable and then the second, and releasing up to the third, the great ship caught a great favorable wind and was well held; set in motion by the force and power of the wind, it moved like a great cloud, borne forward by a following wind, and in due course arrived at the jewel island. Then the one who held the wind-rope began to make proclamation: "Wise merchants of Jambudvīpa, listen! Right here on this jewel island there are stones and pebbles resembling precious gems — examine them carefully and closely, so that when you return to Jambudvīpa you will have no regrets; take the gems in just that way. Right here on this jewel island there are she-demons called Young Cranes; they will in every way bring men to ruin right here through improper conduct — so be wary, and do not consort with them. Right here on this jewel island there are fruits that cause intoxication; whoever eats them will remain senseless for seven days — do not eat them. Right here on this jewel island there are non-humans dwelling here, and they cannot tolerate your staying longer than seven days; after seven days they will send such a wind as this — one that carries away even a great ship as though it had never been built — so do not tarry beyond that either." When the merchants heard this, they gathered their minds and stayed with vigilance. They examined and examined the gems carefully, and the great ship — filled, for instance, with sesame, great heaps of rice, pine, lentils and the like — departed from the jewel island, and, carried by a favorable wind, arrived in Jambudvīpa. In the same way, seven times over, the great ship was successfully completed and came to Jambudvīpa.

Then the navigator Byidhyigpālam's mother said to him, "Son, build a house." He replied, "Mother, should I not first pay off the debts and build under that?" His mother said to him, "Son, your father never had debts, nor did your grandfather — so how did you come to have debts?" He said, "Mother, I alone know," and he had four rats made from the four precious gems, filled a chest with gold, placed those four rats at the four sides of the chest, and went to that merchant.

That merchant was sitting there praising him, saying: "O wise ones, whatever grass or hemp or anything at all that the navigator Byidhyigpālam picks up turns into gold — see how meritorious and greatly renowned he is!" — and so the merchant sat there singing his praises. While the merchant was speaking those praises, someone came to the door and announced that the navigator Byidhyigpālam was standing at the gate. The merchant said, "Let the navigator Byidhyigpālam enter! Who would turn the navigator Byidhyigpālam away?" The navigator Byidhyigpālam then entered inside and said to the merchant, "Merchant, this is the principal, and this is the profit — please accept them." The merchant said, "Navigator, I cannot recall having given you even the smallest thing." The navigator said, "It is I who should remind you," and he reminded him. The merchant asked, "Whose son are you? You are the son of some great householder." The merchant said, "Then you are the son of my dear younger friend. When your father was passing away, he entrusted many kārṣāpaṇas into my hand — it is I who was to give them to you." With that, the merchant received him with a welcome offering of a golden vessel filled with water, and gave him his youngest daughter, adorned with every ornament, as the wife of the navigator Byidhyigpālam.

O monks, he who was the merchant at that time and on that occasion was none other than myself. He who was the navigator Byidhyigpālam at that time and on that occasion is this very Lampā. At that time too, by giving him a little instruction, I established him in the mastery of great lordship. And now too, by giving him a little instruction, I have drawn him out from the wilderness of saṃsāra and established him in the utterly final accomplishment — in the nirvāṇa of unsurpassed bliss and peace.

The Vinaya Analysis, the forty-eighth fascicle. The monks requested of the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, what action did the elder Lampā perform such that by the karmic maturation of that action he was brought low, supremely low, and utterly, supremely diminished?" The Blessed One declared:

O monks, it is Lampā himself who, having performed and accumulated a collection of karmas, having converted the conditions — dwelling close by like a flame — performed and accumulated those actions that are inevitably bound to arise. Who else could experience separately the karma that Lampā himself performed and accumulated? O monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, the virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates (skandhas), elements

(dhātus), and sense bases (āyatanas). As it is said in verse:

Even if a hundred aeons pass, the karmas one has gathered do not perish;
when the assembly and the time arrive, they ripen as fruits for those who bear a body.

O monks, in a former time, in the past, during this very good aeon, when the lifespan of living beings was twenty thousand years, the Teacher, the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, Sugata, Knower of the World, unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, Teacher of gods and humans, the Buddha, the Blessed One Kāśyapa, appeared in the world. He resided near Vārāṇasī together with a retinue of twenty thousand monks. In that Blessed One's scriptural collections, this very Lampā became a monk who was master of the three baskets of scripture, yet due to his Dharma-miserliness he did not teach even a single four-line verse to anyone.

Now there was also a pig-dealer who lived on a certain rocky cliff. At a festival time that arose on those cliffs along both banks of a river, the pig-dealer thought: "If I were to slaughter the pigs here and now, there would not be enough buyers for that much meat, so I should bring them alive and slaughter and sell them on the spot." With this in mind, he tied the blind pigs one to another in a line, loaded them onto a boat, and set off. While the pigs were being conveyed, the boat capsized, and there they suffered in an improper manner.

When the pig-dealer was carried along by the current, about five hundred pratyekabuddhas were encamped on the bank of that river. One of those pratyekabuddhas had gone down to the riverside for water, and seeing the pig-dealer he thought: "Is this one dead, or alive?" He stretched out his hand, which was like an elephant's trunk, pulled the man out, spread sand over him, laid him face-down upon it, and departed.

When all the moisture had drained from the man through the sand, he regained his perception (saṃjñā), rose up, and saw a human footprint. He followed after it, and presently, seeing the five hundred pratyekabuddhas, he began to wait upon them with leaves, fruits, and tooth-wood. They, in turn, gave him the remainders from their almsbowls. And whenever those pratyekabuddhas sat cross-legged in meditative concentration, he too would sit to one side and enter meditative concentration cross-legged. Through this he developed the meditative absorption of non-perception, and was reborn among the gods of non-perception.

O monks, at that very time and in that very era, the monk who had become master of the three baskets in the scriptural collection of the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa, and who had become a pig-dealer — that was this very monk Lampā. The karma of his never having taught even a single four-line verse to anyone out of Dharma-miserliness, of his having slaughtered pigs, and of having been born here from among the gods of non-perception — by the ripening of that karma he became one who was given to, supremely given to, lowly and supremely lowly.

O monks, thus there are these and other faults in meditating without instruction. Therefore a monk should not engage in meditative concentration without instruction; if he does, it will lead to transgression.

Then the Blessed One, having stayed in Śrāvastī as long as he wished, set out toward Rājagṛha and, traveling gradually, arrived at Rājagṛha and took up residence there in the Bamboo Grove, the Kalandaka Park. In Rājagṛha there was a physician named Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta, who heard that the Blessed One had arrived at Rājagṛha while traveling gradually and was residing in the Bamboo Grove, the Kalandaka Park. He went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side.

Sitting to one side, the Blessed One instructed Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta with Dharma-endowed words, guiding him rightly, establishing him rightly, exhorting him rightly, and gladdening him rightly. With many categories of Dharma-endowed words he instructed him rightly, established him rightly, exhorted him rightly, and gladdened him rightly, and then said nothing more. Then Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta rose from his seat, arranged his robe over one shoulder, and with palms joined in the direction of the Blessed One, bowed and addressed the Blessed One in these words: "May the Blessed One please consent to accept, together with the Saṅgha of monks, a midday meal at my dwelling tomorrow. The Blessed Buddhas are difficult to approach and difficult to bear with, so Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta is unable to say to the Blessed Buddhas, 'Except for the Venerable Lamba.'" The Blessed One said nothing, and by that silence he granted the request to Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta. Then Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that the request had been granted, rejoiced and delighted in the Blessed One's words, bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One, and departed from the presence of the Blessed One. He went to where the Venerable Ānanda was, and having arrived, bowed his head to the Venerable Ānanda's feet and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta spoke to the Venerable Ānanda thus: "Venerable Ānanda, please know this: I have invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to a midday meal at my dwelling tomorrow, excepting the Venerable Lamba. May your virtuous qualities, Jīvaka, flourish accordingly." Then Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta rejoiced and delighted in what the Venerable Ānanda had said, bowed his head to the Venerable Ānanda's feet, and departed. Not long after Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta had left, the Venerable Ānanda understood the situation, went to where the Venerable Lamba was, and upon arriving spoke to the Venerable Lamba thus: "Venerable Lamba, please know this: Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta has invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to a midday meal at another household tomorrow, excepting the Venerable Lamba alone. May the virtuous qualities of the Venerable Ānanda flourish accordingly." Then, that very night, Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta made preparation of pure and fine food and drink, and rising early the next morning, spread out seats, set out water for the hands, and invited the Blessed One with the words: "Venerable One, since you have graciously agreed to come at midday, may the Blessed One please bear in mind that the time has now arrived." Then the Blessed One, in the early morning, put on his lower robe and took up his bowl and outer robe, and, surrounded by the assembly of monks and preceded by the Saṅgha of monks, went to and arrived at the dwelling of Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta. He took his seat on the seat that had been prepared, at the head of the Saṅgha of monks. When he had taken his seat, the Blessed One addressed the Venerable Ānanda:

"Ānanda, set down the pitcher of water. Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta has a golden pill called bhṛṅgāra; he is sitting to one side of an elder. The Blessed One has not yet accepted the water."

Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta addressed him: "Why does the Blessed One not accept the water?"

The Blessed One declared: "The assembly of monks has not yet fully gathered."

Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta asked: "Blessed One, who is absent?"

The Blessed One declared: "The monk Lāmpa."

Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta said: "Blessed One, I did not invite him."

The Blessed One declared: "Jīvaka, did you not invite the assembly of monks headed by the Buddha?"

"Blessed One, I did invite them."

"Then is Lāmpa outside the assembly of monks?"

"Blessed One, no."

"Go then and call him." Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta thought to himself: "I will call him at the Blessed One's word, yet I will do so respectfully and not presumptuously." So he sent a messenger, with the instruction: "Go and call him."

Now the Venerable Lāmpa had entered into a meditative absorption of such a kind that, as his mind rested in equipoise, two thousand two hundred and fifty monks appeared, sitting there as his emanations. The messenger went and called out "Lāmpa, Lāmpa," and a great many monks answered "Here!" The messenger returned and said to Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta: "I went there and called out 'Lāmpa, Lāmpa,' and at the Kalandaka grove in the Bamboo Grove, just as the monks had been filling the space before, so again the monks were filling the space, and a great many of them answered 'Here!' Which of them was I to call?"

Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Go, and tell the true Lāmpa to come."

He went and said: "Let the one who is the true Lāmpa please come."

Then the Venerable Lāmpa withdrew the miraculous display of his supernatural power, went there, and took his seat in his own proper place. Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta then began to serve the assembly of monks headed by the Buddha, but he served the Venerable Lāmpa without the special respect he was showing the others.

The Blessed One reflected: "Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta is receiving the words of this great hearer, who is like Mount Meru. I should have his qualities proclaimed." And so, since the Venerable Ānanda was the one who customarily received the Blessed One's bowl, the Blessed One did not pass it to him. For by established custom, so long as the Blessed One has not yet accepted his bowl, the senior monks do not accept theirs.

The Venerable Lāmpa then thought: "Why is it that the Blessed One and the senior monks are not accepting their bowls? I understand: it is in order to proclaim my own qualities." Thinking thus that he should fulfil the Teacher's intention completely, the Venerable Lāmpa rose halfway from his seat, extended his arm like an elephant's trunk, and took up the Blessed One's bowl. Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta, who was sitting to one side of the elder, saw this and thought: "I wonder which elder this is who is displaying such a miraculous marvel?" He followed after the bowl, and after a short while recognized that it was the Venerable Lāmpa. Upon recognizing him, he fainted and fell to the ground. Water was sprinkled on him and he revived. He then touched the two feet of the Venerable Lāmpa, begged his forgiveness, and spoke in verse:

Sandalwood is always cool, fragrant, and full of virtue;
The blue lotus always breathes a fresh and stainless scent;
Like the light of vaiḍūrya, ever bright and pure;
The sins of childish ordinary beings are ever constant,
Like the markings of an incomparable gourd, unchanging.
Noble persons always possess compassion.
The patience of arhats is steadfast indeed.
The Venerable Lāmpa then said: "Jīvaka, I forgive you."

The Blessed One gave his approval, rose from his seat, and departed.

The monks then addressed the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable sir, Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta — when he failed to recognize the qualities of the Venerable Lāmpa, he strove in disrespect, and when he did recognize those qualities, he touched his two feet and begged forgiveness. Please observe this." The Blessed One said: "Monks, this is not the only time. In the past as well, whenever he did not recognize this one's qualities he strove in disrespect, and whenever he did recognize them he touched his two feet and begged forgiveness. Listen now.

Monks, long ago in times past, a caravan leader drove five hundred pack-horses northward and traveled to the central lands. A horse that knew nothing entered the womb of a mare, and from the very day it entered, all those horses ceased to whinny. The caravan leader thought: "Has some illness come upon my horses? Why do they not whinny?" Then at a later time a foal was born from that mare, and from the very day it was born, all those horses no longer even made the effort to snort. The caravan leader thought: "This foal is an unfortunate creature; because of its fault my horses have fallen ill." He therefore always rode the mare yet gave her neither grass nor fodder.

Eventually he arrived at a place called Ultimately Worshipped, and there the rains season came upon him. He thought: "If I travel now, the horses' hooves will become sore and they will be unfit for the caravan, so I shall stay here through the rains." He stayed there through the rains season, and the craftsmen living there served him, each in accordance with their own craft. When the time came for him to depart, the craftsmen came to see him off, and he distributed shares among them. Among them was a potter who had also served him with the work of his craft. The potter's wife said to him: "My lord, the caravan leader is about to leave — ask him for something." The potter took up a lump of clay and stood before the caravan leader. When the caravan leader saw him, he said: "Alas, master, you have come too late — I have already distributed everything I had."

The caravan leader's mind turned with ill omen toward that foal, and he said to the potter: "As it happens, I have a foal. If you want it, take it and go." The potter replied: "No matter — I shall make pots and it will break them." Just then the foal began to lick the potter's two feet with its tongue, and the potter was moved with affection for it, took it with him, and went home.

His wife said to him: "My lord, did you get anything from him?" "I got this foal." "No matter — you shall make pots and it shall break them." Then the foal began to lick the wife's two feet with its tongue as well, and she too was moved with affection for the foal.

When the foal walked among the fired and unfired pots, it did not break a single one, and the potter said to his wife: "This is a fine foal — it walks with full awareness." On another occasion the potter took up a basket and went to fetch clay, and the foal followed close behind him of its own accord. When the potter had filled the basket with clay, the foal offered its back; and so the potter loaded the basket of clay onto the foal's back, and it carried it home for him. The potter then said to his wife: "My dear, this is a fine foal indeed — from now on I shall no longer need to haul clay myself. I shall dig the clay over there, and you can load it here." His wife said "Excellent!" and gave the foal fodder of grass and beans.

Now at that time in Vārāṇasī there reigned a king named Brahmadatta, and under his rule the kingdom was prosperous, flourishing, and joyful; the harvests were good and the land was filled with many people. Battles, strife, quarrels, and civil unrest were entirely at peace; it was free from thieves, famine, and disease. He caused the land to abound in rice, garlands of sugar cane, cattle, and buffalo, and as a righteous king ruling by the Dharma, he ruled his righteous kingdom.

Now when the time came for that king's horse-master to make his round of inspections, the kings of the lands under the sun heard that King Brahmadatta's horse-master had arrived on his tour of inspection, and they sent word to him: "Either submit to an accounting of tribute, or else come out to the pleasure grove outside Vārāṇasī. If you do not, you shall be chained and dragged away by the neck." King Brahmadatta refused to render any tribute to them, yet out of fear he did not go out to the pleasure grove either, and so he sat confined within his city.

In time the merchant caravan leader arrived in Vārāṇasī, and King Brahmadatta heard that a certain merchant caravan leader had driven five hundred trading horses northward and come to Vārāṇasī. He summoned his ministers and said to them: "Wise ones, for as long as I remain shut up here, go today and seek out the horse-master." They went to the caravan leader, and when they saw those horses they said among themselves: "Wise ones, these horses are clearly all broken by the horse-master, yet the horse-master himself is nowhere to be seen here." Then they saw the mare and said: "Wise ones, if the horse-master were to follow this mare, he would be nowhere in sight." They went to the caravan leader and asked him: "Caravan leader, have you sold any horse to someone, or given one away?" The caravan leader replied: "I have not sold any at all, but it is the case that I gave away a foal at a place I took to be inauspicious, thinking it unlucky, to a certain potter." They said to one another: "Wise ones, this caravan leader is a fool — he cast away what was of the highest value and drove the dregs here." They reported to the king and went to the place of the inauspicious omen, and then they went to the potter and asked him: "What use is this foal to you?" The potter said: "It fetches clay for me." They said: "We shall give you a donkey; give us this one." The potter said: "This is what I need." They said: "We shall give you a cart with four oxen." The potter said: "This is what I need." They said: "Consider it today, and we shall come again tomorrow," and they departed.

Now it is in the nature of reality that when the world had not long been established, even animals could speak. So the foal said to the potter: "What is it they want? They want you. Why will you not give me away?"

"Does your heart truly believe that as long as I live I shall carry clay for you and eat chaff and grain husks? I must be consecrated as a king of the warrior-noble class (kṣatriya), anointed on the crown of my head, and I must eat rich and excellent food piled high and brimming over in vessels of gold. If they call me a mere foal, you should say to them in rebuke: 'What do you know of horses?' And if they offer a price, say to them: 'Then give a hundred thousand in gold, or give as much gold as this right haunch of mine can carry.'"

The next day they came and asked the potter: "Dear friend, have you considered, sir?" "I have considered." "Then give us this foal. Are you not ashamed to have them say you know nothing of horses?" They thought to themselves: "This simpleton — does he know whether this is a horse or not? It was this very horse that told him to say this to them, so it must be so." And so they said: "Whether it is a horse or a foal, give it to us for a price." The potter said: "Then give a hundred thousand in gold, or give as much gold as this right haunch of mine can carry." They thought: "This one is powerful; he will be able to carry a great many things. A situation like this will arise." So they said: "We shall give a hundred thousand in gold."

They sent word to King Brahmadatta saying: "We have purchased the horse-knower for a hundred thousand in gold." King Brahmadatta sent word back to them: "Whatever price you paid to obtain him, you will be reimbursed that same amount."

They took their hundred thousand in gold, led the horse-knower away, and arrived at Vārāṇasī. They placed him first in the royal stable and gave him hay and fodder, but he would not eat. The king said: "Have you brought your horse-knower to me sick?" They replied: "He is not sick, Your Majesty. He is wounded in this way" — and then the horse-trainer spoke these verses:

When swift-going ones are timely fit and watered well, but a potter keeps them — head gone dry, mere bone and skin — think then of eating self-healed, re-grown roots.
In that time, did many think of you?

Here, where a swift one carries a thousand loads, and the king has supplied the finest mounts for riding —
why you do not eat: ask that of me, and I shall tell.

Then the most swift, upright, and steadfast one,
with impatience and disturbance, the swiftest of the swift, having calmed himself from that and reflected well, spoke to the wise horse-trainer, that excellent man:

"Here you yourself know my very qualities.
I am not unknown to you as I truly am.
If scorned by the wise, I will not move upon this earth — to die here quickly would be better for me.
Even if scorned long by base people,
if my qualities are yours, that is no scorn.
But if for even a moment a wise person scorns me — if that peace itself, that quality, is scorned —"

The horse-trainer said to the king: "Your Majesty, he is not sick. The reason is this: the proper ceremonial reception has not been performed for him, and so he does not wish to eat hay and fodder. How should his reception be performed?" "Your Majesty, for half a yojana and three quarters in his wake, let it be made beautiful, and let the city itself be made beautiful. Let a royal kṣatriya consecration army with its four divisions be assembled to greet him. In whatever direction he is placed, let that direction be screened with panels of copper. Let the eldest prince hold over his head a white parasol with a hundred ribs. Let the eldest princess fan off the insects with a golden fan adorned with jewels."

Let the king's chief queen present food of fine provisions bound with fresh butter from a golden vessel. Let the king's chief minister discard the dregs with a golden ladle of copper.

The king said, "In that case, this one is the king, and I am not the king."

The trainer said, "Your Majesty, it is not possible to perform that reception for him at all times. It shall be done in this way for seven years. After the seven years have passed, he will become obedient. Whatever has already passed cannot now be undone, but let what remains be carried out. Let the king screen in whatever direction he is placed with panels of copper. Let the eldest prince hold over his head a white parasol with a hundred ribs. Let the eldest princess fan off the insects with a golden fan adorned with jewels. Let the chief queen present food of fine provisions bound with fresh butter from a golden vessel. Let the chief minister discard the dregs with a golden ladle of copper."

The earth-lord became attached to the trainer with his retinue, holding the finest fragrant ointment, and the earth-lord's queen, with fresh butter and fine provisions, filled the vessel and took it for the swift and excellent one.

When the king wished to go to the pleasure grove, a horse of fine breeding was presented to him, and as the king mounted from behind, he whispered to the trainer, "Will this one not kick?" The trainer replied, "Your Majesty, it will not kick. It thought: if the king were to have difficulty mounting, that would not be right, and so it lowered its hindquarters for that reason."

The king mounted and rode off. As they were going, a body of water arose and the horse would not cross it. The king whispered to the trainer, "Is it not afraid?" The trainer said, "Your Majesty, it is not afraid. It thought: if the king were to be splashed by the water from its tail, that would be improper, and so it does not cross for that reason."

The king had the horse's tail placed inside a golden tube, and then the horse crossed over.

The king went to the pleasure grove and was sitting there at ease, when the kings of the southern regions heard that King Brahmadatta had gone to the pleasure grove. They came and seized the gates of the city.

When King Brahmadatta heard that the kings of the southern regions had seized the city gates, he mounted the horse of fine breeding. Between Vārāṇasī and the pleasure grove there lay a pool called Brahmasaras, covered with blue lotuses, pink lotuses, kumuda water-lilies, and white lotuses. The horse of fine breeding thought to itself: "For me to abandon one who has been consecrated as the crown of the kṣatriya royal lineage, leaving him in harm's way, in distress, and in danger — that would not accord with my nature." And so the horse of fine breeding placed its hooves upon the lotus petals and entered Vārāṇasī through the window.

The king was delighted and said to his ministers, "O wise ones, what shall be given to one who has saved the life of a king consecrated as the crown of the kṣatriya royal lineage?" They replied, "Your Majesty, half the kingdom." The king said, "This is an animal — what use has it for half the kingdom? Rather, taking it as the occasion, let us for seven days give gifts, accumulate merit, and hold an out-of-season kumuda festival." And so, taking that as the occasion, the king gave gifts for seven days, began to accumulate merit, and for seven days held an out-of-season kumuda festival.

Then the caravan leader asked the people, "O wise ones, why has this out-of-season kumuda festival come about?" And they told him:

"From the place called Consecrated-by-the-King, a horse trainer had come here after purchasing the horse that knows everything from a potter for a hundred thousand in gold. He then saved this king's life, and the king, taking that as the occasion, gave gifts for seven days, accumulated merit, and held an out-of-season kumuda festival."

The caravan leader thought, "Has that foal become the horse that knows everything? I must go and see." He went to where the horse was, and the horse that knows everything said, "Lord of the caravan, what did those five hundred horses fetch? A hundred thousand in gold. And I alone gave that potter a hundred thousand." At this, the caravan leader fainted and fell to the ground. When water was sprinkled on him he recovered his senses, and prostrating at the two feet of the horse that knows everything, he begged his forgiveness.

Monks, he who was the caravan leader at that time and on that occasion is none other than the youth Jīvaka who nurtured the young. And he who was the horse that knows everything at that time and on that occasion is none other than this very Lāmpa. Even then, when he did not recognize that one's qualities, he fell into disrespect toward him; and when he came to recognize those qualities, he prostrated at his two feet and begged forgiveness. Even now, whenever he does not recognize this one's qualities, he falls into disrespect toward him; and whenever he comes to recognize those qualities, he prostrates at his two feet and begs forgiveness.

The monks then addressed the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable One, what action did Lāmpa perform, such that through the karmic maturation of that action the Blessed One has declared him the foremost among those skilled in transforming minds?"

The Blessed One declared: "It was through the power of an aspiration. Where was that aspiration made? Monks, long ago, when this one had gone forth under the teaching of the perfectly and completely awakened buddha Kāśyapa, the preceptor from whom he had gone forth was declared by the perfectly and completely awakened buddha Kāśyapa to be the foremost among those skilled in transforming minds. Yet this one, having lived the holy life throughout his entire life without gaining even a portion of the accumulation of virtuous qualities, made at the time of his death this aspiration: 'Throughout my life I have lived the holy life under the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha, he of unsurpassed qualities, Kāśyapa, yet I have not gained even a portion of the accumulation of virtuous qualities. By the root of virtue of this holy life I have lived throughout my life, may the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha Kāśyapa, just as he declared the brahmin youth who is my preceptor to be foremost, prophesying: "Brahmin youth, at a future time, when human lives last a hundred years, there shall appear a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and completely awakened buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, an unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, a buddha, a blessed one, named Śākyamuni" — just as my preceptor was declared foremost among those skilled in transforming minds under that Blessed One, so too may I be declared foremost among those skilled in transforming minds by the Blessed One Śākyamuni, the Lion of the Śākyas, the chief of the Śākya kings.' Having begun to plant that aspiration, it is through the power of that aspiration that the Tathāgata has now declared him the foremost among those skilled in transforming minds.

Monks, thus it is that the karmic maturation of deeds that are wholly dark is wholly dark; the karmic maturation of deeds that are wholly bright is wholly bright; and the karmic maturation of mixed deeds is mixed. Therefore, monks, abandon deeds that are wholly dark and mixed deeds, and strive for deeds that are wholly bright. Monks, you should train yourselves accordingly.

There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is mentally disturbed, one who is distracted, or one who is overcome by painful feeling.

The twenty-first rule entailing transgression for teaching without having been appointed is complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One addressed the venerable Nanda: "Nanda, you are to instruct the nuns. Nanda, you are to teach the nuns. Nanda, you are to speak to the nuns with Dharma-infused words." Having given this command, the five hundred nuns of the Utpalāvarṇā circle went to where the venerable Nanda was, and having arrived they prostrated with their heads at the venerable Nanda's feet and sat to one side. The venerable Nanda thought to himself, "Women's domain is of little wisdom," and so he taught them the Dharma in brief, summarizing the meaning, the words, and the letters. Since she — Utpalāvarṇā — was endowed with wisdom, she kept asking deeper and deeper questions, and the venerable Nanda gave answers; and he taught them the Dharma until the time when the sun had set. Then they prostrated with their heads at his feet, rose from their seats, and departed. Now, as they were going, the gates of Śrāvastī had been closed, and the nuns went in search of a gate. The gatekeeper said, "The gates are closed." They said, "Open them — the keys are at the royal palace." Thinking to themselves, "We should stay right here," they went to a pleasure grove that was not far from Śrāvastī.

The Blessed One then gave the order that trees should be assigned in order of seniority, and they began assigning the trees in order of seniority. At that point, as the nuns were calling out to the gatekeepers at the trees with loud cries, calling out phrases in a foreign tongue — "A-ye, a-ya, ha-ḍe, a-ga, e, a-ga, ha-ḍe!" — about five hundred villains wishing to attack Śrāvastī arrived and, hearing that loud, great outcry, said to one another: "Friends, stay still for a moment here at Śrāvastī! Friends, before the retinue of the venerable lady hears this, let us destroy them." Now Utpalāvarṇā thought to herself: "Could something terrible be about to happen without being known?" When she saw those approximately five hundred villains who wished to destroy them, she conjured up the army of a noble warrior, beat the great battle drum, and they said, "Friends, we are surrounded by the army of a noble warrior and are about to be captured — it is not right; let us flee!" Realizing this, they fled. Utpalāvarṇā then said to the nuns: "Sisters, about five hundred villains intent on destruction came here, and I frightened them off so they fled. Now gently, gently, quietly tap the gate and open it." Early the next morning they rose and entered Śrāvastī. When brahmins and householders saw them, they said, "It is excellent that the renunciants who are disciples of the Śākya son both mix with the Dharma and practice pure conduct beyond that." But there were a few monks who censured, disparaged, and criticized: "Why do the monks teach the nuns until sunset?" And in that circumstance the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this basis for a rule, and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks, and so forth, exactly as before. The passage beginning "The blessed buddhas, knowing full well, act as though unknowing" also proceeds exactly as before. The blessed Buddha asked the venerable Nandaka: "Nandaka, is it true that you were teaching the nuns until sunset?" "Reverend one, it is so." The blessed Buddha reproached lack of diligence, lack of application, and acting without examination. Then the Blessed One spoke words of praise for diligence, application, and examined conduct, and declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, perceiving ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule in the Vinaya for the hearers, and so forth, exactly as before. My hearers are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk who has been appointed by the monastic Saṅgha teaches nuns until sunset commits an offense."

The word "monk" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. The phrase "by the monastic Saṅgha" refers to the Saṅgha of hearers of the Tathāgata. The phrase "who has been appointed" refers to appointment by a motion and a dual-act procedure. The phrase "until sunset" means up to the moment when sunset falls. The phrase "nuns" refers to those belonging to this Dharma. The phrase "teaches" refers to instruction in higher moral discipline, higher mind, and higher wisdom. The phrase "commits an offense" means: it causes burning, scorching, and falling into the lower realms of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and wrong rebirths. Furthermore, as long as that offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs wholesome qualities. That is why it is said to be an offense.

As to how the offense comes about: if a monk, when it is indeed sunset, perceives it as sunset and teaches a nun, he commits an offense. If a monk, when it is sunset, is uncertain about it and teaches a nun, he commits an offense. If a monk, when it is not yet sunset, perceives it as sunset and teaches a nun, he commits a wrong act. If a monk, when it is not yet sunset, is uncertain about it and teaches a nun, he commits a wrong act.

Teaching that happens to be heard at night, teaching at the door of a temple, sitting without having closed the door, a temple or a summer dwelling located within a city, and teaching after going to another household — in all these cases there is no offense. For one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, and for one who is afflicted by painful feelings, there is no offense.

The monks, having doubts, asked the Blessed One, who cuts through all doubts: "Reverend one, please look upon the nun of lotus-blue complexion who fully protected five hundred nuns from the terror of bandits." The Blessed One declared: "Monks, not only now — in the past as well she fully protected a great many like-minded companions from the terror of lions. Listen to this, monks. Long ago, in time past, a householder dwelt on a rocky cliff. He took a wife of equal family, and together with her he played, rejoiced, and enjoyed pleasures. He said to his wife: 'Good woman, I must take up provisions and travel to another region.' His wife replied: 'My lord's son, I too shall come.' The householder said:

"Who will serve as your attendant on the road? Stay here — I am not taking you." At this she began to weep, and those who lived by selling curds asked the householder: "Why, my lord, has she been caused to cry?" The householder replied: "Because I said I am not taking her." They said: "Why will you not take her?" The householder said: "Who would serve as her attendant there?" They said: "We will serve as her attendants there." So the householder took her along, and together with those like-minded companions they spent the night on a forest road. Those like-minded companions, exhausted from the journey, lay down to sleep, while the householder's wife kept watch. Just then a lion came and, seizing a sickle stalk, threatened them; and as they fled, a god spoke these verses:

Not only men are skilled in every task and undertaking — in this or that endeavor, too, a woman proves herself adept.

Monks, she who was the householder's wife at that time and occasion is none other than this very Utpalā of the blue-lotus complexion, and those five hundred like-minded companions at that time and occasion are these very five hundred nuns. At that time also she fully protected many like-minded companions from the terror of a lion, and now likewise she has fully protected five hundred nuns from the terror of bandits. Here ends the twenty-second offence entailing expiation until sunset, the offences of the Teacher.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One declared: "Ānanda, you should teach the nuns. Ānanda, you should instruct the nuns. Ānanda, you should address the nuns with Dharma-connected discourse." Having so declared, the great sovereign lady of living beings, Gautamī, together with her retinue of five hundred nuns, went to where the venerable Ānanda was, and having arrived, she bowed her head to the two feet of the venerable Ānanda and sat down to one side. The venerable Ānanda then taught the Dharma to her with deep and profound meanings, words, and letters. But the domain of women, on account of their flickering wisdom, cannot receive the signs, and out of fear they are unable to inquire. Thereupon, the great sovereign lady of living beings Gautamī, delighted and rejoicing in what the venerable Ānanda had said, bowed her head to the two feet of the venerable Ānanda, rose from her seat, departed, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, bowed her head to the two feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the great sovereign lady of living beings Gautamī addressed the Blessed One thus: "Reverend One, when the noble Ānanda teaches the nuns the Dharma with deep and profound meanings, words, and letters, the domain of women, on account of their flickering wisdom, cannot receive the signs, and out of fear they have no occasion to inquire. The Blessed One has declared that giving is a cause of fearlessness. If the Blessed One would permit it, the nuns might do what would bring delight to the monks." The Blessed One declared: "In that case, so be it — let the nuns do what would bring delight to the monks." The Blessed One having declared "Let the nuns do what would bring delight to the monks," they did not know how to go about it. The Blessed One then declared: "The five things to be planted — roots, trunks, leaves, flowers, and fruits — and the five things to be eaten — unhusked grain, cooked rice, small cakes, meat, and oil — and the alms bowl, the Dharma robes, nets, bowls, ladles, straining cloths, small straining pouches, and cloth strips — with these things let the nuns do what would bring delight to the monks."

A certain nun carried some milk porridge and went to the Jeta Grove. Now the practice of the group of six was this: they thought to themselves, "Here, when brahmins and householders come and arrive, we shall teach the Dharma, we shall refute opponents, and we shall proclaim our own reputations." And so one or another of the group of six would not leave the gate of the Jeta Grove unattended. Ānanda rose early in the morning, set aside his tooth-stick, put on a red-and-yellow patched robe, and was walking and sitting at the gate of the Jeta Grove. When Ānanda saw that nun, he asked her: "What is it you have brought?" "Milk porridge." "For whom are you pouring it?" "For the noble Ānanda." "If Ānanda were to receive milk porridge as well, he would always in return teach the Dharma to the nuns." In the same way, when some nuns brought yoghurt porridge and others brought it in a bucket, Ānanda said: "I, Ānanda, am thinking to teach the nuns the excellent Dharma — I, Ānanda, am not at all thinking to teach the nuns for the sake of a mere trifle of food."

Now, certain monks of few wants reproached, dismissed, and criticized the monks, saying: "Why do the monks say to the other monks: 'The monks teach the nuns for the sake of a mere trifle of food'?" The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on this occasion, in regard to this matter, and in this context, convened the community of monks, and so on as before. "The Blessed Buddhas, knowing fully, inquire" — and so forth as before. The Blessed Buddha inquired of Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that the monks say of the other monks: 'The monks teach the nuns for the sake of a mere trifle of food'?" "Venerable One, it is not so." The Blessed Buddha then censured what was not the way of the ascetic, what was discordant, what was improper, what was inconsistent with the discipline, declaring: "This is not something that one who has gone forth should do." Then, having censured it in many ways, the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing the ten benefits, I shall lay down a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk says to other monks: 'Monks teach the nuns for the sake of a mere trifle of food' — that is an offense.

'Whatever monk' refers to a son of the Śākyaas such as Ānanda, or another of that kind. 'To other monks' means to those belonging to this Dharma. 'Says as follows' means if he says such a thing. 'Monks' refers to those of this Dharma. 'For the sake of a mere trifle of food' refers to the five things to be planted and the five things to be eaten. 'To the nuns' means to those of this Dharma. 'Teaches' — the term for teaching here refers to the higher moral discipline, the higher mind, and the higher wisdom. 'That is an offense' means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall — into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies, into the wretched states, and into the downward fall."

Furthermore, if that transgression is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — and that is why it is called a downfall.

As for how one incurs the downfall: whenever a monk says to the monks even the slightest thing, such as, "Monks, he teaches the nuns for the sake of even a trifle of food," in every such case he incurs the downfall. If it is true that he teaches the nuns for the sake of a little food, there is no downfall. There is no downfall for one who is a beginner, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is afflicted by feeling. The twenty-third downfall — teaching for the sake of a mere trifle of food — is complete.

from among those of equal rank, and with her he made merry, delighted, and lived in joy. When he came to old age, his relatives had dwindled away, his wealth was exhausted, and his resources were spent. He said to his wife: "Good woman, I am no longer able to acquire wealth now; I will go forth into homelessness." His wife replied: "My lord's son, I too shall go forth." "Do so, then," he said, and he brought his wife to the great Prājāpatī Gautamī (the chief nun, foster-mother of the Buddha) and said: "Noble lady, this my attendant wishes to go forth in the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya; may the noble lady grant her the going forth and confer upon her the full ordination." The great Prājāpatī Gautamī granted her the going forth and conferred the full ordination. She then said to the merchant: "My lord's son, the world of women is to be lived through existence; visit from time to time." The merchant also went to the Jeta Grove and went forth under a monk. Word spread that the merchant of Śrāvastī had gone forth, and because of his great renown and great merit, his robes, alms food, lodging, medicine for the sick, and requisites were all supplied.

Then at another time, wearing a patched robe of red and yellow, he went to that nun's summer dwelling. That nun prostrated with her head at his two feet, sat before him, and looked again and again at his patched robe. The monk said: "Sister, do you desire this patched robe?" She replied: "Like the remnant of a divine dwelling." He thought: "I will give her this patched robe and sew myself another." And so he gave her that robe and went away.

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and tell the monks: 'The Tathāgata is setting out to tour through Kosala — whichever of you wishes to travel together with the Tathāgata, let him take his robes.'" The venerable Ānanda, having heard the Blessed One, respectfully replied, "As the Blessed One commands," and announced to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One is setting out to tour through Kosala — whichever of you wishes to travel together with the Tathāgata, let him take his robes."

Then the Blessed One, tamed, with a retinue that was tamed; peaceful, with a retinue that was peaceful; liberated, with a retinue that was liberated; at ease, with a retinue that was at ease; subdued, with a retinue that was subdued; an arhat, with a retinue of arhats; free from attachment, with a retinue free from attachment —

calves; like a lion surrounded by a throng of fanged beasts; like a king of geese surrounded by a flock of geese; like a garuḍa surrounded by a flock of birds; like a brahmin surrounded by a throng of students; like a skilled physician surrounded by a throng of patients; like a hero surrounded by a troop of warriors; like a guide surrounded by a throng of travelers on the road; like a caravan leader surrounded by a throng of merchants; like a merchant chief surrounded by a throng of followers; like a king of a fortress surrounded by a throng of ministers; like a wheel-turning monarch surrounded by a throng of a thousand sons; like the moon surrounded by a host of stars; like the sun surrounded by a host of a thousand rays; like Dhṛtarāṣṭra surrounded by a throng of gandharvas; like a noble man surrounded by a throng of attendant vessels; like Virūpākṣa surrounded by a throng of nāgas; like Vaiśravaṇa surrounded by a throng of yakṣas; like Virūḍhaka surrounded by a throng of asuras; like Śakra (Indra) surrounded by the assembly of the Thirty-Three gods; like Brahmā surrounded by the assembly of the Brahmā realm — his faculties perfectly subdued; his deportment and conduct undisturbed; still as an ocean; full of moisture like a cloud; free from arrogance like the lord of elephants; beautifully adorned with the thirty-two marks of a great being; his body rendered magnificent by the eighty minor marks; his form adorned with an aura of a fathom's breadth; possessed of a radiance surpassing a thousand suns; utterly good like a moving mountain of precious gems; endowed with the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, the three unshared foundations of mindfulness, and great compassion; together with the all-knowing Kauṇḍinya, Aśvajit, Mahānāman, Vimalakīrti, Śāriputra, Mahāmaudgalyāyana, Kāśyapa, Ānanda, and Nandaka, and other great śrāvakas —

Now, it is the nature of things that when buddhas, Blessed Ones, set out on tour, some monks travel along fully robed, with upper and lower robes. Knowing this, the Blessed One turned and surveyed the whole of his body from the right side with the gaze of a great elephant, and he saw that very monk traveling along fully robed, wearing both his upper and lower robe. Having seen this, he spoke to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, have the monks who kept the rains retreat obtained their share of robes?"

"Blessed One, they have."

"Ānanda, then why does this monk travel along fully robed, wearing both upper and lower robe?"

The venerable Ānanda explained the matter in full to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One then said: "Ānanda, do monks give robes to nuns who are not their relatives?"

"Venerable sir, they do."

The Blessed One said: "Ānanda, when a nun is not a relative, a monk does not think, 'Are this one's three robes complete, or are they not complete?' He simply takes whatever he can get, and even if he gives to a relative he will not accept anything in return."

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this basis for the ruling, and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks, and so forth, as before. And "The Blessed Ones, the buddhas, though knowing, feign not to know," and so forth, also as before. The Blessed One questioned that monk: "Monk, is it true that you gave a robe to a nun who was not your relative?" "Venerable sir, it is so." The Blessed One rebuked him, saying that it was unbecoming of a renunciant, not in accord with proper conduct, not fitting, not in harmony with the rule — it was not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing the ten benefits, a rule of training in the Vinaya is to be established for the hearers," and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Now in this rule, 'whatever monk' refers to one of this Dharma. 'Nun' likewise refers to one of this Dharma. 'Who is not his relative' means: a grandmother, a grandfather, and those related by descent down to the seventh generation are relatives; beyond that they are not relatives. 'A robe' means any one of the seven kinds: woolen cloth, linen, silk, coarse cotton cloth, cotton flannel, hemp cloth, or jute cloth. 'Gives' means even without being asked. 'Incurs a transgression' means it causes one to be burned, scorched, and to fall into the bad destinies — into the hells as sentient beings, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into misfortune, and into ruin. Furthermore, as long as the transgression is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs wholesome qualities. That is why it is said to incur a transgression.

As for how a transgression is incurred: if a monk gives a robe to a nun who is not his relative, perceiving her as not his relative, he incurs a transgression. If a monk gives a robe to a nun who is not his relative while feeling uncertain about the matter, he incurs a transgression. If a monk gives a robe to a nun who is his relative, perceiving her as not his relative, he incurs a fault. If a monk gives a robe to a nun who is his relative while feeling uncertain about the matter, he incurs a fault.

There is no transgression in giving to one whose robe has been lost or destroyed, in giving to one who speaks well, in giving a robe as a gift to the community of nuns, in giving to one undertaking full ordination, in giving in exchange for a price, or in giving in exchange for something else. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful feelings.

The twenty-fourth defeat-incurring rule concerning giving of robes is complete. The Vinayavibhaṅga, the forty-ninth fascicle.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. The nun Bhadā had five sets of Dharma robes, all poor and patched and worn out. She found a large bolt of cloth and sat absorbed in thought, wondering to herself who might sew it into Dharma robes for her. The nuns said to her: "Sister, why do you sit absorbed in thought?" "Sisters, my five Dharma robes are poor, patched, and worn out, and now that I have found a large bolt of cloth, I do not know who might fashion it into Dharma robes for me." "Sister, could you not go begging with a golden vessel? Your own monk, the noble Cāraka, is a close friend of yours." Bhadā replied:

"He will not make her Dharma robes." The nuns asked: "Have you ever entrusted him with anything?" "I have never entrusted him with anything." "Well, would he not remove your sandals at the sound of the water bell? Go and ask him — he will do it." Bhadā went to the presence of the venerable Cāraka, bowed her head to his two feet, and sat before him. The venerable Cāraka, seeing her large bolt of cloth, said to her: "A person who possesses such a large bolt of cloth should have a patched robe made from fine linen, and then, with something even a little smaller at heart, should press forward toward virtue." Bhadā replied: "Noble one, it is not that I would not offer you this large bolt of cloth. Rather, my five Dharma robes are poor and the patches are worn out, and so I ask you to sew my patches and give them back to me." Cāraka thought to himself: "Even if I were to sew just one now, from all the twelve groups, all those whose Dharma robes need sewing would bring them to me, and how could I ever sew so many? On the other hand, if I do not sew them, I will not even be given the loan of a needle and thread. Therefore I must sew in such a way that, just as with what is boiled in a wooden vessel, what comes first becomes last." So thinking, he said to her: "Leave it and go." Bhadā left it and departed.

The six monks came there, and seeing the large bolt of cloth said: "Venerable Cāraka, whose is this large bolt of cloth?" "It belongs to me — it is for the one whose Bhadā she is." "In that case, cut it into whatever sizes are fitting." "Do it that way." They measured out and cut the large bolt of cloth, rendering it worn through. Then Cāraka took the patches and five-colored thread and went for a walk. He went there, and on the patches he stitched in embroidery — with five-colored thread — the image of himself embracing Bhadā around the neck, and brought it back to the assembly hall. He folded the patches and placed them on the Dharma robe rack.

When Bhadā also came, Cāraka said: "Bhadā, I have sewn your patches, so now you may come." He held the folded patches out and laid them on Bhadā's shoulders, saying: "For now, do not unfold them until the color has been set. You will incur a downfall." Bhadā, with the folded patches still draped just so on her shoulder, tossed them into the summer residence, and the nun Kṣemā said to her: "Bhadā, do look at how the noble Cāraka has sewn your patches." Bhadā said to her: "The noble Cāraka said: 'For now, do not unfold them until the color has been set — you will incur a downfall.'" And so she did not show them.

Bhadā went into the summer residence, and the nuns said to her: "Bhadā, do look at how the noble Cāraka has sewn your patches." Bhadā said: "The noble Cāraka said: 'For now, do not unfold them until the color has been set — you will incur a downfall.'" Some of her fellow nuns were sitting behind her and, thinking "What downfall could there be in this?", snatched the patches away, opened them, and looked. The nuns saw, stitched in embroidery with five-colored thread, Cāraka embracing Bhadā around the neck, and they burst out laughing, saying: "Bhadā, the noble Cāraka has been holding you for quite a long time!" When the great mother of beings, Gautamī, heard this, she said: "Sisters, if you are bald-headed and have your armpit hair shaved, what is there to laugh about?" They said: "Noble one, look at how in such and such a manner the noble Cāraka has done something unseemly."

At the point where the six groups of nuns, who habitually engaged in every kind of misbehavior, were saying that transgressions committed together with them would destroy the teaching of the Blessed One, the nuns reported this to the monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this originating circumstance, and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth, just as before. And the passage "The blessed buddhas, though knowing, make deliberate inquiry" — and so forth — likewise proceeds just as before. The blessed Buddha then addressed the venerable Cāraka: "Cāraka, is it true that you made robes for a nun who is not a blood-relation?" He replied: "Blessed One, I confess it." The blessed Buddha censured what is not the manner of a contemplative, what is not fitting, what is not proper, what does not accord with the rule, saying: "This is not something that one who has gone forth should do." Then, having censured this in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, since the ten benefits are clearly seen, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and so forth, just as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk makes a robe for a nun who is not a blood-relation commits a transgression.

As for the word 'whatever monk' — this means Cāraka, or any other who is of that sort. As for the word 'nun' — this means one who belongs to this Dharma community. As for 'not a blood-relation' — grandmother and grandfather down to the seventh cousin are blood-relations; beyond that they are not blood-relations. As for the word 'robe' — any one of the seven kinds: woolen cloth, linen cloth, rough cotton, fine cotton, soft wool, hemp cloth, and silk. As for 'makes' — this means sewing. As for 'commits a transgression' — it causes burning, it causes scalding, it causes falling into the hells, into the animal realm, into the hungry ghost realm of evil destinies, and into lower realms of misfortune. Furthermore, as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs wholesome qualities. It is for this reason that it is said to be a transgression.

How does one come to transgress? If a monk, perceiving a nun who is not a blood-relation as not being a blood-relation, makes a robe for her, a transgression is incurred. If a monk, with doubt in his mind, makes a robe for a nun who is not a blood-relation, a transgression is incurred. If a monk, perceiving a nun who is a blood-relation as not being a blood-relation, makes a robe for her, a misdeed is incurred. If a monk, with doubt in his mind about a nun who is a blood-relation, makes a robe for her, a misdeed is incurred. For one who is a first offender, for one who is deranged, for one whose mind is disturbed, and for one afflicted by pain, there is no transgression.

The twenty-fifth transgression concerning making robes is complete.

The blessed Buddha was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The six groups said: "These friends Nandika and Upanandika, who go about with black begging bowls whose feet are smeared with monkey fat — when they go out, they acquire gains; when people come to them, they acquire sudden gains, and they also become pleasing and agreeable to many people. We, by contrast, are like tortoises in a dry well: we go nowhere, no one comes to us from anywhere, and so we obtain no gains, and people find us neither pleasing nor agreeable. So let us go too." "Where shall we go?" "Let us go on a country tour. Let us visit the sisters." So early in the morning they put on their lower robes, took their bowls and outer robes, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Then they went to the nuns' rains-retreat residence, approached the group of twelve, and said: "Sisters, look after us — we are going on a country tour." At this the nuns wept. The six groups said: "Sisters, why do you weep? If you leave on a country tour, the Jeta Grove will become empty for us." The six groups said: "Sisters, the Blessed One dwells there with a retinue of twelve hundred and fifty — would you really say the Jeta Grove will become empty for us?" The nuns replied: "When we do not even wish to see those monks with their black bowls coming, offering their seats, or teaching the Dharma, how could it be otherwise?" Nandika said: "Sisters, then let us all go together." Upanandika said: "Is it proper for nuns to travel together with monks?" Nandika said: "It is perfectly proper, entirely proper — where has it been forbidden, and by whom? Prepare plenty of provisions for the road." They prepared plenty of provisions for the road.

The six groups, early in the morning, put on their lower robes, took their bowls and outer robes, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Having completed their alms round in Śrāvastī, they went to the nuns' rains-retreat residence, and there the group of twelve said to them: "Reverend ones, please come and eat." As the monks kept borrowing food from them, the nuns ate up all the provisions they had prepared for the journey. Then the monks said: "Sisters, please see how many provisions you had prepared." The nuns said: "Those were the very things you consumed." The six groups said: "How can such a small amount of provisions suffice for a country tour? On the road you will become especially hungry — prepare more provisions." The nuns prepared more provisions, and then set out on the country tour together with the six groups.

Now a mendicant also set out on the country tour with them. The monks said to him: "These mendicants are of bad conduct and engage in bad behaviour — do not travel on the country tour with them. It will bring you into ill repute." The mendicant replied: "I am a man of advanced years. I receive nothing from these people — no transmission of scripture, no reading, no recitation, no thorough questioning, no meditation practice, no mental training of any kind. What use are they to me?" And with those words he dismissed what they said as meaningless, and set out on the country tour together with the six groups.

When they had gone beyond the boundaries of the settlement, the monks said: "Nanda, Nandika — let us, for as long as we can, travel under the guise of others' behavior. Come, let us travel under the guise of our own proper behavior." So first Nanda sat down, then Nandā sat beside him, then the monk who was Nanda's companion sat, then the nun who was Nandā's companion sat, then Nanda's novice sat, then Nandā's novice sat. In the same way Nandika, together with Gupta-nandā and the others, were arranged in paired order, and they proceeded.

Now a brahmin was traveling in that direction. Seeing them, he understood: "This one is a renunciant, this is his wife, this is his son, this is his daughter-in-law, this is his grandson, and this is his grandson's wife." When Nandika heard this, he said: "You poor wretch — a yoke-pin is pressing down on your head! This is not my wife, this is not his son —"

"This is not his daughter-in-law — this is my grandson, and this is my grandson's wife." The monk who was collecting alms thought to himself: "It would be better to die than to go wandering about on the road together with these people of the group of six who practice all manner of misconduct." He then turned back and went to the Jeta Grove.

When the monks saw him, they said: "Venerable, how was your journey? How comfortable was the travel?" He said: "Venerables, the group of six who practice all manner of misconduct cause damage by means of transgressions that bring ruin upon the Blessed One's teaching." What had happened? He then recounted the matter in full to the monks. Those monks of few wishes censured, rebuked, spread word abroad, and complained, saying: "Why do monks engage the road in harmony with nuns, having joined their purposes

Then on that occasion the monks reported it to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident and on account of this basis, convened the assembly of monks, and so forth, just as before. "The blessed buddhas, the Bhagavāns, though knowing, ask" — and so forth, just as before.

The Blessed One then questioned the group of six: "Is it true, monks, that you have joined your purposes together with nuns and engaged the road in harmony with them?" "It is true, Blessed One." The Blessed One declared: "That which is contrary to the conduct of a wandering ascetic, discordant with it, improper, and inconsistent with propriety — this is not to be done by those who have gone forth." And he rebuked them.

Then, having rebuked them through numerous synonyms, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, having seen ten benefits in their fullness, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya shall be established" — and so forth, just as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: 'Whatever monk engages the road in harmony with a nun, having joined his purpose together with hers, commits a transgression.'" Thus the Blessed One established that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A large number of nuns at Rājagṛha had undertaken the rains retreat in the nuns' rains-retreat dwelling at the king's pleasure grove. When the three months of the rains season had passed, they set out to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One at Śrāvastī, and they began to seek a traveling companion for the journey to Śrāvastī. When they found a traveling companion that included a monk, they said: "Sisters, this traveling companion includes a monk. We should seek another companion without a monk." They began to seek another companion without a monk, but after searching for a long time they could not find a traveling companion without a monk. So they said: "Sisters, even if we were to wait a very long time, we will find no traveling companion without a monk. Let us proceed with this very companion, keeping only to the fore." And they set off with that companion, walking just ahead.

That companion traveled very far ahead. As the nuns were following behind, they were set upon by bandits, and eventually they arrived at Śrāvastī and came to the nuns' rains-retreat dwelling. When the nuns there saw them, they said: "Sisters, how was your journey? How comfortable was the travel?"

"Sisters, we were attacked by bandits."

"Sisters, just as the Blessed One has fully sent us forth, even those ninety-six wondrous ones have never fully sent forth any woman into the world." When this was said, the nuns reported the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, except in a time of necessity."

When monks and nuns traveling together as companions were afflicted with shortage of alms-food, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Provisions for the road are to be sent." When the Blessed One had declared that provisions for the road were to be sent, they did not know by whom to send them, and the Blessed One declared: "A novice monk is to send them. If there is no novice monk, a novice nun is to send them. If there is no novice nun, then the monks are to send provisions for the road to the nuns, and the nuns are to send provisions for the road to the monks. The monks are to instruct the nuns in receiving; and the nuns are to instruct the monks in receiving."

When monks were traveling on a journey and fell ill, and the nuns abandoned them and went on, the Blessed One declared: "Nuns must also carry the monks." When the nuns were holding the monks by the foot-side and the monks were holding the nuns by the head-side, attachment arose among the nuns, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks are to hold from the foot-side, and nuns are to hold from the head-side."

When they had arrived in a village and all remained there, they became afflicted with shortage of alms-food. The Blessed One declared: "Not all are to remain; medicine and food there are to be prepared well, one monk is to be left behind, and the rest are to set out. The same applies equally to the nuns."

Thereupon the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire the training, who have respect for the training, and who embrace the training as their resource, and then addressed the monks with words endowed with qualities consonant with this, abundant in this, and appropriate to this, and declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, what was prescribed before was a rule, and this is a permission. Let my hearers proclaim this as the training-basis in the Vinaya: a monk who, having arranged to travel together with a group of nuns as companions, sets out on a journey — except in a time of necessity — commits a transgression. The time of necessity is this: it is a road that is known to require traveling with companions and is known to be dangerous, or is known to be frightening due to various perils. In such a case, that is the time of necessity.

"As for the phrase 'a monk' — this refers to the Group of Six or any other such person. 'Together with nuns as companions' means those of this same Dharma community. 'Having arranged' means having given a signal. 'On a journey' means on a road through the wilderness. 'Sets out' means goes. 'Except in a time of necessity' means setting aside the time of necessity. 'Commits a transgression' means it scorches, sears, and causes one to fall into the hells as a sentient being, into the animal realm, into the wretched realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower realms, into the state of ruin."

Furthermore, as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs one's wholesome qualities. It is for this reason that it is said to be a transgression.

As for the time of necessity mentioned there: the phrase "to travel with a shared purpose" means that one cannot travel without a shared purpose. The phrase "known to be accompanied by suspicion" means known to be feared because of thieves and deceivers. The phrase "known to be accompanied by danger" means known to be feared because of lions, tigers, and bears. The phrase "known to be accompanied by the kind of danger that is frightening on account of various different dangers" means known to be accompanied by the kind of danger that is frightening on account of various different dangers such as mosquitoes, long-beaked insects, wind, sun, and venomous snakes.

Now, how does the transgression occur? If a monk sets out together with nuns as companions with even the slightest shared purpose and enters upon a journey, an offense is incurred at every half league, and a transgression is committed at every full league. If a monk sets out together with nuns as companions and enters upon a journey from a village to a monastery, an offense is incurred at every half league of the seven intervals measured by a village league, and a transgression is committed at every full league. If a monk sets out together with nuns as companions and enters upon a journey from a monastery to a village, an offense is incurred at every half league of the seven intervals measured by a village league, and a transgression is committed at every full league.

There is no transgression for one who is a first-time offender, for one who is mentally disturbed, for one whose mind is agitated, or for one afflicted by painful sensations.

The twenty-sixth transgression, concerning setting out on a journey together with a nun, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Group of Six said: "Friends, Upananda — these ones with their black bowls, their feet smeared with monkey grease — when they go out they manage to acquire gains, and when they come back they acquire unexpected gains as well, and many people become pleased and delighted with them. We, by contrast, are like turtles in a dry well: we go nowhere and come from nowhere, so how could we ever acquire gains and have many people be pleased and delighted with us? We too shall go out. Where shall we go? We shall go wandering through the provinces. Look, sisters!" And so, early in the morning, having put on their lower robes and taken up their bowls and outer robes, they entered Śrāvastī on alms round, then went to the nuns' rains-retreat quarters and, going among the assembly of the twelve groups, said: "Sisters, look at us — we are going wandering through the provinces." The nuns wept. The Group of Six said: "Sisters, why are you crying? If you go wandering through the provinces, the Jeta Grove will become empty for us." The Group of Six said: "Sisters, the Blessed One resides there with a retinue of twelve hundred and fifty. Are you really saying the Jeta Grove will become empty for us?" The nuns said: "You ones with the black bowls — we do not even enjoy seeing you. Why would we look forward to your coming, offering seats, and teaching the Dharma?" Upananda said: "Sisters, then let us go together." They replied: "Has not the Blessed One laid down the training rule that it is a transgression for a monk to set out on a journey together with nuns as companions, except in a time of necessity?" Upananda said: "That rule was laid down for travel by land; we shall go by boat." Bhaddā Moggallanā said:

Bhaddā Moggallanā said: "Is it proper for nuns to travel by boat together with monks?" Upananda replied: "Perfectly proper. Entirely proper. Where has it been prohibited? Who prohibited it? Prepare plenty of provisions for the journey." They prepared plenty of provisions for the journey.

The group of six monks, early in the morning, put on their lower robes, took up their bowls and outer robes, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Having made their alms round in Śrāvastī, they went to the nuns' rains-retreat quarters. The group of twelve nuns said to them: "Please, masters, lend us a little food." When those nuns lent them food, the monks ate all the provisions the nuns had prepared for the journey. Then the monks said: "Sisters, check and see how many provisions you have prepared for the journey." The nuns replied: "They are the ones you asked for." The group of six said: "How can that much food suffice for travel through the provinces? You will go quite hungry along the road — prepare many more provisions for the journey." The nuns prepared many more provisions and set out to travel through the provinces together with the group of six.

Now a certain mendicant who was also going that way along with them, having observed them, came to understand: "This is the monk, this is his wife, this is his son, this is his daughter-in-law, this is his grandson, and this is his grandson's wife." Upananda overheard this and said: "You pauper — I'll press your skull down with my knee and say: this is my wife, this is my son, this is my daughter-in-law, this is my grandson, and this is my grandson's wife."

A certain wandering mendicant also set out to travel through the provinces together with them. The monks said to him: "These wandering mendicants (parivrājakas) here are of corrupt conduct — do not travel through the provinces with them. It would be too much for you." The mendicant said: "I am old, and I cannot get from them even a little recitation of scripture, reading, oral instruction, thorough questioning, meditation practice, or mental cultivation — what possible use am I to them?" And with those words he dismissed their talk and embarked on a boat together with the group of six.

When they had gone beyond the boundary markers, the monks said: "Dear Upananda, for as long as we are on the way, let us follow the conduct of others. Come, when we return let us follow our own conduct." They arranged it as follows: first Nanda sat, then Nandā, then Nanda's companion, then Nandā's companion, then Nanda's novice, then Nandā's novice nun. In the same way, Upananda together with Sthūlanandā and the others were arranged in alternating pairs and set off.

The other wandering mendicant who was travelling with them saw this and said: "I recognize now: this is the monk, this is his wife, this is his son, this is his daughter-in-law, this is his grandson, and this is his grandson's wife." Upananda heard this and said: "You pauper — I'll press your skull down with my knee and say: this is my wife, this is my son, this is my daughter-in-law, this is my grandson, and this is my grandson's wife."

The mendicant thought to himself: "Better I should die than travel by boat with these ones who practise utter depravity." He therefore turned back and went to the Jeta Grove.

When the monks saw him, they said: "Venerable ones, did the mendicant travel comfortably? Venerable ones, how did he travel comfortably? The fully depraved group of six, through the transgression of defilement, ruin the teaching of the Blessed One." What was done? At that point he explained it fully to the monks. Those few monks of modest desires thereupon censured, upbraided, and rebuked them, asking: "Why do the monks travel together as companions of the nuns who share their destination and board a single boat?" That occasion moved the monks to present the matter before the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence and this occasion, convened an assembly of monks, and so forth, as before. "The Blessed Buddhas, though knowing, act as though they do not know" — and so forth, as before. The Blessed Buddha questioned the group of six: "Monks, is it true that you traveled together as companions of nuns who shared your destination and boarded a single boat?" "It is true, Blessed One." The Blessed Buddha censured them: "That is not the conduct of a renunciant, it is not fitting, it is not proper, it is not in accordance with the discipline. This is not something one who has gone forth should do." And so he censured them. Then, having censured them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing these ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya should be established" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk travels as a companion of nuns who share his destination and boards a single boat, going upstream or downstream, commits a transgression." Thus did the Blessed One establish that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, a certain householder had a temple built across the river for the sake of the Saṅgha, in the garden on the far bank by the riverside, and having done so he invited both communities of the Saṅgha to come and consecrate it. A certain nun who was earnestly devoted to what is wholesome thought to herself: "Today I need not go out for alms. Until midday approaches, I shall apply myself to what is wholesome, and after that, knowing the right time, I will go." Having applied herself to what is wholesome until midday was near, she then, knowing the right time, went to the bank of the river. By then the monks had already boarded the boat, and the boatman said to her: "Noble one, board the boat." She replied: "Good sir, please go ahead; I will go on another boat when it is loaded." The boatman came back again and again, saying: "Noble one, board the boat." And she replied again: "Good sir, please go ahead; I will go on another boat when it is loaded." The boatman departed and, having poled the boat across the river, entered into the midst of a large crowd and sat there. The nun called out to him again and again, but the boatman gave her no reply, and she remained there waiting. When midday had passed, she returned to the summer dwelling and, for as long as vigor had not left her body, she applied herself to what is wholesome. When her bodily vigor was spent, she lay down to rest. The nuns then arrived and said to her: "Noble one, is it perhaps that you think the food belongs to another, or that the meal belongs to another?" She asked: "What happened?" "You lay down to rest — and for as long as you lay resting, the food was eaten." "Who ate it?" "You did." "She did not eat it." "Then why did you lie down to rest?" She then recounted the circumstances in detail to the nuns, and the nuns reported the matter to the monks. The monks presented it before the Blessed One, and the Blessed One said: "Monks, therefore, crossing straight across is excepted." Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire training, who are respectful toward training, who are content with the requisites of training, and addressed the monks with words appropriate to this and consistent with it, saying:

Then, having spoken words of praise appropriate to this and consistent with it, the Blessed One addressed the monks, saying: "Monks, therefore, the earlier rule stands as a rule, and this is permitted. My hearers are to promulgate this as the basis of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, having made arrangements together with a nun who shares his aim, and having boarded the same boat, travels upstream or downstream — excepting crossing straight across — commits a transgression.

Now, 'whatever monk' means one of the group of six, or any other of that kind. 'A nun who shares his aim' means one who is of this teaching. 'Having made arrangements' means having agreed by signal. 'The same boat' means a flat-bottomed vessel, a canoe, or a vessel with a prow. 'Having boarded' means having embarked. 'Travels upstream' means going in the direction opposite the current. 'Travels downstream' means going in the direction of the current. 'Excepting crossing straight across' means that crossing straight across is set aside. 'Commits a transgression' means that it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinies — the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, evil rebirths, and states of perdition. Furthermore, for as long as the transgression is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome factors of the Dharma. That is why it is said to commit a transgression.

How does the transgression accrue? For every half league that a monk, having made arrangements together with a nun who shares his aim, boards the same boat and travels upstream or downstream, he incurs a misdeed; and for every full league, a transgression.

If a monk, having made arrangements together with a nun who shares his aim, boards the same boat and travels from a village to a wilderness, then for each half league of the seven intervals measured by the distance of a village, he incurs a misdeed; and for every full league, a transgression.

If a monk, having made arrangements together with a nun who shares his aim, boards the same boat and travels from a wilderness to a village, then for each half league of the seven intervals not divided by the distance of a village, he incurs a misdeed; and for every full league, a transgression.

There is no transgression in the case of one who veers off from turbulent water, veers off from a place where the light is cut off, veers off from whirlpools, where the rudder has broken, where the mast has broken, or where the helmsman will not obey instructions. There is no transgression if either bank is nearby with any one of the eight impediments at hand. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, who is insane, whose mind is disturbed, or who is overcome by pain.

The twenty-seventh transgression making rule concerning boarding a boat together with a nun is complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. Then the venerable Udāyin, having dressed in the morning, took up his bowl and robe and entered Śrāvastī for alms. As he wandered through Śrāvastī on alms-round in due order, he came to the house of the householder's wife Bhadā. The householder's wife Bhadā saw the venerable Udāyin from a great distance, and seeing him she prepared a seat for the venerable Udāyin and spoke these words: "Venerable Udāyin, come here! Welcome, venerable Udāyin! Venerable Udāyin, please be seated on the seat that has been prepared." The venerable Udāyin looked inside and sat down.

The householder's wife Bhadā likewise prostrated herself at the feet of the venerable Udāyin, then sat down facing away from him. Udāyin taught her the Dharma to such and such an extent, and then he began to recall their former conversations, their flirtations, their pleasures, and the enjoyments they had shared together: "Bhadā, do you remember how the two of us spent time in such and such a pleasure grove, such and such a meeting place, such and such a divine dwelling — how we wore such and such fine clothes, how we ate such and such foods, how we drank such and such drinks, how such and such a bed was spread out, how such and such an oil lamp was lit, and how the two of us did such and such things there?" Bhadā replied, "I remember."

Now, an almsman who had come on his morning alms-round, his robe arranged and bowl and outer robe in hand, had entered Śrāvastī for alms. As he was going through Śrāvastī on his alms-round in due order, he came to the very house of the householder's wife Bhadā. The householder's wife Bhadā saw him, and she thought: "If I were to rise and offer alms, I would lose the venerable Udāyin's discourse." So she waved him away with her hand. When Udāyin saw Bhadā gesturing with her hand, he said to her: "Bhadā, while I am sitting right here before you, are you making hand signals to another man?" Bhadā replied: "Noble one, I was not signaling to another man. An almsman has arrived and I thought: if I were to rise and offer alms, I would lose the noble one's words — so I gestured to him to go on." Udāyin said: "Bhadā, do you really think I have been speaking to you in your heart about the Four Noble Truths? It is like this: if I were to obtain a hundred pleasures through the work of my own hands, could you not then give gifts and make merit?" Bhadā called the almsman back, and filling his bowl with clean and pure provisions and food, she gave it to him, and he took it and departed.

The venerable Udāyin, having finished the business of his meal, went to the assembly hall. The almsman thought: "I will speak to the venerable Udāyin and, upon hearing him, generate the highest joy." So he said to him: "Venerable Udāyin, rejoice! Today I have eaten your alms-food." The almsman said: "You know — did she call you first, or did she signal you to go away with her hand, and then I caused her to call you back afterwards?" "What did she give?" "She filled the bowl with clean and pure provisions and food and gave it. Venerable Udāyin, that is yours." Then the venerable Udāyin remained as he had been sitting. "While you were alone with a woman, in a secluded private place, sitting on a seat — perhaps it was proper, perhaps it was not, perhaps it was improper yet still possible — I was sitting there like that. Almsman, today you ate my alms-food; if you cannot bear it, let a rule of training appear to have been laid down through me — do you think I simply cast it aside?" At that point he told the monks what had occurred, and the monks of few desires rebuked him: "Why do monks sit alone in a secluded private place with a woman?" They criticized him, spread word of it, and spoke against it. Then the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, on account of this basis of rule, and on this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth as before.

"The Blessed Ones, the buddhas, knowing, do such and such" — and so forth, as before. The Blessed One said to the venerable Cāraka: "Cāraka, is it true that you sat alone together with a woman in a secluded private place that was sheltered?" "Indeed so, O Blessed One." The Blessed One censured him, saying that this was unworthy of a renunciant, was not in accord with propriety, was not fitting, was not in keeping with proper conduct, and was not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Then the Blessed One, having censured him in many ways, spoke to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing fully ten benefits, I shall lay down a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before — "and my hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk sits alone together with a woman in a secluded private place that is sheltered, it is a transgression."

Now, "whatever monk" means Cāraka or anyone else of that kind. "With a woman" means a woman, or a girl, one who can bear the characteristic factor that arises from improper conduct. "Together" means in her company. "Alone" means just the two of them. "Secluded" means a place where no other woman, man, or eunuch is present. "Sheltered" means sheltered by one of five things: sheltered by a wall, sheltered by a screen, sheltered by a curtain, sheltered by dense foliage, or sheltered by darkness. "Sitting" means on a seat, that is, upon a surface. "Sits" means places his buttocks within the span of one fathom.

"It is a transgression" means it causes burning, scorching, and falling into bad destinations — hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, lower realms, and states of ruin. Moreover, as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities; therefore it is called a transgression.

As to how the transgression comes about: however slightly a monk sits alone together with a woman in a secluded private place that is sheltered, in every case it becomes a transgression. Sitting in a doorway, entering under a curtain, sitting without the door being shut, or when some are entering and others are leaving — in those cases there is no transgression. There is no transgression for a first offender, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations. The twenty-eighth transgression concerning sitting alone is complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At a time when a female attendant had gone forth and was acting as the duty officer, the nuns in the morning, having dressed and taken their bowls and robes, went out for alms. The female attendant sat in the temple sweeping and cleaning. The venerable Cāraka also in the morning, having dressed and taken his bowl and robes, entered Śrāvastī for alms, and while wandering for alms in Śrāvastī he went to the place where the nuns' summer residence was. The female attendant, who was sweeping in the nuns' summer residence, saw the venerable Cāraka from a considerable distance, and upon seeing him she spoke thus:

"Welcome, noble Cāraka, welcome!" she said, and setting her broom to one side, she prostrated at the feet of the venerable Cāraka and stood before him. Cāraka then taught her the Dharma to some fitting degree, and they began to recall former conversations, jests, pleasures, and enjoyments they had shared. "Do you remember, attendant, how you arranged our lodgings in such-and-such a park, assembly hall, and divine dwelling, wearing such-and-such garments, eating such-and-such food, drinking such-and-such drink, arranging such-and-such bedding, lighting such-and-such lamps of grain-oil, and how the two of us did such-and-such things there?" The attendant replied, "I remember."

Now there was an elderly sick nun who was sitting there, and she thought to herself: why are these two, even though they have not yet been taken as bride and groom, speaking to each other in this way?

The attendant then said, "Noble one, please go now. The nuns are about to arrive, and since the summer residence has not yet been swept, the nuns will reproach me." She took up her broom and Cāraka departed. The attendant then began to sweep the temple. When the nuns returned and saw this, they said to her: "Attendant, how is it that you have swept this summer residence so thoroughly?" The attendant replied, "Sisters, from the moment you went for alms until now, she has not been sitting on the ground." The elderly sick nun heard this and said to the nuns: "It is true that the attendant was not sitting on the ground from the moment you went for alms until now — for the noble Cāraka had come, and she was standing with him, and even though they have not yet been taken as bride and groom, they were speaking to one another."

The nuns then asked the attendant, "Attendant, is it true that you did this?" "Sisters, it is true." The nuns then rebuked her, saying, "Why does a monk stand alone with a nun in a secluded place apart from others?" — censuring her, denouncing her, and spreading the word. Those nuns then reported the matter to the monks, and those monks of few wants, asking why a monk would stand alone with a nun in a secluded place apart from others — censuring, denouncing, and spreading the word — reported it to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then, on account of this incident and this occasion and in this context, convened the community of monks, and so forth, just as before. "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, ask" — and so forth, also as before. The awakened Blessed One then asked the venerable Cāraka: "Cāraka, is it true that you were standing alone with a nun in a secluded place apart from others?" "Blessed One, it is so." The awakened Blessed One then rebuked him, saying that what is not in accord with the conduct of a renunciant, not fitting, not proper, not in keeping with the training — that is not something one who has gone forth should do. The Blessed One then rebuked him in many ways, and having done so, declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, just as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk stands alone with a nun in a secluded place apart from others commits a transgression."

"Whatever monk" refers to Śārcā or any other of that kind. "With a nun" refers to one who belongs to this very Dharma. "Together" means together with that one. "Alone with one" means with that specific one. "Secluded" means a place where there is no other man, woman, or person of indeterminate sex. "In a sheltered place" means sheltered by one of five things: sheltered by a wall, sheltered by a screen, sheltered by a curtain, sheltered by something dense, or sheltered by darkness. "Stands" means stands within the distance of one outstretched arm. "Commits a transgression" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinations of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, and those who have fallen wrongly into lower states of existence. Furthermore, for as long as the transgression remains unconfessed and has not been individually confessed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — and therefore it is said to "commit a transgression."

As to how a transgression comes about in this: whenever a monk stands, however briefly, alone in a sheltered secluded place together with a nun, in every such case a transgression is committed. However, if one stands in a doorway, enters to take medicine, stands without closing the door, or while some persons are entering and others are leaving, there is no transgression. There is likewise no transgression for one who is a beginner, who is insane, who is mentally disturbed, or who is afflicted by physical sensations.

The twenty-ninth transgression involving standing alone is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, the venerable Mahākāśyapa was in Śrāvastī, dwelling in Mṛgāramāṭṛ's mansion in the eastern garden. Then the venerable Mahākāśyapa rose from his sitting, putting away his grinding stone, and went to where the Blessed One was. Having gone there, he prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Mahākāśyapa as follows: "Kāśyapa, you are now old, aged, and advanced in years. These hempen lower robes and rags from the rubbish heap that you wear are heavy. Kāśyapa, come to the Saṅgha's assembly hall, and those who are invited as guests by individual persons — take those invitations for yourself. As for the cloth dyed with woad by householders, let that become of inferior color and worn out." The venerable Mahākāśyapa said nothing and accepted the word of the Blessed One.

Then the venerable Mahākāśyapa, rejoicing in and delighting at the words the Blessed One had spoken, prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One and departed.

Now at that time, there was a certain householder in Śrāvastī in whom this aspiration had long arisen: "Ah, if only I could invite the elder, the venerable Mahākāśyapa, honored by gods and humans, to another home and offer him a meal — how fitting that would be!" That householder then heard that the Blessed One had entrusted the noble Mahākāśyapa to the Saṅgha. Having heard this, he went to where the venerable Mahākāśyapa was, and having arrived, prostrated with his head at the feet of the venerable Mahākāśyapa and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Mahākāśyapa instructed that householder thoroughly with a Dharmic discourse, established him firmly in it, encouraged him rightly, and gladdened him fully. Having in many ways instructed, established, encouraged, and gladdened him thoroughly with a Dharmic discourse, he fell silent. Then that householder thought to himself:

"If I were to invite the noble Mahākāśyapa alone to another household, there might well be a situation where he would not consent. Therefore, I shall invite him together with three others and myself, making four."

Then that householder rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, turned toward the venerable Mahākāśyapa, joined his palms in reverence, made a bow, and spoke these words to the venerable Mahākāśyapa: "May the noble Mahākāśyapa graciously consent to come to my dwelling tomorrow at noon, together with three others and himself, making four." The venerable Mahākāśyapa, without saying a word, consented to that householder's request by his silence. Then that householder, understanding that the venerable Mahākāśyapa had consented through his silence, prostrated with his head at the feet of the venerable Mahākāśyapa, went to his own dwelling, and said to his wife: "My good woman, there has arisen in me for a long time a wish of this kind: 'How wonderful it would be if I were to invite the elder Mahākāśyapa — honored by gods and humans — to another house and offer him a meal!' And so tomorrow I have invited him, together with three others, to another house at noon, and he has consented through his silence. Therefore prepare a great abundance of food and drink."

That householder's wife, having heard this from the householder, prepared whatever foods were to be served cold on that very day, and whatever foods were to be served warm she prepared the following morning. The householder then rose early in the morning and thought: "If seats are arranged on the lower level of the floor, when the mendicants come and go they will be disturbed by the stirring of dust. If seats are arranged on the upper level, they will be troubled there by flies swarming about them. Therefore, let seats be arranged on the middle level." Having thought this, he arranged seats on the middle level and sent word to the venerable Mahākāśyapa, urging him: "Venerable Mahākāśyapa, if you would be so kind as to come as invited at noon, please know that the time has now arrived."

The Blessed One had declared that one should go at the time agreed upon by the one who extended the invitation. So the venerable Mahākāśyapa, early in the morning, put on his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and outer robe, went to that householder's dwelling, ascended to the middle level, and sat down upon the seat that had been prepared there. Then that householder prostrated with his head at the feet of the venerable Mahākāśyapa and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Mahākāśyapa instructed that householder thoroughly with a Dharmic discourse, established him firmly in it, encouraged him rightly, and gladdened him fully.

Then the nun Sthūlanandā, in the early morning, put on her lower robe, took up her alms bowl and outer robe, entered Śrāvastī for alms, and as she went about collecting alms in due order she entered that very house and spoke these words: "O auspicious and healthy one, please give alms."

That householder said: "Noble lady, today the noble Mahākāśyapa — honored by gods and humans — has been invited to my dwelling, and a meal has been prepared for him. Please come back a little later."

Sthūlanandā replied: "He is one who went forth from among other non-Buddhists — the most given away, the most inferior of those given away. As for me, I went forth from among the Śākya women, I possess the three scriptural collections, I preach the Dharma, and I am endowed with the eloquence of reasoning and liberation. You are feeding that one and not giving alms to me?"

When the venerable Mahākāśyapa heard this, he thought: "If much demerit were to arise in him on account of this, that would not be right." And so he cleared his throat.

Since the venerable Mahākāśyapa possessed a voice resonant as a great bell, its sound filled the entire house. When Sthūlanandā heard that voice, she said: "The one called 'Nāga' is right here."

Upon hearing this, the householder said: "So now it turns out that this is the very one who went forth from among other non-Buddhists — the most given away, the most inferior of those given away — and now he is being called 'the one named Nāga.'" Scolding her in this way, he began to descend from the middle floor. Sthūlanandā, hearing the sound of his footsteps coming down — thud, thud — thought: "If this householder descends with such force, he will surely do me harm." Terrified, her arms hanging limp, she began to flee. The householder called out: "Shaven-headed śramaṇī! Nun! Elder among nuns! Do not run — stay where you are! Why are you fleeing? You shall not enter my house again." Sthūlanandā replied: "May your house become a mud-hole and a prison! May outcastes enter your house! We nuns have received from the king the right to complete immunity through the queen's retinue. To whatever extent anyone lays a hand on us, to that same extent she will have both his hands cut off at the wrists." The householder replied: "Shaven-headed śramaṇī! Nuns, elder nuns — it is the nuns who have received from the king the right to immunity through the queen's retinue. You, who practice every kind of bad conduct, have not received it."

Then the householder turned back and, with clean and excellent food and drink, satisfied and sustained the venerable Mahākāśyapa with his own hands. In many ways he satisfied and sustained him with clean and excellent food and drink, and having served him thus, when he understood that the venerable Mahākāśyapa had finished eating and had washed his hands and set down the bowl, he took a low seat and sat before the venerable Mahākāśyapa in order to hear the Dharma.

Then the venerable Mahākāśyapa duly instructed that householder with talk endowed with Dharma, duly guided him, duly encouraged him, and duly gladdened him. Having in many ways duly instructed, guided, encouraged, and gladdened him with talk endowed with Dharma, he rose from his seat and departed.

He went to where the Blessed One was, and arriving there, he bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Mahākāśyapa addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"Venerable Blessed One, today, because I had been assigned by you to the Saṅgha, today I was called 'one who went forth from among other non-Buddhists, the most given away, the most inferior of those given away,' and today I was also called 'the one named Nāga.' Venerable One, for a long time I have been a forest-dweller, and I have also spoken in praise of forest-dwelling; I have been an alms-round practitioner, and I have also spoken in praise of the alms-round; I have been one who wears rag-robles, and I have also spoken in praise of wearing rag-robles. Kāśyapa, if you truly see the purpose in it, then while being a forest-dweller, praise forest-dwelling; while being an alms-round practitioner, praise the alms-round; while being one who wears rag-robles, praise wearing rag-robles. Venerable One, there are two reasons: for my own well-being in this life, and —"

— and so that it may serve as a light for people of future generations. Those elder monks who went forth long ago, who practised the holy life purely, who were praised by the Teacher, who were skilled in the conduct befitting the holy life and were revered by the wise — those who are now passed away — they long ago became forest-dwellers and also spoke praise of forest-dwelling; they became alms-round practitioners and also spoke praise of the alms-round; they became wearers of rag-robles and also spoke praise of wearing rag-robles. Hearing of them and of what they did in that way, people will strive to practise accordingly, and it will bring them long-term benefit, healing, and happiness. Kāśyapa, it is excellent, excellent, that you have long been engaged in benefiting the many, in bringing happiness to the many, in showing compassion to the world, and in working for the welfare and happiness of gods and humans. Kāśyapa, whoever speaks dispraise of those qualities of training that someone has cultivated is speaking dispraise of me; and whoever speaks praise of those qualities of training that someone has cultivated is speaking praise of me. And why is that? Because I have long honoured, esteemed, praised, and highly extolled those very qualities of training. Therefore, Kāśyapa, since you are a forest-dweller, speak praise of forest-dwelling; since you are an alms-round practitioner, speak praise of the alms-round; since you are a wearer of rag-robles, speak praise of wearing rag-robles. Kāśyapa, you should train in this way."

This much occurred at that time; the Blessed One, the buddha, had not yet at this time established a rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga, the fiftieth fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A time of scarcity arose, and faithful brahmins and householders arranged alms for the elder monks, monk by monk. The group of six monks, in the early morning, having arranged their robes and taken up their bowls and monastic robes, entered Śrāvastī for alms and went to the households of the twelve groups. Those households said, "Noble ones, please be seated and receive your meal. Who will give?" They replied, "We will provide it. Who will give tomorrow?" Again they said, "We will provide it." The group of six monks then said, "Sisters, that alone is not enough for us to live on. It is like this: the faithful brahmins and householders who arranged alms for the elder monks — if you were to arrange for those provisions to be diverted to us, then we could live." The nun Sthulanandā said, "Noble ones, is it proper to do so?" The group of six monks replied, "Are we to starve and die? It is perfectly proper. It is entirely fitting." Then where was it prohibited? And by whom was it prohibited?

Thereupon the nun Sthulanandā, in the early morning, having arranged her robes and taken up her bowl and monastic robe, entered Śrāvastī for alms and went to the house where the venerable Ājñāta Kauṇḍinya's alms had been arranged, and said these words: "For whom have you arranged alms?" They replied, "Noble lady, for the venerable Ājñāta Kauṇḍinya." Sthulanandā said, "You would gain far greater merit if you arranged alms for one who went forth from the Śākya clan, who is possessed of the three scriptural collections, who teaches the Dharma, and who has the gift of eloquence in reasoning and in liberation." They replied, "Noble lady, one who went forth from the Śākya clan, who is possessed of the three scriptural collections, who teaches the Dharma, and who has the gift of eloquence in reasoning and in liberation — who might that be?" Sthulanandā replied, "The noble Ānanda went forth from the Śākya clan, is possessed of the three scriptural collections, teaches the Dharma, and has the gift of eloquence in reasoning and in liberation." They said, "Very well," and the alms that had been arranged for the venerable Ājñāta Kauṇḍinya were redirected and arranged for Ānanda. Similarly, all the alms that had been arranged for the elder monks were redirected and arranged for the group of six monks.

In the early morning the group of six monks donned their robes, took up their bowls and outer robes, and went into Śrāvastī for alms. When they returned carrying alms in bowls that had been claimed by others, the monks who saw this said, "Oh! The group of six monks has taken bowls that belong to others." The group of six monks said, "May the laywoman who arranged alms on our behalf be free from illness." The monks said, "Is it right for you knowingly to eat food that was arranged by a nun?" The group of six monks replied, "It might be right, or it might not be right — but are we to starve to death? Why do you monks of little account reproach us, saying that monks are eating food arranged by a nun?" And so they heaped criticism on them, reviled them, and spoke harshly. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, with this origin, and on this occasion, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and the rest follows as before. The passage beginning "The blessed buddhas knowingly inquire" also follows as before. The blessed Buddha asked the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you knowingly ate food arranged by a nun?" They replied, "Venerable One, it is true." The blessed Buddha reproved them, saying that this was not the conduct of one who has gone forth, not in accordance with proper deportment, not fitting, not in keeping with the rule, and not something that one who has gone forth ought to do. He then reproved them in many ways, and declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and the rest follows as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk knowingly eats food arranged by a nun commits a transgression."

Thus the Blessed One established that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The blessed Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In Śrāvastī there was a householder who engaged in two kinds of livelihood at the borders of his estate: trading and farming. He ploughed a field in a remote area, sowed seeds, and having made a shelter near that field and taken his provisions, he departed to another district.

A wandering almsman was travelling through the countryside. He arrived in Śrāvastī and, while wandering about there, caught sight of the shelter beside the field. He thought, "This direction is secluded and peaceful — I should stay right here." He began to stay in that very place, and having collected alms in Śrāvastī, he took up residence there.

There no human noise disturbed it, and no wild animals or birds came near. The gods, moreover, had sent rain in good season at the proper times, and so that field had become exceedingly abundant. The householder, for his part, had brought his affairs to a successful conclusion and returned home in joy and good fortune.

Then the householder stored away his goods, bathed, and ate his meal. His wife said to him, "My lord's son, you sowed seed in that remote field and then departed for another district — I wonder whether even a bare return on the seed was managed. You should go and see." The householder went there, and when he saw how extraordinarily abundant the field's harvest had become, he thought to himself, "I built no shelter here, I left not a single watchman, and yet this field has become so supremely abundant — what can be the cause?" He looked about and, catching sight of human footprints, followed them and made his way straight to the shelter. There he found a monk who lived on alms, sitting cross-legged. He thought, "It is through this one's power that the field has become so supremely abundant." He said aloud, "Noble one, are you dwelling in this shelter?" The monk replied, "Yes, householder." The householder said, "Noble one, this field is mine. Please make free use of whatever flowers, fruits, and thorn-wood you wish. And would the noble one be so good as to come to my home tomorrow to receive alms?" The monk replied, "Householder, I am one who wanders for alms alone, and I shall go only where alms are offered" — and with that he declined the invitation. The householder then bowed his head to the monk's two feet, took his leave, went to where his home was, and when he arrived he said this to his wife: "Good woman, make ready the food-vessels. The harvest of that field has become exceedingly abundant." His wife thought, "He is making excuses to me," and she said, "My lord's son, you built no shelter there and left not a single watchman — what excuse is there to be made to me?" The householder replied, "Good woman, do you think I am making excuses to you? Believe it as a fact: the harvest of that field has become exceedingly abundant." His wife asked, "For what reason?" The householder replied, "When I arrived near that field I found a monk who lives on alms sitting in the shelter, and through that one's power the field has become so supremely abundant." His wife said, "In that case, why did you not invite him to come for alms tomorrow?" The householder replied, "I did invite him, but the monk said with his own lips, 'Householder, I am one who wanders for alms alone, and I shall go only where alms are offered,' and so he declined." His wife said, "One must bow to his feet and invite him in that way." The householder replied, "Very well, then you prepare the food while I go there, bow to his feet, and invite him." He went, bowed his head to the monk's two feet, and said, "Noble one, would you be so good as to come to my home tomorrow to receive alms?" The monk replied, "Householder, I go only where alms are wandered for." The householder said, "Noble one, it would not be right for you to decline to come to my home for alms." The monk, recognizing that the householder knew how to receive him properly, said nothing further and accepted. The householder, understanding from the monk's silence that he had accepted, bowed to his feet, took his leave, went to where his home was, arrived, and spoke to his wife:

"Dear one, I have invited that alms-wandering monk to come tomorrow at midday. He accepted without a word of refusal, so please prepare clean and wholesome food in readiness." The householder's wife then prepared whatever foods were cold right away that same day, and whatever foods needed to be warmed she prepared the following morning.

When the monks who wander for alms had set out on their rounds, another alms-wanderer approached that monk and said, "Fellow alms-wanderer, come this way — I am going for alms." The monk replied, "A householder has invited me as a guest, so I know the time I must go. You go ahead." The other said, "May you be well-provided-for, alms-wanderer, and may your alms-round bring great merit. But do be mindful of the proper measure of food. As for me, I too shall be timely about it."

The nun Sthulanandā, having dressed herself in her undergarment that morning, taken her bowl and robe, and entered Śrāvastī to wander for alms, had gone gradually through her round and entered that very house, where she said, "Auspicious lady, please give alms, good and wholesome." The householder's wife said, "Noble one, I have invited an alms-wanderer and it would be wrong if he were kept waiting and his meal cut off. I am busy — please depart for now." Sthulanandā said, "If she brings that alms-wanderer along with her when she comes, will you give alms to her?" The woman replied, "Yes, I will." "And who will give to this wandering mendicant who follows behind?" "I will." "And who will give to those who guard the shrine?" "I will."

Sthulanandā then thought to herself: "The alms-wanderers have been making their rounds and will be coming back out soon, so the one now just entering must be that monk." With this thought she went and stood at the city gate. The monk himself had thought: "Today I need not wander for alms myself, so let me devote myself to the wholesome and keep to the proper time before going." Having thus minded the time, he dressed in his undergarment, took his bowl and robe, and set out to wander for alms in Śrāvastī. Sthulanandā saw him and thought, "This is that alms-wanderer." She approached and asked him, "Noble one, did Sumagadhā not invite you? Sister, she sent an invitation to you." "Noble one, I spoke your praises at that house." He replied, "Sister, did I ask you to speak my praises to anyone?" "Noble one, you gave no such instruction."

The monk thought to himself: "This food has been arranged by a nun interfering in the matter. It would be better that I cut off the meal than that I incur a transgression." So he turned back. Sthulanandā said, "Noble one, I did not enquire about your lineage, I did not enquire about your name, and yet I spoke your praises — would that not have been sufficient?" The alms-wanderer replied, "Sister, if your first statement was true, then the latter is false; and if the latter is true, then the first is false." With these words he turned back, went to the very same spot, and for as long as the glow had not left his body he devoted himself to the wholesome; and when the glow had left his body he spread out his outer robe and lay down.

Other alms-wanderers then came to him and said, "If the food belongs to someone else — do you think the stomach that holds it is also someone else's? What have you done? You could only pursue the wholesome up to a certain point, and then you ate food equal to that measure." He said, "Who ate it?" "You ate it." "I did not eat it." "Then why did you spread out your robe and lie down?"

He then gave a full account of the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, it is an offense except when previously invited to a home."

The Blessed One then spoke in praise of those who desire training, who are respectful toward training, and who are content with the provisions of training. He addressed the monks with words consonant with that theme, words in which that theme was paramount, words adorned with qualities fitting that theme, and then he declared to the monks:

"Monks, the former rule was provisional; this one is now permitted. My hearers shall recite this training rule of the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk knowingly eats food that has been prepared through the involvement of a nun — except when previously invited to a home — commits a transgression."

Now, "whatever monk" means one of the group of six, or any other person of that kind. "Knowingly" means either being aware of it himself or having been told by another. "A nun" means one belonging to this Dharma. "Prepared through involvement" refers to two kinds of involvement: involvement through moral discipline and involvement through learning. "Food" means the five kinds of hard food and the five kinds of soft food. "Eats" means when it passes down the throat. "Except when previously invited to a home" means setting aside prior invitations to a home as guests.

"Commits a transgression" means it burns, scalds, and causes one to fall into the wretched states — into the hells of sentient beings, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into misfortune, and into wrong states of falling. Furthermore, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities. Therefore it is said to be a transgression.

As for how a transgression comes about in this case, it is as follows. A number of monks had been invited as guests to another household. A nun arrived there and questioned the host: "Which monks did you invite?" "The venerable so-and-so and so-and-so and others." "What kind of food will you give?" "Threefold-enhanced rice." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should give them clean white flour." "What kind of ghee will you give?" "Goat ghee." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should give them cow's butter." "What kind of salt will you give?" "Transforming salt." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should give them rock salt, sea salt, or ocean salt." "What will you pour as a drink?" "Thick brew." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should pour them clear strained liquid." "What condiment will you give with the rice?" "Lentil broth seasoned with salt." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should pour them cooked broth, boiled broth, or yogurt soup." "What soup will you give?" "Bean-sprout broth from wild peas." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should give them bean soup, wild-legume broth, or pea broth."

"What condiment will you give with the side dish?" "Lentil broth seasoned with salt." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should give them roasted meat, grilled meat, and various kinds of meat." "What drink will you pour?" "Sugar-water." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should pour them fermented grain drink, liquorice water, or warm mild drink." "What rice porridge will you give?" "Coarse rice porridge or bran porridge." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should give them sālū-rice porridge." "What pulse broth will you pour?" "Wild-pea broth." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should pour them black-gram pulse broth." "What poultry will you give?" "Just roasted condiment." "That is not suitable. Those monks are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats; you should pour them various kinds of meat, grain-spirit condiment, yogurt, and warm milk." Having thus arranged all this, if a monk knowingly eats it, it becomes a transgression. If it is true that they are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats, there is no transgression.

Now, when a great many monks had been invited as guests to another household, a monk who had not come asked: "Which monks did you invite?" "Such-and-such elders and others." "What food did you give?" "Triple-measure rice." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should give them refined flour." "What clarified butter did you give?" "Goat clarified butter." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should give them cow butter." "What salt did you give?" "Fermented salt." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should give them rock salt, sea salt, or ocean salt." "What drink did you pour?" "Coarse drink." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should pour them strained clear drink." "What condiment did you give with the rice?" "Lentil broth seasoned with salt." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should pour them cooked broth, boiled broth, or yogurt soup." "What soup did you give?" "Wild-pea broth." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should give them grain-spirit soup, side-dish soup, or dried-pulse soup." "What condiment did you give with the side dish?" "Lentil broth seasoned with salt." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should give them roasted meat, grilled meat, and various kinds of meat." "What drink will you pour?" "Sugar-water." "That is not suitable.

"Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should pour for them flower-petal water, cardamom water, and warm soft porridge." "What kind of grain porridge did you give?" "Coarse grain porridge and husked-grain porridge." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should give them sālu rice porridge." "What legume dish did you serve?" "A legume dish of rough wild-pea broth." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should serve them a legume dish of fine wild-pea broth." "What was served as poultry?" "Boiled seasoning." "That is not suitable. Those monks are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā; you should serve

Having arranged all this, if a monk knowingly eats it, it becomes an offence. If they truly are holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā, there is no offence. There is no offence for one who is a novice, for one who is mad, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations. The offence of eating food that a nun has arranged — the thirtieth — is complete.

Summary verse: repeatedly; a single dwelling and resting place; flour and provisions and stored food; assembled and out of season and placement and the rest; swallowing from the mouth and receiving.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Rājagṛha, in the Kalandaka grove of the Bamboo Forest. The habitual practice of the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana was to travel at various times through the hell realms, to travel through the animal realm, to travel through the realm of hungry ghosts, to travel through the realm of gods, and to travel among humans. Having passed through those realms, they would come to Jambudvīpa and, to the four assemblies, they would speak of the sufferings of the beings in the hell realms — the lifting, the cutting, the slicing, the cleaving, and so on — and of the sufferings of the animals who eat one another and so on, and of the sufferings of the hungry ghosts such as hunger and thirst and so on, and of the sufferings of the gods such as death and transmigration, downfall, dispersal, and destruction and so on, and of the sufferings of humans such as seeking and craving and so on. By speaking of all these things, those among whom they were dwelling who were companions and those who were practicing the holy life but had no delight in it — those people they would take in hand and lead to where the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana were. Having arrived, they would make an effort to introduce them thoroughly to the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana, and would make an effort to instruct them rightly and thoroughly. And the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana would in turn introduce them thoroughly and instruct them rightly. When the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana had thus introduced them thoroughly and instructed them rightly, those people came to delight in the holy life and to distinguish ever-greater excellence in it. At that time, the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana were surrounded and attended upon by the four assemblies.

Then the Blessed One spoke to the Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, what is the cause, what is the condition, by which the monks Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana come to be surrounded and attended upon by the four assemblies?" "Reverend one, the habitual practice of the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana is to travel at various times through the hell realms, to travel through the animal realm, to travel through the realm of hungry ghosts, to travel through the realm of gods, and to travel among human beings. The two of them would travel through all those realms and then come to Jambudvīpa, where they would describe to the four assemblies the sufferings of hell-beings — being dragged, pierced, cut, and burned, and the like; the sufferings of animals — devouring one another, and the like; the sufferings of hungry ghosts — hunger and thirst, and the like; the sufferings of gods — death and transmigration, falling from their station, scattering, and destruction, and the like; and the sufferings of humans — striving and craving, and the like. By thus proclaiming these sufferings, they would lead those among their companions and attendants who had no delight in the holy life to the presence of the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana, and there they would present them properly for ordination and instruct them properly. And the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana would in turn properly ordain them and properly instruct them. Once they had been properly ordained and properly instructed by the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana, those persons would take delight in the holy life and would aspire to ever higher distinctions. Reverend one, that is the cause and that is the condition by which the Venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana come to be surrounded and attended upon by the four assemblies.

Ānanda, monks the like of the monk Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana — monks like Śāriputra and like the great Maudgalyāyana — do not arise in every age. It is for this reason that the Blessed One grants permission for the Wheel of the Five Sections to be painted in the gatehouse."

Then the Blessed One declared: "Let the Wheel of the Five Sections be painted in the gatehouse." But the monks did not know how it was to be painted, and the Blessed One declared: "Paint the five destinies: the destiny of hell-beings, the destiny of animals, the destiny of hungry ghosts, the destiny of gods, and the destiny of humans. Since the monks did not know where each was to be placed, the Blessed One declared: "At the bottom, paint the destinies of hell-beings, animals, and hungry ghosts. Paint also the eastern continent

Videha, the western continent Godānīya, the northern continent Uttarakuru, and Jambudvīpa. In the center, paint attachment, aversion, and delusion. Paint a figure of the Buddha indicating the pure maṇḍala of nirvāṇa. Paint also the beings born by spontaneous birth, dying and being reborn in the manner of a continuous thread of silk. Around the rim, paint the twelve links of dependent origination arising in forward order and in reverse order, and depict the whole as held within impermanence. The two verses are also to be composed and extracted:

Strive and lift yourselves up,
Enter upon the Buddha's teaching.
Like a great elephant in a muddy swamp,
Conquer the army of the lord of death.
Whoever shall practice with true diligence
This discipline of the Dharma
Will, having utterly abandoned the round of birth,
Make an end of suffering.

This too is to be painted."

Then, having declared that the Wheel of the Five Sections was to be painted in the gatehouse, the Blessed One gave the instruction, and the monks had the Wheel of the Five Sections painted in the gatehouse. Brahmins and householders came and asked, "Noble ones, what is this that has been painted?" And the monks replied, "We ourselves do not know." Thereupon the Blessed One declared, "A monk shall be appointed to explain it to the brahmins and householders who come and gather there." Having declared that a monk was to be appointed, the Blessed One further said that if they were to appoint monks regardless of qualification — whether immature, confused, unclear of mind, or unskilled — and those monks did not know the matter themselves, how could they possibly explain it to the brahmins and householders who came and gathered there? Therefore the Blessed One declared, "Appoint one who is capable."

Now, in Rājagṛha there lived a householder who had taken a wife from among his equals in rank, and with her he played, rejoiced, and lived in happiness. A son was born to them. Then the man said to his wife, "Dear one, robbers have come and seized our wealth and stolen our possessions. I will therefore load up a ship and set out upon the great ocean. Lady, please do so as I have said." He loaded up the ship and set out upon the great ocean, and right there he met with suffering in a manner that was unrighteous. His wife then nurtured, tended, and raised the boy through the power of her own kinship bonds and the strength of her hands. She had him instructed in letters and script, and he became exceedingly skilled in worldly tales and narratives.

The boy then went together with his companions to the grove of Nalendra and entered the temple. There he saw the Wheel of the Five Sections painted in the gatehouse, and he asked a monk, "Noble one, what is this that has been painted here?" The monk replied, "Dear friend, these are the five destinies: hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, gods, and humans."

The boy asked further, "Noble one, what karma did these beings perform so that, through the ripening of that karma, they were born in the hells and now experience such sufferings as being hoisted up, chopped, cut apart, and hacked?" The monk replied, "Dear friend, these beings extensively habituated themselves to and repeatedly practiced the paths of the ten non-virtuous actions, and through the ripening of that karma they were born in the hells, where they now experience such sufferings as being hoisted up, chopped, cut apart, and hacked."

"And noble one, what karma did these beings perform so that, through the ripening of that karma, they were born among animals and now experience such sufferings as devouring one another?" The monk replied, "Dear friend, these beings habituated themselves to and repeatedly practiced even the slightest and most minor paths of the ten non-virtuous actions, and through the ripening of that karma they were born among animals, where they now experience such sufferings as eating one another."

"And noble one, what karma did these beings perform so that, through the ripening of that karma, they were born among hungry ghosts and now experience such sufferings as hunger, thirst, and the like?" The monk replied, "Dear friend, these beings habituated themselves to and repeatedly practiced miserliness, and through the ripening of that karma they were born among hungry ghosts, where they now experience such sufferings as hunger, thirst, and the like."

"Noble one, then what karma did these beings perform so that, through the ripening of that karma, they were born among the gods and now experience the pleasures of the gods?"

The monk replied, "Dear friend, these beings thoroughly took up, habituated themselves to, and repeatedly practiced the ten paths of virtuous karma to the greatest degree, and through the ripening of that karma they were born among the gods, where they now experience the pleasures of the gods."

"Noble one, then what karma did these beings perform so that, through the ripening of that karma, they were born among human beings and now experience only minor pleasures?"

The monk replied, "Dear friend, these beings thoroughly took up, habituated themselves to, and repeatedly practiced the ten paths of virtuous karma to a lesser degree, and through the ripening of that karma they were born among human beings, where they now experience only minor pleasures."

"Noble one, for my part, I have no wish for the three destinies — the hells, the animals, and the hungry ghosts. Of the two destinies, the gods and human beings, I do wish for those. Noble one, what karma must I perform so that I may be reborn among the gods?"

"Dear friend, there is a way. Go forth before the Blessed One and live the holy life of celibacy. If in this very lifetime you come to comprehend all things as they truly are, that itself will be the end of your suffering. But if you pass away still possessing the remaining bonds of clinging, you will be reborn among the gods."

"Noble one, for how long?"

"Dear friend, for as long as you live."

"But if I cannot manage even that, is there some other means?"

"There is. What is it? Dear friend, offer a midday meal to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha, and you will be reborn among the gods."

"Noble one, how many kārṣāpaṇas would it take to offer such a midday meal to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha?"

"Dear friend, five hundred kārṣāpaṇas."

"Noble one, that I can manage," said the youth, and he bowed at the monk's feet, departed, and went straight to his own home. There he said to his mother, "Mother, today I went to the Añodā Grove and there I saw a wheel painted with five sections, showing the five destinies — the hells, animals, hungry ghosts, gods, and human beings. Mother, do you wish your wicked son to be reborn among the gods?"

"My child, if all sentient beings wish to be reborn among the gods, what need is there even to speak of you? Mother, give me five hundred kārṣāpaṇas so that I may offer a midday meal to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha."

"My child, I raised you, nurtured you, and brought you up with the strength of my kinship and the labor of my own hands — where would I find the wealth of five hundred kārṣāpaṇas?"

"Mother, I shall go and work for wages."

"My child, you are very young; you are not able to work for wages."

"Mother, I can manage."

She, seeing it was the right moment, gave her consent. The boy went and stood in the laborers' market. When brahmins and householders came to take other laborers, no one took him, and he remained there until the sun had set, then came home at nightfall. His mother, seeing him return, asked, "My child, did you find work for wages today?"

The boy answered, "Mother, no one took me."

"My child, that is just how laborers are — laborers go to the laborers' market with their hair disheveled and wearing soiled clothes, and sit there waiting. So if you too wish to work for wages, dishevel your hair, put on soiled clothes, go to the laborers' market, and sit there."

The next day he disheveled his hair, put on soiled clothes, went to the laborers' market, and sat there waiting. A merchant who was building a house came to the laborers' market seeking workers. He took the other laborers but did not take the boy. The boy spoke up: "Sir, I too will work for wages."

The merchant said, "My child, you are far too young — you cannot work for wages."

The boy replied, "Will you pay me my wages up front?"

The merchant said, "Wages are paid at the end."

The boy said, "I will work from today. If you are satisfied, then please pay me my wages."

The merchant took the boy on, and the boy began working for wages at the merchant's house. While the other laborers worked slowly, the boy worked swiftly and with speed. They said to him, "Young fellow, why do you not work slowly?"

The boy replied, "Uncles, because in a previous life I behaved badly, I was born into a poor household, and that is why I am now working for wages. If I work slowly and then die and pass on from here, what will become of my destiny? What will my fate in future lives be?"

They said to him, "Young fellow, you are newly broken in, and there is indeed a place where one ends up as the very last among all — that is what you are like."

Now the boy was skilled in worldly tales and stories, and so he told those laborers stories as he went along swiftly and quickly. The other laborers, fearing they would miss the stories, hurried along swiftly after him, and that day the laborers accomplished a great deal of work.

It was the householder's custom to inspect all the work done by his hired men at the close of each day. The merchant came in the evening and examined all the work, and seeing that twice the usual amount had been done, he asked his foreman, "Did you bring in any additional laborers?"

The foreman said, "I did not."

The merchant asked, "Then why was so much work accomplished today?"

The foreman replied, "May the householder's son be well! Because this boy is skilled in worldly tales and stories — he tells worldly tales and stories and works swiftly and with speed — the other laborers, fearing they will miss the stories, go along swiftly after him and work, and so today a great deal was accomplished."

The merchant then began to pay the boy double wages. The boy said, "Sir, are you giving me both days' wages all at once?"

"No," said the merchant, "I am giving you a bonus because I am pleased with you."

The boy replied, "If you are pleased with me, then for as long as I work in your service, please hold my wages in your own hand."

The merchant agreed: "So be it."

When the merchant's house was completed and the boy's wages were counted, they came to no fewer than five hundred kārṣāpaṇas, and the boy began to weep. The merchant said, "My child, why do you weep? Have I cheated you?"

"Sir, you are a great man — how could you cheat me? It is rather this: I worked for wages to earn five hundred kārṣāpaṇas, thinking I would offer a meal to the monastic Saṅgha — the community of monks with the Buddha at its head — and be reborn in the realm of the gods. Since I have not yet obtained that, I will have to go elsewhere and work again for wages."

The merchant was a man of faith, and so he said, "My child, I myself will make up the full amount."

"Father, I fear I shall not be reborn among the gods."

"My child, do you have sincere faith in the Blessed One?"

"I do."

"Then go and present your request to the Blessed One."

The boy went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet, and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the householder's son addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Blessed One, I worked for wages in the service of a great merchant in order to earn five hundred kārṣāpaṇas. Since I did not obtain them myself, and since the merchant has made up the full amount on my behalf, may I accept them? Blessed One, that merchant is a man of faith — please accept."

"Blessed One, I fear I shall not be reborn among the gods."

"You will be reborn there."

The boy prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and departed.

Then the householder's son received the five hundred kārṣāpaṇas from the merchant and went to his mother. He said: "Mother, please use these five hundred kārṣāpaṇas to prepare a meal and invite the monastic Saṅgha — the community of monks with the Buddha at its head — for the noon meal tomorrow."

"My child, I have no utensils whatsoever, no servants, and no lodging. That same merchant has abundant utensils, servants, and lodging, and he is a man of faith — go and make the arrangements with him."

The boy went to the merchant and said: "Father, in our household there are not even a few utensils, servants, or lodging. Please prepare the meal yourself, and I will be present to invite the monastic Saṅgha — the community of monks with the Buddha at its head — for the noon meal."

The merchant, being a man of faith, thought to himself: "It would be excellent if the monastic Saṅgha — the community of monks with the Buddha at its head — were to take their noon meal at my newly built house." He then said: "Very well, my child — go and invite the monastic Saṅgha, the community of monks with the Buddha at its head, for the noon meal tomorrow, and I will prepare the food."

The householder's son then placed the five hundred kārṣāpaṇas in the merchant's hands, went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet, sat to one side of the elder, and said: "Blessed One, tomorrow I have invited the monastic Saṅgha — the community of monks with the Buddha at its head — for the noon meal." The Blessed One accepted by remaining silent and saying nothing to the householder's son.

Then the householder's son, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that he had accepted, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and departed.

That same night the merchant prepared the food, rose early the next morning, arranged the seats, set out water vessels, and sent an invitation to the Blessed One, saying: "Venerable sir, we invite you; may it please you, Blessed One, to remember that the time has now come." Then the Blessed One, in the forenoon, dressed in his lower robe, took up his bowl and outer robe, was surrounded by the assembly of monks, and went ahead of the monastic Saṅgha toward the merchant's house.

The group of six monks asked: "Whose house is it that the monastic Saṅgha — the community of monks with the Buddha at its head — has been invited to?"

"It is that of a certain very prominent householder's son."

The group of six monks said: "He is just a hired laborer — what could he possibly offer? As we go along from house to house, let us eat at the homes we pass through and take food there on loan."

So as they went, going from house to house, they said to the householders: "Noble ones, please prepare seats for us."

"So be it," they said, and they ate their fill along the way. Then the Blessed One proceeded to the spot where the merchant's invitation had been laid, arrived there, and was seated in the place of honor prepared ahead of the monastic Saṅgha of monks. The group of six monks, having eaten their fill from house to house along the way as they went, arrived there and sat down in their places as well. Then the householder's son, having ascertained that the monastic Saṅgha — the Buddha and the monks — was comfortably seated, satisfied them and nourished them with his own hands, with pure and delightful food and drink. As he went about serving them, the group of six monks, when their turn came, he saw that they were not eating. Seeing this, they sat before the Blessed One and said: "Blessed One, here certain noble ones, when their turn comes, are not eating. We fear that we may not be reborn among the gods." The Blessed One declared: "Good man, if you will be reborn among the gods even by enjoying the merit of lodging, what need is there even to speak of the merit of enjoying food?"

Then the Blessed One, with a Dharma-endowed discourse, rightly instructed that householder's son, rightly led him to take it to heart, rightly praised him, and rightly gladdened him. In many ways, with Dharma-endowed discourse, he rightly instructed him, rightly led him to take it to heart, rightly praised him, and rightly gladdened him. Then he rose from his seat and departed.

Now some five hundred merchants had come from the great ocean to Rājagṛha, and since a festival had arisen in Rājagṛha, they found they could sell nothing at all. There was among them a merchant who knew about monks, and he said: "Friends, take note. In the household where the monastic Saṅgha — the Buddha and the monks — was invited for their midday meal, it is possible that some leftover food and drink remains in excellent condition. Go there and seek it for a price." On hearing this, the others said: "We hear there is a great prominent merchant's house where the monastic Saṅgha — the Buddha and the monks — was given their midday meal." So they took their goods and went there, and said: "Merchant, we are around five hundred merchants who have come from the great ocean to Rājagṛha. A festival has arisen here in Rājagṛha and we have found nothing to sell. We are now hungry. Since your house was the one where the monastic Saṅgha — the Buddha and the monks — was given their midday meal, if there is any food and drink remaining in excellent condition, please give it to us in exchange for a price." The merchant said: "Good friends, let us see," and went to the householder's son and said: "Son, around five hundred merchants have come from the great ocean to Rājagṛha, and since a festival has arisen in Rājagṛha they have found nothing to sell. They are hungry and have come here seeking food and drink. If there is a good quantity remaining, please give it to them in exchange for a price." The boy said: "Father, I will not give it for a price — but I will give it freely as a gift. Let them come." The merchant had those merchants seated, and the boy satisfied them with food and drink. Having thus satisfied themselves in body, those merchants gave voice to this utterance, saying aloud: "Merchant, the householder in whose house the monastic Saṅgha — the Buddha and the monks — was given their midday meal, and who has also satisfied us five hundred merchants with food and drink, that merchant has found good gains indeed." The merchant said: "Good friends, this is not my food — it is the food of this householder's son." They asked: "Whose son, and of which householder?" The merchant replied: "Of a great and prominent householder."

Their caravan leader said: "In that case, this boy is the son of my younger friend." Others said: "In that case, he is our nephew." Still others said: "In that case, he is our grandson." The caravan leader then said: "Many can take from one, but one cannot take from many." With that he set down a foundation, placed his jewels there, and said: "Good friends, let each of you place here whatever you wish to offer in full." Some placed one jewel, some placed two, and some placed many, and so a great heap of jewels was assembled there. The caravan leader then said to the boy: "Son, take these." The boy said: "Good friends, I did not give for payment." The caravan leader said: "We are not paying you a price. Rather, since a single jewel alone can procure a hundredfold of food such as this, we do this from the joy we feel toward you, placing ourselves under the power of that joy." The boy said: "I wonder whether I might not be reborn among the gods." The caravan leader said: "Do you have faith in the Blessed One?" "I do," said the boy. "Then go and make your request to the Blessed One."

Then the boy went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving, he bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, that householder's son addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Blessed One, I gave food and drink to some five hundred merchants, and they, placing themselves under the power of the joy they felt toward me, are about to give me something in return — should I accept it? Beautiful One, please tell me. Blessed One, I wonder whether I might not be reborn among the gods." The Blessed One declared: "Son, this is but the flower — take it. Other fruits will come." So the boy took those jewels.

Now in Rājagṛha there was a guild-master without a son who died in due time, and the men of wealth, the guild-masters, and the caravan leaders assembled together and said: "Good friends, whom shall we consecrate as guild-master of the city? It should be whichever being among us is renowned for great merit." They said: "How shall we know?" And they replied: "Let seeds of various colors be poured into an unglazed clay vessel, and whichever one can grasp seeds of only a single color — that person we shall consecrate as guild-master." They poured seeds of various colors into an unglazed clay vessel and began to reach in to grasp them. All the others grasped seeds of various colors, but that householder's son grasped only seeds of a single color. Then those assembled said: "How are we to consecrate this hired-man's son as guild-master?" Yet they performed the test three times in this same manner, and each time all the others grasped seeds of various colors, while the householder's son grasped only seeds of a single color. Then those assembled said: "Good friends, non-human beings have declared it so by a fourfold sign: this very householder's son is to be consecrated as guild-master." And so they consecrated that boy as guild-master of the city.

The guild-master thought to himself:

"This being is renowned for his great merit and power — I should form a connection with him." And so that guild-master gave his own daughter, adorned with all her ornaments, in marriage to this guild-master of the city. And because of that, the household became exceedingly wealthy with abundant goods and possessions, and his name became instantly renowned — he was called "Instantly Renowned."

Then the guild-master Instantly Renowned thought to himself: "All this magnificent wealth and prosperity in my household has come about through my reliance on the Buddha, the Blessed One — it was born from my having invited the Saṅgha of monks, headed by the Buddha, to another house and offering them a midday meal." And so the guild-master Instantly Renowned went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with his head, and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the Blessed One instructed the guild-master Instantly Renowned with Dharma-endowed words, rightly showing him, rightly establishing him, rightly uplifting him, and rightly gladdening him. In many ways, with Dharma-endowed words, he rightly showed him, rightly established him, rightly uplifted him, and rightly gladdened him — and then he fell silent.

Then the guild-master Instantly Renowned rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, bowed with joined palms toward the Blessed One, and addressed the Blessed One, saying: "Blessed One, may the Blessed

One be pleased tomorrow to accept a midday meal together with the Saṅgha of monks at my home." The Blessed One gave his consent to the guild-master Instantly Renowned by remaining silent.

Then the guild-master Instantly Renowned, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been granted, prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with his head and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

That same night, the guild-master Instantly Renowned prepared food and drink, clean and fine, made everything ready, and early the next morning rose, arranged seats, set out water vessels, and issued this formal invitation: "Blessed One, may you graciously lend your presence — reverend sir, we request your attendance for the midday meal. Blessed One, may it please you to consider that the time has now come." Then the Blessed One, in the morning, having donned his lower and upper robes and taken up his bowl, came surrounded by the assembly of monks, preceded by the Saṅgha of monks, and went to where the guild-master Instantly Renowned's residence was. He arrived and took his seat on the seat that had been arranged in the foremost place among the Saṅgha of monks.

Then the guild-master Instantly Renowned, knowing that the Buddha together with the Saṅgha of monks had been seated comfortably, with his own hands satisfied and refreshed them with food and drink, clean and fine. In many ways, with food and drink clean and fine, he satisfied and refreshed them with his own hands. Then, knowing that the Blessed One had finished the midday meal and had set aside his bowl, he took a low seat and sat — he and his wife — before the Blessed One in order to hear the Dharma.

The Blessed One, having thoroughly understood the minds, the latent dispositions, the temperaments, and the natures of the guild-master Instantly Renowned and his wife, taught the Dharma in such a way as to utterly shatter with the vajra of gnosis the twenty-peaked mountain of the view of the transitory collection — the view of a self in the perishable aggregates — held by the two of them, and thereby bring about the fruit of stream-entry directly before their eyes.

Having seen the truth, they supplicated:

"Venerable One, such benefit as the Blessed One has bestowed upon us, relying on the Blessed One as our good spiritual friend — this our father did not do for us, nor our mother, nor the king, nor the gods, nor our forebears of former times, nor śramaṇas and brahmins, nor the host of our loving friends, companions, and relatives. The ocean of blood and tears has been dried up; we have been freed from the mountains of bones; the doors to the lower realms have been sealed shut; the doors to the higher realms and liberation have been thrown open; we have been lifted out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; we have been placed among gods and humans; saṃsāra has been brought to its end. With the vajra of gnosis you have shattered the twenty-peaked mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time, and we have obtained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable One, we have entered the stream! Venerable One, we have entered the stream! Venerable One, we go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept us as lay practitioners. From this day forward, for as long as we live, we take refuge with our whole heart."

Then the Blessed One rightly instructed, established, exhorted, and gladdened the guild-master Instantly Renowned with a Dharma-endowed discourse. He rightly instructed him, rightly established him, rightly exhorted him, and rightly gladdened him with Dharma-endowed discourses in many ways, and then rose from his seat and departed.

Now, this took place at a time when the Blessed One, the buddha, had not yet established for the śrāvakas the rules of training in the Vinaya.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga. The fifty-first bundle.

Then the Blessed One, having remained in Rājagṛha as long as he wished, set out on a tour of the countryside in the direction of Vaiśālī. The Blessed One, traveling on tour through the villages, came to Vaiśālī and resided in Vaiśālī in the Lofty Hall by the bank of the Monkey Pond. The householder Fierce Energy heard that the Blessed One, traveling on tour through the villages, had come to Vaiśālī and was residing in Vaiśālī in the Lofty Hall by the bank of the Monkey Pond. Having heard this, he went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One rightly instructed, rightly established, rightly exhorted, and rightly gladdened the householder Fierce Energy with a Dharma-endowed discourse. He rightly instructed him, rightly established him, rightly exhorted him, and rightly gladdened him with Dharma-endowed discourses in many ways, and then said nothing further.

joined palms toward the Blessed One, and said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, may it please you to accept tomorrow the midday meal together with the Saṅgha of monks at my dwelling." The Blessed One consented to the householder Fierce Energy by remaining silent. The householder Fierce Energy, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that he had consented, departed from the Blessed One's presence and said to those who sustained themselves on dairy produce:

"Wise ones, the Blessed One, together with the Saṅgha of monks, has consented to come. Prepare abundant pure and excellent food." They prepared abundant pure and excellent food.

Then, the next morning, the householder Fierce Energy rose early, arranged seats, set out water for washing, and invited the Blessed One thus: "Venerable One, it is time — may the Blessed One know the hour has come." The group of six said, "Gavāmpati and Nandita, go on ahead to the households of those who are going home." And so they did. When those two saw a certain alms-gatherer, they said, "Come — enter into the households of those who are going home." They led him away, and having entered Vaiśālī ahead of the others, they went to the households of those who were going home. Then those householders said, "Noble ones, please eat." The group of six said, "We have been invited as guests." By whom? "By the householder Fierce Energy." The householders said, "Noble ones, in that case, please eat the mango pulp." "So be it," and they ate the mango pulp. The alms-gatherer did not eat, so they said to him, "Noble one, you too should eat the mango pulp." He replied, "I observe the one-session rule." They said to him, "Then pass through and eat there at his place." He filled a small bowl and went there. The Saṅgha of monks was seated. The Blessed One remained in the store-room and was engaged in obtaining alms. Blessed ones, buddhas, engage in the practice of obtaining alms while remaining in the store-room for five reasons. What are those five? They wish to establish themselves inwardly in proper composure; they wish to teach the Dharma to the gods; they wish to attend to the sick; they wish to inspect the lodgings; and they wish to establish training rules for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya. In this instance, the Blessed One remained in the store-room and engaged in the practice of obtaining alms because he wished to establish training rules for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya.

Then, when the householder Fierce Energy saw that the Saṅgha of monks was comfortably seated, he served and satisfied them from his own hand with abundant pure and excellent food and drink. Then the householder Fierce Energy sat down before the alms-gathering monk. The monk thought to himself: "This householder will come to know that I ate mango pulp as follows — for as long as he finds no fault with me, I should speak to him." And so he said this to the householder Fierce Energy: "Householder, it was not only I who ate mango pulp — these members of the group of six also ate mango pulp." The householder said, "Noble one, why do you say that not only did I eat mango pulp but these members of the group of six also ate mango pulp?" Embarrassed, the monk said, "Noble one, does it seem to you that I have no mango pulp?" He then said to those who sustained themselves on dairy produce: "Wise ones, open the pots of mango pulp." They opened them. Then the monk who had been gathering alms took the alms and went to where the Blessed One was. He went there, bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One, and sat to one side.

It is the nature of awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, to gladden each monk who has been gathering alms by asking, "Monk, how did the alms-gathering go? Did you satisfy the monastic Saṅgha?" And so, in keeping with this, the Blessed One gladdened the monk who had been gathering alms by asking, "Monk, how did the alms-gathering go? Did you satisfy the monastic Saṅgha?"

The monk then reported: "Venerable one, the alms-gathering went well, and the monastic Saṅgha was satisfied — for the householder Dragshuljen had provided a full meal for the monastic Saṅgha." He then reported the entire matter in detail to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, the householder Dragshuljen has provided a dwelling for the monastic Saṅgha."

Then, having completed the meal, the Blessed One rinsed both feet outside the temple hall and entered the temple hall to rest in inner composure. Thereafter, rising from inner composure, he took his seat on the cushion prepared before the monastic Saṅgha.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident and this occasion and this circumstance, convened the monastic Saṅgha — and so forth, as before. It is the nature of awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, to inquire with full knowledge while feigning not to know — and so on as before. The Blessed One then questioned the monks: "Monks, is it true that you ate repeatedly?"

"Venerable one, it is true."

The Blessed One censured them, saying that such conduct was unbecoming of a renunciant, not in keeping with propriety, not permissible, not in accord with proper conduct, and was not the deed of one who has gone forth into renunciation. Having censured them in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, perceiving ten benefits, I shall lay down a training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: eating repeatedly is an offense entailing a downfall." Thus did the Blessed One lay down the training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One was residing in Vaiśālī, in the Monkey Pond Pavilion, in the multi-storied dwelling.

A certain sick monk went to a physician's residence, and when the physician saw him, he said, "Good friend, show me your condition and I will give you medicine." The noble one replied, "Please ask the Blessed One." The physician said, "Good friend, this medicine of mine — if you do not use it for your livelihood, you will not recover from your illness." The monk said, "Good friend, the Blessed One has laid down a training rule." The physician replied, "Noble one, your Teacher is compassionate; taking this very circumstance as the occasion, he will certainly grant permission. Let there be such a case."

The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, it is permitted except in times of illness."

"Monks, when tasks for the stūpa or tasks for the Saṅgha have been performed, and the monks are hungry, have collapsed in exhaustion, are lying down, and are unable to muster energy for wholesome pursuits, if brahmins and householders who are full of faith arrive at the temple hall and say, 'Noble ones, if you are truly dedicated to the teaching, why do you lie collapsed in sleep and fail to rouse yourselves for wholesome pursuits?' and the monks reply, 'Good friends, we are hungry — please report this to the Blessed One.' The physician had said, 'Good friend, the Blessed One has laid down a training rule.'"

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, with the exception of times of work, this rule stands."

Then it occurred that other monks, while travelling on the road, became hungry, collapsed in exhaustion, lay down, and were unable to muster energy for wholesome pursuits. Brahmins and householders full of faith arrived and said to them, "Noble ones, if you are truly dedicated to the teaching, why do you lie collapsed in sleep and fail to rouse yourselves for wholesome pursuits?" The monks replied, "Good friends, we are hungry. Please report this to the Blessed One." The brahmins and householders said, "But the Blessed One has laid down a training rule." When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, with the exception of times of travel, this rule stands."

After that, the Blessed One resided in Vaiśālī as long as he wished, and then, setting out on a wandering journey in the direction of Śrāvastī, he arrived at Śrāvastī and dwelt there in the Jeta Grove of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Now there was a householder in Śrāvastī whose customary practice was to observe the precepts on the eighth and fourteenth days of the month, and as long as the monks who had been invited to his home had not eaten, he himself would not eat. This householder invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another home. The Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha departed. The householder sent a servant to the temple hall, saying, "Go and invite the monks, for the meal is ready." The servant went to the temple hall, but not a single monk was to be seen, so he returned and reported: "Householder, there are no monks there — I did not see even one." The householder said, "Go to where the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha was invited, invite the monks from there, and tell them the meal is ready." The servant went there, and when he arrived he saw that the monks had already eaten and were coming out. He said to them, "Noble ones, please come — a great householder requests you to come for a meal. What do you say?" The monks replied, "We have already eaten." The servant returned and told the householder: "Householder, from the mouths of the monks came these words: 'We have already eaten.'" The householder said, "Go, enter the house, and on behalf of the householder tell them to come, that a meal is ready and a great length of cloth will be offered." The servant went and said: "Noble ones, on behalf of the householder I am told to say: please come, the meal is ready, and a great length of cloth will be offered." The monks replied, "We decline." The servant returned and told the householder: "Householder, from the mouths of the monks came these words: 'We decline.'" Thereupon the householder, establishing the fact that the Saṅgha he had invited had not eaten the meal he had prepared, cut off the food. And the neighbouring households said among themselves: "Even if you give cloth to these ascetics (śramaṇas), sons of the Śākyas, they will not make use of it — this householder has cut off their food because the monks did not eat." They criticized the monks, jeered at them, and spoke ill of them. When the monks reported all of this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, with the exception of the time of cloth-giving, this rule stands."

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire training, who are devoted to training, and who devote their resources to training, and he addressed the monks in words befitting that theme, in harmony with it, in its fullness, and endowed with the Dharma appropriate to the occasion. He then declared to the monks:

"Monks, therefore the former rule stands as a prohibition, and this is now permitted. My hearers should take up this training rule as a foundation for discipline as follows: eating repeatedly except at the permitted times is an offense that causes downfall. The permitted times are these: the time of illness, the time of work, the time of a journey, and the time of cloth-giving — those are the permitted times.

'Eating repeatedly' means eating again and again. 'Except at the permitted times' means setting aside those designated times. 'An offense that causes downfall' means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the lower states of wretched existence — into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into miserable destinies, into states of ruin. Furthermore, so long as that offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs wholesome qualities. That is why it is said to be an offense that causes downfall.

Of those permitted times, 'the time of illness' means this: when a monk cannot sustain himself on a single meal. 'The time of work' means this: when a monk has performed even the slightest service — such as dusting with a cloth or sweeping the floor — for the Saṅgha or for a stūpa. 'The time of a journey' means this: when a monk has traveled half a league or half of that and then returns. 'The time of cloth-giving' means this: when a monk has received even a small bolt of cloth or a large bolt of cloth.

Now, as to how a downfall may occur in connection with cloth-giving: there are four cases — being invited with cloth, being invited without cloth, being invited with cloth and also with the price of cloth, and being invited without cloth and without the price of cloth.

In the first case: if a monk has been invited with cloth and is then invited to another place also with cloth, that monk should accept both invitations and eat at both. There is no offense in accepting both, and no offense in eating at both.

In the second case: if a monk has been invited with cloth and is then invited to another place without cloth, that monk should accept the first invitation and decline the second, or else give it away to another. If he accepts both and eats at both, the acceptance of the second becomes a wrong act and the eating of it becomes an offense that causes downfall — but there is no offense in regard to the first.

In the third case: if a monk has been invited with cloth and is then invited to another place with cloth and also with the price of cloth, that monk should accept both invitations and eat at both. There is no offense in accepting both and no offense in eating at both.

In the fourth case: if a monk has been invited with cloth and is then invited to another place without cloth and without the price of cloth, that monk should accept the first invitation and decline the second, or else give it away to another. If he accepts both and eats at both, the acceptance of the second becomes a wrong act and the eating of it becomes an offense that causes downfall — but there is no offense in regard to the first.

If a monk has been invited without cloth and is then invited to another place also without cloth, that monk should accept the first invitation and decline the second, or else give it away to another. If he accepts both and eats at both, the acceptance becomes a wrong act and the eating becomes an offense that causes downfall — but there is no offense in regard to the first.

If a monk has been invited without cloth and is then invited to another place with cloth, that monk should accept both invitations and eat at both. There is no offense in accepting both and no offense in eating at both."

If a monk has been invited without cloth and is then invited to another place with cloth and also with the price of cloth, that monk should accept both invitations and eat at both. There is no offense in accepting both and no offense in eating at both.

If a monk has been invited without cloth and is then invited to another place also without cloth and without the price of cloth, that monk should accept the first invitation and decline the second, or else give it away to another. If he accepts both and eats at both, the acceptance becomes a wrong act and the eating becomes an offense that causes downfall — but there is no offense in regard to the first.

If a monk has been invited with cloth and also with the price of cloth and is then invited to another place also with cloth and also with the price of cloth, that monk should accept both invitations and eat at both. There is no offense in accepting both and no offense in eating at both.

If a monk has been invited with cloth and also with the price of cloth and is then invited to another place with cloth only, that monk should accept both invitations and eat at both. There is no offense in accepting both and no offense in eating at both.

If a monk has been invited with cloth and also with the price of cloth and is then invited to another place without cloth, that monk should accept the first invitation and decline the second, or else give it away to another. If he accepts both and eats at both, the acceptance becomes a wrong act and the eating becomes an offense that causes downfall — but there is no offense in regard to the first.

If a monk has been invited with cloth and also with the price of cloth and is then invited to another place without cloth and without the price of cloth, that monk should accept the first invitation and decline the second, or else give it away to another. If he accepts both and eats at both, the acceptance becomes a wrong act and the eating becomes an offense that causes downfall — but there is no offense in regard to the first.

If a monk has been invited without cloth and without the price of cloth and is then invited to another place also without cloth and without the price of cloth, that monk should accept the first invitation and decline the second, or else give it away to another. If he accepts both and eats at both, the acceptance becomes a wrong act and the eating becomes an offense that causes downfall — but there is no offense in regard to the first.

If a monk has been invited without cloth and without the price of cloth and is then invited to another place with cloth, that monk should accept both invitations and eat at both. There is no offense in accepting both and no offense in eating at both.

If a monk has been invited without cloth and without the price of cloth and is then invited to another place without cloth only, that monk should accept the first invitation and decline the second, or else give it away to another. If he accepts both and eats at both, the acceptance becomes a wrong act and the eating becomes an offense that causes downfall — but there is no offense in regard to the first.

If a monk has been invited without cloth and without the price of cloth and is then invited to another place with cloth and also with the price of cloth, that monk should accept both invitations and eat at both. There is no offense in accepting both and no offense in eating at both.

There is no offense for one who is a beginner, for one who is mentally deranged, for one who is disturbed in mind, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

This completes the thirty-first offense that causes downfall, concerning eating repeatedly.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At a certain rocky cliff, a householder was living, and he had established a dwelling place for the śramaṇas and brahmins of the four directions. In that dwelling, he provided whatever was needed by way of alms to whichever śramaṇas and brahmins of the four directions resided there.

Now at the time when the Blessed One had displayed the great miracle at Śrāvastī, defeating the non-Buddhist adherents (tīrthikas) and bringing delight to gods and humans alike, and gladdening the hearts of the wise — at that very time the remaining tīrthikas took up residence in the outlying regions.

On another occasion, sixty naked ascetics arrived at that rocky cliff and went before that householder, saying, "Venerable one, may we obtain the Dharma! May we obtain the Dharma!" The householder replied, "Noble ones, have you gone forth?" They said, "We have gone forth." The householder said, "You are welcome. Please stay in the dwelling place I have established for the śramaṇas and brahmins of the four directions, and I shall provide you with whatever you need by way of alms." They took up residence there, and the householder provided them with what they needed by way of alms.

There was at Śrāvastī a certain householder of faith who came with a caravan and arrived at that rocky cliff. He entered the shop of that householder and came to know that householder as his associate. That householder of faith began to make offerings to the naked ascetics, but he did not send them to the other householder's door. Instead he sent word to them, saying, "Friends, come here — I will make offerings to worthy recipients." Since the householder was a person of faith, he thought to himself, "They may well be disciples of the Blessed One — let me go and see." When he went there, he saw that the naked ascetics were nothing but shameless and without modesty, and he felt that to speak unpleasantness openly would be painful, so he said nothing and simply sat there.

After the naked ascetics had eaten and left, the householder said to the other man, "Friend, is the seed good and the field good?" He replied, "Friend, if the seed is good, the field is nothing but naked ascetics who are shameless and without modesty, who hold wrong views, who are as barren as a salt plain, who have severed connections, who are wicked — it is nothing but evil ground." The householder said, "Friend, is there some other good field?" He replied, "There is — the disciples of the Blessed One." The householder said, "If they would come here, I would provide them with whatever they need by way of alms."

That householder then turned his caravan around, sold his goods, and went to Śrāvastī. He deposited the proceeds of his goods in a warehouse and went to the Jeta Grove. Now the group of six monks had the habit of thinking, "Here we will also teach the Dharma to brahmins and householders who come and arrive, we will defeat opponents, and we will proclaim our own fame." For this reason, some member of the group of six always kept the gate of the Jeta Grove from being left unoccupied. So the venerable Nandaka rose early in the morning, discarded his tooth-stick, put on a reddish-yellow patched robe, and was pacing and sitting at the gate of the Jeta Grove.

When Nandaka saw the householder while he was still far off, he said, "Welcome, householder, welcome! From where have you come after so long a time, arriving like the moon that has been hidden away?" The man replied, "Noble one, at a certain pleasant rocky cliff there is a great householder who has established a dwelling for the śramaṇas and brahmins of the four directions, and he wishes to see the disciples of the Blessed One."

Nandaka thought: "If any black-bowl-bearer hears of this, he will rush there very quickly. So if I disparage this householder, I will certainly not tell any black-bowl-bearer about it." And so he said to the householder: "Don't you think your heart is occupied with nothing beyond thoughts such as 'who will give us food along the road?' and 'who will give us robes?' — do you ever think of meditation or recitation?" The householder thought: "Among those who are possessed of desire, there is none worse than Nandaka. Now he has disparaged me. If I were to tell others who are monks by nature, they would disparage me far more widely." And so he sat in silence, saying nothing.

Nandaka, having disparaged the householder, then went to the group of six and said: "Venerable ones, for however long we are in want, let us put an end to that want." They asked him: "Have you heard something?" He replied: "Yes. At a pleasant rocky cliff there is a great householder who has established a dwelling for the śramaṇas and brahmins of the four directions, and he supplies those who stay there with robes and alms-food as needed. Let us go there." They asked: "Will all of us go?" Nandaka replied: "Only six will go." And so those six set out, traveling to that pleasant rocky cliff.

The naked ascetics there said: "Let those who know how to conduct themselves according to custom come." And those naked ascetics left a single naked guard at the dwelling and departed elsewhere.

The group of six continued on their way and, arriving at that cliff, went to the householder and said: "Householder, are you well? Are you well?" The householder said: "Who are you?" They replied: "We are disciples of the Blessed One." The householder said: "How wonderful! We too have been wishing to see disciples of the Blessed One, and here you have come. Noble ones, please stay in the dwelling I have established for the śramaṇas and brahmins of the four directions, and I will supply you with alms-food and whatever you need." The group of six then asked: "Is there any bedding — chairs or small seats?" The householder said: "There is none." The group of six replied: "Householder, we do not make our beds on the ground." The householder then searched for bedding there and sent chairs and small seats to the dwelling.

The naked guard said: "Hey, śramaṇas (Skt. śramaṇa), sons of the Śākyas! This is not your temple, and it is not your dwelling — where do you think you are going?" The group of six replied: "What is this so-called person of understanding saying? Don't say 'this is not our temple and this is not our dwelling.' If we stay, then we stay and that is all. If we do not stay, we will cut off your major limbs." The naked man thought: "There are six of these, and I am alone. There is nothing I can do to them. It would not be right if they harmed me." And so, frightened, he fled.

The group of six then went to the householder's house every single day to eat. Then on another occasion, the householder had some business to attend to at a different cliff, and he said to the group of six: "Noble ones, I have some business at another cliff and I am going there. While I am away, please conduct yourselves in my absence as you would in my presence, until I return." The group of six replied:

"So be it." The householder then said to his servant: "Serve the noble ones just as you have been serving them, until I return." And he went off to that cliff.

The group of six continued to go there every single day and eat as before. Then they said among themselves: "Friends and companions, for how long shall we keep to the conduct of others? It is time to show our own conduct." They said: "So be it." And then they said: "Friends and companions, look, look at how beautiful are the eyes of this woman, her ears, her teeth, her lips, her breasts, her waist, her thighs, and her feet!" The woman, overcome with shame, withdrew into a room and sat there.

When the householder returned from that cliff, he asked his servant: "Did the almsmen come and receive food as usual?" The servant replied: "Almsmen of this sort — there were none whatsoever — but that is not the point. I have heard words from your almsmen that I have never heard before from jesters, musicians, or the sons of dancers." The householder thought: "Women's sense-objects are what men think about. Those naked wanderers who entered — when people see them, desire arises. But as for these śrāvakas of the Blessed One, who are well clad in the lower robe and well clad in the Dharma robe, I cannot find this pleasing." So he said to the servant: "Do you find pleasure in those naked wanderers? How could you take pleasure in the śrāvakas of the Blessed One, who are well clad in the lower robe and well clad in the Dharma robe?" His wife then spoke: "My lord's son, if you do not trust me, I shall make it plain before your very eyes."

The householder thought: "Better to investigate." He stayed away for a few days, and then said to the group of six: "Noble ones, I have a little business again at that cliff, and I shall go there. Please conduct yourselves in my absence as you would in my presence, until I return." The group of six replied: "So be it."

When the householder had gone into a room and was sitting quietly, the group of six likewise entered his house and made themselves at home. Then his wife began to serve them, and the group of six said: "Friends and companions, look, look at how beautiful are the eyes of this woman, her ears, her teeth, her lips, her breasts, her waist, her thighs, and her feet!"

The householder heard this and thought: "It would not accord with my character to cut off their alms just like that, on the spot. I must find a skilful approach." So that day he carried out one load and left it out. The group of six said: "Friends and companions, the domain-talk is stinging." Then they said: "Venerable ones, the one load we were in the habit of giving to the hungry — from this day forward, it will no longer be given." The next day he carried out a second load and left it out, and they said: "Friends and companions, the domain-talk is stinging." Then they said: "Venerable ones, the other load that we used to leave at the base beneath the alms bowl — that too will no longer be left from this day forward." And so in this way, gradually, he began to give only coarse grain and rough boiled gruel, and they said: "Friends and companions, the domain-talk is stinging." And they said further: "What is there here to sting about? Even were we to pass through a hundred doorways, it is hard to achieve a full belly. Now here we are, sitting in the cool shade, and you begin with coarse grain and rough boiled gruel, and you refuse even that?"

Now the naked ascetic wandered around and, catching sight of the naked ascetics, said: "Wise ones, our domain has been taken — drive them back!" They replied: "Where have you been staying, and where did you come from here?" He said: "I was chased away from there." "By whom?" "By the monks, the sons of the Śākyas." They asked: "How many sons of the Śākyan monks came?" He said: "Six." They replied: "We have sixty men — surely we can beat those six soundly and drive them out! Come, let us go. When we call out the signal 'Wise ones, gather!' let ten of us rush upon each of the six groups and beat them thoroughly." They said: "Let us first ask the householder." Agreed. So they went to the householder and said: "Householder, to whom have you offered the lodging?" The householder replied: "I have offered it to no one in particular; whoever is staying there, I supply them with alms food as needed." They said: "Householder, then remain in the middle for now." And they went off to the lodging and said to the group of six: "Ha! Monks, sons of the Śākyas — where did you come from that you have settled here? This is neither your temple nor your lodging — come out! If you come out, well and good; if you do not come out, we will cut you down to size in no small way." The group of six replied: "Ha! What is it these naked scruff-napes are saying? 'This is neither your temple nor your lodging — come out!' they say. Let them not say it! If they are settled here, they are settled. If they do not vacate, we will cut them down to size in no small way." The naked ascetics then called out the signal "Wise ones, gather!" and ten naked ascetics rushed upon each member of the group of six and began to beat them. The group of six said: "Dear ones, companions, brothers in the holy life — it would be unseemly for us to come to grief; protect your eyes and your ears." Then they said: "Scruff-napes, you dare — press in properly from this side!" and they showed their buttocks and such, and had them beaten. When the naked ascetics grew weary and could no longer strike, the group of six called out: "Venerable ones, press in harder!" and each member of the group of six, extending an arm, knocked five naked ascetics to the ground, and withdrawing an arm, knocked five more naked ascetics to the ground, and then began to beat them severely, saying: "Dear ones, companions, it would be unseemly for a root downfall (pārājika), a defeat, to arise — guard the root downfall!" With that, the group of six thoroughly pummelled and thrashed those ascetics with switches, fists, clods of earth, and sticks, and as they were being beaten, the naked ascetics were dragged out of the lodging. Brahmins and householders who saw this said: "Look, look, wise ones! The monks are fighting — it will cause a downpour of rain!" The group of six said: "Dear ones, companions, the domain-talk is still burning and has not yet died down — come, let us go to Śrāvastī." And so they went to Śrāvastī.

A disputant from the south, whose pursuit was to fling challenges at the world, named Acara, came to Śrāvastī and, wishing to have a debate, wishing for the implements of debate, went to the venerable Kauṇḍinya and said: "Oh monk, I have taken a few letters from my teacher, and therefore I wish to settle a discussion with you together." The venerable Kauṇḍinya replied: "Brahmin, I have no wish to debate with you — go away."

Then that world-challenger went to where the venerable Rāṣṭhapāla, Bhadra, Revatī, Mahānāman, Yaśas, Pūrṇa, Vimāla, Gavāṃpati, and Subāhu were, and said to them: "Oh monks, I have taken a few letters from my teacher, and therefore I wish to settle a discussion with you together." They replied: "Brahmin, we have no wish to debate with you — go away."

Then that world-challenger went to where the venerable Śāriputra was and, having arrived, said this to the venerable Śāriputra: "Oh monk, I have taken a few letters from my teacher, and therefore I wish to settle a discussion with you together."

The venerable Śāriputra considered: does this one have any roots of virtue at all? He saw that he did. He considered: on whom does this depend? He saw that it depended on himself. He considered: can one such as this be tamed through debate? He saw that he could. He considered: how long will it take for him to be tamed? He saw that after seven days he would be tamed. And so the venerable Śāriputra said: "Brahmin, come here — let it be so." On that first day he engaged him in debate and dismissed him with the remainder still unresolved. The following day as well he dismissed him with the remainder unresolved. And so it continued through to the seventh day, dismissing him each time with the remainder unresolved.

Meanwhile, the report spread throughout all quarters that the world-challenger Acara from the south had come, and that he and the noble Śāriputra had been debating for seven days now, and that neither had defeated the other. Hearing this, many hundreds of thousands of living beings gathered there — some drawn by curiosity, some stirred by their roots of virtue from former times.

The venerable Śāriputra then considered: have those who can be tamed through debate gathered? He saw that they had. And so the venerable Śāriputra defeated that world-challenger, crushed him completely, dismissed him with not the slightest remainder left unresolved, and thus cut down the world-challenger and wanderer Acara. That one, having then become filled with faith, said: "Venerable Śāriputra, if I may obtain the going forth and full ordination in the Dharma and Vinaya well proclaimed by the Blessed One, and thereby the full status of a monk, I will practice the holy life in the presence of the Blessed One." The venerable Śāriputra gave him the going forth and performed the full ordination.

Having thus gone forth, that one dwelt in solitude, in seclusion, in heedfulness, in application, and in self-surrender. And for the sake of which a son of good family shaves off hair and beard, puts on the saffron robes, and with perfect faith goes forth from home into homelessness — that supreme culmination of the holy life — he realized directly, actualized it with his own direct knowledge in that very life itself, and came to know: "Birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is no knowing of another existence beyond this." He became an arhat: freed from attachment to the three realms, with a mind equal toward a clod of earth and gold, equal toward the sky and the palm of the hand, one who, like sandalwood placed upon an altar, had burst through the shell of the egg of ignorance by means of knowledge, one who had attained the higher knowledges, the superknowledges, and the individual perfect realizations, who had turned his back on continued existence, gain, and honor, and who was worthy of worship, veneration, and homage by the gods together with Indra and his retinue.

Then the assembly was filled with wonder, saying: "The venerable Śāriputra has defeated a challenger such as this."

Then the venerable Śāriputra, knowing the intentions, latent tendencies, constitutions, and natures of those in the assembly, taught the Dharma in such a way that many hundreds of thousands of living beings saw the Truths. Some of them directly realized the fruit of stream-entry (Skt. srotāpatti). Some directly realized the fruit of once-returning. Some directly realized the fruit of non-returning. And some went forth into homelessness, abandoned all afflictions, and directly realized the state of arhathood. Having taught the Dharma in this way, the great majority of those in the assembly were established as ones who had turned toward the Buddha, who had arrived at the Dharma, and who had come to rest in the Saṅgha.

The venerable Śāriputra had finished off the wandering brahmin Carakā, a challenger belonging to the school of the world-hurlers, in the morning session, and in the afternoon the six groups arrived at Śrāvastī. The monks said to them: "Welcome, venerable ones, welcome! Where have you come from?" The venerable Śāriputra replied that he had come from the south, where he had finished off the challenger from the school of the world-hurlers, a wandering brahmin named Carakā who had come seeking a debate and the materials of debate, and had emerged victorious from the contest.

The six groups said: "How wonderful it is that the venerable Śāriputra, endowed with a twofold assembly, a general of the Dharma, one who follows in the wake of the wheel of Dharma, should have finished off a single challenger. Even if the venerable Śāriputra had not finished him off, the Blessed One was present nearby, so that would be no great wonder. But as for us six men defeating sixty naked ascetics — that is truly wonderful! We did so by teaching the Dharma to their bodies with the knowledge that struck at whatever branch of learning they took up. Whether they live or die, if they are alive now, they may either live a little longer or be on the verge of death."

Then the monks of few desires rebuked them, saying: "Why do the monks use the very limb by which they should feel shame as a source of pride?" — criticizing them, reviling them, and speaking ill of them. On that occasion the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident and in light of this occasion and these circumstances, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth, as before. The awakened Blessed Ones, though knowing, feign ignorance — and so forth, as before — until the awakened Blessed One questioned the six groups: "Monks, did you truly do such an unseemly thing?" They replied: "Blessed One, we did." The awakened Blessed One rebuked them, saying that such conduct was not in keeping with the practice of a renunciant, was not appropriate, was not fitting, was not in conformity with proper conduct, and was not something that one who has gone forth should do.

Having rebuked them in numerous ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: A monk who has dwelt for a day in a single dwelling place shall eat but one portion of alms food. Should he eat more than that, it constitutes a transgression." Thus the Blessed One established that rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

Then that householder took his carrying-net and went to that very cliff, and entered the shop of that householder. The householder began to weigh out goods for the naked ascetics. But Śāriputra did not send anyone on behalf of that householder; instead he gave to those friends who were worthy recipients of gifts.

He called out, "Come here!" and since that householder was a man of faith, he thought to himself, "These must indeed be hearers of the Blessed One — let me go and have a look." He went over, and upon seeing that the naked ascetics were beings devoid of shame and modesty, he felt that to speak ill of them openly would be unkind, and so he said nothing and sat in silence.

When they had eaten and departed, that householder said to the other householder, "Friend, is your field good and your seed good?" The other householder replied, "Friend, if the seed is good, the field itself — inhabited by naked ascetics who are without shame and modesty, who hold corrupt views, who haunt charnel grounds smelling of salt and bones, who are wholly given over to evil — is a soil that is thoroughly foul." The first householder said, "Friend, is there a better field than that?" The other replied, "There is — the hearers of the Blessed One."

The first householder said, "Friend, do not even speak their name!" The other said, "But have they come here?" "They have. They are the group of six." "And what have they been doing?" "Such and such things." The other replied, "Friend, you have taken worthless pebbles from a great ocean." The first householder said, "Are there other fine hearers of the Blessed One?" "There are. If you were ever to see the Venerable Śāriputra, the great Maudgalyāyana, Nāgasamudra, Apratihata, and other great hearers of the Blessed One, there would be such grounds for you to develop genuine faith." The first householder said, "If they were to come here, I would provide them with whatever alms food they require."

That householder then thought to himself, "Now I shall go and make a request to the Blessed One." So that householder converted his goods into money and, taking the proceeds, set out in the direction of Śrāvastī, and in time arrived at Śrāvastī. He then hid his carrying-net in the shop and went to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, he bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side.

Seated to one side, that householder addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, at a certain steep cliff there is a great householder who provides lodging for the renunciants (śramaṇas) and brahmins of the four directions. He supplies all who dwell there with whatever alms food they need. If it please the Blessed One — out of compassion for him — to send some monks there so that he may see the hearers of the Blessed One, that would be excellent."

The Blessed One said nothing to that householder — which was his consent.

Then that householder, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been given, bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Then the Blessed One considered which monk would be able to tame that householder along with his retinue and the assembly of people dwelling at that cliff, and he saw that it was the monk Śāriputra who would tame them. The Blessed One then addressed the Venerable Śāriputra: "Śāriputra, tend to the great householder at that steep cliff, together with his retinue and the assembly of people dwelling at the cliff."

The Venerable Śāriputra replied, "Venerable One, I shall do as commanded," and having received the instruction from the Blessed One, he set out with a retinue of five hundred, wandering stage by stage in the direction of that cliff. Journeying in stages, he arrived at that cliff and entered the lodging house of that householder.

The householder heard that the Venerable Śāriputra had arrived at that cliff with a retinue of five hundred and had entered his lodging house. Upon hearing this, he went to where the Venerable Śāriputra was, and having arrived, he prostrated with his head at the feet of the Venerable Śāriputra and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the Venerable Śāriputra proceeded to instruct that householder thoroughly with Dharma-endowed discourse, to lead him to full understanding, to uplift him completely, and to fill him with great joy. In many ways, with Dharma-endowed discourse, he thoroughly instructed him, led him to full understanding, uplifted him, and filled him with joy, and then fell silent.

Then that householder rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, and facing the direction where the Venerable Śāriputra was, joined his palms in reverence and addressed the Venerable Śāriputra with these words: "Would the Venerable Śāriputra be so gracious as to accept tomorrow's midday meal together with the community of monks?" The Venerable Śāriputra accepted by remaining silent, and the householder, understanding from his silence that he had accepted, prostrated with his head at the feet of the Venerable Śāriputra and departed from his presence.

That very night the householder made preparations, readying clean and pure food and drink. Rising early the next morning, he spread out seats, set out water for washing, and sent word to the Venerable Śāriputra: "Venerable Śāriputra, if you would be so kind as to arrive at the midday hour, may the Venerable Śāriputra please take note that the time has now come."

Then the Venerable Śāriputra, in the early morning, dressed himself and, taking up his bowl and robes, set out surrounded by the assembly of monks with the community of monks before him, and went to the home of that householder. Having arrived, he sat upon the seat that had been spread at the head of the community of monks. The householder, perceiving that the Venerable Śāriputra and the community of monks were comfortably seated, satisfied and refreshed them from his own hands with clean and pure food and drink. Having in many ways satisfied and refreshed them from his own hands with clean and pure food and drink, and seeing that the Venerable Śāriputra had finished eating, had washed his hands, and had set down his bowl, the householder took a low seat and sat before the Venerable Śāriputra in order to hear the Dharma.

Seated there, the householder said to the Venerable Śāriputra: "Venerable Śāriputra, please teach the Dharma. For your sake, householder, let a seat be spread in this spacious open area. And tomorrow the noble Śāriputra will teach the Dharma to the great assembly of people here at this cliff. Make a proclamation: 'Let those among you who wish to hear the Dharma come forward.'"

The Venerable Śāriputra gave his thanks, rose from his seat, and departed. Since that householder was the most renowned person at that cliff, he had seats spread in a spacious open area and caused this proclamation to be made to the great assembly of people at that cliff: "Tomorrow the noble Śāriputra will teach the Dharma here. Let those among you who wish to hear the Dharma come forward. And any among you who does not come to see the truths there shall be doomed to wander in saṃsāra for a very long time."

Then the Venerable Śāriputra went to that place and sat upon the seat that had been spread at the head of the community of monks.

Many hundreds of thousands of living creatures had also gathered there — some out of curiosity, and some impelled by the roots of virtue they had planted in former lives. The Venerable Śāriputra, having understood the intentions, latent tendencies, constitutions, and dispositions of that assembly, taught the Dharma in such a way that the householder together with his retinue, along with twenty thousand living creatures, saw the truths directly. Some among them actualized the fruit of stream-entry (sotāpatti); some actualized the fruit of once-returning; some actualized the fruit of non-returning; some went forth from home life, and by abandoning all afflictions, actualized arhatship itself; some aroused the mind of awakening directed toward the enlightenment of a śrāvaka; some aroused the mind of awakening directed toward the enlightenment of a pratyekabuddha; and some aroused the mind of awakening directed toward unsurpassed, perfectly complete buddhahood. Having thus taught the Dharma, the greater part of that assembly was established in devotion to the Buddha, in reliance upon the Dharma, and in refuge in the Saṅgha.

Since the Venerable Śāriputra had taught the Dharma for a very long time, the sun had passed its zenith and the wind had come to blow at his back. The householder then said: "Venerable Śāriputra, please stay for this reason at my dwelling place, and I shall see to your needs by providing you with almsfood." Śāriputra replied: "Householder, it is on account of you yourself that the Blessed One will establish a rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya — and so I must go."

Thereupon the Venerable Śāriputra, while still unwell, finished his meal and departed from that cliff, making his way toward Śrāvastī, traveling on gradually until at last he arrived at Śrāvastī. There the monks who were staying with the Venerable Śāriputra and those who were in his retinue asked him: "Venerable ones, how was the journey — comfortable? Was it somewhat comfortable? Or somewhat uncomfortable?" They replied: "It was somewhat comfortable, and somewhat uncomfortable." "What was comfortable? The fact that the preceptor accomplished the training of so many beings to be tamed — that was comfortable. And what was uncomfortable? The fact that the preceptor, though unwell, left that cliff in the heat of midday — that was uncomfortable."

When this was reported, the monks brought the matter before the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, except in case of illness, it is permitted for a monk to carry someone on his back." Then the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of those who desire training, who revere training, and who are devoted to the requisites of training, addressed the monks accordingly, with words in full accord with and consonant with that topic, befitting the occasion, and declared to the monks:

"Monks, what was formerly established remains as a rule, and what follows is now permitted. My śrāvakas are to learn this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: a monk who is not ill and who has spent the night in a single lodging place shall eat one portion of almsfood. To eat more than that is an offense.

The phrase 'who has spent the night in a single lodging place' means: one who has spent the night in the lodging place of a non-Buddhist (tīrthika). 'A monk' means a monk of this Dharma. 'Who is not ill' means with the exception of one who is ill. 'Shall eat one portion of almsfood' means one meal. 'To eat more than that' means to eat a greater amount. 'Is an offense' means it causes burning, scorching, and falling into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of misfortune. Furthermore, as long as such a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of wholesome dharmas.

Therefore it is said to be an offense. How does a transgression come about in this regard? If one stays there and eats there, staying there incurs a fault and eating there incurs an offense. If one stays there but eats elsewhere, staying there incurs a fault but eating elsewhere incurs no offense. If one stays elsewhere but eats there, staying elsewhere incurs no offense but eating there incurs an offense. If one stays elsewhere and eats elsewhere, neither incurs an offense.

If an assembly, or relatives, or a donor says, "Stay right here," there is no offense. There is no offense for one who is a beginner, for one who is mentally deranged, for one who is disturbed in mind, or for one who is troubled by painful sensations.

Here ends the thirty-second offense, that of eating while staying in a single lodging place.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga, the fifty-second fascicle.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. When a group of like-minded monks had come up along the northern road to Śrāvastī, the Six-Group monks heard of this and said among themselves: "Friends, Nandaka, we have heard that a group of like-minded monks has come up along the northern road to Śrāvastī. If we can manage to accomplish even a small thing, let us go out to meet them. If they say, 'Give us some alms food,' we shall say, 'Having a full belly will do.' If they say, 'Give us some robes,' we shall take them." And so those monks went out and said, "Friends, come and sit down; we shall teach the Dharma." Those monks paid homage at their feet and sat down in front of them to hear the Dharma. The Six-Group monks then taught them the Dharma, after which those monks said, "Noble ones, please accept alms food right here." The Six-Group monks replied, "Friends, having a full belly will do."

The Six-Group monks came again and again to teach the Dharma, and again and again the like-minded monks said, "Noble ones, please accept alms food right here," and again and again the Six-Group monks replied, "Friends, having a full belly will do."

Then on another occasion the like-minded monks said to one another, "Knowledgeable ones, there is no grass here for the oxen. Let us go to another rocky hillside for a while, let the oxen graze and rest there, and when we have turned the wagons around and are ready to depart, then we shall set out for Śrāvastī." So they drove the oxen to a rocky hillside so that the oxen might graze there.

The Six-Group monks, rising early the next morning, went out to teach the Dharma as before. But after a while, when the like-minded monks were nowhere to be seen, those monks sat down troubled and disheartened. Then a certain man came and said, "Noble ones, why do you sit there so troubled and downcast?" The Six-Group monks replied, "Friend, some like-minded companions of ours were staying in this direction, and they have gone away without so much as a glance toward us." The man replied, "Noble ones, they have not gone away for good. It is just that their oxen had no fodder, so they have gone to a certain rocky hillside to graze the oxen, and they will come back here again." "Friend, may you be well," said the Six-Group monks, and they went to that rocky hillside.

When they arrived, the like-minded monks saw them approaching from a great distance and spoke these verses:

Do not go to a rugged mountain.
Even if you go, do not stay long.
Just as rugged mountains are,
So too is dwelling on a mountain.

One who dwells first on a mountain
Is like refined gold being polished;
But when one begins plotting harm to people,
That mountain becomes just what it is.

When the like-minded monks heard this, they said, "Noble ones, why do you reproach us?"

"Friends, you are our companions, and it is because we care for you that we have set aside our own virtuous pursuits to teach you the Dharma — and yet you have come here without so much as a glance back at us. Noble ones, it is not that we have all come here on our own account for all our purposes. The fact is, our oxen have no price here, and so we are here tending our oxen. As soon as we have sold our goods and set out, we shall return again to Śrāvastī. Friends, do stay — let us teach you the Dharma."

At that, the like-minded monks prostrated at the feet of the Six-Group monks, took seats lower than theirs, and sat down before them to hear the Dharma. The Six-Group monks taught them the Dharma, and when they had done so, the monks said, "Noble ones, please take alms right here."

"Friends, eating one's fill is enough."

Then the merchant leader said, "Wise ones, the noble ones have said that eating one's fill again and again is sufficient — but these people have no food; they are short of food. Let food be given to them."

"So be it," they agreed, and they served each of the Six-Group monks a portion the color of a silk-worm larva.

Then the Six-Group monks said, "Friends, you say again and again to take alms — but let us see what kind of alms are actually being given." One of the Six-Group monks took up a vessel the size of a cooking-pot and said, "Pour in here." The like-minded monks thought, "This vessel is enormous; if it is filled, there will be enough alms to fill all their bellies." And so they filled that vessel from their provisions and offered it.

The other Six-Group monks did the same, one after another, each taking up a vessel the size of a cooking-pot. And when the like-minded monks had filled all six such vessels from their provisions and offered them, all the provisions the like-minded monks had for the journey were exhausted. Then the like-minded monks said, "Noble ones, we came here with a small amount of provisions for the return journey — and all of that has been consumed. Let us send this man along with some kārṣāpaṇas to Śrāvastī together with the noble ones; let the noble ones purchase our provisions, prepare them, and send them back to us along with someone to escort them. Friends, please do this."

The like-minded monks sent a man behind the Six-Group monks with kārṣāpaṇas. The Six-Group monks went to a temple hall and said to the man, "Good fellow, do this task." He did it. Then they said, "Good fellow, do this other task as well." He did that too. The Six-Group monks kept the man busy with one errand after another until the sun went down. Then they dismissed him afterward, saying, "Now go and make the purchases."

The man bought the provisions himself and, as he was making his way back through the dense outskirts of Śrāvastī, he was attacked by bandits, and he arrived alone back among the like-minded monks.

When the like-minded monks saw him, they asked, "What have you brought?" He replied, "Nothing." "Why not?" "I was set upon by bandits." They said, "Did the noble ones not send someone to escort you?" He replied, "Wise ones, in truth it was they themselves who did this to me — they kept me running errands alone from morning until the sun went down, then sent me off saying, 'Now go and make the purchases.' I bought the provisions myself, and as I was making my way back through the dense outskirts of Śrāvastī, I was attacked by bandits."

At this the like-minded monks criticized and rebuked the Six-Group monks, saying: "The conduct of a śramaṇa (ascetic) among the Śākya sons is mere words; the conduct of a brahmin is mere words — for they say, 'I will help,' yet do nothing but harm." And they spread the story abroad.

They slandered them in this way. Now, this is how things stood at that time: the Blessed One, the buddha, had not yet established the training rules for the hearers in the Vinaya. The Blessed One was staying in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Now in Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder who had taken a wife from among his social equals. He took pleasure with her, was delighted with her, and lived with her in joy and happiness. A daughter was born to them on the right side, and they raised her and brought her up until she was grown. When the time came to find suitors for all the other girls of her age, none came to ask for this girl, because she was a daughter born on the right side.

There was another householder in Śrāvastī who had likewise taken a wife from his social equals. His first wife passed away through the ripening of her own karma. He took a second, and she too passed away. In the same way, he took wife after wife up to the seventh, and each of them passed away. Because of the karma that would lead to him being slandered, this householder came to be called "the wife-killer" — the one who kills his wives. Whenever someone came to ask for a daughter for him, the girl's family refused to give her, saying: "Why should we give our daughter away? We will not." When he sought to arrange a match through female go-betweens, those women too said: "Why should we send her to your house when you only destroy us?"

The householder fell into utter despair and began to mend the fence around his house himself. One day a friend, a younger companion of his, came by and saw him and asked: "What are you doing?" The householder replied: "I am mending the fence." The friend asked: "Why are you mending the fence yourself?" The householder said: "I took one wife, and she passed away through the ripening of her own karma. I took a second, and she too passed away. In the same way, up to the seventh — each one passed away." The friend said: "Why don't you seek another?" The householder answered: "When I try, they refuse to give a girl, saying, 'Why should we give our daughter away? We will not.'" The friend said: "Why not seek through female go-betweens?" The householder replied: "I tried, and those women too said,

'Why should we send her to your house when you only destroy us?'" The friend said: "Why not seek the girl born on the right side? They will not refuse her. Go and ask — since that family is utterly weary of her, they will give her." The householder went to the home of the father of the right-side daughter and greeted them, saying: "May all be well, may all be well." They said: "What have you come to ask?" He replied: "I have come to ask for the girl — to ask for a bride." "Which girl?" "The one born on the right side." Since they were utterly exhausted by her, they said: "We will give her." He said: "When will you send her as a bride?" He replied: "In several days' time." The friend said, "Let it be so," and left.

Then that younger friend was seized by regret, thinking: "I have done something wrong by urging my friend to seek the right-side daughter. She is of ill omen, and if she causes my friend's death, that would be terrible." He went to the householder and said: "Have you obtained the right-side daughter?" The householder said: "I have." Then the friend spoke these verses:

Chewing a twig of lac-tree wood, lying down showing the back at nightfall, sleeping heavily, drinking curds, and taking to wife a right-side daughter — even the peaceful deteriorate from their peace.
As when dropping strikes a pit,
as iron falls upon stone,
you too may be slain by a wife — and since she is a right-side daughter, let us see which of you two prevails.

"Friend, that woman is of ill omen, and it would be terrible if she were to cause your death. Instead, take my own sister, a left-side daughter."

The householder said: "Friend, I cannot abandon her now. Nevertheless, let some arrangement be made in this matter."

The mother of the right-side daughter then began preparing a wedding feast. Now, the house was one that members of the group of six frequented, and so the group of six divided the morning alms route among themselves, took up their bowls and robes, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Going about their rounds in due order, they entered that very house. As they were about to receive their portions, the porters who were carrying loads saw them, and said: "Sister, is your marriage ceremony soon upon you?" She replied: "Noble ones, your elder sister is about to be given in marriage, and we are preparing her wedding feast." The group of six said: "Sister, might we receive a little something?" She said: "Noble ones, who would give to you? This is yours — it belongs to you yourselves." The group of six said: "Sister, never mind what may be stored away in the back — let all that be. Just see what you can give us right now." She relaxed her guard, and those porters filled every bowl with loads of food, and the group of six collected all her food and departed.

After a while the householder arrived, and his wife said: "Noble sons who are recipients of gifts came along, and they took all the food and left. Please tell him who is to be the husband to stay just a few more days while the wedding feast is prepared for your friend." The householder said: "Good woman, he cannot stay. Just send the girl off as a bride, and later provide food to the relatives." His wife said: "Noble son, he is a wife-killer, and so no one else would give him a daughter. He should leave, and she will stay." The householder went to the man and said: "My son, whatever food we had prepared, the recipients of gifts have consumed it. Now, please stay just a few more days while food is prepared for the relatives." He replied: "I will not stay. If this very day you send the bride and give her to me, I will take her as my wife. If you do not give her, I will take another wife and abandon your daughter." The householder went to his wife and told her: "Good woman, the husband says: 'If this very day you send the bride and give her to me, I will take her as my wife. If you do not give her, I will take another wife and abandon your daughter.'" His wife said: "Noble son, he is a wife-killer, and so who else would give him a daughter?" But she then began preparing the wedding feast.

The husband took the friend's sister, a left-side daughter, as his wife. The mother of the right-side daughter, having prepared the food, again said to the householder: "Noble son, now go to that husband and invite him to come and receive his bride." The householder went to him and said: "My son, now come and receive your bride." He replied: "You caused me to miss that day, and so now I will not take her."

The householder seized that husband, crying out and dragging him to the royal palace, and the husband defeated the householder in that proceeding.

The mother of the right-side daughter sat weeping, saying: "He has not taken my daughter." Meanwhile, on the last day of that period, certain neighbors were speaking critically of the practice of the śramaṇas among the sons of the Śākyaś — speaking critically of the śramaṇa's way of life and of the brahmin's way of life — saying: "In this manner, they create obstacles for a daughter who has already been given away." And they mocked them openly.

While they were speaking critically in this way, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then, as before, the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks in relation to this occurrence, this basis of deliberation, and this occasion, and so forth. As before: "The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, knowingly bring things to light" — and so forth as before. The Blessed One questioned the group of six, saying: "Monks, is it true that you have done something so unseemly?" "Venerable one, we have." The Blessed One rebuked them for conduct unworthy of the śramaṇa's way, for conduct unsuitable, improper, and inconsistent with the rules — declaring that what has been gone forth into the renunciant life should not be done. Then, having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training is to be established in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

When a large number of monks have gone to houses, if faithful brahmins and householders press upon those monks flour and the like, and lumps of food, repeatedly and in due time, and if those monks desire to accept, they may take two or three bowlfuls. Having taken two or three bowlfuls, they should go out to the park outside, share with the monks who are staying there, and eat together themselves. That is the proper procedure."

The word "monks" refers to the group of six. "A large number" means more than two — that is what "a large number" means. "To houses" means to the houses of brahmins and householders. "Have gone" means having departed. "Those monks" means those same monks. "Faithful brahmins and householders" — "faithful" means those with faith directed toward the buddha, toward the Dharma, and toward the Saṅgha; those who have gone for refuge to the buddha, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha. "Flour and the like" means flour and fine flour. "Lumps of food" means cooked cakes. "Repeatedly and in due time" means offered again and again. "If they desire" means if they seek it. "Those monks" means whatever monks there may be. "They may take two or three bowlfuls" — there are three kinds of bowl: large, medium, and small. The large one is that into which, when a thick rice gruel cooked in a small vessel of the Magadha measure, together with legumes and vegetables, is poured, the edge of the rim alone does not reach to the navel of the thumb.

The small one is that into which, when a thick rice gruel cooked in a full small Magadha vessel, together with legumes and vegetables, is poured, the edge of the rim alone does not reach to the navel of the thumb. The medium is between those two. "If one takes more than that" means more than that amount. "It constitutes a transgression" — it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinies of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of misfortune. Furthermore, for as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of wholesome dharma — therefore it is said to constitute a transgression.

"Having taken two or three full alms-bowls, go to the pleasure grove outside, and share with whatever monks are gathered there" — this means: go to the temple outside the house, and give to whatever monks are gathered there as well.

Now, how does a transgression arise in this matter? If a monk takes three large alms-bowls, the act of taking constitutes a wrongdoing, and the act of eating constitutes a transgression. If a monk takes two large and one medium, the act of taking constitutes a wrongdoing, and the act of eating constitutes a transgression. If a monk takes two large and one small, the act of taking constitutes a wrongdoing, and the act of eating constitutes a transgression. If a monk takes two medium and one large, the act of taking constitutes a wrongdoing, and the act of eating constitutes a transgression. Whatever amount a monk takes in alms that exceeds two and a half small measures, in all such cases it constitutes a transgression. There is no transgression for whatever a donor does of their own accord. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is mentally disturbed, one whose mind is agitated, or one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

The thirty-third transgression — that of taking more than three alms-bowls' worth — is complete.

A summary verse:

One seat, and giving up water likewise,
Fermented foods, permitted foods,
Let go, excessive gruel,
And the group of sour foods — these are gathered here.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the pleasure grove of Anāthapiṇḍada. Then the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, I eat only one meal per sitting. Since I eat one meal per sitting, I live on little, am little troubled, am little afflicted, am light of movement, live with vitality and strength, in happiness, without blame, and I dwell in comfort." "Monks, come now, you too eat one meal per sitting. When you eat one meal per sitting, you will live on little, be little troubled, be little afflicted, be light of movement, live with vitality and strength, in happiness, without blame, and dwell in comfort."

The monks came to eat one meal per sitting. But when they ate one meal per sitting, if they saw their preceptor they would rise, and if they saw their abbot, their teacher, or someone like a teacher they would also rise — and because they would not eat saying "We have given this up," they became emaciated, feeble, lean, thin, and their bodies lost their fullness.

The blessed buddhas act knowingly yet feign ignorance, and so the Blessed One asked the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, I said to the monks, 'Monks, I eat one meal per sitting. Since I eat one meal per sitting, I live on little, am little troubled, am little afflicted, am light of movement, live with vitality and strength, in happiness, without blame, and dwell in comfort. Monks, come now, you too eat one meal per sitting. When you eat one meal per sitting, you will live on little, be little troubled, be little afflicted, be light of movement, live with vitality and strength, in happiness, without blame, and dwell in comfort.' Now, what is the cause, what is the condition, by which the monks have become emaciated, feeble, lean, thin, and their bodies have lost their fullness?"

"Reverend monks, the Blessed One has declared: 'Monks, I eat one meal per sitting. When I eat one meal per sitting, I live on little, am little troubled, am little afflicted, am light of movement, live with vitality and strength, in happiness, without blame, and dwell in comfort. Monks, come now, you too eat one meal per sitting. When you eat one meal per sitting, you will live on little, be little troubled, be little afflicted, be light of movement, live with vitality and strength, in happiness, without blame, and dwell in comfort.'

"After the Blessed One declared this, the monks began seeking out the single-meal practice. Yet in their pursuit of the single-meal practice, when they saw their preceptor, abbot, teacher, or one who is like a teacher, they would rise to their feet. Having done so, they would say, 'We have given this up,' and would not seek to eat — and because they did not eat, they became emaciated, feeble, lean, thin, and their bodies lost their fullness. Reverend one, this is the cause, this is the condition, by which the monks have now become emaciated, feeble, lean, thin, and their bodies have lost their fullness."

Then Ānanda said: "Therefore, reverend one, one should eat a satisfying sufficiency without giving up food entirely, and when eating has commenced, one should not rise to one's feet upon seeing one's preceptor, abbot, teacher, or one who is like a teacher."

The Blessed One then declared: "One should eat a satisfying sufficiency without giving up food entirely, and when eating has commenced, one should not rise to one's feet upon seeing one's preceptor, abbot, teacher, or one who is like a teacher."

But having heard this, the monks gave up food as completely as water, renouncing even leaves, pulse, roots, and dried provisions, saying "We have given these up" — and because they would not eat, they became emaciated, feeble, lean, thin, and their bodies lost their fullness.

Now the buddha, the Blessed One, knowing full well, asked the venerable Ānanda this question: "Ānanda, I have declared that one should eat a satisfying sufficiency without giving up food entirely, and that when eating has commenced, one should not rise to one's feet upon seeing one's preceptor, abbot, teacher, or one who is like a teacher. What then is the cause, what is the condition, by which the monks have now become emaciated, feeble, lean, thin, and their bodies have lost their fullness?"

"Reverend Blessed One, after you declared that one should eat a satisfying sufficiency without giving up food entirely, and that when eating has commenced one should not rise to one's feet upon seeing one's preceptor, abbot, teacher, or one who is like a teacher — the monks gave up food as completely as water, renouncing even leaves, pulse, roots, and dried provisions, saying 'We have given these up,' and would not eat. This is the cause, reverend one, this is the condition, by which the monks have now become emaciated, feeble, lean, thin, and their bodies have lost their fullness."

"Ānanda, therefore these are the five planted things by eating which one will not come to give up food, and these are the five cooked foods by eating which one will come to give up other foods.

"What are the five planted things by eating which one will not come to give up food? They are: roots, stalks, leaves, flowers, and fruits that are cultivated. These are the five planted things by eating which one will not come to give up food.

"What are the five cooked foods by eating which one will come to give up other foods? They are: cooked grain, hot cooked rice, meat, oil-rich food, and sweet food. These are the five cooked foods by eating which one will come to give up other foods."

After finishing the five planted things, one should eat the five cooked foods; and after eating the five cooked foods, one should not partake of the five planted things. A monk who eats the five cooked foods and then partakes of the five planted things incurs a serious offence.

The Blessed One had declared, "The five planted things will not lead to giving up food, whereas the five cooked foods will lead to giving up other foods." But they refused to eat from the hands that had handled those things, and from the alms-bowls that had been touched by them, saying "We have given those up." And so those monks became emaciated, weak, haggard, gaunt, and their bodies wasted away.

Now, the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, know and yet set things in motion, and so the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, I have declared that the five planted things will not lead to giving up food, whereas the five cooked foods will lead to giving up other foods. So then, what is the cause, and what is the condition, by which monks have now come to be emaciated, weak, haggard, gaunt, and with bodies wasted away?"

The venerable Ānanda replied: "Blessed One, you declared, 'The five planted things will not lead to giving up food, whereas the five cooked foods will lead to giving up other foods,' and so they refuse to eat, saying 'We have given those up,' from the hands that have handled such things and from the alms-bowls that have been touched by them. That is the cause, Blessed One, and that is the condition by which monks have now come to be emaciated, weak, haggard, gaunt, and with bodies wasted away."

"Ānanda, that being the case, one should speak of giving up in terms of five causes, and one should speak of not giving up in terms of five causes.

"What are the five causes by which giving up is to be declared? They are: having food, having someone to present food, having food that has been begun, having food that has been relinquished, and falling away from one's deportment.

"How is there 'having food'? By there being the five planted things and the five cooked foods. That is how there is having food.

"How is there 'having someone to present food'? By there being a woman, a man, or a person of the third sex. That is how there is having someone to present food.

"How is there 'having food that has been begun'? By there being an undertaking of all five planted things and all five cooked foods. That is how there is having food that has been begun.

"How is there 'having food that has been relinquished'? By there being a relinquishment of the five planted things and the five cooked foods. That is how there is having food that has been relinquished.

"How is there 'falling away from one's deportment'? By rising from the seat on which one had been sitting. That is how there is falling away from one's deportment.

"By these five causes, giving up is to be declared.

"What are the five causes by which not giving up is to be declared? They are: having no food, having no one to present food, having no food that has been begun, having no food that has been relinquished, and not falling away from one's deportment.

"How is there 'having no food'? By there being no five planted things and no five cooked foods. That is how there is having no food.

"How is there 'having no one to present food'? By there being no woman, no man, and no person of the third sex. That is how there is having no one to present food.

"How is there 'having no food that has been begun'? By there being no undertaking of all five planted things and all five cooked foods. That is how there is having no food that has been begun.

"How is there 'having no food that has been relinquished'? By there being no relinquishment of the five planted things and the five cooked foods. That is how there is having no food that has been relinquished.

"How is there 'not falling away from one's deportment'? By not having risen from the seat on which one had been sitting.

That is how there is not falling away from one's deportment. By those five factors, the food is to be declared as not having been relinquished.

Furthermore, by five factors food is to be declared as having been relinquished, and by five factors it is to be declared as not having been relinquished. What are the five factors by which it is to be declared as having been relinquished? Relinquishing by means of what is suitable; relinquishing by means of something mixed with what is suitable; relinquishing by means of something that has not been stored; relinquishing by means of something mixed with what has not been stored; and falling away from one's deportment. By those five factors, the food is to be declared as having been relinquished. What are the five factors by which it is to be declared as not having been relinquished? Relinquishing by means of what is not suitable; relinquishing by means of something mixed with what is not suitable; relinquishing by means of something that has been stored; relinquishing by means of something mixed with what has been stored; and not falling away from one's deportment. By those five factors, the food is to be declared as not having been relinquished.

Furthermore, by five words without a remainder, the food is to be declared as having been relinquished, and by five words with a remainder, it is to be declared as not having been relinquished. What are the five words without a remainder? The words "Release it," "Give it," "Take it away," "It has been eaten," and "It is enough." By those five words without a remainder, the food is to be declared as having been relinquished. What are the five words with a remainder? The words "Release it for now," "Give it for now," "Take it away for now," "It has been eaten for now," and "It is enough for now." By those five words with a remainder, the food is to be declared as not having been relinquished.

After the Blessed One declared that a monk must not eat food that has been relinquished, the group of six went ahead and ate both food that had been relinquished and food that had not been relinquished. Then monks of few wishes, on learning that the Blessed One had declared that a monk must not eat food that has been relinquished, reproached them, saying: "Why do these monks eat food both when it has been relinquished and when it has not been relinquished?" They rebuked them, spread the matter abroad, and spoke critically. At that, the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this basis, and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth as before. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though already knowing, made inquiry — and so forth as before. The buddha, the Blessed One, then questioned the group of six monks: "Monks, when I declared that a monk must not eat food that has been relinquished, did you truly eat both food that had been relinquished and food that had not been relinquished?" "Venerable One, it is so." The buddha, the Blessed One, rebuked them, saying: "That which is not in keeping with the practice of a renunciant, not in accord, not fitting, not consonant with the rules — such conduct is not to be done by one who has gone forth." Then, after reproaching them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers is to be established in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, having eaten and being satisfied, accepts further food from what has been relinquished, or undertakes to eat it, or eats it — he commits a transgression.

Thus did the Blessed One establish that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A certain householder invited the buddha along with the monastic Saṅgha of monks to another home for the midday meal.

There were very many monk attendants for very many sick monks, and those attendants, having eaten themselves, stored away the leftover almsfood from the sick monks' full bowls. The sick monks were unable to eat, and the monk attendants, for their part, would not eat it either, saying, "We have already relinquished it." There being no one from the enclosure nor any novices present, they piled up great mounds of food in the enclosure, and when crows came to eat there, a great clamor of crows arose.

The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, know yet feign not to know. And so the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, what is the cause of this great clamor of crows that has arisen in the enclosure?"

"Blessed One, a certain householder invited the buddha along with the monastic Saṅgha of monks to another home for the midday meal. There were very many attendants for very many monks who were bathing, and those attendants, having bathed themselves, stored away the leftover almsfood from the bathing monks' soaking bowls. The bathing monks had not yet had a chance to bathe, and the monk bathing-attendants, for their part, would not use it either, saying, 'We have already relinquished it.' There being no one from the enclosure nor any novices present, they piled up great mounds of food in the enclosure, and when crows came to scavenge there, a great clamor of crows arose."

Then the Blessed One thought to himself: "I should grant a further permission, both so that the monks may remain in comfort and so that the donors' act of giving may be fully enjoyed." Having thought thus, he said to the monks: "Monks, therefore I permit you to eat with a further permission as what has been additionally made."

When the Blessed One had declared that eating with a further permission was permitted, the monks did not know how to make the further permission. The Blessed One then declared: "If a monk has finished eating and relinquished his meal — having made it complete and final — and if any person who has themselves finished eating and fully made things complete then finds food and wishes to eat, that monk should join his two hands together, receive it, and eat. But if a monk has finished eating and has not relinquished, yet has not fallen from proper conduct, or if a monk has finished eating and has relinquished and has not fallen from proper conduct, one should sit before that person in a squatting posture and say these words: 'Venerable one, please pay attention. I, the monk called such-and-such, am one who has sought and relinquished, and having made things complete and final, I seek to find and eat what has been additionally prepared. Please grant it to me with the further permission.' Then, after that person has eaten two or three mouthfuls, he should say: 'That will do for you — now go.' And with that the further permission is made.

In that regard, if the monk has finished eating and has not relinquished, and has not fallen from proper conduct, he himself, having eaten two or three mouthfuls, makes the further permission. In that regard, if the monk has finished eating and has relinquished, and has not fallen from proper conduct, he should hand it over without eating it himself, saying 'That will do for you — now go,' and thereby the further permission is made. If one eats without doing this, it becomes a serious transgression.

In five cases it should be said that the further permission has not been made: what are the five? When it is done outside the boundary, in a direction where the person cannot be reached, from behind, from the side, and when one leads the other into a lapse from proper conduct. In those five cases it should be said that the further permission has not been made.

In five cases it should be said that the further permission has been made: what are the five? When it is not outside the boundary, in a direction where the person can be reached, not from behind, not from the side, and when one does not lead the other into a lapse from proper conduct. In those five cases it should be said that the further permission has been made.

Furthermore, in five cases it should be said that the further permission has not been made: what are the five? When it is outside the boundary, in a direction where the person cannot be reached, at the base of the alms bowl, from above, and when one leads the other into a lapse from proper conduct. In those five cases it should be said that the further permission has not been made. In five cases it should be said that the further permission has been made: what are the five? When it is not outside the boundary, in a direction where the person can be reached, not at the base of the alms bowl, not from above, and when one does not lead the other into a lapse from proper conduct. In those five cases it should be said that the further permission has been made.

What one person has made as a further permission may be eaten by many, and in this one should have no regret.

Then the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of those who desire the training, who are respectful toward the training, and who are equipped with the requisites of the training, addressed the monks with words suited to this occasion, words of greater import, words endowed with qualities befitting it, and then declared to the monks: "Monks, the foregoing was a rule, and this is a permission. My hearers should establish the following as a training rule in the Vinaya: If a monk, having already eaten and having set aside the remainder, makes an appointment or eats food without having made a further permission, it is a transgression.

As for the phrase 'a monk,' this refers to the group of six or to anyone else of that kind. The phrase 'having already eaten and having set aside the remainder' means from what has been fully and completely consumed. The phrase 'without having made a further permission' means without making it additional, without discarding it and without having fully released it. The phrase 'makes an appointment or eats food' refers to the five kinds of foods to be appointed and the five kinds of foods to be eaten. The phrase 'eats' means swallowing it down the throat. The phrase 'it is a transgression' means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the lower destinies of the hell-beings, animals, the wretched hungry ghosts, the miserable states, and the lower rebirths. Furthermore, as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome Dharmas — and for that reason it is said to be a transgression.

As for how a transgression arises in this case: if a monk, perceiving as set aside what has been set aside, makes an appointment or eats food without having made a further permission, it is a transgression. If a monk, with doubt about what has been set aside, makes an appointment or eats food without having made a further permission, it is a transgression. If a monk, perceiving as set aside what has not been set aside, makes an appointment or eats food without having made a further permission, it is a wrongdoing. If a monk, with doubt about what has not been set aside, makes an appointment or eats food without having made a further permission, it is a wrongdoing.

The venerable Upāli (Nyēba Khor) asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, how should something like a hard food be set aside?" The venerable Upāli is the one who tilts his face upward. "Venerable one, how should something like a soft food be set aside?" The venerable Upāli is the one who extends the five fingers forward. There is no setting aside for what the venerable Upāli has drunk down the throat. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is overcome by feeling.

The transgression relating to the one-seat meal is the thirty-fourth. It is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time there was a householder in Śrāvastī who had taken a wife of equal family and was sporting and rejoicing together with her.

sporting and rejoicing together with her. When he reached old age, his relatives were exhausted, his wealth was exhausted, and his possessions were depleted. He said to his wife, "Good woman, in my old age I am unable to acquire wealth, so I shall go forth into homelessness. My lady, please do likewise."

He went to the Jeta Grove, approached a certain monk, prostrated at his two feet, and said, "Noble one, I wish to go forth — please give me the going forth." The monk replied, "Good sir, I myself have gone forth and am newly ordained, so it is not appropriate for me to give the going forth." The man said, "Noble one, since I have come to you first of all, please entrust me to some other monk." There was a monk whose preceptor was a forest-dweller who practiced meditative concentration in a hermitage, so that monk led him to the preceptor and said, "Preceptor, this son of good family wishes to go forth and receive full ordination in the well-taught Dharma and Vinaya. For the sake of compassion, preceptor, please give him the going forth and please confer full ordination." The preceptor replied, "My son, the Blessed One has declared that it is not appropriate for monks to give the going forth and confer full ordination in a remote place and then fail to guide and teach the ordinand." The man said, "Preceptor, please just give the going forth and full ordination; I myself will read to him and teach him." The monk then gave him the going forth and conferred full ordination, and said, "Good sir, this person is your teacher, so you will read and receive instruction from him. As for whatever conduct is to be practiced, ask him about it and do it accordingly."

When he was reading and receiving instruction from the teacher, this newly entered elder forgot things repeatedly and kept incurring downfalls, so the teacher made him sit cross-legged before him and would put him through the confessing of downfalls. The newly entered elder thought, "My teacher constantly makes me sit cross-legged before him and puts me through confessing downfalls. I wonder what means there might be for me to make him sit cross-legged before me and put him through confessing downfalls."

A householder invited the community of monks headed by the Buddha to another house at midday. The community of monks headed by the Buddha went, the Blessed One ate the midday meal, and then began to teach the Dharma to that householder. The monk said to the newly entered elder, "Elder, come over here — walk along in the manner of laypeople going home." The two of them walked along in the manner of laypeople going home. The people there said, "Noble ones, please take the midday meal. Householder, we two have already eaten." He replied, "Take what is left over and eat the surplus." He looked at the newly entered elder's face and said, "Elder, would you like some?" "I would." The two of them accepted what was given, departed, and went to the Jeta Grove. The monk said to the newly entered elder, "Elder, would you wash the bowls, or else go into the assembly hall and eat the surplus?" The newly entered elder said, "Please allow me to eat the surplus." The monk began washing the bowls, and the newly entered elder took the alms-bowl and entered the assembly hall, where he made himself eat the surplus from his own bowl but did not make the monk eat the surplus from his own bowl.

The monk washed the bowls, entered the assembly hall, and said, "Elder, were you permitted to eat the surplus?" He replied, "You were permitted." The monk sat down and ate. When he had eaten, the newly entered elder said, "Teacher, please open the confession session." He opened it. The newly entered elder said, "A downfall has occurred for you; please restore it according to the Dharma."

He replied, "I see no downfall." The newly entered elder said, "You ate food designated as a meal and as eatables without having made it into surplus." He replied, "Did I not ask you whether I might make you eat the surplus?" The newly entered elder said, "I permitted it for myself." He replied, "Newly entered elder, no downfall will attach to me, but there will indeed be a case of this very kind in which you yourself will incur a downfall." He then reported the matter to the monks. Some monks of few wishes, asking why monks would knowingly seek out an opportunity against a monk who had already eaten and had set aside his food, with the thought "By any means, let this monk commit an offense," and taking that very thought as their motivation, would serve him food not made into surplus, saying "Venerable one, eat this, take this of this" — these monks criticized, rebuked, and condemned him, saying "How can they offer, at such a time, food and eatables not made into surplus?" The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon, the Blessed One — "on this occurrence, with this as the basis, and on this occasion, assembled the community of monks" — and so forth, as before. "The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though omniscient, act as though unaware" — and so forth, also as before. The buddha, the Blessed One, questioned that monk: "Monk, is it true that you knowingly sought out an opportunity against a monk who had already eaten and set aside his food, thinking 'By any means, let this monk commit an offense,' and taking that very thought as your motivation, served him food not made into surplus, saying 'Venerable one, eat this, take this'?" He replied, "It is true, Blessed One." The buddha, the Blessed One, reproved him, saying that what is not the manner of a contemplative, what is not concordant, what is not proper, what is not in keeping with the rule — such conduct is not to be performed by one who has gone forth into homelessness. Thereupon, the Blessed One reproved him in many ways and then declared to the monks: "Monks, seeing ten benefits, the training rule for śrāvakas in the Vinaya is to be established" — and so forth, as before. "My śrāvakas are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, knowingly seeking out an opportunity against a monk who has already eaten and set aside his food, with the thought 'By any means, let this monk commit an offense,' and taking that very thought as his motivation, says 'Venerable one, eat this, take this' — if he offers food and eatables not made into surplus, it is a downfall-producing act.

Now, 'whatever monk' refers to one who belongs to this Dharma community. 'Knowingly' means either by his own recognition or by another's informing him. 'Monk' refers to one who belongs to this Dharma community. 'Who has already eaten and set aside his food' means one who has finished eating completely and conclusively. 'Seeking out an opportunity' means seeking a fault. 'With the thought "By any means, let this monk commit an offense"' means thinking 'By any means, let this monk be made to incur a downfall.' 'Taking that very thought as his motivation' means no other motivation than that. 'Venerable one, eat this, take this' refers to food designated as a meal and as eatables. 'Not made into surplus' means not having made it into surplus, not having discarded it, not having fully relinquished it. 'Food designated as a meal and as eatables' refers to the five kinds of meal-foods and the five kinds of eatables. 'If he offers' means if he offers again and again. 'A downfall-producing act' means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells among sentient beings, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies, into the state of ruin and wrong falling."

Furthermore, it is taught that so long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obscures the wholesome qualities — and for that reason it is called a downfall-producing act.

As for how a downfall arises in this case: if a monk, knowing even slightly that another monk has eaten his meal and has set aside the remainder, seeks an occasion with the thought, "By whatever means may I bring about an offense for this monk," and, using just that intention as the condition, then says to the venerable one, "Eat this! Take this!" — offering food designated as a meal and as eatables that has not been made into surplus — a downfall-producing act arises in every instance. For one who is a first-time offender, for one who is mentally deranged, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by feelings, there is no downfall. The thirty-fifth downfall-producing rule concerning offering to one who has set aside the remainder is complete.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the fifty-third fascicle.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandakanivāpa in the Bamboo Grove. At that time, the monk Devadatta, together with a great many monks, gathered inside a pleasure hall and was eating food. A monk of few duties reproached them, saying, "Why do you monks gather inside a pleasure hall to eat?" He slandered them, spread it about, and criticized them. On that occasion, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One convened the community of monks on account of this occurrence, this ground for discussion, and this occasion — and so forth, as before. As for the passage "the Blessed Buddhas, though knowing, nevertheless act with feigned ignorance" — this too is as before. The Blessed One questioned Devadatta: "Devadatta, is it true that you gathered together with a great many monks inside a pleasure hall and ate food?" "It is true, Reverend One." The Blessed One rebuked him in the manner of: "This is not the way of a monastic practitioner; it is not fitting, not proper, not in keeping with the rule — this is not to be done by one who has gone forth." Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, having seen the ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so on, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Eating while gathered together is a downfall-producing act." Thus the Blessed One established that rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

A great many monks who were ill went to a physician's quarters. The physician, upon seeing them, said, "Handsome ones, prescribe medicine for us." They replied, "Noble ones, you yourselves should present what is to be given. Who will provide it? We shall accept it." "Is it for the entire Saṅgha?" "No — it is for as many monks as are sick." The handsome physician said, "The Blessed One has established a rule of training against eating while gathered together." They replied, "Noble ones, your Teacher is compassionate; making this itself the condition, there may well be a case in which he would grant permission." Thereupon the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Therefore, excepting the time of illness."

Then, when the monks had performed work for the Saṅgha and for the stūpa, they grew weak from hunger, lay down exhausted, and were unable to engage in virtuous endeavors. Some faithful brahmins and householders came to the monastery, saw them, and asked, "Noble ones, if you are wholly devoted to the Teaching, why do you lie down exhausted and fail to engage in virtuous activities?" They replied, "We are hungry." "Why do you not request food? Who will provide it? We ourselves will provide it."

"Will you feed the entire Saṅgha?" "No, we will feed only you." When they said, "Good friends, the Blessed One has established a training rule concerning eating communally," the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Therefore, excepting the time of work."

When monks who were companions were traveling together along a road, they came to a certain cliff-face and said, "Good friends, wait here for a little while as we go out on alms round to this cliff-face." The companions said, "Noble ones, there is danger of bandits in this area behind us. Come this way, and we ourselves will provide alms." "Will one person give to all?" "No, some will give to four, and others to five." When they said, "Good friends, the Blessed One has established a training rule concerning eating communally," and those monks thereby greatly curtailed their eating, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Therefore, excepting the time of travel on the road."

When a great many monks who were companions boarded a boat together and were sailing through a region, they came to a certain cliff-face and said, "Good friends, wait here for a little while as we go out on alms round to this cliff-face." The companions said, "Noble ones, there is danger of bandits behind us here on the river. Come this way, and we ourselves will provide alms." "Will one person give to all?" "No, some will give to four, and others to five." When they said, "Good friends, the Blessed One has established a training rule concerning eating communally," and those monks thereby greatly curtailed their eating, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Therefore, excepting the time of being on board a boat."

The Blessed One then proclaimed that a topknot festival, a great festival, and a five-yearly festival should be held. On that occasion a great assembly of monks gathered, and faithful brahmins and householders said to the monks, "Noble ones, come and accept the midday meal." The monks replied, "Will you feed the entire Saṅgha?" "Noble ones, where would we find sufficient resources to feed the entire Saṅgha? As it is, some will feed twenty, and others thirty." When they said, "Good friends, the Blessed One has established a training rule concerning eating communally," the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Therefore, excepting the time of a great assembly."

There was a time when King Rūpiṇīhṛdaya had not yet seen the truths, and during that time he had assigned the sustenance of the Kundū-tsho grove to an individual called Kundū-tsho. When he came to see the truths, the Kundū-tsho grove sustenance was taken away and offered to the Saṅgha of śrāvakas of the Blessed One. The maternal uncle of King Rūpiṇīhṛdaya, a man named Kundū-tsho, had gone forth from the household life and the king said, "Noble ones, this is my maternal uncle. So long as he does not engage in corrupt conduct, please allow him to stay alone. When he comes to engage in corrupt conduct, I myself will then expel him too." And so King Rūpiṇīhṛdaya supplied that Kundū-tsho with whatever food he needed. The monks practiced diligently without sleeping in the early and late watches of the night, and Kundū-tsho, seeing this, became very devoted. He then said to the monks, "I too shall provide you with the midday meal. Do proceed in this way."

"Would it be for the entire Saṅgha?" "No, my lady. Just as the king has been providing me with whatever food I need, I myself do not have the means to provide the midday meal for the entire Saṅgha. Rather, I shall provide the midday meal for twenty or twenty-five monks."

The monks then said that the Blessed One had laid down a training rule concerning eating in company, whereupon the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Therefore, it is an offence except at the time of the meal of ascetics."

The Blessed One then spoke in praise of those who desire the training, who are devoted to the training, and who have gathered the requisites for the training, and he addressed the monks with a discourse in accord with that theme, more extensive than that, and containing Dharma points appropriate to it. He then declared to the monks: "Monks, what was laid down before stands as a prohibition, and this is now a permission. My hearers shall recite this training rule of the Vinaya as follows: Eating in company is a transgression except at the appointed time.

The appointed times are these: the time of illness; the time of work; the time of travel; the time of boarding a boat; the time of a great assembly; and the time of the meal of ascetics. These are the appointed times.

Eating in company means eating together in an irregular manner. Except at the appointed time means the appointed time being set aside. Transgression means that it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinations of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, and the miserable states of wrong descent. Furthermore, so long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs wholesome qualities. That is why it is called a transgression.

The times are these. The time of illness means this: a sick monk is unable to sustain himself on one meal. The time of work means this: a monk who has performed work for the Saṅgha or for a stūpa, even so much as waving a cleaning cloth or laying out a single maṇḍala mat. The time of travel means this: a monk who has traveled half a yojana or half of that and then returned. The time of boarding a boat means this: a monk who has boarded a boat, traveled half a yojana or half of that, and then returned. The time of a great assembly means: a crowd. The time of the meal of ascetics means this: if renunciants who have gone forth from other traditions outside this one are present there, they too count under the designation 'ascetics,' and that is the appointed time for them. The expression these are the appointed times means: in those cases that is the conforming circumstance.

Now, how does a transgression arise in those cases? If a monk, perceiving it to be within the boundary when it is within the boundary, eats in company, he incurs a transgression. If a monk eats in company while doubtful about whether it is within the boundary, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, perceiving it to be within the boundary when he is actually outside the boundary, eats in company, he incurs a wrong deed. If a monk eats in company while doubtful about whether he is outside the boundary, he incurs a wrong deed.

Where there are two distinct dwelling places — the base dwelling and the household dwelling — those who are eating at the base dwelling must ask whether monks have come from the household dwelling; if they eat without asking, they incur a wrong deed. Those who are eating at the household dwelling must likewise ask whether monks have come from the base dwelling; if they eat without asking, they incur a transgression.

Eating three portions and accepting a single additional portion; completing three full servings but not completing one full serving; receiving even a small morsel of additional food, even so much as a single pinch of salt or a single lump of it; having fixed and separate dwellings; and

If the donor says, "I am giving this to those who are gathered here," there is no transgression. There is no transgression for one who is a novice practitioner, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

This completes the thirty-sixth rule among the transgressions related to eating in a group.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana gave forth into the going forth and conferred full ordination upon seventeen young men from the village of Upananda and the like. Those seventeen then put on their lower robes in the morning, took up their bowls and Dharma robes, and entered Śrāvastī for alms.

Now, the realm of women is one where craving operates. Seeing the monks, the women beat their chests and said, "What did those who begot these men gain? These were men who, the very moment they were born, could not fill their mouths with briny gruel, could not be set on a hip and carried along. What have they accomplished?" The group of seventeen, feeling humiliated, said, "It is bad enough that we have cut off our food — and now on top of that we must hear words of such shameful reproach. This is not fitting." From that very spot they turned back, and having cut off their food in that way, as long as there was any vigor left in their bodies they exerted themselves on the side of virtue. When the vigor in their bodies was exhausted, they spread out their robes and lay down.

Seeing them, a dear friend said, "Alas, O group of seventeen! Could it be that the food belongs to someone else — do you perhaps think your stomachs belong to someone else too? No matter how much effort you make toward the side of virtue, you have eaten only as much as suffices for that effort." "Who ate?" "You did." "We did not eat." "Then why are you lying with your robes spread out?" They then recounted the whole matter in full.

Some women from the city, being fond of pleasure gardens, took food and drink and went outside Śrāvastī to the Jeta Grove to share and eat and drink there. Seeing them, the group of seventeen made themselves comfortable in their bellies, and recited these verses:

"O Protector, your many excellent teachings circulate throughout this world of the moving and the still.
The sage who has no sensation of hunger in his body — that is your most excellent teaching."

The women then said, "Noble ones, if you are asked — do you wish?" "We do."
The women gave food and drink to the group of seventeen, and after they had eaten, the monks paired up and began to walk back and forth reciting their texts.

Seeing them reciting their texts, a dear friend said, "How remarkable — the group of seventeen has applied themselves with great diligence!" The venerable Ānanda then presented the truth of the matter to the Blessed One. He said, "When a donor and a patron give food to a recipient, they bestow five things: they give life, they give complexion, they give strength, they give ease, and they give eloquence — and this brings happiness." The Blessed One declared this, and it is well spoken: if one eats, one will be endowed with eloquence; if one does not eat, one will not. "Did you eat?" "We ate." "Was it fitting for you to eat at an improper time?" "If food is not found at the proper time, are we then to starve and die?" "Monks who are of small account — why do they eat and take up food at an improper time?" — at this, people began to reproach them, to rail at them, to spread gossip and slander. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, with this matter in mind, and

On this occasion and in this context, the convening of the assembly of monks, and so forth, proceeds as before. Likewise, "The blessed buddhas, though knowing, perform a purposeful inquiry" and so forth also proceed as before. The blessed Buddha then questioned the group of seventeen monks: "Monks, is it true that you received solid food and consumables and ate them at an improper time?" "Venerable One, it is true." The blessed Buddha then censured them, saying that this was unworthy of a contemplative, not in accord, not fitting, not in keeping with proper conduct — this is not something one who has gone forth ought to do. Thereupon the Blessed One, having censured them in many ways, spoke to the monks:

"Monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers," and so forth, as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk receives solid food or consumables or eats them at an improper time incurs a transgression."

"Whatever monk" refers to the group of seventeen or any other monk of that kind. "At an improper time" means there are two improper times: before the dawn has risen, and after noon has passed. "Solid food or consumables" means the five kinds of solid food and the five kinds of consumable food. "Receives or eats" means having swallowed it down the throat. "Incurs a transgression" means it causes burning, scorching, and falling into the hells, into the realm of animals, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into states of woe, and into states of wrong descent. Moreover, for as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome dharmas — therefore it is called "incurring a transgression."

As for how one incurs the transgression: when a monk, perceiving an improper time as an improper time, receives or consumes solid food or consumables, he incurs a transgression. When a monk, in doubt about whether it is an improper time, receives or consumes solid food or consumables, he incurs a transgression. When a monk, at a proper time but perceiving it as an improper time, receives or consumes solid food or consumables, he commits a wrongdoing. When a monk, at a proper time but in doubt, receives or consumes solid food or consumables, he commits a wrongdoing. For one who is a first offender, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensations, there is no transgression.

The thirty-seventh transgression, eating at an improper time, is complete.

The blessed Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Kāḷa was dwelling in dependence upon a certain village or hamlet. In the early morning he put on his inner robe, took up his alms bowl and Dharma robe, and entered that very village or hamlet, guarding his body with great care, restraining his faculties thoroughly, and setting his mindfulness close at hand, he went on alms round. If he obtained cooked wet rice, he received it in his alms bowl; if he obtained cooked dry rice, he received it in the vessel of his alms bowl. Then, having made his alms round through that village or hamlet, he went to the temple. The wet cooked rice he ate directly; the dry cooked rice he dried out, filled an unbaked earthen vessel with it, and set it aside. Then, should wind arise, or bad weather come, or rain fall, or hail descend — whenever such things occurred, when wind had arisen, bad weather had come, rain had fallen, or hail had come — at such a time he would rinse the dry cooked rice with hot water, eat it, and then enter into meditative concentration, liberation, and liberation, and meditative absorption, experiencing the bliss of entering into samādhi.

It is the nature of reality for blessed buddhas, while they are alive, living, and well, to feel compassionate concern for those who are amenable to guidance, and so from time to time they would go down into the hells, range through the animal realm, range through the realm of hungry ghosts, range through the realm of the gods, range through the provinces, range along the riverbanks, range through the mountains, range through the charnel grounds, and go to the temples. With that purpose in mind, the Blessed One decided to go to the temple, and he said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'Monks, the Tathāgata is going to the temple. Any of you who wishes to go to the temple together with the Tathāgata should take your robes.'"

The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Lord," listened to the Blessed One, and then said to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One is going to the temple. Any of you who wishes to go to the temple together with the Tathāgata should take your robes."

Then the Blessed One, surrounded by the assembly of monks, with the monastic Saṅgha going before him, set out walking to the temple. He went directly to the temple of the venerable Kāḷudāyin. At that time, in the temple of the venerable Kāḷudāyin, a very great quantity of dry cooked rice was lying stored. The Blessed One saw the very great quantity of dry cooked rice lying stored in the temple of the venerable Kāḷudāyin. Having seen it, he said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, to whom does all this stored dry cooked rice belong?"

"Lord, this is the practice of the venerable Kāḷudāyin: whatever village or hamlet he dwells near, he rises early in the morning, takes his bowl and robes, and enters that very village or hamlet keeping his body well restrained, his sense faculties thoroughly subdued, and mindfulness closely established, and goes on his alms round. If he receives wet cooked rice, he takes it in the vessel of his alms bowl; if he receives dry cooked rice, he takes it in the vessel of his alms bowl. Having completed his alms round through that village or hamlet, he goes to the temple. The wet cooked rice he eats directly; the dry cooked rice he fills an unbaked earthen vessel with and sets aside. Then, should wind arise, or bad weather come, or rain fall, or hail descend — whenever such things occur, when wind has arisen, bad weather has come, rain has fallen, or hail has come — at such a time he rinses the dry cooked rice with hot water, eats it, and then experiences the bliss of entering into meditative concentration, liberation, and meditative absorption. Venerable sir, the monks eat stored food — that is his practice."

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this instance, and this occasion, convened an assembly of the monastic Saṅgha — and all that followed proceeded as before. "The blessed buddhas, though knowing, act as if unaware" — and so on, as before. The Blessed One then questioned the venerable Kāḷudāyin: "Kāḷudāyin, is it true that you keep stored provisions and eat stored food?"

"Lord, it is true."

The Blessed One then censured lack of effort, lack of application, and conduct without examination.

Then the Blessed One praised effort, application, and conduct with examination, and declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits in full, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: 'Furthermore, should any monk receive stored provisions or stored food and then eat or consume them, it is a transgression.'"

"Furthermore, any monk" refers to the venerable Kāḷudāyin or any other of like kind.

"Stored provisions and stored food" refers to the five types of provisions and the five types of food.

"Stored" means stored in one of two ways: food received in the morning and kept until the afternoon, or food received in the afternoon and kept beyond the allotted time.

"Eat or consume" means to swallow at the throat.

"Transgression" means: it burns, scalds, and causes one to fall into hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into miserable destinies, and into states of ruin. Furthermore, for as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome phenomena — and therefore it is called a transgression.

As to how a transgression arises in this matter: if a monk perceives stored provisions as stored provisions and then eats or consumes them — provisions or food — a transgression arises. If a monk, acting with uncertainty regarding stored provisions, eats or consumes them — provisions or food — a transgression arises. If a monk perceives what is not stored as if it were stored provisions and then eats or consumes them — provisions or food — a misdeed arises. If a monk, acting with uncertainty regarding what is not stored provisions, eats or consumes them — provisions or food — a misdeed arises.

If a monk stores an alms bowl, a small alms bowl, a scraper, a cup, a salt pouch, a bowl-container, a robe, a crystal, a high seat, a low seat, a ladle, a water vessel, a ball, a key, or a hooked key, and then eats what has been set aside using these — in all such cases a misdeed arises.

If a monk uses stored mouth or stored hands to eat or consume provisions or food, a misdeed arises.

If a monk stores flowers or fruits, and eats as much as has been stored — in all such cases a transgression arises.

If a monk drinks water to quench thirst without rinsing the mouth first, a misdeed arises.

For one who is a novice practitioner, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, and for one afflicted by painful sensations, there is no transgression.

The thirty-eighth transgression concerning stored provisions is complete.

The Blessed Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Mahākāḷa was one who observed all the charnel-ground practices: his alms bowl was from the charnel ground, his Dharma robe was from the charnel ground, his alms-rounds were at the charnel ground, and his dwelling and bedding were at the charnel ground.

How was his alms bowl from the charnel ground? In this way: when relatives would throw into the charnel ground a skull of one who had died and whose time had come, the venerable Mahākāḷa would fire-harden it at the tip of a flame, consecrate it, and carry it as his alms bowl — and in this way his alms bowl was from the charnel ground.

How was his Dharma robe from the charnel ground? In this way:

when relatives would throw into the charnel ground the garments of one who had died and whose time had come, the venerable Mahākāḷa would wash them, wring them out, turn them over, consecrate them as his Dharma robe, and carry them — and in this way his Dharma robe was from the charnel ground.

How were his alms-rounds from the charnel ground? In this way: when relatives would throw into the charnel ground the five foods of one who had died and whose time had come, the venerable Mahākāḷa would take them up and eat them — and in this way his alms-rounds were from the charnel ground.

How was his dwelling and bedding from the charnel ground? In this way: the venerable Mahākāḷa dwelt in the charnel ground — and in this way his dwelling and bedding were from the charnel ground.

When ordinary people had enough to eat, the venerable Mahākāḷa's sinews, skin, flesh, and blood would become full, and he would not go again and again into the village on alms-rounds. When ordinary people did not have enough to eat, the venerable Mahākāḷa would become lean, feeble, emaciated, dried out, and without bodily nourishment, and he would go again and again into the village on alms-rounds. Taking this pattern as a distinguishing sign, people began to think: "When ordinary people have enough to eat, this noble Mahākāḷa's sinews, skin, flesh, and blood become full, and he does not go again and again into the village on alms-rounds. But when ordinary people do not have enough to eat, this noble Mahākāḷa becomes lean, feeble, emaciated, dried out, and without bodily nourishment, and he does go again and again into the village on alms-rounds — surely this noble Mahākāḷa must be eating human flesh?" And everywhere the report spread: "The noble Mahākāḷa eats human flesh."

Now in Śrāvastī there lived a brahmin who had taken a wife of equal caste, and he sported with her, delighted in her, and enjoyed her company. And from their sporting, delight, and enjoyment together, a daughter was born; they reared and raised her, and she grew up. Then at another time that brahmin's hour came, and his relatives wrapped him, adorned with blue, yellow, red, and white garments, and carried him to the charnel ground. They cremated him and withdrew into a grave-pit, and his wife and daughter sat together at the edge of the pit. The venerable Mahākāḷa sat there looking into the pit. The daughter saw the venerable Mahākāḷa sitting and staring into the pit, and

Then the Blessed One (the Buddha) said to the monks: "Monks, a brahmin's daughter spoke, and having spoken in that way, she uttered a rough verbal act against the great śrāvaka who is like Mount Meru — and because of that, that brahmin's daughter will become a female crow eyeing carrion for five hundred lifetimes." And everywhere the report spread: "The Blessed One has prophesied that that brahmin's daughter will become a female crow eyeing carrion for five hundred lifetimes."

The brahmin woman heard that the Blessed One had prophesied that her daughter would become a female crow eyeing carrion for five hundred lifetimes. Thereupon the brahmin woman took her daughter and went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, she prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with her head and addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Blessed One, may you grant pardon to this daughter."

"She did not speak harsh words with a mind of intense hatred." The brahmin woman said, "Can I swear an oath about something? If this daughter of mine had spoken harsh words with a mind of intense hatred, there would be grounds for her to be reborn in the hells. Such a place of rebirth would indeed exist."

Now at Śrāvastī, some brahmin boys heard that the venerable Mahākṛṣṇa ate human flesh, and they said to one another: "Friends, is this really true or not? Or is it false? We have invited the venerable Mahākṛṣṇa to a meal. Let one of us pretend to be dead, and we will carry him to the charnel ground." They decided among themselves: "Let whichever one of us plays the corpse be the one carried there." One of them said, "You play the dead one." He replied, "But won't I be eaten?" They said, "We will protect you." So he pretended to be dead, and they anointed him with oil and sesame butter, wrapped him in a winding cloth, laid him out in a curled position, and began to leave Śrāvastī. Now the venerable Mahākṛṣṇa had entered Śrāvastī on his alms round, and when he saw them, he thought: "It would not do if a fox were to eat these five foods and my meal were cut off." Recognizing this, he quickly began to walk back, and the brahmin boy who was pretending to be dead became frightened and started crying out, "I am being eaten! I am being eaten!" The other brahmin boys grabbed sticks and came running quickly, saying to him: "You, a noble one, bearing the standard of a sage — do you engage in such vile and wicked conduct as this?" He replied, "What? I did not eat human flesh. Good sirs, did you see me pick up a blade and cut and eat flesh?" They said, "Then why did you come running so quickly?" He answered, "Good sirs, it occurred to me: if this fox eats these five foods and my meal is cut off, that would not be right — that is why I came so quickly." They asked, "Noble one, have you eaten the five foods? You did not seek human flesh?" He replied, "That is so — everywhere the report has gone around that the venerable Mahākṛṣṇa eats human flesh."

At this point, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then reflected: "Whatever fault has arisen came about because the monks did not allow the food to be received. Therefore, if the monks allow the food to be received and it is eaten with them as witnesses, that itself shall serve as the proof." Thinking thus, he declared: "Therefore, monks, you shall allow the food to be received and then eat it."

When the Blessed One had declared that the monks should allow the food to be received and eat it, they did not know how receiving was to be done. The Blessed One then declared: "There are five kinds of receiving. What are the five? Receiving with the body, body to body; receiving through what is connected with the body, body to body; receiving with the body into what is connected with the body; receiving through what is connected with the body into what is connected with the body; and the fifth is the ritual of placing. How is it done body to body with the body? It is when one gives with the body and the other receives with the body.

That is how it is done body to body through what is connected with the body. How is it done body to body with the body through what is connected with the body? It is when one gives by means of an alms bowl and the other receives with the body. That is how it is done body to body through what is connected with the body. How is it done into what is connected with the body with the body? It is when one gives with the body and the other receives into an alms bowl. That is how it is done into what is connected with the body with the body. How is it done into what is connected with the body through what is connected with the body? It is when one gives by means of an alms bowl and the other receives into an alms bowl. That is how it is done into what is connected with the body through what is connected with the body.

How is the fifth, the ritual of placing, performed? Monks, there are people of a region called "the Reviled," and they revile their mothers, they revile their fathers, and they revile their brothers and sisters. Any monk who goes there should draw a circle and say, "Place it here," and whatever those people place there, one should declare it received; and at the time of the unpleasant sound from the north, having blessed it, one should eat it and need not feel regret about this. That is how the fifth, the ritual of placing, is performed.

When faithful brahmins and householders offered fruits to the monks, the monks did not accept them. Those people then said: "Noble ones, before the Blessed One came into the world, other non-Buddhists were indeed worthy recipients of gifts. Now the Blessed One has come into the world and you are the worthy recipients of gifts. If you do not accept, shall we, who are deprived of the means of planting wholesome roots, pass from this world to the next world in that state? Please accept." At that juncture the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "They may be accepted; and having accepted them, they may be rendered allowable and eaten."

Not knowing how many ways of rendering allowable there were, the Blessed One declared: "There are five ways of rendering allowable. What are the five? Rendering allowable by fire; rendering allowable by a blade; rendering allowable by a fingernail; rendering allowable by aging; and the fifth is rendering allowable by having a wound made by a bird's beak."

There are also a further five ways of rendering allowable. What are the five? Rendering allowable by removal of the seed part; by having been processed; by being cut; by being pierced; and the fifth is the absence of the nature of a seed.

The Blessed One having declared that fruits were to be received and eaten, not knowing how they were to be received, the Blessed One declared: "There are five ways of receiving with the hand extended. What are the five? A flat stone slab; a bed; a low seat; a mat; and the fifth is the base of an alms bowl."

As the monks were making each fruit allowable one by one, it took a very long time, and the Blessed One declared: "If a pile is made and touched by fire in two or three places, the whole becomes allowable. A blade and a fingernail are applied one by one."

When the laypeople distributed the fruits unevenly, the Blessed One declared: "Let the novices be put in charge of the distribution." When the novices also distributed unevenly, the Blessed One declared: "Let the monks wash their hands, receive the fruits, and then distribute them." Yet again it became uneven, and the Blessed One declared: "The portions for distribution — the best, the middling, and the last — should each be done separately." When those in charge of distributing had subsequently all obtained their shares, the Blessed One declared: "The share of the one doing the distribution is to be set aside by the abbot and the preceptor." When those shares turned out to be good ones, the Blessed One declared:

Those seated near them are to be served. When those people kept getting up repeatedly and coming forward to receive many shares, the Blessed One declared: "Those who do not rise from their seats are to be allowed to receive as much as they are able." When it became uneven again and those same people were made to receive, the Blessed One declared: "Those who are able to receive without rising from their seats are to be told that their reception is complete. Those who are unable to receive without rising from their seats are to be made to receive again." When the householders said, "Noble ones, we too shall make the distribution," and the monks were unwilling, the Blessed One declared: "Let them be made to distribute." When those householders took first and the monks took afterward, the Blessed One declared: "The monks are to take first, and the householders afterward." When what the monks had received from the other monks was then made subject to distribution again, the Blessed One declared: "Whatever has been received from monks — the reception of that is final. Whatever has been received from laypeople is to be made subject to distribution." When distributing, the laypeople distributed first and the monks distributed afterward; and then the monks discarded the remaining portions, saying that they had been stored. The Blessed One declared: "The monks are to distribute first and the laypeople afterward, and the following day it is to be distributed to the Saṅgha."

When faithful brahmins and householders offered to the Saṅgha jars of clarified butter, jars of grain oil, jars of honey, and jars of molasses, the monks did not accept them, and the Blessed One declared: "They are to be accepted, and once accepted, distributed to the Saṅgha." When the robes of those monks became soiled with oil, the Blessed One declared: "They are to be distributed with grass or leaves placed in between." When those monks grew tired from holding and standing with the jars, the Blessed One declared: "They may be set down." When those same jars were overturned as they were being set down, the Blessed One declared: "They are to be set upon a base." When some creatures ate from those jars and then those jars were returned to the monks, the monks said: "Noble ones, if clarified butter, grain oil, honey, and molasses are to be offered, surely the jars should not also be offered — you yourselves should make use of the jars." The monks accepted the jars and sat down. The Blessed One declared: "Those jars are to be placed in a deep pond for seven or eight days, and when fish, turtles, frogs, crocodiles, or young animals have licked every last bit from them, or when a dog-owner's dogs have licked them clean, they are to be brought inside a suitable room and put to use." The Blessed One having declared that the contents were to be received and eaten, the monks did not know how to say when something had and had not been properly received. The Blessed One declared: "In five circumstances it is to be said that something has not been properly received, and in five circumstances it is to be said that it has been properly received. What are the five circumstances in which it is to be said that something has not been properly received? They are: receiving while sitting outside the boundary; receiving from a direction from which one cannot reach it; receiving from the side; receiving from behind; and receiving with the hands cupped downward. These are the five circumstances in which it is to be said that something has not been properly received."

What are the five circumstances in which it is to be said that something has been properly received? They are: not sitting outside the boundary; receiving from a direction from which one can reach it; not receiving from the side; not receiving from behind; and not receiving with the hands cupped downward. These are the five circumstances in which it is to be said that something has been properly received.

The Blessed One declared that food which had been properly received was to be eaten. But the group of six monks ate both what had been properly received and what had not been properly received. Some monks with little needs rebuked, scorned, and criticized them, saying: "Why do the monks eat both what has been properly received and what has not been properly received, even though the Blessed One has declared that food which has been properly received is to be eaten?" The monks then reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence and this occasion and this circumstance, convened the Saṅgha of monks — and so on as before. The Blessed Buddhas, knowing full well, inquire — and so on as before. The Blessed Buddha questioned the group of six monks: "Monks, when I have declared that food which has been properly received is to be eaten, is it true that you ate both what had been properly received and what had not been properly received?" "Venerable One, it is so."

The Blessed Buddha rebuked them, saying that this was not the conduct of a contemplative, was not appropriate, was not fitting, was not in accordance with the code — it was not something for one who has gone forth to do. Having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be laid down" — and so on as before. "My hearers shall train in the Vinaya according to this rule of training: any monk who eats food that has been put into his mouth without it having been properly received commits an offense."

Thus did the Blessed One lay down that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

Now, monks dwelling in forest hermitages had no one to formally receive water and tooth-cleaning sticks on their behalf, and so they abandoned their forest lodgings and moved into lodgings on the outskirts of villages.

The Blessed Buddhas, knowing full well, inquire. The Blessed Buddha questioned the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, why have the monks dwelling in forest hermitages abandoned their forest lodgings and moved into lodgings on the outskirts of villages?" "Venerable One, it is because the Blessed One laid down the rule of training: any monk who eats food that has been put into his mouth without it having been properly received commits an offense. Since the monks dwelling in forest hermitages have no one to formally receive water and tooth-cleaning sticks on their behalf, they have abandoned their forest lodgings and moved into lodgings on the outskirts of villages."

The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, water and tooth-cleaning sticks are excepted. Furthermore, where there are intelligent elephants, intelligent monkeys, or intelligent bears, and these animals offer fruits to the monks — if the monks, out of scrupulousness, do not accept them — the Blessed One declared: since wherever there is something to be received there is also something to be formally received, therefore what has been placed by such animals is to be said to have been properly received. One should not be scrupulous about that."

Then the Blessed One, together with those who delight in the training and who hold the training in respect — having praised those who dedicate their requisites to the training and who honor the training with respect, the Blessed One then addressed the monks with words consonant with that theme, excelling in that theme, and bearing qualities befitting that theme. He declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, what was formerly prescribed remains prescribed, and what is now permitted is permitted. My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: 'Furthermore, any monk who, having not received food formally, eats it by placing it in his mouth — excepting water and tooth-cleaning sticks — commits an offense.'"

"Any monk" refers to any of the six groups or anyone else of that same kind. "Having not received formally" means that it has not been formally given by any man, woman, or person of the third sex. "Food placed in the mouth" refers to the five kinds of staple food and the five kinds of soft food. "Eats it" means swallowing it down the throat. "Excepting water and tooth-cleaning sticks" means that water and tooth-cleaning sticks are set aside. "Commits an offense" means it causes burning, scorching, and falling into the bad destinations — into the hell-beings, animals, the woeful realm of hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the realms of wrong fall. Furthermore, so long as such a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the virtuous qualities. Therefore it is said to "commit an offense."

As to how a transgression arises in this regard: if a monk, perceiving food not formally received as not having been formally received, accepts or eats staple or soft food, a transgression arises. If a monk, eating staple or soft food with doubt about whether or not it was formally received, accepts or eats it, a transgression arises. If a monk, perceiving food that has been formally received as not having been formally received, accepts or eats staple or soft food, a misdeed arises. If a monk, having doubt about food that has been formally received, accepts or eats staple or soft food, a misdeed arises. There is no transgression for one who acts for the first time, for one who is mad, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one who is overcome by painful sensations.

The monks then asked the Blessed One: "Venerable sir, what action did the great elder Nāgasena perform, such that through the ripening of that karma he went forth before the Blessed One, came to possess all the charnel-ground practices, abandoned all afflictions, directly realized arhatship, and yet — even after attaining arhatship — was falsely accused?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, the great Nāgasena himself accumulated a mass of karma, whose conditions were fully set, which remained close like a flame, and which was certain to arise — karma he himself had performed and accumulated. Could anyone else experience the ripening of karma performed and accumulated by the great Nāgasena himself? Monks, karma performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma performed and accumulated ripens within the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense sources:

Even were a hundred eons to pass, the karma gathered is not lost.
When the conditions and the time arrive,
for those with bodies it bears its fruit.

Monks, long ago in a time past, in the city of Vārāṇasī, there resided a pratyekabuddha (solitary buddha) called Teacher. He was surrounded and attended before by many hundreds of thousands of hosts of gods, and from amidst a great charnel ground he entered Vārāṇasī for alms. In that great charnel ground there dwelt a fierce yakṣa, who was there devouring a human corpse. When Teacher the pratyekabuddha entered that great charnel ground, the fierce yakṣa, through the power of the gods, fled from that great charnel ground, and —"

The human corpse that had been left there was eaten by foxes and other animals. The fierce yakṣa then thought: "This renunciant has become an obstacle to my food. I shall do him dishonor." He placed a human hand into the pratyekabuddha's alms bowl, and throughout all of Vārāṇasī the report spread that this renunciant ate human flesh.

The pratyekabuddha, that great being, thought: "If this fierce and afflicted yakṣa is gravely harmed and ruined, that would be wrong. I will offer him a place to abide." And out of compassion for him, the pratyekabuddha rose up into the sky above, spreading out like a king of geese with wings extended, and began to perform miracles — blazing with fire, shining with light, raining down water, and flashing lightning. Ordinary folk are quick to fix their minds upon miraculous powers, and so the fierce yakṣa, like a great tree cut down at the root, fell prostrate before the pratyekabuddha's feet and spoke these words: "True field of offerings, I beseech you to descend! I beseech you to descend! Please draw me out by the collar from where I have sunk in the mire of affliction. I uttered false and dishonoring speech against you. And throughout all of Vārāṇasī the report spread that this renunciant does not eat

Out of compassion for the fierce yakṣa, the pratyekabuddha descended from the sky above. Then the fierce yakṣa removed the human hand from the alms bowl and cast it on the ground. He bowed with joined hands at the pratyekabuddha's feet and made this aspiration: "Whatever karma there is in having harmed such a true and perfect field of offerings — may the root of virtue of whatever offering I have made, even though it is not equal to that karma of harm, bring me to attain such qualities as would please a Teacher far more exalted than a hundred thousand billion pratyekabuddhas, without causing him displeasure or offense."

Now monks, the fierce yakṣa of that time, of that occasion, is none other than this very Mahākāla. Through the karmic maturation of having falsely slandered the pratyekabuddha, he was tormented in the hells for many lifetimes. Then through the remainder of that same karma, he was slandered falsely for five hundred lifetimes. And even now, having attained the state of an arhat, he is still slandered falsely.

Through the karmic maturation of the karma of having made an offering and set an aspiration, he went forth in my presence, abandoned all afflictions, and directly actualized the state of an arhat. He pleased me, the Teacher who am far more exalted than a hundred thousand billion pratyekabuddhas, and did not cause me displeasure or offense. And due to the habitual tendency formed by having dwelt in that charnel ground, even now he is wholly endowed with the charnel ground.

Monks, thus it is: the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly dark is itself wholly dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly bright is itself wholly bright; and the karmic maturation of actions that are mixed is itself mixed. Therefore monks, abandon actions that are wholly dark and actions that are mixed, and strive after actions that are wholly bright. Monks, you should train yourselves in this way.

The intermediate summary verse:

Wholly endowed with the charnel ground,
the cowherd and the daughter, the brahmin who was struck, and the five who received gifts, and five others including the case of the fruit, the water and the tooth-cleaning wood with permission given, the elephant, the monkey, and the bear —

these are set alongside the former conduct.

This concludes the thirty-ninth rule entailing defeat for eating without having received the food properly.

The Vinaya Analysis, the fifty-fourth fascicle.

When the Blessed One Śākyamuni was wandering on tour among the Śākyas, he came to the Śākya settlement and there, in the Nyagrodhā pleasure grove at the Śākya settlement, he took up residence. Śākya Mingchen heard that the Blessed One, wandering on tour among the Śākyas, had come to the Śākya settlement and was residing there in the Nyagrodhā pleasure grove. Upon hearing this, he set out from the Śākya settlement, went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving, prostrated with his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One instructed Śākya Mingchen rightly with Dharma-endowed words, roused him rightly, gladdened him rightly, and delighted him rightly. In many ways the Blessed One rightly instructed, rightly roused, rightly gladdened, and rightly delighted him with Dharma-endowed words, and then fell silent.

Then Śākya Mingchen rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, bowed with his palms joined toward where the Blessed One was, and said to the Blessed One: "Would the Blessed One please permit me to shelter the community of monks together with myself under a canopy-shade tomorrow?" The Blessed One gave permission to Śākya Mingchen by remaining silent.

Then Śākya Mingchen, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that permission was granted, prostrated with his head to the Blessed One's two feet, withdrew from the Blessed One's presence, went to his own home, and said to his household servants: "Good people, the Blessed One and the community of monks will come in the wake of one another. Make preparations early in the morning for excellent food to be served for the canopy-shade meal." The group of six, having risen early the previous evening, said: "Friends, let us go look in on the households that are going to serve as alms-round houses." They did so, and went to the households. Those households said to them: "Noble ones, please accept your meal here today." The group of six replied: "We have been invited." "By whom?" "By Śākya Mingchen." "In that case, please accept the meal tomorrow." "Very well."

Then Śākya Mingchen rose early in the morning, arranged seats, set out water vessels, and invited the Blessed One, saying: "Venerable one, please think to honor us with the canopy-shade meal; Blessed One, please bear in mind that the time has come." Then the Blessed One, in the early morning, put on his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and robes, and, surrounded by a gathering of monks, with the community of monks spreading out before him, went and arrived at the dwelling place of Śākya Mingchen. He took his seat on the seat that had been prepared at the head of the community of monks. Then Śākya Mingchen, knowing that the Buddha and the rest of the community of monks were comfortably seated, himself served them with his own hands with ample and clean food and drink, satisfying them and filling them. Having in many ways served, satisfied, and filled them with ample and clean food and drink and set down their bowls, and knowing that the Blessed One had finished his meal and set aside his bowl, he took a low seat and sat before the Blessed One to hear the Dharma.

Then the Blessed One rightly taught Śākya Mingchen with words that accord with the Dharma, rightly led him to take hold of it, rightly praised him, and rightly gladdened him. In many ways, with words that accord with the Dharma, he rightly taught him, rightly led him to take hold of it, rightly praised him, and rightly gladdened him. Then, rising from his seat, he departed.

Śākya Mingchen then followed close behind the Blessed One, step by step, and having prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet, he circumambulated the Blessed One three times, withdrew from the Blessed One's presence, and went to a lower part of the estate of that fine house above, where he practiced the meditation on generosity. Those who lived by selling curds then cleared away his sleeping quarters and gathered up the food.

The group of six said, "Friends, since the midday hour has come and Ānanda's meal supply has run out, it would not be right to go empty-handed," and they had sixty portions of food prepared at the households they regularly visited for alms, then went to the house of Śākya Mingchen. When they arrived, they saw that no food had been prepared there and no sleeping quarters had been arranged. The group of six then said to those who lived by selling curds, "Good sirs, he invites the community of monks headed by the Buddha and takes only a small portion from his heart for himself, and yet he does not prepare even the midday meal, nor does he arrange sleeping quarters. Could it be that he intends to cut short the midday meal of the community of monks headed by

Those men said, "Noble ones, have you been asleep? The community of monks headed by the Buddha took their midday meal and have already departed."

The group of six said, "Would they then cut off our meal?" The men said, "Noble ones, we told Śākya Mingchen to wait just a little while, for the time of mixing the curds, and then we went and told Śākya Mingchen, 'Noble sir, the group of six has just now arrived and has asked for a serving.'" Śākya Mingchen said, "Give them whatever small amount of leftovers there is today." They went and said, "Noble ones, please be seated and take your meal," and as they began to serve, the group of six said, "Śākya Mingchen, with great shamelessness, obtained permission from the Blessed One to take the midday meal together with the community of monks at his own home — but if food like this is suitable for inviting the community of monks headed by the Buddha, then Ānanda too should invite the community of monks headed by the Buddha every single day. This poor man — with whatever he has today — go, householder, to the great lady's house and fetch milk; go to the great lady's house and fetch curds; go to the great lady's house and fetch butter; go to the great lady's house and fetch fish; go to the great lady's house and fetch meat; go to the great lady's house and fetch dried meat" — and in this way, having gathered for themselves such begged food from other households, they ate it there, then left and went to the monastery.

The monks said to them, "Venerable ones, where did you eat your meal?" "Right there." "We did not see you there." The group of six said, "We arrived late." "And what sort of food did you eat?" The group of six said, "Milk, curds, butter, fish, meat, and dried meat." The monks said:

"We have not obtained such food." The group of six said, "Where would a poor man find such food? We took it from the households we visit and ate it there." "Is it permissible to take such begged food from other households and eat it for your own benefit?" "It may be permissible or it may not be permissible — but are we to starve and die? Monks of little account — why do you censure, denounce, and speak ill of monks who take such begged food from other households for their own benefit and consume it?"

At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, on account of this instance, and on account of this occasion, summoned the community of monks — and so forth, as before. "The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though fully knowing, feign not to know" — and so forth, as before — and the Blessed One questioned the group of six: "Monks, I have spoken of certain foods proper for monks to receive as alms — namely milk, curds, butter, fish, meat, and dried meat. Is it true that you took such begged food from other households for your own benefit and ate it?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Blessed One then rebuked them, saying that this was not the conduct of a renunciant (pravrajyā), not in keeping with it, not proper, not in accord with proper conduct, and therefore not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

Then, having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten good qualities, a rule of training shall be laid down for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever foods the Blessed One has named as proper for monks to receive as alms — namely milk, curds, butter, fish, meat, and dried meat — if a monk takes such begged food from other households for his own benefit and accepts or eats it, it is an offense entailing a downfall.

Thus did the Blessed One lay down that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya."

Then a sick monk asked a physician, "Good friend, please prescribe medicine for me." "Noble one, drink milk." "Good friend, who will give me milk?" "Noble one, beg for it from households." "Good friend, the Blessed One has laid down a rule of training." "Noble one, your Teacher is compassionate — if you take that very circumstance as the condition and make the request, a solution will be found."

At that the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, it is permitted in time of illness." And in the same way, the same procedure as before was followed until permission was granted for other monks as well to beg milk, curds, butter, fish, meat, and dried meat from households.

Then the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of those who delight in training, who are respectful toward training, and who take training as their provision, addressed the monks with a discourse in keeping with that theme, more extensive than that, and adorned with qualities befitting it, and then declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, the former was the rule, and this is now the permission. My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

The foods that may be begged by monks, as declared by the Blessed One, are these: milk, curds, butter, fish, meat, and dried meat. Should any monk who is not ill beg such foods from the households of others for his own sake, and then receive or eat them, he commits a transgression (āpatti).

The phrase "as declared by the Blessed One" refers to the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha. The phrase "by monks" refers to those who follow this Dharma. The phrase "foods that may be begged — begged" is an explicit designation. "That is to say, milk, curds, butter, fish, meat, and dried meat" — these are the beggable foods. "Should any monk" refers to the group of six, or any other monk of similar disposition. "Who is not ill" means excepting one who is sick. "For his own sake" means dedicated to himself. "Such foods" means milk, curds, butter, fish, meat, and dried meat. "From the households of others" means from the households of brahmins and householders. "Beg" means to ask for and receive. "Receive or eat" means to swallow down the throat. "Commits a transgression" means it causes one to be burned, to be scorched, and to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the evil destinies. Furthermore, as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs all virtuous qualities. Therefore it is said to be a transgression.

As for how the transgression arises: if a monk who is not ill begs and eats while not ill, begging constitutes a minor offense and eating constitutes a full transgression. If a monk who is not ill begs and then eats while ill, begging constitutes a minor offense and eating involves no transgression. If a monk who is ill begs and then eats while not ill, the begging involves no transgression but eating constitutes a full transgression. If a monk who is ill both begs and eats while ill, there is no transgression in either case.

When a monk is going on alms round and approaching households, and as he is leaving a woman's domain carrying food, if the monk remains silent without saying anything and the woman in her domain asks, "Noble one, what do you wish?" he should respond that it has been given, and whatever he desires he may take — no transgression arises from this. No transgression arises from whatever the donor does out of kindness. When curds are being offered, no transgression arises from begging whey and fresh curd. No transgression arises for one who is a first offender, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one threatened by painful sensations.

The fortieth rule entailing transgression through begging food is now complete.

A summary verse: living creatures in bedding and seat; standing, naked, an army; two nights prepared and stirred, going about; striking, stealing, and taking up a bad dwelling.

The Blessed One was dwelling in Kauśāmbī, in the garden called Ghositārāma. The venerable Udāyin knowingly used water containing living creatures. The monks said to him: "Venerable Udāyin, do not knowingly use water containing living creatures." He replied: "Has someone counted them and entrusted them to me? Why should I not go to the great eastern ocean? Why not to the great southern, western, or northern ocean? Why not to rivers, lakes, and marshes?" And he went on blaming, disparaging, and rebuking the monks, saying: "Why do monks of little purpose tell monks knowingly to use water containing living creatures?" At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence and this occasion, he convened the assembly of monks, and so forth, exactly as before. "The awakened Blessed Ones, knowing full well, inquire," and so on, again as before. The Blessed One questioned the venerable Udāyin: "Udāyin, is it true that you knowingly used water containing living creatures?" "It is true, Venerable One." The Blessed One rebuked him, saying that conduct unbecoming a contemplative, conduct that is not in harmony, not fitting, not in accord with proper comportment, is not something one who has gone forth should do. Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, perceiving ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule in the Vinaya for the hearers," and so on, as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows:

As for 'whatever monk': this means Udāyin or any other like him. 'Knowingly' means either he himself has recognized it or others have told him. 'Containing living creatures': living creatures are of two kinds — those that are visible to the naked eye and those that are caught by a straining cloth. 'Uses water': the uses of water are of two kinds, internal and external. Internal use consists of bathing, drinking, spitting out tooth-wood, and washing hands and feet. External use consists of washing the alms bowl, washing the small bowl, washing robes, doing dyeing work, plastering cracks in a shrine hall, twisting thread, and smearing a plastered surface with clay. 'Incurs a transgression' means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells as sentient beings, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies, and into the states of wrong descent. Furthermore, as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — therefore it is said to incur a transgression.

As to how a transgression comes about in this regard: if a monk, perceiving water that contains living creatures as containing living creatures, uses it, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, entertaining doubt about water that contains living creatures, uses it, he incurs a transgression. If a monk, perceiving water that contains no living creatures as containing living creatures, uses it, he incurs a wrong deed. If a monk, entertaining doubt about water that contains no living creatures, uses it, he incurs a wrong deed.

If a monk consumes clarified butter, grain oil, honey, the scum of molasses, milk, yoghurt, or butter that contains living creatures, he incurs a transgression. If a monk drinks salt, grain salt, whey, or gruel that contains living creatures, he incurs a transgression. If a monk partakes of food that has been prepared or served with living creatures in it, he incurs a transgression.

One who is a first-time offender, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is afflicted by feelings — for these there is no transgression.

The forty-first transgression, concerning the use of water containing living creatures, is complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

The venerable Cāraka, knowing well the proper time, dressed in his lower robe in the early morning, took up his bowl and outer robe, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. In Śrāvastī there was a young man, a seller of incense, who had not long been married. As this young man was arranging his goods for display, the thought arose in him — an improper mental engagement — thinking, "I shall go and enjoy myself together with my young wife." And he began gathering his goods back up. The venerable Cāraka, seeing this, thought, "While other merchants are now spreading out their wares, why is this incense-seller gathering his in?" And reflecting further, he understood: "He has not long been married, and he wishes to go and enjoy himself with his young wife." Thinking, "I shall go there and put his hope of that to an end," he went first to that man's house, sat down on a seat, and spoke these words: "Come here, daughter, sit down, and let me teach you the Dharma." The young woman prostrated at his feet and sat before him to hear the Dharma. He then began to teach her the Dharma.

After some time the incense-seller arrived and said to his wife, "Offer alms to the noble Cāraka and request that he depart." The venerable Cāraka said, "Good man, having thoroughly exhausted what is on the side of my own virtue, I have come here to teach the Dharma. Do you not wish to hear the Dharma? Sit and listen to the Dharma." And pressing him to stay, he sat him down. As long as the venerable Cāraka was freeing that man from his entanglement with desire, he continued to teach the Dharma.

Then that man began to revile and slander, saying, "The conduct of the ascetics who are sons of the Śākyans is mere word; the conduct of brahmins is mere word. Look at how this one has no power even over his own wife." He went on to criticize, mock, and slander, saying, "Why do monks, on a flimsy pretext, enter into the houses of those who seem to lie down negligently, pressing in at a later hour and sitting on a seat there?" When the monks heard this criticism, mocking, and slander, they reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks in connection with this incident, this occasion, and this case — and so on as before. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, act though already knowing — and so on as before. The Buddha, the Blessed One, asked the venerable Cāraka: "Cāraka, is it true that you entered the house of one who seems to lie down negligently, pressed in at a later hour, and sat on a seat there?" "Reverend One, it is true." The Buddha, the Blessed One, censured him, saying that such conduct — unworthy of an ascetic, discordant, improper, and contrary to the rules — is not to be done by one who has gone forth. Then the Blessed One, having censured him in many ways, addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, the training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya shall be established" — and so on as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, knowingly, enters the house of one who seems to lie down negligently, pressing in at a later hour, and sits on a seat there, incurs a transgression.

Now, 'whatever monk' means Cārika or any other of that kind. 'Knowingly' means either he himself is aware of it or others have told him. 'The house of one who seems to lie down negligently' means a woman is one who lies down with a man, and a man is one who lies down with a woman. 'House' means the house of a brahmin or a householder."

"Pressing in at a later hour" means entering afterward. "On a seat" means on the ground. "Sits" means placing one's haunches within the span of a cubit's length. "Incurs a transgression" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinations of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of wrong falling. Furthermore, so long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs wholesome qualities — and for that reason it is called "incurring a transgression."

As to how the transgression comes about: if a monk, knowingly and even slightly, sits on a seat in the house of one who seems to lie down negligently, pressing in at a later hour, he incurs a transgression in all cases. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, who is insane, whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensations.

The forty-second transgression — sitting in the house of one who seems to lie down negligently — is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Cārika perceived a jewel-like opportunity, and that morning he put on his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and his Dharma robe, and entered Śrāvastī for alms.

In Śrāvastī there was a young perfume-seller who had not long before taken a wife, and when he spread out his wares he gave rise to inappropriate mental engagement, thinking, "I shall go to enjoy myself with my wife." He began to gather his wares back together. The venerable Cārika saw this and thought, "While other merchants are spreading out their goods, why is this young perfume-seller gathering his in?" He understood: "This man took a wife not long ago and wishes to go and enjoy himself with her." He thought, "Let me go and watch." So he went first to the man's house and stood upright behind the door panel.

After this the young perfume-seller arrived and led his wife inside the room. The woman saw Cārika standing alone outside, and she said to her husband, "The noble Cārika, the son of the lord, is standing behind the door panel." The young perfume-seller said, "The noble Cāraka is standing in the temple experiencing the bliss of meditative concentration, liberation, and entry into meditative absorption." Having said this, he sported with his wife, and when he had finally disengaged from his entanglement with her, he then saw Cāraka — and he reviled and abused and slandered him, saying, "The wanderers who are Śākya-sons speak of the conduct of a wanderer in words only, and of the conduct of a brahmin in words only — yet in this very way he has no restraint over his own wife!" He censured, disparaged, and criticized, saying, "Why do monks of little substance stand in solitary shelter in the house of one who seems to lie down negligently, knowingly?"

At that time the monks reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then convened the assembly of monks in connection with this incident, this basis, and this occasion — and so on as before. "The Blessed Ones, the buddhas, although they know, feign not to know" — and so on also as before. The Blessed One then questioned the venerable Cāraka: "Cāraka, is it true that you knowingly stood in solitary shelter in the house of one who seems to lie down negligently?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Blessed One then said that the conduct was unbecoming of a wanderer, not in accordance with it, not befitting — not in accordance with it, not befitting of one who has gone forth. In this way he rebuked him. Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing the ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so on as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, knowingly standing in solitary shelter in a house where one who seems to lie down negligently dwells — commits an offense.

'Whatever monk' refers to Cāraka or any other of that kind. 'Knowingly' means that he himself is aware of it, or that it has been reported to him by others. 'One who seems to lie down negligently' — a woman lies down with a man, and a man lies down with a woman. 'In a house' means in the house of a brahmin or householder. 'Solitary' means a place where no woman, no man, and no person of indeterminate sex is present. 'In shelter' means sheltered by five things: sheltered by a wall, sheltered by a screen, sheltered by a curtain, sheltered by something dense, and sheltered by darkness. 'Standing' means standing within a fathom's distance. 'Commits an offense' means it burns him, scorches him, and makes him fall into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower realms, into states of wrong view. Furthermore, for as long as that offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — and for that reason it is said to 'commit an offense.'

As to how one incurs the offense in this case: however little a monk knowingly stands in solitary shelter in a house where one who seems to lie down negligently dwells, in all such cases he commits an offense. There is no offense for one who acts for the first time, one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

This is the forty-third offense concerning standing in the house of one who seems to lie down negligently — complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Bamboo Grove, the abode of the Kalandakas. Then a great many merchants of Rājagṛha went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they prostrated with their heads at the two feet of the Blessed One and seated themselves to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One thoroughly instructed, established, encouraged, and gladdened the great many merchants of Rājagṛha with a Dharma-endowed discourse. Having thoroughly instructed, established, encouraged, and gladdened them in many ways with a Dharma-endowed discourse, he fell silent.

Then the great many merchants of Rājagṛha, delighted and rejoicing in what the Blessed One had declared, prostrated with their heads at the two feet of the Blessed One, withdrew from the Blessed One's presence, and went to where the venerable Ānanda was. Having arrived, they prostrated with their heads at the two feet of the venerable Ānanda and seated themselves to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Ānanda thoroughly taught, established, encouraged, and gladdened the great many merchants of Rājagṛha with a Dharma-endowed discourse. In many ways he thoroughly taught, established, and encouraged — and gladdened them thoroughly, and then fell silent.

Then the great many merchants of Rājagṛha rose from their seats, arranged their upper robes over one shoulder, bowed with their palms joined toward the venerable Ānanda, and said to him:

"Venerable Ānanda, after the Blessed One has completed the rains retreat, where will he travel? Wise ones, please ask the Blessed One this. Venerable Ānanda, the Buddha Blessed One is difficult to approach and difficult to bear with, so we have no way to make this request of the Buddha Blessed One ourselves. And for us as well, since the Buddha Blessed One is difficult to approach and difficult to bear with, we ourselves cannot make the request to the Buddha Blessed One."

"Venerable Ānanda, if even the venerable Ānanda finds that the Buddha Blessed One is difficult to approach and difficult to bear with, and therefore the venerable Ānanda too is reluctant to make the request to the Buddha Blessed One, then how does the venerable Ānanda know by signs, or how does he know from his words, where the Blessed One will travel after completing the rains retreat and going in a particular direction? How does he know by signs? How does he know from his words?"

"Wise ones, after the Blessed One has completed the rains retreat, he faces toward the direction in which he intends to travel, and while seated he gazes in that direction and speaks words of praise about those people. The venerable Ānanda observes which direction the Blessed One gazes toward while seated, and about whose people he speaks words of praise. Wise ones, the Blessed One is now gazing toward Kosala while seated, and he speaks words of praise about the people of Śrāvastī."

They expressed their delight and rejoicing at what the venerable Ānanda had said, prostrated with their heads at the two feet of the venerable Ānanda, and departed. And they thought to themselves: "After completing the rains retreat, the Blessed One will travel to Śrāvastī." And so they made preparations for the journey to Śrāvastī.

Then the Blessed One completed the rains retreat. When the three months of the rains had passed, the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'Monks, the Tathāgata is going on tour through the Kosala lands. Whichever of you wishes to go on tour through the Kosala lands together with the Tathāgata, let him complete the business of his robe-making.'"

The venerable Ānanda, having heard the Blessed One and heeding his word, announced to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Tathāgata is going on tour through the Kosala lands. Whichever of you wishes to go on tour through the Kosala lands together with the Tathāgata, let him complete the business of his robe-making."

The great many merchants of Rājagṛha heard the venerable Ānanda announce to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Tathāgata is going on tour through the Kosala lands. Whichever of you wishes to go on tour through the Kosala lands together with the Tathāgata, let him complete the business of his robe-making." Having heard this, they went to where the Blessed One was, arrived, prostrated with their heads at the two feet of the Blessed One, and stood to one side. Standing to one side, the Blessed One thoroughly taught, established, encouraged, and gladdened the great many merchants of Rājagṛha with a Dharma-endowed discourse.

Then, after he had thoroughly taught, established, encouraged, and gladdened them through many categories of Dharma-endowed discourse, he said nothing further. Thereupon the great many merchants of Rājagṛha rose from their seats, arranged their upper robes over one shoulder, joined their palms toward the Blessed One, and addressed him thus: "Blessed One, may it please you to accept from us food and alms-food, lodging, medicine for the sick, and medicinal requisites for as long as you travel with the monastic Saṅgha of monks from Rājagṛha to Śrāvastī." The Blessed One granted this to the great many merchants of Rājagṛha by his silence. Then the great many merchants of Rājagṛha, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that he had granted their request, expressed their delight and approval at the Blessed One's word, prostrated with their heads at the two feet of the Blessed One, and departed from his presence.

Thereupon the great many merchants of Rājagṛha went to where the venerable Ānanda was, arrived, prostrated with their heads at his two feet, and stood to one side. Standing to one side, the great many merchants of Rājagṛha said this to the venerable Ānanda: "Venerable Ānanda, how far does the Blessed One travel each day on the road?" "Sirs, he travels the distance a wheel-turning king travels." "Venerable Ānanda, and how far does a wheel-turning king travel?" "Sirs, a wheel-turning king travels ten leagues along the roads." Accordingly, at every ten leagues those merchants prepared encampments for the retinue of the Blessed One together with the monastic Saṅgha of monks. Whatever foods were cold they prepared that very day in advance; whatever foods needed to be warm they prepared fresh each day.

Then the Blessed One — himself tamed, attended by a retinue of the tamed; himself at peace, attended by a retinue of the peaceful; himself liberated, attended by a retinue of the liberated; himself at ease, attended by a retinue of the at-ease; himself subdued, attended by a retinue of the subdued; himself an arhat, attended by a retinue of arhats; himself free of attachment, attended by a retinue free of attachment; himself glorious, attended by a retinue of the glorious — surrounded by a herd of bulls as a supreme bull among bulls; surrounded by a troop of young elephants as a great elephant; surrounded by a pride of fanged beasts as a lion; surrounded by a flock of geese as a king of geese; surrounded by a host of birds as a garuḍa; surrounded by a throng of disciples as a brahmin; surrounded by a crowd of the sick as a skilled physician; surrounded by troops of warriors as a hero; surrounded by those who have entered the path as a guide who knows the terrain; surrounded by a caravan of merchants as a caravan leader; surrounded by a retinue of followers as a merchant chief; surrounded by a company of ministers as a king of a citadel; surrounded by a host of a thousand sons as a wheel-turning king; surrounded by a host of stars as the moon; surrounded by a host of a thousand rays as the sun; surrounded by a throng of gandharvas (celestial musicians) as Yakṣa-guardian-of-the-realm; surrounded by a host of vessels as a noble man; surrounded by a host of nāgas as one of ill-favored eye; surrounded by a host of yakṣas as the yakṣa Wealth-Giver — surrounded by a host of asuras as Vemacitrin; surrounded by a host of the Thirty-Three as Śakra (Indra, king of the gods); surrounded by a host of the Brahmā realm as Brahmā; his senses most thoroughly tamed; his manner of movement and conduct undisturbed; still as an ocean; full of moisture like a cloud; free of pride like the king of elephants; well-adorned with the thirty-two major marks of a great being; his form beautifully graced with the eighty minor marks; his body adorned with a radiance of one fathom; possessed of a light exceeding that of a thousand suns; good in every way like a moving mountain of jewels; endowed with the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, the three unshared bases of mindfulness, and great compassion — together with those great śrāvakas: Kauṇḍinya the All-Knowing, Aśvajit, Bhadrīka, Vāṣpa, Mahānāman, Yaśodā, Pūrṇa, Vimāla, Gavāmpati, Subāhu, and others; and moreover surrounded by a very large community of monks and with them walking ahead, he set out from Śrāvastī wandering through the countryside and the gardens there.

A knowing man who shared the same purpose and was traveling along with them fell upon a time of poverty and was overcome with hunger. He thought to himself: "What means is there by which I might not be overcome by hunger?" He then thought again: "If I seek refuge with the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākya, that will allow me to travel the road in comfort." Realizing this, he went to where the monks were and said to them: "Your teacher is one devoted to the good. He plows his field with a golden plow, and so he provides you with food of a hundred flavors, a hundred thousand garments of fine cloth, and five hundred multi-storied houses. Thus for the time being, even in this very life, you dwell in contact with happiness, and when you pass away from here you will be reborn among the gods. Our teacher is devoted to the bad. He plows his field with a sesame-stalk plow, and so he has provided us with nothing but nakedness, rough garments, food fit for insects, wandering from place to place, and sleeping on the ground. Thus for the time being, even in this very life, we dwell in contact with suffering, and when we pass away from here we will be reborn among the hell-beings."

The monks thought: "This knowing man has developed faith," and they said to him: "Knowing man, how do you get by?" "With difficulty," he replied. The monks asked: "Would you like the leavings from the monks' bowls?" The knowing man thought to himself: "If I do not eat the leavings from the monks' bowls, I shall die of starvation." And so he said: "I would." The monks said: "Knowing man, sit in sight of the monks while they eat, and the monks will give you the leavings from their bowls." The knowing man sat in sight of the monks while they ate, and the monks gave him the leavings from their bowls. He took up his begging bowl with the leavings and rushed away. As he was coming out carrying his begging bowl and hurrying off, the caravan leader saw him and said: "Knowing man, who gave you that load?" He replied: "Those monks are your field of merit, and I am their field of merit, so they gave it to me." The caravan leader said: "Knowing man, if the monks gave it to you out of compassion, would you then say that you are their field of merit? If the Blessed One were to hear this —"

— which would be just the kind of occasion on which the Blessed One would establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers. He said this, and the caravan leader too burst out laughing.

Then, coming along that same road, there arrived some fellow travelers going in the same direction, and with them came a certain knowing man traveling together. He saw the other knowing man and said: "Knowing man, have you eaten?" He replied: "I have." "From whom?" He replied: "These householders of the Śreṣṭhī family supply me with what I need." The other said: "Knowing man, you are one who does not understand what has been done for you. Are these the Śreṣṭhī householders of yours? From among them, it seems that a group of five hundred are on the point of passing beyond sorrow, and have you, knowing man, seen even a single one of them pass beyond sorrow?" And he spoke these verses:

Why does the wicked one not press his face into the earth?

Why does he not split his tongue into a hundred pieces?

Why do the secret parts of your body

Not receive hailstones of vajra, short spears, and arrows?

Just as a jackal that eats the leavings of a lion

And yet desires to kill the lion itself,

So too do you devour the scraps of the one endowed with the ten powers,

While daring to disparage the one with the ten powers.

Wherever and in whomever one takes close refuge,

Rather than gaining a livelihood like this base creature,

The wise who understand things are there friends and enemies alike

And are omniscient —

Those people who do not understand what has been done for them

Are considered far worse than dogs.

For even a dog, it seems, understands what a human has done for it, While people of serpent-kind spread their venom.

Now this had come to pass for the time being: the Buddha, the Blessed One, had not yet established rules of training in the Vinaya for the hearers. Then the Blessed One, wandering on a tour through the Kosala provinces, arrived at Śrāvastī.

In Śrāvastī, in a park, there were some five hundred courtesans laden with loads of indigo, encamped and settled there. They saw the Buddha, the Blessed One — adorned and resplendent with the thirty-two marks of a great being, endowed with the qualities of an embodied being of that kind, like a man freshly gilded, like a lamp resting in a golden vessel, like a golden mountain in motion, like a golden offering-tree adorned with jewels of every sort — renowned, radiant, fearless, stainless, possessed of a completely pure mind. And seeing him, it was like this: just as a sentient being who has accumulated roots of virtue, upon first seeing a buddha, gives rise to mental well-being — as one does through having trained the mind in calm abiding for twelve years, or as a poor person seeing a treasure, or as someone without a child obtaining a child, or as one delighting in royal sovereignty and being consecrated in royal sovereignty — and since none of those other things produce such mental well-being, they went to where the Blessed One was, came to him, and bowed their heads to his two feet, placing them on top. They took their seat to one side.

Having taken their seat to one side, the Blessed One understood their intention, their latent disposition, their temperament, and their nature, and then taught Dharma in such a way that he would by all means shatter with the vajra of gnosis the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection and directly actualize for them the fruit of stream entry. Having seen the truths, they said: "Venerable Blessed One, what you have done for us here is something that our fathers did not do, our mothers did not do, the king did not do, the gods did not do, our ancestors of old did not do, ascetics (śramaṇas) and brahmins did not do, and neither did the assembly of relatives, friends, and kinsmen — you have dried up an ocean of blood and an ocean of tears.

You have freed us from the mountains of bones, closed the doors to the lower realms, opened the doors to higher rebirths and liberation, lifted our feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and placed us among gods and humans. You have brought cyclic existence to its end. With the vajra of gnosis you have shattered the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection, accumulated since beginningless time, and we have attained the fruit of stream entry. Venerable Blessed One, we have entered the stream. Venerable One, we take refuge in the Blessed One, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept us as laywomen. From this day forward, for as long as life lasts, we take refuge with all our heart."

Then they thought: "If the Blessed One were to go to Śrāvastī, we would have no opportunity there. Let us invite the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of monks to take a midday meal here." So those noble daughters rose from their seats, bowed with joined palms turned toward the Blessed One, and addressed him thus: "May the Blessed One please consent to accept tomorrow's midday meal for himself together with the Saṅgha of monks."

The Blessed One gave his consent to those noble daughters by remaining silent. When they understood from his silence that consent had been granted, they bowed their heads to the feet of the Blessed One, departed from his presence, went to where the venerable Ānanda was, bowed their heads to his feet, and stood to one side. Standing to one side, those noble daughters said to the venerable Ānanda: "Venerable Ānanda, we wish to invite the buddha and so forth — the Saṅgha of monks — to the midday meal. Venerable Ānanda, how many kārṣāpaṇas will it take to provide a midday meal for the buddha and so forth, the Saṅgha of monks?"

The venerable Ānanda said: "Five hundred kārṣāpaṇas."

They each contributed one kārṣāpaṇa and said: "Venerable Ānanda, since we lack the equipment, the servants, and the dwelling facilities, please arrange the food yourself, and we will come and serve." "Set down the kārṣāpaṇas." They placed the kārṣāpaṇas all in one place and departed.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the fifty-fifth fascicle.

The householder Anāthapiṇḍada heard that the Blessed One was traveling through the Kośala lands and had arrived at Śrāvastī. Having heard this, he went to where the Blessed One was, bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One, and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the Blessed One taught the householder Anāthapiṇḍada thoroughly with a Dharma-endowed discourse, guided him to proper reception of it, praised him properly, and filled him with proper joy. With many categories of Dharma-endowed discourse he taught him thoroughly, guided him to proper reception, praised him properly, and filled him with proper joy, and then fell silent.

Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, bowed with joined palms turned toward the Blessed One, and addressed him thus: "Blessed One, may you consent to accept tomorrow's midday meal at my home together with the Saṅgha of monks?"

The Blessed One said: "Householder, I have already been invited first by five hundred noblewomen."

Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, rejoicing and delighting in what the Blessed One had declared, bowed his head to the Blessed One's feet, departed from the Blessed One's presence, went to where the venerable Ānanda was, and having arrived, bowed his head to the venerable Ānanda's feet and sat down to one side. Seeing those coins, he asked: "Venerable Ānanda, to whom do these coins belong?"

The venerable Ānanda replied: "Approximately five hundred noblewomen invited the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of monks to another house at noon tomorrow, and they left these coins behind. Mix these coins with your own coins, prepare the food and drink in advance, and send it here."

He took those coins, went away, mixed them with his own coins, prepared the food and drink, and sent it to the Jeta Grove.

The venerable Ānanda sent word to them: "The food has been prepared; come now and serve the Saṅgha of monks, beginning with the Buddha." They arrived and said: "Venerable Ānanda, you are our spiritual friend — come, you too should partake."

As the venerable Ānanda began to partake, two naked wandering women came. When they tried to offer food to those noblewomen, the noblewomen said: "This food belongs to the prince."

The two naked women then said to the venerable Ānanda: "Venerable one, we, the prince's wives, are in need — please give us food." And they offered food to him.

The venerable Ānanda said: "Sit, and I will give it to you." The two sat down. One was an old woman; the other was a young woman.

The venerable Ānanda, without thinking carefully, began to serve them, and he gave one portion to the old woman and two portions to the young woman.

The old woman, having eaten her single portion, said to the young woman: "How many portions did you receive?"

She replied: "I received two."

The old woman said: "The prince gave me just one portion and you two portions — it must be that he is looking after you. Make preparations for his sake."

The young woman replied: "He has renounced his extensive royal retinue and gone forth. How could he concern himself with someone as stained and defiled as me?"

The old woman said: "Men have desires for various women — the prince is surely looking after you. Make preparations for his sake."

Some monks of few wants then asked why the venerable Ānanda was giving food and provisions with his own hand to naked male wanderers and naked female wanderers. They began to criticize him, to mock him, and to speak ill of him. Thereupon the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then, in connection with this incident, with this occasion, and in this context, convened the Saṅgha of monks, and so forth, as before.

The passage beginning "The Blessed Buddhas, though they know, yet ask" and so forth also follows as before.

The Blessed Buddha then asked the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that you gave food and provisions with your own hand to naked male wanderers and naked female wanderers?"

"Blessed One, it is so."

The Blessed Buddha then admonished and thoroughly rebuked acting without diligence, without care, and without reflection.

The Blessed One then praised acting with diligence, with care, and with reflection, and declared to the monks: "Monks, it is for this reason that, having directly seen the ten benefits, the rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers shall be established thus" — and so forth, as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya thus: Whatever monk gives food or provisions from his own hand to a naked male wanderer or a naked female wanderer, he commits an offense."

Now, "whatever monk" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma. "To a naked male wanderer or a naked female wanderer, from his own hand" means hand to hand. "Food and provisions" refers to the five kinds of food and the five kinds of provisions. "Gives" means without the need for it to be consumed first. "Commits an offense" means he is scorched, he is burned, he falls into the woeful states of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the downfall realms. Furthermore, as long as the offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of wholesome dharmas — therefore it is said "he commits an offense."

As to how the offense is incurred: however many times a monk gives food or provisions from his own hand to a naked male wanderer or a naked female wanderer, in each and every instance he commits an offense.

If one wishes to free a relative, a sick person, or someone under the influence of wrong view from that condition, there is no offense. If one breaks the food into pieces and gives it, or has another person give it, there is no offense. For one who is a beginner, or who is mentally disturbed, or whose mind is agitated, or who is afflicted by painful sensations, there is no offense.

The forty-fourth offense in the category of offenses incurred through giving to the naked is complete.

The Blessed Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The king of Kosala, Prasenajit, sent a battalion against a rebel force, and it was defeated and thoroughly routed, and returned. A second battalion and a third were sent, and they too were defeated and thoroughly routed and returned. The ministers then spoke to Prasenajit, the king of Kosala: "Your Majesty, the rebel's forces are growing while our forces are diminishing. If Your Majesty does not go there in person, it will be very difficult to overcome the rebel. We beg Your Majesty to go there in person."

Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, then had it proclaimed by drum throughout his realm: "All those who dwell here and live by the sword shall march. Whoever does not go shall pay a fine of five hundred kārṣāpaṇas." The fourfold army with the host of the royal forces set out, and the six monks said: "Friends, let us go and watch the fourfold army of dear Nandika and great Upananda march." They went and took up a position right along the road. When the elephant corps came, the six monks called out to them: "Ho there, friends! Noble ones, we are coming to help defeat the rebel against Prasenajit, the king of Kosala!" "You poor wretches — can the likes of these elephants subdue a rebel? Your elephants are like pigs, while the rebel's elephants are like heaped-up mountains. Even if you go forward, there is no coming back. Go home today, offer sesame water to your parents, and then depart!" Those soldiers all went away with these words taken to heart, and stood still.

Then the cavalry corps came, and the six monks called out to them: "Ho there, friends! Where are you going?"

"Noble ones, we are coming to help defeat the rebel against Prasenajit, the king of Kosala!" "You poor wretches — can horses like these subdue a rebel? Your horses are like donkeys, while the rebel's horses are like young elephants. Even if you go forward, there is no coming back. Go home today, offer sesame water to your parents, and then depart!" Those soldiers all went away with these words taken to heart, and stood still.

Then the chariot corps came, and the six monks called out to them: "Ho there, friends! Where are you going?" "Noble ones, we are coming to help defeat the rebel against Prasenajit, the king of Kosala!" "You poor wretches — can chariots like these subdue a rebel? Your chariots are like broken-down carts, while the rebel's chariots are like palaces. Even if you go forward, there is no coming back. Go home today, offer sesame water to your parents, and then depart!" Those soldiers all went away with these words taken to heart, and stood still.

Then the infantry corps came, and the six monks called out to them: "Ho there, friends! Where are you going?" "Noble ones, we are coming to help defeat the rebel against Prasenajit, the king of Kosala!" "You poor wretches — can men like these subdue a rebel? Your men are like blades of grass, while the rebel's men are like fierce yakṣas. Even if you go forward, there is no coming back. Go home today, offer sesame water to your parents, and then depart!" Those soldiers all went away with these words taken to heart, and stood still.

Then Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, arrived and said: "Why have you all gone off and stood still with these words taken to heart, refusing to advance?" They replied: "Your Majesty, how can we prevail? These shaven-headed wanderers with their great patched robes of rough cloth — these nine of them who go about begging — the ones known as the noble six monks — wise friends, they are merely reckless wanderers, yet what harm have their words done you? Go on, depart!" Having considered the matter, Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, thought: "These monks will cause me trouble again and again." He then spoke to a man: "Head-steward, come here. Go to where the Blessed One dwells and, conveying my words, bow your head at the Blessed One's two feet and inquire after his health: 'Is the Blessed One experiencing little affliction? Little distress? Is he at ease in his movements? Does he live and thrive? Does he abide in strength and comfort? Is he free from any offense?' Then present this request on behalf of Prasenajit, the king of Kosala: 'It would be well if, out of compassion, the Blessed One would establish a minor rule whereby the noble ones would not go about in the manner of armed soldiers, so that they might be mindful of not doing so.'" That man replied: "Your Majesty, as you command," and, having received these words from Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, he bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, that man addressed the Blessed One thus: "Reverend sir, Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, bows his head at the Blessed One's two feet and inquires after the Blessed One's health: 'Is the Blessed One experiencing little affliction? Little distress? Is he at ease in his movements? Does he live and thrive? Does he abide in strength and comfort? Is he free from any offense?' And this is the message he conveys: 'Head-steward, may Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, and you be well.'" "Reverend sir, on behalf of Prasenajit, the king of Kosala: Reverend sir, when these noble ones go about in the manner of armed troops, alas — if the Blessed One, out of compassion, would be so good as to establish a minor rule by which he would cause those who go about in the manner of armed troops to bear in mind that they should not do so, that would be excellent." Such was his message.

The Blessed One said nothing to that man, granting his request by silence. Then that man, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that the request had been granted, bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this occasion, and this circumstance, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth, just as before. "The blessed buddhas do such-and-such knowingly" — and so forth, also just as before.

The Blessed One questioned the Group of Six: "Monks, is it true that you went about in the manner of armed troops?" "Reverend sir, it is true." The Blessed One rebuked them: "This is not in keeping with the conduct of a contemplative; it is not fitting; it is not appropriate; it is not in accord with proper conduct — it is not something to be done by one who has gone forth." Then, having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, perceiving ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, just as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk goes about in the manner of armed troops commits an offense."

"Whatever monk" refers to the Group of Six or any other who is similarly disposed.

Regarding the word "army": an army may have one division, two divisions, three divisions, or four divisions. What is an army of one division? A corps of elephants. What is an army of two divisions? A corps of elephants and a corps of cavalry. What is an army of three divisions? A corps of elephants, a corps of cavalry, and a corps of chariots. What is an army of four divisions? A corps of elephants, a corps of cavalry, a corps of chariots, and a corps of infantry.

"In the manner of armed troops" means with evident delight in engaging in battle.

"Goes about" means goes.

"Commits an offense" means it causes one to be scorched, afflicted, and cast down into hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, evil destinations, and states of ruin. Furthermore, for as long as the offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of virtuous qualities — and therefore it is said to "commit an offense."

How does one incur a downfall in this case? Whatever monk goes about even to the slightest degree in the manner of armed troops incurs a downfall in every instance.

A monk who is on his alms round when troops pass by, who is sitting in the colonnade of a monastery when troops arrive there, who has been summoned by a king, a queen, a prince, a minister, a city official, a village headman, or a district official — for him there is no offense. For one who is beset by any one of the eight obstacles and remains in that proximity, there is no offense. For a first offender, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by painful sensations, there is no offense.

The forty-fifth offense involving viewing troops is complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. Even though the stone-quarry man had not yet come, the king had set up camp there on that very spot, and his ministers said: "Divine lord, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada is renowned as one of great power whose good fortune has fully ripened.

"If he were to come, his power would be such that the stone-quarry man would indeed arrive, and there would be a situation of that kind." The king sent a letter to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada saying that he wished to see the householder, and the householder Anāthapiṇḍada came to him. Even so, since the stone-quarry man had not yet arrived, Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, said to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada: "Householder, do the boys not remember? Divine lord, the boys do not remember — and yet in this way they wish to see the noble ones." Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, sent a letter to the Saṅgha saying: "I wish to see the noble ones of the Saṅgha." The liturgical master read the letter aloud in the midst of the Saṅgha, and announced that whoever wished to go there should draw a lot. When the lots were drawn, the elder monks said: "We are old and cannot endure the journey, so we are unable to go." The junior monks said: "If the Dharma must be taught there, we have heard little and cannot teach the Dharma — so should we draw water instead? Or are we likewise unable to go?" The group of six monks said: "Friends Nandika, as long as the Blessed One lives and we are alive, the teaching endures. When the Blessed One passes into nirvāṇa and our own time comes, it will be said that the teaching has declined. For as long as we live, we have cherished the teaching." They drew lots and went there. Setting out along the road, they taught the Dharma to the king and inspired the king with sincere faith. They taught the Dharma to the queen, to the princes, to the ministers, and to the leaders of the city, and inspired the great multitude of ordinary people with sincere faith. Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, said to his ministers: "I will take the stone-quarry man on a tour," and set out with both the noble ones and the group of six monks. The group of six monks said: "Friends Nandika, for as long as we can, let us abide by the conduct of others rather than our own conduct — let us march like a great army." And they went and stationed themselves along the road. When the elephant corps arrived, those soldiers said: "Noble ones, make way, make way! Why? The elephant corps is coming." "Are creatures like these elephants? They look more like pigs." And they seized them by their tusks and threw them to one side. When the cavalry arrived, those soldiers said: "Noble ones, make way, make way! Why? The cavalry is coming." "Are creatures like these horses? They look more like donkeys." And they seized them by their tails and threw them to one side. When the chariot corps arrived, those soldiers said: "Noble ones, make way, make way! Why? The chariot corps is coming." "Are creatures like these chariots? They look more like broken-down carts." And they seized them by their axle-poles and threw them to one side. When the infantry corps arrived, those soldiers said: "Noble ones, make way, make way! Why? The infantry is coming." "Are creatures like these men? They look more like scarecrows." And they seized them by their collars and threw them to one side, and those soldiers fell into a rage and stood there in fury. When Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, arrived, he said: "Wise ones, why are you standing there in fury without moving? Divine lord, how could we prevail?"

"These mendicants who are seeking large bolts of cloth to tie around their heads — nine of them are coming, are they not? And who are they?" "Noble ones, those are the six-group monks. Since they are dissolute mendicants, what harm can what they say do to you? Leave it be." Now Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, thought to himself: "These fellows will keep provoking me again and again," and recognizing this, he said to one of his men: "My good man, come here. Go to where the Blessed One is, and in my name bow your head to the Blessed One's two feet and ask after his health, saying: 'Is the Blessed One experiencing little discomfort, little distress? Are you vigorous and in good health? Do you dwell in touch with strength and ease? Are you free from any impropriety?' Then speak these words: 'Blessed One, on behalf of Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, who bows his head to the Blessed One's two feet — these noble ones have been going about fully armed and remaining in the midst of an army for a very long time. Alas! For the sake of compassion, it would be good if the Blessed One would establish some means of remembrance for the noble ones so that, having gone about fully armed, they would no longer remain in the midst of an army for so very long.'" The man replied, "As the lord commands," and, having heard these words from Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, he went to where the Blessed One was. He arrived and bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet, then sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, he spoke thus to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, bows his head to the Blessed One's two feet and asks after the Blessed One's health: 'Is there little distress, little discomfort? Are you vigorous? Do you live in good health? Are you endowed with strength? Do you dwell in touch with ease? Are you free from any impropriety?'" Then: "My good man, may Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, be well. Blessed One, on behalf of Prasenajit, the king of Kosala: these noble ones have been going about fully armed and remaining in the midst of an army for a very long time. Alas! It would be good if the Blessed One, out of compassion, would establish some means of remembrance for the noble ones so that, having gone about fully armed, they would no longer remain in the midst of an army for so very long." The Blessed One said nothing to the man, and by that silence gave his assent. The man, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that assent had been given, departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this circumstance, and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and all the rest is as before. "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, knowing yet feigning not to know" — and so forth, also as before. The awakened one, the Blessed One, rebuked the six-group monks: "Monks, is it true that you went about fully armed and remained in the midst of an army for a very long time?" "Blessed One, it is so." The awakened one, the Blessed One, criticized their conduct, saying: "This is not the proper conduct of a mendicant, it is not fitting, it is not suitable, it is not in accord with proper conduct, and it is not something that one who has gone forth should do." Having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten genuine benefits, a rule of training is to be established for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a circumstance such as this arises for a monk — that is, going about fully armed — that monk may remain within that army for up to two nights. If he remains beyond that, it constitutes a transgression."

As for "a monk" — this refers to one of the group of six, or to any other such person.

As for "an army" — an army may have one division, two divisions, three divisions, or four divisions. What is a one-division army? It is a host of elephant troops. What is a two-division army? It is a host of elephant troops and a host of cavalry. What is a three-division army? It is a host of elephant troops, a host of cavalry, and a host of chariot troops. What is a four-division army? It is a host of elephant troops, a host of cavalry, a host of chariot troops, and a host of foot soldiers.

As for "armed" — this refers to one who delights in doing battle.

As for "going about" — this means for whatever reason one travels.

As for "if a circumstance such as this arises" — this means if one is summoned by a king, a queen, a prince, a minister, a city magistrate, a town dweller, or a country dweller.

As for "that monk" — this means whichever monk it may be.

As for "within that army" — this means within that armed force.

As for "may remain for up to two nights" — this means he may remain for a period of no more than two nights.

As for "if he remains beyond that" — this means if he remains past that point.

As for "it constitutes a transgression" — this means it causes him to be scorched, burned, and made to fall into hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of ruin. Moreover, so long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities of virtue. Therefore it is said to constitute a transgression.

Now, how does the transgression arise? For however much time beyond two nights a monk remains within an army, a transgression arises in every case. There is no transgression, however, for one who is told to stay by a king, a queen, a prince, a minister, a city magistrate, a town dweller, or a country dweller. There is no transgression if, through any one of the eight impediments, one is constrained to remain nearby. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, who is insane, whose mind is disturbed, or who

This completes the forty-sixth transgression: remaining within an army.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. Now, although Prasenajit of Kosala had not come to see him for some time, he spoke to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, saying: "Householder, do you not think of the boys? By 'the boys' I mean that I wish to see the noble ones." King Prasenajit of Kosala sent a letter to the community of monks saying that he wished to see the noble ones. The rector of the community read the letter in the midst of the Saṅgha, and announced that whoever wished to go there should cast a lot. The elder monks among the monks said: "We are old and cannot endure the journey, so we are unable to go." The junior monks said: "If the Dharma must be taught there, we have heard little and are unable to teach the Dharma — so should we draw water or is it also impossible for us to go?" The group of six said: "Friends, Nandaka and Upananda — as long as the Blessed One lives and we are alive, the teaching will endure. When the Blessed One passes into nirvāṇa and our time comes, it will be said that the teaching has declined. Therefore for as long as we are alive, you must cherish the teaching."

"Take your tooth-sticks," they said, and taking their tooth-sticks, the monks went there and taught the Dharma to the king, causing the king to develop faith. They also taught the Dharma to the queen, the young princes, the ministers and counselors, and the captains of the city districts, thereby inspiring faith in the great multitude of people assembled there.

King Prasenajit of Kosala said to his ministers: "Today, prepare for battle, and have the rocky crags surrounded." As they began to set the formation, the group of six said: "Friends Nandaka and Upananda, for however long we remain, let us conduct ourselves according to others' standards of deportment rather than our own. Let us go and experience firsthand the sight of the finest victory banners of the great-bellied ones, the finest troops, and an army arrayed and drawn up for battle." So they went into the midst of the elephant corps and asked: "O wise ones, what are you doing?" The soldiers replied: "Noble ones, we are setting up the formation." The group of six said: "You poor fellows — elephants decked out like these: do you put them in this direction, or turn them this way?" And seizing the elephants by their tusks, they flung them all to one side.

Then they went into the midst of the cavalry and asked: "O wise ones, what are you doing?" The cavalry replied: "Noble ones, we are setting up the formation." The group of six said: "You poor fellows — horses like these: do you place them in this direction, or turn them this way?" And seizing the horses by their tails, they flung them all to one side.

Then they went into the midst of the chariot corps and asked: "O wise ones, what are you doing?" The chariot drivers replied: "Noble ones, we are setting up the formation." The group of six said: "You poor fellows — broken-down chariots like these: do you place them in this direction, or turn them this way?" And seizing the chariots by their axle-poles, they flung them all to one side.

Then they went into the midst of the infantry and asked: "O wise ones, what are you doing?" The soldiers replied: "Noble ones, we are setting up the formation." The group of six said: "You poor fellows — slackers like these: do you place them in this direction, or turn them this way?" And seizing the soldiers by their necks, they flung them all to one side.

Then the group of six, placing themselves directly in front of the troops at no great distance from the rocky crags, let out a sudden shout. When the troops heard it they thought: "The rocky crags have broken free from the fort and are sliding down!" Terrified and panic-stricken, they began to flee. The group of six, moving swiftly, came and stood before the city district captains and asked: "O wise ones, why are you fleeing?" They replied: "Noble ones, the rocky crags have broken free from the fort and are sliding down!" The group of six said: "You poor fellows, that was just a little trick of ours. If the rocky crags had truly borne down on you and you had realized it, by the very next morning you would all have been seized by the neck and carried off to the crags. Do not be afraid — turn back." The troops went off to one side and stood there, coming to their senses.

Shortly thereafter, King Prasenajit of Kosala arrived and said: "O wise ones, have you not yet set the battle formation?" They replied: "O King, how could we prevail? As it is, there are these śramaṇas with their shaved heads, wrapped in great bolts of cloth, who are a match for us and number nine to our one." The king asked: "Which śramaṇas?" They answered: "Noble sire, it is the group of six." The king said: "O wise ones, these are merely wandering śramaṇas — what harm could their words do to you? Now set the battle formation today." King Prasenajit of Kosala thought to himself:

Realizing that these men would be a persistent source of trouble for him, the king spoke to one of his attendants: "Come now, go to where the Blessed One is, and in my name bow your head at the Blessed One's two feet and inquire after his health: 'Is the Blessed One free from illness? Free from affliction? Active and vigorous? Living in comfort? Dwelling in a state of strength and ease? Free from anything unseemly?' Then speak these words: 'From King Prasenajit of Kosala comes this message: these noble ones dwell for a very long time within the army, they go to where the battle formation is being drawn up, and they experience the sight of victory banners at their finest, the finest of troops, and the army in full battle array. It would be excellent if the Blessed One, out of compassion, would please establish some rule by which these noble ones, even when dwelling for a very long time within the army, would not go to where the battle formation is being drawn up, would not experience the sight of victory banners at their finest, the finest of troops, and the army in full battle array — so that they may be mindful of this.'"

The man replied, "As you command, Sire," and having received these words from King Prasenajit of Kosala, he went to where the Blessed One was. Upon arriving, he bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the man addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, King Prasenajit of Kosala bows his head at the Blessed One's two feet and inquires after his health: 'Is the Blessed One free from illness? Free from affliction? Active and vigorous? Living in comfort? Dwelling in a state of strength and ease? Free from anything unseemly?'" The Blessed One replied, "May King Prasenajit of Kosala be well." Then the man continued: "From King Prasenajit of Kosala comes this message: these noble ones dwell for a very long time within the army, they go to where the battle formation is being drawn up, and they experience the sight of victory banners at their finest, the finest of troops, and the army in full battle array. It would be excellent if the Blessed One, out of compassion, would please establish some rule by which these noble ones, even when dwelling for a very long time within the army, would not go to where the battle formation is being drawn up, would not experience the sight of victory banners at their finest, the finest of troops, and the army in full battle array — so that they may be mindful of this."

The Blessed One said nothing to the man, and by his silence gave consent. The man, understanding that the Blessed One's silence was his consent, then bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this origin, and this occasion, convened the assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth, as before. The passage beginning "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, while knowing, act as though unknowing" also proceeds as before.

The awakened Buddha, the Blessed One, then questioned the group of six: "Monks, is it true that you dwell within the army, go to where the battle formation is being drawn up, and experience the sight of victory banners at their finest, the finest of troops, and the army in full battle array?" They replied, "Venerable One, it is true." The awakened Buddha, the Blessed One, rebuked them: "What is not the conduct of a śramaṇa, what is not in keeping with it, what is not appropriate, what is not in accord with proper conduct — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth." Having thus rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks:

"Monks, therefore, having seen the ten benefits clearly, a rule of training is to be established for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so on, as before. "My śrāvakas are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk, while dwelling within that army for two days, goes to witness a battle formation in action, or experiences the sight of the finest victory banners, the finest of troops, or the army drawn up in full battle array, he commits a transgression."

The term "monk" refers to the group of six, or any other who is of that same kind. "Two days" means up to and including two days. As for "army" — an army may have one division, two divisions, three divisions, or four divisions. What is a one-division army? A host of elephants. What is a two-division army? A host of elephants and a host of cavalry. What is a three-division army? A host of elephants, a host of cavalry, and a host of chariots. What is a four-division army? A host of elephants, a host of cavalry, a host of chariots, and a host of infantry.

"While dwelling within it" means while staying there. "Goes to witness a battle formation in action" means going to watch a formation set for battle. "The finest of victory banners" — there are four kinds of victory banners: the banner of the horse standard, the banner of the sea-monster (makara), the banner of the lion, and the banner of the nāga. "The finest of troops" refers to the fourfold host of divisions: elephants, cavalry, chariots, and infantry. As for "experiences the sight of the army drawn up in full battle array" — a formation takes four shapes: like the face of a grain, like the form of a chariot, like a crescent moon, or like the wings of a garuḍa.

"Commits a transgression" — it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the evil destinations of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, and the lower realms. Moreover, so long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome dharmas. It is for this reason that it is said "commits a transgression."

How precisely does one commit a transgression in this regard? If a monk goes to watch a formation being stirred into action by armored elephants, he commits a transgression. If the elephants are unarmored, it is a misdeed. If a monk goes to watch a formation being stirred into action by armored cavalry, he commits a transgression. If the cavalry is unarmored, it is a misdeed. If a monk goes to watch a formation being stirred into action by equipped chariots, he commits a transgression. If the chariots are unequipped, it is a misdeed. If a monk goes to watch a formation being stirred into action by armored infantry, he commits a transgression. If the infantry is unarmored, it is a misdeed. If a monk goes to a formation when it is being stirred into action, he commits a transgression. The same applies to experiencing the sight of the finest victory banners, the finest of troops, and the army drawn up in full battle array.

If any one of the eight impediments is present, no transgression is incurred. Likewise, no transgression is incurred for one who is a beginner, one who is mentally deranged, one who is mentally disturbed, or one who is afflicted by feeling.

Here concludes the forty-seventh transgression: the transgression of experiencing the divisions of an army.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana had given going forth and full ordination to the group of seventeen, including Upananda and others — youths who were young members of the Śākya clan — those seventeen proceeded to rely upon, attend, and pay homage to the group of six monks.

Then Chāraka said: "Let the seventeen come here and do such and such." They replied: "Are you our preceptor or our abbot? You are not." At that, he said: "You fools, what else would you do?" and struck one of them. Thereupon all of them fell to the ground on their backs and began to cry out, "We have been struck! We have been struck!"

The monks said: "Venerable Chāraḁa, why do you strike the youths?" Chāraḁa replied: "Venerable ones, when I struck just one of them, they all fell to the ground and wept." The monks then said to the seventeen: "Venerable ones, when only one of you was struck, why did all of you fall to the ground and cry?" They replied: "If we had not cried out, all of us would have been beaten."

The monks censured, criticized, and reproached them, saying: "Why do monks, over a trifling matter, beat other monks in rage, disturbance, and indignation?" The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this occasion, and this context, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth, as before. The section beginning "The Blessed Buddhas, knowing full well, inquire as if unaware" also proceeds as before.

The Blessed One questioned the venerable Chāraḁa: "Chāraḁa, is it true that, acting in rage, disturbance, and indignation, you struck a monk?" He replied: "Reverend one, it is true." The Blessed One then censured him, declaring that such conduct was unworthy of a renunciant, was not appropriate, was not suitable, and was not in accordance with the rule — that this is not something to be done by one who has gone forth. And so the Blessed One censured him in many ways.

He then addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing the ten benefits in their entirety, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established," and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to uphold this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Furthermore, should any monk, acting in rage, disturbance, and indignation, strike a monk, he commits a transgression.

'Furthermore, should any monk' refers to Chāraḁa or any other who is of that kind.

'Acting in rage, disturbance, and indignation' means being angry and overcome by the force of anger.

'A monk' refers to one who belongs to this Dharma.

'Should strike' means should he strike.

'He commits a transgression': this burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower rebirths, and the miserable destinies. Moreover, for as long as the transgression is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities. Therefore it is said: 'he commits a transgression.'

As for how a transgression comes about in this case: it may be through inner grasping, through outward projection, or through the possession of both together.

How does it come about through inner grasping?

If a monk, stirred by anger and rage, his mind displeased, strikes a fellow monk with one finger, he incurs one transgression. If he strikes with two, three, four, or five fingers, he incurs two, three, four, or five transgressions respectively. If he strikes with a fist, an elbow, a shoulder, the head, the chest, the back, the hip, the thigh, the knee, the shin, or even with the big toe of his foot, he incurs a transgression in each case. That is how a transgression comes about through inner grasping.

As for how it comes about through outward projection: if a monk, stirred by anger and rage, his mind displeased, shoots an arrow at a fellow monk, he incurs a transgression. Just as with an arrow, so too with an iron arrow, an arrow tipped halfway with iron, a dart with a pointed tip, a dart with serrated teeth, a four-edged dart, a dart shaped like the petal of a karāvīra flower, a dart with a hollow tip, a wheel, a single-pointed vajra, a heavy arrow, a single-pointed blade, a bolt of Chinese bamboo, or even a handful of mustard seeds that he throws — for as many mustard seeds as strike the body, he incurs that many transgressions; and for as many mustard seeds as fail to strike the body, he incurs that many offenses of wrongdoing. That is how a transgression comes about through outward projection.

As for how it comes about through the possession of both together: if a monk, stirred by anger and rage, his mind displeased, strikes a fellow monk with a sword, he incurs a transgression. Just as with a sword, so too with a hatchet, a single-edged blade, a double-edged blade, a spear, a thrown spear, a curved knife, a grass stalk, or even a broom — for as many bristles of the broom as strike the body, he incurs that many transgressions; and for as many bristles as fail to strike the body, he incurs that many offenses of wrongdoing. That is how a transgression comes about through the possession of both together.

There is no transgression for one who is being restrained by others, or who is performing a ritual striking as part of the practice of a vidyā mantra. There is likewise no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is mentally deranged, one whose mind is disturbed, or one who is afflicted by painful feelings.

The thirty-eighth transgression concerning striking is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana gave forth-going and full ordination to seventeen young men — novices born in Nīpa — together with their near attendants. Once they had been ordained, those novices began to consort with, associate with, and pay service to the group of the Six Monks.

Then Chanda said to them: "You seventeen, come here and do this and that." They replied: "Are you our preceptor or our abbot? We will not do it." At this he mocked them, saying: "You dolts, what else do you do?" — and he made a threatening gesture as though to strike one of them. At once all of them fell to the ground and began to weep. The monks said: "Venerable Chanda, why did you threaten to strike the young men?" Chanda replied: "Venerable ones, I made a threatening gesture as though to strike one of them, and they all fell to the ground and wept." The monks then said to the seventeen: "Venerable ones, he only made a threatening gesture toward one of you — why did you all fall to the ground and weep?" They replied: "If we had not wept, there would have been no one to report what he struck and why."

Then the monks of few desires censured and rebuked those monks, saying: "Why do monks stirred by anger and rage, their minds displeased, make threatening gestures toward fellow monks?"

The monks reported this matter of abusive speech to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, with this as the basis and occasion, convened the community of monks — and so forth, as before. The passage beginning "The blessed buddhas, while knowing, make inquiry" — and so forth, also as before. The Blessed One addressed the venerable Chanda: "Chanda, is it true that, stirred by anger and rage, your mind displeased, you made a threatening gesture as though to strike a monk?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Blessed One censured him, saying that what is not the proper conduct of a monk, what is not fitting, not suitable, not in accord with the discipline, is not something a person who has gone forth ought to do. Then, having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing the ten benefits rightly, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, stirred by anger and rage, his mind displeased, makes a threatening gesture as though to strike a monk — even with the flat of the hand — commits an offense.

Now, the phrase 'whatever monk' refers to Chanda or to any other who is likewise. The phrase 'stirred by anger and rage, his mind displeased' means overcome by anger and overwhelmed by the force of that anger. The phrase 'toward a monk' means toward one who belongs to this Dharma. The phrase 'makes a threatening gesture as though to strike' means positions himself to strike. The phrase 'even with the flat of the hand' means even if it is merely a threatening gesture with the flat of the palm. The phrase 'commits an offense' means it causes him to be burned, scorched, and cast down into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of miserable rebirth. Furthermore, for as long as the offense is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the virtuous qualities — and for that reason it is said to commit an offense.

Now, one may ask: how does it become an offense? It does so through being seized internally, through being cast externally, or through both together. How so through being seized internally? If a monk, stirred by anger and rage, his mind displeased, makes a threatening gesture as though to strike a monk with one finger, he commits one offense. If he makes a threatening gesture with two, three, four, or five fingers, he commits two, three, four, or five offenses respectively. If he makes a threatening gesture with the fist, with the elbow, with the shoulder, with the head, with the knee, with the back, with the hip, with the thigh, with the knee-joint, with the ankle, or even with the big toe of the foot, he commits an offense in each case. That is how it occurs through being seized internally.

How does it occur through being cast externally? If a monk, stirred by anger and rage, his mind displeased, makes a threatening gesture as though to shoot an arrow at a monk, he commits an offense. Just as with shooting an arrow, so too with an iron arrow, a half-iron arrow, a three-pointed dart, a dart with tooth-like points, a four-cornered dart, a dart shaped like the petals of a karavīra flower, a dart shaped like a bird's heart, a discus, a single-pointed vajra, a large arrow, a single-pointed weapon, a bamboo thorn — and even if he makes a threatening gesture with a palmful of white mustard seeds, he commits as many offenses as there are mustard seeds he threatens with. That is how it occurs through being cast externally.

Now, how does it occur through both together?

If a monk, overcome with rage and agitation, in a state of anger and discontent, makes a threatening gesture toward another monk with a sword, he commits a transgression. Just as with a sword, so too with a cleaver, a single-edged blade, a double-edged blade, a spear, a thrown spear, a knife, and a grass thorn — and even if he makes a threatening gesture with a broom, he commits as many offenses as there are thorns in it. Just as with a broom, so too with a bunch of iron needles and a coil of rope — if he makes a threatening gesture, it is the same. That is how it occurs through both together.

There is no offense for one who is a first offender, who is insane, who is mentally disturbed, or who is afflicted by feelings.

The forty-ninth offense of threatening is complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. A monk named Dharma who dwelt together with Ānanda was a person of conscience, given to remorse, restrained, and desirous of training. For as long as he did not know that a certain individual was engaging in misconduct throughout his dwelling, he continued to live together with that person. But when he came to know that the person was engaging in such misconduct, he then began to live together with those monks who were of naturally proper conduct. In accordance with the word of the Blessed One, he would go at the three times of day simply to bow at that person's feet.

Dharma went to the other monk and requested permission to use his parasol. When Ānanda heard this, he said, "My son Dharma, take my mat as well and go. Has the ācārya too gone to use a parasol? Foolish one, do you wish to examine me separately? What practice of yoga is there that I do not know? I do not investigate the ācārya separately." Having thus said, "Has the ācārya too gone to use a parasol?" and having requested a seat, Dharma departed.

Dharma took that monk's mat and went out to use it during the day. He placed the mat at the foot of a tree and sat down in a secluded spot and began to arouse mental application. Afterward Ānanda came and, seeing Dharma from a distance — for they were far apart — said, "Ācārya, I have placed the mat at the foot of a tree; go there and sit." Ānanda went there and sat down covering his head. Not finding what he wished for there, he rose from the mat and began to look in all four directions. Then a girl was seen cutting shadow-grass at the edge of the Jeta Grove, and he called out to Dharma, "Dharma, make the girl stop cutting shadow-grass."

Dharma said to him, "Ācārya, think of the meaning of the Jeta Grove sūtra. Foolish one, have you come to rely on the literal edge of a sūtra passage? Did the Blessed One not say, 'I will not even discard a blade of grass belonging to the Saṅgha'? I shall go myself and turn her away. The ācārya knows."

Ānanda went and said, "Girl, why are you cutting the shadow-grass of the Jeta Grove?" The girl smiled. Ānanda grabbed her by her limbs and her trunk and let out a cry. Then he went to Dharma and asked, "My son Dharma, did you see anything at all?" "Ācārya, I saw everything except the actual penetration." "My son Dharma, do not tell anyone. Ācārya, for as long as you have not seen a monk of naturally proper conduct, I will not tell anyone." Ānanda said, "If I were to conceal the offense of misconduct of your preceptor, would you not conceal mine?" Dharma replied:

When Dharma said, "Even if you, ācārya, conceal it, I will not conceal it," the monks reported this to the Blessed One. The monks rebuked, derided, and murmured against him, saying, "Why do certain monks knowingly conceal a monk's offense of serious misconduct?" The monks then informed the Blessed One, and thereupon the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks on account of this occurrence, this basis, and this occasion — and so forth as before. The Blessed Buddhas knowingly feign not to know — and so forth as before.

The Blessed One questioned the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that you knowingly concealed a monk's offense of serious misconduct?" "Blessed One, it is so." The Blessed One censured him, declaring that what is not the way of the ascetic life, what is not proper, what is not fitting, what does not accord with the rule — that is not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Then the Blessed One censured him in many ways and spoke to the monks: "Monks, seeing ten benefits, I will establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk knowingly conceals a monk's offense of serious misconduct commits a downfall.

Now, 'whatever monk' means a son of the Śākyas such as Ānanda or anyone else of that kind. 'Knowingly' means having recognized it himself or having been told by others. 'A monk's' means one belonging to this Dharma community. 'Offense of serious misconduct' refers to two kinds of serious misconduct: that which leads to defeat (pārājika), and that which leads to a formal act of the remaining Saṅgha. Why are these called serious misconduct? Because of their essential nature and their arising. 'Conceals' means having covered it over. 'Commits a downfall' means it burns him, scorches him, and causes him to fall into hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, evil destinies, and states of ruin. Furthermore, as long as the offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome dharma — therefore it is said to commit a downfall.

How does one come to commit a downfall in each case? If a monk sees another monk committing an offense that leads to defeat, and generates in his mind the intention to conceal it from that monk, then until dawn has not yet broken it is a misdeed, and when dawn breaks it becomes a downfall. If a monk sees another monk committing an offense requiring a formal act of the remaining Saṅgha, and generates in his mind the intention to conceal it from that monk, then until dawn has not yet broken it is a misdeed, and when dawn breaks it becomes a downfall. If a monk sees another monk committing an offense that itself constitutes a downfall, and generates in his mind the intention to conceal it from that monk, then until dawn has not yet broken it is a misdeed, and when dawn breaks it also remains a misdeed. If a monk sees another monk committing an offense requiring individual confession, and generates in his mind the intention to conceal it from that monk, then until dawn has not yet broken it is a misdeed, and when dawn breaks it also remains a misdeed. If a monk sees another monk committing a misdeed offense, and generates in his mind the intention to conceal it from that monk, then until dawn has not yet broken it is a misdeed, and when dawn breaks it also remains a misdeed.

For me, this basis does not touch upon ease, if it would become an obstacle to the ascetic's rules and to the holy life, there is no transgression. For me, if this basis would cause division of the Saṅgha, or disturbance of the Saṅgha, or the Saṅgha becoming two, or the Saṅgha becoming separate, there is no transgression. For one who is a beginner, or who is insane, or who is mentally disturbed, or who is afflicted by feelings, there is no transgression. The fifty offenses of concealing a basis of bad conduct are complete.

The Vinaya Analysis, the fifty-sixth bundle. In summary: ease, fire, and intention; not yet fully ordained, Dharma, and speech; a novice whose complexion has changed; precious things and the hot season.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A monk named Dharma was dwelling together with Ānanda — a monk who was conscientious, remorseful, restrained, and desirous of training. For as long as he did not know that the other was engaging in all kinds of bad conduct, he dwelt together with him. When he came to know that the other was engaging in all kinds of bad conduct, he then began to dwell together only with those monks who were of naturally good conduct, and by the Blessed One's scriptural authority he would go to pay homage at his feet at the three times of day alone.

Upananda said to Ānanda: "Look, teacher Dharma has lodged a complaint before the community of monks, the Saṅgha of the Buddha and the rest. I too should do him some definite harm." Ānanda replied: "This monk is conscientious, remorseful, restrained, and desirous of training — what harm could you do him? What must certainly be done is to cut off his food." "That can be done."

A householder invited both Ānanda and Upananda to a meal. Upananda thought: "Today I shall cut off this Dharma's food." Dharma went to Ānanda's place and said: "Preceptor, I request leave to go on alms-round." Ānanda said: "Dharma, today a householder has invited us to a meal — come here and eat your meal right here." Dharma replied: "Was I ever invited before together with the preceptor?" Upananda said: "Dharma, I have heard from others and seen from others — if I know you to be conscientious, remorseful, restrained, and desirous of training, did your preceptor cause you to take possession of improper things? Why then do you cut off the words of one who has the qualities of a preceptor? Has the Blessed One not said in the Vinaya that when an ācārya or preceptor instructs, one must comply, and that if one does not comply it becomes a misdeed?" Silenced by the eloquent censure of that monk, Dharma sat without saying anything. Then he said: "I shall come, having taken my bowl and water-pot." Ānanda replied: "What use is the bowl and water-pot there? There you will get the water strained from washing the vessels — come along then." Dharma set out together with both of them. A noble one engaged in alms-round saw him and said: "Dharma, where are you going?" "I am going where I have been invited." "Know moderation in food." Dharma said: "Whether I will eat a meal or have my food cut off, there is no telling." He entered Śrāvastī together with those two. The two went along the street and took their place in the market. Upananda went to that householder's house, ate his meal, and returned. After that, Ānanda too went to that householder's house and ate his meal, sitting there. Dharma said to Upananda: "Teacher, it is midday — you should leave." Upananda replied: "Everything there is already prepared, so go there — there is nothing else to do apart from eating — go straight at midday."

Dharma stood up and began measuring the shadow with both feet. Ānanda said: "You fool — do you have not even a little trust in our training? Do you think that by traveling by a middle route we will eat at the wrong time? It is not comfortable for me to speak or sit together with you; it would be more comfortable for me to speak or sit alone. Off you go!" Dharma thought: "If I had come carrying my bowl and water-strainer, I would have been going out on alms-round — but now there is nothing at all to be done." So he went to the temple, and for as long as there was color in his body he strained toward virtue, and when the color faded from his body he lay down and rested. The monks then said to him: "Venerable Dharma, is the food someone else's — is the meal also someone else's? Why, for something as small as being unable to strain toward virtue, did you eat that much food?" Dharma replied: "Who ate? Did you not eat? — I did not eat." Because he expanded on that occasion in that way, and because monks of little understanding were rebuking monks, saying they had intentionally cut off a monk's food, hurling insults, and speaking ill of them, the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, because of this occurrence, with this as the grounds, and in this context, convened the community of monks — and so forth as before. The Blessed Buddhas, though knowing, made inquiry — and so forth as before.

The Blessed Buddha then questioned Ānanda: "Ānanda, you yourself were seeking a fault and thinking 'I shall find a fault with this monk' — taking that very intention as the condition, you spoke to the monk thus: 'Venerable, come here; go to the householders' homes, and I will have them give you as much lodging and food as you wish' — and then, without actually having them give it to him, you said after that: 'Venerable, it is not comfortable for me to speak or sit together with you; it would be more comfortable for me to speak or sit alone — off you go!' — and you set about cutting off his food. Is that true?" "Reverend, it is so."

The Blessed Buddha then rebuked him, saying that such behavior — contrary to the conduct of an ascetic, not befitting, not suitable, not in conformity with discipline — is not to be done by one who has gone forth. After rebuking him in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks:

"Monks, seeing ten benefits in their true form, a rule of training is to be laid down in the Vinaya for the hearers — and so forth as before. My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, seeking a fault and thinking 'I shall find a fault with this monk,' takes that very intention as the condition and speaks to the monk thus: 'Venerable, come here; go to the householders' homes, and I will have them give you as much lodging and food as you may desire for alms' — and then, without having them give it to him, says thereafter: 'Venerable, it is not comfortable for me to speak or sit together with you; it would be more comfortable for me to speak or sit alone — off you go!' — commits an offense.

Here 'whatever monk' refers to Śākyamuni's son Ānanda or another of that kind."

"Seeking a fault, thinking 'I shall find a fault with this monk'" means: thinking "I shall cause this monk's alms to be cut off by any means."

"Taking that very thing as the condition" means: not something else.

"To the monk" means: to one who belongs to this Dharma.

"Saying thus" means: having spoken in these words.

"Venerable, come here; go to the householders' homes" means: to the homes of brahmins and householders.

"Lodging and food as alms for you there" — "lodging" refers to the five kinds of lodging, and "food" refers to the five kinds of food.

"Saying 'I will have them give you as much as you may desire'" means: as much as is sufficient.

"Without having them give it to him, says thereafter: 'Venerable, it is not comfortable for me to speak or sit together with you; rather, it would be more comfortable for me to speak or sit alone — off you go!'" means: having said exactly those words.

"Commits an offense" means: it burns, scorches, and casts one down into the hells, the animal realm, the preta realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the states of miserable downfall. Furthermore, so long as that offense is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs one's virtuous qualities. Therefore it is said to commit an offense.

As to how a downfall arises in this case: however slight the intention with which a monk causes a monk's alms to be cut off, a downfall arises in every instance. There is no downfall when one causes it to be done for the sake of someone who is ill, or when it is done following a physician's instruction. There is no downfall for a first offender, for one who is mentally deranged, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one overwhelmed by painful sensations.

The fifty-first offense — that of causing alms to be cut off — is complete.

The Blessed One (the Buddha), Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Then a great many merchants of Śrāvastī went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they bowed their heads at the Blessed One's feet and sat down to one side. Having sat down to one side, the Blessed One fully taught those many merchants of Śrāvastī with words of Dharma, fully led them to take it up, fully praised them, and fully gladdened them. With many explanations he fully taught, fully led them to take it up, fully praised them, and fully gladdened them with words of Dharma, and then fell silent.

Then those many merchants of Śrāvastī, having rejoiced and expressed their delight at what the Blessed One had declared, bowed their heads at the Blessed One's feet, departed from the Blessed One's presence, and went to where the Venerable Ānanda was. Having arrived, they bowed their heads at the Venerable Ānanda's feet and sat down to one side. Having sat down to one side, the Venerable Ānanda fully taught, fully led to the taking up, fully praised, and fully gladdened those many merchants of Śrāvastī with Dharma talk. With many explanations he fully taught, fully led them to take it up, fully praised them, and fully gladdened them with Dharma talk, and then fell silent.

Then those many merchants of Śrāvastī rose from their seats, arranged their upper robes over one shoulder, turned toward the Venerable Ānanda with palms joined in reverence, and spoke to the Venerable Ānanda thus:

"Venerable Ānanda, after the Blessed One has accepted the rains retreat, where will he go? Wise ones, please ask the Blessed One. Venerable Ānanda, the Blessed One is difficult to approach and difficult to bear with, and so we do not dare to ask the Blessed One directly. Wise ones, for me too, since the Blessed One is difficult to approach and difficult to bear with, I am unable to ask the Blessed One. Venerable Ānanda, if even the Venerable Ānanda, because the Blessed One is difficult to approach and difficult to bear with, does not venture to ask the Blessed One — then how does the Venerable Ānanda know by signs or by words where the Blessed One will go after accepting the rains retreat? How does he know by signs? How does he know by words?"

"Wise ones, whichever direction the Blessed One, having accepted the rains retreat, intends to travel, toward that direction he faces and sits, and he also speaks in praise of those people. Venerable Ānanda, which direction does the Blessed One face as he sits? Of which people does he speak in praise?" "Wise ones, the Blessed One faces toward Magadha as he sits, and he speaks in praise of the people of Rājagṛha."

Those merchants, delighting in and rejoicing over what the Venerable Ānanda had said, bowed their heads at the feet of the Venerable Ānanda and departed. They then thought to themselves: "The Blessed One, having accepted the rains retreat, will journey to Rājagṛha." And so they made preparations to travel to Rājagṛha.

Then the Blessed One accepted the rains retreat, and when all three months of the rains had passed, the Blessed One addressed the Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'Venerable ones, the Tathāgata is setting out to tour the lands of Magadha. Whoever among you wishes to travel with the Tathāgata to tour the lands of Magadha should attend to the business of his robe.' "

The Venerable Ānanda replied, "Yes, Venerable One, as you command," and having heard the Blessed One, he announced to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Tathāgata is setting out to tour the lands of Magadha. Whoever among you wishes to travel with the Tathāgata to tour the lands of Magadha should attend to the business of his robe."

The merchants of Śrāvastī heard the Venerable Ānanda making this announcement to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Tathāgata is setting out to tour the lands of Magadha. Whoever among you wishes to travel with the Tathāgata to tour the lands of Magadha should attend to the business of his robe." Having heard this, they went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, bowed their heads at the feet of the Blessed One, and stood to one side. Standing to one side, the Blessed One fully taught, fully led to the taking up, fully praised, and fully gladdened those many merchants of Śrāvastī with Dharma talk. With many explanations he fully taught, fully led them to take it up, fully praised them, and fully gladdened them with Dharma talk, and then fell silent.

Then the very many merchants of Śrāvastī rose from their seats, arranged their robes over one shoulder, joined their palms toward the Blessed One, bowed, and addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Blessed One, for as long as the Blessed One, together with the community of monks, travels from Śrāvastī to Rājagṛha, may it please you to accept from us food, alms-rounds, lodging, medicine for the sick, and all requisite supplies." The Blessed One said nothing to the very many merchants of Śrāvastī, and by that silence he consented. Then, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that he had consented, the very many merchants of Śrāvastī rejoiced and delighted in the Blessed One's word, bowed their heads at the Blessed One's two feet, and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Then the very many merchants of Śrāvastī went to where the venerable Ānanda was, arrived there, bowed their heads at the feet of the venerable Ānanda, and stood to one side. Standing to one side, the very many merchants of Śrāvastī said to the venerable Ānanda: "Venerable Ānanda, how great an entourage does the Blessed One travel with?" The venerable Ānanda replied: "Good sirs, it is like a wheel-turning king." They asked: "Venerable Ānanda, and how great an entourage does a wheel-turning king travel with?" The venerable Ānanda replied: "Good sirs, a wheel-turning king travels along the roads with a retinue extending ten leagues in every direction." With that measure of ten leagues in every direction, they arranged provisions for the assembly accompanying the Blessed One together with the community of monks. Whatever cold foods there were, they prepared in advance on that very day; whatever hot foods there were, they prepared fresh each day.

Then the Blessed One set out, his retinue tamed, surrounded by a tamed retinue; he who was at peace, surrounded by a retinue that was at peace; he who was liberated, surrounded by a liberated retinue; he who had found relief, surrounded by a retinue that had found relief; he who was subdued, surrounded by a subdued retinue; an arhat, surrounded by arhats; he who was free of attachment, surrounded by those free of attachment; one who was beautiful, surrounded by a beautiful retinue. Like a supreme bull surrounded by a herd of bulls; like an elephant surrounded by a host of young elephants; like a lion surrounded by a host of fanged beasts; like a king of geese surrounded by a flock of geese; like a garuḍa surrounded by a flock of birds; like a brahmin surrounded by a host of students; like a skilled physician surrounded by a host of patients; like a hero surrounded by a host of troops; like a land-surveyor surrounded by a host of those who have entered the path; like a caravan leader surrounded by a host of merchants; like a merchant chief surrounded by his retinue; like a king of a citadel surrounded by a host of ministers; like a wheel-turning king surrounded by a host of a thousand sons; like the moon surrounded by a host of stars; like the sun surrounded by a host of a thousand rays; like Dhṛtarāṣṭra surrounded by a host of gandharvas; like a noble man surrounded by a host of attendants; like the nāga Virūpākṣa surrounded by a host of nāgas; like Vaiśravaṇa surrounded by a host of yakṣas; like Virūḍhaka surrounded by a host of asuras; like Śakra (Indra) surrounded by the host of the Thirty-Three Gods; like Brahmā surrounded by the host of the Brahmā realm —

— with faculties perfectly tamed; with conduct and deportment untroubled; steady as an ocean of water; laden with moisture like a rain-cloud; free from arrogance like the king of elephants; well adorned with the thirty-two marks of a great being; his body beautifully ornamented with the eighty minor marks; his form resplendent with a radiance extending a fathom in all directions; possessed of a brilliance surpassing a thousand suns; auspicious in every direction like a moving mountain of jewels; endowed with the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, the three unmixed applications of mindfulness, and great compassion — together with those great śrāvakas: Jñānaḥḍinya, Aśvajit, Bhadrīka, Vāṣpa, Mahānāman, Yaśas, Pūrṇa, Vimala, Gavāmpati, Subāhu, and the rest — and further, surrounded and attended in front by a very great community of monks, the Blessed One set out to stroll and walk in the direction of Rājagṛha.

The venerable Ānanda had gone on ahead in a direction serving the same purpose. When he saw a fork in the path, he waited there until the Blessed One arrived. After the Blessed One had come, the Blessed One spoke: "Ānanda, why do you wait here?" "Venerable One, this is a forking of paths. The straight path has the danger of lions, while the winding path is safe. By which shall I go?" "Ānanda, take the straight path — the Tathāgata is free from the danger of lions."

Then the Blessed One began proceeding along the straight path, and as he traveled along that road he came to a cliff. From that cliff two young boys came out onto the road and sat there playing. One of them held in his hand a large drum called a ṭaḥa, and the other held a bow. When those two saw the Blessed One, they said: "May the Blessed One come this way. Welcome, Blessed One. Where does the Blessed One go along this fearsome path? But the Blessed One should not be frightened — the two of us will escort the Blessed One."

Then, filled with faith, one of them beat the ṭaḥa drum, and the other, filled with faith, twanged the bow. As the two of them began to walk before the Blessed One, the Blessed One thought to himself: "These two boys are generating roots of virtue." Knowing this, the Blessed One spoke to those two boys: "Boys, go back — the Tathāgata is free from the danger of lions."

Those two prostrated with their heads at the two feet of the Blessed One, and departed from the Blessed One's presence, and the Blessed One smiled.

By the nature of reality, whenever the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, smile, rays of light — blue, yellow, red, white, rose-pink, crystal-clear, and silver-hued — issue from their mouths. Some of those rays descend downward and some ascend upward. Those that descend downward pass into the hells: the Cold Hell, the Black-Line Hell, the Crushing Hell, the Wailing Hell, the Great Wailing Hell, the Hot Hell, the Intensely Hot Hell, the Avīci Hell, the Blistering Hell, the Bursting-Blister Hell, the Chattering-Teeth Hell, the Crying-Out Hell, the Groaning Hell, the Cracked-Like-an-Utpala-Flower Hell, the Cracked-Like-a-Lotus Hell, and the Greatly Cracked-Like-a-Lotus Hell — and upon whatever hot hells there are, those rays cause a cool refreshing rain to fall; and upon whatever cold hells there are, those rays cause a warm and gentle rain to fall. By this, the particular torments of those sentient beings are cut off without interruption, and those beings think to themselves: "O wise ones, have we died and passed on from here, or have we been reborn elsewhere?" In order to arouse faith in them, the Blessed One sends forth an emanation. When they behold the emanation, they think: "O wise ones, we have neither died and passed on from here, nor have we been reborn elsewhere. It is thus: by the power of this being we had never seen before, our particular torments have been cut off." Having developed sincere faith in their minds toward the emanation, they exhaust the karma that had consigned them to experience the hells, and then take rebirth among those gods and humans who are vessels for the truths, in whatever place that may be.

Those rays that travel upward enter among the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, the Heaven Free from Strife, the Joyful Heaven, the Heaven of Enjoying Emanations, the Heaven of Wielding Power over Others' Emanations, the Heaven of Brahmā's Retinue, the Heaven of Brahmā's Ministers, the Great Brahmā Heaven, the Heaven of Minor Light, the Heaven of Boundless Light, the Heaven of Radiant Light, the Heaven of Minor Virtue, the Heaven of Boundless Virtue, the Heaven of Abundant Virtue, the Cloudless Heaven, the Heaven of Merit-Born, the Heaven of Great Fruit, the Heaven of No Perception, the Heaven of Neither Torment nor Ease, the Heaven of Auspicious Appearance, the Heaven of Clear Vision, and the Heaven of Akaniṣṭha — and there they proclaim the words: impermanence, suffering, emptiness, selflessness. And they also recite these two verses:

Strive and bring forth,
enter upon the Buddha's teaching.
Like a great elephant at a house of mud, crush the armies of the Lord of Death.
Whoever dwells with utmost heedfulness and practices in this taming Dharma shall utterly abandon the round of birth and make an end of suffering at last.

Then those rays, having pervaded the great trichiliocosm, follow along behind the Blessed One, trailing after him. If the Blessed One intends to prophesy past karma, the rays dissolve at his back. If he intends to prophesy future karma, they dissolve at his front. If he intends to prophesy rebirth in the hells, they dissolve at the soles of his feet. If he intends to prophesy rebirth as an animal, they dissolve at his heels. If he intends to prophesy rebirth as a hungry ghost, they dissolve at his great toes. If he intends to prophesy rebirth as a human, they dissolve at his knees. If he intends to prophesy sovereignty as a wheel-turning monarch of great power, they dissolve at his left palm. If he intends to prophesy sovereignty as a wheel-turning monarch, they dissolve at his right palm. If he intends to prophesy rebirth as a god, they dissolve at his navel. If he intends to prophesy the awakening of a śrāvaka, they dissolve at his mouth. If he intends to prophesy the awakening of a pratyekabuddha, they dissolve at his hair-tuft between the brows. And if he intends to prophesy unsurpassed, perfect, and complete awakening, they dissolve at his crown protrusion.

Then those rays circled the Blessed One three times and dissolved into his crown protrusion.

Thereupon the venerable Ānanda joined his palms together and asked the Blessed One:

Blazing with a thousand varied hues, these rays have issued from the Blessed One's face and lit up all directions on every side, like a sunshade spreading wide its canopy.

And he spoke further in verse:

Free from agitation, free from timidity, and entirely rid of pride, the Buddha has become the supreme cause for wandering beings.
The Victor who has subdued his foes, beyond all cause for conflict — whose hands are white as a conch shell's whorls, who smiles not without cause — for that reason the Teacher, knowing the right moment by his own wisdom, the Sage (muni), the bull of the herd, lord among ascetics and lords of birth, we pray that he dispel with words that are firm, and with the holy and virtuous, the doubts that have arisen in those assembled beings who listen with attentiveness. Like a king of mountains standing firm in the salt sea, the buddha protectors do not smile on a sudden impulse. We who are gathered as an assembly of beings wish to hear the reason why those who are firm now display a smile.

The venerable one — the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and completely awakened buddhas do not smile without cause and without condition.
Venerable one, what then is the cause of this smile? What is the condition?

The Blessed One declared: Ānanda, it is exactly so. It is exactly so. Ānanda, the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and completely awakened buddhas do not smile without cause and without condition.

Ānanda, did you see those two boys, those two young children, who were pelting the Tathāgata with sand?

Venerable one, I did see them.

Ānanda, by virtue of this root of virtue and this wholesome conduct, those two boys will not fall into evil states for thirteen aeons. The two of them will take rebirth among gods and humans, passing through cyclic existence, and when they reach their final existence, their final dwelling, their final form, their final body, it is through that very karma, that very root of virtue, and that very wholesome conduct that they will go forth and directly realize solitary awakening. One will become a pratyekabuddha named Drum Sound, and the other will become a pratyekabuddha named Fearless Giver.

Then the Blessed One consented to pass the night at a certain secluded forest hermitage outside any town. The Blessed One gave the instruction that a hollow tree should be surrounded by elderly monks in succession. The group of six, having obtained the hollow tree, feeling cold, set fire inside the hollow tree, and a snake that was rapidly spreading its venom within the hollow tree was stirred up by the smoke, climbed up to the branches above, and hung there.

The group of six, seeing it hanging there, said among themselves, "It has appeared! It has appeared!" The attendants (doṇṁthun), hearing this, thought, "A lion has appeared!" and, terrified, fled in all four directions.

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: Ānanda, why have the attendants fled in all four directions?

Venerable one, the Blessed One gave the instruction that a hollow tree be surrounded by elderly monks in succession. The group of six, having obtained the hollow tree, feeling cold, set fire inside the hollow tree, and a snake that was rapidly spreading its venom within the hollow tree was stirred up by the smoke, climbed up to the branches above, and hung there. The group of six saw it hanging there and said, "It has appeared! It has appeared!" The attendants, hearing this, thought, "Has a lion appeared?" and, terrified, fled in all four directions.

The Blessed One declared: Ānanda, go and tell the attendants that the Tathāgata is free from the fear of lions, and bid them return.

The venerable Ānanda replied, "As the Blessed One commands," and having heard this from the Blessed One, went to where the attendants were and said, "Friends, the Tathāgata is free from the fear of lions — return!" And they returned.

The monks then addressed the Blessed One: Venerable one, the group of six caused the attendants to flee in terror — — and the Blessed One saw them as they fled in all four directions and breathed a sigh. Monks, not only now, but in times past as well, these same ones caused a great herd of wild animals to flee in terror in all four directions, and I breathed a sigh then too. Listen to this.

Monks, long ago in times past, beside a certain pond there was a grove of bilva trees, and in that grove of bilva trees there lived six hares. From that grove a bilva fruit fell into the pond and made a loud splash. The six hares heard the sound and, being small creatures, were terrified and began to flee.

As they fled, some foxes saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The hares replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the foxes too began to flee.

As they fled, some deer saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The foxes replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the deer too began to flee.

As they fled, some boars saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The deer replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the boars too began to flee.

As they fled, some buffalo saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The boars replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the buffalo too began to flee.

As they fled, some rhinoceroses saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The buffalo replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the rhinoceroses too began to flee.

As they fled, some elephants saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The rhinoceroses replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the elephants too began to flee.

As they fled, some bears saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The elephants replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the bears too began to flee.

As they fled, some hyenas saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The bears replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the hyenas too began to flee.

As they fled, some wolves saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The hyenas replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the wolves too began to flee.

As they fled, some tigers saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The wolves replied, "There was a great crash!" And so the tigers too began to flee.

As they fled, some lions saw them and asked, "Friends, why do you run?" The tigers replied, "There was a great crash!" And so those lions too began to flee.

Now, not far from the foot of a mountain, there sat a lion with a mane like a crown. He saw those lions fleeing and said to them, "Friends, all of you have the strength of claws and the strength of fangs and nothing else — so why do you flee?" The lions replied, "There was a great crash!" The lion said, "Friends, where did this great crash come from? I myself do not know where such a crash comes from." Then that lion spoke:

"You who are wise, do not flee! Let us investigate where this crashing noise has come from." With these words he questioned the tigers: "Who told you this?" The tigers replied, "The wild yaks did." He questioned the wild yaks: "Who told you this?" The wild yaks replied, "The bears did." He questioned the bears: "Who told you this?" The bears replied, "The elephants did." He questioned the elephants: "Who told you this?" The elephants replied, "The rhinoceroses did." He questioned the rhinoceroses: "Who told you this?" The rhinoceroses replied, "The buffalo did." He questioned the buffalo: "Who told you this?" The buffalo replied, "The boars did." He questioned the boars: "Who told you this?" The boars replied, "The deer did." He questioned the deer: "Who told you this?" The deer replied, "The foxes did." He questioned the foxes: "Who told you this?" The foxes replied, "The hares did." He questioned the hares: "Who told you this?" The hares replied, "Come, and we shall show you directly the very fear we saw; and we shall point out where that crashing noise came from." And so they led that lion to the grove of bel trees and said, "The crash came from here." Now, at that very moment, another bel fruit dropped into the pool, and the sound "crash!" arose. Then that lion said, "You who are wise, this is merely a crashing sound — do not be afraid!" And at that, all of them breathed a sigh of relief.

Then the god spoke these verses:

Do not go by what is widely reported;
see for yourself with your own direct perception.
A bel fruit falling in the forest grove —

Monks, the lion with a mane like a crown who at that time and on that occasion relieved from terror the great assembly of animals that had fled in the four directions — that was none other than myself. And the six hares who at that time and on that occasion caused the great assembly of animals to be seized with terror — those were the Group of Six. Monks, thus even in times past these same ones caused the great assembly of animals to be seized with terror and flee in the four directions, and I relieved them; and now too these same ones have, in concert, caused terror and flight in the four directions, and I have relieved them.

This, then, is something that has occurred. For the time being, the Blessed One, the Buddha, will not for the time being set down a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya. Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go to the Group of Six and tell them this: 'None of you are to go before the Group of Six. The Tathāgata himself will come before the Group of Six.'" The venerable Ānanda replied, "As the Blessed One commands," and having listened to the Blessed One he went to the meeting place of the Group of Six and said, "You who are wise, the Tathāgata has declared: 'None of you are to go before the Group of Six. The Tathāgata himself will come before the Group of Six.'" Such was his announcement.

Then the Tathāgata himself went before the Group of Six. And when he arrived, a certain lion with a mane like a crown came roaring and flung itself down before the Blessed One, the Blessed One emanated five lions with manes like crowns in the palm of his right hand. Smelling their scent, the lion became frightened and began to flee, whereupon the Blessed One emanated fire in all four directions. That lion saw fire blazing, fiercely blazing, blazing all around in every direction, the flames merging into one continuous conflagration, and saw that only at the very feet of the Blessed One was there peace. The lion then touched its head to the two feet of the Blessed One. The Blessed One's hands bore the wheel, the auspicious symbol, the swastika, and the webbing between the fingers — born of many hundreds of merits, bestowing relief from all fears. With these hands he stroked the lion's head and spoke: "Fair-faced one, because you acted with past misdeeds you were born in the realm of animals. You are now engaged in fierce cruelty, in striking and slaying with blood-red paws; you take the lives of others, you lead others to take life, you live by killing the lives of others. When you die and pass on from here, what will your destiny be? What will your birth be? What will your next life be? Fair-faced one, know this: all formations are impermanent, all phenomena are without self, nirvāṇa is peace." Having thus taught the Dharma in these three sayings, he declared, "Fair-faced one, place your mind in manifest faith in me, and through that you will be freed from attachment to the animal realm of birth."

When monks touched that lion, it let out a roar. Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, do not touch the lion. Why is that? Because, monks, a lion is difficult to endure and difficult to approach. Therefore, monks, a monk must not touch a lion. If a monk touches a lion, it will become a serious offense."

Then the king of beasts, that lion, thought to himself: "Since I have heard the Dharma in these three sayings before the Blessed One, it is not fitting for me to go on eating food." And so he entered upon a fast. Because the metabolism of those born in the animal realm is acute, when he had grown feeble from hunger he placed his mind in manifest faith in the Blessed One, and when his time came he passed away and was born among the gods of the Four Great Kings. It is the natural condition of a son of the gods or a daughter of the gods that, not long after birth, three thoughts arise: from where did I pass away, where have I been born, and by what karma was I born? He saw that he had passed away from among the animals, that he had been born among the gods of the Four Great Kings, and that he had been born by having placed his mind in manifest faith in the Blessed One.

Then that formerly-a-lion son of the gods thought to himself: "Since I abide in my dwelling place and approach the Blessed One in order to see him and pay homage to him, this is not in keeping with my manner of conduct. Rather, without relying on my dwelling place, I will approach the Blessed One simply to see him and pay homage to him."

Then the formerly-a-lion son of the gods, his ear-ornaments and earrings swaying, wearing pure and stainless garlands and necklaces, his body adorned with garlands and bracelets, filled a basket with divine blue lotuses, pink lotuses, white water-lilies, and white lotuses — streaming down through the night with their colors brilliantly surpassing all — and went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, he scattered the flowers as an offering before the Blessed One, bowed his head to the two feet of the Blessed One in homage, and sat to one side. And so it was that through the radiance of the formerly-a-lion son of the gods, all the places of the uninhabited wilderness monastery were suffused with a great and spreading light.

Then the Blessed One, having understood the disposition, the latent tendencies, the temperament, and the intrinsic nature of the formerly-a-lion son of the gods, taught the Dharma in such a way as to lead one to a thorough individual discernment of the noble Four Truths — the very Dharma by hearing which the formerly-a-lion son of the gods, while still seated on that same seat, shattered with the vajra of gnosis the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection, and directly realized the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, he solemnly proclaimed three times: "What the venerable Blessed One has done for me — this, my father has not done, my mother has not done, the king has not done, the gods have not done, my forebears of former times have not done, ascetics (śramaṇas) and brahmins have not done, and the assembly of friends, companions, and kinsmen has not done. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears, you have liberated me from mountains of bones, you have closed the doors to the lower realms, you have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation, you have lifted my feet from the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and you have placed me among gods and humans."

Then he spoke further in verse:

By your supremely mighty power,
I — though laden with many faults — have had the trail of lower realms blocked off, been richly endowed with merit, had the path to the higher realms opened before me, and attained as well the trail to nirvāṇa.

Relying on you, utterly pure one,
today I have obtained an eye free of defects and clean, attained the noble sublime station of peace and joy, and shall cross to the far shore of the ocean of suffering.

Among beings worshipped by gods, demigods, and humans, free of birth, old age, and death,
the one who sees existence as empty — supremely rare:
the Sage. Today there is the fruit of having seen you.

Then, with a garland hanging loosely down in grief, he bowed at the feet of the Blessed One, and joy arose within him.
Having circumambulated to the right, honoring the Foe-Destroyer, he departed through the sky in the direction of the divine world.

Then the formerly-a-lion son of the gods became like a merchant who has found great profit, like a farmer who has obtained an abundant harvest, like a hero who has been completely victorious in battle, like a sick person who has been wholly freed from all illness — and in the very same attire in which he had come into the presence of the Blessed One, he departed for his own abode.

Now those monks who were devoted to striving and remained without sleeping in the first watch and the last watch of the night saw, in the presence of the Blessed One, a vast and spreading radiance fill the space around them. Seeing it, with minds full of doubt, they waited until dawn had broken and then asked the Blessed One: "Blessed One, what was this? Was it Brahmā, lord of the world of the imperceptible realm? Or was it Śakra (Indra), king of the gods? Or the four world-guardian kings? Or some other son of the gods of great wealth and great power who came to behold the Blessed One?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, the lord of the imperceptible realm, Brahmā, did not come to behold me. Nor was it Śakra, king of the gods. Nor the four world-guardian kings. Nor any other son of the gods of great wealth and great power. Monks, do you see that lion, the king of beasts, to whom I taught the Dharma in three statements? Yes, Blessed One, we see him. Monks, he died and passed on from there, was reborn among the gods of the Four Great Kings, and last night he came to me. I taught him the Dharma, he saw the truth, and then he departed for his own abode."

The monks, having arisen with doubt, asked the Buddha, the Blessed One, to cut through every one of their doubts: "Venerable One, what karma did the formerly-a-lion son of the gods perform by virtue of whose maturation he was born among lions? And what karma did he perform by virtue of whose maturation he was born among the gods of the Four Great Kings?"

And what karma did he perform by virtue of whose maturation he saw the truth and then departed for his own abode?

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, formerly the very one who was the son of the gods named Lion had performed and accumulated deeds that constitute a collection of karma, that transform conditions, that abide close like light, that will without fail come to arise. Whatever karma the former son of the gods named Lion performed and accumulated — by whom else could it be experienced? Monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, whatever virtuous and non-virtuous karma has been performed and accumulated ripens solely in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense sources.

Actions do not perish even in a hundred aeons;
when the assembly and the time are met,
for those who possess a body,
they will assuredly come forth as their fruit.

Monks, in a former time now passed, in this very good great aeon, when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, there appeared in the world a Teacher — a Tathāgata, an arhat, a fully and perfectly awakened buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, an unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans — a Blessed One, a buddha by the name of Kāśyapa. He was accompanied by twenty thousand monks and dwelled in dependence upon the deer park of Ṛṣivadana near the city of Vārāṇasī.

At the time before the fully and perfectly awakened Buddha Kāśyapa had appeared in the world, there was in Vārāṇasī a brahmin with a very great retinue — one who had reached the far shore of the Vedas and their ancillary branches, and who had become teacher to brahmins dwelling in various lands. He was greatly honored, revered, respected, and venerated by the entire world.

But when the fully and perfectly awakened Buddha Kāśyapa had appeared in the world, no one thereafter showed him any honor, revered him, respected him, or venerated him. When the fully and perfectly awakened Buddha Kāśyapa was seated before a retinue of many hundreds, teaching the Dharma, that brahmin with his very great retinue passed by that way, and the brahmin saw the fully and perfectly awakened Buddha Kāśyapa seated before a retinue of many hundreds, teaching the Dharma. Having seen him, he said: 'This ascetic teaches the Dharma to his retinue as fearlessly and as unabashedly as a lion, while these hearers listen to the Dharma like little timid deer.'

The fully and perfectly awakened Buddha Kāśyapa heard this. Having heard it, he declared to that brahmin: 'Brahmin, you have uttered coarse verbal karma. Come and confess the transgression through the door of confession, for if you do, that karma of yours will become attenuated, utterly exhausted, and brought to its final end.' The brahmin confessed the transgression through the door of confession, went for refuge in the presence of the fully and perfectly awakened Buddha Kāśyapa, and took up the bases of training.

Monks, at that time, in that era, whoever it was who spoke of the fully and perfectly awakened Buddha Kāśyapa as a lion — and whoever engaged in all that conduct — that very one was this same son of the gods, the former Lion.

By the karmic maturation of that conduct — having referred to the fully and perfectly awakened Buddha Kāśyapa as a lion — he was born among lions for five hundred lifetimes, and even up to the present he has continued to be born among lions. By the karmic maturation of that action through which he aroused faith and devotion toward me, he passed away when his time came and was born among the gods of the Four Great Kings. And by the karmic maturation of the action of going for refuge in the presence of the fully and perfectly awakened Buddha Kāśyapa and taking up the bases of training, he saw the Truths in my presence, and having seen the Truths, he went to his own abode.

Monks, thus it is: the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly dark is wholly dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly bright is wholly bright; and the karmic maturation of actions that are mixed is mixed. Therefore, monks, abandon actions that are wholly dark and actions that are mixed, and strive after actions that are wholly bright. Monks, you should train in this way.

Then, as the Blessed One was wandering on tour through Magadha, he arrived at Rājagṛha and dwelt there in the Kālandaka Bamboo Grove in the Jeta Grove of the Cool Forest. At that time, the Group of Six monks were amusing themselves by throwing fire at one another, making moon shapes, making sun shapes, and making wheel-of-sickle-fire shapes. Certain wise non-Buddhists who saw this said: "These ascetics, sons of the Śākyan, amuse themselves by throwing fire at one another, making moon shapes, making sun shapes, and making wheel-of-sickle-fire shapes — just like these small boys who amuse themselves by throwing fire at one another, making moon shapes, making sun shapes, and making wheel-of-sickle-fire shapes. Wise ones, what difference is there between these small boys and these ascetics, sons of the Śākyan? What intention is there? What distinction is to be made? Who would think to give alms or render service to these shaven-headed ascetics?" And they reviled them, spoke disparagingly of them, and gossiped about them. At that juncture, the monks reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this ground, and this occasion, convened the community of monks — and so forth, as before. The awakened Blessed Ones, though they know, feign not to know — and so forth, as before. The awakened Blessed One asked the Group of Six: "Monks, is it true that you were amusing yourselves by throwing fire at one another, making moon shapes, making sun shapes, and making wheel-of-sickle-fire shapes?" "Venerable One, it is so." The awakened Blessed One censured them, saying that this was not the way of an ascetic, was not in conformity with the rule, was not fitting, was not in accord with proper conduct, and was not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

Then the Blessed One censured them in many ways, and spoke to the monks as follows: "Monks, therefore, having seen the ten benefits, I shall lay down a training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya thus: 'Furthermore, whatever monk touches fire or causes another to touch it incurs a transgression.'" Thus did the awakened Blessed One lay down that training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya.

"Monks, henceforth they are not to offer incense at stūpas enshrining the hair and nails of the Tathāgata, nor to light lamps there. They are not to offer warm water to their preceptors and masters. They are not to perform bowl-making work. They are not to perform dyeing work."

The awakened Blessed Ones act knowingly, and so the awakened Blessed One asked the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, why is it that the monks henceforth are not to offer incense at stūpas enshrining the hair and nails of the Tathāgata, nor to light lamps there? Why are they not to offer warm water to their preceptors and masters? Why are they not to perform bowl-making work? Why are they not to perform dyeing work? Reverend Blessed One, you have laid down a training rule in the Vinaya to the effect that whatever monk touches fire or causes another to touch it incurs a transgression — and so, from now on, those monks will no longer offer incense at stūpas enshrining the hair and nails of the Tathāgata, nor light lamps there. They will not offer warm water to their preceptors and masters. They will not perform bowl-making work. They will not perform dyeing work."

"Ānanda, therefore, the time must be blessed. Let the time be blessed." The Blessed One spoke the words "Let the time be blessed," but as they did not know how to bless the time, the Blessed One declared: "One should bless the time by means of acts that accord with the Dharma in relation to the Teacher, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, one's preceptors, one's masters, and those who share in the holy life."

Now, when monks were performing bowl-making work and dyeing work, they would repeatedly forget and touch fire, and when remorse arose in them on account of this, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Bless the time for a long duration."

A certain monk came to suffer from a disease of wind and bile. He went to a physician and asked: "Good sir, prescribe medicine for me. Noble one, please provide a remedy. Good sir, the Blessed One has laid down a training rule.

Noble one, your Teacher is compassionate — in just this way, if he were to make that very condition the occasion and then permit it, such a circumstance would come about." At this, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Except in the case of illness."

Then the Blessed One uttered praise of wanting to train, of reverence for training, and of immersion in the requisites of training, and addressed the monks with words fully in accord with that, more extensive than that, and endowed with a teaching appropriate to that. He then declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, what was stated before is the rule, and this that follows is the permission. My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya thus: 'Furthermore, whatever monk who is not ill touches fire for his own sake, or causes another to touch it, incurs a transgression.'"

"Whatever monk" refers to one of the six classes or any other of that sort. "Who is not ill" sets aside the case of illness. "For his own sake" means for his own benefit. "Touches fire" means by his own hand. "Causes another to touch it" means through another person. "Incurs a transgression" means it causes burning, scorching, and falling in the hells, among animals, among hungry ghosts, in states of woe, and in states of utter downfall.

Furthermore, it is said that for as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome phenomena of virtue. For that reason, it is called a downfall. As to how a downfall arises in this context: if a monk uses fire to play a game of spinning a wheel of fire with another person, it becomes a downfall. If he makes a moon shape with fire, it becomes a downfall. If he makes a sun shape with fire, it becomes a downfall. If he makes a sickle or a wheel of fire, it becomes a downfall. If a monk wishes to light a fire, he should do so after first performing the consecration at the proper time. If he lights a fire without having performed the consecration at the proper time, it becomes a downfall. If a monk wishes to extinguish a fire, he should do so after first performing the consecration at the proper time. If he extinguishes a fire without having performed the consecration at the proper time, it becomes a downfall. If a monk wishes to stir up or draw out firewood, he should do so after first performing the consecration at the proper time. If he stirs up or draws out firewood without having performed the consecration at the proper time, it becomes a downfall. If a monk wishes to stoke or draw out kindling, he should do so after first performing the consecration at the proper time. If he stokes or draws out kindling without having performed the consecration at the proper time, it becomes a downfall. If a monk wishes to stoke or draw out fire-embers, he should do so after first performing the consecration at the proper time. If he stokes or draws out fire-embers without having performed the consecration at the proper time, it becomes a misdeed. If a monk throws hair, fur, bones, or nails into a fire, it becomes a misdeed. If a monk throws saliva, mucus, vomit, or phlegm into a fire, it becomes a misdeed. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one who is in danger due to feeling.

This concludes the fifty-second downfall pertaining to touching fire.

The Vinaya Analysis, the fifty-seventh fascicle.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Chāraka, having abandoned all afflictions, directly realized arhatship. The venerable Udāyin had gone to Kauśāmbī and was sitting at leisure. The seasons of swift travel and of the rains retreat had arrived. Nanda and Upananda were residing within the Saṅgha. At that time the seventeen groups, being wicked and domineering, were masters of sūtra, masters of Vinaya, and masters of the Māṭrkā as well, and so they said: "Venerable ones, we have long been slandered by the six groups. Just as Nanda and Upananda have been slandered, so too others have not been slandered in that same manner. And just as Upananda has been slandered, Nanda has not been slandered in the same way. So let them come here. Let us perform the act of removal from residence." Then one among them said: "Brothers, his brother Nanda is skilled in debate, and so we are unable to perform the act of removing Upananda from residence. Let us provoke an altercation." Saying this, they went to where Nanda was and said: "Homage to the elder. Venerable ones, take notice — the elder's robes have become soiled. My friend, since you have grown old, the monks who dwell with you and the attendants too despise you for your old age, and from now on they refuse to perform the work of the robes. We shall wash the elder's robes; please hand them over." Nanda gave his robes to the seventeen groups. They in turn said:

"Elder, let us wash all the robes at once. Please hand over every one of your robes." Nanda, in his fondness for old worn things, put on his old rags and handed all his robes over to the seventeen groups. The seventeen groups took those robes and set about altering them, then prepared a meeting place, struck the gong, and went before Nanda, saying: "Elder, there is some business of the Saṅgha. The gong has been struck; please come." Nanda replied: "My boys, given my circumstances, how can I go before the Saṅgha? I offer my assent to whatever lawful business the Saṅgha has to conduct."

Then, when the whole Saṅgha had assembled and was sitting in harmony, the monk who was stirring up trouble sat down off to one side, near the elder, and goaded Nanda, saying: "Venerable Nanda, do you recall saying something like this — that you would disembowel the seventeen groups and festoon the Jeta Grove with their entrails?" The elders replied: "What use is there in cutting open those whose wounds have healed? That is a matter of the past." But those monks pressed Nanda into a quandary, saying: "The Blessed One established rules of training for hearers in the Vinaya only with reference to past events," and so doing they carried out the act of suspending him from residence.

Once the act of suspending Nanda from residence had been carried out, he went to his elder brother Nanda and began to weep. Nanda said: "Nanda, why do you weep?" Nanda replied: "Those who carry black begging bowls have carried out the act of suspending me from residence." Nanda said: "May those who have carried out the act of suspending my younger brother from residence be expelled from village, city, province, and all three realms. Nevertheless, I shall go and beg forgiveness from those who have carried out the act of suspension, even if there is no village or city for them to go to. Let them stay, and I shall ask their pardon." In this way they had performed the act solely in a spirit of contention.

As for whoever had not been present there — "It was I." The elder Nanda offered his assent. "Did I know that they were carrying out the act of suspending my younger brother from residence? I would not offer my assent to a Saṅgha act of that kind. I have not offered my assent. My assent was given wrongly."

Why is it that monks of small account, after offering assent on behalf of a monk to a lawful act of the Saṅgha, then afterward become angry, turbulent, and aggressive, are displeased, and make it a practice of renunciation, saying: "Monk, take back your assent — it will not be given to you" — insulting him, dismissing him, and speaking against him? The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this occasion, and this context, convened the assembly of monks, and so on, all as before. "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, knowing, inquire for a purpose," and so on, also as before.

The awakened Blessed One asked Nanda: "Nanda, is it true that, after you offered assent on behalf of a monk to a lawful act of the Saṅgha, you then afterward became angry, turbulent, and aggressive, were displeased, made it a practice of renunciation, and said, 'Monk, take back your assent — it will not be given to you?'" "Venerable Sir, it is true." The awakened Blessed One rebuked him, saying that such conduct was unworthy of a renunciant, was discordant, was improper, was contrary to discipline, and was not something to be done by one who has gone forth. Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One — addressed the monks, saying: "Monks, seeing ten benefits, I establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Should any monk, having offered assent on behalf of a monk to a lawful act of the Saṅgha, afterward become angry, turbulent, and aggressive, be displeased, make it a practice of renunciation, and say, 'Monk, take back your assent — it will not be given to you,' he commits a transgression."

Now, "any monk" means Nanda, son of the Śākya, or another of similar kind. "Of the Saṅgha" means of the Saṅgha of hearers of the Tathāgata. "To a lawful act" means to a lawful ecclesiastical act. "On behalf of a monk" means on behalf of one who holds this Dharma. "Having offered assent" means having given his assent. "Afterward" means at another time. "Angry, turbulent, and aggressive, and displeased" means angry, overwhelmed by the force of anger. "Makes it a practice of renunciation" means makes it a practice of withdrawal. "Says" means utters the following words. "Monk, take back your assent — it will not be given to you" — "says" means speaks those words.

"He commits a transgression" means he burns, scorches, and falls into the hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the states of misfortune. Moreover, for as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome factors of Dharma — and therefore it is said that he commits a transgression.

As for how a transgression arises in this case: whatever and however much a monk, having offered assent on behalf of a monk to a lawful act of the Saṅgha, afterward becomes angry, turbulent, and aggressive, is displeased, makes it a practice of renunciation, and says, "Monk, take back your assent — it will not be given to you" — in every such instance he commits a transgression. There is no transgression for one who is a novice in the training, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by painful sensations.

The fifty-third offense, of withdrawing assent, is complete.

Summary verse:

Listening to Dharma, and with a sign, sickness, a monk of evil conduct,
two done in agreement, bowing before, and the novice.

The awakened Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. Faithful brahmins and householders came to the monastery and said to the monks: "Noble ones, please teach the Dharma." The monks replied: "Good people, come before the Blessed One today, and the Blessed One will teach you the Dharma." They said: "Noble ones, the Teacher is solitary and at present teaches the Dharma to the gods, or to nāgas, or to yakṣas, or to humans — please enquire. And do you yourselves also teach the Dharma." "Good people, the Blessed One has not given permission for that," the monks said. They then made the request to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I give permission for monks also to teach the Dharma." Having declared that monks too should teach the Dharma, from that time onward they taught the Dharma during the day.

Now, those who lived by the fruit of merit, having listened to the Dharma by day, would tell those who lived by the fruit of toil at night: "Noble ones, the āryas teach lovely and lovely teachings of the Dharma, presenting the Dharma like the nectar of bees — like bees making honey, they offer and dispense what is like the nectar of the Dharma." Those who lived by the fruit of toil replied: "For those among you who hear the Dharma, the arising of a buddha is fruitful. But then why do you yourselves not listen to the Dharma?" "We who live by the fruit of merit listen to the Dharma by day. But we who live by the fruit of toil — if we do not do our work by day, we will go hungry and die. If the noble ones were to teach the Dharma at night, then we too would listen." At that point the monks made the request to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Teach the Dharma at night." They taught the Dharma every night, and they grew weary. The Blessed One then declared: "Do not teach the Dharma every single night." They taught until midnight, and yet they grew weary again. The Blessed One declared: "Teach the Dharma on the eighth day and the fourteenth day of the month."

When they were teaching the Dharma on the eighth and the fourteenth, an alms-seeker came to the temple to hear the Dharma, and the monks taught until midnight. That person thought: "It is not yet time to leave — I shall stay right here." He went to a corner, sat down cross-legged, and remained there. The laypeople who had come likewise lay down right there, and the duty monk began to extinguish the lamps. They called out: "Noble one, please do not put out the lamps, and we will provide sesame oil." The duty monk kept the lamps burning and went off. The laypeople remained there, and they said: "A great elder among the noble ones taught lovely and lovely teachings of the Dharma. A great elder among the noble ones taught most lovely and lovely teachings of the Dharma."

At that moment an elderly monk who was forgetful and had been sleeping dreamed in his sleep that he was lying together with a former old acquaintance, and he began to mutter something or other. The laypeople said: "Wise ones, who is this layman muttering like that?" They moved over toward him. When they saw that the elderly monk had been sleeping in the back and was muttering something or other, they said: "Wise ones, even the condition of the old ones is like this — as for these young ones who have gone forth, what will their condition be like?" And they gave rise to lack of faith.

The alms-seeker arose early in the morning and went to the forest dwelling. The ascetic monks saw him and asked: "Venerable one, did those who practice the holy life teach lovely and lovely teachings of the Dharma and inspire faith in the great assembly of people?" He replied: "The ones who practice the holy life taught lovely and lovely teachings of the Dharma and inspired faith in the great assembly of people — indeed, the many. But one elderly monk caused the great assembly of people to lose faith." "How did that come about?" He then related the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it in full to the Blessed One. The Blessed One reflected: "Whatever fault has arisen here is the fault of monks sleeping together with those who have not received full ordination."

Thinking that the fault had arisen from sleeping in the light, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, a monk must not sleep together with one who has not received full ordination, and must not sleep in the light either. Whoever does so incurs an offense requiring expiation."

Now this is what had first come about. For the time being, the buddha, the Blessed One, did not yet establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers. The venerable Śāriputra had two novices named Grasp-Sound and Spur-On. When a monk arrived unexpectedly, the venerable Grasp-Sound, who had gone out during the day, had his cell assigned to the newly arrived monk. That monk then took out Grasp-Sound's bowl and robes and set them to one side. When the venerable Grasp-Sound returned from his daytime activities, he saw that his own bowl and robes had been taken out and set to one side, and he sat absorbed in thought. Presently the novice Spur-On arrived and said: "Venerable Grasp-Sound, why do you sit so absorbed in thought?" Grasp-Sound replied: "The cell I went out to during the day has been assigned to a monk who arrived unexpectedly, and he has taken out my bowl and robes and set them to one side. Now that a five-colored cloud has gathered, I do not know where my bed is to be laid." Spur-On said: "Venerable Grasp-Sound, why sit absorbed in thought? Just spread your bed wherever it suits you." Grasp-Sound replied: "Venerable Spur-On, you are possessed of great miraculous powers and great strength — you can conjure a mat not made of leaves and arrange a bed. What am I to do?"

At that time some faithful brahmins and householders had applied fragrant ointment to the outer walkway of the Blessed One. The venerable Grasp-Sound thought: "It is impossible and out of the question that the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, would relieve themselves at an improper time, so that place will be free. Let me go and sleep there." And so he went, rested his head on the footrest of the outer walkway, and lay down. That night a five-colored cloud gathered and began to pour down rain. Not far from that outer walkway there was the nest of a serpent — chief among those whose venom spreads swiftly — and when the rainwater flowed in, that serpent, the swift-spreading chief, lunged toward the outer walkway where the Blessed One had been.

Since it is the very nature of the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, never to be forgetful, the Blessed One reflected: "If that serpent chief, whose venom spreads swiftly, were to find Grasp-Sound, it would leave nothing but his name behind. The Śākyas are proud people: if young Grasp-Sound of good character had not gone forth, he would have become a genuine king. Now that he has gone forth, the unprotected act at this untimely hour will cause faithless people to hear of it and scorn the teaching." Comprehending this, the Blessed One stretched out his hand — like an elephant's trunk — took Grasp-Sound up, and laid him down to sleep in his own sleeping quarters.

It is impossible and out of the question for a buddha, the Blessed One, to sleep in the same place as one who has not received full ordination. So the Blessed One spent much of that night in walking back and forth and in sitting in the open air.

In the morning, when it was yet early, the elder monks arose and came to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One,

It is the nature of all buddhas, the Blessed Ones, that when they wish to establish a rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya, they welcome the monks who arrive in the future but do not turn away the monks who are already present. Now, the elder Prompting-One went to bow at the feet of the Blessed One, and as he approached he saw that the venerable Grasp-Sound was lying in the Blessed One's sleeping quarters. Seeing this, he roused the venerable Grasp-Sound by making a snapping sound with his fingers and said, "Venerable Grasp-Sound, where are you sleeping?" Grasp-Sound awoke and, realizing at once that he was lying in the Blessed One's sleeping quarters, rose with all haste and descended from the Blessed One's bed. Then Prompting-One said, "Venerable Grasp-Sound, if the Blessed One had not been mindful of you, a serpent whose venom spreads with terrible speed would have left nothing of you but a name."

Thereupon the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, these novices have no mother, no father, and no other community of friends and companions. You alone are their companions in the holy life, and these novices stand at the very gateway to the state of an arhat. If you do not look after them fully, who else will? Therefore, monks, I allow sleeping in the same place for up to two nights with one who has not received full ordination."

Then a monk fell ill with dysentery, and while relieving himself in the dark he soiled both his legs and lay down with them stretched out. The next morning his fellow monk, who had been residing there with him, and some attendants came and asked him, "Preceptor, are you well?" He replied, "I am not well." "How are you unwell?" He explained the situation in full detail. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "In that case, let a lamp be lit." A lamp was lit, but from remorse the monk would not sleep, and that very situation became an offense. The Blessed One declared, "He should sleep, and need not feel remorse in this matter."

When monks who were nursing the sick felt remorse and would not sleep, they too became ill. The Blessed One declared, "They too should sleep." When those who were caring for them grew lax in their duties, the Blessed One declared, "Those who have not received full ordination may also sleep there." When, after two nights, they were made to leave and this caused harm to the patient, the Blessed One declared, "They may sleep there a third night as well." When the patient felt remorse, the Blessed One declared, "He should sleep and need not feel remorse in this matter." When the nursing monks felt remorse and would not sleep, the Blessed One declared, "They should sleep and need not feel remorse in this matter."

When elder monks fell ill and, though they rose and tried to receive their own food, they were unable to eat, the Blessed One declared, "Their attendants should hold the bowl with them, receive the food, and sit together and eat." Even if those attendants were juniors, they too should do likewise in that fashion. When there were no fully ordained monks present, the Blessed One declared, "Those who have not received full ordination may receive the food." Just as juniors and those without full ordination serve as attendants to the elders, so too the elders should serve as attendants to the juniors and to those without full ordination.

When moonlight or sunlight came in and monks, out of remorse, would not sleep, the Blessed One declared, "These are not considered conventional transgressions; they should sleep and need not feel remorse in this matter."

The Blessed One declared, "One should not sleep together with a person who has not received full ordination in the same place for more than two nights." When monks expelled those who had not received full ordination from the monastery, those persons were then set upon by thieves, by wrongdoers, by lions, by tigers, and by leopards. The Blessed One therefore declared, "They should not be expelled from the monastery." When monks expelled them from the cloister, the Blessed One declared, "They should not be expelled from the cloister; rather, they should be set aside in a nearby area."

There was a monk who had a novice with him, and a wicked monk came to that monastery and said to the novice, "Novice, where do you sleep?" The novice replied, "Right here, at this doorway." The novice's preceptor heard this, and he asked the novice, "What did you say?" The novice replied, "He was asking me where I sleep." The preceptor then had the novice sleep in his own cell, and the preceptor himself passed the night walking and sitting.

The next morning, the monks who were staying together and the attendants came and asked, "Preceptor, are you well?" He replied, "I am not well." They asked, "Why?" and he explained the whole matter in detail. They then said, "Preceptor, the Blessed One has declared that there are two kinds of noble persons: one who does not take up a burden that has not been assumed, and one who brings to completion a burden that has been assumed. Wishing to bring to completion this burden that has been assumed, we will do so." The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"If a wicked monk enters among those who have not pledged to remain and can be expelled for the time being, he should be expelled. If he cannot be expelled, take the novice and go to another monastery. If a wicked monk enters among those who have pledged to remain and can be expelled for the time being, he should be expelled. If he cannot be expelled, place the novice in the care of a friendly monk. If there is no friendly monk, they may pass three months together in the same place. After the invitation ceremony, if the wicked monk can then be expelled, he should be expelled. If he cannot, take the novice and go to another monastery."

When monks were traveling on the road, novices also traveled with them, and when monks expelled those novices after two nights had passed, sending them outside the agreed fellowship, those novices were then set upon by thieves, by wrongdoers, by lions, by tigers, and by leopards. The Blessed One declared, "Rather than expelling them outside, let there be two agreed fellowships." When two agreed fellowships were formed, those in the smaller fellowship were set upon by thieves, by wrongdoers, by lions, by tigers, and by leopards. The Blessed One declared, "If the agreed fellowship is too small to be divided into two, then the monks should keep vigil without sleeping." When the monks kept vigil the entire night without sleeping, they became exhausted. The Blessed One declared, "They need not keep vigil the entire night; they should keep vigil for three watches, or two, or one, or at the very least at the time of the breaking of dawn." Even so they became exhausted, and the Blessed One declared, "They may sleep, and they need not feel remorse about this."

When monks, while traveling on the road, abandoned novices by the roadside and went on, those novices were then set upon by thieves, by wrongdoers, by lions, by tigers, and by leopards. The Blessed One declared, "They should be sent on ahead." Those novices became hungry early in the morning, and the Blessed One declared, "They should be given food on loan." When those novices went begging for food even in the morning hours and the monks said to them, "We already gave you food on loan this morning — are you begging again?" the Blessed One declared, "Since novices have a large constitution of fire, food should be given to them even in the morning hours."

Now the venerable Ānanda had two novices named Thorn and Great One. He was sleeping together with those two in a single dwelling for more than two nights. The monks said to him, "Venerable Ānanda, the Blessed One has declared that a monk may not sleep in the same dwelling together with one who has not received full ordination for more than two nights. You should not sleep in a single dwelling together with one who has not received full ordination for more than two nights." Ānanda replied, "If two nights are permissible, then three nights should be permissible as well. What harm is there in drinking spirits on the third night, or eating from a common pot?" The monks of few desires began to rebuke him, to protest, and to reproach him, saying, "The Blessed One has declared that a monk may not sleep in a single dwelling together with one who has not received full ordination for more than two nights — so why do those monks deliberately transgress beyond two nights?" The monks then reported this to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One convened the community of monks in regard to this incident, in regard to this basis, and in regard to this occasion — and so forth, just as before. The Blessed Ones who are buddhas act knowingly, and so forth — also just as before. The Blessed One, the Buddha, reproved Ānanda, saying, "Ānanda, since I have declared that a monk may not sleep in a single dwelling together with one who has not received full ordination for more than two nights, is it true that you deliberately transgress beyond two nights?" "Revered One, it is so." The Blessed One, the Buddha, then formally censured him: "That which is not the way of a contemplative, which is not in accord with propriety, which is not fitting, and which is not in conformity with proper conduct — that is not something to be done by one who has gone forth." Then, having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits, one should establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, just as before. "My hearers should recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk sleeps in a single dwelling together with one who has not received full ordination for more than two nights commits an offense."

Now, "whatever monk" means a son of the Śākyas — Ānanda or any other of that kind. "Together with one who has not received full ordination" — those who have received full ordination are two: a monk and a nun. Anyone other than those two has not received full ordination. "More than two nights" means having passed beyond two nights. "Sleeping in a single dwelling" — there are four kinds of dwelling, consisting of all fully covered and all fully enclosed; all fully covered and mostly enclosed; mostly covered and all fully enclosed; and mostly covered and mostly enclosed — sleeping in any of these such that one witnesses the breaking of dawn. "All fully covered and all fully enclosed" means a building or dwelling the surrounding cloister, or multi-storied buildings. "All fully covered and mostly enclosed" refers to structures with ten doorways or twelve doorways. "Mostly covered and all fully enclosed" refers to four-sided cloisters. "Mostly covered and mostly enclosed" refers to three-sided cloisters and surrounding colonnades.

"It causes a transgression" means it scorches, burns, and causes one to fall into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies, and into states of utter downfall. Furthermore, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of virtuous qualities — and that is why it is said to cause a transgression.

Now, how does a transgression come about? If a monk, perceiving a person who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, sleeps together with that person in a single dwelling for more than two nights, a transgression is incurred. If a monk, being of two minds about whether a person has received full ordination, sleeps together with that person in a single dwelling for more than two nights, a transgression is incurred. If a monk, perceiving a person who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, sleeps together with that person in a single dwelling for more than two nights, a wrongdoing is incurred. If a monk is of two minds about a person who has received full ordination and sleeps together with that person in a single dwelling for more than two nights, a wrongdoing is incurred. For one who is a first offender, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is overcome by feeling, there is no transgression. This concludes the fifty-fourth rule entailing a transgression: sleeping in a single dwelling together with one who has not received full ordination.

death: "Those things that the Blessed One has taught as obstructive factors — I understand that practising them does not constitute an obstruction." Many monks heard that the monk Ariṭṭha, formerly a vulture-trainer, had given rise, while facing death, to a pernicious view of that kind — namely, that those things the Blessed One has taught as obstructive factors are not obstructive when practised, and that this is how he understood the Dharma as taught by the Blessed One. Upon hearing this, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, you should approach the monk Ariṭṭha — and any others who are like him — and speak to him as follows. You are to say: 'Venerable Ariṭṭha, do not say: "Those things that the Blessed One has taught as obstructive factors — I understand that practising them does not constitute an obstruction." Do not slander the Blessed One. Slandering the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One would not say such a thing. The Blessed One has declared in many ways that the factors which obstruct are indeed obstructive, and that practising them leads to obstruction. Ariṭṭha, abandon this pernicious view of yours.'"

The monks replied, "Venerable one, we will do as you have commanded," and having heard the Blessed One, they approached Ariṭṭha and said: "Venerable Ariṭṭha, do not say: 'Those things that the Blessed One has taught as obstructive factors — I understand that practising them does not constitute an obstruction, and that this is how the Blessed One taught the Dharma.' Do not say this.

Do not slander the Blessed One. To slander the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One has not said any such thing. The Blessed One has declared in many ways that the factors which obstruct are indeed obstructive, and that practising them leads to obstruction. Ariṭṭha, abandon this pernicious view of yours.'"

Even though the many monks admonished and instructed him in this way, he clung tenaciously to that very same view, grasped it firmly, and continued to maintain: "This alone is true; everything else is false." Thereupon the monks reported the matter in full to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you must admonish and instruct the monk Ariṭṭha and anyone else who is like him by means of the formal act with a motion and three proclamations. The admonition is to be carried out as follows: prepare the seat, strike the wooden sounding board, properly assemble the monks with the formal summons, and when the entire Saṅgha is seated in harmony, one monk shall make the motion and perform the act. 'Let the venerable Saṅgha please hear. The monk Ariṭṭha has given rise to a view of this pernicious kind: that those things which the Blessed One has taught as obstructive factors do not constitute an obstruction even when practised — this, he says, is how I understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it. Many monks have admonished and instructed him, yet even when admonished and instructed he has clung tenaciously to that very pernicious view, grasped it firmly, and continued to maintain: "This alone is true; everything else is false." If the time is right for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, then let the Saṅgha grant approval, and let the Saṅgha admonish the monk Ariṭṭha: Ariṭṭha, do not say that those things which the Blessed One has taught as obstructive factors do not constitute an obstruction even when practised — that is how I understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it. Do not say such a thing. Do not slander the Blessed One. To slander the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One has not said any such thing. The Blessed One has declared in many ways that the factors which obstruct are indeed obstructive, and that practising them leads to obstruction. Ariṭṭha, abandon this pernicious view of yours.' This is the motion. The formal act is to be performed as follows: 'Let the venerable Saṅgha please hear. The monk Ariṭṭha has given rise to a view of this pernicious kind: that those things which the Blessed One has taught as obstructive factors do not constitute an obstruction even when practised — this, he says, is how I understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it. Many monks have admonished and instructed him, yet even when admonished and instructed he has clung tenaciously to that very pernicious view, grasped it firmly, and continued to maintain: "This alone is true; everything else is false." Therefore, let the Saṅgha admonish the monk Ariṭṭha: Ariṭṭha, do not say that those things which the Blessed One has taught as obstructive factors do not say that this is how I understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it. Do not misrepresent the Blessed One. To misrepresent the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One would not say such a thing. Those things which the Blessed One has taught in many ways as obstructive factors are indeed obstructive; when one engages in them, obstruction arises. Ariṭṭha, abandon this pernicious view of yours, which is of just such a kind." If, after the Saṅgha has admonished him with a formal act of censure by motion and three proclamations, those venerable monks who consent to the Saṅgha performing this formal act of censure by motion and three proclamations toward the monk Ariṭṭha should remain silent, while those who do not consent should speak.

This is the first recitation of the motion. It is to be repeated in the same way a second and a third time. When the Saṅgha has consented and allowed it, the Saṅgha shall have performed the formal act of censure by motion and three proclamations toward the monk Ariṭṭha. Since no one has spoken, this is accordingly upheld. The monks, having heard the Blessed One, replied: "Venerable sir, we will act as the Blessed One has commanded," and carried out the formal act of censure toward Ariṭṭha by motion and three proclamations. Yet even when censured by motion and three proclamations, he continued to cling tenaciously to that very same view, grasped it firmly, and went on asserting: "This alone is true; everything else is false." At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you shall perform the act of reproach against the monk Ariṭṭha for not abandoning his pernicious view, and similarly toward anyone else of that kind. It is to be done as follows. Having prepared seats, the drum is to be struck, and the monks are to be duly assembled with the words of summons. When the entire Saṅgha is seated and united, one monk shall make a motion and the act shall be performed. Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. In the monk Ariṭṭha there has arisen a pernicious view of just such a kind — that those things which the Blessed One has taught as obstructive factors do not constitute an obstruction even when practised; this, he says, is how he understands the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it. Many monks have admonished and instructed him, yet even when admonished and instructed by many monks he has clung tenaciously to that very pernicious view, grasped it firmly, and continued to assert: 'This alone is true; everything else is false.' The Saṅgha is to censure the monk Ariṭṭha by motion and three proclamations. Even when censured by motion and three proclamations, if he still clings tenaciously to that pernicious view, grasps it firmly, and asserts 'This alone is true; everything else is false,' then, if the time is right for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, let the Saṅgha approve this. The Saṅgha shall perform the act of reproach against the monk Ariṭṭha for not abandoning his pernicious view. For as long as the monk Ariṭṭha does not abandon this pernicious view in every aspect and in every way, the Saṅgha shall not speak with him, shall not converse with him, and shall treat him with contempt and utter contempt, as one treats an outcaste." This is the motion. The act is to be performed as follows. Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. In the monk Ariṭṭha there has arisen a pernicious view of just such a kind — — that those things which the Blessed One has taught as things that obstruct the path, when one relies on them, do not obstruct the path — saying: "I understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One in just this way."

Now, though this monk Ariṭṭha was admonished by a great many monks, he stubbornly clung to and held fast to that very form of the pernicious view, and having attached himself to it, he continued to declare: "This alone is true; all else is false." And though the Saṅgha admonished him by means of a motion and a threefold act, he still stubbornly clung to and held fast to that very form of the pernicious view, and having attached himself to it, continued to declare: "This alone is true; all else is false."

Therefore the Saṅgha shall perform the act of reproach against the monk Ariṭṭha for not abandoning this pernicious view. For as long as the monk Ariṭṭha does not abandon this pernicious view of just such a kind in every aspect and in every way, the Saṅgha shall not speak with him, shall not converse with him, and shall treat him with contempt and utter contempt, as one treats an outcaste.

Those venerable ones who consent to the Saṅgha performing the act of reproach against the monk Ariṭṭha for not abandoning this pernicious view, and who consent that for as long as the monk Ariṭṭha does not abandon this pernicious view of just such a kind in every aspect and in every way, the Saṅgha shall not speak with him, shall not converse with him, and shall treat him with contempt and utter contempt as one treats an outcaste — let those venerable ones remain silent. Those who do not consent — let them speak.

This is the first recitation of the act. The same is recited a second and a third time.

The Saṅgha having consented and approved, the Saṅgha performed the act of reproach against the monk Ariṭṭha for not abandoning this pernicious view, and for as long as the monk Ariṭṭha does not abandon this pernicious view of just such a kind in every aspect and in every way, the Saṅgha shall not speak with him, shall not converse with him, and shall treat him with contempt and utter contempt, as one treats an outcaste. Since no one spoke, it is held to be so confirmed.

The monks, having heard from the Blessed One and received his instruction, then performed the act of reproach against the monk Ariṭṭha for not abandoning this pernicious view, and for as long as the monk Ariṭṭha did not abandon this pernicious view of just such a kind in every aspect and in every way, they did not speak with him, did not converse with him, and treated him with contempt and utter contempt, as one treats an outcaste.

Those monks having performed the act of reproach against the monk Ariṭṭha for not abandoning this pernicious view, and having thus refused — for as long as he did not abandon this pernicious view of just such a kind in every aspect and in every way — to speak with him or converse with him, treating him with contempt and utter contempt as one treats an outcaste, yet he stubbornly clung to and held fast to that very form of the pernicious view, and having attached himself to it, continued to declare: "This alone is true; all else is false." At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, with this incident as the occasion, convened an assembly of the community of monks — and so forth, as before.

"The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, act with knowledge" — and so forth, as before.

The Blessed One then questioned Ariṭṭha: "Ariṭṭha, is it true that you have said: 'I understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One in such a way that the very things the Blessed One has declared to be impediments are not, when one engages in them, actual impediments'?"

"Venerable One, that is not so."

The Blessed One then proceeded to rebuke him as one who conducts himself in a manner unbecoming of an ascetic, as one who acts in a way that is not fitting, not suitable, and not in accordance with proper conduct — this is not something that one who has gone forth should do. And so, having rebuked him in this way and through many expressions, the Blessed One then declared to the monks:

"Therefore, monks, seeing the ten benefits clearly, I shall establish a rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before.

"Let my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Should any monk say: 'I understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One in such a way that the very things the Blessed One has declared to be impediments are not, when one engages in them, actual impediments' — then the monks shall address that monk thus: 'Venerable friend, do not say such a thing. Do not misrepresent the Blessed One. To misrepresent the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One does not say any such thing. Venerable friend, the impeding factors are indeed impediments — so the Blessed One has declared through many expressions — and if one engages in them, they become impediments. Venerable friend, abandon this pernicious view of just such a kind.' When the monks address him in this way, if he abandons that ground, that is good. If he does not abandon it, he shall be addressed a second time and a third time, correctly and with full instruction, so that he may give it up. If, upon being so addressed and instructed a second and a third time, he abandons that ground, that is good. If he does not, it constitutes a transgression."

Now, the phrase "any monk" refers to Ariṭṭha or anyone else of that kind. The phrase "says thus" means when he utters such words. As for the phrase "the things the Blessed One has declared to be impediments," the term "impeding factors" (antarāyika dharmas) refers to: the four rules entailing defeat, the thirteen rules entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha, the two indefinite rules, the thirty rules entailing forfeiture and confession, the ninety rules entailing simple confession, the four rules entailing acknowledgment, the many rules of training, and the seven rules for the settlement of disputes — all of which the Blessed One has taught. The phrase "even if one engages in them" means even if one practices them extensively. The phrase "they are not actual impediments" means he claims they do not obstruct one's standing as an ascetic. The phrase "thus by the Blessed One" refers to the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened Buddha. The word "Dharma" refers to what has been spoken by the Buddha and explained by the śrāvakas. The word "taught" means fully and explicitly taught.

The phrase "if he says, 'I know this'" means "if he says, 'I know all of this.'" The phrase "to that monk" refers to the one showing signs of death. The phrase "the monks" refers to those belonging to this Dharma community. The phrase "in these words" means he is to be admonished, delivering the admonition exactly as previously taught. The phrase "when the monks admonish that monk in these words" means when they deliver the admonition. The phrase "if he abandons that ground" means if he entirely relinquishes that view. The phrase "that is good" means that is excellent. The phrase "if he does not abandon it" means if he does not relinquish it entirely. The phrase "he should be correctly admonished and correctly instructed a second and a third time" means that one should admonish him by means of the motion and the fourfold formal act, exactly as previously taught; that which is "correct admonition" is precisely that, and that which is "correct instruction" is precisely that.

The phrase "it entails a downfall" means: it burns, it scorches, it causes one to fall into the lower rebirths — into the hells, into the animal realm, into the wretched realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies and bad destinies. Moreover, for as long as that downfall has not been confessed and individually confessed, it obstructs all wholesome qualities; therefore it is said to "entail a downfall."

Now, as to how a downfall arises: if a monk says even so much as this — that those things which the Blessed One has taught as impediments would not be impediments even if one practiced them — then on every occasion this constitutes an offense.

When monks admonish him with the introductory act and he abandons that ground, that is good. If he does not abandon it, it becomes an offense.

When he is admonished by the motion and fourfold formal act and he abandons that ground, that is good. If he does not abandon it, it becomes an offense at the point of reading the motion.

When the first recitation of the formal act is being read and he has not completed it but abandons that ground, that is good. If he does not abandon it, the offense arises upon completion of the reading.

When the second recitation of the formal act is being read and he has not completed it but abandons that ground, that is good. If he does not abandon it, the offense arises upon completion of the reading.

When the third recitation of the formal act is being read and he has not completed it but abandons that ground, that is good. If he does not abandon it, then when the reading is completed: if the admonishment is delivered in a manner that is discordant and contrary to the Dharma, there is no downfall. If it is delivered in a manner that is discordant yet in accordance with the Dharma, there is no downfall. If it is delivered in a manner that is concordant and conforms to the Dharma, there is no downfall. If it is delivered in a manner that is discordant and contrary to the Dharma in a corrected form, there is no downfall. If it is not delivered in accordance with the Dharma as it is, the Vinaya as it is, and the teaching of the Teacher as it is, there is no downfall. But if it is delivered in a manner concordant with the Dharma as it is, the Vinaya as it is, and the teaching of the Teacher as it is, then upon completion of the reading it entails a downfall.

That monk, while still seated in his place, must declare: "Venerable ones, a downfall entailing a fall has arisen for me." If he makes that declaration, that is good. If he does not, from that point onward an offense of concealment will arise for him.

Therefore, for as long as a monk has not confessed and individually confessed that downfall, performing the motion and the fourfold formal act on every occasion, it becomes an offense in each instance.

For one who is a first offender, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one who is overwhelmed by painful feeling, there is no downfall.

Here ends the fifty-fifth downfall entailing a fall, that of not relinquishing the view.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. When the formal act of expulsion was performed against Ariṭṭha from that residence, he wept and went to his friend. His friend said, "Ariṭṭha, why are you weeping?" Ariṭṭha replied, "Those with black bowls have performed the formal act of expelling me from the residence." His friend said, "May those who performed the formal act of expelling Ariṭṭha from the residence be expelled from village, town, province, and all three realms. Yet as for those against whom the formal act of expulsion from the residence was performed, is there no village or hamlet? Please ask permission to stay." And so his friend conversed with Ariṭṭha, spoke of his coming, provided him with lodging, provided him with enjoyment, and slept together with him in one dwelling.

Then a monk rebuked them, saying, "Monks, why, for a trifling matter, do you converse with, speak of the coming of, provide lodging to, provide enjoyment to, and sleep together in one dwelling with that person who has been spoken about — one who has not acted in accordance with the Dharma and who has not relinquished that form of a wicked view — doing so knowingly?" He reproached them, raised a clamor against them, and spread word against them. At that time the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident and this basis and this occasion, convened the community of monks — and all the rest is as before. The phrase "the Blessed Buddhas knowingly make it appear as though they do not know" and so forth is also as before.

The Blessed One then questioned Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that you, knowingly, conversed with, spoke of the coming of, provided lodging to, provided enjoyment to, and slept together in one dwelling with that person who has been spoken about — one who has not acted in accordance with the Dharma and who has not relinquished that form of a wicked view?" He replied, "Venerable One, it is so."

The Blessed One then thoroughly censured him, saying, "That which is not the manner of a monastic, not in conformity, not proper, not in accord with the rule — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth." And so the Blessed One censured him in many ways. He then addressed the monks, declaring, "Therefore, seeing ten benefits and with the intention of establishing a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and all the rest is as before — "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Furthermore, whatever monk, knowingly, converses with, speaks of the coming of, provides lodging to, provides enjoyment to, and sleeps together in one dwelling with that person who has been spoken about — one who has not acted in accordance with the Dharma and who has not relinquished that form of a wicked view — that is a downfall."

Now, "whatever monk" means a son of the Śākyas, namely Ānanda or anyone else of that kind. "Knowingly" means that he himself has come to know it, or that others have told him. "The person who has been spoken about" means Aritṭha. "Has not acted in accordance with the Dharma" means has not acted in conformity with the Dharma. "Has not relinquished that form of a wicked view" means whatever that form of view was. "Converses with" means providing scriptural recitation. "Speaks of the coming of" means providing visits with a purpose in mind. "Provides lodging" means providing a place to stay. "Provides enjoyment" and so on means receiving service from him and making it one's own. "Sleeps together in one dwelling" means covering and surrounding all four sides of the dwelling, fully covered and mostly surrounded, mostly covered and fully surrounded, and mostly covered and mostly surrounded — sleeping there until dawn breaks. "Fully covered and fully surrounded" refers to a residential building, a surrounding cloister, and a multi-storied structure. "Fully covered and mostly surrounded" refers to buildings with ten doors and buildings with twelve doors. "Mostly covered and fully surrounded" refers to cloisters open on all four sides. "Mostly covered and mostly surrounded" refers to cloisters open on three sides

"Constitutes a transgression" means it causes burning, scorching, and falling into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower rebirths, and the states of misfortune. Furthermore, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs virtuous qualities — and for that reason it is said to constitute a transgression.

As to how the transgression comes about: if a monk, knowing even a little, converses with a person of whom it has been said that he has not acted in accordance with the Dharma and has not relinquished that form of a wicked view, a transgression is incurred. If one speaks of his coming, a transgression is incurred. If one provides him lodging, a transgression is incurred. If one shares enjoyments with him, a transgression is incurred. If one sleeps with him until dawn breaks in any of the four kinds of dwellings, a transgression is incurred. However, if one is ill, or if one wishes to be separated from that form of wicked view, there is no transgression. For one who is a beginner, who is insane, whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensations, there is no transgression.

This concludes the fifty-sixth transgression of the section on abandonment, in full.

The Vinaya Analysis, the fifty-eighth fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. There were two novices in Ānanda's retinue named Kṣudraka and Mahaka. While they had not yet become free from attachment, the monks would sit beside them on benches, play with them, touch them playfully, sport with them, make noise with them, and engage in laughter, pride, and bodily movements. Afterward, those two novices restrained whatever transgressions required restraint and confessed whatever transgressions required confession, and through enthusiasm, effort, and striving, having abandoned all afflictions, they directly realized the state of arhathood and also manifested supernormal powers.

On another occasion, when Kṣudraka and Mahaka were picking and arranging flowers, they saw some monks traveling through the sky by supernormal power. The two said: "Who are you?" Those monks replied: "We are such-and-such by name." The two then said: "You once did such-and-such together with us." The monks replied: "That is so. However, we restrained whatever transgressions required restraint and confessed whatever transgressions required confession, and through enthusiasm, effort, and striving, having abandoned all afflictions, we directly realized the state of arhathood and also manifested supernormal powers."

At that point a wicked view of the following kind arose in Kṣudraka and Mahaka: that those sensual pleasures which the Blessed One has said are obstructions are, even when engaged in, not in fact obstructions —

When they said "We understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it" — at that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you are to summon the novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka, and likewise any others of that kind, and admonish them. The admonition is to be given in these words: 'Kṣudraka and Mahaka, do not say this: that those sensual pleasures which the Blessed One has declared to be obstructions are, even when engaged in, not in fact obstructions, and that we understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it in this way. Do not slander the Blessed One. It does not go well for one who slanders the Blessed One. The Blessed One did not say any such thing. The Blessed One has stated in many ways that those sensual pleasures which are obstructions are indeed obstructions, and that to engage in them will become an obstruction. Kṣudraka and Mahaka, abandon this kind of wicked view.' That is how the admonition is to be given."

The monks replied "Venerable ones, we will carry out the instruction as commanded," and they went to the two novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka and admonished them: "Kṣudraka and Mahaka, do not say this: that those sensual pleasures which the Blessed One has declared to be obstructions are, even when engaged in, not in fact obstructions, and that we understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it in this way. Do not slander the Blessed One. It does not go well for one who slanders the Blessed One. The Blessed One did not say any such thing. The Blessed One has stated in many ways that those sensual pleasures which are obstructions are indeed obstructions, and that to engage in them will become an obstruction. Kṣudraka and Mahaka, abandon this kind of wicked view." That is how they summoned and admonished them.

Now when the many monks summoned and admonished the two novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka in this way, those two, even though thus summoned and admonished, clung tenaciously to that very wicked view, held fast to it, and continued to assert: "This alone is true; everything else is false." When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you are to summon the novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka, and likewise any others of that kind, and admonish them by the act of formal inquiry with a quorum of four. The procedure is as follows: having prepared the seats and struck the gong, after duly informing all the monks with the words of inquiry, and when the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in harmony, the two novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka are to be removed from hearing range and placed within sight range, and then a single monk is to make a motion and the formal act is to be carried out. The motion is to be stated thus: 'Venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear. The following wicked view of this kind has arisen in these two novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka: that those sensual pleasures which the Blessed One has declared to be obstructions are, even when engaged in, not in fact obstructions, and saying that they understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it in this way. When the many monks summoned and admonished these two, even though thus summoned and admonished, they clung tenaciously to that very wicked view, held fast to it, and continued to assert: "This alone is true; everything else is false."

If it is the right time for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha is willing, let the Saṅgha grant its consent. The Saṅgha's novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka are hereby admonished: "Kṣudraka and Mahaka, do not say this — that those sensual pleasures which the Blessed One has declared to be obstructions are, even when engaged in, not in fact obstructions, and that you understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it in this way. Do not misrepresent the Blessed One. To misrepresent the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One did not say any such thing. Kṣudraka and Mahaka, the Blessed One has said in many ways that sensual pleasures that obstruct are indeed obstructions, and that to engage in them is to create obstruction. Therefore, Kṣudraka and Mahaka, abandon this wicked view of such a kind." This is the motion, and the formal act is performed with the motion-and-three-proclamations.

This is the motion.

Thereafter, one monk should address these two and say: "The Saṅgha is about to perform the formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations in regard to you two. The motion has already been made. You two are hereby admonished to abandon this wicked view of such a kind. If, when thus admonished, you abandon that position, well and good. If you do not abandon it, then the formal act that follows shall be performed."

The formal act is to be performed as follows. Venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear. In these two novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka there has arisen a wicked view of this kind: that those sensual pleasures which the Blessed One has declared to be obstructions are, even when engaged in, not in fact obstructions, and they have said that they understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it in this way. When the many monks summoned and admonished these two, even though thus summoned and admonished, they clung tenaciously to that very wicked view, held fast to it, and continued to assert, "This alone is true; everything else is false." Therefore, the Saṅgha's novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka are hereby admonished: "Kṣudraka and Mahaka, do not say this — that those sensual pleasures which the Blessed One has declared to be obstructions are, even when engaged in, not in fact obstructions, and that you understand the Dharma as the Blessed One has taught it in this way. Do not misrepresent the Blessed One. To misrepresent the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One did not say any such thing. Kṣudraka and Mahaka, the Blessed One has said in many ways that sensual pleasures that obstruct are indeed obstructions, and that to engage in them is to create obstruction. Therefore, Kṣudraka and Mahaka, abandon this wicked view of such a kind." The formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations is hereby performed in this way. Those venerable ones who consent to the formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations being performed in regard to the novices Kṣudraka and Mahaka should remain silent. Those who do not consent should speak. This is the first proclamation.

Thereafter, one monk should address these two and say: "The Saṅgha has also performed the first proclamation of the formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations in regard to you two. You two are hereby admonished to abandon this wicked view of such a kind. If, when thus admonished, you abandon that position, well and good. If you do not abandon it, then the second proclamation shall follow."

After the second proclamation has likewise been made, one monk should again address these two and say: "The Saṅgha has also performed the second proclamation of the formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations in regard to you two. You two are hereby admonished to abandon this wicked view of such a kind."

If, when thus admonished, you abandon that position, well and good. If you do not abandon it, then the third proclamation shall follow.

After the third proclamation has likewise been made, one monk should again address these two and say: "The Saṅgha has now also performed the third proclamation of the formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations in regard to you two. You two are hereby admonished to abandon this wicked view of such a kind."

If, when thus admonished, you abandon that position, well and good. If you do not abandon it, the closing declaration shall then be made. The Saṅgha having consented and approved, one should declare: "The Saṅgha has performed the admonishment of the novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla by means of the formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations. Since they have said nothing in reply, it is understood that they maintain their position accordingly."

The monks then replied to the Blessed One: "Venerable ones, we shall act according to the Blessed One's instruction." And in compliance with the Blessed One's word, they performed the admonishment of the novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla by the formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations.

When the monks performed this admonishment of the novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla by the formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations, the two of them, even when thus admonished, stubbornly clung to and became firmly attached to that very same wicked view, and continued to assert: "This alone is true; all else is false." At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, you shall perform upon the novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla, who will not relinquish this wicked view, and upon any others of such a kind, the formal act of expulsion. This is how it shall be done: Having arranged the seats and struck the signal board, the monks shall be properly convened with the words of inquiry. When the entire Saṅgha is assembled and in concord, the novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla are to be removed from the hearing range and placed within sight, and then one monk shall put the motion and carry out the formal act.

Venerable Saṅgha, please hear this. This wicked view of such a kind has arisen in the novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla — namely, that they have declared: 'We understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One to mean that those things which the Blessed One called obstructions are not, when indulged in, actually obstructions.' Even when admonished by a great many monks, these two clung stubbornly to and became firmly attached to that very same wicked view, asserting, 'This alone is true; all else is false.' And even when the Saṅgha admonished these two by the formal act of motion-and-three-proclamations, they still clung stubbornly to and became firmly attached to that very same wicked view, asserting, 'This alone is true; all else is false.' If the Saṅgha is ready and consents, the Saṅgha shall approve. The Saṅgha hereby expels the novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla, who will not relinquish this wicked view. Henceforth, you two novices must not refer to the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, as your Teacher. You must not follow in the footsteps of whatever brahma-faring master-like figure you may encounter. Whatever permission you had to sleep overnight together with monks and novices in the same dwelling up until the second night — that too you no longer possess. You deluded ones are hereby expelled; go elsewhere." This is the motion.

Following that, a single monk shall address the two of them in these words: "You two — the Saṅgha is about to perform the act of one motion and three proclamations concerning you. On account of that motion, you two must relinquish this wicked view of such a kind." When he has so addressed them, if they relinquish that ground, so much the better. If they do not relinquish it, the act shall then proceed as follows.

The act is to be performed in this way. "Venerable members of the Saṅgha, please hear. Regarding these two novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla, there has arisen in them a wicked view of this kind: they have declared, 'We understand that the teaching which the Blessed One gave — namely, that those things he described as obstructions do not in fact obstruct one who indulges in them — is what the Blessed One truly taught.' Many monks then took hold of these two and admonished them. Although the two were taken hold of and admonished, they seized upon that same wicked view with even greater tenacity and clung to it, asserting thereafter, 'This alone is true; all else is false.' Even though the Saṅgha now performs the act of one motion and three proclamations concerning these two, even after the Saṅgha performs this act of one motion and three proclamations, they seize upon that same wicked view with even greater tenacity and cling to it, asserting thereafter, 'This alone is true; all else is false.' Therefore, the Saṅgha hereby expels the novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla, who will not relinquish this wicked view. Henceforth, you two novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla must not refer to the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, as your Teacher. You must not follow in the footsteps of whatever brahma-faring master-like figure you may encounter. Whatever permission you had to sleep overnight together with monks and novices in the same dwelling up until the second night — that too you no longer possess. You deluded ones are hereby expelled; go elsewhere." If the Saṅgha performs the act of expulsion, those venerable ones who consent to the expulsion of the novices Ariṭṭha and Mahāpāla, who will not relinquish this wicked view, shall remain silent. Those who do not consent shall speak. This is the first proclamation of the act.

Following that, a single monk shall address the two of them: "You two — the Saṅgha has performed the act of one motion and three proclamations, and the first proclamation of the act has also been made. You two must relinquish this wicked view of such a kind." When he has so addressed them, if they relinquish that ground, so much the better. If they do not relinquish it, the second proclamation of the act shall then be made.

After the second proclamation has been made, a single monk shall again address the two of them: "You two — the Saṅgha is performing the act of one motion and three proclamations, and the second proclamation of the act has also been made. You two must relinquish this wicked view of such a kind." When he has so addressed them, if they relinquish that ground, so much the better. If they do not relinquish it, the third proclamation of the act shall then be made.

After the third proclamation has been made, a single monk shall again address the two of them: "You two — the Saṅgha is performing the act of one motion and three proclamations, and the third proclamation of the act has also been made. You two must relinquish this wicked view of such a kind." When he has so addressed them, if they relinquish that ground, so much the better. If they do not relinquish it, the conclusion shall then be performed.

With the Saṅgha's consent and permission, the Saṅgha has performed the act of one motion and three proclamations, the act of suspension, against the novices Thorny and Great-One. Since no one has spoken against it, this is held to be so.

The monks, having heard from the Blessed One and saying, "Reverend sir, we accept the command," performed the act of suspension by one motion and three proclamations against Thorny and Great-One. When the act of suspension had been performed against the two of them, they went weeping to their companion, and the companion said: "Thorny and Great-One, why do you two weep?" The two of them replied: "Those who carry black begging bowls have performed the act of suspension against us two." The companion said: "May those who performed the act of suspension against you two be themselves suspended from village, from town, from province, and from the three realms. But as for those against whom the act of suspension has been performed, are there no villages and towns? Stay here, and ask for forgiveness." And he settled those two close by, kept company with them, and had the two sleep together with him in one dwelling.

Then a few monks said: "Why, monks, do monks knowingly settle close by these novices against whom the act of suspension has been performed, keep company with them, and sleep together with them in one dwelling?" They rebuked them, pointed it out, and spread word of it. At that occasion, the monks reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon, the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence and in connection with this matter and this occasion, summoned the assembly of monks — and so forth as before. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, knowingly ask — and so forth as before as well.

The Blessed One asked Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that you knowingly settle those suspended novices close by, keep company with them, and sleep together with them in one dwelling?" "Reverend sir, it is so." The Blessed One then censured this as not the conduct of a renunciant, as not in accordance with what is fitting, as not appropriate, as not in conformity with the discipline, and as something that one who has gone forth ought not to do.

Then, having censured it in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten good reasons, a rule of training for the hearers is to be established in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If any novice should say, 'I understand the Dharma taught by the Blessed One to be such that those things he declared to be obstructions are not, when engaged in, obstructive' — then the monks shall say to that novice: 'Do not say this, novice. Do not misrepresent the Blessed One. To misrepresent the Blessed One is not good. The Blessed One would not say this. Venerable novice, the Blessed One has declared in many ways that the things which obstruct are indeed obstructions — and if one engages in them, they become obstructions. Novice, relinquish this wicked view of such a kind.'"

When the monks have so spoken to that novice, if he relinquishes that ground, so much the better.

If he does not relinquish it, in order that he may relinquish that ground, he is to be admonished and instructed correctly a second time and a third time. If, when admonished and instructed correctly a second and third time, he relinquishes that ground, so much the better. If he does not relinquish it, the monks shall say to that novice: "From this day forward, novice, you shall not say of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, that he is your Teacher. You shall not follow after any accomplished elder in the holy life (brahmacarya), as one follows a preceptor. And the permission you previously had to sleep in the same lodging together with monks for up to two nights — that too you shall have no more. Foolish one, you are expelled; go elsewhere." This is how the admonition is to be given. Furthermore, any monk who knowingly gives lodging to a novice who has been expelled in this way, or associates with him, or sleeps with him in the same lodging, commits a transgression.

Now, "a novice" means one of a thorny type, one of a major type, or any other such kind. "Speaking thus" means when one says such words. Regarding "things the Blessed One has declared to be obstructions": "desires" here means the five qualities of desire. "Even if one engages in them" means even if one pursues them extensively. "They will not become obstructions" means they will not become obstructions to the way of the ascetic. "Thus declared by the Blessed One" refers to the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha. "Dharma" means what has been spoken by the buddha or explained by a śrāvaka. "Taught" means thoroughly taught. "If he says 'I know'" means if he says "I know all of it." "To that novice" refers to the thorny type and the major type. "The monks" means those who belong to this Dharma community. "Speaking thus" means that one takes the matter up and admonishes as was shown before. "When the monks have so spoken to that novice" means when the admonition has been properly given. "If he relinquishes that ground" means if he utterly relinquishes that form of view — if so, so much the better. "If he does not relinquish it" means if he does not utterly relinquish it. "He is to be admonished and instructed correctly a second time and a third time" means that the admonition is to be given by means of a motion-and-three-proclamation act, just as was shown before — and that is what correct admonition means, and that is what correct instruction means. "To that novice" refers to the thorny type and the major type. "The monks" means those who belong to this Dharma community.

"From this day forward, novice, you shall not say of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, that he is your Teacher. You shall not follow after any accomplished elder in the holy life as one follows a preceptor. The permission you previously had to sleep in the same lodging together with monks for up to two nights — that too you shall have no more. Foolish one, you are expelled; go elsewhere." This is to be administered by means of a motion-and-three-proclamation act of expulsion, just as was shown before.

"Furthermore, any monk" refers to a son of the Śākyas or any other such person. "Knowingly" means having come to know it himself, or having been told by others. "A novice who has been expelled in this way" is as described, of the thorny or major type. "Gives lodging" means provides a place of residence. "Associates with him" means sharing the begging bowl and the robe, the net bag, the bowl, the belt, the recitation of texts aloud, reading, chanting, and the giving of instruction through intentional questioning.

"Sleeping together in one dwelling" refers to sleeping until dawn in any of the four kinds of dwelling: one that is fully enclosed and fully surrounded on all sides; one that is fully enclosed and mostly surrounded; one that is mostly enclosed and fully surrounded; or one that is mostly enclosed and mostly surrounded. "Fully enclosed and fully surrounded" refers to a proper dwelling hall, a cloistered courtyard, and a multi-storied building. "Fully enclosed and mostly surrounded" refers to a building with ten doors or one with twelve doors. "Mostly enclosed and fully surrounded" refers to a cloister open on four sides. "Mostly enclosed and mostly surrounded" refers to a cloister open on three sides and an open-sided courtyard cloister.

"It entails a transgression" means that it causes one to burn, to be scorched, and to fall into the hell-beings, the animals, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the states of ruin. Furthermore, as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — and for that reason it is called a transgression.

As for how exactly a transgression arises in this context: if a monk, knowing even something of this, nonetheless provides lodging for a novice who has been expelled in such a way, a transgression arises. If he associates with him, a transgression arises. If he sleeps with him in the same dwelling, a transgression arises. There is no transgression for one who wishes to be separated from that person, whether on account of illness or on account of a view that is corrupt and evil. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, who is mentally disturbed, whose mind is distracted, or who is overcome by painful sensations.

Here ends the fifty-seventh transgression in the category of transgressions concerned with harboring expelled persons.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing at Rājagṛha, in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove in the Veṇuvana. At that time, dwelling in Rājagṛha were two nāga kings named Parvata and Manāpa. Through their power, the five hundred hot springs of Rājagṛha, its streams, its lakes, and its ponds were caused by the gods to flow with excellent water at the proper seasons, and the harvests were exceedingly abundant. When the Blessed One had tamed the nāga kings Nanda and Upananda, those two, on the eighth day, the fourteenth day, and the fifteenth day of each lunar fortnight, would come to the terraced slopes of Mount Meru and pay homage to the Blessed One. Then the nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa thought to themselves, "Since the nāga kings Nanda and Upananda come on the eighth, fourteenth, and fifteenth days to the terraced slopes of Mount Meru and pay homage to the Blessed One, while we two remain here and have not paid homage to the Blessed One, let us go and pay homage to him." So the two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they bowed with their heads to the feet of the Blessed One and stood to one side. Having stood to one side, the Blessed One established the two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa in the going-for-refuge and in the bases of training. When the Blessed One had established those two in the going-for-refuge and in the bases of training, those two became exceedingly elevated in body and in possessions. When those two had become exceedingly elevated in body and in possessions, they thought, "Let us go forth into the great ocean." And so those two went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they bowed with their heads to the feet of the Blessed One and stood to one side. Having stood to one side, the two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable Blessed One, when you established the two of us in the going-for-refuge and in the bases of training, we two became exceedingly elevated in body and in possessions. If the Blessed One would permit it, we two would enter the great ocean." The Blessed One declared: "O lords of nāgas, you two are kings born in Magadha, dwellers in the heartland of the refined form — Kalandaka's grove in Veṇuvana. You should present your request to the king of Magadha, born of the refined form, the essence of Kalandaka's grove." Those two thought: "In effect, the Blessed One has not given us permission to go into the great ocean."

During the nights when those two would attend upon the Blessed One, they would attend him in the manner befitting a celestial palace; and during the days when they would attend upon the Blessed One, they would attend him in the manner befitting a householder. Then the king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, of the refined form, went to where the Blessed One was dwelling at the Kalandaka grove in the Bamboo Forest. Now, the kṣatriya lineage is by nature proud, and so the king remained on the road and said to a certain impure-edged one: "Go inside and look at who is attending upon the Blessed One." That impure-edged one, having respectfully heard from the king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, the words "As your lord commands," went to where the Blessed One was, and saw two householders attending upon the Blessed One. Having seen this, he went back to where the king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, was, and said to him: "Your Majesty, two householders are attending upon the Blessed One — they seem to be dwelling in the realm of the gods; they did not bend their knees." The king thought: "Those two householders are dwellers in my own realm; if they see me, they will surely rise to their feet." And so he went to where the Blessed One was.

The two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa saw the king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, from a considerable distance. Having seen him, those two addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, should we first pay homage to the sacred Dharma, or should we pay homage to the king?" "O two nāga kings, first pay homage to the sacred Dharma. The Blessed buddhas themselves hold the sacred Dharma in reverence, and the arhats too place the Dharma first."

Thereupon the Blessed One, on this occasion, declared these verses:

All the buddhas of the past, and all the buddhas yet to come, and the buddhas now dwelling in the present, many as they are, who dispel sorrow —

every one of them abides, has abided, and will abide in reverence toward the sacred Dharma.

And they cause others likewise to abide in reverence.

This is the very nature of buddhahood.

Therefore, one who desires what is good for oneself, who aspires to great distinction, should, in recollecting the teaching of the buddhas, hold the sacred Dharma in deep reverence.

Those two did not rise to their feet before the king of Magadha, Bimbisāra. The king became angry and thought: "These two householders are dwellers in my own realm, yet they do not rise to their feet before me." And with that, he bowed with his head to the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side.

Seated to one side, Bimbisāra, king of Magadha, whose body was shaped by noble craftsmanship and whose heart was full, addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Blessed One, please teach the Dharma."

The Blessed One then spoke these verses on the occasion:

One who lacks delight, who harbors aversion, who is agitated — such a one cannot come to know all the sacred Dharma taught by the perfectly and completely awakened one. But one who restrains the impulse toward wrongdoing, who dispels the mind of delight and its absence, and who abandons here the mind that broods with hostility — that one will come to know the well-spoken teaching.

The king thought to himself: "Through these two householders, my audience with the Blessed One for hearing the Dharma has also come to an end." Then Bimbisāra, king of Magadha, bowed with his head to the feet of the Blessed One, withdrew from the Blessed One's presence, and as he departed from the Bamboo Grove, he gave instruction to those who lived by dairy produce: "When these two householders have departed from the presence of the Blessed One, tell them this from the king's mouth: 'The two of you are not to remain in my territory.'" Having said that, the king departed.

Those who lived by dairy produce replied, "As the king commands," and remained there. Then the two nāga kings, Parvata and Manāpa, bowed at the feet of the Blessed One, withdrew from his presence, and when the two of them had departed from the Bamboo Grove, the king's dairymen said to them: "You two householders, this message has come from the king's mouth: 'The two of you are not to remain in my territory.'"

Upon hearing these words, Parvata and Manāpa thought: "The aspiration we have long held has now been fulfilled with little difficulty." Knowing this, right there and then they generated a great effulgence of water in all directions and entered into the small streams. From the small streams they entered into the large streams. From the large streams they entered into the small rivers. From the small rivers they entered into the great rivers. From the great rivers they entered into the great ocean. And at the moment the two of them entered the great ocean, their bodies and wealth rose to heights of Dharmic excellence exceedingly great.

Now at the very moment the two of them entered the great ocean, the five hundred hot springs of Rājagṛha also began to dry up. The gods no longer sent the waters flowing well in season into the cascades, the lakes, and the ponds. The harvests too became utterly ruined. The king then thought: "In this Rājagṛha there used to dwell two nāga kings named Parvata and Manāpa. Through their power, the five hundred hot springs of Rājagṛha, the cascades, the lakes, and the ponds had waters flowing well in season, and the harvests were most abundant. Now the five hundred hot springs of Rājagṛha have begun to dry up, the gods no longer send the waters flowing well in season into the cascades, the lakes, and the ponds, and the harvests have become utterly ruined. Has it happened that the two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa have fallen ill, died, fled, or been seized by some serpent enemy? For this buddha, this Blessed One, is omniscient and all-seeing —"

— for he is one who has attained supreme mastery of knowledge and of all that is to be known. I shall go to the buddha, the Blessed One, and ask."

Then Bimbisāra, king of Magadha, went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, King Bimbisāra of Magadha addressed the Blessed One in these words:

"Venerable one, in this city of Rājagṛha there dwell two nāga kings named Parvata and Manāpa. Through their power, the five hundred hot springs of Rājagṛha, the cascades, the lakes, and the ponds have had waters flowing well in season, sent by the gods, and the harvests have been most abundant. But now the five hundred hot springs of Rājagṛha have begun to dry up, the gods no longer send the waters flowing well in season into the cascades, the lakes, and the ponds, and the harvests have become utterly ruined. Has it happened that the two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa have fallen ill, died, fled, or been seized by some serpent enemy — or has none of this occurred?"

"Great King, the two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa have not fallen ill, have not died, have not fled, and have not been seized by a serpent enemy. It is you yourself who drove them away."

"Venerable one, I do not even recall having seen the nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa — how then could I have driven them away?"

"Great King, I shall remind you of it."

"Venerable one, may the Blessed One please do so."

"Great King, what did you say to those two householders at that time?"

"Venerable one, when those two householders departed from the presence of the Blessed One, I told the men who were living off curds to spread the word: 'The moment those two householders leave the Blessed One's presence, let it be announced from the king's mouth that the two of you are not to remain in my domain.' That is what I ordered."

Then the Blessed One declared: "Great King, those two householders were none other than the two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa."

The king asked: "Venerable one, where did those two go at that time?"

"They entered the great ocean."

The king said: "Venerable one, Blessed One, then my domain has been harmed."

The Blessed One declared: "Great King, your domain will not be harmed — provided that you offer forgiveness to those two."

The king said: "Venerable one, they have entered the great ocean and I am here. How shall I offer them forgiveness?"

The Blessed One declared: "Great King, those two will come here to bow at my feet on the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth days of the month. You also should come here on the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth, and I will show you those two so that you may offer them forgiveness."

"Venerable one, should I then touch their two feet?"

"Great King, you need not touch their feet. When one bows at the feet of those of low birth, one is grasped by the hand of the chief men — therefore extend your right hand and offer forgiveness to the two lords of the nāgas, saying: 'May you forgive.'"

Then at another time the two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving they bowed their heads to the Blessed One's two feet and stood to one side. At that same time, King Bimbisāra of Magadha also went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side.

The Blessed One gave a signal. Then King Bimbisāra of Magadha, whose body was well-formed and refined, extended his right hand and said: "May the two lords of the nāgas forgive." The two replied: "Great King, we forgive." The two lords of the nāgas then said: "If you would forgive us, please invite us to your land." The two replied: "Great King, at the time when we entered the great ocean, our bodies and wealth became exceedingly and manifestly exalted — and so if we were now to come here, there would simply be no place fitting for the two of us. The king said: "Two lords of the nāgas, in that case my land is not worthy of you." The two replied: "Great King, your land will not be unworthy — for if you cause two shrines to be built, one for the mountain and the other for the pleasant grove, and if you install there the sustenance and livelihood of the two of us, and if every six months you cause a festival to be held, then the two of us will also come in person at those times and fulfill our former obligations."

Then King Bimbisāra of Magadha caused two shrines to be built — one for the mountain, the other for the pleasant grove — and had festivals held there every six months. Whenever a festival took place, great crowds of common people from all six great cities would come and gather together in harmony.

Then at another time, when the festival of the two nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa came around in Rājagṛha, a dancer also arrived in Rājagṛha from the southern road. He thought to himself: "What means might there be to greatly delight the crowds of common people and also obtain abundant gain?" He then thought further: "If I were to recite the praises of a great person, then the crowds of common people would be greatly delighted and abundant gain would come about as well."

At that time, most of the great crowd of common people had come to have faith in the Blessed One. The dancer thought: "For now, this world with its gods has faith in the Blessed One — so if I recite the praises of the Blessed One, the buddha, the crowds of common people will be greatly delighted and abundant gain will come about. Therefore I shall recite the praises of the Blessed One, the buddha." And so he went to the assembly of those who rejoiced and spoke:

"Noble ones, at the time when the Blessed One, still a bodhisattva, dwelled in the Tuṣita heaven, he surveyed the world through the five kinds of examination — looking at lineage, family, land, time, and woman — and then purified the six gods of the desire realm three times. He transformed his form into the appearance of a great elephant and, with full awareness, entered the womb of his mother. At that very time this great earth shook violently. And those interspaces of the world where the light of the sun and moon — so great in their supernatural power, so great in their might — cannot reach, those that are darkened by an enveloping darkness, a thick darkness, an obscuring darkness, those too were at that moment pervaded by a vast illumination. Sentient beings born there who could not even see their own extended hands — even they, by that light, saw one another, being and being, and those endowed with understanding said: 'Other sentient beings too are born here.'

those endowed with understanding said: "Other sentient beings too are born here. Other sentient beings too are born here." And at the time when the Blessed One, the bodhisattva, was born from his mother's womb after ten months had passed, at that time too this great earth shook violently. And those interspaces of the world where the light of the sun and moon — so great in their supernatural power, so great in their might — cannot reach, those that are darkened by an enveloping darkness, a thick darkness, an obscuring darkness, those too were at that moment pervaded by a vast illumination. Sentient beings born there who could not even see their own extended hands — even they, by that light, saw one another, being and being, and those endowed with understanding said: "Other sentient beings too are born here. Other sentient beings too are born here."

And on the very day when the Blessed One, the bodhisattva, was born, sons too were born to the four great kings. In Śrāvastī, the son of the great king Rib-kyi 'phur-tshang-byin was born, and that king thought to himself: "When my son was born, the world appeared brilliantly illuminated, bright as brightness itself; therefore I shall name this youth Bright Victor." And so he gave that son the name Bright Victor. In Rājagṛha, a son was born to the great king Padmamahā, and he thought: "When my son was born, the world appeared as though the form of the sun had risen, and since this boy is the son of the queen Gzugs-can, I shall name this youth Essence of Form." And so he gave that son the name Essence of Form. In Kauśāmbī, a son was born to the great king of the Hundred-Armed Army, and he thought: "When my son was born, the world appeared as though the sun had risen; therefore I shall name this youth Risen." And so he gave that son the name Risen. In the noble kingdom, a son was born to the great king Mu-khyud-mtha'-yas, and he thought: "When my son was born, the world became illuminated by a supreme light; therefore I shall name this son Supreme Light." And so he gave that son the name Supreme Light.

And on the very day when the Blessed One, the bodhisattva, was born, five hundred young Śākyas headed by Bzang-Idan were also born, and five hundred attendants headed by 'Dun-byed were born. From five hundred mares, five hundred foals headed by Bsnags-Idan were born. And the gods revealed five hundred treasures nearby. The Blessed One, the bodhisattva, was then examined by brahmins who were readers of omens and by specialists in marks, and they prophesied: "If this youth remains within the palace, he will become a wheel-turning king (cakravartin) victorious in all four directions — a righteous king, a king endowed with Dharma, possessed of the seven precious things. Those seven precious things will be as follows: the precious wheel, the precious elephant, the precious horse, the precious jewel, the precious queen, the precious householder, and the precious general — these are the seven. He will have brave and bold sons of supreme form, a full thousand of them, who utterly vanquish enemy armies. And he will settle the entire great earth reaching to the ocean's edge, without injury and without harm, without cutting down and without the sword, by means of Dharma, in harmony and accord, well established and at peace."

"If he shaves his hair and beard, dons ochre robes, and goes forth from home into homelessness with perfect faith, then he will become a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and completely awakened Buddha, renowned throughout the world, possessed of a fame that resounds everywhere" — such was the prophecy.

And at the time when the Blessed One, still a bodhisattva, was born into the world, everywhere near the face of the snowy mountains, beside a river, by a road where fortunate travelers passed, not far from the hermitage of the golden-robed ascetics, a young son was born among the Śākyas. The brahmin astrologers and sign-readers proclaimed: "This is how the prophecy was spoken." And the kings of the regions under the sun, hearing that near the face of the snowy mountains, beside a river, by a road where fortunate travelers passed, not far from the hermitage of the golden-robed ascetics, a young son had been born among the Śākyas, and that the brahmin astrologers and sign-readers had proclaimed it so — hearing this, those kings of the regions under the sun thought to themselves: "If we attend upon the youth, in due time it will bear fruit. Whom should we attend upon? We should attend upon the youth." And so they considered: "We should attend upon King Śuddhodana, for attending upon him is the way to attend upon the youth." So they began to attend upon King Śuddhodana, and at the proper seasons they sent messengers and gifts, honouring him.

Then King Śuddhodana thought to himself: "When my son was born, every purpose was fulfilled and every undertaking accomplished. Therefore I shall give this youth the name Sarvārthasiddha, Fulfiller of All Purposes." And so the name Sarvārthasiddha was requested and bestowed.

Then, when he was led to pay homage to the deity of the Śākya, a yakṣa named Śākyavardhana, "Increaser of the Śākya," the young Śākya proved capable, and when he bowed before that deity, he was named Śākyamuni, "Capable One of the Śākya," and also "God above Gods."

And at the time when the Blessed One, still a bodhisattva, grew into maturity in body, having mastered all branches of learning, and having engaged in the sports of youth, he beheld an old man, a sick man, and a dead man, and his mind turned away. He went into the forest and for six years practised austerities. During that time King Śuddhodana and the Śākya nobleman Śākya Legs-par-Rab-rtogs dispatched two hundred and fifty men in shifts, two hundred and fifty at a time, to seek an audience with the Blessed One the bodhisattva, and each day those men went to request an audience with him.

And at the time when the Blessed One the bodhisattva had practised austerities for six years, he recognised that asceticism was of no benefit whatsoever, and he breathed in as he wished and breathed out as he wished, and he partook of abundant food — boiled rice, warm gruel, and so forth. He anointed his body with butter and grain oil, and bathed his body with warm water.

Then he went to the nearby village, where two village girls — Sujātā and Balavijayā — offered him milk mixed with honey that had been churned sixteen times. Praised by Kāḷanāgarāja, the black nāga king, he accepted bundles of golden-coloured auspicious grass from a grass-seller, and went to the place of awakening. Arriving there, he himself spread a seat of undisturbed grass, sat down cross-legged, drew his body upright, settled his mindfulness, and dwelt there, uttering from his heart this resolve:

Until I attain the undefiled, this cross-legged seat I shall not break.

And at the time when the Blessed One, at midnight, subdued by the power of loving-kindness the māras and demons — thirty million and sixty million — together with their retinues, — please teach extensively how the Blessed One attained, in full and complete manifestation, unsurpassable perfect and complete awakening.

Ānanda said: What use is that to you?

The dancer said: Noble one, I would set it to the art of dance.

Ānanda said: You pauper — would you embellish it as our Teacher is embellished? Be off with you and say no more.

Then the dancer went to the assembly of Ānanda's attendants, asked the same question, and they too gave the same reply. Then he went in turn to the assemblies of the quick-walkers, the Nabhasos, the Undaos, and the Charkas, asked the same question, and every one of them, each in their own way, gave the same reply and did not teach him.

Then the dancer went to the twelve assemblies of nuns, and first he asked the nun Bhaumadharā, saying the same thing. Bhaumadharā replied: What use is that to you?

The dancer said: I would set it to the art of dance. What fee is appointed for her? I offer it.

Now Bhaumadharā was one of great learning, endowed with the three scriptural collections, possessed of the confidence that comes from reasoning and liberation. She therefore taught him in full — from the time when the Blessed One, dwelling as a bodhisattva in Tuṣita Heaven, surveyed the world through the five modes of vision, looking at family, lineage, region, time, and woman, and having looked upon the world, caused the six gods of the desire realm to purify themselves three times completely; then, transforming the appearance into that of a great elephant, he knowingly entered into his mother's womb; and at that very moment the great earth shook and trembled violently, and the dark and darkening darkness that pervades the interworld spaces — where the sun and the moon, though of such great miraculous power, of such great might, cannot make their light felt — that darkness too was at that time pervaded by a vast radiance, so that the sentient beings born there, who could not even see their own hands outstretched, by that light could see one another, and knowing this said: "O wise ones, another sentient being has been born here! O wise ones, another sentient being has been born here!" — down to the time when, at midnight, the Blessed One subdued by the power of loving-kindness the māras and demons — thirty million and sixty million — together with their retinues, and fully attained unsurpassable perfect and complete awakening — all of this exactly as it is extensively told in the sūtra of the manifest arising up to the perfect and complete awakening.

Then the dancer set it to the art of dance, and then he thought: By this I am able to increase the faith of the masses of ordinary people who already have faith — but what means is there by which even those who have no faith might come to have faith?

So he ingratiated himself with the six groups of monks, following close behind them one after another. At a certain moment, the venerable Undao had finished eating and set aside his main dish, and found some leftover food and scraps and wished to eat them, and he rubbed his hands together and was about to take that leftover food, when the venerable Charka, who was eating his gruel, was approached by Undao, who sat down on his haunches before him and said: Venerable Charka, please take note. I, the monk Undao — having sought, found, and completely and utterly exhausted my main dish and food — have found and sought some leftovers, and if you would leave a little more, please give it to me.

Charka ate two or three mouthfuls from it, then said: Take what remains for yourself and be gone.

When the dancer saw this, he thought: By this I shall be able to bring even those without faith to faith. And then he departed.

Vinayavibhaṅga, the fifty-ninth fascicle.

Then the dancer, in Rājagṛha, went to Giriva, the nāga king of the mountains, and —

On the day when the festival of Delightful Twain had begun, the great clay drum was beaten from a high seat, and when a great multitude of common folk had gathered there and sat together in harmony, the dancer performed, in elaborate dance, all the enactments of that time when the Blessed One, dwelling as a bodhisattva in the Tuṣita realm, surveyed the world through the five surveys — of clan, lineage, region, time, and woman — and having looked upon the world, caused the six gods of the realm of desire to purify themselves three times; and then, having transformed his appearance into that of a great white elephant, entered with full awareness into his mother's womb. At that very moment the great earth trembled violently, and those dark interspaces of the world — the regions between world-systems — where the light of the sun and moon, great as their supernatural power is, mighty as their might is, does not reach, so that those places are wrapped in thick, blinding darkness, those very places were pervaded by a vast radiance. The sentient beings born there, who could not even see their own hands stretched out before them, saw one another by that light, and those with wisdom understood: "Yet another sentient being has been born here, yet another sentient being has been born here." And then, enacting the events from the sūtra — as it extensively describes them — up to the time when the Blessed One, at the midnight hour, subdued Māra (Skt. māra) who had come with a retinue of thirty million demons and sixty million attendants, by the power of loving-kindness, and fully awakened to unsurpassed, perfect, complete awakening, the dancer staged all of this extensively as dance. The faithful among the great multitude of common folk grew yet more fervent in their faith, and called out: "Eamo! Well danced! Eamo! Well danced!" And the dancer gained great material reward.

Then the dancer thought again: I have increased the faith of those among the common folk who already had faith. Now I should also bring to faith those who have no faith yet. After that, one dancer dressed himself in the costume of Charka, and another dancer dressed himself in the costume of Undao. The one dressed as Undao filled a bowl with ashes, placed two or three lumps of raw sugar on top, then sat cross-legged in front of the one dressed as Charka who was eating a meal, and said: Venerable Charka, please take note. I, the monk Undao, having sought, found, and completely and utterly exhausted my main dish and food, have now sought and found a little more; if you would leave some over, please give it to me. The one dressed as Charka then took the two or three lumps of raw sugar and ate them, and the one dressed as Undao poured the ashes from the bowl over his own head, saying: Take what is yours and be gone. At this, the entire great multitude of common folk burst into loud laughter, crying out "Ha! Ha!" Those who had no faith grew fervent in their faith, and called out: "Eamo! A madman's trick! Eamo! A madman's trick!" And the dancer gained great material reward.

Then those among the great multitude of common folk who were faithful said: Look here, friends! This dancer has enacted the time when the Blessed One, dwelling as a bodhisattva in the Tuṣita realm, surveyed the world through the five surveys — of clan, lineage, region, time, and woman — and having looked upon the world, caused the six gods of the realm of desire to purify themselves three times, having transformed his appearance into that of a great white elephant and entered, fully conscious, into his mother's womb — and at that very moment the great earth trembled violently, and those regions of the world between worlds where these two — the sun and the moon, great as they are in their miraculous power and their might — cannot reach with their light, and which remain in utter, impenetrable, pitch-black darkness: those regions too were at that moment pervaded by a great radiance, so that the sentient beings born there, who could not even see their own hands stretched out before them, could now see one another by that light, and knew: "Friends, yet another sentient being has been born here! Friends, yet another sentient being has been born here!"

From that point up to the time when the Blessed One, in the middle watch of the night, with the power of loving-kindness (Skt. maitrī) subdued the māra host — thirty million demons together with sixty million attendants — and fully awakened to the unsurpassed, perfect, and complete awakening: all of this in its entirety, exactly as it is described at length in the sūtra on his manifest arising, was set to dance with great elaboration and performed.

And those among the faithful in the great crowd of common folk said: "Friends, look! This dancer has elaborated upon and enacted, at great length and with all its details, the dance of the Blessed One's entry into the bodhisattva's conduct — the dance called 'Unpleasant Sound.' " And their faith grew manifestly stronger.

Those among the great crowd of common folk who had no faith said: "Friends, look! This dancer has elaborated upon and enacted all of this at great length as a madman's trick — parodying what the six groups of loose wandering monks (Skt. śramaṇa) do that is not to be done." And they laughed.

In time the six groups came to hear that it was being said the dancer had imitated them. They said: "We shall make this dancer unwelcome. We will go and take counsel with our sisters." And they went to the community of twelve groups of nuns and said: "Sisters, let us discuss together whatever we can recall of the dance-performance called 'Unpleasant Sound,' which depicted the Blessed One's entry into the bodhisattva's conduct." And so they went together with those nuns to a pleasure garden and began their deliberations.

In time, having forgotten nothing at all, those nuns fetched ornaments and costumes from the royal palace, set up a tent-canopy not far from the dancer, had a close companion bind his head in a cloth and beat a great clay drum — while the watching crowd streamed out from among the common folk and gathered there. The dancer also arrived at that spot.

When he saw something that resembled the dance of gods, he thought to himself: "Can these be gods performing a dance? Or are they nāgas? Or yakṣas? Or gandharvas (Skt. gandharva)? Or kinneras (Skt. kiṃnara)? Or great serpents?" And realizing what he saw, he was filled with amazement.

The six groups, having performed their dance, changed out of their costumes and departed. The dancer thought: "Who are these people?" and followed along behind them. In time they entered the Ōmā Grove, and the dancer waited at the gate. In time, one named Acharka came out through the gate, his shoulder-cloth draped about him, as though anointing himself. The dancer said to him: "Noble one, did you perform that dance?"

Acharka replied: "We are going to make you unwelcome. You, a pauper, make your living by our arts alone, and yet you imitate us — so wherever you go to dance, we will go there and outbid you, and you will find that neither the great clay drum nor any other equipment will need to be carried for us."

The dancer replied: "Noble one, that is our livelihood — please be patient."

Acharka said:

"If you give everything you earn to us, we will be patient."

He thought: "These ones will keep pestering me again and again, so I will give." And having given all his earnings to them, he sat there with a heavy heart.

After a while, his younger companion arrived and asked him: "Friend, why do you sit with such a heavy heart?"

He replied: "I have been cut down by a penalty."

"By whom?"

"By the śramaṇas (Skt. śramaṇa), the sons of the Śākya."

"Why?" He then gave a full account of what had occurred, and said that the code of conduct of the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākya is merely words, and the code of the brahmins (Skt. brāhmaṇa) is merely words — for even against dancers they impose penalties, they condemn them, they disparage them, they slander them. And they condemned, disparaged, and slandered the monks, saying: "Why do monks — monks of small worth — do such an unseemly thing?"

At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One reflected: "Whatever fault has arisen has come about from monks wearing householders' clothing. Therefore a monk should not put on householders' clothing." Having so reflected, the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks regarding this incident, this case, this occasion — and so forth, as before. "The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though they already know, cause enquiry to be made" — and so forth, also as before.

The Blessed One questioned the group of six: "Monks, is it true that you did something so unseemly?" "We did, Venerable One."

The Blessed One rebuked them, saying that what is not proper conduct for one who has gone forth — what is not fitting, not appropriate, not in accordance with the rule — that should not be done by one who has gone forth. Then the Blessed One, having rebuked them in many ways, addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, having seen ten benefits fully and correctly, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas" — and so forth as before.

"My śrāvakas shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya thus: If a monk obtains a new robe, he shall mar its appearance by dyeing it in one of the three discolouring colours — blue-black, red, or ochre. If a monk wears a new robe without having marred its appearance with one of the three discolouring colours — blue-black, red, or ochre — he commits an offence."

As to the terms of this rule: "a monk" refers to the group of six. "Robe" means any one of the seven kinds: woollen cloth, hemp cloth, silk cloth, muslin cloth, coarse linen cloth, cotton cloth, or a cloth made of a mixture of these. "New" — there are two kinds of new: what is new in the sense of being freshly made, and what is new in the sense of being newly obtained. In this context, it is intended as newly made. "Obtains" means from another. As to "one of the three discolouring colours — blue-black, red, or ochre": blue-black means indigo; red means lac; ochre means tree-bark. "Shall mar its appearance" means to make its colour unattractive.

"If a monk wears a new robe without having marred its appearance with one of the three discolouring colours — blue-black, red, or ochre" means if he wears it. "He commits an offence" means it causes him to be scorched, to be scalded, to fall — to fall into the realms of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of utter downfall.

Furthermore, so long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities. For that reason it is said to cause one to fall. As to how the transgression comes about: whenever a monk obtains any new cloth at all — even a bowl-cover will do — he must mar its appearance with one of the three discolouring colours, blue-black, red, or ochre, whichever is suitable. If a monk uses a new cloth without having marred its appearance with one of those three discolouring colours — blue-black, red, or ochre — he incurs a transgression in every instance. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations.

This is the fifty-eighth rule giving rise to transgression, concerning the wearing of robes without marring their appearance, and it is complete.

As an interlude verse:

The Vulture Peak, the casting away, music, the great Licchavi assembly, the melodious lute, she who holds the deer —
these are the proper collection here.

The Blessed One, the buddha (Skt. buddha), was dwelling at Rājagṛha on Vulture Peak. Then one morning the Blessed One donned his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and his Dharma robe, and came down from Vulture Peak. The venerable Ānanda followed close behind him. As they proceeded to Rājagṛha for alms, the Blessed One saw that in that direction a radiance of water had fallen and was shimmering and glowing, for a treasure hidden there by people of the first aeon had been caused to rain down by a god. Having seen this, the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda, "Ānanda, that is a swiftly spreading serpent-venom." The venerable Ānanda replied, "Blessed One, it is indeed a fierce serpent-venom." "Ānanda, it is a swiftly spreading serpent-venom." "O Sugata, it is indeed a fierce serpent-venom."

Now nearby, not very far away, there was a man who was living by gleaning leftover curds, with only a stump remaining of his crops and roots. He heard this exchange and thought: "I can see the swiftly spreading serpent-venom, but I cannot see any fierce serpent-venom. What then might the fierce serpent-venom of the ascetics who are sons of the Śākya be like? I myself wander through this area day and night, and if I were to be seized by some fierce serpent-venom it would be terrible — how would I escape?" And so he went over to that spot. When he arrived, he saw a treasure shimmering and glowing, and he thought: "The fierce serpent-venom of the ascetics who are sons of the Śākya is beautiful! The fierce serpent-venom of the ascetics who are sons of the Śākya is truly excellent! With a fierce serpent-venom such as this, even seizing one's own unloved father and mother would be easy. Even seizing one's children, one's wife, one's maidservants, one's workers, those who live by gleaning curds, one's friends and companions, one's ministers, one's relatives, and one's dearest kin by blood — even all of that would be easily done." And so that man wrapped up the treasure in bundles of leaves and carried it home step by step, bit by bit.

Now at the time when Ajātaśatru, king born of the noble lady Vaidehī, who had come from Māgadha, had been surrounded and misled by the evil companion Devadatta, and his righteous father, the Dharma-king Bimbisāra, had been separated from his life — when Ajātaśatru himself had been bound with the diadem and installed as the sovereign lord of royal dominion — at that time he commanded those who lived by gleaning leftover curds: "Wise ones, go and look — whatever assemblies there are, whatever provisions there are, whatever it is by which people live: examine all of this." Then those men who lived on gleaned curds, following the royal command, obeyed King Ajātaśatru, born of the noble lady Vaidehī from Māgadha, and

When those men who lived by gleaning the king's leftover curds were wandering through the quarters, they saw that man making his household prosperous. They said to him: "My friend, you are poor — you survive by selling roots and fruits, root and branch alike, and by stringing together a meager living. Whence has this household prosperity of yours come? Have you found a treasure?" He replied: "I have indeed found a treasure. I have this prosperity now, but previously, when there was a king who did not act in accordance with the Dharma, I did not bring it forth. Now, however, a king who does act in accordance with the Dharma has arisen, and that is why I am building up my household prosperity. As for the king Rūpaṣeṇaḥṛdaya, his palace, his retinue, and the people of the realm are pleased with him — but he is not one who acts in accordance with the Dharma. As for King Ajātaśatru, the palace, his retinue, and the people of the realm are not pleased with him — and yet he is a king who acts in accordance with the Dharma." They replied: "My friend, if King Rūpaṣeṇaḥṛdaya, who acts in accordance with the Dharma, does not in fact act in accordance with the Dharma, and if the one who killed his own father turns out to be the one who acts in accordance with the Dharma — do you know who we are?" He replied: "I know. You are men who live on the king's leftover curds, and through your very eyes the king will come to see."

They said: "My friend, do not deceive us with lies. Take half of the treasure you found for yourself, and give the other half to us." He replied: "I have found a treasure, and it is indeed mine — nevertheless, be satisfied with a gift of a third." They thereupon seized him, bound both his arms behind his back, strung a cord through his collar, and brought him before the king, saying: "Your majesty, this man has found a treasure." The king said: "My friend, do you know who I am? I pay homage to you — the four guardians of the world do guard the world. You yourself are the fifth guardian of the world, a kṣatriya king anointed on the crown, who protects living beings." Then: "My friend, do not deceive me with lies about the treasure you found. Speak the truth — take half for yourself and give half to me." He said: "Your majesty, I have found a treasure." Then: "My friend, since you found a treasure, give me a third of it." He said: "Your majesty, I have found a treasure." The king grew angry and said to his ministers: "Wise ones, what is the punishment for one who has interrupted three times the word of a kṣatriya king anointed on the crown?" They replied: "Your majesty, the punishment is death." The king said: "Wise ones, let this man be banished completely. Let his relatives be made to crawl on their bellies. And let all his wealth be presented to the royal palace." Then the ministers, saying "As your majesty commands," and obeying King Ajātaśatru — son of the noble lady Vaidehī, born in Māgadhā — had that man's relatives thrown into prison, and all his wealth was presented to the royal palace. As for the man himself, he was bound around the neck with red karavīra blossoms by men dressed in dark blue garments bearing swords in their hands, and was being led away to the place of execution. As he went he called out:

"Ānanda! A snake's venom spreads swiftly.

O Blessed One, a snake's venom is fierce.

Ānanda! A snake's venom spreads swiftly.

O Sugata, a snake's venom is fierce."

Now that king's custom was such that, when a man condemned to death was questioned, he would give a different answer — and as long as one had not yet petitioned the king, the execution would not be carried out for the time being. So the ministers said to the king:

"Your Majesty, when that man is questioned by others, he gives a different answer." The king said, "Bring him here." The ministers brought him, and the king asked, "My dear man, what are you saying?" He replied, "Ānanda! A snake's venom spreads swiftly. O Blessed One, a snake's venom is fierce. Ānanda! A snake's venom spreads swiftly. O Sugata, a snake's venom is fierce." The king said, "My dear man, what is the meaning of what you have said? Your Majesty, please grant me fearlessness." The king said, "It is granted." The man then recounted the matter in full, and spoke these words: "If a swift-spreading snake's venom had seized me, then I alone would have met my appointed time. But it was a fierce snake's venom that seized me, and on account of that, I and all my kinsmen and all my wealth have been made to suffer unjustly."

Now at that time the king of Magadha (Skt. Magadha), Ajātaśatru, son of Vaidehī, had not long before come to faith in the Blessed One, and so he said, "My dear man, do you have sincere faith in the Blessed One?" The man replied, "Your Majesty, I do have sincere faith." Then the king of Magadha, Ajātaśatru, son of Vaidehī, was moved to tears and said, "My dear man, what happened to you was done by you yourself — go now." The king then gave orders to the jailers: "Release this man's kinsmen, and return to him all his wealth." The jailers released his kinsmen and returned all his wealth.

Then that man thought to himself: "Whatever prosperity and good fortune I have in my home, all of it is owing to the Blessed One. I shall therefore invite the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks to another house and offer them a midday meal." So the man went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One fully instructed that man with a Dharma teaching, fully established him in it, fully praised him, and fully gladdened him. With many words he fully taught him with a Dharma teaching, fully established him in it, fully praised him, and fully gladdened him, and then said nothing further.

Then that man rose from his seat, bowed with joined palms turned toward the Blessed One, and addressed the Blessed One thus: "Would the Blessed One kindly consent to accept tomorrow, together with the Saṅgha of monks, a midday meal at my dwelling?" The Blessed One consented to the man's request by his silence. Knowing from the Blessed One's silence that the invitation was accepted, the man prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and departed from the presence of the Blessed One.

That very night the man made the preparations, and in the morning rose early, set out the seats, placed water vessels, and invited the Blessed One with the words: "Venerable one, may the Blessed One please be mindful that the time for the midday meal has now come." Then the Blessed One, in the early morning, put on his lower robe, took up his begging bowl and robe, and surrounded by an assembly of monks, with the Saṅgha of monks proceeding before him, went to the place where that man's dwelling was, arrived there, and took his seat on the prepared seat at the head of the Saṅgha of monks.

Then, perceiving that the Buddha and the Saṅgha of monks were comfortably settled, the man served them with pure and choice drink and food from his own hand, satisfying them fully. In many different ways he served pure and choice drink and food from his own hand, filling them to contentment. Then, perceiving that the Blessed One had finished his meal and set aside his bowl, he bowed with joined palms, and taking a seat lower than the Blessed One's, sat down before him to listen to the Dharma.

Then the Blessed One, having understood that man's thoughts, latent tendencies, temperament, and nature, taught the Dharma in such a way that, as that man sat there together with his wife, the peak of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection — twenty heights high — was shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry was directly realized. Having seen the truth, the man said in petition: "Venerable one, through relying on the Blessed One as my virtuous friend, what the Blessed One has done for me here is something my father did not do, nor did my mother, nor did the king, nor did the gods, nor did my ancestors of old, nor did the ascetics and brahmins, nor did the assembly of friends, companions, and relatives. You have dried the ocean of blood and tears; you have freed me from the mountain of bones; you have closed the doors to the lower realms; you have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation; you have drawn my feet out of the hells, the realm of hungry ghosts, and the animal realm; you have placed me among gods and humans; you have brought cyclic existence to an end. The peak of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection — twenty heights high — accumulated since beginningless time, has been shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry has been obtained. Venerable one, I have directly entered the stream. I have directly entered the stream. Venerable one, I take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the Saṅgha of monks. I humbly request to be received as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I take refuge with faith from the depths of my heart."

Then the Blessed One instructed that man with a Dharma-endowed discourse, correctly establishing him, correctly uplifting him, and filling him with joy. Then he rose from his seat and departed.

Now at this point the awakened Blessed One had not yet established a rule of training for the hearers within the Vinaya. The awakened Blessed One was residing in Rājagṛha, in the Kalandaka's Grove of the Bamboo Forest.

The venerable Śārika dressed in the early morning, took his begging bowl and robe, and entered Rājagṛha for alms. As he was making his alms-round, he saw a place where archery was being practiced, and went there. There was no archery master, but some boys were standing about, and he asked them: "Boys, what are you doing?" They replied: "Noble one, we are learning archery." Śārika said: "Good, boys — you have surpassed the highest craft! Boys, practice shooting to the left, shooting to the right, footwork, gripping the bow, throwing the lasso, shooting a great arrow, cutting, piercing, bending back, the single-pointed vajra shot, and casting a single-pointed weapon." And they began to practice shooting to the left, shooting to the right, footwork, gripping the bow, throwing the lasso, shooting a great arrow, cutting, piercing, bending back, the single-pointed vajra shot, and casting a single-pointed weapon.

Śārika clasped his two hands together and turned his face aside. They said: "Noble one, why do you clasp your two hands together and turn your face aside?" Śārika said: "Even your teacher does not know this — how should you be expected to understand it?" They said: "Noble one, do you know something of this?" Śārika said: "Boys, what is the craft or occupation on earth that I do not know?" They said: "Noble one, please perform shooting to the left, shooting to the right, footwork, gripping the bow, throwing the lasso, shooting a great arrow, cutting, piercing, and bending back." So Śārika performed shooting to the left, shooting to the right, footwork, gripping the bow, and throwing the lasso in a manner that no one else could replicate, and, binding himself with a belt and taking up a round shield, he also performed cutting, piercing, and bending back. They were filled with amazement and said: "Noble one, excellent! Excellent!" Śārika said: "Boys, you should train in the craft in this way — or else seek another teacher! What use is it to stand about like husks of fruitless grain?" And with that he departed.

Presently their teacher arrived and said: "Boys, why are you standing about? Do your shooting to the left, shooting to the right, footwork, gripping the bow, throwing the lasso, shooting a great arrow, cutting, piercing, bending back, the single-pointed vajra shot, and casting a single-pointed weapon!" They clasped their two hands together and turned their faces aside, saying: "Master, you yourself still know nothing of this — how are we supposed to look at you?" The teacher said: "Boys, when something unprecedented like this has occurred, has someone come here?" They replied: "Yes." "Who?" "The noble Śārika. He performed shooting to the left, shooting to the right, footwork, gripping the bow, throwing the lasso, shooting a great arrow, cutting, piercing, bending back, the single-pointed vajra shot, and casting a single-pointed weapon in such a way that no one could match it." He also said to them: "He has trained with the very one from whom a bodhisattva would train in the fundamentals of archery. Were he not gone forth into renunciation, he would become the supreme archery master throughout all of Jambudvīpa. Still, whatever I know, learn that from me, and for the rest learn from others."

The teacher thought to himself: "He will keep coming back to challenge me — I had better go to him." And so he went to Śārika and said: "Noble Śārika, have you come to the place where we practice our archery?" Śārika said: "I have." "Noble one, did you discipline the boys somewhat?" Śārika said: "I disciplined them." He said: "Noble one, those boys are my livelihood — please do not discipline them further. You are a poor man; you live by our craft. Will you not give us even a small fee for our service?" Śārika replied: "Noble one, I am destitute." Śārika said: "Poor man, if you do not pay, I shall come back again and again and discipline them." The teacher thought: "If I do not pay his fee, he will keep coming back and disciplining the boys." And so he sold all his archery equipment, paid him his fee, and sat with his heart deeply troubled.

After a time, the teacher's younger friend came and asked: "Friend, why do you sit with your heart so troubled?" He replied: "I have been fined." "By whom?" "By the śramaṇas (wandering renunciants), the sons of the Śākyas." "Why?"

He then recounted the matter in full detail, and the younger friend found the deportment of the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākyas, to be worthy of reproach, and the deportment of the brahmins likewise to be reproach-worthy. In this way he began to revile them, saying: "Even the teachers of archery impose fines," and he spread slander, heaping scorn and insults upon them.

Now at that time the Buddha, the Blessed One, had not yet established rules of training in the Vinaya for the hearers. The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling in Rājagṛha, in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove at the Veṇuvana.

The venerable Śāraka dressed himself in his robes in the early morning, took up his bowl and Dharma robe, and entered Rājagṛha on alms round. As he was going about collecting alms, he came upon a performance ground and entered it. There was no music teacher present; only some boys were gathered there. He asked them: "Boys, what are you doing?" They replied: "Noble one, we are learning music." Śāraka said: "Well done, boys — you have surpassed the master craftsmen. Boys, try performing the six-beat, the sage-style, the earth-holding, the clear-minded, the encircling-ear, the middle-style, and the Keśika." They began to perform the six-beat, the sage-style, the earth-holding, the clear-minded, the encircling-ear, the middle-style, and the Keśika. Then Śāraka clasped his two hands together and turned his face away. They said: "Noble one, why do you clasp your two hands together and turn your face?" Śāraka said: "Even your teacher still does not know it — how would you ever come to know it?" They said: "Noble one, do you know something of it?" Śāraka said: "Boys, is there any craft or professional art on earth that I do not know?" They said: "Noble one, please then perform the six-beat, the sage-style, the earth-holding, the clear-minded, the encircling-ear, the middle-style, and the Keśika for us, quickly, without delay." Śāraka then performed the six-beat, the sage-style, the earth-holding, the clear-minded, the encircling-ear, the middle-style, and the Keśika in such a way that no one else could have done it. They were filled with wonder and said: "Noble one, excellent! Excellent!" Śāraka said: "Boys, you should train in the craft to that standard — otherwise, go find yourself another teacher; there is no point in you sitting here tossing about worthless chaff." And with that, he departed.

Presently their teacher arrived and said: "Boys, just sit and do as you please — perform the six-beat, the sage-style, the earth-holding, the clear-minded, the encircling-ear, the middle-style, and the Keśika." They clasped their two hands together and turned their faces, saying: "Even our teacher still does not know it — how could we come to know it?" The teacher said: "Boys, if there was a transformation of this kind, never seen before, then someone must have come here." They said: "Indeed, someone did come." "Who?" "Noble Śāraka. He performed the six-beat and the rest in a manner that no one else could, to such a degree that no song or dance could match him." The teacher said to them: "The bodhisattva too trained in music at the very performance ground where Śāraka trained in music. If Śāraka had not gone forth into renunciation, he would have become the supreme master of music throughout the whole of Jambudvīpa. Nevertheless, let each of you learn from him whatever he knows, and learn the remainder from someone else."

The teacher then thought to himself: "This man will keep coming here and putting me to shame. I had better go to him." He went to Śāraka and said: "Noble Śāraka, have you come to our performance ground?" Śāraka replied: "I have." "Noble one, did you discipline the boys even a little?" Śāraka replied: "I disciplined them." The teacher then said:

"Noble one, you are my livelihood — do not discipline the boys too harshly. You are a poor man; we make our living by the performing arts. Will you not give us even a small fee for your stay?" Śāraka replied: "Noble one, I am destitute." Śāraka said: "Poor man, if you will not pay, I shall come again and again and discipline them." Śāraka thought to himself: "If I do not pay this man his fee for lodging, he will come again and again and discipline the boys." So he sold all his musical instruments, paid the man his lodging fee, and sat there deeply troubled.

After some time, a younger friend of his came to visit and asked him: "Friend, why do you sit so troubled?" He replied: "I have been fined." "By whom?" "By the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākyans." "Why?" The man then recounted what had happened in full. Now the conduct of the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākyans, was a subject of talk, and the conduct of the brahmins was a subject of talk. People were criticizing them, saying that even masters of music impose fines, and they were mocking them and speaking ill of them.

Now this was a time when the Blessed One, the buddha, had not yet established a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya. Then the Blessed One, having stayed as long as he wished in Rājagṛha, set out wandering on tour in the direction of Vaiśālī, and in due course arrived at Vaiśālī, where he took up residence in the excellent multi-storied dwelling on the bank of the Monkey Pool. In the morning, the venerable Ānanda put on his lower robe, took up his bowl and outer robe, and entered Vaiśālī for alms. At the same time, a great many young Licchavī boys came out of Vaiśālī. Outside the city they set aside all their ornaments in one place and began to play. Ānanda saw them and, thinking the ornaments were the property of a yakṣa, took them all and went on his way. The young Licchavī boys of Vaiśālī then seized Ānanda — some by the hands, some by the feet, some by his outer robe — saying: "Noble one, why do you steal our ornaments?" A senior Licchavī who saw the young Licchavī boys of Vaiśālī seizing Ānanda and raising their fists said: "Boys, why do you raise your fists against the noble Ānanda?" They replied: "He has stolen our ornaments." He said: "Noble Ānanda, why did you take the boys' ornaments?" Ānanda replied: "I found them and thought they were a yakṣa's property." The senior Licchavī said: "If these seem like a yakṣa's property to you — these are the ornaments of young men — please return them without taking them." Ānanda set them down, and then went to the monastery with his outer robe soiled with dust. The monks said to him: "Venerable Ānanda, why are you soiled with so much dust?" Ānanda replied: "May the senior Licchavī be well. I found what I took to be a yakṣa's property and had to set it down."

Now this too was a time when the Blessed One, the buddha, had not yet established a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya. The Blessed One was residing at Vaiśālī in the excellent multi-storied dwelling on the bank of the Monkey Pool. The Group of Six, in the morning, put on their lower robes, took up their bowls and outer robes, and entered Vaiśālī for alms. Along the way, there were pleasure gardens belonging to the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī, and the Licchavīs said:

"Dear friends, the Blessed One obtained these pleasure gardens from the gods of the thirty-three who belong to the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī — come and look at what those gardens are like." So they entered there. And in the gardens there were various kinds of supplies of this sort: bathing lotions, tooth-cleaning twigs, unguents, combs, incense, emblic myrobalan, hair-washing preparations, lutes, milk, mahātī, woolly blankets, and sughoṣaka instruments — all laid out. And those who were there said, "Dear friends, shall we bathe first, or shall we sing and dance?" Those others replied, "We have been singing and dancing for a long time — let us sing and dance again." And so they began to sing and dance.

Now whatever sound of music had been performed in the pleasure garden of King Śuddhodana, that very sound was the sound of the music performed on the battlefield of King Ajātaśatru, the son born of Vaidehī. When they struck up that music, the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī heard it. Hearing it, they were startled and said, "Good people, the patricide has raised his army and come upon us without warning!" They armed themselves and began to rush out.

The Group of Six had also left that pleasure garden just then. Seeing the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī arming themselves and rushing out, the Group of Six asked them, "Good people, where are you going?" They replied, "The patricide has come, and we are heading out to meet him in battle." "Where is he?" "Just now," they said, "the sound of the music performed on the battlefield of King Ajātaśatru, the son born of Vaidehī, arose here." The Group of Six said, "Good people, is that so? We were the ones who were making merry — surely you are not fleeing in such a panic because of us?" The Licchavīs said, "Noble ones, was it your musical instruments that produced that sound?" The Group of Six replied, "We were the ones who made that sound." The Licchavīs said, "Noble ones, the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī were alarmed, and it is not right that they be harmed on your account — please turn back." They turned back.

Then the monks said to the Group of Six, "Venerable ones, why did you turn back?" The Group of Six replied, "Venerable ones, we killed those men." "Who did?" "The Licchavīs of Vaiśālī did." "Why?" They gave a full account of the circumstances. A few of the monks who were modest said, "Why do monks do something so unseemly?" and they rebuked them, insulted them, and spoke against them. Then those monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, on account of this occasion, convened an assembly of the community of monks — and so forth, just as before. "The blessed buddhas, while knowing, ask questions" — and so forth again, just as before.

The blessed Buddha questioned the Group of Six: "Monks, is it true that you did such an unseemly thing?" "It is true, Reverend One." The blessed Buddha rebuked them, saying that what is improper for a monk, what is incongruous, what is unfitting, what is contrary to the discipline — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth. Having rebuked them in this and in many ways, the Blessed One then declared to the monks:

"Monks, seeing the ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the discipline is to be established" — and so forth, just as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the discipline as follows: 'Furthermore, whatever monk takes with his own hand, or causes to be taken, a precious object or what is regarded as a precious object, he commits an offense.'" Thus did the Blessed One establish this rule of training for the hearers in the discipline.

Thereafter, the Blessed One stayed in Vaiśālī as long as he wished, and then set out wandering by stages toward Śrāvastī. Traveling on stage by stage, he arrived at Śrāvastī and there dwelt in the eastern park, in the mansion of Mṛgāramātṛ.

Now Mṛgāramātṛ Sāgā heard that the Blessed One had been traveling through the Kośāla regions, had arrived at Śrāvastī, and was staying there at her own mansion. Hearing this, she adorned herself with all her ornaments and came forth from Śrāvastī to where the Blessed One was. Being a person of modesty, however, she removed her ornaments, bundled them up, and gave them into her daughter's hands. She then went before the Blessed One, bowed her head to his two feet, and sat down to one side. Not far from where she sat there was a branch of a campaka tree in full blossom. She saw it and thought to herself: "I shall pluck flowers from this and scatter loose petals over the Blessed One — that will be a fine offering." So she set aside the bundle of ornaments to one side, plucked flowers from that campaka branch, scattered the loose petals over the Blessed One, and sat down to one side. The Blessed One taught her the Dharma at length, after which she bowed to his feet and departed — and in that very spot she forgot and left behind the bundle of ornaments.

The venerable Ānanda saw that she had left the ornaments behind and departed, and he thought to himself: "Although the Blessed One has not yet permitted it, this could serve as a cause through which something of this nature might come to be permitted." So the venerable Ānanda had the ornaments stored away, then went to where the Blessed One was, bowed his head to his two feet, and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Ānanda addressed the Blessed One thus: "Reverend One, Mṛgāramātṛ Sāgā forgot her ornaments and departed, and it occurred to me: 'Although the Blessed One has not permitted it, this could serve as the very cause through which what is to be permitted might come to be permitted in such a case.' So I had those ornaments stored away."

"Ānanda, it is well that you perceived what I am going to permit. Well done! Ānanda, for that reason, when staying in the park of the pleasure grove or when staying within a dwelling, with the exception of those places: since it is in the nature of women to be attached to ornaments, the next day Sāgā remembered the ornaments and said to her daughter: 'Daughter, where are the ornaments?' The daughter replied: 'Lady, you left them there yourself.' She said: 'Go and retrieve them.' Her sons, hearing this, said: 'Mother, do you not know they are in the storeroom? How could they have been taken and brought back?' Sāgā said to her sons: 'Children, she is not one who would squander wealth.' Then the daughter went to the venerable Ānanda, and the venerable Ānanda said: 'Daughter, why have you come?' The daughter said: 'Noble one,

'They are here. Take them and go.' The daughter took them and went back to Sāgā and said: 'Lady, here are your ornaments, recovered and returned.' Sāgā said to her sons: 'Children, she has brought back the ornaments. Did I not say she is not one who squanders wealth?' Her sons then asked the daughter: 'Daughter, which noble one hid them away?' The daughter said: 'The noble Ānanda.' They said: 'Because the noble Ānanda saw them, they were simply safeguarded. But if the Group of Six had seen them, there would have been a situation in which what was there would have been consecrated as a finder's fee.' Then they thought: 'Now we shall test whether our mother squanders wealth or not.' They filled some bags with dinars to the size of grain heaps and threw them at a crossroads. People passing by from there, seeing them, abandoned them completely and would not pick them up, saying: 'These spread snake-poison swiftly.' Then those sons said: 'There are bags filled with dinars sitting there, heaped like grain — why does no one take them?' The people replied: 'These spread snake-poison swiftly; they are not bags of grain heaped up with dinars, and so we do not take them.' Then those sons came back and said to their mother: 'Mother, you are indeed not one who squanders wealth.' And everywhere the reputation spread: 'It is true — Sāgā, the mother of Mṛgārīn, is not one who squanders wealth.' A monk belonging to the Ānanda community saw a bag fallen there that was filled with dinars heaped like grain, and a man came in that direction. The monk said to the man: 'My dear friend, is not this grain-like bag yours?' 'It is, noble one.' 'Take it and go.' The man took it and went away quickly. Then another man came, his head covered in dust, weeping, and said: 'Noble one, did you see a bag like a heap of grain?' The monk said: 'A man took it and went away.' That man, not finding the bag, went mad and distraught, searching here and there, and was suffering grievously through improper conduct. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: 'In the same way, one must not speak rashly but should ask that person: What kind of bag like a heap of grain? And ask whether it was a weighing-merchant's.'

If the description matches the marks, one should give it back. If the description does not match the marks, one should not give it back. When they had left it there and gone away, others stole it. The Blessed One declared: 'In the same way, one should not simply leave it and go. Rather, one should conceal it with earth or a covering of leaves beside the path along which people travel.' When they had abandoned it entirely and gone, the Blessed One declared: 'One should not abandon it completely, but should go there and remain for seven or eight days. If the owner comes and describes the marks correctly, one should give it back. If the owner does not come, then after that it should be placed in and kept in the Saṅgha's treasury. If the owner comes after six months have passed and describes the marks correctly, one should give it back. If the owner does not come, then after that the property should be sold for a fair price and the proceeds kept. Should the owner arrive at that time, one should say to him: "This property of yours was sold here; please be satisfied with that." If he is satisfied, that is good. If he is not satisfied, one should give it back to him. If he makes trouble, one should say: "Is it not the case that we who have carefully preserved it deserve some gratitude? Take it and go." Accordingly, it must not be left outside in what belongs to the assembly hall or remain in what belongs to the residential quarters.'

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire training, who are respectful toward training, and who have secured the requisites for training. He then addressed the monks with words appropriate to the occasion, more pronounced on that point, and bearing on Dharma-teachings suited to it, and declared to the monks: 'Monks, therefore what was stated before is a prescribed rule, and this is a permissive allowance. My hearers should recite the following as a training rule in the Vinaya:

Whatever monk receives with his own hand, or causes another to receive, a precious object or what is spoken of as precious, while sitting in what belongs to the assembly hall or sitting in what belongs to the residential quarters — except for sitting in what belongs to the assembly hall or sitting in what belongs to the residential quarters — commits a transgression.

As for the phrase "whatever monk": this refers to the six groups and others of the same kind. As for "a precious object or what is spoken of as precious": a precious object means a jewel, a pearl, beryl, white crystal, coral, gold, silver, the essence of stone, spug, the red one, and the right-coiling one. What is spoken of as precious means all weapons used in battle and all implements used in music. "With his own hand" means hand to hand. "Receives" means he himself does so. "Causes to receive" means another does so. "Sitting in what belongs to the assembly hall" means outside the assembly hall. "Sitting in what belongs to the residential quarters" means inside the assembly hall. "Except for" means leaving aside sitting in what belongs to the assembly hall or sitting in what belongs to the residential quarters. "Commits a transgression" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the miserable realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the places of wrong rebirth. Furthermore, so long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of virtuous Dharma-factors — therefore it is called a transgression. "A monk" means one who belongs to this Dharma. As for "sitting in what belongs to the assembly hall or in what belongs to the residential quarters, a precious object or' a precious object' — thinking, "I wonder whose this is, and who will take it?" — one should take it up with such a thought in mind. As for "that being the proper procedure": that means that is the conforming Dharma-procedure for that situation.

Now, how does a transgression arise in this case?

As the intermediate summary verse states:

Jewels and necklaces, lutes,
Conches and bows and arrows,
Statues together with reliquaries —
These are the last of the earlier rules.

If a monk takes a jewel — if he takes one that has been strung, it incurs a transgression; if he takes one that has not been strung, it incurs a misdeed. Just as with jewels, so too with pearls, beryl, quartz crystal, coral, silver, gold, gemstone essences, turquoise, red gems, and right-spiraling shells — all are the same. Even if a monk takes so much as a tiny chip of a jewel, it incurs a misdeed.

If a monk takes a necklace, it incurs a transgression. Just as with a necklace, so too with bracelets, armlets, a garland hung about the neck, and a shoulder ornament — all are the same. Even if a monk takes so much as a string of seeds, it incurs a misdeed.

If a monk takes a lute — if he takes one fitted with strings, it incurs a transgression; if he takes one without strings, it incurs a misdeed. Just as with a lute, so too with the vīṇā, the Balari, the Mahātī, and the Sughoṣaka — all are the same. Even if a monk takes so much as a mouthpiece, it incurs a misdeed.

If a monk takes a conch — if he takes one that produces sound, it incurs a transgression; if he takes one that does not produce sound, it incurs a misdeed. Just as with a conch, so too with the great drum, the paṭaha drum, and the clay drum — all are the same. Even if a monk takes so much as a single-faced clay drum, it incurs a misdeed.

If a monk takes a bow — if he takes one fitted with a bowstring, it incurs a transgression; if he takes one without a bowstring, it incurs a misdeed. Just as with a bow, so too with a sword, a curved sword, a double-edged sword, a spear, a throwing spear, and an iron hook — all are the same. Even if a monk takes so much as a little bow, it incurs a misdeed.

If a monk takes an arrow — if he takes one fitted with an arrowhead, it incurs a transgression; if he takes one without an arrowhead, it incurs a misdeed. Just as with an arrow, so too with an iron arrow and an arrow whose head is half made of iron — all are the same. Even if a monk takes so much as something fashioned to resemble an arrow, it incurs a misdeed.

If a monk takes a statue — if he takes one with relics, it incurs a transgression; if he takes one without relics, it incurs a misdeed. If one takes it while holding the perception that it is the Teacher, there is no transgression. Likewise, for one who is a novice, or who is mad, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is overcome by painful sensations — there is no transgression.

The monks, having become uncertain, requested the Blessed One, the Buddha, to resolve all their doubts: "Venerable One, what could the mother of Mṛgāra's lord have done such that, through the ripening of that karma, one would never lack for wealth?" The Blessed One declared: "O monks, it is because the mother of Mṛgāra's lord herself performed and accumulated actions that bring results, that transform conditions completely, that abide like a flame, and that are certain to mature — that those actions performed and accumulated by the mother of Mṛgāra's lord herself will be experienced individually by whoever the person may be. O monks, actions that are performed and accumulated do not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, the virtuous and non-virtuous actions that are performed and accumulated ripen in the aggregates, elements, and sense bases that have been appropriated. And:

Even over a hundred eons, actions do not perish —
When the assembly and the time have come together,
They will ripen as fruits for those who bear a body.

O monks, in this very same great and good eon, at a time long past when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, there appeared in the world a Teacher, a Tathāgata, an arhat, a fully and perfectly awakened buddha, perfect in knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, an unsurpassed guide for those who are to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, a buddha, a Blessed One by the name of Kāśyapa. When the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa had performed all the deeds of a buddha and had passed beyond sorrow into the expanse of nirvāṇa without remainder of aggregates, at that time there was a king named Kṛkī whose kingdom was prosperous, flourishing, and at peace, blessed with good harvests, filled with many common folk and people, in which battles, strife, quarrels, and domestic unrest had been thoroughly stilled, and which was free of thieves, famine, and disease, abounding in rice paddies, rows of sugarcane, and herds of cattle and buffalo. He was a righteous king who governed a righteous kingdom. By his authority, a stūpa was built with four kinds of precious substances, one league in breadth and half a league in height, in honor of the Blessed One, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa. At that place there was a single elderly woman who had taken refuge and accepted the precepts, and she dwelt there paying homage and making offerings at the stūpa of the Blessed One, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa.

Then one spring day, when the trees were blossoming and bearing abundant fruit, and groves resounded with the calls of geese, cranes, peacocks, parrots, cuckoos, wagtails, and birds of paradise, King Kṛkī came to the pleasure garden accompanied by his retinue of queens. The king then quickly and swiftly entered Vārāṇasī. The queen's retinue had begun their bathing, hanging garlands of pearls on the branches of the mango trees, when they heard that the king had quickly and swiftly entered Vārāṇasī. In a rush, they forgot the garlands of pearls and left them behind, and entered Vārāṇasī. The elderly woman noticed those garlands of pearls and hung them on a bamboo pole, keeping them there. Since women by nature are fond of adornments, the next day she remembered the jewelry and reported it to the king. The king sent his men of the yogurt-provision to that place, and they saw the garlands of pearls hung on the bamboo pole. They questioned the elderly woman: "Who hung these garlands of pearls on the pole and left them here?" The old woman said, "I did." They presented the garlands of pearls to the king. The king said to his men of the yogurt-provision, "Where did you find these?" They said, "We found them where an elderly woman had hung them on a bamboo pole." The king said, "Call that elderly woman." They called her and said, "Your Majesty, this is that elderly woman." The king said, "Is it true that you hung these garlands of pearls on the bamboo pole and left them there?" The old woman said, "Your Majesty, it is not so." The king said, "Did you not feel any desire for them?" The old woman said, "Your Majesty, since I have taken refuge before the Blessed One, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa, and have accepted the precepts, how could I give rise to a mind of desire for another's belongings?" The king was delighted, and he gave her those very garlands of pearls as a gift.

"Take them — they are yours." The old woman took those garlands of pearls, sold them, and with the proceeds made offerings and acts of veneration at the stūpa of the Blessed One, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa. She prostrated, touching her head to his two feet, and made this aspiration: "By this root of virtue, may I never suffer the destruction of wealth."

Monks, the elderly woman of that time and occasion was none other than this very Sāgā, the mother of Mṛgadharin. Because she made that aspiration at that time, through the karmic maturation of that action, she came never to suffer the destruction of wealth.

Monks, it is thus: the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly dark is itself wholly dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are wholly bright is itself wholly bright; and the karmic maturation of mixed actions is itself mixed. Monks, therefore, abandon actions that are wholly dark and mixed, and seek out actions that are wholly bright. Monks, you should train accordingly.

Here ends the fifty-ninth transgression-producing rule belonging to the category of forfeiture.

The Vinayavibhaṅga (the Exposition of Monastic Discipline), sixtieth fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing at Rājagṛha, in the Bamboo Grove, the abode of the Kalandakas. In Rājagṛha there were three hot springs. At the first, the king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra (the Handsome King of Sound Craft), bathed. At the second, the royal consorts and their retinue bathed. At the third, the townspeople and country folk bathed.

The king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra, thought to himself: "I have served the Blessed One, together with the Saṅgha of hearers, in many ways and with all kinds of requisites — yet I have not served them with a bath. Let me invite the Blessed One, together with the Saṅgha of hearers, to bathe." Having formed this intention, he went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, bowed with his head to the Blessed One's two feet, and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra, addressed the Blessed One in these words:

"Venerable sir, here in Rājagṛha there are three hot springs. At the first, I myself bathe. At the second, my consorts and their retinue bathe. At the third, the townspeople and country folk bathe. Venerable sir, wherever I myself bathe, may the noble ones also bathe; and when the noble ones are bathing, may I remain to one side, and when I am bathing, may the noble ones be pleased to use me as an attendant. And wherever my consorts and their retinue bathe, may the noble women also bathe; and when the noble women are bathing, may my consorts and their retinue remain to one side, and when my consorts and their retinue bathe, may the noble women be pleased to accept their attendance."

The Blessed One granted this by remaining silent and saying nothing to the king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra. Then, knowing that the Blessed One had granted the request by his silence, the king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra, bowed with his head to the Blessed One's two feet and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

The group of six monks had the idea: "Nandā and Upanandā — since the king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra, is a man of faith, let us go see what his faith is like by going to bathe." So they went there to bathe, and they said: "Nandā and Upanandā, if we all bathe at once we will finish quickly. Let two bathe while four assist, then let the next two bathe while four assist."

Then the next two were to bathe while four assisted. "Very well," they agreed, and so two of them began to bathe while the four sat assisting them.

Now at that time the king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra, whose name was Bimbisāra of Rūpasāra, had also come to that place to bathe. He spoke to one of his attendants from among his private guard: "Go inside — go now and see who is bathing." The man replied, "As my lord commands," and obeying the king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra of Rūpasāra, he went there and looked. He saw that the group of six monks were bathing, then returned to the king's presence and said: "Sire, the noble group of six monks are bathing." The king said: "Set up a chair and let us wait." A chair was set up and the king sat down.

After a long time had passed, the king again spoke to one of his private guard: "Go inside — go now and see who is bathing." The man replied, "As my lord commands," and obeying the king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra of Rūpasāra, he went there and looked. He saw again that the group of six monks were still bathing, then returned to the king's presence and said: "Sire, those same noble members of the group of six are still bathing." The king again remained seated in the very same chair.

After yet another long time had passed, the king once more spoke to one of his private guard: "Go inside — go now and see who is bathing." The man replied, "As my lord commands," and obeying the king of Māgadha, Bimbisāra of Rūpasāra, he went there and looked. He saw that even now the group of six monks were still bathing, then returned to the king's presence and said: "Sire, even now those same noble members of the group of six are still bathing." The king said: "Wise ones — they have kept me waiting here a very long time indeed. Bring water, then, and let me bathe with the royal consecration bathing." They brought water, and the king bathed right there with the royal consecration bathing. Then he proceeded to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, bowed with his head to the Blessed One's two feet, and departed from the Blessed One's presence without hearing any Dharma teaching at all.

Then the Blessed One said to the Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, why did King Bimbisāra of Rūpasāra leave without hearing any Dharma?" "Venerable One, King Bimbisāra of Rūpasāra was kept waiting by the group of six monks." "Why? Let that occasion be explained in full."

Then the Blessed One reflected thus: "Whatever fault has arisen has come about from monks bathing. Therefore monks should not bathe." Having so reflected, he declared: "Therefore monks shall not bathe."

After the Blessed One had declared that monks were not to bathe, the monks no longer bathed, and their bodies became smeared with the filth of dirt and began to smell foul. When brahmins and householders said: "Noble ones, who are these foul-smelling ones?" the monks replied: "We are." "Noble ones, why do you not bathe?" "The Blessed One has not permitted it." "Do you think you will become pure by carrying around your filth?" At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit bathing once a fortnight."

After the Blessed One had declared that monks might bathe once a fortnight, the hot season arrived, and the monks, overcome with heat, became pale and wan, emaciated, without gaining comfort for their bodies. Faithful brahmins and householders said to them: "Noble ones, why have you become so pale and haggard, emaciated, feeble, and thin, without gaining comfort for your bodies?" The monks replied: "We are overcome with heat." "Why do you not bathe?" "The Blessed One has not permitted it." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit bathing, except during the hot season."

Some monks then fell ill and went to a physician to ask him: "Good sir, we are sick. Please prescribe medicine for us." He said: "Noble ones, bathe every day and you will recover." "Good sir, the Blessed One has not permitted it." "Noble ones, your Teacher is compassionate; making this very circumstance the occasion, he will surely grant permission. Such a situation will come to pass." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit bathing, except during times of illness."

After the monks had done work for the Saṅgha and for the stūpas, they were standing about covered in mud and filth when faithful brahmins and householders arrived and asked them: "Noble ones, why are you standing about covered in mud and filth? What harm is there in bathing?" "The Blessed One has not permitted it." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit bathing, except during times of work."

When monks had been out travelling and returned from their journey, they were prostrated with exhaustion from the heat and lay down to rest, and faithful brahmins and householders arrived and asked them: "Noble ones, if you are devoted to the Teaching above all else, why are you lying down prostrated and not exerting yourselves in virtue?" The monks replied: "We have been travelling, and being overcome with heat we have lain down prostrated and are unable to exert ourselves in virtue. What harm is there in bathing?" "The Blessed One has not permitted it." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit bathing, except during times of travel."

Wind arose and the monks became covered in dust, and as they were standing there just as they were, faithful brahmins and householders arrived, saw them, and asked: "Noble ones, why are you standing about covered in dust? What harm is there in bathing?" "The Blessed One has not permitted it." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit bathing, except during times of wind."

Rain fell and the monks became thoroughly drenched and were standing there just as they were when faithful brahmins and householders came to the temple hall and asked them: "Noble ones, why are you standing about soaked through by the rain? What harm is there in bathing?" "The Blessed One has not permitted it." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit bathing, except during times of rain."

A muddy rain fell and the monks' bodies became blotched and streaked, and as they were standing there just as they were, faithful brahmins and householders came to the temple hall and asked: "Noble ones, why are you standing about with your bodies blotched and streaked? What harm is there in bathing?"

"The Blessed One has not permitted it." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit bathing, except during times of muddy rain."

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire training, who revere training, and who are furnished with the requisites for training, and having addressed the monks with words in accord with this, rich in this meaning, and with teachings befitting it, he declared to the monks: "Monks, what was stated before is a rule, and what follows is a permission. My hearers should uphold this as a training basis in the Vinaya in the following manner: if one bathes more frequently than once a fortnight as taught by the Blessed One — except at permitted times — it is a downfall. The permitted times are these: the last two half-months of the hot season; the first half-month of the rains seasons; these three half-months constitute the hot season. The remaining times are: the time of illness; the time of work; the time of travel; the time of wind; the time of rain; and the time of muddy rain. These are the permitted times."

As for the phrase "as declared by the Blessed One" — it is by the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened Buddha.

As for "once a fortnight as declared for bathing" — it refers to each half of the lunar month.

As for "if one bathes more frequently than that" — it means bathing more often than once per fortnight.

As for "except at permitted times" — the times are set out here.

As for "it is a downfall" — it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and into wrong downfalls. Furthermore, for as long as the downfall is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs virtuous phenomena. Therefore it is said to be a downfall.

As for "the permitted times are these: the last two half-months of the hot season; the first half-month of the rains seasons; these three half-months constitute the hot season" — the last two half-months of the hot season refers to those two half-months during which the rains retreat draws near: from the first day of the middle summer month up to the fifteenth of that same middle summer month, those two half-months. As for "the first of the rains seasons" — it refers to the first month of those who have undertaken the rains retreat: from the sixteenth day of the middle summer month up to the fifteenth of the last summer month, that one month.

As for "the time of illness" — it is as follows: when a monk is unable to sustain life without bathing.

As for "the time of work" — it is as follows: when a monk sweeps even a small section of the Saṅgha's or a stūpa's grounds, or plasters even a small circle of the mandala-floor.

As for "the time of travel" — it is as follows: when a monk has traveled one league or half a league and returned.

As for "the time of wind" — it is as follows: even when the wind has stirred the hem of one's robe.

As for "the time of rain" — it is as follows: even when two or three drops of rain have fallen on the body.

As for "the time of muddy rain" — it is as follows: even when a muddy rain has stirred the hem of one's robe and two or three drops of rain have fallen on the body.

As for "these are the permitted times" — in each case, that is the corresponding permitted condition.

Now, how does a transgression arise? If a monk bathes using a consecration bath in the form of an empowerment (abhiṣeka), he must at that time bless it accordingly.

If one bathes without having blessed the permitted time, then for as long as the water has not reached the navel it is an offense of wrongdoing, and once the water reaches the navel it becomes a downfall.

If a monk bathes using an immersion bath, he must bless it as a permitted time. If he bathes without having blessed the permitted time, then for as long as the water has not reached the navel it is an offense of wrongdoing, and once the water reaches the navel it becomes a downfall.

If a monk, having bathed using a consecration bath in the form of an empowerment, then bathes using an immersion bath, he must bless it as a permitted time. If he bathes without having blessed the permitted time, then for as long as the water has not reached the navel it is an offense of wrongdoing, and once the water reaches the navel it becomes a downfall.

If a monk bathes in a slow-flowing river, he must bless it as a permitted time. If he bathes without having blessed the permitted time, then for as long as the water has not reached the navel it is an offense of wrongdoing, and once the water reaches the navel it becomes a downfall.

If a monk bathes in a swift-flowing river, he must bless it as a permitted time. If he bathes without having blessed the permitted time, then for as long as the water has not reached the navel it is an offense of wrongdoing, and once the water reaches the navel it becomes a downfall.

If a monk, having bathed in a slow-flowing river, then bathes in a swift-flowing river, he must bless it as a permitted time. Some monks, when crossing a river, felt regret afterward. The Blessed One declared: "There is no need for regret in such a case. If one wished to bathe, one should have blessed it as a permitted time and then bathed."

Some monks, thinking the ground was dry, entered the water, and having fallen in there, regret arose in them. The Blessed One then declared:

"There is no need for regret in such a case. If one wished to bathe, one should have blessed it as a permitted time and then bathed."

Likewise, when monks fell into water through inattentiveness while walking about, or when water was thrown onto someone who had fainted, regret arose in them. The Blessed One declared: "There is no need for regret in such a case. If one wished to bathe, one should have blessed it as a permitted time and then bathed. For one who is a first offender, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is overcome by feeling, there is no downfall."

This completes the sixtieth offense pertaining to bathing.

Summary verse:

An animal, regret, a finger, shooting alongside another, causing fright, concealment, no support, no ground, and traveling without a man — these are the cases.

The buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Cāraka, in the early morning, having put on his lower robe and taken up his bowl and outer robe, entered Śrāvastī for alms. Having made his alms round there, he saw an archery training ground and entered it. The archery master being absent, some boys were gathered there. He asked the boys: "Boys, what are you doing?" They replied: "Noble one, the archery master Cāraka told us: 'Boys, excellent! You have set your eyes on mastering the supreme craft. Shoot to the left, shoot to the right, and release five arrows.' " And they had begun to shoot to the left, to shoot to the right, and to release five arrows. He then twined his two hands together and contorted his face.

They asked: "Noble one, why do you twine your two hands together? Why do you contort your face?" Cāraka said: "Even your own master does not know this — could you come to know it by watching?" They replied: "Noble one, does he have some knowledge of this?" Cāraka said: "There is no craft and no field of work on earth that I do not know." They said: "Noble one, please be so kind as to demonstrate — shoot to the left, shoot to the right, and release five arrows." Cāraka said: "Bring a bow." They offered a bow. Cāraka said: "This bow is like a bow of wool-felt. Bring another bow." They offered a second and a third, and Cāraka said: "These too are like bows of wool-felt. Bring your master's bow." They offered the master's bow, and Cāraka said: "This one seems to have some measure of tension." He then bent the bow as if it were a bow of wool-felt, drew the string taut, and sent forth its resonant twang, whereupon a flock of crows began to fly about in the sky above. Cāraka said: "Which shall it be — shall I pierce this crow in the tail and bring it down by the mouth, or pierce it in the mouth and bring it down by the tail?" They replied: "Noble one, please pierce it in the tail and bring it down by the mouth." Cāraka shot one arrow into the sky to the east, then one arrow each into the sky to the south, the west, and the north, and the crow, turning its beak upward, began to fly. Cāraka then shot a single arrow after it, piercing it in the tail so that it came out through the mouth, and the crow fell to the ground. Those boys were struck with wonder and stood there, deeply impressed.

Cāraka said: "Boys, you must train in the craft in this manner, or else seek another master — what is the point of sitting about tossing up the husks of something fruitless?" Having said this, he departed.

Those boys stood there deeply impressed, and after some time their master arrived. He asked: "Boys, why do you stand there so deeply impressed? Shoot to the left — to the right, shoot five arrows — those hands will spin and the face will turn." The master said: "Boys, when a transformation of this kind, unseen before, has occurred here, could it be that someone has come? Who was that noble Cāraka, and what did he do?" "He shot five arrows, pierced this crow in the tail, and brought the arrow out through its mouth." The master said: "Boys, wherever the bodhisattva has trained in the archer's stance, and in that very stance this one too has trained — if he does not go forth into the renunciant life, he will become the supreme master of archery throughout all of Jambudvīpa. Yet for now, learn from me what I know, and learn the rest from others."

He then thought: "Again and again this one will become my equal, and so I wish to be displeased with him." He therefore said to those boys: "Boys, do you wish the renowned and widespread sound and assemblage of Cāraka's fame to be celebrated in every direction and quarter?" They replied: "We do." He said: "When the noble Cāraka goes on his alms round, take the carcass of this crow, fix it on the tip of a long bamboo pole, follow directly behind the venerable Cāraka, and proclaim to all people: 'Look — the noble Cāraka shot five arrows thus, piercing this crow in the tail and bringing the arrow out through its mouth!' And even if you are told to turn back, do not turn back."

The next day, the venerable Cāraka rose in the morning, put on his lower garment, took up his bowl and his monastic robe, and went on his alms round in Śrāvastī. When those boys saw him, they fixed the carcass of the crow to the tip of a long bamboo pole, followed directly behind the venerable Cāraka, and proclaimed to all people: "Look — the noble Cāraka shot five arrows thus and pierced this crow in the tail, bringing the arrow out through its mouth!"

When Cāraka saw them he said: "Boys, why do you try to exalt me? Turn back!" But when they did not turn back, they kept up that proclamation, and the brahmins and householders, the learned ones, began to say: "These śramaṇas (Skt. śramaṇa), sons of the Śākyans, are killers — they do not refrain from killing, have not abandoned it, have not individually abandoned it. O learned ones, look — these śramaṇas, sons of the Śākyans, kill in just this way: even the hide of a sentient being is of no use to them, nor its flesh, nor its sinews, nor its bones, yet they kill like this. Who would think to give alms to these tonsured śramaṇas?" They reviled them, made a great outcry, and spoke ill of them. At that juncture the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Then the Blessed One, in connection with this event, this occasion, and this circumstance, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth, as before. "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, feign not to know" — and so forth, as before.

The awakened Blessed One asked Cāraka: "Cāraka, is it true that you did this unseemly thing?" "Venerable one, it is so." The awakened Blessed One then formally rebuked him, declaring: "This is not the conduct of a śramaṇa, it is not fitting, it is not proper, it is not in accord with the training — this is not what one who has gone forth should do." Then, having rebuked him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks:

"Monks, seeing these ten benefits fully, I establish the rule of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My śrāvakas are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk intentionally kills a living being belonging to the animal realm incurs a transgression."

Now, "whatever monk" refers to Cāraka or anyone else of that kind. "Intentionally" means after having deliberated. "A living being belonging to the animal realm" means a crow or any other creature of that kind. "Kills" means causes the cessation of its life. "Incurs a transgression" — this is said because it scorches, burns, and causes one to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the wretched states of existence. Furthermore, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities of the Dharma — and therefore it is called a transgression.

As for how the transgression comes about, a summary verse:

Seized by oneself, or launched from without, or involving both together — these are the fully gathered categories.

How does "seized by oneself" apply? When a monk, with the intention to kill a living being belonging to the animal realm, thinking, "May this action that I am now undertaking bring about its death," presses it with one finger, and if through that very undertaking it does indeed die, the monk incurs a transgression. If it does not die at that time but dies thereafter from that cause, the monk incurs a transgression. If it does not die at that time and does not die thereafter from that cause either, then the monk commits an offense through that earlier act of effort itself.

In the same way as with one finger — pressing with the thought "May this action that I am now undertaking bring about its death" — so too with two fingers, or three, or four, or five, or with the fist, or the elbow, or the shoulder, or the head, or the hip, or the thigh, or the knee, or the shin, or the heel, or the sole of the foot, or even with the big toe — if through that very undertaking it dies, the monk incurs a transgression. If it does not die at that time but dies thereafter from that cause, the monk incurs a transgression. If it does not die at that time and does not die thereafter from that cause either, the monk commits an offense through that earlier act of effort itself. Such is the case of "seized by oneself."

How does "launched from without" apply? When a monk, with the intention to kill a living being belonging to the animal realm, thinking "May this action that I am now undertaking bring about its death," shoots it with an arrow, and if through that very undertaking it dies, the monk incurs a transgression. If it does not die at that time but dies thereafter from that cause, the monk incurs a transgression. If it does not die at that time and does not die thereafter from that cause either, the monk commits an offense through that earlier act of effort itself.

In the same way as with an arrow — with the thought "May this action that I am now undertaking bring about its death" — so too with an iron arrow, or a half-arrow tipped with iron, or a blunt-ended shaft, or a small blade with teeth like a saw, or a quadrangular blade, or a blade shaped like a karṇikāra leaf, or a blade shaped like a bird's heart, or a discus, or a single-pointed vajra, or a large arrow, or a single-pointed weapon, or even with the fruit of a cypress tree — if through that very undertaking it dies, the monk incurs a transgression.

If it does not die at that time but dies afterward from that same cause, the monk incurs a transgression. If it neither dies at that time nor dies afterward from that same cause, the monk incurs a wrongdoing through that very earlier act of undertaking. That is how it is with what is hurled outward.

As for how it applies when both factors are present: when a monk, with the intention to kill a living creature belonging to the animal realm, undertakes an action with the thought "May this undertaking that I now begin cause it to die at this time," and pierces it with a sword — and if through that very undertaking it does die at that time, the monk incurs a transgression. If it does not die at that time but dies afterward from that same cause, the monk incurs a transgression. If it neither dies at that time nor dies afterward from that same cause, the monk incurs a wrongdoing through that very earlier act of undertaking.

Just as with a sword, so too — with the thought "May this undertaking that I now begin cause it to die at this time" — if one pierces it with a knife, or a single-edged blade, or a double-edged blade, or a lance, or a throwing spear, or a pointed digging tool, or a whip, or even with a grass arrow, and through that very undertaking it dies at that time, the monk incurs a transgression. If it does not die at that time but dies afterward from that same cause, the monk incurs a transgression. If it neither dies at that time nor dies afterward from that same cause, the monk incurs a wrongdoing through that very earlier act of undertaking. That is how it applies when both factors are present.

There is no transgression for a first offender, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by intense feeling.

This concludes the sixty-first section on the transgressions of killing animals.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana had completed the going forth and full ordination of the assembly of the seventeen groups — including Neighboring Monastery and so forth, and the novice Sāra — those groups began to associate with, draw close to, and pay homage to the Group of Six.

Thereupon the venerable Chāraka said to the seventeen groups: "All seventeen groups, come here. Do such-and-such." They replied: "Are you our preceptor? Are you our abbot? Why should we do anything for you?" Chāraka said: "Fools! Then what else would you do?" And grabbing them by their collars, he drove them out. They then said to some venerable monks: "Whatever reproach we have suffered at the hands of the Group of Six has come about entirely because we had little learning. We wish to take hold of more learning, and therefore henceforth we shall have no need whatsoever to inquire of the Group of Six." Saying this, they went to a certain monk and said: "Venerable one, please give us a reading." He told them that it would be beneficial for them, and they began to read in his presence.

A companion said: "Venerable Chāraka, the seventeen groups are no longer associating with us, drawing close to us, or paying homage to us." Chāraka said: "I drove them away, and now they have begun to take hold of learning. Venerable Chāraka, you have prodded a sleeping snake with a stick for us! As long as those fools have little learning, they will associate with us, draw close to us, and pay homage to us. But when they have gained much learning and become holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the Mātṛkā, and have become fierce and able to overpower others, then at that time they will set their minds on harming us." Chāraka said: "I will make sure that they do not manage to take hold of learning at all, and —"

"— and even cause them to fall away from the learning they have already taken hold of. Go in that way." So Chāraka went to their dwelling and spoke thus: "Ho there, you seventeen groups! Have you been applying yourselves with great diligence?" They replied: "We have." "And what does diligence accomplish?" "It accomplishes the taking hold of learning." "And what does taking hold of learning accomplish?" "It accomplishes great learning." "And what does great learning accomplish?" "It accomplishes the full ripening of the faculties." "And what does the full ripening of the faculties accomplish?" "It accomplishes entry into certainty and the exhaustion of the defilements." "So you expect to attain entry into certainty and the exhaustion of the defilements, do you? Venerable Chāraka — have we perhaps committed actions of immediate retribution, or severed the roots of virtue?" "You have neither committed actions of immediate retribution nor severed the roots of virtue. And yet, have you not heard what the Blessed One declared: that any monk who confers full ordination upon a person who has not yet reached the age of twenty — that person will not have attained valid full ordination, and those monks will be subject to censure? Since you received full ordination without having reached the age of twenty, how do you expect to attain entry into certainty and the exhaustion of the defilements?"

When they heard this they became troubled and fell into despondency. Then their preceptor arrived, and he said: "Young ones, why have you become troubled and despondent? Come here and take hold of learning!" They replied: "Preceptor, what does taking hold of learning accomplish?" "It accomplishes great learning." "And what does great learning accomplish?" "It accomplishes the full ripening of the faculties." "And what does the full ripening of the faculties accomplish?" "It accomplishes entry into certainty and the exhaustion of the defilements." They said: "Preceptor, we expect to attain entry into certainty and the exhaustion of the defilements — but have we committed actions of immediate retribution, or severed the roots of virtue?" He replied: "You have neither committed actions of immediate retribution nor severed the roots of virtue. However, since the Blessed One has declared that any monk who confers full ordination upon a person who has not yet reached the age of twenty — that person will not have attained valid full ordination, and those monks will be subject to censure — since you received full ordination without having reached the age of twenty, you will attain entry into certainty and the exhaustion of the defilements?" They said: "Preceptor, we expect to attain entry into certainty and the exhaustion of the defilements, but since we received full ordination without having reached the age of twenty we fear we cannot." He said: "Have you not also heard what the Blessed One declared: that for a first offender there is no transgression? Since you are first offenders, you have indeed received full ordination. Come then, and receive the scriptural transmission." Furthermore: "Who was it that aroused this remorse in you?" "It was Venerable Chāraka." The monks then censured him: "Why does a monk with so little purpose deliberately arouse remorse in monks?" — they reproached him, mocked him, and disparaged him. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this occasion, and these circumstances, convened the assembly of monks — and all that follows is as before. "The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, ask" — and so forth, likewise as before. The Buddha, the Blessed One, then questioned the venerable Chāraka: "Chāraka, is it true that you deliberately aroused remorse in monks?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Buddha, the Blessed One, censured him, saying: "That which is contrary to the conduct of a contemplative, which is not in accord with what is proper, which is not fitting, which is not in conformity with the code — that is not something a person who has gone forth should do." Having thus censured him in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks:

"Monks, seeing these ten benefits, a rule of training should be established for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My śrāvakas are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, having deliberately formed the intention 'By whatever means, let this monk not experience even a moment of happiness,' and making that very thought the condition, arouses remorse in a monk — that is an offense.

Now, 'whatever monk' means Chāraka, or any other of the same kind.

'Deliberately' means having thought it through.

'By whatever means, let this monk not experience even a moment of happiness' means: 'Let him feel displeasure in mind, even for just a moment.'

'Making that very thought the condition' means: not for any other reason.

'In a monk' means: in one belonging to this Dharma.

'Arouses remorse' means: if he causes in the mind even a little remorse, or full remorse, or intense remorse.

'An offense' — this burns him, scorches him, and causes him to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the states of misery, and the lower destinies. Furthermore, for as long as that offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome dharmas — therefore it is said to be an offense.

As to how this becomes an offense: a monk goes somewhere with the intention of arousing remorse in another monk, and says, 'Venerable one, do you recall such-and-such a king, or a wealthy man, or a great merchant, or a great caravan leader?' When the other replies, 'I do not recall,' the first monk says, 'That was in an earlier time, and you, venerable one, are a latecomer; since you did not receive full ordination properly, but received full ordination improperly, you must receive full ordination again.' Whether or not remorse arises in the monk, the one who spoke is guilty of an offense.

A monk goes somewhere with the intention of arousing remorse in another monk, and says, 'Venerable one, do you recall such-and-such a great lunar eclipse or solar eclipse?' When the other replies, 'I do not recall,' the first monk says, 'That was in an earlier time, and you, venerable one, are a latecomer; since you did not receive full ordination properly, but received full ordination improperly, you must receive full ordination again.' Whether or not remorse arises in the monk, the one who spoke is guilty of an offense.

A monk goes somewhere with the intention of arousing remorse in another monk, and says, 'Venerable one, do you recall such-and-such a good year or a bad year?' When the other replies, 'I do not recall,' the first monk says, 'That was in an earlier time, and you, venerable one, are a latecomer; since you did not receive full ordination properly, but received full ordination improperly, you must receive full ordination again.' Whether or not remorse arises in the monk, the one who spoke is guilty of an offense.

A monk goes somewhere with the intention of arousing remorse in another monk, and says, 'Venerable one, where did you receive full ordination?' When the other replies, 'In such-and-such a place,' the first monk says, 'That place had its boundary improperly demarcated and the central area was not properly determined; since you did not receive full ordination properly, but received full ordination improperly, you must receive full ordination again.' Whether or not remorse arises in the monk, the one who spoke is guilty of an offense."

A monk goes somewhere with the intention of arousing remorse in another monk, and says, 'Venerable one, who was your preceptor? Who was your instructor?' When the other replies, 'Such-and-such a person was my preceptor, and such-and-such a person was my instructor,' the first monk says, 'Both of them are of defective moral discipline; since you did not receive full ordination properly but received full ordination improperly, you must receive full ordination again.' Whether or not remorse arises in the monk, the one who spoke is guilty of an offense.

A monk goes somewhere with the intention of arousing remorse in another monk, and says, 'Venerable one, where are you going?' When the other replies, 'I am going there,' the first monk says, 'That place is a dangerous pass; a defeat-entailing transgression has arisen for you, Venerable one.' Whether or not remorse arises in the monk, the one who spoke is guilty of an offense.

A monk goes somewhere with the intention of arousing remorse in another monk, and says, 'Venerable one, did you take the robes of your instructor and your preceptor?' When the other replies, 'I did take them,' the first monk says, 'You, Venerable one, took them with the intention to steal; thus a defeat-entailing transgression has arisen for you.' Whether or not remorse arises in the monk, the one who spoke is guilty of an offense.

A monk goes somewhere with the intention of arousing remorse in another monk, and says, 'Venerable one, did you proclaim in the midst of the Saṅgha, "All formations are impermanent; all phenomena are without self; nirvāṇa is peace"?' When the other replies, 'I did say that,' the first monk says, 'You, Venerable one, proclaimed a superhuman quality of a human being; thus a defeat-entailing transgression has arisen for you.' Whether or not remorse arises in the monk, the one who spoke is guilty of an offense.

For another purpose, and when Vinaya implements are used, there is no offense. How is it for another purpose? It is as follows. A monk goes to another monk and says, 'Venerable one, do you recall some great king, wealthy man, merchant, or caravan leader?' When the other replies, 'I do not recall,' the first monk says, 'That was long ago, and so the Venerable one does not recall it; the Venerable one received full ordination properly.' In that case there is no offense.

It is as follows. A monk goes to another monk and says, 'Venerable one, do you recall some great lunar eclipse or solar eclipse?' When the other replies, 'I do not recall,' the first monk says, 'That was long ago, and so the Venerable one does not recall it; the Venerable one received full ordination properly.' In that case there is no offense.

It is as follows. A monk goes to another monk and says, 'Venerable one, do you recall some great good year or bad year?' When the other replies, 'I do not recall,' the first monk says, 'That was long ago, and so the Venerable one does not recall it; the Venerable one received full ordination properly.' In that case there is no offense. That is how it is for another purpose.

How is it when Vinaya implements are used? It is as follows. A monk goes to another monk and says, 'Venerable one, where did you receive full ordination?' When the other replies, 'In such-and-such a place,' the first monk says, 'That place had its boundary properly demarcated and the central area was properly determined; the Venerable one received full ordination properly.' In that case there is no offense.

It is as follows. A monk goes to another monk and says, 'Venerable one, who was your preceptor and who was your instructor?' When the other replies,

'My preceptor is such-and-such a person, and my instructor is such-and-such a person,' the first monk says, 'Both of them are monks endowed with moral discipline, and if you pay them proper respect, great merit will arise for you, and you will have served the Venerable one in a way that brings full completion.' In that case there is no offense.

It is as follows. A monk goes to another monk and says, 'Venerable one, did you take the Dharma robes of your preceptor and instructor?' When the other replies, 'I did take them,' the first monk says, 'Do not take them with a mind of theft. See to it that a transgression leading to defeat does not occur.' In that case there is no offense.

It is as follows. A monk goes to another monk and asks, 'Venerable one, are you going to such-and-such a region?' When the other replies, 'I am going,' the first monk says, 'That region is dangerous territory — do not go there. You are a celibate practitioner of pure conduct; do not cause those who are wise to become suspicious of a place where there is no grounds for suspicion, and do not cause them to become doubtful about a matter that gives no cause for doubt.' In that case there is no offense.

It is as follows. A monk goes to another monk and asks, 'Venerable one, did you, in the midst of the Saṅgha, speak these words: "All formations are impermanent; all phenomena are without self; nirvāṇa is peace"?' When the other replies, 'I did speak them,' the first monk says, 'Do not speak of superhuman qualities. See to it that a transgression leading to defeat does not occur.' In that case there is no offense.

That is how it is when Vinaya implements are used.

For one who is at the beginning of their practice, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, and for one afflicted by painful sensations, there is no offense.

The sixty-second section, on transgressions that generate regret, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana had caused the group of the Seventeen — including those born near him, the youths of the Sārpaka clan — to go forth and receive full ordination. Whenever any one of those Seventeen was assigned a monastic duty, they would all band together to do it. Once, late one night, a teaching arose in that very monastery, and they all gathered together and made noise. The next day, when a teaching arose at the Saṅgha's heating chamber, they all gathered there as well and made noise. The day after that, the duty of monastery overseer fell to one of the Seventeen, and on that day too they all decorated the monastery and took their seats. Then, when the overseer was about to make noise, one of the Seventeen thought, 'I shall sleep soundly. Why should sixteen men not be able to make the noise on their own?' And so, each one in turn had exactly that same thought, and all sixteen others went off separately to sleep. The overseer, left alone by himself, got up in the last part of the night, collected the lamp stands, opened the doors, swept and plastered the monastery, announced the time, arranged the seats, spread incense smoke around the precincts of the stūpa, and then stood atop the monastery and began to strike the gaṇḍī. The sixteen, awakened by the sound of the gaṇḍī, came out of their own quarters carrying their bowls, and they saw that one overseer running to and fro by himself. They said to one another, 'Venerable ones, this one is running to and fro all alone — did none of us come to his aid?' One of them said, 'The thought came to me —

'I was exhausted and slept — surely the sixteen of them could have managed without my help.' In the same way, another said the same, and yet another said the same, until all of them had said the same thing. Then the sixteen said to one another, 'Venerable ones, if it is our custom always to be the first to go to any immediate task, then our not having helped him was wrong on our part — he will reproach us for it. Let us ask his forgiveness as soon as we have finished eating.' And so, after eating, they began to ask his forgiveness. The younger ones touched their heads to his two feet, and the elders embraced him around the neck, saying, 'Venerable one, please forgive us.' But he sat there in complete silence. One who was a particularly close friend of his then tickled him, and he began to laugh, and said, 'I forgive you.' They thought, 'That is a good method,' and one after another the rest also tickled him, until finally, midway through all of them tickling him, the breath reversed upward and he died at that moment. They stood there in shock and began to grieve. The monks said to them, 'Hey, you group of seventeen — why are you standing there in shock and grief?' They replied, 'We were formerly a group of seventeen, but now we are a group of sixteen; a pleasant companion in the holy life has been lost, and a defeat transgression has occurred.' The monks said, 'That is wrong,' and departed. The sixteen also departed together, deeply troubled and sunk in remorse. Other monks saw them sitting there having sunk into themselves in silence, and those monks began to mock those monks, saying, 'These venerables of the group of seventeen blazed up like straw-fire — flaring up in an instant and dying out in an instant; for a little while they were boisterous, and now for a little while they sit sunk in silent remorse.' Though they were tormented inwardly by the fire of grief and fully mocked, they said nothing and sat silent, sunk in remorse. The overseer saw them sitting sunk in remorse and said, 'Group of seventeen, why are you sitting here sunk in remorse?' They replied, 'Do we still count as the group of seventeen? Why would we?' They then explained the incident in detail.

Now, as for why monks of little sense were reproaching monks by poking them with fingers, snapping at them, and talking back at them on that occasion, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this occasion, and these circumstances, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth as before. The awakened, Blessed Buddhas, though fully knowing, feign not to know — and so forth as before. The awakened Blessed One then questioned the group of seventeen: 'Monks, is it true that you were poking with fingers?' 'Venerable one, it is so.' The awakened Blessed One then formally rebuked them, declaring that this was conduct unbecoming a renunciant (pravrajyā), not in accordance with proper conduct, not allowable, not consistent with the rules. He then rebuked them in many ways, and having done so, he addressed the monks: 'Therefore, monks, having seen ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers — and so forth as before.' My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

"Whoever tickles with fingers commits a transgression." As for the phrase "tickles with fingers," this refers to performing any bodily action, bodily conduct, or bodily movement with the intention of tickling with fingers. As for the phrase "commits a transgression," this means being burned, scorched, and cast down into the bad destinations and wrong rebirths — namely, hell-beings, animals, and hungry ghosts in the lower realms. Moreover, for as long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome phenomena. Therefore it is said to be a transgression.

As for how a transgression comes about in this matter: if a monk tickles another monk with one finger, a transgression is incurred. If he tickles with two, three, four, or five fingers, a transgression is likewise incurred. If he uses his fist, elbow, shoulder, head, chest, back, waist, thigh, forearm, or even the big toe of his foot to tickle, a transgression is likewise incurred. If one exposes a wound, a sore, a blister, a mole, or a hair follicle, there is no transgression. For one who is a novice, one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by feelings, there is no transgression.

The sixty-third transgression rule, that of tickling, is complete.

The awakened Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the venerable Upananda, from among the group of seventeen, had directly realized arhatship by abandoning all afflictions, he thought to himself: "Do these companions of mine in the holy life (brahmacarya) have even a little wholesome root?" He saw that they did. "On whom does it depend?" He saw that it depended upon himself. And so, keeping in view the taming of those other sixteen, he went along following behind them one after another. They said to him: "Venerable ones, let us go to the bank of the river to fetch water, and let us bathe there." And so, taking water vessels and water pots, they went to the bank of the river. Then they said: "Venerable ones, shall we simply bathe, or shall we splash the water?" They said: "Let us splash the water, and then bathe afterward." So they splashed the water, and setting their robes aside in a single pile they began to bathe, entered the water, and proceeded to come up to the surface and then sink down below; to go from this bank to the far bank and return from the far bank to this bank; to go with the current and go against the current; to make sounds like great kettledrums upon the water and sounds like a one-sided clay drum; to scatter and hurl sprays of water; to make circles and vajra-like patterns in the water; to make whirlpools, eddies, and swirling currents in the water; and to make a commotion, splashing about, and twisting their bodies in the water.

Venerable Upananda, knowing full well, bathed, crossed the river, put on his robe, and sat apart. At that time, King Prasenajit (Skt. Prasenajit) of Kosala was seated at the upper floor of his palace with Queen Mālinī and happened to see the group of seventeen playing and frolicking in the water. Having seen this, he said to Queen Mālinī: "Mālinī, look, look at the beauty of the monks of good conduct!" Queen Mālinī replied: "Your Majesty, that is not so remarkable — it is not so remarkable that they practice the holy life in the freshness of their youth. What is truly remarkable is that even though the god has reached the age of old age, he still has no such thoughts!"

The king, embarrassed, sat in silence.

Now, Venerable Upananda thought to himself: "I wonder whether some among the group of seventeen have become displeased." And looking over, he indeed saw that King Prasenajit of Kosala, seated at the upper floor of his palace, had become displeased. Seeing this, he said to the seventeen: "Venerable ones, King Prasenajit of Kosala has become displeased. Come out at once, and let him be pleased."

At that, they came out of the water. While they were putting on their robes, Venerable Upananda entered a meditative absorption (samādhi) born of loving devotion, and in that way all of them, along with their water-pots and water-vessels, rose up into the sky above, soaring like the king of swans with wings spread wide, and departed.

The shadow of them moving through the sky above fell upon the upper floor of King Prasenajit of Kosala's palace, and Queen Mālinī looked up and saw them soaring through the sky above like the king of swans with wings spread wide. She said to King Prasenajit of Kosala: "Your Majesty, look, look at the beauty of these men of virtue!"

The king replied: "Mālinī, it cannot happen and it is not the occasion for arhats whose defilements are exhausted to play about in the water with frivolous splashing. That simply cannot be."

Queen Mālinī said: "Your Majesty, has he not heard the Blessed One say this: 'When I see a monk seated here, he may be with attachment, with aversion, and with delusion; yet that very same one, when he rises, I see to be free of attachment, free of aversion, and free of delusion'? Has he not heard the Blessed One declare: 'Monks, therefore, the mind is like lightning, and meditative absorption is like a vajra — by means of wisdom the afflictions are destroyed'? The king has heard too little of this." And so the king sat in silence.

Then Queen Mālinī also reflected: "It cannot happen and it is not the occasion for arhats whose defilements are exhausted to play about in the water with frivolous splashing. That simply cannot be."

Thereupon Queen Mālinī said to a certain man: "Good sir, come here. Go to where the Blessed One is, and when you have gone, bow your head at the feet of the Blessed One, and convey these words of mine: 'Venerable One, these noble ones have been playing about in the water with frivolous splashing, and the king has become displeased in his heart. It would be well, Blessed One, if you would be pleased to establish some rule by means of which the noble ones will not engage in such frivolous playing about in the water, so that they will remember to refrain.' Please present this petition."

The man replied: "As my lady commands," and, having listened to Queen Mālinī, he went to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, he bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Seated to one side, he spoke these words to the Blessed One: "Venerable One, Queen Mālinī bows her head at the feet of the Blessed One. May the Blessed One and Queen Mālinī be well. Venerable One, Queen Mālinī conveys this message: 'These noble ones have been playing about in the water with frivolous splashing, and the king has become displeased in his heart. It would be well, Blessed One, if you would be pleased to establish some rule by means of which the noble ones will not engage in such frivolous playing about in the water, so that they will remember to refrain."

The Blessed One gave his consent by remaining silent and saying nothing to the man.

Then that man, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been given, bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this ground for legislation, and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth as before. "The blessed buddhas, knowing full well, make inquiry" — and so forth, also as before. The Blessed One questioned the seventeen groups of monks: "Monks, did you truly engage in frivolous splashing about in the water?" "Venerable One, it is true, we did." The Blessed One rebuked them, declaring that this was not in keeping with the conduct of a renunciant, not fitting, not proper, and not in conformity with the discipline; it was not something that one who has gone forth should do. Then, having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Therefore, perceiving ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If one plays in the water, it is a downfall."

"Playing in the water" means: if, with the intention of playing in the water, one performs a bodily action, a bodily movement, or a physical gesture. "It is a downfall" means: it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the wretched states — the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the states of ruin. Furthermore, as long as the downfall has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of virtuous qualities. Therefore it is called a downfall.

Now, how does one incur the downfall? It arises from nine bases — that is, from the intention that one ought to play, that one ought to get others to play, that one ought to frolic, that one ought to get others to frolic, that one ought to enjoy oneself, that one ought to get others to enjoy themselves, that one ought to be boisterous, that one ought to splash about frivolously, or that one ought to move one's body about.

As for how the downfall arises from the intention that one ought to play: if a monk, with the intention of playing in the water, rises from his seat, puts on his lower robe, puts on his outer robe, sets out, then lays aside his outer robes, puts on a bathing cloth, enters the water, and goes down under — a downfall is incurred. If one comes up to the surface, a downfall is incurred. If one's intention is merely to cool oneself, there is no downfall. If one goes from the near bank to the far bank, a downfall is incurred. If one comes from the far bank to the near bank, a downfall is incurred. If one's intention is to cross over, there is no downfall. If one strokes along with the current, a downfall is incurred. If one strokes against the current, a downfall is incurred. If one's intention is to learn swimming, there is no downfall.

If one beats a large drum over the water, beats a one-headed clay drum over the water, performs a dance over the water, goes in circles over the water, performs the vajra posture over the water, or stirs up turbulence in the water, a downfall is incurred. Even striking the water with the palm of the hand is a misdeed.

If a monk beats a large drum over the water using a pot, a pitcher, a ball, or a bowl — or beats a one-headed clay drum — even striking the water with the palm of the hand constitutes a misdeed.

If a monk beats a large drum over the water with peas, sesame, or dry grass, or beats a one-headed clay drum — even striking the water with the palm of the hand constitutes a misdeed. If one's intention is merely to measure or count, there is no downfall.

Such, then, is the analysis of the intention that one ought to play.

The same applies to the remaining intentions, such as the intention to poke at something with a point. There is no downfall for one who is a beginner, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is overcome by painful sensations. This completes the sixty-fourth rule on downfalls concerning playing in water.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the sixty-first fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

At a certain time, the venerable Unobstructed, having abandoned all afflictions, directly realized arhatship and was experiencing the bliss of liberation. In that moment, this thought arose in his mind: "The Blessed One has done what is beneficial for me. That Sugata (well-gone one) has done what is good for me — for the Blessed One has dispelled the many qualities of suffering in me; the Blessed One has established the many qualities of happiness in me; the Blessed One has dispelled the many evil and non-virtuous qualities in me; the Blessed One has established the many virtuous qualities in me. What then should I do so that I might truly repay the Blessed One, serve him, and honor him greatly?"

Then this thought arose in him again: "All the countless hardships that the blessed buddha-Blessed Ones underwent through three immeasurable eons to perfect the six perfections and thereby realize unsurpassed omniscience — all of this was for the sake of sentient beings. I too, therefore, should do something, however small, in the work of taming beings."

Then the venerable Unobstructed rose from his meditative settling, early in the morning while it was still dawn, took his robe and bowl, went to where the Blessed One was, and bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One, then sat to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Unobstructed addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable sir, I wish to go on a wandering tour of the regions."

Then the Blessed One, knowing the mind of the venerable Unobstructed with his own mind, spoke to the venerable Unobstructed in these words: "Unobstructed, go — and those sentient beings who have not crossed over, lead them across; those who have not been liberated, liberate them; those who have not breathed easy, bring them relief; those who have not passed beyond sorrow, cause them to pass beyond sorrow."

Then the venerable Unobstructed, rejoicing and delighting in the words spoken by the Blessed One, bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

That same evening passed, and when morning came, the venerable Unobstructed dressed himself, took up his bowl and his Dharma robe, entered Śrāvastī for alms, made his meal, and when he returned from the alms round for the meal, prepared his dwelling and provisions as befitted his needs, then took his bowl and Dharma robe and set out on his tour of the regions.

At a certain rocky cliff, there lived a householder who had taken a wife from an equal family and lived with her in play, in joy, and in delight. He had two sons and one daughter. He settled the two sons in their own households and gave the daughter in marriage. At a later time, that householder himself passed away, and the daughter's husband also died, so she began residing in the household of her two brothers, living in merriment together with other men.

Now at that rocky cliff, those two brothers of hers were well-known as men of prominence. Whenever the two of them quarreled with someone, the adversary in the quarrel would say, "You two may speak — your sister carries on in merriment with other men." The two brothers went and said to their sister: "Sister, when we quarrel with people, they say, 'You two may speak — but your sister carries on in merriment with other men.'" The sister replied: "Both brothers, I am a person of moral discipline; it is false people who slander me."

At a later time, a being entered into her, and signs of a child dwelling in the womb appeared. The two brothers then said to her: "Sister, you yourself said, 'I am a person of moral discipline; it is false people who slander me' — so where did this come from?" The sister replied: "Both brothers, this is a being with a prominent forehead who has forcibly entered my womb."

At a later time she gave birth, and a boy was born. When her relatives gathered and assembled to give the boy a name, they thought: "Since before this boy was even born, the word 'prominent-forehead one' was repeatedly uttered on his account, let the boy's name be Prominent-Forehead." And so the boy's name was given as Prominent-Forehead. His mother too came to be known by the name "Mother of Prominent-Forehead," and the two brothers settled her in another place.

Now the venerable Anaghata was roaming and wandering through the countryside, and coming to that rocky cliff he sought lodging there. Some boys who were playing and gathered there said to him: "Noble one, go seek lodging from Mother of Prominent-Forehead — she will offer you lodging." It is the nature of arhats that knowledge and vision do not arise through deliberation, so he went there and sought lodging. She offered him lodging, spread a seat, and said: "Noble one, please sit here." He sat down there, and she brought water to wash his feet and came saying: "Noble one, allow me to wash your feet." The venerable Anaghata said: "I do not have my feet washed by a woman." She thought: "Those who have gone forth must have taken up a discipline of this kind," and she brought foot-anointing oil, came forward, and said: "Noble one, allow me to anoint your feet." The venerable Anaghata said: "I do not have my feet anointed by a woman." She thought: "Those who have gone forth must have taken up a discipline of this kind," and she brought food, came forward, and said: "Noble one, please take a meal." The venerable Anaghata said: "I do not eat at an improper time." She thought: "Those who have gone forth must have taken up a discipline of this kind," and she spread his bed. The venerable Anaghata sat cross-legged on that bed, held his body upright, and remained with mindfulness directed forward and present.

She came before him and began to display the wiles of a woman, the tricks of a woman, the coquetries of a woman, and all the artifices of a woman, whereupon the venerable Anaghata subdued his senses. She thought: "This tiresome creature — let him sleep for now, and at midnight I shall go." At midnight she went and again began to display the wiles of a woman, the tricks of a woman, the coquetries of a woman, and all the artifices of a woman, whereupon the venerable Anaghata subdued his senses. She thought:

"Even if I had to travel a very great distance to be with a man like this and enjoy his company, what means is there to bring him under my power?" She thought: "The touch of a woman's body is a poison — if I embrace him, he will come under my power." And so she began to embrace him, whereupon the venerable Anaghata, like a king of geese spreading his wings without obstruction, rose up into the sky above and began to perform miracles — blazing, shining, raining down water, and sending forth lightning. Ordinary people are quickly seized with wonder at miracles, and so the woman, like a tree cut at the root, fell prostrate at the feet of the venerable Anaghata and said: "Worthy one who dwells in merit, please come down. Please come down. Please draw me out from the very depths of this mire of affliction." Out of compassion for that woman, the venerable Anaghata descended from the sky above. The woman then bowed her head to the feet of the venerable Anaghata, took a very low seat, and sat before him to hear the Dharma. The venerable Anaghata, having understood her disposition, her latent tendencies, her temperament, and her character, taught her the Dharma in such a way that, remaining right there on that seat, she shattered with the vajra of wisdom the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadṛṣṭi) that had been built up since beginningless time, directly realized the fruit of stream-entry, and rightly distinguished the Four Noble Truths one by one.

Having seen the truths, she said: "Venerable Anaghata, what you have done for me is something that neither my father did for me, nor my mother, nor a king, nor the gods, nor my forebears of former times, nor śramaṇas and brahmins, nor friends, companions, and kinsmen. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears; you have freed me from the mountains of bones; you have closed the doors to the lower realms; you have opened the doors to higher states and to liberation; you have drawn my feet out of the hell realms, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; you have placed me among gods and humans; you have brought cyclic existence to its end. You have shattered with the vajra of wisdom the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time, and I have obtained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable Anaghata, I have entered the stream. Venerable Anaghata, I have entered the stream. Venerable Anaghata, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept me as a laywoman. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge with all my heart."

"Venerable Anaghata, please grant permission to offer a midday meal here tomorrow. Sister, it shall be accepted on one condition: only if it is offered with the door properly closed." She said: "It shall be offered with the door bolted." That very night she made the food ready, and early the next morning she rose, arranged the seat, bolted the door, and at the midday hour, having understood that the venerable Anaghata was comfortably seated, she satisfied and strengthened him with her own hands, serving him with pure and well-prepared foods and drink. In many ways she served him with pure and well-prepared foods and drink, satisfied him with her own hands, and having satisfied him —

Having perceived that the venerable Anaghata had finished eating, washed his hands, and set down his bowl, she took a low seat and sat down before the venerable Anaghata to listen to the Dharma.

At that time, her two brothers got into a quarrel with a man. That man said: "Do you two have anything to say? Your sister, that woman of wondrous and diverse offerings, has not even let go of the śramaṇa son of the Śākyas — and now that the śramaṇa son of the Śākyas has entered her mouth, she still cannot get enough of it." The two brothers thought: "Every bit of contempt we two have suffered from people is the doing of this one. We shall go and kill her." Drawing their swords from their scabbards, they ran off toward where she lived.

Many hundreds and thousands of living creatures, some drawn by curiosity, others spurred on by roots of virtue accumulated in former lives, followed along behind those two.

Then the venerable Anaghata said: "Sister, I am going out — bolt the door." He came out, and she bolted the door.

Then the venerable Anaghata rose up into the sky above like a king of geese spreading his wings, and began to perform miracles: blazing, shining, making rain fall, and sending forth lightning. Ordinary people are quickly captivated by miracles, and so those two fell at the feet of the venerable Anaghata like trees cut down at the root, and said: "O true and worthy recipient of offerings, please come down. Come down. Please, we pray you, draw us out by the collar from the swamp of affliction in which we are sunk." Out of compassion for those two, the venerable Anaghata descended from the sky above.

The two of them then paid homage at the feet of the venerable Anaghata and stood to one side. The venerable Anaghata, having penetrated the intention, the latent tendencies, the constitution, and the natural disposition of that entire assembly, taught the Dharma accordingly. For twenty thousand living beings, the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection were shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and they directly realized the fruit of stream-entry. Some directly realized the fruit of once-returning. Some directly realized the fruit of non-returning. Some, going forth and abandoning all afflictions, directly realized arhatship itself. Some generated the mind set upon the awakening of a hearer. Some generated the mind set upon solitary awakening. Some generated the mind set upon the unsurpassed, perfectly complete awakening of a buddha. Having thus taught the Dharma, the great majority of that assembly came to take refuge in the Buddha, to take refuge in the Dharma, and to take refuge in the Saṅgha.

Then the venerable Anaghata properly instructed that assembly with a discourse in accordance with the Dharma, properly established them in it, properly praised them, and having gladdened them thoroughly, he rose from his seat, departed, and went off to another rocky crag. Not far from that crag there was a pleasure grove, and he accepted it as his lodging for the night. He sat down there in cross-legged posture.

Now about five hundred bandits who wanted to plunder the rocky crag had also entered that pleasure grove. One of the bandits, thinking the venerable Anaghata was a tree stump, laid arrows upon him and began to pull them back. The venerable Anaghata said: "Friend, your ear-ornament is catching on your robe — take care and draw slowly, so your robe does not tear." The bandit said: "Who are you?" "A śramaṇa."

"Whose śramaṇas?" "The śramaṇas of the Śākya's sons." He said: "Friends, we see a bad omen in this — let us kill him." Now the military commander among them had previously been a servant in the household of the venerable Anaghata, and had trained in the very same sword-fighting ground where the venerable Anaghata had trained, and had become skilled at cutting with the sword. At the time when the venerable Anaghata had gone forth, this man too had joined the bandits and had risen to become the military commander of the five hundred bandits. Recognizing the venerable Anaghata by his voice, he said: "Is this not the noble Anaghata? Handsome man, people know him as such." He said: "Friends, do not kill this one. He is a renunciant of excellent fortune, and by the power of his name merchants have returned safely with great ships from the great ocean. How is this known? If we obtain nothing at all just now, we can kill him afterward, but if we do obtain something, let us not kill him — wait a while." So they posted four bandits as his guards, with the instruction "See that this one does not escape," and then entered the rocky crag with the intention of plundering it.

The venerable Anaghata said to those four guards: "Good people, stand down your weapons for a moment." They said: "You will flee." "If four of you are stationed here, how can I flee?" They stood down their weapons and took up their posts, and the venerable Anaghata, penetrating their minds, latent tendencies, constitutions, and characters, then and there, while they remained seated on that very spot, shattered with the vajra of gnosis the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection that had been built up since beginningless time, and directly realized the fruit of stream-entry. In this way he taught them the Dharma.

Having seen the truth, they said: "Venerable one, relying upon you as a virtuous spiritual friend, what you have now done for us — this has been done for us by neither father nor mother, neither king nor gods, neither ancestors of old nor śramaṇas and brahmins, nor by the assembly of relatives, friends, and kinsmen. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears, freed us from the mountains of bones, shut the doors to the lower realms, opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation, lifted our feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and placed us among gods and humans. You have brought our wandering in saṃsāra to an end. With the vajra of gnosis you have shattered the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time, and we have obtained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, we have entered the stream. Venerable one, we have entered the stream. Venerable one, we go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. We beseech you to accept us as lay practitioners. From this day forward, for as long as we live, we go for refuge with wholehearted sincerity from the very core of our hearts." "Noble one, will our other companions also obtain Dharma such as this?" "All of you who have a basis for it will obtain far more than you."

The venerable Anaghata blessed things so that not even a single dog would be roused at that rocky crag, and the bandits completed their plunder and returned. They said to the four men: "Where is the renunciant? What is he doing?" "We have completed our work and returned, so let us pay him our respects." The venerable Anaghata said to them: "Good people, stand down your weapons and take your seats — I will teach you the Dharma."

"Noble one, will our captors not come?" "They will not come." They removed their armor and took their seats before the venerable Anaghata to hear the Dharma. The venerable Anaghata, having thoroughly understood their minds, their habitual tendencies, their temperaments, and their characters, taught the Dharma in such a way that, right there as they sat upon their very seats, he shattered with the vajra of wisdom the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection (the belief in a self within the aggregates), which had been piled up from beginningless time — and thereby directly actualized for them the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, they said: "Venerable one, we have relied upon you as our spiritual friend, and what you have done for us is something our fathers never did for us, our mothers never did, kings never did, the gods never did, our ancestors of old never did, ascetics and brahmins never did, and neither did friends, companions, or the circle of our kindred. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears. You have delivered us from the mountains of bones. You have closed the gates of the lower destinies. You have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation. You have drawn our feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and set us among gods and humans. You have brought cyclic existence to its end. From beginningless time the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection had been heaped up — you have shattered it with the vajra of wisdom, and we have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, we have entered the stream. Venerable one, we have entered the stream. Venerable one, we go for refuge to the Blessed One, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept us as lay practitioners. From this day forward, for as long as we have life, we go for refuge with heartfelt, wholehearted joy.

Noble one, we will no longer incur the fault of taking what is not given — not even so much as a sesame husk belonging to another. As for these goods, what use are they to us? Good sirs, leave them right there on the spot." "Noble one, will our captors not come? Did even a single dog awaken there?" "Leave them there on the spot." So they went and set all those goods back where they had been.

Then a deity who had faith in the venerable Anaghata spoke at that rocky crag: "Everything that has been left unharmed is through the power of the noble Anaghata. The noble Anaghata is dwelling in this garden — come hear the Dharma today." Thereupon many hundreds of living creatures — some drawn by curiosity, some stirred by the roots of virtue from former lives — came forth and went to where the noble Anaghata was. They bowed their heads to his two feet and took their places before the noble Anaghata to hear the Dharma.

The venerable Anaghata, having thoroughly understood the minds, habitual tendencies, temperaments, and characters of that assembly, taught the Dharma in such a way that twelve thousand living creatures, right there as they sat upon their very seats, shattered with the vajra of wisdom the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection — and directly actualized the fruit of stream-entry. Some directly actualized the fruit of once-returning. Some directly actualized the fruit of non-returning. Some went forth into renunciation and, having abandoned all afflictions, directly actualized arhatship. Some aroused the mind of awakening oriented toward the awakening of a śrāvaka. Some aroused the mind of awakening oriented toward solitary buddhahood. Some aroused the mind of awakening oriented toward unsurpassed, perfect, and complete buddhahood. In this way the Dharma was taught, and the greater part of that assembly turned toward the Buddha, arrived at the Dharma, and came to rest in the Saṅgha.

Then those five hundred sons of good family said this to the venerable Aniruddha: "Venerable Aniruddha, if we could obtain the going forth into renunciation and the full ordination in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya, attaining the status of monks, we would practice the holy life in the presence of the Blessed One." "Good friends, come then! The Blessed One will perform your going forth and your full ordination, and you will attain the status of monks." Then the venerable Aniruddha led those five hundred sons of good family to where the Blessed One was. At that time the Blessed One was seated before an assembly of many hundreds, teaching the Dharma. The Blessed One saw the venerable Aniruddha coming from a great distance. Having seen him, he said to the monks: "Monks, do you see the monk Aniruddha approaching from a great distance?" "Venerable One, we see him." "Monks, this Aniruddha comes to the Tathāgata carrying a gift, and there is no such gift for the Tathāgata other than one such as this, from those who are to be trained."

Then the venerable Aniruddha went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Aniruddha said this to the Blessed One: "Venerable One, these five hundred sons of good family wish to obtain the going forth into renunciation and the full ordination in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya, attaining the status of monks. May the Blessed One, out of compassion, be pleased to give them the going forth, and be pleased to confer full ordination upon them." The Blessed One said to them: "Come, monks!" — granting them the going forth — "Come, monks! Practice the holy life." And at the very conclusion of the Blessed One's words, they found themselves with their heads shaved and wearing patched robes, their hair and beards grown as if for seven days, their hands occupied with begging bowl and water-pot, and they were just as a monk who has been fully ordained for a hundred years.

And it was also said:

When the Tathāgata spoke the word "Come," those bodied ones, wearing shaved heads and patched robes, straightaway found their faculties perfectly stilled, and by the Buddha's intention their bodily forms were clothed.

Then the Blessed One gave them this instruction: "Sons of good family, dwelling alone in solitude, with heedfulness, with ardor, with the self fully surrendered — you who have shaved your hair and beard, donned the saffron robes, and gone forth from home into homelessness in genuine faith, in order to realize in this very life, through your own direct knowledge, the unsurpassed culmination of the holy life — should realize and accomplish it, knowing: 'My birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What was to be done has been done. I know no other existence beyond this.'" And they became arhats (Skt. arhat), free from attachment, released from the three realms, their minds equal toward a clod of earth and gold, equal toward the sky and the palm of the hand, like sandalwood set aside, their faculties fully stilled. With the three knowledges (vidyā) they had split open the shell of the egg of ignorance, and they had attained the knowledges, the direct cognitions, and the analytical discriminations. They turned their backs on continued existence, on the gains of desire, and on honor. They became worthy of worship, of reverence, and of direct praise by the gods together with Indra and their retinues.

The monks asked the venerable Aniruddha: "Venerable Aniruddha, how did you fare comfortably along the way?" "Venerable ones, I fared somewhat comfortably and somewhat with difficulty." "How was it comfortable?"

"How was it difficult?" "The work of taming that was done — that was the comfortable part. The killing of the young deer at Hadapo — that was the difficult part." "Why?" Then he spoke of that at length.

The monks said: "Venerable Aniruddha, is it proper for you, who have not ceased, to lie in one dwelling together with a woman? Because it is not proper, a fault has arisen." The monks of little want asked: "Why do the monks reproach, rebuke, and criticize, saying that monks lie in one dwelling together with a woman?" Then the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, on account of this instance, and on account of this occasion, assembled the community of monks — and so forth, as before. The passage beginning "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, while knowing, act as though they do not know" also proceeds as before. The Blessed One then asked the venerable Aniruddha: "Aniruddha, is it true that you lay in one dwelling together with a woman?" "Blessed One, it is so." The Blessed One censured lack of effort, lack of application, and unconsidered conduct. Then the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of effort, application, and considered conduct, addressed the monks:

"Monks, therefore, seeing the ten benefits in full, a rule of training is to be laid down for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk lies in one dwelling together with a woman commits a transgression.

Now, 'whatever monk' means one who belongs to this Dharma. 'Together with a woman' means a woman or a young girl who is capable of engaging in or has engaged in unchaste conduct. 'Together' means with such a one. 'In one dwelling' means in all four types of enclosed and surrounded spaces: those that are fully enclosed and fully surrounded, those that are fully enclosed and mostly surrounded, those that are mostly enclosed and fully surrounded, and those that are mostly enclosed and mostly surrounded. 'Fully enclosed and fully surrounded' refers to a dwelling room, a surrounding corridor, and a multi-storied building. 'Fully enclosed and mostly surrounded' refers to structures with ten doors or twelve doors. 'Mostly enclosed and fully surrounded' refers to corridors with four sides. 'Mostly enclosed and mostly surrounded' refers to corridors with three sides and surrounding walkways. 'If he lies' means if he lies down after nightfall. 'Commits a transgression' means it burns, scorches, and causes falling into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies, and into the miserable states of falling. Furthermore, so long as the transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome Dharmas — and therefore it is called a transgression."

Now, as to how a transgression comes about: if a monk lies in an upper room while a woman lies in the middle room below, that monk must draw up the ladder, or block the door with a firm lock, or station a monk as guard. If he does not draw up the ladder, or does not block the door with a firm lock, or does not station a monk as guard, then from that time until dawn it constitutes a wrongdoing, and when dawn breaks it becomes a transgression.

If a monk lies in the upper story while a woman lies in the middle story, that monk must draw up the ladder, or block the door with a firm lock, or station a monk as guard. If he does not draw up the ladder — or does not block the door with a firm lock, or does not station a monk as guard, then from that time until dawn it constitutes a wrongdoing, and when dawn breaks it becomes a transgression.

If a monk lies in the middle room while a woman lies in the upper room above, that monk must draw up the ladder, or block the door with a firm lock, or station a monk as guard. If he does not draw up the ladder, or does not block the door with a firm lock, or does not station a monk as guard, then from that time until dawn it constitutes a wrongdoing, and when dawn breaks it becomes a transgression.

If a monk lies in the lower room while a woman lies in the middle room, that monk must draw up the ladder, or block the door with a firm lock, or station a monk as guard. If he does not draw up the ladder, or does not block the door with a firm lock, or does not station a monk as guard, then from that time until dawn it constitutes a wrongdoing, and when dawn breaks it becomes a transgression.

If a monk lies in the main dwelling while a woman lies in the corridor, that monk must block the door with a firm lock, or station a monk as guard. If he does not block the door with a firm lock, or does not station a monk as guard, then from that time until dawn it constitutes a wrongdoing, and when dawn breaks it becomes a transgression.

If a monk lies in the corridor while a woman lies in the main dwelling, that monk must block the door from the outside, or station a monk as guard. If he does not block the door from the outside, or does not station a monk as guard, then from that time until dawn it constitutes a wrongdoing, and when dawn breaks it becomes a transgression.

If a monk lies in the gatehouse while a woman lies on a staircase, that monk must block the door from the inside, or station a monk as guard. If he does not block the door from the inside, or does not station a monk as guard, then from that time until dawn it constitutes a wrongdoing, and when dawn breaks it becomes a transgression.

If a monk lies on a staircase while a woman lies in the gatehouse, that monk must block the door from the outside, or station a monk as guard. If he does not block the door from the outside, or does not station a monk as guard, then from that time until dawn it constitutes a wrongdoing, and when dawn breaks it becomes a transgression.

If a householder keeps guard, there is no transgression.

If a monk lies in a cowshed or a livestock shelter, that monk must screen off that area with planks, or boards, or curtains, or station a monk as guard. If he does not screen off that area with planks, or boards, or curtains, and does not station a monk as guard, then from that time until dawn it constitutes a wrongdoing, and when dawn breaks it likewise constitutes a wrongdoing. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is insane, one who is mentally disturbed, or one who is afflicted by painful feelings.

The monks became uncertain, and in order to resolve all their doubts they put a question to the buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable One, what action did the long-lived Anāgata perform, such that through the ripening of that action he was born into a household of wealth, great riches, and abundant possessions, and then, having gone forth into the teaching of the Blessed One and abandoned all mental afflictions, he directly realized arhatship and performed such a vast work of taming beings?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it was by the long-lived Anāgata himself that this accumulation of karma was obtained.

conditions fully transformed, abiding nearby like light, and arising without fail — these were performed and accumulated. Through the very unobstructedness of karma performed and accumulated, who else but oneself would experience it? Monks, karma performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases. As it is said in verse:

Even through a hundred aeons, karma does not perish.

When the conditions and the time have gathered, it will bear fruit for embodied beings without fail.

Monks, in this very same great and excellent aeon, long ago, when the lifespan of human beings was twenty thousand years, the Teacher — the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, knower of the world, the unsurpassed guide for those who are to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, the Blessed One — Kāśyapa appeared in the world. At that time this one had gone forth in the teaching of that Blessed One and was serving as an abbot in a temple on a certain rocky cliff. Together with him there were five hundred co-residents and attendants. Nearly all the people living in that community on the rocky cliff had deep faith in him.

On another occasion, when some time had passed, his co-residents and attendants asked him: "Venerable Abbot, have you attained any accumulation of excellent qualities?"

He replied: "I have attained none at all."

They asked: "What aspiration, then, did the Abbot make?"

He said: "I made this aspiration: May I go forth in the canonical words of the Blessed One — the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, knower of the world, the unsurpassed guide for those who are to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, the Blessed One — who was prophesied by the Blessed One Kāśyapa, the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha, to the brahmin youth his teacher, saying: 'O brahmin youth, in a future time, when the lifespan of human beings is one hundred years, there will appear a Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed guide for those who are to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, the Blessed One, to be called Śākyamuni.' Having gone forth in the canonical words of that one who was thus prophesied as being certainly destined, and having abandoned all mental afflictions, may I directly realize arhatship."

His co-residents and attendants then said: "May we too, in reliance on the Abbot, go forth in the canonical words of that Blessed One and, having abandoned all mental afflictions, directly realize arhatship."

When the community of people living on that rocky cliff heard of this, in the manner of what a noble one had said, they went to him and asked: "Noble One, have you attained any accumulation of excellent qualities?"

"None at all," he replied.

They asked: "What aspiration, then, did the noble one make?"

He said: "I made this aspiration: the Blessed One Kāśyapa, the Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha, prophesied with certainty to the brahmin youth his teacher, saying: 'O brahmin youth, in a future time, when the lifespan of human beings is one hundred years, there will appear a Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed guide for those who are to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, the Blessed One, to be called Śākyamuni.' Having gone forth in the canonical words of that one who was thus prophesied as certainly destined, and having abandoned all mental afflictions, may I directly realize arhatship."

They then said: "May we too, in reliance on the noble one, go forth in the canonical words of that Blessed One and come to see the truths directly."

"Monks, the monk who at that time was chanting the text — that is this one who has not yet passed away, Māgandha. Through the karmic maturation of the act of chanting that text with proper doctrinal understanding, he was born into a wealthy household of great possessions and abundant riches, and going forth in my teaching he abandoned all mental afflictions and directly realized arhatship. The five hundred companions and attendants who were with him at that time — those are these five hundred monks. Through the power of the aspiration they made on that occasion, relying on this one who has not yet passed away, they went forth in my teaching, abandoned all mental afflictions, and directly realized arhatship. The assembly of people who were dwelling on that cliff face at that time — those are the assembly of people now dwelling on this cliff face. Through the power of the aspiration they made on that occasion, relying on this one who has not yet passed away, they have come to see the truths in my scriptures.

"Venerable Māgandha, what act did he perform whose karmic maturation was the possession of the divine eye?"

"Monks, in this very excellent great aeon that has already come to pass, when the lifespan of beings was forty thousand years, there appeared in the world a Teacher — a Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed guide for those who are to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, the Blessed One buddha — named Saṃsāra-Destroyer. Having performed all the deeds of a buddha, he passed into the nirvāṇa realm of nirvāṇa without remainder through the exhaustion of the aggregates. Then King Mañjuśrī had a jeweled stūpa for him built from four kinds of precious materials, one league in breadth and half a league in height, and he also arranged a festival in his honor. When the time of the festival arrived, five hundred men wishing to defeat a band of robbers came there. There, at the frayed boot of the robber chieftain, not far away there was a bathhouse, in which a lamp was burning with a small, dim flame. The robber chieftain saw it, entered that bathhouse, and began to repair his boots. As he worked, the lamp was burning with a small, dim flame, and he trimmed the wick of the lamp, whereupon the lamp blazed with a very bright, clear light. As soon as he could see the image before him, he was filled with very great faith, made an offering with a coin, and made this aspiration: 'By this root of virtue of mine, may I come to possess the divine eye.'

"Monks, the robber chieftain of that time is this monk Māgandha. Through the karmic maturation of the act of trimming the wick and generating faith, he came to possess the divine eye."

"Venerable Māgandha, what act did he perform whose karmic maturation was the Blessed One proclaiming him foremost among those who possess the divine eye?"

"That too was through the power of aspiration. Where was that aspiration made? Monks, in this very excellent great aeon that has already come to pass, when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, there appeared in the world a Teacher — a Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened buddha, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed guide for those who are to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, the Blessed One buddha — named Kāśyapa, and he dwelt in dependence near Vārāṇasī, in the Deer Park of the Forest of Sages."

In that teaching, a certain monk who had gone forth and been ordained by him was pointed out by the Tathāgata, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa, as supreme among those possessing the divine eye. Yet throughout that one's entire life he had practiced the holy life without attaining any accumulation of virtuous qualities whatsoever. Then, at the time of his death, he made this aspiration: "Throughout my entire life I practiced the holy life under the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, the unsurpassed field of offerings, Kāśyapa, yet I did not attain any accumulation of virtuous qualities. By this root of virtue — my practice of the holy life throughout my entire life — may the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa, who pointed out the brahmin youth Lama as supreme, and who prophesied with certainty: 'Brahmin youth, in a future time, when the lifespan of beings is one hundred years, there will appear a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and fully awakened buddha, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed guide for those who are to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, a Blessed One buddha, named Śākyamuni' — may I, just as this preceptor was pointed out by the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa as supreme among those possessing the divine eye, likewise be pointed out as supreme among those possessing the divine eye by the Blessed One Śākyamuni, the Lion of the Śākyas, the chief of the Śākya kings." Having set down that aspiration, through its power he has now been pointed out by the Tathāgata as supreme among those possessing the divine eye.

Monks, thus it is: the karmic maturation of actions that are purely dark is itself purely dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are purely bright is itself purely bright; and the karmic maturation of mixed actions is itself mixed. Therefore, monks, abandon actions that are purely dark and mixed, and strive for actions that are purely bright. Monks, this is how you should train.

Here ends the sixty-fifth rule concerning lying down together with a woman.

The Blessed One buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana had fully ordained and administered full ordination to the group of seventeen — including Upananda and others, the young men born in Sara — those seventeen then attended, associated with, and paid homage to the group of six. Then Charka said to them: "You seventeen, come here and do this and that." They replied: "Are you our teacher or preceptor? We will not do it." Charka said: "You fools! Who else is there to do it?" And he seized them by the neck and drove them away. They then said: "Venerable ones, everything in which we were looked down upon by the group of six came about because of our scant learning. Let us go and acquire learning. From now on let us not ask the group of six anything at all." They went to a certain monk and said: "Venerable one, please grant us recitation." That monk said to them, "This is a means," and they began to receive recitation from him. Upananda said: "Venerable one, Charka — the seventeen — no longer attend us, no longer associate with us, no longer pay us homage." Charka said:

"I drove them away and they have now begun to acquire learning. Venerable Charka, you have beaten sleeping snakes with a stick! As long as these fools remain of scant learning, they will attend us, associate with us, and pay us homage. But once they become learned — once they master the sūtras, master the Vinaya, master the māṭṛkā — they will become fierce and will overcome others, and then they will think to harm us." Charka said: "I shall arrange it so that they will not understand what they do not yet understand, and will lose even the understanding they already have."

The seventeen monks lit a lamp in the fire-room and began their recitation. Then the Venerable Charka wrapped himself in an animal skin with the fur turned outward, entered the fire-room, extinguished the lamp, and cried: "A spirit! A spirit!" At that, the seventeen were seized with terror and fled out of the fire-room, and they gathered in a corner.

Their teacher saw them and said: "Young men, why do you sit here in silence without doing your recitation?" They said: "Teacher, we were frightened by a non-human being." He thought: "The Jeta Grove is never empty, for five hundred yakṣas clad in blue robes dwell there always — and here there may well be a non-human being. Some rogue with a black begging bowl, a scoundrel who roams about everywhere, has terrified these lads." He said: "Young men, do you wish to catch that non-human being?" They said: "We do." He said: "Young men, place lamps at the four corners of the fire-room, and set a lamp in the middle on top of an earthenware pot, then recite. If it comes and extinguishes the lamp in the middle and cries 'A spirit! A spirit!', bar the door, uncover the lamps at the four corners of the fire-room, and seize it."

They did as instructed. Before long, the Venerable Charka wrapped himself in an animal skin with the fur turned outward, entered the fire-room, extinguished the lamp in the middle, and cried: "A spirit! A spirit!" They barred the door, uncovered the lamps at the four corners of the fire-room, seized him, and began to beat him. He cried: "Charka! Charka!" They said: "Did you think that by crying 'It is Charka — he is our friend' in your heart's distress we would release you? We will not release you until the warmth of death leaves your body." They said: "Venerable ones, even killing a very great non-human being brings only a heavy offence — so we confessed our transgression and then beat him thoroughly." They pummeled him soundly and let him go.

Charka crept away, dragging himself back to his own dwelling. The next day he lay on a couch while others rubbed and massaged his body with oil and ghee. The monks said to him: "Venerable Charka, what is wrong with you?" Charka said: "Venerable ones, for having done just a small wrongful thing, such a misfortune as this has befallen me." "What did you do?" He then recounted the whole matter in full. The monks said to him: "Is it fitting for you to frighten monks? Because it is not fitting, exactly this kind of misfortune has befallen you. Why do monks who care so little for the Dharma reproach, abuse, slander, and denounce other monks for frightening them?"

The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, in connection with this incident, this founding case, and this occasion, convened an assembly of the Saṅgha of monks — and so on as before.

The blessed buddhas, though knowing, act as if they do not know:

And so on as before, with the five-part formula. The Blessed One, the Buddha, then questioned the venerable Charka: "Charka, is it true that you frightened a monk?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Blessed One then censured him, saying that what is not the way of a contemplative, what is not fitting, what is not proper, what is not in accordance with the training — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth. After censuring him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits with full discernment, a rule of training for the hearers is to be established in the Vinaya," and so on as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk frightens a monk, or causes another to frighten a monk — even if it was only intended as a joke — commits a transgression.

As for the phrase 'whatever monk': this refers to Charka or anyone else of that kind. 'A monk' means one who belongs to this Dharma community. 'Frightens' means does so himself. 'Causes another to frighten' means through someone else. 'Even if it was only intended as a joke' means even if it was only intended as a prank. 'Commits a transgression': this means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the states of ruin. Moreover, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome phenomena — and therefore it is said to 'commit a transgression.'

As for how a transgression arises in this context: when a monk, with the intention of frightening another monk, produces appearances — such as a hungry ghost, a flesh-eater, a skeleton, or a rotting corpse with black crows, or like a burning post or charred timber — unpleasant forms of that kind, and then asserts, 'These will carry you off; these will kill you; these will deprive you of your life' — then, whether fear arises in the other monk or not, he commits a transgression against that monk.

When a monk, with the intention of frightening another monk, produces sounds — such as a hungry ghost, a flesh-eater, a skeleton, or a rotting corpse making sounds like those of a lion, a tiger, a bear, an owl, a leopard, or a fox — unpleasant sounds of that kind, and then asserts, 'These will carry you off; these will kill you; these will deprive you of your life' — then, whether fear arises in the other monk or not, he commits a transgression against that monk.

When a monk, with the intention of frightening another monk, produces smells — such as those of a hungry ghost, a flesh-eater, a skeleton, or a rotting corpse: the smell of excrement and urine, or a smell like that of a goat or goat's bile — unpleasant smells of that kind, and then asserts, 'These will carry you off; these will kill you; these will deprive you of your life' — then, whether fear arises in the other monk or not, he commits a transgression against that monk.

When a monk, with the intention of frightening another monk, produces tactile sensations — such as those of a hungry ghost, a flesh-eater, a skeleton, or a rotting corpse: a burning touch, a stinging touch, a touch like being slapped — unpleasant tactile sensations of that kind, and then asserts, 'These will carry you off; these will kill you; these will deprive you of your life' —

then asserts, 'These will carry you off; these will kill you; these will deprive you of your life' — then, whether fear arises in the other monk or not, he commits a transgression against that monk.

When a monk, with the intention of frightening another monk, produces pleasant visual forms — such as those of gods, nāgas, gandharvas (dri za, scent-eaters), yakṣas, kinaras (mi 'am ci, half-human beings), or great serpents; or of kings, great ministers, brahmins, householders, the wealthy, merchants, or caravan leaders — and then asserts, 'These will carry you off; these will kill you; these will deprive you of your life' — then, whether fear arises in the other monk or not, he commits a misdeed against that monk.

When a monk, with the intention of frightening another monk, produces pleasant sounds — such as those of gods, nāgas, gandharvas, yakṣas, kinaras, or great serpents; sounds like those of the vīṇā, the flute, the paṇava drum, the mahāti, or the sughoṣaka — and then asserts, 'These will carry you off; these will kill you; these will deprive you of your life' — then, whether fear arises in the other monk or not, he commits a misdeed against that monk.

When a monk, with the intention of frightening another monk, produces pleasant scents — such as those of gods, nāgas, gandharvas, yakṣas, kinaras, or great serpents; scents like those of agaru, sandalwood, saffron, or the leaves of the tamāla tree — and then asserts, 'These will carry you off; these will kill you; these will deprive you of your life' — then, whether fear arises in the other monk or not, he commits a misdeed against that monk.

When a monk, with the intention of frightening another monk, produces pleasant tactile sensations — such as those of gods, nāgas, gandharvas, yakṣas, kinaras, or great serpents; sensations like the touch of silk, of fine cotton cloth, of fine linen, of taffeta, of dukūla fabric, or of kauṭamba cloth — and then asserts, 'These will carry you off; these will kill you; these will deprive you of your life' — then, whether fear arises in the other monk or not, he commits a misdeed against that monk.

However, when one speaks of the hells, of the animal realm, of hungry ghosts, of gods, or of humans for the purpose of generating weariness and disenchantment, there is no transgression. There is likewise no transgression in the case of one who is a novice, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by painful sensations.

The sixty-sixth section on transgressions involving frightening is complete.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the sixty-second bundle.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana had ordained and fully ordained seventeen groups of young men, beginning with those in his own inner circle, such as Saṃprasanna. At that point those seventeen groups began to associate with, befriend, and pay reverence to the group of six monks. A certain householder had invited the buddha and the Saṅgha of monks to his home for a midday meal, and the buddha together with the Saṅgha of monks set out. The group of six monks and the group of seventeen followed along behind.

Now, along the road there was a pond full of water. The group of six monks said to the group of seventeen: "O group of seventeen, if you and we are truly well matched, come, little ones — let us see who can sink and stay under the water the longest." The seventeen replied, "So be it," and all of them entered the water. Then one of their companions came up out of the water, hid the robes of the group of seventeen under a clump of earth, and left them there. The group of six monks quickly came up out of the pond, put on their robes, and left. When the group of seventeen surfaced, the group of six were nowhere to be seen. "It would not be right for them to have beaten us," the seventeen said, and they too ducked back under the water. They came up again and again and looked around, but still the group of six were nowhere in sight. Thinking, "They must still be beneath the water," the seventeen said to one another, "Venerable ones, the group of six have hidden our robes and gone off." Since not a single robe was to be found, they said, "Venerable ones, they have made fools of us." So they came up out of the pond and stood to one side.

The venerable Śāriputra and the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, together with a retinue of five hundred, were traveling through the Kosala regions on a teaching tour and had arrived at the Jeta Grove. Upon arriving, they found the Jeta Grove empty, and the two of them said to one another, "Where has the Saṅgha of monks gone, headed by the Buddha? A householder must have invited them." They said, "Let the two of us also go there and take our meal." So the two of them set off.

As they went, the venerable Śāriputra saw the group of seventeen playing by the bank of the pond. Seeing this, he said to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, "Look at the state of your disciples." The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana replied, "Since they do not heed my words, what am I to do?" The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana then said to the group of seventeen, "Young ones, it is not right that the hour is already past midday — cross the water and come along." They said, "Preceptor, the group of six monks have hidden our robes." The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana wondered, "Did they carry them off, or did they hide them here on the spot?" Perceiving that the robes had in fact been hidden right there, he retrieved them and gave them to the monks. The group of seventeen put on their robes and set off.

When the venerable Śāriputra and Mahāmaudgalyāyana arrived and began to settle the monks, the group of seventeen likewise stirred the monks into commotion. The monks said to them, "Venerable ones, the venerable Śāriputra and the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana have come here having carried out their work of guiding beings; it is fitting that those two should settle the monks for a while. What have you done that you now come here and create a disturbance among the monks?" The seventeen replied, "Venerable ones, if our preceptor has failed to look after us, we shall be cut off from food." Whereupon they explained the matter in full.

The monks who had little desire then censured, reproached, and criticized them, saying: "Why do monks hide the robes of other monks?" This situation was then reported to the Blessed One by the monks. Thereupon the Blessed One convened the Saṅgha of monks in relation to this incident, this founding case, and this situation — and the rest proceeds as before.

"The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though they know, act as though they do not know" — and so forth, as before. The Blessed One then questioned the group of six monks: "Is it true, monks, that you hid the robes of other monks?" "Venerable One, it is not true." The Blessed One censured them, saying: "This is not the conduct of a renunciant, it is not in accordance with what is fitting, it is not proper, it is not in keeping with the discipline — this is not something one who has gone forth should do." Then, having censured them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Therefore, having seen the ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "Let my hearers recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: Any monk whatsoever who hides, or has another hide, the alms bowl, robe, straining cloth, cup, belt, or any other requisite belonging to the livelihood of a renunciant belonging to a monk, a nun, a probationer, a novice monk, or a novice nun — he commits a transgression."

Thus did the Blessed One establish this training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya.

Then it happened that one monk placed robes in the keeping of another monk's hands, and a frightening situation arose. That monk hid his own robes but did not hide the robes of the other monk, and those who take what is not given stole them, leaving that monk destitute. The monks then informed the Blessed One of this, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, with the exception of such a circumstance."

Thereupon the Blessed One, having praised those who desire the training, who are respectful toward the training, and who are well-disposed toward the training, addressed the monks with a discourse containing what is foremost in that spirit, in accord with it, and consonant with it. Then he addressed the monks: "Monks, whereas the former was prescribed, this is now permitted. Let my hearers recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: Any monk whatsoever who hides, or has another hide, the alms bowl, robe, straining cloth, cup, belt, or any other requisite belonging to the livelihood of a renunciant belonging to a monk, a nun, a probationer, a novice monk, or a novice nun — except in such a circumstance — commits a transgression."

Now in the phrase "any monk whatsoever," this means a son of the Śākya, a friend of virtue, or anyone else of that kind. "A monk, a nun, a probationer, a novice monk, or a novice nun" means those who belong to this Dharma. "Alms bowl" means the alms bowl itself. "Robe" means any one of the seven kinds. "Straining cloth" means the vessel for the alms bowl. "Cup" means a water cup. "Belt" means a strap, a twisted cord, a broad band, or a small strap. "Any other requisite belonging to the livelihood of a renunciant" means anything else besides those enumerated. "Hides" means by oneself. "Has another hide" means through another. "Except in such a circumstance" means setting aside such a circumstance as that. "Commits a transgression" means: it causes one to burn, to be scorched, and to fall into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of the hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies, into the states of wrong downfall. Moreover, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — and therefore it is said that one commits a transgression.

Now, how does a transgression come about? When a monk, even to the slightest degree, hides — or has another hide — the alms bowl, robe, straining cloth, cup, a belt, or any requisite for the livelihood of a renunciant — hides it or causes another to hide it — in every case this constitutes a transgression. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one who has a disturbed mind, or for one who is afflicted by feeling. This concludes the sixty-seventh transgression, that of concealment.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At the time when the venerable Charka had abandoned all afflictions and directly realized arhatship, the venerable Undana departed for Kauśāmbī, and he went about very bent and stooped; both Nābhasa and the two others arrived at their time. Ānanda and Upananda were both present within the Saṅgha. At that time the venerable Upananda had grown old. He dwelt together with Ānanda, but since none of his attendants obeyed him and his robes had become soiled, and since he was unable to wash and reverse them himself, it occurred to him to devise a means. So he gave out those robes to those who dwelt with him and to his attendants: to some he gave an under-robe, to some an upper robe, to some a lower robe.

They said to him: "Preceptor, shall we wash these, turn them, and return them?" He replied: "Children, since I am old, these are now yours." And so, out of their own longing for them, they washed those robes well and turned them well.

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'The Tathāgata is about to journey to the Kośala regions. Whoever among you wishes to travel together with the Tathāgata to the Kośala regions — let him perform the robe transaction.'"

The venerable Ānanda, having listened to the Blessed One and replied "Reverend Sir, as you command," announced to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Tathāgata is about to journey to the Kośala regions. Whoever among you wishes to travel together with the Tathāgata to the Kośala regions — let him perform the robe transaction."

Upon hearing this announcement, the monks took up their robes and went to a certain monk and said: "Venerable one, we entrust these robes of ours to you for the time being. We are going on the road-tour together with the Blessed One." That monk asked: "Is your preceptor also going?" They said: "He is not going." He replied: "Then entrust them to him today himself. It is not right for me to cause a break within my own circle."

They then went to their preceptor and said: "Preceptor, we entrust these robes to you for the time being. We are going on the road-tour together with the Blessed One." The preceptor replied: "Venerable ones, even if I were a monk of good moral discipline bound with grass, I would still act according to the proper time — I have no wish to keep them. Entrust them to the hand of some other monk who is your friend."

They said: "Preceptor, who is a better friend to us than you? We place them in your very hands." The preceptor said: "In that case, take a good mark and set them down. When I return, each one of you can easily take your own." They set those robes there and went off on the road-tour together with the Blessed One.

The preceptor, opening one bundle, took out a patched under-robe, and wearing it exactly as soiled as it was, he wore and wore it, then put it back into that very bundle.

In the same way he took out an upper robe from a second bundle, wore it, and in this manner made use of all the robes, wearing each until it was thoroughly soiled, then folded them back exactly as they had been and set them down.

In due time the Blessed One completed his tour of the provinces and departed for Śrāvastī. A householder heard that the Blessed One had made a provincial tour together with the Saṅgha of monks and had come to Śrāvastī, and he invited the Buddha and the Saṅgha of monks who had just arrived on short notice for a meal at midday. The monks thought: "We left our travel robes here. Let us wear our other robes and go." They went to where their friend was, pulled out the bundles of robes and looked at them — but the robes had become so soiled they could not recognize them. The monks said: "Preceptor, are these our robes?" The friend said: "Venerable ones, I did tell you: 'Even if I were bound with grass, I — a monk who keeps moral discipline — would keep my appointed duties. Take a good mark and set them down; when I return, each of you can easily take his own.' Did I not say that?" Just then one monk recognized his own robes by their distinctive marks and said: "Venerable ones, these robes are mine — and the preceptor has been using them." The friend said: "Poor fellows, do not be upset." They replied: "Venerable ones, our travel robes are far better than these — let us simply put on our travel robes and go." And so they put on their travel robes and came. When the other monks saw them, they said: "Venerable ones, you left your robes packed away — why have you come wearing your travel robes?" They replied: "We did leave them packed away." "Then why were you not wearing those?" They then recounted the whole matter in full, and some monks of few desires criticized, rebuked, and condemned: "Why does a monk give his robes to a fellow monk and then use them shamelessly in the meantime?"

Those monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence and this founding case and these circumstances, convened the Saṅgha of monks — and so forth as before. The phrase "The blessed buddhas, though knowing, make enquiry" — and what follows — likewise proceeds as before. The blessed Buddha then questioned the son of the Śākya, the friend: "Friend, is it true that you gave robes to a monk and then used them shamelessly in the meantime?" "It is true, Venerable One." The blessed Buddha rebuked him: "What an unworthy act, what is not in keeping, not proper, not consonant with the ascetic life — this is not something one who has gone forth should do." And he rebuked him in many categories.

He then addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, a training rule is to be established for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk gives a robe to a fellow monk and then uses it shamelessly in the meantime commits an offense.

'Whatever monk' means a son of the Śākya such as the friend, or anyone else of that kind. 'To a fellow monk' means to one who belongs to this Dharma community. 'Robe' means any one of the three: the patched under-robe, the upper robe, or the lower robe. 'Gives' means gives without retaining possession. 'In the meantime' means at some other time thereafter."

"Shamelessly" means without having received permission. "Uses" means wears it. "Commits an offense" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad rebirths of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of wrong falling. Furthermore, as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — and that is why it is said to "commit an offense."

Now, one may ask: how exactly does the offense arise? If a monk gives so much as a small amount of robe to a fellow monk and then uses it afterwards without having received permission, in every such case an offense is committed. If, however, the giving was pleasurable, welcomed, and agreeable to the recipient, and upon hearing of it the recipient feels great delight, then no offense is incurred. No offense is incurred either for one who acts for the first time, for one who is mentally deranged, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful sensations. The sixty-eighth training rule among those that cause downfall through the livelihood supported by giving is now complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Bamboo Grove. At that time the venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo was staying on Vulture Peak Mountain in Rājagṛha. Not very far from there was a pond called the Stone-Walled Pond, and beside it the venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo used to spend the daytime. During the time when, relying on the virtuous friend of the complexion of a blue lotus — the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana — he had gone forth into the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya and had attained the victory of an arhat, he recognized this and, filled with faith, would go again and again to pay his respects to the Blessed One and to the elder monks and nuns of the Saṅgha. More particularly, seeing that the venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo, although he had brought himself to meditate on the eight liberations of an arhat, had set aside the bliss of meditative concentration, liberation, and entering into meditative absorption, and was instead striving diligently in the tasks of the Saṅgha's communal affairs — perceiving this as something difficult to do — he would go again and again to observe him.

Then on another occasion, after paying homage at the feet of the Blessed One and of the elder monks, he went to where the venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo was, arrived there, and with his head bowed to the venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo's two feet, sat down before him to listen to the Dharma.

At that time two monks — a friend and one born of the earth — found a rag used for sweeping. Both of them had been going after the venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo life after life, and had constantly been striving to find fault with him. The friend said: "Born of earth, where should we launder this sweeping rag?" The one born of the earth replied: "The Stone-Walled Pond has little traffic and a clean surrounding, so let us go there." The two of them took the sweeping rag and went to the Stone-Walled Pond, washed it there, and laid it out in the sun to dry.

At that time a corner of the venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo's monastic robe was blown by the wind and touched the head of the nun of the complexion of a blue lotus. The friend saw this, and said: "Born of earth, a Saṅgha remainder has arisen here — Gyabu Norgyalpo has had physical contact with the body of the nun of the complexion of a blue lotus. Go and report this to the monks." The one born of the earth replied: "Venerable friend, at this moment, if we two first perform the act of suspension while remaining in the assembly — would you actually want to carry out the act of suspension while remaining in the assembly?" The friend said:

"Venerable one born of earth, at that time it was not in accordance with truth on your part, whereas on my part it is in accordance with truth. Did not the Blessed One say that the term 'lanu' refers to hair and garments connected with it? How could there be any falsehood here, venerable one? Come now — let us go and report this to the monks." The one born of earth, having been deceived by his friend and thus won over, the two of them went to the temple and spoke to the monks: "Venerable ones, we two have witnessed a Saṅgha remainder arising through physical contact between Venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo and the nun of the complexion of a blue lotus. In whose faith or trust should we two now place reliance?" The monks said: "Venerable ones, are you two bundling together gods and humans alike, and likewise abiding together among hell-beings, hungry ghosts, and animals? Or are you two making a baseless accusation under a Saṅgha remainder charge against the monk who is an arhat, accomplished in the eight liberations, absorbed in meditation, displaying the miraculous powers supreme among human qualities?" The two replied: "Venerable ones, we two have not erred in this matter. Surely, what our own eyes have seen — should we gouge out those eyes? The Blessed One has commanded: examine carefully what you two saw, how you saw it, and where you saw it; on what basis did you two go there, and thereby see it — discuss this thoroughly and investigate it." The monks then questioned the two thoroughly: what did you see, how did you see it, and where did you see it, and why, having gone there, did you see it there — they discussed and investigated this thoroughly. When a great many monks had discussed and investigated it thoroughly, the two said: "Venerable ones, there was no Saṅgha remainder of physical contact between Venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo and the nun of the complexion of a blue lotus. Rather, we two spoke against Venerable Gyabu Norgyalpo out of desire, out of aversion, out of delusion, and out of fear." The monks of few wants thereupon criticized them, asking why monks would make a baseless Saṅgha remainder accusation against a monk who is pure and free from transgression. They rebuked them, cast them out, and spoke against them. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this origin of the rule, and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and all the rest follows as before. "The blessed buddhas, though fully knowing, feign inquiry" — and so forth, as before. The blessed Buddha then addressed the friend and the one born of earth: "Monks, is it true that you two, aroused to anger and filled with aversion, made a baseless Saṅgha remainder accusation against a monk who is pure and free from transgression?" "Venerable sir, it is so." The blessed Buddha then censured them, saying that this is conduct unworthy of a renunciant, not in accord, not fitting — such behavior is not what one who has gone forth should do. He rebuked them accordingly.

Then, having censured them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall lay down a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and all the rest follows as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Should any monk, aroused to anger and filled with aversion, make a baseless accusation under a Saṅgha remainder charge against a monk who is pure and free from transgression, he commits a transgression."

Now, "any monk" means a friend, or one born of the soil, or anyone else of that kind.

"Aroused to anger" means being disturbed and agitated.

"Filled with aversion" means having become mentally displeased — that is, the disturbance has not yet become manifest.

"A monk who is pure" means the venerable Gyadbu Nor, or anyone else of that kind.

"Free from transgression" means free from transgression in respect of that particular basis.

"Baseless" means without any of the three bases — the basis of what was seen, the basis of what was heard, and the basis of what was suspected.

"Under a Saṅgha remainder charge" means under any one of the thirteen. This is something that is not Dharma, yet is spoken of by the name of Dharma.

"He makes an accusation" means he slanders another.

"He commits a transgression" — this means it burns him, it scorches him, it causes him to fall into hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of wrong descent. Moreover, for as long as that transgression is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs wholesome dharmas. For this reason, it is called "a transgression."

Now, how does a transgression come about in this matter? When one makes a baseless accusation against a pure person, a transgression arises through ten bases, whereas through five bases no transgression arises.

How does a transgression arise through ten bases? When, with respect to what one has not seen, not heard, and not suspected, one shifts one's perception and alters one's acceptance, intention, understanding, thought, and view — and then declares, "I saw it," "I heard it," "I suspect it" — every single utterance constitutes a transgression.

When one has heard something and remembers it, and when one suspects something and remembers it, yet one shifts one's perception and alters one's acceptance, intention, understanding, thought, and view — and then says, "I heard it and I have not forgotten it," "I suspect it and I have not forgotten it" — every single utterance constitutes a transgression.

When, trusting in what one has heard, one says "I saw it"; when, not trusting in what one has heard, one says "I saw it"; when, on the basis of what one has heard, one suspects it and then says "I saw it"; when, on the basis of what one has heard, one does not suspect it and then says "I saw it"; and when, on the basis of what one suspects, one suspects and then says "I saw it" — every single utterance constitutes a transgression. In this way, a transgression arises through ten bases.

How does no transgression arise through five bases? When, with respect to what one has not seen, not heard, and not suspected, one does not shift one's perception and does not alter one's acceptance, intention, understanding, thought, and view — and yet says, "I saw it," "I heard it," "I suspect it" — no transgression arises.

When one has heard something and has forgotten it, and when one suspects something and has forgotten it, yet one does not shift one's perception and does not alter one's acceptance, intention, understanding, thought, and view — and then says, "I heard it and I have forgotten it," "I suspected it and I have forgotten it" — no transgression arises. In this way, no transgression arises through five bases.

Just as making a baseless accusation against a pure person results in a transgression through ten bases and no transgression through five bases, in the same way, making a baseless accusation against a pure person whom one has treated as impure likewise results in a transgression through ten bases and no transgression through five bases.

When one makes a baseless accusation against an impure person, however, a transgression arises through eleven bases, and no transgression arises through six bases. How does a transgression arise through eleven bases? When, with respect to what one has not seen, not heard, and not suspected, one shifts one's perception and alters one's acceptance, intention, desire, understanding, thought, and view, and then says "I saw it," "I heard it," "I suspected it," then everything one has said constitutes a transgression. If one saw it and then forgot it, heard it and then forgot it, or suspected it and then forgot it, and then, having shifted one's perception, acceptance, desire, understanding, thought, and view, says "I saw it and have not forgotten it," "I heard it and have not forgotten it," "I suspected it and have not forgotten it," then likewise everything one has said constitutes a transgression. If, believing what one has heard, one says "I saw it"; if, not believing what one has heard, one says "I saw it"; if, having doubts about what one has heard, one says "I saw it"; if, having no doubts about what one has heard, one says "I saw it"; or if, having suspected something, one says "I saw it" — all of these constitute transgressions. In this way a transgression arises through eleven bases.

How does no transgression arise through six bases? When, with respect to what one has not seen, not heard, and not suspected, one does not shift one's perception, acceptance, desire, understanding, thought, or view, and yet says "I saw it," "I heard it," "I suspected it," no transgression arises. If one saw it and then forgot it, heard it and then forgot it, or suspected it and then forgot it, and yet, without shifting one's perception, acceptance, desire, understanding, thought, or view, says "I saw it and have not forgotten it," "I heard it and have not forgotten it," "I suspected it and have not forgotten it," no transgression arises. In this way no transgression arises through six bases.

Just as a baseless accusation against an impure person results in a transgression through eleven bases and no transgression through six bases, so too a baseless accusation against an impure person whom one has treated as pure likewise results in a transgression through eleven bases and no transgression through six bases.

There is no transgression when an announcement has already been made publicly. There is likewise no transgression from the point at which it has been inscribed as a painted image on a wall, if one thinks: "Just as I know it, so too does the entire world." There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one who has a disturbed mind, or for one who is overwhelmed by painful feelings.

This completes the sixty-ninth transgression-producing offense, that of making a baseless accusation.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In Rājagṛha there lived a weaver named Spyi-cer. He took as his wife the daughter of a weaver from Śrāvastī, and he repeatedly struck that young woman with his fists and the flat of his hand. A certain old woman lived in the neighboring dwelling, and the young woman went to the old woman and said: "Mother, this husband of mine repeatedly strikes me with his fists and the flat of his hand, and I am fleeing." The old woman replied: "Daughter, so long as you have not borne a son for him, he will strike you. But once you have borne him a son, he will come to love you. Do not flee; stay." And the old woman then said this to the weaver Spyi-cer:

"My son, if this young woman should flee because you repeatedly strike her with your fists and the flat of your hand, that would not be right. From now on, do not strike her." Yet the weaver Spyi-cer, though the old woman had spoken to turn him back in this way, could not be restrained, and thereafter he went on repeatedly striking that young woman with his fists and the flat of his hand.

Then on another occasion, that weaver drank liquor at a tavern, and in his intoxication he went home and beat that young woman severely. The young woman thought to herself: "Before I have borne him a son, if he kills me in the meantime, that would not be right. Even though I have no son, it is better for me to flee and go." And so, once she knew that the weaver had fallen asleep, she slipped out the very moment the front door was opened and fled.

Now a monk who had undertaken to spend the rains retreat in Rājagṛha was traveling up to Śrāvastī to pay his respects at the feet of the Blessed One — and he too had come out the moment the front door was opened and set off. The young woman saw this monk and asked him: "Noble one, where are you going?" The monk replied: "Sister, I am going to Śrāvastī." The young woman said: "I too am going to Śrāvastī. Let me travel together with the noble one." "Do so then." And the young woman set out, traveling along together with that monk.

Now when the weaver Spyi-cer had slept off his intoxication and woke up, he found the young woman nowhere to be seen, and he went to the old woman next door and asked: "Mother, the young woman is nowhere to be found." The old woman said: "My son, did I not say to you from the very beginning that you should not strike her, for if she were to flee it would not be right? She has apparently fled and gone. Ask the gatekeeper." The weaver went and asked the gatekeeper: "Hail, doorkeeper — did a young woman come out through this gate?" The gatekeeper replied: "She came out the very moment the front gate was opened and went." The weaver climbed up onto a rampart and looked out ahead, and when he saw that she had gone only a great distance away, he came down quickly and gave chase. He was gaining on them, but then he saw that she was traveling together with a monk, and he thought: "I am alone, and these two are two together. If I were to seize her, both of them together might turn on me and beat me — that kind of situation could arise. I will seize her when I find some companions." And so he followed along behind the two of them.

In time they came to a rocky cliff, and at that cliff some five hundred weavers were encamped. The weaver Spyi-cer went to them and said: "Good friends, if you are kinsmen of mine, then help me — a śramaṇa (Skt. śramaṇa), a son of the Śākyas, has taken away my wife." And he incited them to shoot arrows in that direction. The weavers, being entirely without discernment, grabbed up about five hundred shuttles from their looms, came out from the cliff, and beat the monk severely. They also broke his almsbowl, smashed his bowl and his ladle, tore his robes, and thinking him dead, they left him there.

The young woman said to the monk: "Noble one, have you not received from the king the privilege of being exempt from prosecution as a youth? Go to the king and speak. Ask that the hands and feet of these men be cut off." The men, frightened, began to beg the monk's forgiveness and said: "Noble one, please forgive us." The monk's heart was gentle as butter, and he said: "I forgive you." But the young woman said: "Even if the noble one forgives, I do not forgive." Then the men said to the young woman: "Sister, you are a kinswoman of ours — you too should forgive." The young woman replied: "I may forgive you, but I cannot forgive the weaver Spyi-cer here —

I will have his hands and feet cut off." The men said to the weaver: "Forgive him as well." The young woman replied: "I will forgive him on a pledge — if he promises never to beat me again, I will forgive him." The weaver said: "I will never beat you again." The young woman said: "If that is so, then I forgive you."

The monk then gradually made his way to Śrāvastī. When the other monks saw him, they said: "Welcome, venerable one, welcome! How was your journey? Venerable ones, how was your journey?" He replied: "Fellow monks, the weavers almost cost me my life and my companion along with it." When asked why, he recounted the whole episode in detail. The monks then said to him: "Is it fitting for a man without a male companion to travel on the road together with a woman? Precisely because it is not fitting, this kind of trouble arose." And the monks, because of the small number of things at stake, nevertheless reproached him, saying: "Why does a monk travel on the road together with a woman without a male companion?" They blamed him, threw it in his face, and spoke ill of him. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One — seeing that this incident had occurred, that this was the originating circumstance, and that this was the occasion — convened the assembly of monks, and so forth, just as before. The Blessed Buddhas, knowing yet feigning not to know, and so forth, likewise as before. The Blessed Buddha questioned that monk: "Monk, is it true that you traveled on the road together with a woman without a male companion?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Blessed Buddha then reprimanded him, saying that such conduct was unworthy of a wandering ascetic, was not in keeping with the rule, was not proper, was not in conformity with the discipline, and that one who has gone forth should not act in this way. After rebuking him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya," and so forth, just as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk travels on the road together with a woman without a male companion — even if only as far as a village — commits an offense.

Now, 'whatever monk' refers to one of this kind or any other similar case. 'Without a male companion' refers to the specific situation. 'Together with a woman' refers to a woman or a young girl who is capable of engaging in unchaste conduct, the act of sexual intercourse. 'Travels on the road' means traveling on a path through a wilderness. 'Even as far as a village' means even as far as the distance of one krośa. 'Commits an offense' means it causes one to burn, to be tormented, and to fall into a hell-being existence, into the animal realm, into the wretched realm of hungry ghosts, into evil rebirths, and into downfall states. Furthermore, for as long as that offense is neither confessed nor individually confessed, it obstructs virtuous qualities — and therefore it is said to 'commit an offense.'

As to how the offense arises: however little distance a monk travels on the road together with a woman without a male companion, in all cases he commits an offense. If a village is separated from a wilderness by seven krośas, and a monk travels from the village into the wilderness, then for every half-krośa he incurs a wrongdoing, and for every full krośa he commits an offense. And if he travels from the wilderness to the village, likewise for every half-krośa he incurs a wrongdoing, and for every full krośa he commits an offense. However, when a monk goes ahead to show a woman the way, when a woman who has lost the path shows a monk the way, when a monk who is unable to travel is led by a woman, there is no offense. There is no offense for one who is a beginner, for one who is mad, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one who is threatened by feelings of pain.

This completes the seventieth rule entailing a wrongdoing, concerning traveling together with a woman.

A summary verse:

Theft, and those under twenty,
Digging, hospitality, training,
Fighting, not speaking, traveling,
Disrespect, drinking liquor at the wrong time.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A certain monk had accepted the rains retreat at Rājagṛha, in the Bamboo Grove of Kalandaka. When the three months of the rains retreat had passed, that monk, having obtained his robe-cloth and received his robe, took up his alms bowl and robes and set out to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One, seeking companions for the journey to Śrāvastī. He saw some merchants who were dice-players and said to them, "Wise ones, where are you going?" They replied, "Noble one, we are going to Śrāvastī." He said, "Wise ones, I too will go to Śrāvastī together with you." They replied, "Noble one, please do so." But then they thought it would be inconvenient, felt regret, and said to him, "Noble one, we are merchants who play dice: we travel at the right time and at the wrong time, we travel ahead and we travel out of the way, so it would not be fitting for you to travel together with us." He said, "Are you going empty-handed, or will you be carrying loads?" They replied, "We will be going with loads." He said, "Since you will be going with loads, why can I not go behind you, going empty-handed?" They replied, "If you will do so, then go ahead in this direction and wait for us there until we arrive." He went on ahead and waited there. In due course the dice-playing merchants arrived and set out together with him. After some time they reached a certain cliff, a haunt of dice-players, and the dice-playing merchants, fearing bandits who cut off travelers, began to make their way by a side road, while that monk went on ahead. As they were traveling by the side road, some dice-players spotted them and said, "Hey, you dice-playing merchants, where are you going?" Seeing the monk going ahead, the dice-players said, "Wise ones, do not harm these dice-playing merchants — but that Śākyaṇ śramaṇa going ahead has wronged us, so let us kill him." They beat that monk severely, smashed his alms bowl, broke his wooden dish and his spoon, tore his robes, and threw him aside thinking he was dead. The dice-playing merchants then said to the monk, "Noble one, since you have obtained from the king the protection due to a young man of rank, go before the king and speak, and let him have the hands and feet of these dice-players cut off." The dice-players, terrified, began to beg forgiveness of the monk and said, "Noble one, we beg you to grant us your forgiveness." The mind of the monk was like butter, and he said, "I forgive you." The dice-playing merchants said, "Even if the noble one forgives them, we do not." The dice-players said, "You too should forgive." The dice-playing merchants replied, "We will forgive under this pledge: if you dice-players, however many you are, prevent us merchants, however many we are, from being robbed by dice-players, then we too will forgive." The dice-players granted this to the merchants. The monk eventually arrived at Śrāvastī, and the monks spoke to him saying:

"Welcome, venerable one, welcome! How was your journey? Was the journey comfortable for the venerable one?" He replied, "The dice-players struck and beat me terribly." He then recounted the whole episode in detail. The monks said to him, "Is it fitting for you to travel the road together with a like-minded thief? It is precisely because it is not fitting that such faults and harms as these have come about." Monks of few concerns — why do they censure, rebuke, and reproach monks, saying, "Why should monks travel the road together with a like-minded thief?" At that point, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then convened the community of monks regarding this incident, this origin story, and this occasion — and the rest is as before. "The blessed buddhas, though fully knowing, act as if they do not know" — and so forth, also as before. The Blessed One then asked that monk, "Monk, is it true that you traveled the road together with a like-minded thief?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Blessed One rebuked him, saying that this was not the conduct of an ascetic, was not in accord with the training, was not proper, was not in conformity with the rule, and was not what one who has gone forth should do. The Blessed One rebuked him again and again in many ways. He then declared to the monks, "Therefore, having seen the ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and the rest is as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule of the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk travels the road together with a like-minded thief — even as far as a single village — commits a transgression.

Now, in this rule, 'whatever monk' means one who is of this Dharma or of another community of the same kind. 'Together with a like-minded thief' — 'thief' refers to those bandits who raid and plunder villages, and merchants who cheat at dice. 'Travel the road' means to travel along a path leading through a wilderness. 'Even as far as a single village' means even as far as a single league. 'Commits a transgression' means that it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinies of hell-beings, animals, and hungry ghosts, into the lower realms and the states of wrong falling. Furthermore, so long as the transgression is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome dharmas — therefore it is said to be a transgression.

As for how the transgression arises: however little a monk may travel the road together with a like-minded thief, he commits a transgression in every case. Among seven villages separated from one another by a league: if a monk travels from a village to a wilderness hermitage, at every half-league he incurs a fault, and at every full league he commits a transgression. Likewise, if he travels from a wilderness hermitage to a village, at every half-league he incurs a fault, and at every full league he commits a transgression. There is no transgression if one joins a thief in order to drive him away, if one is led onto the road by a thief when one has lost one's way, or if one is led away by a thief when one is unable to go on one's own. There is no transgression for one who is a novice, for one who is mad, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one who is afflicted by painful feelings.

The seventy-first transgression, that of traveling the road together with a thief, is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana gave going forth and full ordination to the group beginning with Upāli and other young novices — seventeen groups in all. Then, at the hour of the predawn watches of the night, those newly ordained were overwhelmed by the distress of hunger and wept.

At the hour of the predawn watches of the night, the Blessed One heard the sound of a great many young children crying inside the grove. Having heard it, he addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, who are these many young children crying inside the grove at this hour of the predawn watches?"

"Venerable one, it is those whom the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana gave going forth and full ordination — the group beginning with Upāli and the other young novices, seventeen groups in all. They are weeping, overwhelmed by the distress of hunger at this predawn hour."

"Ānanda, do monks give full ordination as monks to persons who have not yet reached the age of twenty?"

"Venerable one, they do."

"Ānanda, a person who has not reached the age of twenty is by nature unable to endure cold, heat, hunger, thirst, wind, sun, horseflies, mosquitoes and biting insects, contact with venomous snakes, harsh words spoken by others, ill treatment that comes upon one, and all the bodily feelings of suffering that arise — unbearable, rough, hot, disagreeable, life-threatening — nor is such a person able to endure defilements or be willing to regard them with resolve, or to accept and bear them."

"A person who has reached the age of twenty is by nature able to endure cold, heat, hunger, thirst, wind, sun, horseflies, mosquitoes and biting insects, contact with venomous snakes, harsh words spoken by others, ill treatment that comes upon one, and all the bodily feelings of suffering that arise — unbearable, rough, hot, disagreeable, life-threatening — and is able to endure defilements, to regard them with resolve, and to accept and bear them."

Thereupon the Blessed One convened an assembly of monks on account of this occurrence, this basis for the teaching, and this occasion — and so forth, as before. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, knowingly establish what has been observed — and so forth, as before.

The Blessed One addressed the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Maudgalyāyana, is it true that you give full ordination as monks to persons who have not yet reached the age of twenty?"

"Venerable one, it is true."

The Blessed One then censured the lack of effort, the lack of care, and the conduct of acting without examination. He then praised effort, care, and conduct undertaken with examination, and addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers — and so forth, as before. My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk gives full ordination as a monk to a person who has not yet reached the age of twenty commits a transgression. That person does not thereby become fully ordained, and those monks are to be censured. This is the proper procedure in such a case.

As for the phrase 'whatever monk': this refers to one who belongs to this Dharma, or to anyone else who is similarly situated. As for 'person': this is whoever is to be made a monk.

As for the phrase "who has not yet reached the age of twenty": this means one who has not yet reached the full age of twenty.

As for the phrase "gives full ordination as a monk": this is done by means of the motion-and-three-proclamations procedure.

As for the phrase "commits a transgression": this causes one to be burned, scorched, and cast down into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower destinies, and into the downward falls. Furthermore, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the virtuous qualities of Dharma — and for that reason it is said that one commits a transgression.

As for the phrase "that person does not thereby become fully ordained": this refers to whichever person that may be.

As for the phrase "those monks are to be censured": this refers to whichever monks were present on that occasion.

As for the phrase "this is the proper procedure in such a case": this means that this is the Dharma in accordance with what is appropriate.

Now, how does the transgression arise? In the first case: the candidate has not reached the age of twenty, perceives himself as not having reached the age of twenty, and when the monks ask him, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" he answers, "I have not reached the age of twenty." If the monks then proceed to give that person full ordination as a monk, that person is not fully ordained from the very outset, and there is a transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company, and this also becomes a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

In the second case: the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty, perceives himself as not having reached it, and when the monks ask him, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" he answers, knowing and remembering without any doubt, "I have not reached the age of twenty." If the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk, that person is not fully ordained from the very outset, and there is a transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company, and this also becomes a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

In the third case: the candidate has not reached the age of twenty, yet perceives himself as having reached it, and when the monks ask him, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" he answers, "I have reached the age of twenty." If the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk, the going-forth and the full ordination arise for that person then and there, establishing him in the state of a monk; there is no transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company, and it does not become a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

In the fourth case: the candidate has not reached the age of twenty, yet perceives himself as having reached it, and when the monks ask him, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" he answers, knowing and remembering without any doubt, "I have reached the age of twenty." If the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk, the going-forth and the full ordination arise for that person then and there, establishing him in the state of a monk; there is no transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company, and it does not become a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

In the fifth case: the candidate has not reached the age of twenty, and he does not know, does not remember, and has no doubt about it; and the monks either do not ask him or, having asked, he gives no answer. If the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk, the going-forth and the full ordination arise for that person then and there, establishing him in the state of a monk; there is no transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company, but this does become a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

In the sixth case: the candidate has reached the age of twenty but perceives himself as not having reached it; the monks ask him, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and he replies, "I have not reached the age of twenty." If the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk, there is no transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company from the very beginning, establishing him in the state of a monk; but this does become a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

In the seventh case: the candidate has reached the age of twenty but perceives himself as not having reached it; the monks ask him, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and he replies, "I know it, I remember it, I have no doubt about it — and I have not reached the age of twenty." If the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk, there is no transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company from the very beginning; but this does become a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

In the eighth case: the candidate has indeed reached the age of twenty and perceives himself as having reached it; the monks ask him, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and he replies, "I have reached the age of twenty." If the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk, there is no transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company from the very beginning, and this does not become a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

In the ninth case: the candidate has indeed reached the age of twenty and perceives himself as having reached it; the monks ask him, "Have you reached the age of twenty?" and he replies, "I know it, I remember it, I have no doubt about it — I have reached the age of twenty." If the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk, there is no transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company from the very beginning, and this does not become a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

In the tenth case: the candidate has reached the age of twenty; he does not know, does not remember, and has no doubt about it; and the monks either do not ask him or, having asked, he gives no answer. If the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk, there is no transgression for accompanying him and making use of his company from the very beginning; but this does become a serious offense against the Saṅgha.

Now, the first and second persons among these are those who were confused from the outset and were therefore not properly fully ordained from the beginning. If they participate together with persons who are properly established in their natural state in the restoration ceremony two or three times, or if they take part in Saṅgha acts, they are dwelling by stealth and are persons fit to be expelled.

Concerning a person who was given full ordination while under twenty years of age yet perceived himself as having reached twenty: if his relatives come and approach and ask, "Has the one called so-and-so been fully ordained?" and he is said to be not yet twenty, then the months he spent in the womb and any intercalary months must also be counted. If when these are included the total is complete, then that is good. If it is still not complete, either the ordination boundary must be changed or the full ordination must be performed again. If neither the boundary is changed nor the full ordination is performed again, and he participates together with persons properly established in their natural state in the restoration ceremony two or three times, or takes part in Saṅgha acts, he is dwelling by stealth and is a person fit to be expelled.

Concerning a person who was fully ordained at the age of nineteen: if he later comes to recall that his years were not complete, he must count the months spent in the womb and any intercalary months as well.

If the years are complete, then all is well. If they are not complete, the ordination boundary must be changed or the full ordination must be performed again. If neither the boundary is changed nor the full ordination is performed again, and he participates together with persons properly established in their natural state in the restoration ceremony two or three times, or takes part in Saṅgha acts, he is dwelling by stealth and is a person fit to be expelled.

If he comes to recall a single year, then the full ordination performed in that manner is a proper full ordination, for it is rare that a person who has gone forth and received full ordination in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya actually attains the status of a monk.

Concerning a person who was fully ordained at the age of eighteen: if he later comes to recall that his years were not complete, he must change the ordination boundary or be fully ordained again. If neither the boundary is changed nor the full ordination is performed again, and he participates together with persons properly established in their natural state in the restoration ceremony two or three times, or takes part in Saṅgha acts, he is dwelling by stealth and is a person fit to be expelled. If he comes to recall a single year, he must count the months spent in the womb and any intercalary months as well. If they are complete, then all is well. If they are not complete, the ordination boundary must be changed or the full ordination must be performed again. If neither the boundary is changed nor the full ordination is performed again, and he participates together with persons properly established in their natural state in the restoration ceremony two or three times, or takes part in Saṅgha acts, he is dwelling by stealth and is a person fit to be expelled. If he comes to recall two years, then the full ordination performed in that manner is a proper full ordination, for it is rare that a person who has gone forth and received full ordination in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya actually attains the status of a monk.

Concerning a person who has not yet reached the age of twenty, who does not know, does not recall, and is in doubt regarding the full ordination he received: he must come to know, come to recall, and dispel his doubt. When he has come to know, to recall, and has dispelled his doubt, he must count the months spent in the womb and any intercalary months as well. If they are complete, then all is well. If they are not complete, the ordination boundary must be changed or the full ordination must be performed again. If neither the boundary is changed nor the full ordination is performed again, and he participates together with persons properly established in their natural state in the restoration ceremony two or three times, or takes part in Saṅgha acts, he is dwelling by stealth and is a person fit to be expelled.

Concerning a person who has reached the age of twenty but who, perceiving himself as not yet having reached twenty, receives full ordination: that full ordination is a proper full ordination from the very beginning. Concerning a person who has reached the age of twenty and who, perceiving himself as having reached twenty, receives full ordination: that full ordination too is a proper full ordination from the very beginning. There is no transgression for a first offender, one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by feeling.

The seventy-second offense — that of performing full ordination for one who has not yet reached the age of twenty — is complete.

Here begins the Vinaya, the fifteenth volume.

Here begins the Analysis of the Vinaya, the sixty-third fascicle.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the group of six monks were digging the ground with their own hands, having others dig, turning over the soil, having others turn it over, and pulling up plants.

— having others drag it away. Then other non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) who were knowledgeable said: "These śramaṇas, sons of the Śākya, dig the ground with their own hands, have others dig, turn over clods of earth, have others turn them over, pull up plants, and have others drag them away. And yet brahmins and householders also dig the ground with their own hands, have others dig, turn over clods of earth, have others turn them over, pull up plants, and have others drag them away. If that is so, what difference is there, what distinction is there, what separateness is there between these śramaṇas, sons of the Śākya, and brahmins and householders? Who would think to give alms to these shaven-headed śramaṇas?" And so they reproached them, disparaged them, and spoke ill of them.

At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, on account of this occasion, assembled the community of monks — and all the rest proceeds as before. "The blessed buddhas, though already knowing, feign not to know" — and so forth, also as before. Then the Blessed One rebuked the group of six, saying: "Monks, is it true that you dig the ground with your own hands, have others dig, turn over clods of earth, have others turn them over, pull up plants, and have others drag them away?" "Venerable One, it is true." The Blessed One rebuked them, saying that this is not proper conduct for a śramaṇa, not in accordance with what is fitting, not allowable, not in conformity with proper conduct, and that this is not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

Then, having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya shall be established" — and so forth, as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk digs the ground with his own hands or has it dug — this is an offense producing a downfall.

Now, 'whatever monk' refers to one of the group of six or anyone else of that kind. 'With his own hands' means hand to hand, by one's own hand. 'Ground' refers to two kinds of ground: ground with intrinsic nature and ground without intrinsic nature. 'Ground with intrinsic nature' means ground that has consolidated over three months with the falling of rain, or ground that has consolidated over six months without the falling of rain. 'Ground without intrinsic nature' is anything other than that.

'Digs' means doing so oneself. 'Has it dug' means having another do so.

'An offense producing a downfall' means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, states of misfortune, and states of ruin. Furthermore, as long as the downfall has not been confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs the arising of virtuous qualities — and therefore it is called an offense producing a downfall.

Now, how does the downfall come about? If a monk digs ground that has intrinsic nature, it becomes an offense producing a downfall. If he digs ground without intrinsic nature, it becomes a wrong deed. If a monk breaks apart compacted earth, breaking apart what is hard becomes an offense producing a downfall, while breaking apart what is loose becomes a wrong deed. If a monk drives a stake into the ground, it is an offense producing a downfall; if he extracts a stake from the ground, it is a wrong deed. If a monk draws a line in the ground, it is a wrong deed. If the intention is merely to demonstrate or show something, there is no downfall.

If a monk removes clay that is adhered to the ground, it becomes a wrong deed. If he removes clay alone, without it being adhered to the ground, there is no downfall. If a monk causes a bank to collapse, causing what is hard to collapse becomes an offense producing a downfall, while causing what is loose to collapse becomes a wrong deed. If a monk walks through mud, it becomes a wrong deed. If a monk lifts a ladle, a pot, or a ball that is connected with mud, it becomes a wrong deed. If a monk demolishes a wall, demolishing what is hard becomes an offense producing a downfall, while demolishing what is loose becomes a wrong deed. If a monk removes the mortar of a wall, removing what is hard becomes an offense producing a downfall, while removing what is loose becomes a wrong deed. If a monk drives a stake into a wall, it becomes an offense producing a downfall; if he extracts a stake from a wall, it becomes a wrong deed. If a monk removes clay adhered to a wall, it becomes a wrong deed. If a monk draws a line on a wall, it becomes a wrong deed. If the intention is merely to demonstrate or show something, there is no downfall. If a monk causes salt deposits to crumble from a wall, it becomes a wrong deed. If a monk digs stony ground, and there is considerably more earth than stones, it becomes an offense producing a downfall. If there are considerably more stones than earth, it becomes a wrong deed. If he merely moves stones alone, there is no downfall. If a monk digs sandy ground, and there is considerably more earth than sand, it becomes an offense producing a downfall. If there is considerably more sand than earth, it becomes a wrong deed. If he merely digs sand alone, there is no downfall. If a monk has no implement suitable for the workmanship of hand-crafts and the arrangement of stars, and he inserts his finger into the earth to a depth of about four finger-widths, there is no downfall. There is no downfall for one who is a novice at the act, for one who is mad, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one who is overcome by painful sensations. The seventy-third offense producing a downfall, that of digging the earth, is complete.

When the Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was wandering on tour among the Śākyas and came to the Śākya settlement, he stayed at the Nyagrodha Park in that Śākya settlement. The great Śākya noble Mahānāman heard that the Blessed One, the buddha, was wandering on tour among the Śākyas and had come to the Śākya settlement, staying at the Nyagrodha Park there. Upon hearing this, he thought to himself: "I have many times invited the Blessed One, together with the Saṅgha of monks, to my house for a midday meal, providing complete requisites on some occasions but not on others. Now let me invite the Blessed One, together with the Saṅgha of monks, for four months with all complete requisites."

Then Mahānāman the great Śākya went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Having sat to one side, the Blessed One thoroughly taught Mahānāman with Dharma-endowed speech, caused him to thoroughly grasp it, thoroughly praised him, and thoroughly delighted him. Having in many ways thoroughly taught, caused to grasp, thoroughly praised, and thoroughly delighted him with Dharma-endowed speech, he fell silent. Then Mahānāman the great Śākya rose from his seat, arranged his robe over one shoulder, joined his palms in homage toward the Blessed One, and addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"Blessed One, may the Blessed One, together with the Saṅgha of monks, consent to accept from me, for four months, robes, almsfood, lodging, medicine for the sick, and medical requisites." The Blessed One consented to Mahānāman the great Śākya by remaining silent. Then Mahānāman the great Śākya, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been given, prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One, withdrew from the presence of the Blessed One, and had a suitable infirmary constructed, had medicines for the sick stored there, had restorative medicines stored that were appropriate for any time of day, appropriate for specific periods, for seven days, and for lifetime use, had root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, and fruit medicines stored, had both clarified and unclarified butter stored, had both clarified and unclarified grain oil stored, had cows, female buffaloes, and she-goats kept there, had all requisites stored, and had physicians and attendants for the sick stationed there. He also supplied the monks with all requisites.

Now the group of six spoke among themselves, saying, "Dear friend Upananda, let us find a way to obtain such fine lodgings and food as these," and they went and questioned the physician: "Good sir, look and see what illnesses we have." The physician thought to himself, "These are slovenly ascetics who are speaking agreeably with me because they want to eat," and so he said to them, "Noble ones, you are indeed exhausted from the road — please apply an oil massage, and after that take a steam bath." They said in reply, "Dear friend Upananda, this physician is a great physician skilled in illness, in the causes of illness, and in bodily constitution — the kind a king would need. If all of us were to begin doing as he says at the same time, we would be caught quickly. Let two of us first apply the oil massage while four attend to the sick. After that, let two more apply the oil massage while four attend to the sick. After that again, let two more apply the oil massage while four attend to the sick." Proceeding in this manner, while two were beginning to apply the oil massage and four were attending to the sick, a full month passed. Then, after the second pair began to apply the oil massage and four attended to the sick, the second month passed. Then again, after another pair began to apply the oil massage and four attended to the sick, the third month passed. In the fourth month all assembled and began eating, and when the four months had elapsed, Mahānāman the great Śākya invited the Blessed One to a concluding meal, and Upananda sent a message to the attendant in charge of utensils: "Good sir, prepare broth, soups, and meat dishes for me today." The attendant said, "Noble one, four months have passed and Mahānāman the great Śākya has invited the Blessed One to the concluding meal — has your business still not been finished?" Upananda replied, "The poor Mahānāman, with great generosity, has invited the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks with all requisites for four months. If an invitation of this kind is a proper way to invite the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks, then Upananda too would be delighted to invite the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks for as long as life lasts." The attendant said, "Although you have eaten nothing but meat and flesh soups for four months, still you criticize others. Elder, elder — those who have not taken so much as a single piece of āmalaka fruit in four months, they are truly the ones who practice austerity."

On the occasion when monks with few wants criticize other monks, saying "Why do monks beg so excessively?" — reviling them, taunting them, and speaking ill of them — the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks must not beg excessively."

"Monks, once upon a time, long ago in a past age, there was a hermit (ṛṣi) dwelling in a forest hermitage far from any village. His hermitage was abundantly endowed with flowers, abundantly endowed with fruits, and abundantly endowed with hedges and enclosures. Not very far from that hermitage there was a great pond, and in that pond dwelt a young nāga. Whenever the hermit sat cross-legged in meditation, the young nāga would emerge from that great pond and coil his body seven times around the hermit's body, then rear up and spread a great hood above him, and remain there thus.

"Whenever the hermit rose, the young nāga would uncoil his body from the hermit's body, adorn himself with shoulder ornaments, earrings and ear-hoops, garlands and ornaments of various jewels, and ointments, and then sit before him with palms joined together and serve the hermit with every requisite. Yet from the touch of the nāga's body, the hermit had become pale and wan, emaciated, weak, thin, and had lost his bodily health.

"On another occasion, a different hermit who was wandering and travelling through that region came to the hermitage of that first hermit and said to him: 'O hermit, this hermitage of yours is abundantly endowed with flowers, abundantly endowed with fruits, and abundantly endowed with hedges and enclosures — so why have you become pale and wan, emaciated, weak, thin, and lost your bodily health?'

"The first hermit replied: 'That is so. Although this hermitage of mine is abundantly endowed with flowers, abundantly endowed with fruits, and abundantly endowed with hedges and enclosures, there is nonetheless a fault here.'

"The other asked: 'What fault is there here?'

"The first hermit said: 'In this great pond there dwells a young nāga. Whenever I sit cross-legged in meditation, the young nāga emerges from that great pond and coils his body seven times around my body and rears up with a great hood above me and remains there thus. Whenever I rise, he uncoils his body from my body, adorns himself with shoulder ornaments, earrings and ear-hoops, garlands and ornaments of various jewels, and ointments, and sits before me with palms joined together and serves me with every requisite. Yet from the touch of his body I have become pale and wan, emaciated, weak, thin, and have lost my bodily health.'

"The second hermit said: 'Would you wish that the young nāga not come to you again from now on?'

"The first hermit said: 'I would.'

"The second hermit said: 'The next time the young nāga comes and serves you with every requisite, ask him for the jewel that rests upon his head. Nāgas are miserly by nature and will not give it, and so he will cease to come again.'

"On another occasion, when the hermit was sitting cross-legged in meditation, the young nāga emerged from the great pond just as before, coiled his body seven times around the hermit's body, reared up with a great hood above him, and remained there thus. When the hermit rose, the young nāga uncoiled his body from the hermit's body and adorned himself with shoulder ornaments, earrings and ear-hoops, necklaces of various jewels, and garlands, anointed with perfume. He pressed his palms together, sat before the hermit, and served him with every requisite. Then the hermit said to him, "Young nāga, give me that jewel which rests upon your head." The young nāga replied, "I must ask my parents." The hermit said, "Very well, do so."

The young nāga went and asked both his parents: "Father and Mother, if the hermit asks me for the jewel, shall I give it to him?" The two of them replied, "It is through the power of this jewel that we obtain our food, drink, perfume, garlands, and ornaments, so do not give it away."

Then the young nāga emerged from the pond and sat before the hermit, and the hermit said to him, "Young nāga, give me that jewel which rests upon your head." And so the young nāga spoke these verses:

Food and drink, and likewise clothing too — all these are accomplished through this jewel's power.
That is why I will not give this jewel to you.
By asking too much you have become a source of anger.
By asking too much you have become loathsome to me, like a sharp sword honed with sesame oil.
If you come to my dwelling henceforth, beat me on the head with a stone!

So he spoke, and disappeared along a road unseen. Monks, if even those creatures born in an animal realm, when pushed too far, take themselves off along a road unseen, what need is there even to speak of human beings? Therefore, monks, a monk must not make excessive demands.

Monks, in yet another story from the distant past, there was a hermit dwelling in a forest hermitage without any village nearby. His dwelling was excellent — richly adorned with flowers, abundant in fruit, and splendid with encircling groves. Many birds lived there, and they raised their calls, for sound is a thorn in meditative concentration, and so that hermit was unable to attain one-pointedness of mind on account of the many birds' noise.

Then another hermit who was wandering through the countryside came to that hermit's dwelling and said to him, "O hermit, this dwelling of yours is excellent — richly adorned with flowers, abundant in fruit, and splendid with encircling groves. Have you here attained one-pointedness of mind?" He replied, "That is true — my dwelling is excellent, richly adorned with flowers, abundant in fruit, splendid with encircling groves — yet there is a fault here as well." The other said, "And what fault is there?" He replied, "Many birds live here and raise their calls, and sound is a thorn in meditative concentration, so on account of the many birds' noise I have not been able to attain one-pointedness of mind."

The other said, "Would you wish that these birds no longer come here?" He answered, "I would." Then the other said, "On the twenty-ninth night of the month, kindle a grass-torch and go to the foot of the trees and say these words: 'Eat your eggs! Eat your young!' and they will come no more."

He began to do exactly as instructed. The birds, however, thought to themselves, "Has this hermit gone mad?" — and the birds caused their young to grow wings, and then they departed and came no more, until finally every last one of them had gone off along a road unseen.

Monks, if even those creatures born in an animal realm, when pushed too far, take themselves off along a road unseen, what need is there even to speak of human beings?

Therefore a monk should not push others too far. If one pushes too far, it becomes a cause of conflict.

Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this case, and this occasion, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth, as before. The passage beginning "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, act with full knowledge" — that too proceeds as before.

The Blessed One addressed Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that one who has been invited as a guest for four months treats that as his own entitlement and then claims even more than that as his entitlement?" "Venerable One, it is so." The Blessed One rebuked this as conduct unworthy of a contemplative, conduct that is not conformable, not fitting, not in accord with proper standards, and conduct not to be performed by one who has gone forth. Then, having rebuked it in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten advantages clearly, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: A monk may accept an invitation as a guest for four months and treat it as his own. If he claims more than that as his entitlement, it is an offence." In this way the Blessed One established that rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

Then the Blessed One, having stayed as long as he wished in the land of the Śākyas, set out wandering toward Rājagṛha, travelling in stages, and in the course of that gradual journey arrived at Rājagṛha, where he dwelt in the Bamboo Grove, in the place of the Kalandakas.

Now the king who had arisen in Magadha, Bimbisāra, the man of noble form and heart, heard that the Blessed One, while wandering among the Śākyas, had arrived at Rājagṛha and was dwelling in the Bamboo Grove at the place of the Kalandakas. Upon hearing this, he thought to himself: "The great Śākya name — the Blessed One together with the assembly of monks — has been invited for four months with all provisions by those great Śākyas. I too have many times invited the Blessed One together with the assembly of monks to other houses for a midday meal, but I have never once invited them for four months with all provisions. I should invite the Blessed One together with the assembly of monks for four months with all provisions."

Then the king who had arisen in Magadha, Bimbisāra, went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One instructed, guided, inspired, and gladdened the king who had arisen in Magadha, Bimbisāra, with a Dharma-filled discourse. Having in many ways instructed, guided, inspired, and gladdened him with a Dharma-filled discourse, the Blessed One became silent.

Then the king who had arisen in Magadha, Bimbisāra, rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, bowed with joined palms toward the Blessed One, and addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Blessed One, may you please consent to the assembly of monks receiving from me, for four months of the season, robes, alms-food, lodging, medicine for the sick, and medicinal requisites."

The Blessed One consented to the king who had arisen in Magadha, Bimbisāra, by remaining silent. Then the king who had arisen in Magadha, Bimbisāra, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been given, bowed his head to the Blessed One's feet, and departing from the Blessed One's presence, had a suitable infirmary built and had suitable medicines placed there as well. He had placed there medicines that are beneficial when taken at pleasant times, medicines for specific hours of the day, seven-day medicines, medicines to be kept for life, root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, flower medicines, and fruit medicines. He had clarified butter both rendered and unrendered placed there. He had grain-oil both rendered and unrendered placed there. He had cows, female buffaloes, and she-goats placed there. He had all requisites placed there. He had physicians and sick-attendants placed there as well.

Now, the husband of the sister of the venerable Pilindavatsa heard that when the Blessed One was wandering through the Śākya territories and had arrived at Rājagṛha, he was residing in Rājagṛha at the Veṇuvana, the abode of the Kalandakas. Having heard this, he thought to himself: "The great Śākya clan has invited the Blessed One together with the community of monks for four months with all requisites. I too have on many occasions, at the lunchtime hour, invited the Blessed One together with the community of monks to another household and offered a meal, yet not once have I invited them with all requisites. Let me invite the Blessed One together with the community of monks for four months with all requisites."

Then that brahmin went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, bowed his head to the Blessed One's feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One fully instructed that brahmin with a Dharma-filled discourse, fully guided him, fully inspired him, and fully gladdened him. Having in many ways fully instructed, guided, inspired, and gladdened him with a Dharma-filled discourse, the Blessed One became silent.

Then that brahmin rose from his seat, and bowing with joined palms toward the Blessed One, addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Blessed One, may you please consent to the assembly of monks together with the Blessed One receiving from me, for four months of the season, robes, alms-food, lodging, medicine for the sick, and medicinal requisites."

That brahmin had previously been invited by the king who had arisen in Magadha, Bimbisāra. The brahmin then thought: "The noble Pilindavatsa is my kinsman; if I invite him, he will likely grant permission." And so he went to where the venerable Pilindavatsa was, and having arrived, bowed his head to the venerable Pilindavatsa's feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Pilindavatsa fully instructed that brahmin with a Dharma-filled discourse, fully guided him, fully inspired him, and fully gladdened him. Having in many ways fully instructed, guided, inspired, and gladdened him with a Dharma-filled discourse, the venerable Pilindavatsa became silent.

Then that brahmin rose from his seat, and bowing with joined palms toward the venerable Pilindavatsa, addressed the venerable Pilindavatsa in these words:

"Would the noble one permit me to provide robes, alms-food, lodging, medicine for the sick, and medicinal requisites for four months?"

The venerable Pilindavatsa replied, "I shall ask the Blessed One."

Then the venerable Pilindavatsa went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, bowed his head to the Blessed One's feet and addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Reverend sir, my son-in-law came to where I was, and said to me, 'Would the noble one permit me to provide robes, alms-food, lodging, medicine for the sick, and medicinal requisites for four months?' What response shall I give him?"

The Blessed One declared, "In that case, with the exception of individual invitations, a monk may accept an individual invitation as his own."

Now some other monks who had arrived later thought, "We were not invited by the king, so let us go on alms-round," and understanding this, they went on alms-round. The king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, was sitting at the base of a belvedere atop the Finework Pinnacle Palace, and seeing those monks wandering on alms-round, he said to his ministers, "Wise ones, why are these noble ones going on alms-round?" They replied, "Your Majesty, it appears that the reason they have come is this: those monks who arrived at the same time as the Blessed One were invited by the king, but we who arrived later were not invited by the king — thinking this, they went on alms-round." The king said, "In that case, the noble ones shall be invited again and again."

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "In that case, with the exception of repeated invitations, a monk may accept a repeated invitation as his own."

The monks then thought, "King Bimbisāra has many duties and many affairs, while we have few duties and few affairs; so let us go on alms-round" — and thinking this, they went on alms-round. The king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, was sitting at the base of the belvedere atop the Finework Pinnacle Palace, and seeing those monks wandering on alms-round, he said to his ministers, "Wise ones, why are these noble ones going on alms-round?" They explained the situation in full, and the king said, "In that case, the noble ones shall be invited at the appointed time."

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "In that case, with the exception of a timely invitation, a monk may accept a timely invitation as his own."

King Bimbisāra then invited the Blessed One along with a display of his going forth, and the following day a great many monks went on alms-round. The king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, was sitting at the base of the belvedere atop the Finework Pinnacle Palace, and seeing those monks wandering on alms-round, he said to his ministers, "Wise ones, why are these noble ones going on alms-round?" They explained the situation in full, and the king said, "In that case, the noble ones shall always be invited."

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "In that case, with the exception of a standing invitation, a monk may accept a standing invitation. Then the Blessed One praised the desire to train, reverence for the training, and providing requisites for the training, and addressed the monks with words in accord with this, bearing this meaning at length, and befitting this occasion. He then declared to the monks: "Monks, what came before was a rule; this is a permission. My hearers shall recite this rule for training in the Vinaya thus: a monk may accept an invitation for up to four months. To accept beyond that is an offence. Except in the case of an individual invitation, a repeated invitation, a timely invitation, and a standing invitation — for in those cases it is the proper occasion. This is the rule."

The analysis of terms is as follows. "A monk" refers to one who possesses this teaching. "For four months" means up to four months. "An invitation" means one that has been extended. "May accept" means it is to be taken up. "To accept beyond that" means to go beyond that limit. "An offence" means it burns, it scorches, it causes one to fall into the bad rebirths of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of wrong descent. Moreover, for as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome Dhammas — and for that reason it is called an offence.

"An individual invitation" is as follows: monks invited separately, one by one. "A repeated invitation" is as follows: monks invited again and again. "A timely invitation" is as follows: monks invited with urgency. "A standing invitation" is as follows: monks invited on a permanent basis. "Except" means set aside. "For in those cases it is the proper occasion" means that in those cases it is the conforming rule.

Now, how does an offence come about? If a monk accepts even a little beyond an invitation for four months, it becomes an offence in every instance. If a monk is invited for an unwholesome purpose and requests alms-food, the requesting is a wrong act and the eating is an offence. If a monk is invited for a wholesome purpose and requests something unwholesome, the requesting is a wrong act and the eating too is a wrong act.

When a monk is on alms-round and a woman brings food from her household, the monk may say, "Sister, that is sufficient; I do not want it." If the woman says, "Venerable one, what does the noble one wish for?" he should state what has been extended to him and may take whatever he desires. There is no offence for one who is a beginner, or who is mentally deranged, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by feeling.

This is the seventy-fourth offence entailing removal from the invitation, the one of remaining at a distance.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing in Rājagṛha, in the Bamboo Grove, the abode of the Kalandaka squirrels. At that time, when the Blessed One was establishing a rule of training common to all hearers in the Vinaya, he assembled both orders of the Saṅgha. This too, therefore, is a rule of training common to all hearers established by the Blessed One in the Vinaya, and for this one he assembled both orders of the Saṅgha. The Blessed One then declared to the Venerable Ānanda:

"Ānanda, go and release a monk among the monks into the midst of the nuns and deliver this message: 'Sisters, the Blessed One has established the following rule of training common to all hearers in the Vinaya: a monk may accept an invitation for four months; if he accepts beyond that, it entails a transgression. Excepted are individual invitations, repeated invitations, timely invitations, and standing invitations — for these it is timely. The Blessed One having thus established this rule, you too should train in this training.' Convey this instruction."

The Venerable Ānanda replied, "As the Blessed One commands," received these words from the Blessed One, went to where the Venerable Lāmpa was, and instructed him: "Venerable Lāmpa, go and, addressing the nuns, deliver this message: 'Sisters, the Blessed One has established the following rule of training common to all hearers in the Vinaya: a monk may accept an invitation for four months; if he accepts beyond that, it entails a transgression. Excepted are individual invitations, repeated invitations, timely invitations, and standing invitations — for these it is timely. The Blessed One having thus established this rule, you too should train in this training.'"

The Venerable Lāmpa replied, "As the Venerable Ānanda commands," received these words from the Venerable Ānanda, and set out for the nuns' rains retreat dwelling. As he arrived, the group of six saw him and asked, "Venerable Lāmpa, where are you going?"

The Venerable Lāmpa thought to himself, "These ones also seem not to have heard this. I should tell them as well." And so he said: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One has established the following rule of training common to all hearers in the Vinaya: a monk may accept an invitation for four months; if he accepts beyond that, it entails a transgression. Excepted are individual invitations, repeated invitations, timely invitations, and standing invitations — for these it is timely. The Blessed One having thus established this rule, you too should train in this training."

They replied: "We are monks who hold the sūtras, who hold the Vinaya, who hold the māmakīs. We will not train in this training on the basis of your words — you are childish, confused, obscure, and unskilled." And with these words they heaped on him the epithets of being childish, confused, obscure, and unskilled.

The Venerable Lāmpa then continued on his way, and as he went the group of twelve nuns saw him and asked him, "Venerable Lāmpa, where are you going?"

He said: "Sisters, know this: the Blessed One has established the following rule of training common to all hearers in the Vinaya: a monk may accept an invitation for four months; if he accepts beyond that, it entails a transgression. Excepted are individual invitations, repeated invitations, timely invitations, and standing invitations — for these it is timely. The Blessed One having thus established this rule, you too should train in this training."

They replied: "We are nuns who hold the sūtras, who hold the Vinaya, who hold the māmakīs. We will not train in this training on the basis of your words — you are childish, confused, obscure, and unskilled." And with these words they heaped on him the epithets of being childish, confused, obscure, and unskilled, and departed.

The venerable Lamba thought to himself: "What is the use of speaking to these nuns who engage in all manner of bad conduct? I shall now go and not speak of this to anyone other than the great Progenitress Gautamī." And so he went to where the great Progenitress Gautamī was, and upon arriving, spoke to her as follows:

"Gautamī, know this well. The Blessed One has established the following as a common training rule in the Vinaya for śrāvakas: 'A monk may accept invitations for up to four months. If he accepts beyond that, it entails a transgression. Excepted are individual invitations, repeated invitations, timely invitations, and standing invitations — for these it is timely.' This rule the Blessed One has established, and you too should train in this training."

The great Progenitress replied: "Venerable Lamba, the Blessed One has established that training rule in the Vinaya as a common rule for śrāvakas — namely, that a monk may accept invitations for up to four months, that to accept beyond that entails a transgression, and that individual invitations, repeated invitations, timely invitations, and standing invitations are excepted, for those it is timely. That rule which the Blessed One has so established — this I accept with head, speech, and mind alike.

"Venerable Lamba, consider this example. Suppose some young women of the warrior caste, or of the brahmin caste, or of the merchant caste, or of the common people's caste — well bathed, well anointed, with hair and nails well trimmed, desiring white garments — were to be given a garland of blue lotuses, or a garland of campaka flowers, or a garland of jasmine, or a garland of atimukta flowers. They would receive it with delight, taking it up with both hands, and place it as an adornment upon their noble heads. In just the same way, Venerable Lamba, the rule which the Blessed One has established in the Vinaya as a common training rule for śrāvakas — that a monk may accept invitations for up to four months, that to accept beyond that entails a transgression, and that individual invitations, repeated invitations, timely invitations, and standing invitations are excepted, for those it is timely — that rule too I accept with head, speech, and mind alike."

The venerable Lamba then conveyed this and returned. When the venerable Ānanda saw him, he asked: "Venerable Lamba, did you convey this to the nuns?" He replied: "I conveyed it, and this is what happened: they heaped upon me the epithets of being childish, confused, obscure, and unskilled." "Who did?" "The group of six." "Why?" At that, he recounted the matter in full. The few monks who had little desire asked why the monks were conveying to the venerable ones that they should train in this training — and when that was done, those nuns said: "We are nuns who hold the sūtras, who hold the Vinaya, who hold the māmakīs — we will not train in this training on the basis of your words, you who are childish, confused, obscure, and unskilled." And so they reviled them, spread it about, and gossiped. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident and this occasion and this context, convened the assembly of monks — and the rest proceeds as before.

"The awakened blessed ones, though knowing, act as though they do not know" — and so forth, continuing as before. The Buddha, the Blessed One, questioned the group of six, saying: "Monks, is it true that when monks conveyed to the venerable ones that they should train in this training, those monks said: 'We hold the sūtras, we hold the Vinaya, we hold the māmakīs — we will not train in this training on the basis of your words, you who are childish, confused, obscure, and unskilled'?" "Blessed One, it is true." The Buddha, the Blessed One, then condemned them, saying: "That which is not the manner of a renunciant, not befitting, not proper, not in accord with the rule — that is not what one who has gone forth should do." Then, having condemned them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be laid down" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows. Whatever monk, when monks convey to the venerable one that he should train in this training, says to them: 'I hold the sūtras, I hold the Vinaya, I hold the māmākīs — I will not train in this training on the basis of your words, you who are childish, confused, obscure, and unskilled' — that constitutes a transgression. And any monk who wishes to know everything should also train in that training. He should inquire of those who hold the sūtras, who hold the Vinaya, who hold the māmākīs — and in that matter, that is the proper procedure."

"Whatever monk" refers to the group of six or anyone else of that kind. "When monks" refers to those who follow this Dharma. "Convey to the venerable one that he should train in this training" refers to whatever training it may be. "To them" refers to those monks. "Says" means when one says the following. "Those who hold the sūtras" means those who hold all the sūtras. "Those who hold the Vinaya" means those who hold all the Vinaya. "Those who hold the māmākīs — we will inquire of them" means those who hold all the māmākīs. "Childish" — by "childish" is meant one who thinks harmful thoughts, speaks harmful words, and performs harmful deeds. "Confused" — by "confused" is meant one who does not hold the sūtras, does not hold the Vinaya, does not hold the māmākīs. "Obscure" — by "obscure" is meant one who is obscure regarding the sūtras, obscure regarding the Vinaya, and obscure regarding the māmākīs. "Unskilled" — by "unskilled" is meant one who is unskilled in the sūtras, unskilled in the Vinaya, and unskilled in the māmākīs. "Says that he will not train in this training on the basis of your words" means when one says exactly that. "That constitutes a transgression" — it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the states of misfortune. Furthermore, as long as the transgression is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the virtuous qualities — and therefore it is said to constitute a transgression. "Any monk who wishes to know everything should also train in that training. He should inquire of those who hold the sūtras, who hold the Vinaya, who hold the māmakīs — and in that matter, that is the proper procedure" means: in that matter, that is the conforming practice. Now, how does a transgression come about in this matter?

If a monk, to whatever small degree, instructs others saying, "Venerable one, you should train in this training," and those addressed respond: "I will not train in this training on the word of someone who, until he has inquired of those who hold the sūtras, who hold the Vinaya, who hold the māmakīs, is childish, confused, unclear, and unskilled" — in all such cases a transgression is incurred. If they say, "I will not train in this training on the word of someone childish" — a transgression is incurred. If they say, "I will not train in this training on the word of someone confused" — a transgression is incurred. If they say, "I will not train in this training on the word of someone unclear" — a transgression is incurred. If they say, "I will not train in this training on the word of someone unskilled" — a transgression is incurred. However, if one is genuinely and truly childish, confused, unclear, and unskilled, there is no transgression. There is likewise no transgression for one who is a beginner, who is mad, whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful sensations. The seventy-fifth transgression concerning the abandonment of placing oneself close to the training is hereby complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha (Skt. buddha), was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the Venerable Charka, having abandoned all afflictions, directly realized arhatship. The Venerable Udāyin had gone to Kauśāmbī and was there sitting in a small, depressed state of mind. Āvāsin and Nāgasamāla had arrived at their time of death. Nanda and Upananda were sitting within the Saṅgha. At that moment, the group of seventeen — who were hostile, domineering toward others, holders of the sūtras, holders of the Vinaya, and holders of the māmakīs — said among themselves: "Venerable ones, the group of six has been opposing us for a long time. Just as Nanda and Upananda have opposed us, no one else has done so in the same way; and just as Upananda has opposed us, Nanda has not done so in the same way. We should therefore carry out an act of expulsion against them from this place." They then said, "This one's elder brother is skilled in debate — summon him. Let us take counsel." They entered the deliberation hall, shut the door, and began to deliberate. Upananda, however, listened through a window, and having overheard them he challenged them, saying: "Alas, you group of seventeen — what are you deliberating? Some of my fellow practitioners of celibacy have passed fully into nirvāṇa; some are merely sitting in a low-spirited state; some have arrived at their time of death. Do you really think, then, that now you will carry out an act of expulsion from this place? Do you imagine you will now overwhelm and suppress us? We too shall deal you a great defeat." And he challenged them with these words: "Have you not heard the verse — Even if the elephant's rope be dried out by the sun and wind, and even if one falls from the elephant's neck-yoke, still five hundred sheep should be driven along." Hearing this, they thought: "He has overheard our deliberations and will go and report to others." So they entered the fire-house and began to deliberate there. Upananda crept there as well, listened, and challenged them there in the same way. They then assembled in the upper chamber and began to deliberate, while Upananda sat in the middle story and listened, and challenged them there likewise in the same way. They assembled in the middle story and began to deliberate, while Upananda sat in the lower chamber and listened, and challenged them there likewise in the same way. They assembled in the residence hall and began to deliberate, while Upananda sat in the corridor and listened, and challenged them there likewise in the same way. They assembled in the corridor and began to deliberate, while Upananda sat in the residence hall and listened, and challenged them there likewise in the same way. They assembled in the gatehouse and began to deliberate, while Upananda sat in the stairwell and listened, and challenged them there likewise in the same way. They assembled in the walking-meditation path and began to deliberate, while Upananda sat in the cells and listened, and challenged them there likewise in the same way. They assembled in the cells and began to deliberate, while Upananda sat in the walking-meditation path and listened, and challenged them there likewise in the same way. They assembled in the hermitage grounds and began to deliberate, while Upananda sat among the shrubs and listened, and challenged them there likewise in the same way. They assembled among the shrubs and began to deliberate, while Upananda sat in the hermitage grounds and listened, and challenged them there likewise in the same way. They set out along the road, deliberating as they went, while Upananda followed along behind and listened, and having challenged them there likewise in the same way, the monks said to him: "Venerable ones, we are unable to carry out the act of suspension against him from this place; let us ask his pardon." And so they said to him: "Venerable Upananda, please grant us your pardon." Upananda said: "Pardon is granted." They then asked him: "How did you know what we were deliberating?"

Upananda said: "When you entered the assembly hall and deliberated, I listened through the window. When you entered the fire house and deliberated, I listened by crouching down. When you assembled in the upper chamber and deliberated, I sat in the middle story and listened. When you assembled in the middle story and deliberated, I sat in the lower chamber and listened. When you assembled in the residence hall and deliberated, I sat in the corridor and listened. When you assembled in the corridor and deliberated, I sat in the residence hall and listened. When you assembled in the gatehouse and deliberated, I sat in the stairwell and listened. When you assembled in the stairwell and deliberated, I sat in the gatehouse and listened. When you assembled in the walking-meditation path and deliberated, I sat in the cells and listened. When you assembled in the cells and deliberated, I sat in the walking-meditation path and listened. When you assembled in the hermitage grounds and deliberated, I sat among the shrubs and listened. When you assembled among the shrubs and deliberated, I sat in the hermitage grounds and listened. When you set out along the road and deliberated as you went, I followed along behind and listened." They said to him: "Is it right for you to sit eavesdropping like that?" Upananda replied: "If I had not been sitting and listening while you deliberated, you would have carried out an act of suspension against me."

Monks of little account — why did the monks come to fight, to slander one another, to be at odds, to quarrel? It is while sitting in that very assembly that these monks, thinking "Whatever they say, I will listen and then traduce them accordingly," take that very intention as their occasion to sit in silence listening as a spy, then condemn them, denounce them, and spread malicious talk about them. At that point, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then, on account of this incident and this basis for legislation, "On this occasion the Saṅgha of monks was convened" — and so forth, as before. "The blessed buddhas, knowing full well, nevertheless inquired" — and so forth, likewise as before.

The Blessed One, a buddha, then asked Ānanda, the son of the Śākyaas: "Ānanda, when monks have come to fight, to slander one another, to be at odds, to quarrel, and are sitting in that assembly — is it true that you sat listening as a spy, saying nothing, having taken as your occasion the very thought, 'Whatever these monks say, I will listen and then traduce them accordingly'?"

"Venerable One, it is so."

The Blessed One then rebuked him, saying that this is unworthy of a renunciant, that it is improper, inappropriate, and contrary to proper conduct — it is not something one who has gone forth ought to do.

After rebuking him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing the ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya shall be laid down" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Furthermore, whatever monk, when monks have come to fight, to slander one another, to be at odds, to quarrel, and are sitting in that assembly — taking as his occasion the very thought, 'Whatever these monks say, I will listen and then traduce them accordingly' — sits listening as a spy, saying nothing: that is an offence entailing a downfall."

Now, "whatever monk" refers to Ānanda, the son of the Śākyas, or to any other who is similarly situated.

"Monks" refers to those who are of this Dharma.

"Have come to fight, to slander one another, to be at odds, to quarrel, and are sitting in that assembly" refers to those who are stationed on one side or the other of a dispute.

"Taking as his occasion the very thought, 'Whatever these monks say, I will listen and then traduce them accordingly'" means: with such an intention, thinking to counter and press against the other side in that or this manner as a counteragent.

"Taking that very thing as his occasion" — meaning no other occasion.

"Sits listening as a spy, saying nothing" means sitting with ears pricked, uttering not a word.

"Offence entailing a downfall" — it burns, it scorches, it causes one to fall into the hells, into the animal realm, into the realm of hungry ghosts, into the lower rebirths, into the states of misfortune. Furthermore, for as long as that downfall is not confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of wholesome qualities. That is why it is called "an offence entailing a downfall."

Now, how does the downfall occur?

If monks are holding a deliberation in an upper chamber and a monk also ascends there, that monk should make a sound with his heel, the sound of a sandal, or a cough. If he does not make the sound of a heel, the sound of a sandal, or a cough, then for as long as he hears voices but has not yet understood the meaning, it amounts to a wrongdoing for that monk. Once he understands the meaning of what is being said, it becomes an offence entailing a downfall.

If monks are walking along and holding a deliberation in a hall, a lower room, a dwelling, a corridor, a gatehouse, a terrace, a walkway, a park, or on a road, and a monk follows behind them — that monk should make the sound of a heel, the sound of a sandal, or a cough. If he does not make the sound of a heel, the sound of a sandal, or a cough, then for as long as he hears voices but has not yet understood the meaning, it amounts to a wrongdoing for that monk. Once he understands the meaning of what is being said, it becomes an offence entailing a downfall.

There is no offence in the following cases: when one is not intentionally concealed; when one is in a state of doubt; when one listens with the intention of bringing about a reconciliation, there is no offence. There is no offence for one who is a first offender, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

The seventy-sixth offence entailing a downfall, arising from eavesdropping, is complete.

The Vinaya Analysis, the sixty-fourth fascicle.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's park. At the time when the venerable Chārcā had directly realized arhatship by abandoning all afflictions, the venerable Udāyin had gone to Kauśāmbī and was staying quietly and humbly there. The pair Mahānāma and Anuruddha had each arrived at their appointed time. The pair Nandika and Ānanda were at that time within the community, and the assembly of the group of seventeen — being contentious, overbearing toward others, masters of the sūtras, masters of the Vinaya, and masters of the Mātṛkā — said the following: "Venerable ones, for a long time the group of six has been lodging formal accusations against us. Just as Nandika and Ānanda have lodged accusations against us, yet no one else has done the same against them; and just as Ānanda has lodged accusations, Nandika has not done the same in return — therefore let us carry out the act of formal expulsion against them from this place."

Then some among them said: "Nandika's elder brother Ānanda is skilled in debate, and so we are not able to carry out the act of formal expulsion against him." Others among them said: "When one person speaks, two should not listen; but when the assembly speaks, the assembly is like a king — so if he were to say even a little, that would be the moment to carry out the act of formal expulsion against him." Having thus arranged the meeting place, they struck the gaṇḍī bell and duly conveyed the matter to the monks in the proper form of invitation, and when the entire community was seated together in harmony, the instigator sat to one side of an elder and said: "Reverend Ānanda, do you recall saying words such as these — that the belly of the assembly of the group of seventeen should be split open and their entrails used to encircle the Jeta Grove?"

Ānanda replied: "Venerable ones, that matter is past — what is the use of speaking of a healed wound? Let it be."

They said: "The Blessed One established the rules of training for the hearers in the Vinaya solely on the basis of past occurrences." And when Ānanda began to respond in counter, they said: "Whoever offers a counter-response shall also be formally expelled."

Ānanda thought to himself: "Given the way these people are behaving, if they were to carry out the act of formal expulsion against me as well, that would not be good." Since the winter season had arrived, he put on a woolen cloak, propped that cloak up against the base of a wall, and without saying a word, rose from his seat and left.

Then they said: "Venerable ones, speak your opinion!" — and in his absence they carried out the act of formal expulsion against Ānanda. After the act of formal expulsion had been carried out, he went weeping to his elder brother. Ānanda said: "Ānanda, why are you weeping?" He replied: "Those who carry black alms-bowls have carried out the act of formal expulsion against me from this place."

Ānanda said: "May those who have carried out the act of formal expulsion against my younger brother be expelled from village, from town, and from all three realms. Yet for those against whom an act of formal expulsion has been carried out — is there no village, no town? Stay on, and afterward request pardon. For they have performed this act in a spirit of pure antagonism."

"Who was there at the time?" Ānanda said: "It was I. I heard the sound of a teacher from where I was sitting, to the side of an elder."

Ānanda said: "At the moment when they were saying, 'Whoever offers a counter-response shall also be formally expelled,' I thought to myself:

"If they proceed in this manner, they will end up performing an act of formal expulsion against me as well while I remain here — that would not be good." And so, since the winter season had arrived, he put on a shawl, stood that shawl against the wall, rose from his seat without saying a word, and departed.

Monks of little worth then censured him, gossiped about him, and spread adverse talk, saying: "Why is it that when a discussion fully in accord with the Dharma of the Saṅgha has taken place and a proper determination has been reached, monks simply rise from their seats without a word and walk away?" The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks regarding this occurrence, this basis of discussion, and this occasion — and so forth, as before. The phrase "The blessed buddhas, with full knowledge, perform inquiry" — and so forth, also as before — and the blessed Buddha questioned the Śākya's son Nanda: "Nanda, is it true that when a discussion fully in accord with the Dharma of the Saṅgha had taken place and a proper determination had been reached, you rose from your seat without saying a word and departed?"

The blessed Buddha then rebuked him: "That is not the conduct of a renunciant, it is not fitting, it is not proper, it is not in accord with proper conduct — it is not what one who has gone forth should do." And so the Blessed One reproached him in many ways. Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing these ten benefits, one should establish rules of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk, when a discussion fully in accord with the Dharma of the Saṅgha has taken place and a proper determination has been reached, rises from his seat without saying a word and departs — that is a transgression." Thus did the Blessed One establish that rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers.

Now, there were monks who were seriously ill and unable to remain seated for long, and their attendant monks were also neglecting the care of the sick; and monks who were waiting upon others were also neglecting the business of the Saṅgha. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, one should speak to the seated monk and then depart."

After the Blessed One had declared that one should speak to the seated monk and then depart, a certain monk left his bowl and robes at another household and went away, and while he was there a fire broke out. As that monk had set out to leave and had gone halfway along the road, the thought arose in him: "I have not spoken to the seated monk." So he turned back, and by the time he had spoken to the seated monk who was there seated, his bowl and robes had been burned. He then arrived there, and the householder said: "Noble one, why have you come so late? On account of that, your bowl and robes are burned. Had you come more quickly, your bowl and robes would not have been burned." And that monk found himself in a state of loss and hardship. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, except in circumstances such as these."

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire training, who are devoted to training, and who are equipped with the implements of training, and addressed the monks with words in accord with that, exceeding that, and befitting it. The Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore the former rule stands as it was established, and this is now the permitted exception:

My śrāvakas shall recite this as the rule and basis of training in the Vinaya: "Furthermore, whatever monk, when a Saṅgha proceeding that possesses the qualities proper to the Saṅgha arises for the purpose of settling a matter, departs from his seat without saying a word and goes away, and does not speak to a sitting monk — that constitutes a transgression, except in such circumstances."

The phrase "whatever monk" refers to a son of the Śākyaas, such as Gavampati, or any other of like kind. The phrase "of the Saṅgha" refers to the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's śrāvakas. The phrase "when a Saṅgha proceeding that possesses the qualities proper to the Saṅgha arises for the purpose of settling a matter" refers to when a formal act has arisen by single motion, by motion and one proclamation, or by motion and three proclamations. The phrase "departs from his seat without saying a word and goes away" means that he leaves while still within earshot of the assembly. The phrase "does not speak to a sitting monk" refers to whatever monk is sitting there at that time. The phrase "except in such circumstances" means that such circumstances have been allowed as an exception. The phrase "constitutes a transgression" means it causes one to be burned, scorched, and to fall into states of woe — namely the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, unfortunate destinies, and lower rebirths. Moreover, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs the arising of virtuous qualities, and for that reason it is said to constitute a transgression.

Now, how does the transgression occur? Whatever monk, as soon as a Saṅgha proceeding that possesses the qualities proper to the Saṅgha has arisen for the purpose of settling a matter, departs from his seat without saying a word and goes away, and does not speak to a sitting monk — for as long as he has not yet gone beyond earshot of the assembly, it constitutes a wrongdoing; once he has gone beyond earshot, it constitutes a transgression. For one who is a beginner, one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by pain, there is no transgression. The seventy-seventh transgression, that of going away without speaking, is complete.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Rājagṛha, in the Kalandaka Grove of the Bamboo Forest. At that time, a certain monk, the black son of the lord of the great elephant god, was sitting together with a large number of monks in the meeting hall, having gathered there in harmony for the purpose of settling some dispute regarding the question "This is the Dharma, this is the Vinaya, this is the teaching of the Teacher," when one party alone was causing disruption in the Saṅgha, one party alone was causing discord in the Saṅgha, and they were holding to their dispute and arguing, not allowing the matter to come to its conclusion, not showing respect, not deferring to seniority, and intending to speak out again. That monk then began to rebuke, deride, and slander a small number of monks, saying: "Why do you monks — though so few — object to a large number of monks who are sitting together in harmony at the meeting hall for the purpose of settling a dispute, namely the question 'This is the Dharma, this is the Vinaya, this is the teaching of the Teacher,' when one party alone is causing disruption in the Saṅgha, one party alone is causing discord in the Saṅgha, holding to their dispute, arguing, not allowing the matter to come to its conclusion, not showing respect, not deferring to seniority, and intending to speak out again?" The monks then reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, concerning this basis, and regarding this circumstance, convened an assembly of the monks — and so forth, as before. "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, knowing fully, act without error" — and so forth, as before. The Buddha, the Blessed One, then addressed the black son of the lord of the great elephant god: "Monk, you —

"This is the Dharma. This is the Vinaya. This is the teaching of the Teacher" — sitting in the waiting room in order to bring some dispute to rest, and having reached agreement, one alone turns the Saṅgha away, and one alone causes the Saṅgha to be at odds: holding to the dispute, arguing while seated there, not allowing the matter to come to its conclusion, not showing respect, not deferring to seniority, and intending to speak out again — is this true?" "Venerable sir, it is so." The Buddha, the Blessed One, censured him, declaring that this was improper conduct for a renunciant, not in accordance with harmony, not fitting, not in keeping with the rule — this is not something that one who has gone forth ought to do. Then, having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing fully the ten benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If one does not show respect, it is an offense."

Now, "not showing respect" means not showing respect in either of two ways: toward the Saṅgha and toward individual persons. The Saṅgha here means the Saṅgha of hearers of the Tathāgata, and also what goes by the conventional designation of Saṅgha. Individual persons means one's preceptor and one's teachers. "It is an offense" means that it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the realms of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, states of misery, and wrong destinations. Furthermore, as long as that offense has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the wholesome qualities — and that is why it is called an offense.

As for how one incurs the offense in practice: if the Saṅgha instructs a monk, "Be seated," and he does not sit, he incurs an offense. If the instruction is "Do not be seated," and he sits, he incurs an offense. If the instruction is "Go," and he does not go, he incurs an offense. If the instruction is "Do not go," and he goes, he incurs an offense. If the instruction is "Take a lodging," and he does not take it, he incurs an offense. If the instruction is "Do not take a lodging," and he takes it, he incurs an offense. If the instruction is "Take the assembly hall," and he does not take it, he incurs an offense. If the instruction is "Do not take the assembly hall," and he takes it, he incurs an offense. If the instruction is "Speak," and he does not speak, he incurs an offense. If the instruction is "Do not speak," and he speaks, he incurs an offense. If he gives a Dharmic admonishment in a proper and harmonious manner, there is no offense. The same applies when the instruction comes from those who bear the conventional designation of Saṅgha.

If a preceptor instructs a monk, "Be seated," and he does not sit, it is a misdeed. If the instruction is "Do not be seated," and he sits, it is a misdeed. If the instruction is "Go," and he does not go, it is a misdeed. If the instruction is "Do not go," and he goes, it is a misdeed. If the instruction is "Take a lodging," and he does not take it, it is a misdeed. If the instruction is "Do not take a lodging," and he takes it, it is a misdeed. If the instruction is "Take the assembly hall," and he does not take it, it is a misdeed. If the instruction is "Do not take the assembly hall," and he takes it, it is a misdeed. If the instruction is "Speak," and he does not speak, it is a misdeed. If the instruction is "Do not speak," and he speaks, it is a misdeed. If he gives a Dharmic admonishment in a proper and harmonious manner, there is no offense. The same applies when the instruction comes from teachers. There is no offense for one who is a beginner, for one who is mentally disturbed, for one who is mentally troubled, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

This completes the seventy-eighth section on transgressions arising from disrespectful conduct.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

On the hill of Crocodile Child-Slayer there lived a householder named Wise One, who was wealthy, possessed of great riches, of extensive property, with vast and wide holdings, endowed with the wealth of the son of Vaiśravaṇa, rivaling the son of Vaiśravaṇa in riches. He took a wife from among women of equal birth and sported with her, delighted in her, and enjoyed pleasure with her. To him was born a daughter who was beautiful in form, pleasing to behold, and lovely. He raised and nurtured her, and she grew to maturity. The householder thought to himself: "I will not give this daughter away on account of her beauty, nor on account of her craft. I will give her only to one who is equal to me in lineage and in wealth, or better."

He heard that in Śrāvastī there lived a householder named Anāthapiṇḍada, who was wealthy, possessed of great riches, of extensive property, with vast and wide holdings, endowed with the wealth of the son of Vaiśravaṇa, rivaling the son of Vaiśravaṇa in riches, and that this man was equal to him in lineage and in wealth, indeed surpassing him in the manner of his wealth. So he gave his daughter in marriage to the son of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada in Śrāvastī. And the householder Anāthapiṇḍada took her as a wife for his son, the wealthy Śrī.

The householder Wise One would sport with her, delight in her, and enjoy pleasure with her, and a sentient being entered her womb. From the very day that the sentient being entered her womb, a hundred afflictions befell the householder Wise One. As the one dwelling in the womb continued to develop and grow, so too did great afflictions — a hundred in number — befall the householder Wise One again and again.

The householder Wise One thought: "I shall go and sit in the pleasure garden." He instructed his stewards: "O wise ones, if some great harm should befall me, give the signal. If it does not come, do not give it." Having given this instruction, he went and sat in the pleasure garden.

Then at a later time his wife gave birth, and a boy was born. On the very day he was born, a thousand afflictions befell the householder Wise One. Then a man came running at full speed toward where the householder Wise One was, and the householder Wise One, seeing the man coming running at full speed from a great distance, thought: "Could it be that some great harm has come upon me?" And he said to the man: "My dear fellow, why do you come running in such a way?" The man replied: "Your son has been born — rejoice!" Wise One said: "My dear fellow, though my son has caused me hundreds upon hundreds of afflictions, still it is good that a son has come."

His relatives assembled and gathered together, and thinking to give the boy a name, they reflected thus: "Since his father uttered the words 'it is good that he has come,' let this boy's name be Legs-'ongs," that is, Welcome. And so his name was given as Welcome.

As Welcome continued to grow and develop, the wealth, grain, silver, gold, servants both male and female, workers, and stewards in the household of the householder Wise One became utterly exhausted.

Then at another time the householder Wise One's time came, and his wife's time came as well.

That house too burned down. Every form of storehouse, every form of field, every form of wealth, every form of grain — all of it burned down. Some of the townspeople had taken up bundles of goods and set out for other lands: some met with the wreck of a great ship on the vast ocean; some found that their goods were not what they had supposed; some met with suffering in that very place through improper means; and some settled there and gave nothing in return. Some of the relatives too met their time; some fled; and some settled there, giving nothing in return. Male servants, female servants, workers, and wage-earners — some met their time, some fled, and some settled there, giving nothing in return.

One old female servant of the householder Wise One, who alone had remained to attend to Welcome's needs, sent the boy Welcome off to school to learn letters and writing. That old woman reflected: "The householder Wise One's household, rich in so many possessions, has become utterly exhausted and spent — I wonder whether this has come about through my own lack of merit, or through Welcome's lack of merit. Let me look into this." And so, however many times she registered a crop in Welcome's name, it was consumed and ruined; and however many times she registered one in her own name, it thrived. From this she concluded: "This is a being without good fortune. Because of his ill returns, the householder Wise One's household, rich in so many possessions, has been ruined through improper means. Because of his ill returns, I too will surely end up suffering through improper means — there can be no doubt this situation will arise. What then is to be done with him?" And she thought: "I must flee." That old woman therefore gathered up whatever few precious things remained and fled.

Dogs entered the empty house, ate whatever food was left, and began to fight. A man of leisure who happened to be passing through that direction heard the sound of dogs fighting in the house and thought: "Has the householder Wise One's house become empty? Why are dogs fighting and lingering here like this? Let me go and see." He entered, and finding that nearly all the dogs were fighting with one another and not a single person was present — the place entirely deserted — he took whatever remained of the leftover scraps and went on his way.

After him, Welcome came from the school, thinking to eat a meal. He entered the house and found it empty. He called out, "Mother, mother!" but no one answered. Not far from there was the house of a relative, and he went inside — only to find that the people of that house had gotten into a quarrel. When the quarrel subsided, they said to one another: "Friends, when I used to see you before, you were dear to my heart — but now, seeing you, I could kill you."

The others said the same to one another, and then they thought: "Let us see whether someone else has come here." Looking, they saw that Welcome had arrived, and they said: "Friends, this is not Welcome — this is Misfortune-come! Because of his ill returns, a quarrel has broken out among us." And so they drove him out, and he went elsewhere. In that place too things went just the same way: they said the same words and drove him out and sent him away. He entered among the destitute, and even those destitute ones, finding their hands empty and their begging bowls empty, returned — and those people said: "Friends, in the past, whenever we entered somewhere, we would return with full hands and full begging bowls; yet today we have come back with hands empty and begging bowls empty. What is the reason for this?" They said to one another: "Some ill-starred sentient being has entered our midst, and that is why we have come back with hands empty and begging bowls empty." They said again: "Let us investigate, then split into two groups and go in separately." So they divided into two groups and went. Those among whom Welcome had entered returned with hands empty and begging bowls empty, while the others all returned with hands full and begging bowls full. Those people then said: "This ill-starred sentient being has entered our midst, and that is why we have come back with hands empty and begging bowls empty." And so they split once more into two groups and went in separately — and again the same thing happened. They divided into two groups again and again, and still it turned out the same. After this had gone on in just this way, at a certain point Welcome and yet another hungry wanderer entered together as a pair; yet when they separated, Welcome came back with hands empty and begging bowl empty, while all the others came back with hands full and begging bowls full. Those people then declared: "This ill-starred sentient being has entered our midst, and that is why we have come back with hands empty and begging bowls empty." And so they beat Welcome soundly and drove him away.

Now in Śrāvastī there lived a householder friend of Togden, the younger brother of the householder Togden. This man had taken up a net and gone to the bank of a river where children came to kill crocodiles. There he saw Welcome walking along the road, holding his begging bowl in hand, and recognizing him by his very appearance, he called out to him: "Child, are you not the son of the householder Togden?" Welcome answered that he was. The man said: "Where have your father and mother gone?" Welcome replied: "Their time has come." The man said: "And what has become of his house, his storerooms, his fields, his wealth, his grain?" Welcome said: "All of it was burned by fire." The man asked: "And the people of the town who took their belongings and went to other lands — where did they go?" Welcome said: "Some were lost in the great ocean when a large ship was wrecked. Some lost their goods along the way. Some suffered misfortune right there through wrongdoing. And some stayed where they were but did not give so much as a word." The man asked: "And his relatives — where did they go?" Welcome said: "Some met their time. Some fled. Some stayed right there but did not give so much as a word." The man asked: "And his servants, male and female, his workers, and those who lived on a share of yogurt — where did they go?" Welcome said: "Some met their time. Some fled. Some stayed right there but did not give so much as a word."

Hearing this, the householder sat weeping, and then he said: "Child, let me go together with you to Śrāvastī." Welcome said: "Father, and what would be the point of my going there?" The man said: "Child, there in Śrāvastī lives the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, the giver of food to the shelterless. His son has taken your younger sister as his wife, and if you go there, she will be able to provide for what you need." Welcome said: "Father, let us go." The householder gave Welcome two kārṣāpaṇas and said: "Child, until I can arrange my affairs and join you, stay here for a while and live on these two coins." But Welcome tossed those two kārṣāpaṇas into the fold of his robe and set them aside, and through the force of his karmic maturation he forgot them both entirely.

That householder traded his goods, received the price, and led Welcome away; and Welcome departed together with him. After they had traveled some distance, a quarrel broke out among the members of their party, and even the oxen began to fight. The men said to one another: "Friends, in the old days, whenever we saw each other our hearts were gladdened, yet now, whenever we see one another we fall to quarreling, and even the oxen fight the moment they catch sight of each other. Could it be that some misfortune has come upon us?" And when they looked and saw that Welcome had joined them, they said: "Friends, this is not Welcome — this is Misfortune! It is on account of his karma that we have fallen to quarreling and the oxen have begun to fight." And they started to drive him away. Then the householder said: "Friends, this is my younger brother's son, my friend's child — do not drive him away." But they replied: "Householder, you may do as you like within your own party, but we cannot travel with him. If he goes, we will not go." So the householder said to Welcome: "Child, follow behind us and come along, and I will set food aside for you." As Welcome followed behind them and arrived at each stopping place, the householder would indeed set food aside for him — but some portions he placed on the ground covered with grass, and others he placed on the branches of trees covered with leaves. The food left covered with grass on the ground was eaten by foxes, and the food placed on branches covered with leaves was eaten by birds and monkeys, so that Welcome received only a little and mostly went without. He thus dragged himself onward in the most wretched misery.

Now, it is an impossibility, a thing that cannot occur, that a being in his last existence — one who has not yet attained the exhaustion of all defilements — should die and have his stream cut off midway before the appointed time. Since that was impossible, Welcome eventually arrived at Śrāvastī, and there he sat resting at the mouth of a well just outside the city. The younger sister of Welcome, who had become the daughter-in-law of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, the giver of food to the shelterless, sent her maidservant carrying a water jug to draw water at that well. The maidservant recognized Welcome by his appearance and said to him: "Young master, are you not Welcome, son of the householder Eloquent (Rtogs Idan), from the hill country where they kill sea-monster children?" He replied: "Yes, I am your mistress's brother." The maidservant asked: "Young master, where have your father and mother gone?" He said: "They have passed away." "And the house, the storerooms, the fields, the wealth, the grain — where are they all?" "Everything was burned in a fire." "And the townspeople who took their goods and went to other regions — where are they?" "Some perished when a great ship was wrecked on the ocean. Some lost their goods and came back empty-handed. Some were afflicted right there by unjust mistreatment. Some stayed right there and will not send even a word." "And the relatives — where are they?" "Some have passed away. Some fled. Some stayed right there and will not send even a word." "And the servants, the maidservants, the workers, the hired hands — where are they?" "Some have passed away. Some fled. Some stayed right there and will not send even a word."

When the maidservant heard all this, she sat there bathed in tears. Then she said to Welcome: "Young master, wait here just a moment while I go and tell your elder sister." She went and said to her mistress: "Mistress, your brother has arrived." The mistress asked: "In what state has he come?" The maidservant replied: "Mistress, he has come with matted hair, filthy and

"Tell Young Master the following, and ask him to eat this first and be satisfied. Then later, if he happens to meet his nephews and nieces, he will be able to give them whatever kārṣāpaṇas may be needed, and so your kinsmen will not be disappointed in you." The maidservant went there, offered the garments and the kārṣāpaṇas to Welcome, and said: "Young master, your elder sister conveys this message: please eat this first and be satisfied, and then later, if you happen to meet your nephews and nieces, you will be able to give them whatever kārṣāpaṇas may be needed, and so your kinsmen will not be disappointed in you." Having said this, she departed.

Welcome thought to himself: "The householder Anāthapiṇḍada has a large circle of kinsmen and dependants, and I too formerly had a large circle of kinsmen. If I go there now, they will press me with questions and detain me a long time, and I shall end up dying of hunger in the meantime. Let me first go borrow somewhere to eat and drink my fill, and only then go there, so that I may greet each of my assembled kinsmen with ease and gladness." With that thought, he went to the house of a brewer and drank as much fermented drink as would intoxicate him. He became intoxicated and went into a park and lay down to sleep.

Now in Śrāvastī there were men whose task it was to clear the parks, and they would sweep through the park and rouse anyone they found sleeping. If a person woke up, they would say to him: "Sir, have you not heard that in Śrāvastī the men who clear the parks sweep through and drive away those who are found sleeping there? Get up and be gone!" But if a person did not wake up, they would beat him and drag him out. Those park-clearers arrived at that spot and, finding Welcome lying asleep, they shook him with their feet. When he did not wake up, they beat him and dragged him away. When at last Welcome did wake up, he saw that he himself had been beaten, and he sat there in the very same filthy rags he had been wearing.

His sister wondered why her brother had been detained so long, and so she sent a maidservant, not a close attendant but a lower servant, to go and have a look. When the girl went and looked, she saw that he had been beaten, and she returned and reported to the mistress: "Mistress, the young master has been beaten and is sitting there just as he was before." The sister thought to herself: "He is a being of ruined fortune. His karmic retribution has already caused the householder of discernment to squander his many riches through improper conduct. Now, if I were to take him into my house, his karmic retribution would likewise bring suffering upon my husband's household through improper means — there would come to be such a situation." And so she abandoned him entirely.

Welcome too, his mind obscured by karma, forgot all this and entered into the company of wandering beggars. And those beggars — their hands were empty and their begging bowls were empty when they came back. They said: "Friends, whenever we used to enter our usual places, we would come back with hands full and bowls full. Today we have come back with empty hands and empty bowls. What is the reason for this?" They said among themselves: "Some being of ruined fortune has joined our company, and that is why we have come back with empty hands and empty bowls." And they said further: "Let us investigate — we will divide into two groups and go." They divided into two groups and set out; and whichever group Welcome had joined returned with empty hands and empty bowls. Then those in the other group also split into two and set out, and whichever group Welcome had joined returned with empty hands and empty bowls.

They too returned with empty hands and empty bowls. Again those in that group split into two and set out, and the very same thing happened. And so it continued, time after time — until eventually Welcome and another beggar entered together alone, and when they separated, Welcome came back with empty hands and empty bowls, while all the others came back with hands full and bowls full. Then those beggars said: "This being of ruined fortune has joined our company, and that is why we have come back with empty hands and empty bowls." And they beat Welcome severely, broke his head with a begging bowl, and drove him away, saying: "You bringer of ill fortune, be gone from here!"

Now the householder Anāthapiṇḍada had invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to come at midday to another house. He gave instructions to those in his household who were to prepare the curds and provisions: "Good people, until the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha has been served at midday, do not let any beggar enter. Serve them afterward." When the beggars then began to press their way in, the doorkeepers turned them back. The beggars said: "Hey, good steward! This house is known by the name of our patron — the householder Sudatta — as Anāthapiṇḍada, the Provider of Food for the Friendless. So why do you turn us away?" But the doorkeepers replied:

"Good people, look here — has that ill-fated one not crept in among us?" They looked, and when they saw that Welcome had indeed entered among them, they said: "There is the bringer of ill fortune!" They beat Welcome severely, broke his head with a begging bowl, seized him by his hands and feet, dragged him off, laid him on a heap of rags, and said: "You bringer of ill fortune — sit there!" And Welcome sat upon that heap of rags, weeping.

Then the Blessed One, in the early morning, put on his lower robe, took up his bowl and outer robe, and, surrounded by the assembly of monks and preceded by the Saṅgha of monks, set out in the direction of the dwelling-place of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One saw Welcome sitting upon that heap of rags with his head split open, blood trickling down, weeping. Upon seeing this, the Blessed One spoke to the monks: "Monks, even a being who is in his last existence can be reduced to such a condition as this. Let him be satiated with existences, let him be satiated with the requisites of existence."

Then the Blessed One spoke to the Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, you shall leave the remains of your bowl for Welcome." The Blessed One then went to the dwelling-place of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, arrived there, and took his seat upon the prepared throne at the head of the Saṅgha of monks. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada, knowing that the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha was comfortably seated, satisfied and strengthened them from his own hand with many varieties of pure and choice foods and provisions. Having satisfied and refreshed them with many varieties of pure and choice foods and provisions from his own hand, and knowing that the Blessed One had finished his midday meal and had set aside his bowl, he took a seat lower down and sat before the Blessed One to hear the Dharma. And the Venerable Ānanda forgot to leave the remains of his bowl for Welcome.

Since the buddhas and Blessed Ones are by their very nature incapable of forgetfulness, the Blessed One himself left the remains of his bowl for Welcome. Then, when the Venerable Ānanda began to take away the Blessed One's bowl, he remembered that the Blessed One had told him to leave the remains of the bowl for Welcome, and he began to weep. The Blessed One said to him, "Ānanda, why do you weep?" "Venerable sir, I forgot to leave the remains of the bowl for Welcome, and in so doing I have broken the Blessed One's command." The Blessed One replied, "Ānanda, you have not broken my command. It is rather that Welcome's own karmic obscuration caused you to forget to leave him the remains of the bowl. Now go, Ānanda, and call Welcome."

So Ānanda went and called out, "Welcome! Welcome!" Many voices answered, "Here!" and each of them thought, "Whom does the Blessed One, teacher of the three worlds, have in mind today?" The Venerable Ānanda returned and asked, "Venerable sir, when I called out 'Welcome! Welcome!' many voices answered 'Here!' — which one am I to bring?" The Blessed One replied, "Go and call out these words: 'Welcome — the son of the householder Wise One, the hunter who slays crocodile cubs — come here!'"

The Venerable Ānanda went and called out those very words. Welcome, hearing his own name called, then spoke these verses:

The name "Welcome" has slipped away — from where could I come here now?
What was ill-fated has been exhausted, and what is good has truly come.
Those who take refuge in you — their protector is the Omniscient One.
Those who delight in your words,
those noble ones — they are the truly welcome.
As for me, I am bereft of good fortune:
abandoned by all kin and companions,
having reached a harsh and fearful state,
I am tormented by the sting of grief.

The Venerable Ānanda led him back and presented him, saying, "Venerable sir, this is Welcome." The Blessed One said, "My son, will you eat the remains of the Blessed One's bowl?" "I ask this of the Blessed One." The Blessed One gave him the remains of the bowl. When Welcome saw how little there was, he thought to himself, "Even though the Blessed One, teacher of the three worlds, has thought of me in a hundred ways, he has left only a small amount of bowl-scraps for me." The Blessed One, knowing his thought with his own mind, said, "My son Welcome, even if you were to eat food in quantities the size of Mount Meru and drink in quantities the size of the great ocean, as long as you were not yet satisfied, the remains of the Tathāgata's bowl would still not be exhausted."

Welcome ate the remains of the Blessed One's bowl. When he was satisfied, he began to gaze at the Blessed One's face. The Blessed One asked, "My son Welcome, are you satisfied?" "Blessed One, I am satisfied." "Now drink the last drop of water, and it will vanish." He took it, and it vanished.

The householder Anāthapiṇḍada then asked, "Blessed One, who is this?" The Blessed One replied, "Householder, this is Welcome — the son of the householder Wise One, the hunter who slays crocodile cubs." "Blessed One, then he is my younger brother's companion's son!" "Householder, he is indeed."

Then the Blessed One gave a discourse of thanks, rose from his seat, and departed. That being of final existence followed step by step behind the Blessed One, and went with him to the monastery, where the Blessed One took his seat on the throne laid out before the community of monks. Welcome, too, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side.

The Blessed One, thinking to himself, "I should now purify this one's karma," then spoke to Welcome. "Welcome, do you have any kārṣāpaṇas?" "Blessed One, I have none." The Blessed One said, "Son, look in the fold of your robe." Welcome looked, and saw that there were exactly two kārṣāpaṇas. He said, "Blessed One, there are." The Blessed One said, "Son, go to the Joyful Grove, to Prince Duṃba's enclosure, and bring back some blue utpala lotuses."

Welcome replied, "As the Blessed One commands," and having received the instruction from the Blessed One, he set off toward the Joyful Grove where Prince Duṃba was. Prince Duṃba, seeing him coming from a great distance, thought to himself, "This troublemaker — wherever he comes from, his arrival will surely bring harm to me. Some such situation will arise." And so he said, "Troublemaker, do not enter the Joyful Grove!"

Welcome then spoke in verse:

I do not seek the utpala for myself, nor do I need the lotus for my own sake.
I am the messenger of him who is renowned as all-knowing — the Lord of Sages.

Duṃba replied in verse:

If the Sage, the peaceful one himself, the object of worship for gods and men, if you are the messenger of that supremely worthy object of veneration, then come forward.

Duṃba asked, "Are you the messenger of the Buddha?" Welcome answered, "I am indeed the Buddha's messenger." "What have you come for?" "I have come for some utpala lotuses." "Go — take as many as you wish."

Welcome took up a load of blue utpala lotuses and went before the Blessed One. The Blessed One said, "Welcome, distribute them among the monks." Welcome began to distribute the blue utpala lotuses among the monks, but the monks did not accept them. The Blessed One then said, "Monks, all fragrant things are beneficial to the eyes, and it will also serve to purify this one's karma — please accept them." The monks then took the flowers.

Now, Welcome's previously exhausted capacity for perceiving blue had been restored, so as he sat there at the edge of the elder's assembly, he saw the monks holding the blue utpala lotuses in their hands. And upon seeing them, his capacity for perceiving blue, which had been so long exhausted, manifested fully once again.

The Blessed One then said, "Welcome, why have you not gone forth?" "Blessed One, I will go forth." The Blessed One gave him the going forth (pravrajyā) and conferred full ordination (upasampadā) upon him, and then gave him instruction.

Having thus gone forth, living alone in seclusion, with heedfulness, diligence, and dwelling in earnest — in that very way in which the sons of good family, having cut their hair and beard and donned the ochre robes, go forth from home into homelessness out of genuine faith — he realized and directly accomplished, through his own direct knowledge, the unsurpassed pinnacle of the holy life, and in that very life he achieved it: "My birth is exhausted, the holy life has been lived, what had to be done has been done."

He became one who knows: "There is no further existence beyond this." He became an arhat, freed from attachment, beyond the three realms — one whose mind is equal toward clay and gold, equal toward the sky and the palm of the hand. As when sandalwood is placed upon a blade, his awareness split open the sheath of ignorance. He attained gnosis, the superknowledges, and the individual perfect understandings. He turned his back on the gains and honors of existence and worldly desire. And he came to be worshipped, revered, and openly praised by the gods, both those with power and those under their sway.

Then, when the venerable Svāgata attained arhatship and experienced the joy and bliss of liberation, he spoke these verses:

He who sees things as they truly are bound me with the lasso of his skillful means.
As a great aging elephant is drawn from the mud, with his compassion he drew me from the mire of suffering.

Formerly, I was of ill arrival;
after him, of ill arrival I remained.
Now, by the power of your words, O Mighty Sage,
I have become truly of good arrival.

I, like iron in the presence of the omniscient one, heard your supreme speech — and now I have attained a body like gold, undefiled and without outflow.

Whether seeking material riches, or the higher realms, or liberation, it is excellent to rely upon a spiritual friend who always wishes one's genuine benefit.

This is the sixty-fifth fascicle of the Vinayavibhaṅga.

Now, at the time when the venerable Svāgata had gone forth into the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya, other learned non-Buddhist adherents (tīrthikas) were saying: "The ascetic Gautama's teaching is entirely beautiful in all respects." But then, seeing that even fools like Svāgata and others were being admitted into it, they spoke in disparagement, saying: "How can his teaching be beautiful in all respects?" They sneered, gossiped, and spread slander.

The Blessed One considered: "These common crowds speak slightly of a great śrāvaka who is like Mount Meru. If his virtues are to be proclaimed, where should it be done? It should be done in the very place where he was born and where he fell." And so the Blessed One so considered.

Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'The Tathāgata is going on a begging round through the village of the Aṅgas. Whoever among you wishes to go on the begging round through the Aṅga village together with the Tathāgata, let them take their robes.'"

The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Venerable One," and having listened to the Blessed One, he announced to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One is going on a begging round through the Aṅga village. Whoever among you wishes to go on the begging round through the Aṅga village together with the Blessed One, let them take their robes."

Then the Blessed One — tamed, with a tamed retinue; at peace, with a peaceful retinue; liberated, with a liberated retinue; at ease, with an at-ease retinue; restrained, with a restrained retinue; an arhat, with a retinue of arhats; free from attachment, with a retinue free from attachment; resplendent, with a resplendent retinue — surrounded by a herd of bulls as by a supreme bull among the herd; surrounded by young elephants as by a great elephant; surrounded by a pride of fanged beasts as by a lion; surrounded by a flock of geese as by a king of geese; surrounded by flocks of birds as by a garuḍa; surrounded by students as by a brahmin — surrounded by a throng of the sick as by a skilled physician; surrounded by a troop of warriors as by a hero; surrounded by a company of travelers as by a guide who knows the terrain; surrounded by a host of merchants as by a caravan leader; surrounded by an assembly of retinue as by a merchant lord; surrounded by a throng of ministers as by a king of a fortress; surrounded by a company of a thousand sons as by a wheel-turning king; surrounded by a multitude of stars as by the moon; surrounded by a thousand rays of light as by the sun; surrounded by a host of gandharvas as by Dhṛtarāṣṭra, guardian of the realm; surrounded by a host of kinnaras as by a noble man of excellence; surrounded by a host of nāgas as by Virūpākṣa; surrounded by a host of yakṣas as by Vaiśravaṇa, the giver of wealth; surrounded by a host of asuras as by Pahrāda of the copper mountain; surrounded by the throng of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three as by Śakra; surrounded by the assembly of the Brahmā realms as by Brahmā — his senses supremely tamed; his deportment and conduct unagitated; still as a deep ocean; laden with water as a cloud; free from arrogance as a lord among great elephants; beautifully adorned with the thirty-two major marks of a great being; his body splendidly embellished with the eighty minor marks; his body ornamented with a halo a fathom in breadth; possessed of a radiance surpassing a thousand suns; wholly excellent in every direction as a moving mountain of precious gems; endowed with the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, the three foundations of exclusive mindfulness, and great compassion —

together with a great multitude of the Saṅgha of monks surrounding him and preceding him, he was traveling on a tour of inspection through the country of the sons of the Mallas when he arrived at Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain and took up residence in a fearsome forest thicket on that mountain, in the wilderness haunted by wild beasts.

The brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain heard that the Blessed One, while traveling on a tour of inspection through the country of the sons of the Mallas, had arrived at Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain and was residing in a fearsome forest thicket on that mountain, in the wilderness haunted by wild beasts. Having heard this, they gathered together in groups from assembly to assembly, from district to district, came forth from Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived there, they bowed their heads at the feet of the Blessed One and stood to one side. Standing to one side, the Blessed One instructed, established, encouraged, and gladdened the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain with a Dharma-laden discourse in the proper manner. By means of many kinds of Dharma-laden discourse he instructed, established, encouraged, and gladdened them thoroughly, and then fell silent.

Then the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain rose from their seats, folded their hands toward the Blessed One in reverence, and addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Blessed One, would the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of monks be so gracious as to accept a meal from us tomorrow?"

The Blessed One consented by remaining silent and saying nothing to the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain. Then the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that he had consented, bowed their heads to the Blessed One's feet, and departed from his presence.

That very same night the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain prepared pure and excellent food and drink, and rising early the next morning they arranged seats and set out water vessels. They then invited the Blessed One, saying: "Venerable one, if it pleases you, the time has come. May the Blessed One be so gracious as to consider that the hour is right."

Then the Blessed One, in the morning, dressed in his lower robe and, taking up his bowl and outer robe, went surrounded by the assembly of monks, with the Saṅgha of monks going before him, and proceeded to the place where the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain had invited him. He arrived there and took his seat on the prepared throne at the head of the Saṅgha of monks.

Then the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain, seeing that the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks were comfortably seated, served and satisfied them with pure and excellent food and drink from their own hands, in many and various kinds. Having served them and satisfied them abundantly with pure and excellent food and drink of many kinds from their own hands, when they saw that the Blessed One had finished eating and had set aside his bowl, they took lower seats and seated themselves before the Blessed One to hear the Dharma.

Having seated themselves, the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable Blessed One, just as the Blessed One has tamed malevolent nāgas and malevolent yakṣas such as Sogatama and others dwelling in the wilderness and such places — so too, Venerable One, this nāga Āmra-Riverbank has long harbored resentment toward us who have no quarrel with him, he seeks to compete with those who do not compete with him, he causes harm to those who do no harm, and he ruins the harvest of crops. Ah, may the Blessed One out of his compassionate care subdue this nāga Āmra-Riverbank for us."

The Blessed One consented by remaining silent and saying nothing to the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain. Then the Blessed One instructed, established, encouraged, and gladdened the brahmins and householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain thoroughly with a Dharma-laden discourse in the proper manner. By means of many kinds of Dharma-laden discourse he instructed, established, encouraged, and gladdened them thoroughly, then rose from his seat and departed.

The Blessed One then proceeded to the place where the monastery was and arrived there, taking his seat on the prepared throne at the head of the Saṅgha of monks. Having seated himself, the Blessed One declared to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'Whichever of you wishes to tame the nāga Āmra-Riverbank, take a toothstick.' Then distribute toothsticks to the Saṅgha."

The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Venerable One," and having heard the Blessed One's words, he announced to the monks: "Whichever of you wishes to tame the nāga Āmra-Riverbank, take a toothstick." He then began to distribute toothsticks to the Saṅgha. But the Blessed One did not take a toothstick, and the elder monks, the senior elders, reflected to themselves — — wondered to themselves why the Blessed One had not taken a toothstick. Perceiving that the Blessed One wished to proclaim the virtues of the venerable Śubhāṅga, they likewise refrained from taking toothsticks.

The venerable Śubhāṅga thought to himself: "Why have the Blessed One and the elder monks, the senior elders, not taken toothsticks?" Perceiving that they wished to proclaim his virtues, he resolved to fulfil the intention of the Teacher. He rose halfway from his seat, extended his arm like the trunk of a great elephant, and took a toothstick.

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, which elder monk took a toothstick?"

"Venerable One, it was the venerable Śubhāṅga."

The Blessed One declared: "Ānanda, go to the monk Śubhāṅga and tell him this: 'That nāga is venomous — guard the faculties of your body.'"

The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Venerable One," and having heard the Blessed One's words, he went to the venerable Śubhāṅga and said: "Venerable Śubhāṅga, the Blessed One has declared: 'That nāga is venomous — guard the faculties of your body.'"

The venerable Śubhāṅga replied: "Venerable Ānanda, I obey the Teacher's command. Yet even if this entire Jambudvīpa were filled to the brim with nāgas like Āmra-Riverbank — as a grove of sugarcane, a thicket of reeds, or a forest of rushes — they could not so much as stir a single tip of my hair. How then could they obstruct the faculties of my body? For I have thoroughly and repeatedly cultivated all four bases of miraculous power in the presence of the Blessed One, having practised them again and again."

Then the venerable Śubhāṅga, when that very night had passed, dressed himself in the early morning, took his almsbowl and robes, and entered the lane of Crocodile-Child-Killer to go on almsround. Having made his almsround through the lane of Crocodile-Child-Killer, he went to the dwelling of the nāga

Āmra-Riverbank.

The nāga Āmra-Riverbank saw the venerable Śubhāṅga coming from afar. Upon seeing him, the nāga thought: "Has this ascetic heard that I am deadly? Why else would he come to my abode? For the moment, this is sudden — let him come." Then the venerable Śubhāṅga set his water-strainer and almsbowl to one side, shook out his patchwork robe, washed his two feet, rinsed his two hands, drew water, plucked leaves that had fallen there, sat down, and began to attend to his meal.

When the venerable Śubhāṅga had finished his meal, he reflected: "A venomous nāga, if not provoked, is not a fit subject for taming. Since this one is venomous, I shall provoke it." He washed his almsbowl, and poured the bowl-washing water into the nāga's pond. The nāga Āmra-Riverbank was disturbed by this, and thought: "This ascetic arrived and even ate his fill here, yet I let it pass. Now he insults me and pollutes my abode with his bowl-washing water. This ascetic is clearly not someone who dwells at peace." Enraged, the nāga rose up into the sky above, unleashed a great crash of thunder, and began to rain down upon the venerable Śubhāṅga all manner of weapons: single-pronged vajras, discuses, great arrows, single-pointed spears, and the like.

The venerable Śubhāṅga entered into the meditative absorption of loving-kindness, and those weapons were transformed into divine flowers — blue lotuses, lotuses, white water-lilies, and white lotuses — and fell upon the body of the venerable Śubhāṅga. The nāga Āmra-Riverbank then began to rain down a shower of flaming arrows, and the venerable Śubhāṅga, entering into the meditative absorption of loving-kindness, caused those flaming arrows to be transformed into divine mandāra flowers, which fell upon his body. The nāga Āmra-Riverbank then began to rain down a shower of burning embers, and the venerable Śubhāṅga, entering into the meditative absorption of loving-kindness, caused those embers to be transformed into powdered divine aloe wood, powdered sandalwood, powdered costus, and powdered tamāla leaves, which fell upon his body. The nāga Āmra-Riverbank then released smoke by the power of his rage, and the venerable Śubhāṅga likewise dispelled it by the power of his miraculous ability. The nāga Āmra-Riverbank then kindled fire by the power of his rage, and the venerable Śubhāṅga entered into meditative equipoise within the element of fire. Then, from the great radiance that arose through the combined power of the nāga Āmra-Riverbank's rage and the venerable Śubhāṅga's miraculous ability, the brahmin householders of Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain said to one another: "Friends, this is the Blessed One taming the nāga Āmra-Riverbank."

Then the Blessed One said to the monks: "Among my śrāvaka monks who again and again enter into meditative equipoise within the element of fire, this — namely the monk Śubhāṅga — is the foremost."

When the nāga Āmra-Riverbank had exhausted all his weapons and began to flee, the venerable Śubhāṅga manifested fire on all sides, so that the nāga Āmra-Riverbank saw everything blazing, burning intensely, and flaring up on every side into a single mass of flame — with only the space at the feet of the venerable Śubhāṅga appearing calm. The nāga then went to where the venerable Śubhāṅga was, approached him, and said: "Venerable Śubhāṅga, why do you do this to me? It is I who am subject to aging — it is not fitting that I should challenge you; rather, it is you who have challenged me. Had I not attained such a gathering of qualities, you would this very day have left nothing of me but a name." Śubhāṅga said: "Venerable Āmra-Riverbank, what shall I do? Tell me." "Come now, fair one. Go into the presence of the Blessed One, take refuge, and take up the training precepts."

Then the venerable Śubhāṅga placed the nāga Āmra-Riverbank into his almsbowl, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Sitting thus to one side, the venerable Śubhāṅga said to the Blessed One: "Venerable sir, here is the nāga Āmra-Riverbank." The Blessed One then spoke: "Fair one, formerly, through your misdeeds, you have now been born in the wretched animal realm of existence — violent, red-handed, given to harm and extreme harm, robbing others of their lives, inciting the killing of others' lives, living by the slaying of others' lives. When you pass from here, what will your destiny be? What will your rebirth be? What will your future life be?"

The Blessed One declared: "Fair one, come here, take refuge before me, undertake the training precepts, and grant fearlessness to the brahmins and householders of the crocodile-child-killing mountain." The nāga replied: "Venerable sir, I take refuge before the Blessed One, I accept the training precepts, and from this day forward I grant fearlessness to the brahmins and householders of the crocodile-child-killing mountain."

Then the brahmins and householders of the crocodile-child-killing mountain, taking up many female birds as gifts, went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, bowed their heads to the two feet of the Blessed One, and sat to one side. Sitting thus to one side, the brahmins and householders of the crocodile-child-killing mountain said to the Blessed One: "Venerable sir, has the Blessed One tamed the nāga Āmra-Riverbank?" The Blessed One declared: "I did not tame the nāga Āmra-Riverbank. The monk Subhāṅga tamed the nāga Āmra-Riverbank." They then said: "Venerable Subhāṅga — who tamed the crocodile-child-killing mountain householder — is Subhāṅga, the son of the wise householder." And then some said: "He is the son of our father's brother." Others said: "He is our nephew." Others said: "He is our maternal uncle." And still others said: "He is the son of our younger friend." And they offered him many female birds as gifts.

Then the brahmins and householders of the crocodile-child-killing mountain rose from their seats, arranged their upper robes over one shoulder, bowed with palms joined toward the Blessed One, and said to the Blessed One: "May the Blessed One together with the monastic Saṅgha of monks be pleased, through the venerable Subhāṅga's merit, to accept our offering of a canopy meal for seven days." The Blessed One consented to the brahmins and householders of the crocodile-child-killing mountain by remaining silent. Then the brahmins and householders of the crocodile-child-killing mountain, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been given, bowed their heads to the two feet of the Blessed One and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Now on the crocodile-child-killing mountain there was a brahmin, the younger companion of the wise householder, who was a snake-charmer. He had fled to Śrāvastī out of fear of the nāga Āmra-Riverbank, and the king of Kosala, Prasenajit, had appointed him as superintendent of the royal elephant stables and installed him there. He had gone back to the crocodile-child-killing mountain on some business, and there he heard how the venerable Subhāṅga, son of the wise householder, had tamed the nāga Āmra-Riverbank. On hearing this, he went to where the venerable Subhāṅga was, arrived there, bowed his head to the two feet of the venerable Subhāṅga, and sat to one side. Sitting thus to one side, that brahmin said to the venerable Subhāṅga: "Venerable Subhāṅga, would you be pleased to accept my canopy meal tomorrow at my home?" The venerable Subhāṅga replied: "Brahmin, the brahmins and householders of the crocodile-child-killing mountain have invited me — on account of me — to a canopy meal for seven days for the Buddha and the monastic Saṅgha of monks. I cannot come." The brahmin said: "If you will not accept now, then when you come to Śrāvastī, please accept my almsfood first of all." The venerable Subhāṅga said: "So be it." And he rose and departed.

Then the Blessed One, having stayed as long as he wished at the crocodile-child-killing mountain, set out wandering on tour toward Śrāvastī, and travelling on by stages he arrived at Śrāvastī and took up residence in the Jeta Grove there, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada (Anāthapiṇḍada, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada — "feeder of the destitute").

The householder Anāthapiṇḍada heard that the Blessed One had set out wandering on tour toward Śrāvastī through the region of the Aṅga people and had arrived at Śrāvastī and was residing in the Jeta Grove, in his own park. Having heard this, he came out from Śrāvastī, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's feet and sat down to one side. Sitting thus to one side, the Blessed One instructed the householder Anāthapiṇḍada with a Dharma-filled discourse, rightly showing him, rightly causing him to take hold of it, rightly encouraging him, and rightly delighting him. In many and various ways, with a Dharma-filled discourse, he rightly showed, rightly caused him to take hold, rightly encouraged, and rightly delighted him, and then fell silent.

Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada rose from his seat, joined his palms and bowed in the direction of the Blessed One, and said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, would you kindly consent — together with the monastic Saṅgha of monks — to accept tomorrow a canopy meal at my residence?" The Blessed One consented to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada by remaining silent. Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, understanding that the Blessed One had consented by remaining silent, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's feet and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

The brahmin Sarpaskandhin heard that the Blessed One had set out wandering on tour toward Śrāvastī through the region of the Aṅga people and had arrived at Śrāvastī and was residing in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. Having heard this, he went to where the venerable Subhāṅga was, and having arrived, he prostrated with his head at the venerable Subhāṅga's feet and sat down to one side. Sitting thus to one side, the venerable Subhāṅga instructed that brahmin with a Dharma-filled teaching, rightly showing him, rightly causing him to take hold of it, rightly encouraging him, and rightly delighting him. In many and various ways, with a Dharma-filled teaching, he rightly showed, rightly caused him to take hold, rightly encouraged, and rightly delighted him, and then fell silent.

Then that brahmin rose from his seat, joined his palms and bowed in the direction of the venerable Subhāṅga, and said this to the venerable Subhāṅga: "Venerable Subhāṅga, would you kindly consent to accept a canopy meal at my residence tomorrow?" The brahmin replied: "Inquire of the Blessed One."

Then the venerable Subhāṅga said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, that brahmin has come to me and requests, by way of a word of invitation, that I go elsewhere for tomorrow's canopy meal — may I be lent out?" The Blessed One declared: "The prior invitation shall be honored." The venerable Subhāṅga consented to that brahmin by remaining silent. Then that brahmin, understanding that the venerable Subhāṅga had consented by remaining silent, prostrated with his head at the venerable Subhāṅga's feet and departed from the venerable Subhāṅga's presence.

Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, that very night, had pure and excellent food and drink prepared in advance,

In the morning, rising early, seats were arranged and water vessels set out. Then an invitation was sent to the Blessed One: "Venerable one, we request that you be pleased to attend the canopy meal; may the Blessed One be pleased to come at the appropriate time." Then, in the early morning, the Blessed One dressed, took up his alms bowl and robes, and, surrounded on all sides by the assembly of monks, with the monastic Saṅgha going before him, proceeded to the place of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada's canopy meal and arrived there. He took his seat in the place prepared, at the head of the monastic Saṅgha. That brahmin, meanwhile, had also prepared pure and excellent food in advance for the venerable Subhāṅga. And so the venerable Subhāṅga too, in the early morning, put on his robes, took up his alms bowl and robes, and went to that brahmin's place of the canopy meal, arriving there and sitting down upon the seat that had been laid out.

Then that brahmin, seeing that the venerable Subhāṅga was seated comfortably, satisfied him with pure and excellent food. The brahmin then thought: "The venerable Subhāṅga has eaten the excellent food and will be unable to digest it." And so he said to the venerable Subhāṅga: "Venerable Subhāṅga, will you drink some digestive drink tomorrow?" Subhāṅga replied: "I will drink." Then the brahmin dipped his finger into a large vessel of elephant liquor and stirred it into a cup of plain water, and offered this to the venerable Subhāṅga. Now, arhats do not bring into action knowledge and vision that they have not deliberately applied; and so the venerable Subhāṅga drank it. Having offered his words of thanks, he rose from his seat and departed.

Then, as he was passing through Śrāvastī along a street covered with a reed awning, the rays of the sun struck his body, and right there, overcome by the force of the liquor, he collapsed to the ground. Since it is the nature of the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, to be free from forgetfulness, the Blessed One emanated a clump of leaves that were not real leaves and covered him with it.

Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, knowing that the Blessed One and the rest of the monastic Saṅgha were seated at ease, with his own hands satisfied them and served them in abundance with pure and excellent food and drink. In many ways and on many occasions he satisfied them and attended upon them with pure and excellent food and drink by his own hand. Knowing that the Blessed One had finished his meal and set aside his alms bowl, he took a low seat and sat before the Blessed One to listen to the Dharma.

Then the Blessed One, with Dharma-endowed words of instruction, properly taught, properly guided, properly encouraged, and properly gladdened the householder Anāthapiṇḍada. In many ways, with Dharma-endowed words of instruction, he properly taught, properly guided, properly encouraged, and properly gladdened him. Then, having given words of thanks, he rose from his seat, departed, and went in that direction.

Then the Blessed One, having withdrawn the supernatural feat he had performed, addressed the monks, saying: "Monks, is this not the very monk named Subhāṅga who tamed the nāga on the shore of the Āmra stream? Monks, what do you think — is this monk Subhāṅga now capable of taming even a baby snake?" "Venerable one, certainly not." "Monks, in that case, such faults as these, and others besides, arise from drinking intoxicants. Therefore, monks, those who call me their teacher shall not drink anything intoxicating — not so much as a drop on a blade of grass — nor shall they cause others to drink."

Then the Blessed One caused the venerable Subhāṅga to awaken and asked him: "Subhāṅga, why has this come to pass?" "Blessed One, I did not think. Sugata, I did not think."

Then the Blessed One went to the assembly hall and, having arrived, took his seat on the prepared throne before the community of monks. Having seated himself, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, it is on account of seeing ten benefits that a rule of training in the Vinaya is to be established for the hearers" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: if one drinks grain liquor or prepared liquor that causes intoxication, it is an offense entailing a downfall.

What is meant by grain liquor? It is a drink made from grain, a drink made from flour, or a drink made from fermented mash. What is meant by prepared liquor? It is a drink made from roots, a drink made from wood, a drink made from leaves, a drink made from flowers, or a drink made from fruit. When both are mixed together, that is called grain liquor and prepared liquor. What is meant by 'if one drinks it'? It means swallowing it down the throat. What is meant by 'an offense entailing a downfall'? It burns one, scorches one, and causes one to fall into the hells, into the animal realm, into the wretched realm of hungry ghosts, into bad rebirths, into states of ruin. Furthermore, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs wholesome qualities — and for this reason it is said to entail a downfall.

Now, how does a downfall come about? If a monk drinks something possessing the color that causes intoxication, and the smell that causes intoxication, and the taste that causes intoxication, and the sensation that causes intoxication, and having drunk it becomes intoxicated, it constitutes an offense entailing a downfall. If having drunk it he does not become intoxicated, it constitutes a minor offense. If a monk drinks something possessing the color that causes intoxication, and the smell that causes intoxication, and the taste that causes intoxication, and having drunk it becomes intoxicated, it constitutes an offense entailing a downfall. If having drunk it he does not become intoxicated, it constitutes a minor offense. If a monk drinks something possessing the color that causes intoxication and the smell that causes intoxication, and having drunk it becomes intoxicated, it constitutes an offense entailing a downfall. If having drunk it he does not become intoxicated, it constitutes a minor offense. As for drinking something that possesses only the color that causes intoxication, unmixed with anything else — there is no offense in that, for it has become merely brine.

If a monk drinks grain liquor, it is an offense entailing a downfall. If he drinks prepared liquor, it is an offense entailing a downfall. If he drinks grain liquor and prepared liquor together, it is an offense entailing a downfall. If a monk drinks the yeast of grain liquor, it is an offense entailing a downfall. If a monk eats grain husks, it is an offense entailing a downfall. If a monk eats grain stalks, it is an offense entailing a downfall. If a monk eats the sediment of liquor, it is a minor offense. If a monk eats flowers or fruits that cause intoxication, it is a minor offense. There is no offense in drinking boiled liquor, in carrying it on a physician's prescription for someone with a mouth ailment, or in using it to rinse the body along with threads. There is no offense for one who acts for the first time, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

The monks, having doubts, asked the Buddha, the Blessed One, who cuts through all doubts: "Venerable one, what action did the venerable Subhāṅga perform such that by the ripening of that action he was born into a household of great wealth with abundant riches and many enjoyments? What action did he perform such that by the ripening of that action he entered among the hungry and came to be known by the name Subhāṅga — 'Auspicious' — only in name? What action did he perform such that by the ripening of that action he went forth in the teaching of the Blessed One and, having abandoned all afflictions, directly realized the state of an arhat?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it was this very Subhāṅga, the son of good family, who accumulated those actions."

Actions that transform conditions, that abide like a flame, that will unfailingly come to be — these were performed and accumulated. Since the one called Subhāṅga himself performed and accumulated those actions, who else could experience them individually? Monks, actions that are performed and accumulated do not ripen in the external element of earth; they do not ripen in the element of water; they do not ripen in the element of fire; they do not ripen in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous actions that are performed and accumulated ripen in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases. As it is said in verse:

Even across a hundred aeons,
actions do not perish.

When the conditions and the time are met,
their fruits will surely come to be for embodied beings.

Monks, long ago in times gone by, there lived in a certain mountain cliff-dwelling a householder who was wealthy, of great possessions, and with many enjoyments. One day, accompanied by his retinue, he went to a pleasure garden. Now, in an age when no buddhas arise in the world, pratyekabuddhas — solitary buddhas — arise: beings who feel compassion for the lowly and the poor, who delight in remote dwelling-places, who are solitary like a rhinoceros, and who have become worthy recipients of offerings for the world. Such a solitary buddha, a great being, was wandering for alms near that mountain cliff-dwelling. The householder, seeing the solitary buddha from a great distance, instructed those among his household who lived by their share of dairy food: "Wise ones, drive away this renunciant!" But none of them were willing to drive the solitary buddha away. So the householder, annoyed, rose from his seat, seized the solitary buddha himself by the neck, drove him out, and said: "You wretched beggar — go off among the starving!"

And he hurled him into a heap of dirty rags.

The great being, that solitary buddha, then reflected: "This afflicted householder has acted extremely badly. If he is ruined and harmed by this, it would be wrong." Wishing to extend a hand to him from this condition, the solitary buddha, spreading his wings like a king of swans, rose manifest into the sky above, and began to perform miraculous feats — blazing, radiating, bringing rain, and sending forth lightning. Ordinary people are swift to place their trust in supernatural power, and so the householder fell prostrate at the feet of that solitary buddha, like a great tree cut at its root, and said: "O true worthy one, please come down, please come down! Please extend a hand to pull me, sunk in the mud of afflictions, up from my depths!"

Out of compassion for that householder, the solitary buddha descended from the sky above. The householder made offerings to him, prostrated with his head at his feet, and offered this aspiration prayer: "Whatever root of virtue there is in these offerings made to undo the harm I have done to one who is such a true worthy one — may it not be in accord with that portion of the action of harm. By this root of virtue, may I be born into a household of wealth, great possessions, and many enjoyments, and may I attain qualities of such a kind that one can please and not disappoint a Teacher far more supremely excellent than this one."

Monks, that householder of that time and place is none other than this Subhāṅga. Because he made offerings to that solitary buddha and offered that aspiration prayer, by the karmic maturation of that action he has now been born into a household that is wealthy, of great possessions, and with many enjoyments.

By the karmic maturation of that action — the action of having done harm and of having uttered the word "Nyeong" — he was tormented for an aeon in the great hell of Avīci. Then, by the remaining force of that very same action, he wandered for five hundred lifetimes in the state of hunger, being gnawed by starvation, bearing the name "Nyeong." Even to this day he has taken birth among the hungry ghosts and carries the name "Nyeong."

Now, as for the action of having done harm to one who was a perfectly worthy recipient of offerings — instead of coming to accord with that portion of the action, he offered an aspiration prayer to attain qualities of such a kind that one can please and not disappoint a Teacher supremely more excellent than this one. By the karmic maturation of that action, he went forth into my teaching, and by abandoning all afflictions he has directly realized arhatship. He has pleased me, the Teacher who is supremely more excellent than a hundred thousand billion pratyekabuddhas, and has not caused me disappointment.

Monks, what action did the venerable Subhāṅga perform, such that by its karmic maturation the Blessed One has again and again proclaimed him foremost among those who enter meditative absorption in the fire element? This too came about through the power of aspiration. And where was that aspiration made?

Monks, long ago, in a time past, during this very excellent great aeon, when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, there appeared in the world the Teacher, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly complete buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, the knower of the world, the unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, the Teacher of gods and humans, the Buddha, the Blessed One Kāśyapa. He dwelt near Vārāṇasī, in the deer park in the forest of the Seer who speaks truth. This one went forth into that Teacher's teaching, and the monk by whom he was ordained was again and again proclaimed by the Tathāgata, the perfectly complete buddha Kāśyapa, foremost among those who enter meditative absorption in the fire element.

Now, having practiced the holy life under that Teacher for as long as his life lasted, this one attained not even a portion of the accumulation of qualities. Then, at the time of his death, he offered this aspiration prayer: "Throughout my life I have practiced the holy life under the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the perfectly complete buddha, the unsurpassed recipient of offerings, Kāśyapa, and yet I have attained not even a portion of the accumulation of qualities. By this root of virtue of having practiced the holy life for as long as I lived, may the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the perfectly complete buddha Kāśyapa, give a prophecy to the brahmin youth Lama, saying: 'Brahmin youth, in a future time, when the lifespan of beings is one hundred years, there will appear a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly complete buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, a knower of the world, an unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, a Teacher of gods and humans, a Buddha and Blessed One called Śākyamuni.' And may I then go forth into the teaching of that prophesied one, abandon all afflictions, and directly realize arhatship — and just as my preceptor here was proclaimed by the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the perfectly complete buddha Kāśyapa, foremost among those who enter meditative absorption in the fire element again and again, may I likewise be proclaimed by the Blessed One Śākyamuni, the Lion of the Śākyas, foremost among those who enter meditative absorption in the fire element again and again." Having begun to make this aspiration, by the power of that aspiration he has now been proclaimed by the Tathāgata as foremost among those who enter meditative absorption in the fire element again and again.

Monks, that being so, the karmic maturation of actions that are entirely dark is entirely dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are entirely bright is entirely bright; and the karmic maturation of actions that are mixed is mixed. Therefore, monks, abandon actions that are entirely dark and those that are mixed, and strive for actions that are entirely bright. Monks, you should train accordingly.

Here ends the seventy-ninth rule entailing a transgression through drinking intoxicants.

Summary verse:

Śiva, the matted-hair ascetic, the jewel merchant, the physician, the Saṅgha, the ladder and the food,
the eaten thing, the one turned harmful, the fierce woman, the youth, the alms bowl, and the powerful ones.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. On a rocky hillside, a brahmin was living there who had taken a girl from Śrāvastī as his wife. He sported with her, delighted in her, and enjoyed pleasures with her. A daughter was born to them, and he raised and nurtured her until she grew up.

Business requiring the brahmin's presence in Śrāvastī arose, and he set out in a carriage, riding in dignity. His daughter saw him and said, "Father, where are you going?" The brahmin said, "To Śrāvastī, daughter." The daughter said, "Father, I will come too." The brahmin said, "Daughter, you are on the verge of attaining the highest good, so if someone were to touch your hands or feet, it would be unpleasant for us — stay right here." The daughter began to weep, and her mother said, "Daughter, why do you cry?" The daughter said, "Father is going to Śrāvastī but does not wish to take me there." The mother said, "Take the noble lord's daughter along as well, and she will see her relatives." The brahmin said, "Daughter, she is about to attain the highest good, so if someone were to touch her hands or feet, it would be unpleasant for us — let her stay here." The mother said, "If she travels together with the noble lord's son, she will be well concealed and well protected." So the brahmin had his daughter mount the carriage and set out in dignity.

Because the daughter was of a curious and inquisitive nature, she asked her father: "Father, whose park is this? Whose lotus pond is this? Whose temple is this? Whose pleasure grove is this? Whose well is this? Whose assembly hall is this?" The brahmin said, "Daughter, this is the dwelling place of the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākya." The daughter said, "Father, let us go there." The brahmin said, "Daughter, in this dwelling place reside those who have gone forth from many different classes and lineages — if someone were to touch your hands or feet, it would be unpleasant for us — come back, let us go on." And they rode away in dignity.

Now, near the town, a large number of brahmin wives and householders' wives who wished to visit the assembly hall had come out to the outskirts of Śrāvastī. They saw that brahmin and said to him, "Welcome, welcome! You have come well. Where have you been for so long?" The brahmin said, "If I were to come just as you all do, where would I be going? I have come to visit the assembly hall in the Jeta Grove."

"Bring this daughter-in-law of yours along as well today. Show her too the assembly hall." And so that girl went together with them to the Jeta Grove.

Now the practice of the group of six was this: "When brahmins and householders come and arrive here, we will teach them the Dharma, defeat our opponents, and spread our own fame." Because of this, one or another of the group of six would always be standing at the gate of the Jeta Grove, never leaving it unattended. The venerable Charka had risen early in the morning, before dawn, had thrown away his tooth-stick, put on his patched robe of reddish-yellow, and was walking back and forth and sitting at the gate of the Jeta Grove.

Now in the six great cities, there was no one among the inhabitants — whether by lineage, clan, family line, name, physical appearance, craft, or livelihood — whom the group of six did not know or had not seen or heard of or recognized or understood. And so the venerable Charka, seeing from a great distance that large gathering of brahmin wives and householders' wives, called out to them saying: "Welcome, mother of so-and-so! Welcome, wife of so-and-so! Welcome, daughter-in-law of so-and-so! Welcome, daughter of so-and-so! Welcome, sister of so-and-so! You have come well, you have come well! Why do you wander about for so long, like the moon?"

They replied: "Venerable Charka, when the Blessed One so excellently proclaimed that the eight inopportune states are not the time for a person to live the holy life, we find ourselves in a ninth inopportune state — being burdened with the busyness of household life."

Charka said: "Sisters, have you not heard someone recite these words:

When a king afflicted by poison and the like leaves his duties undone, both he himself and those duties
come to utter ruin.
And even those very duties,
before they are fully accomplished, death — the enemy of the world — will come to take him away."

They said: "Venerable Charka, it is for that very reason that we have come to the pleasure garden to enter the Jeta Grove, to view the assembly hall, and to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One and the venerable elder monks."

Charka said: "Sisters, if that is why you have come, then it is excellent — for the Blessed One has also taught that one should draw out what is essential from this body that is without essence. Excellent, excellent! But sisters, go ahead and ask me how one should view it, as one views a spectacle. Sisters, where do you intend to enter?"

"Venerable Charka, we all wish to enter through the main gate and view the assembly hall."

"Sisters, the Blessed One has said:

If a person of wisdom, with a genuinely devoted mind, takes even a single step toward the stūpas of the buddhas, even a hundred thousand times the weight in gold of the river Jambū would not equal that merit."

"That too is excellent! Sisters, have you found some monk who will show you the assembly hall?"

"Noble one, shall we enter with a lamp-holder in hand, or should we look for someone else? Venerable Charka, why look for another monk, having passed you by? Who is there who surpasses you? Please show it to us yourself."

Then the venerable Charka thought to himself: "If I show them the assembly hall, my store of virtue will be entirely depleted. But if I do not show it to them, I will not receive the alms of the one who was burned."

The Blessed One had declared: "Those who lack faith are to be established in perfect faith, tamed, grasped, and properly set in place." Recognizing this, Charka resolved to commit them firmly to virtue and to show them everything in full. He took up various offerings — flowers, incense, and the like — held the lamp-holder in his hand, and began to show them the hall in proper sequence.

"Sisters, this is the Blessed One's perfume chamber, where the Blessed One three times by day and three times by night surveys the world with a buddha's eye, discerning: who has fallen away, who has grown, who has been harmed, who has become distressed, who has become unhappy, who has become harmed and distressed and unhappy, who is inclined toward the lower realms, who is falling toward the lower realms, who has fallen into the lower realms — and raises such beings from the mire of the lower realms and places them in the higher states, liberation, and its fruit. Those sunk in the mire of desire he draws out by the hand. Those bereft of the wealth of the noble ones he places in the sovereignty of the noble wealth. The worlds adorned by the arising of buddhas he causes to be endowed with fruit. The roots of virtue not yet produced he causes to be produced; roots of virtue already produced he causes to ripen; and those that have ripened he causes to be liberated." With this knowledge and vision he acts, even as it is said:

A being venomous as a sea-monster's lair may yet pass beyond the appointed time — but the loving-kindness of a buddha toward those to be tamed does not pass beyond the appointed time.

As a mother ceaselessly attends her only beloved child and watches over its life, so too the Tathāgata attends upon those who are to be tamed and watches over their lives.

The compassion residing in the mind-stream of the omniscient one is a mare who seeks her foal to be tamed and does not tire.
Loving-kindness toward those wasted by existence and the lower realms is like the love of a cow for her wasted calf.

"This is the assembly hall of the venerable Kauṇḍinya. It was here that the Blessed One, when the world was in the darkness of ignorance, without a guide, without a full guide, first cleansed the eye of Dharma of the one whose Dharma-eye he purified with the collyrium-stick of the eye of gnosis — the Blessed One who, being the foremost among those who are elders, those who are like regents, those who have long since gone forth, those who visibly practice the holy life, and those who bear aloft the victory banner of the patched robe, is prophesied supreme. It is his stream. And here too, because the Blessed One set in motion the wheel of Dharma endowed with the Dharma — the wheel that no ascetic, brahmin, god, māra, Brahmā, or anyone else in the world is able to turn back, the wheel that is for the benefit of the many, for the welfare of the many, for their happiness, out of compassion for the world, for the good and benefit and happiness of gods and humans — turning it thrice, in twelve aspects, seek to pay proper reverence at his feet.

"This is the assembly hall of the venerable great Kāśyapa. He was a brahmin like a great sāla tree in its prime — one who abandoned the unsatisfied accumulation of a thousand and went forth; one endowed with six hundred million particles of gold; one possessed of eighty small granaries of golden rice —"

— one who owned eighteen villages of servants; one who owned sixteen villages of dependents; one endowed with a beautiful fair-skinned body surpassing even gold — who cast all that aside as one casts away the ash of dried spittle, and who, in the last watch of the night, took up a patched robe of stitched cloth worth a hundred thousand, going forth for the sake of whatever arhats dwelled in the world, dwelling in the forest to cultivate meditative concentration (dhyāna), liberation, meditative absorption, and meditative attainment — one at whose very sight even rutting bull elephants are freed from their pride; one who, having accepted the undertaking to make Bumangs

a place of offering, received the vows of a monk (bhikṣu); one whom the Blessed One likewise proclaimed among monks — "Among my monk-disciples who are of few desires, who are content, and who speak of the virtues of training, the foremost is this one: the monk Mahākāśyapa" — one praised by the Blessed One. Seek to pay proper reverence at his feet here as well.

This is the assembly hall of the venerable Śāriputra — the one who attained the highest fruit; one who, at the age of sixteen, having read the grammar of the Indra tradition, refuted all opponents; one who went forth in the teaching of the Blessed One; one whom the Blessed One proclaimed the foremost among those of great wisdom and great eloquence; one of whom the Blessed One declared that all the world together does not amount even to a sixteenth part of him, and whom the Blessed One praised in verse:

Whatever wisdom all the world may hold, the gods included — all of it combined would not suffice to be one sixteenth part of Śāriputra's wisdom, it is said.

And even if this entire world with its gods were equal to Śāriputra in his wisdom, still it would not suffice to be one sixteenth part of the wisdom of the Tathāgata.

Seek to pay proper reverence at his feet here as well.

This is the assembly hall of the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana — one who was heir to an uncrowned kingdom among the Manadons and went forth; one by whose miraculous powers the palace called Vijayanta belonging to Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, was shaken three times, rocked completely, and shaken thoroughly with his right big toe; one by whose miraculous powers the Blessed One traveled to the world-realm Prabhāvatī in seven days and nights; one whom the Blessed One proclaimed the foremost among those of great miraculous powers and great might. This is the assembly hall of the venerable Aniruddha — one who went forth from among men of good fortune; one who is the son of the Blessed One's father's brother, whose very name, when properly proclaimed, causes merchants who are sailing across the great ocean in well-built vessels to arrive safely; one whom the Blessed One proclaimed the foremost among those possessing the divine eye. well.

This is the assembly hall of the venerable Ānanda — one who for a long time served the Blessed One; one who attended close at the feet of the Buddha, the Blessed One; one truly praised by the Teacher; one who lived the pure life of Brahmā; one truly honored by the wise; one who went forth from among the sons of the Blessed One's father's brothers; one whom the Blessed One proclaimed the foremost among those of great learning, those who retain what they have heard, and those who accumulate learning. Seek to pay proper reverence at his feet here as well.

This is the assembly hall of the venerable Nandana — one who went forth from a son born of the Blessed One's younger brother Śru, who, had he not gone forth, would have become a wheel-turning king of great power.

This is the assembly hall of the venerable Śrākāvin — one whom the Blessed One proclaimed the foremost among those who restrain the gates of the senses. Seek to pay proper reverence at his feet here as well.

This is the assembly hall of the venerable Nandaka. This is that of Aniruddha. This is that of Chanda. This is that of Lāghava. This is that of Nabasa. This is my assembly hall. Shall we look at this one too? Noble one, having looked at all the assembly halls, shall we not then look at the assembly hall of the noble Cāraka? We very much wish to look at this assembly hall of the noble Cāraka. Sisters, do as you wish.

Now, the venerable Cāraka was one who had indulged in sensual pleasures, and so in his assembly hall the floor was smeared with a paste of black beans, the walls were variegated and neatly painted, beds stuffed with the wool of young lambs were laid out, jars filled with drink were set in place along with vessels containing them, and within the store-room there were various provisions in abundance.

The venerable Cāraka spoke to the very many wives of brahmins and householders who had come to his assembly hall: "Sisters, who is going to serve the drink? Or will you simply drink? Noble one, does a river flow backwards? Whatever it is we would ask of you, do you in turn grant it to us. Give us what we lack." "Sisters, what do you lack?" "Noble one, the hearing of Dharma." "Sisters, the Blessed One has well declared that six things arising in the world are wonderful and rare. What are these six? The Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha; the Dharma and Vinaya taught by the Tathāgata; being human; being born in a central land; having no deficiency in one's faculties; and having aspiration toward wholesome things. Therefore, this aspiration toward wholesome things that has arisen in you is like the arising of a buddha. Excellent! Excellent! Sisters, be seated, and I shall teach you the Dharma." They bowed at his two feet and sat before him to hear the Dharma, and he began to teach them the Dharma.

Vinaya Analysis, the sixty-sixth fascicle.

Now that girl, being by nature fond of spectacle, was looking at pictures and wandered off elsewhere. The others, having heard the Dharma, bowed at the two feet of the venerable Cāraka and departed from the assembly hall. The girl, unaware that the others had left, remained in the very entrance hall, looking at pictures. When the venerable Cāraka had seen the others out and was about to enter the assembly hall, he saw that girl sitting in the entrance hall and said to her: "Girl, have you not gone?" She gave a smile, and Cāraka accosted her and laid hold of her limbs and extremities — he groped her all over. The girl wept, came out, and went to her father, saying: "Father, the ascetic Cāraka has violated my person." The brahmin thought to himself: "If I say even a little about this now, I am alone, and —"

"These many people will become a source of harm to me — that is the kind of situation this will turn into. When I have found allies, I shall have this arrow reversed." Between the Jeta Grove and Śrāvastī there stood a great roadside tree, and beneath it a brahmin sat giving instruction in the secret brahmanical recitations to some five hundred brahmin youths. That brahmin said to them: "Wise ones, the ascetic Cāraka has violated my young daughter. You are fellow practitioners of brahmanical celibacy with me — help me!" The brahmins, being utterly without hesitation, took up their staves and went there. The venerable Cāraka was standing and walking near the gate of the Jeta Grove, and they seized him and began to drag him away, yet they could not move him at all. The Blessed One, knowing the moment ripe for taming, caused Cāraka's strength to wane, and then they were able to drag the venerable Cāraka back and forth and carry him off.

The venerable Cāraka thought to himself: "Surely the Blessed One is aware that I have come to harm, to distress, and to discomfort?" And he reflected: "Since the Blessed One is aware of this, and since this is the last instruction he will give on this matter, it is better to let myself be led away."

Now the Blessed One, knowing that King Prasenajit of Kosala lay sleeping on the floor of his upper chamber, roused him with a snapping of fingers and declared: "Great King, you should investigate carefully and not be hasty." The Blessed One roused King Prasenajit of Kosala, who lay sleeping on the floor of his upper chamber, a second time and a third time with a snapping of fingers, and declared: "Great King, you should investigate carefully and not be hasty."

The brahmins, meanwhile, brought the venerable Cāraka to the gate of the royal palace. At the gate of the royal palace, a great crowd of common people raised a loud uproar and clamor: "The brahmins have seized the ascetic Cāraka and brought him to the king's gate!" King Prasenajit of Kosala, lying on the floor of his upper chamber, was awakened by the noise of the crowd, and he said to his night attendants: "Wise ones, why is this crowd of common people making such a loud uproar and clamor?" They replied: "Your divine majesty, the reverend Cāraka, a brahmin's daughter, a brahmin, and some five hundred brahmin youths have all come and are gathered in a tumultuous crowd at the palace gate."

King Prasenajit of Kosala thought to himself: "It is with this in mind that the Blessed One declared to me, 'Great King, you should investigate carefully and not be hasty.'" And he understood it clearly.

Now it is the custom in Śrāvastī that whenever a great dispute arises, drums are beaten and conch shells are blown. So King Prasenajit commanded his night attendants: "Wise ones, beat the great drum and blow the conch!" They beat the drum and blew the conch, and the assembly gathered together with the king. The king said: "Let that brahmin and the reverend Cāraka be brought inside." When the two had come in, the king said to the brahmin: "Brahmin, what do you say?" "Your divine majesty, the ascetic Cāraka has violated my young daughter." The king said: "Reverend Cāraka, the brahmin says this of you — what do you say?"

"Your divine majesty, I have committed no sinful act against her."

The king said to his ministers: "Wise ones, how is this to be examined?" The ministers said: "Your divine majesty, the Blessed One has declared your majesty himself to be foremost among those possessed of confident eloquence. Therefore let your majesty's own mouth resolve this case."

The king said: "Wise ones, how is this to be known? The eye-consciousness can perceive visible forms, but let the queen's attendants examine the girl. Let the girl be sent in among the queen's attendants and let them investigate her." They sent the girl in among the queen's attendants, and the queen Phreṇḍanma took the girl onto her lap and said: "Girl, speak truthfully. If the venerable Cāraka violated you and deprived you of your maidenhood, then since he is one who has gone forth from the home of a brahmin reciter, he will fall down into the hearth-pit of your household. But if you remain unharmed and possessed of moral discipline, and you falsely slander a monk, you will be reborn in the great hells." The girl said: "My lady, he did not deprive me of my maidenhood. This is what he did: he suckled me and pressed my limbs and body — he pressed them all over." The queen Phrenldanma said: "Girl, for a matter as small as that you have thrown the entire royal court into turmoil. Do not fathers suckle their daughters and press their limbs and body all over?"

Then the elderly women examined the girl, and as far as they could determine, her maidenhood was unharmed. They reported to the king: "Your divine majesty, this girl's maidenhood is unharmed." The king said to his ministers: "Wise ones, what should be done here?" The ministers said: "Your divine majesty, the venerable Cāraka should be punished." The king said: "Wise ones, then today let this brahmin be placed in a house of lac and burned with fire. Let that girl also be tied to the two hind legs of a wild colt. And let those five hundred brahmin boys have their hands and feet cut off." The venerable Cāraka said: "Your divine majesty, if through any act of mine that many sentient beings were to be harmed, then truly, your divine majesty, you would have expelled me from the teaching of the Blessed One." The king said: "Wise ones, then today release those five hundred brahmin boys, but place this brahmin in the house of lac and burn him with fire, and let that girl be tied to the two hind legs of a wild colt." The venerable Cāraka said: "Your divine majesty, if through any act of mine even a single tiny ant were harmed, then truly, your divine majesty, you would have expelled me from the teaching of the Blessed One." The king said to his ministers: "Wise ones, observe the power of discriminating analysis that a hearer of the Blessed One possesses even without being free from attachment. If the brahmins were to overcome the venerable Cāraka, he would be slain by even a single stone. Wise ones, now let everyone disperse!" They were dispersed, the drum was beaten, the curtain was drawn, and the multitudes of common people scattered in all directions.

Then the king, the queen Phrenldanma, and the venerable Cāraka sat together, and the king said to the queen Phrenldanma: "Phrenldanma, see how the venerable Cāraka's insolence of what kind has thrown the entire royal court into turmoil." The queen Phrenldanma then said to the venerable Cāraka: "Venerable Cāraka, because of you, the fully ordained nun Utpala-colored, the novice nun Kulabyeda, the novice nun Cirika, and —"

"— and many others besides, all of whom have abandoned every affliction and directly realized arhatship: do you feel no remorse even now, having created such ugliness in the midst of the retinue gathered around the king?"

The venerable Cāraka replied: "Phreñdanma, I shall conduct myself in such a way that, as I continue wandering in saṃsāra, I will no longer engage in such afflictions." So saying, he rose from his seat and departed.

Ashamed, he was unable to come before the Blessed One, and so he went instead to where the venerable Śāriputra was, and when he arrived he said to the venerable Śāriputra: "Preceptor, please teach me the Dharma in such a way that, as I continue wandering in saṃsāra, I will no longer engage in such afflictions."

The venerable Śāriputra considered the matter, wondering whether any outstanding transgressions had not yet arisen. Seeing that there remained certain ones still outstanding, he had him confess those transgressions that were to be confessed, and had him restrain those transgressions that were to be restrained through restraint. Then he gave him this instruction: "Attend to your mind in such and such a way, and practise with vigilance."

Thereupon the venerable Cāraka, dwelling alone in seclusion, vigilant, ardent, and fully composed, directly realized in that very lifetime — through his own direct knowledge — that unsurpassed culmination of the holy life for the sake of which sons of good family shave off their hair and beard, don the saffron robes, and go forth from home into homelessness with faith in what is true alone. He understood: "Birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. Beyond this present existence there is nothing further to know." He became an arhat, free from attachment beyond the three realms, a mind equanimous toward clay and gold alike, equanimous toward sky and the palm of a hand, cutting through the filth at the gateway of consciousness like sandalwood applied there, attaining the higher knowledges, the direct cognitions, and the individual analytical wisdoms, turning his back on acquisition of existence, desire, and respect, worthy of veneration, worthy of honor, and worthy of being addressed directly by the gods together with Indra and his retinue.

Then, as the venerable Cāraka the arhat was experiencing the joy and bliss of attainment and liberation, he thought: "The Blessed One has been of benefit to me; the Sugata has done me good. For the Blessed One has removed from me many phenomena of suffering; the Blessed One has established for me many phenomena of happiness; the Blessed One has removed from me many forms of evil and unwholesome phenomena; the Blessed One has established for me many forms of wholesome phenomena. What then should I do so that by it I may have repaid the Blessed One, requited him, and repaid him fully?"

He then reflected further: "All that the blessed buddhas have come to know through unsurpassed omniscience — completing the six perfections across three incalculable eons by means of countless hundreds and thousands of hardships — all of that was for the benefit of sentient beings. So I, too, shall bring benefit to sentient beings."

He then thought: "Has the Blessed One ever indicated anyone as supreme among those lay people who inspire faith?" And he saw that the Blessed One had not.

Wondering who might be the right person, he saw that it was himself. He then thought: "Good — by this I shall perfectly fulfill the intention of the Teacher."

As for the time ripe for taming, in Śrāvastī there lived a brahmin who had faith in Śiva and rendered him devoted service. The venerable Śāraka reflected: "This brahmin is ripe for taming," and went to him. The brahmin, for his part, continued rendering devoted service to Śiva, calling out "Ho, brahmin! Brahmin!" as he sought him. The venerable Śāraka said: "I am a brahmin." The brahmin replied: "A brahmin has a topknot, but you are a shaven-headed ascetic." The venerable Śāraka said: "Even so, I am a brahmin, and my Teacher is the foremost of brahmins. Do you have faith in this Śiva?" He replied: "I do." The venerable Śāraka said: "Then let us speak of Śiva. How is it that I am a brahmin and my Teacher is the foremost of brahmins?" Śiva spoke: "Noble Śāraka, that is just so — you are indeed a brahmin, and your Teacher is indeed the foremost of brahmins."

The brahmin then thought: "For a long time I have rendered devoted service to Śiva, and yet he has never shown himself, even in a dream. But when the venerable Śāraka speaks a word, he responds in speech. Ah — the venerable Śāraka must be of great miraculous power and great might!" So the brahmin said: "Venerable Śāraka, why have you come?" Śāraka replied: "For your sake — to tame you. Venerable Śāraka, please remain here for this purpose and accept alms in this place." The venerable Śāraka stayed right there and accepted alms, and then the brahmin together with his wife sat down before the venerable Śāraka to hear the Dharma. The venerable Śāraka, having penetrated the brahmin's intentions, latent tendencies, constitution, and natural disposition, taught the Dharma in such a way that, while that brahmin and his wife sat right there on their seat, the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection was shattered by the vajra of wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry was actualized. He taught just in this way.

Having seen the truth, that brahmin spoke: "Venerable one, through relying on the venerable Śāraka as my spiritual friend, what the venerable Śāraka has done for me is something that neither my father did, nor my mother, nor a king, nor the gods, nor my ancestors of former times, nor ascetics and brahmins, nor friends, companions, or the circle of relatives and kin. He has dried up an ocean of blood and tears. He has liberated me from mountains of bones. He has closed off the doors to the lower realms. He has opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation. He has drawn my feet out from hell, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts. He has placed me among gods and humans. He has brought cyclic existence to its end. The twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection, accumulated since beginningless time, has been shattered by the vajra of wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry has been attained. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. I have entered the stream! Venerable one, I take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the monastic Saṅgha. May I be received as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge with heartfelt sincerity."

The brahmin then said: "Venerable Śāraka, please consent to accepting my alms-food, robes, lodging, provisions in illness, and medicinal requisites for as long as you live." The venerable Śāraka replied: "One who has gone forth has entered upon the path of caring for others' benefit;

he must also work for the benefit of other brahmins." So saying, he declined to accept.

Then the venerable Śāraka tamed and established both households of brahmins in Śrāvastī.

The venerable Śāraka reflected: "Who is now ripe for taming?" He perceived that in Śrāvastī there was a brahmin who had faith in Śiva and paid homage to Śiva. The venerable Śāraka thought: "That brahmin is now ripe for taming," and went to him. The brahmin paid homage to Śiva and then called out, searching for a brahmin: "Ho, brahmin! Brahmin!" The venerable Śāraka said: "I am a brahmin." The brahmin replied: "How can a shaven-headed one like this be a brahmin?" The venerable Śāraka said: "What does a brahmin look like?" The brahmin replied: "A brahmin has matted hair." Thereupon the venerable Śāraka transformed himself into one with matted hair. When the brahmin was filled with wonder at this, he said: "Venerable Śāraka, why have you come?" Śāraka replied: "For the sake of taming you yourself." "Venerable Śāraka, then please stay right here and take your meal." The venerable Śāraka stayed there and ate. Then the brahmin, together with his wife, sat down before the venerable Śāraka to hear the Dharma. The venerable Śāraka, having understood that brahmin's mind, his latent tendencies, his temperament, and his nature, taught the Dharma in such a way that, as the two of them sat right there together, the vajra of gnosis shattered the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the perishable collection that had been accumulated since beginningless time, and they directly realized the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, the brahmin said: "Venerable one, in relying upon you, the venerable Śāraka, as my virtuous spiritual friend, what you have done for me is something my father never did, my mother never did, no king ever did, no gods ever did, no ancestors of old ever did, no ascetics or brahmins ever did, no friends, companions, or circle of relatives ever did: you have dried up the ocean of blood and tears, freed me from mountains of bones, closed the doors to the lower rebirths, opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation, lifted my feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and set me among gods and humans, brought cyclic existence to its end. Through the vajra of gnosis you have shattered the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the perishable collection accumulated since beginningless time, and I have obtained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable Śāraka, I have entered the stream! I have entered the stream! Venerable one, I take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the Saṅgha of monks. May I be received as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge with heartfelt sincerity." "Venerable Śāraka, please consent to accepting my alms-food, robes, lodging, provisions in illness, and medicinal requisites for as long as you live." The venerable Śāraka replied: "One who has gone forth has entered upon the path of caring for others' benefit; he must also work for the benefit of other brahmins." So saying, he declined to accept.

Then the venerable Śāraka tamed and established both households of a second brahmin in Śrāvastī.

The venerable Śāraka reflected: "Who is now ripe for taming?" He perceived that in Śrāvastī there was a miserly brahmin whose wife was fond of jewels. The venerable Śāraka thought: "That brahmin is ripe for taming," and so the venerable Śāraka disguised himself as a jewel-merchant and went to that brahmin's house, calling out: "Jewels for sale! Jewels for sale!" The brahmin's wife heard this and said: "What price are you selling the jewels for?"

The venerable Śāraka said: "These jewels are costly, yet I give them for a small price." So saying, the venerable Śāraka made the appearance of the jewel-merchant vanish and sat there in his own monk's robes. The brahmin was filled with wonder and said: "Venerable Śāraka, why have you come here?" "For the sake of taming you." "Then, venerable Śāraka, please stay right here for that purpose and accept meals." The venerable Śāraka stayed there and accepted meals, and that brahmin together with his wife sat before the venerable Śāraka to listen to the Dharma. The venerable Śāraka, having thoroughly understood that brahmin's disposition, latent tendencies, constitution, and temperament, then taught the Dharma in such a way that, as that brahmin and his wife sat there on that very seat, the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection were shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and they manifestly realized the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, the brahmin spoke: "Venerable one, I have relied upon the venerable Śāraka as my virtuous spiritual friend, and what the venerable Śāraka has done for me is something that neither my father did for me, nor my mother, nor the king, nor the gods, nor my forebears of old, nor ascetics and brahmins, nor my beloved ones, friends, and circle of relatives. He has dried up the ocean of blood and tears. He has delivered me from the mountains of bones. He has closed the doors to the lower destinies. He has opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation. He has lifted my feet free from the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts. He has placed me among gods and humans. He has brought cyclic existence to its end. The twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection, accumulated since beginningless time, have been shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and I have obtained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept me as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, with all my heart I go for refuge wholeheartedly and with full sincerity."

"Venerable Śāraka, please agree to accept for as long as I live my alms food, robes, lodging, medicines for illness, and medicinal requisites." The venerable Śāraka said: "One who has gone forth has entered upon a life of benefiting others, and so one must also benefit other brahmins," and with that he declined to accept.

Then the venerable Śāraka tamed and established both households of a third brahmin in Śrāvastī.

The venerable Śāraka reflected: "Who is now ripe for taming?" He perceived that in Śrāvastī there was a brahmin who was sick. Physicians had treated him with cold medicines, warm medicines, and sweating treatments, and he had grown disgusted with them all. He had instructed his doorkeeper: "Do not let any physician inside." The venerable Śāraka thought: "The time has come to tame that brahmin," and so the venerable Śāraka disguised himself as a physician and went to stand at that brahmin's gate, announcing that a physician had come. The doorkeeper said: "The brahmin has instructed me not to let any physician inside, and so I am posted here for just that reason." The venerable Śāraka said: "Go and tell the brahmin: a physician has come who says he will heal you not with medicine and not with painful treatment, but with secret mantras."

The doorkeeper went and reported all of this to the brahmin, and the brahmin said: "Let him in." The venerable Śāraka entered, and healed the brahmin with secret mantras. Then the venerable Śāraka put aside the guise of a physician and sat in his own appearance. The brahmin was filled with wonder and said: "Venerable Śāraka, why did you come here?" "For the sake of taming you." "Then, venerable Śāraka, please remain right here and accept our hospitality." The venerable Śāraka stayed there and took his meals, and the brahmin together with his wife sat before the venerable Śāraka to hear the Dharma. The venerable Śāraka, having thoroughly understood that brahmin's disposition, latent tendencies, temperament, and character, taught the Dharma in such a way that, while the brahmin and his wife sat right there on their seats, the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi) — accumulated since beginningless time — were shattered by the vajra of wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry was actualized.

Having seen the truth, the brahmin spoke: "Venerable one, by relying on the good friend that is the venerable Śāraka, the venerable Śāraka has done something for me that my father never did, my mother never did, the king never did, the gods never did, my ancestors of old never did, neither ascetics nor brahmins, neither friends nor companions nor a host of kinsmen — he has dried the ocean of blood and tears, freed me from mountains of bones, closed the doors to the lower realms, opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation, and lifted my feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and set me among gods and humans, and brought cyclic existence to an end. The twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection, accumulated since beginningless time, have been shattered by the vajra of wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry has been attained. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept me as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge with a sincere and open heart."

"May the venerable Śāraka please accept, for as long as I live, my alms-food, robes, lodging, remedies for sickness, and medicinal requisites." The venerable Śāraka replied: "One who has gone forth has entered upon the path of caring for others, and so one must also benefit other brahmins," and with that he accepted.

At that time the venerable Śāraka tamed and established both brahmin households in Śrāvastī. The venerable Śāraka thought: "When the time has come to tame someone," and in Śrāvastī there was a brahmin who was wealthy, possessed of great riches and abundant resources, with extensive and vast holdings — yet miserly, small-eyed, one who would not even give a scrap to a crow, grasping at every possession. At his gate some five hundred brahmin boys were reciting brahmanical sacred texts. The venerable Śāraka thought: "The time has come to tame that brahmin," and so, looking toward the one to be tamed, whenever the venerable Śāraka entered that place for alms, he repeatedly received nothing there at all. Having emerged empty-handed, as the venerable Śāraka came out that brahmin saw him and said: "Hey, ascetic, you keep going in there again and again — do you get anything at all?"

The venerable Śāraka, thinking of that brahmin's wealth of faith, said: "Brahmin, if you yourself have nothing, what is there to give?" The brahmin, stung by this, replied: "Ascetic, you should give to all the household folk together." The venerable Śāraka said, "That is the means," and departed.

Now one of the brahmin boys who was familiar with the monk's ways said to that brahmin: "Do you know, sir, what the teacher meant when he said 'that is the means'?" The brahmin replied: "I do not know." The boy said: "What the teacher said — 'receive it with joy' — that is what he meant by 'that is the means.'" The brahmin asked again: "And what, sir, did the teacher mean by 'all the household folk together'?" The brahmin replied: "I do not know." The boy said: "By 'all the household folk together' is meant the noble Gautama of the warrior clan, together with his retinue of twelve hundred and fifty monks. In this way the teacher has effectively invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha."

The brahmin said: "Have I not seen brahmins endowed with the three Vedas? Why then should I give to these shaven-headed ascetics?" The boy replied: "The ascetic, by using the teacher's name today, will tomorrow invite the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to the teacher's home gathering." The brahmin asked: "Why would he do such a thing?" The boy replied: "Teacher, if you do not trust me, please send a brahmin boy to observe." So he sent a brahmin boy, and when the venerable Śāraka had assembled the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha, the boy sat off to one side at the edge of the gathering and heard an elder brahmin inviting the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another home at midday, using that brahmin's name. The brahmin boy, having heard this, came back and reported to the brahmin: "It is just as I said, sir. The venerable Śāraka has, using the teacher's name, invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to tomorrow's home gathering. Please make preparations for the meal."

The brahmin said: "Have I not seen brahmins endowed with the three Vedas? Why then should I give to these shaven-headed ascetics? Let them go eat at the householder Anāthapiṇḍada's almshouse." Then the next morning, when the monks doing water purification arrived at that brahmin's house and said: "Brahmin, where shall we set the water?" the brahmin replied: "At the householder Anāthapiṇḍada's home gathering." Likewise, when those doing the purification of cooked food arrived and said: "Brahmin, where shall the meal be arranged?" the brahmin replied: "At the householder Anāthapiṇḍada's home gathering."

Now the Blessed One had declared: "Whoever has been invited as a guest should go ahead of time and see to what has not yet been prepared." So the venerable Śāraka rose early in the morning and the noble one encountered the householder Anāthapiṇḍada on the road, who said: "Venerable Śāraka, where are you going?" He replied: "A brahmin made use of my name to invite the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another home at midday, so I am going there." The householder said: "That brahmin is without faith. It would not be right for the midday gathering of the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to be cut off — I shall come as well."

The two of them went there together. When they arrived, the brahmin was sitting in a state of despondency. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada said to him: "Brahmin, you have invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another home at midday — why then are you sitting in despondency? What harm is there in preparing the food?" The brahmin replied: "Have I not seen brahmins who are masters of the three Vedas? I give to those shaven-headed ascetics (śramaṇas). You, go eat a meal at my home." The householder said: "Brahmin, do you think I have no wealth? I would be glad to go on serving the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha for as long as I live, with almsfood, robes, lodging, medicine for illness, and medicinal requisites. But I speak now for your own benefit. Do not sit in despondency — prepare the food. For the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha has been honored, revered, regarded as supreme, and worshipped by King Prasenajit of Kośala, by Queen Mallikā, by the noblewomen of the Kṣatriya clan, by the divine seer Brahmadatta, by those of the old families, by myself, and moreover by a great number of brahmins and householders. If, because of you, the midday gathering of the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha were to be cut off, the king would certainly do you harm, and it would come to such a pass that you would be submerged in water up to your neck and put to death." The brahmin was afraid and thought: "That is indeed what would happen." He said: "Householder, the food has not been prepared — what shall I do now?" The householder replied: "Brahmin, there is nothing in Śrāvastī that money cannot buy. Bring kārṣāpaṇas (silver coins), and I will prepare the food." The brahmin asked: "Householder, how many kārṣāpaṇas will be enough to provide a midday meal for the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha?" The householder replied: "Five hundred kārṣāpaṇas." The brahmin gave the householder five hundred kārṣāpaṇas, and the householder Anāthapiṇḍada added further kārṣāpaṇas of his own on top of those and prepared the food.

The brahmin then said: "Householder, I have no serving bowls either." The householder Anāthapiṇḍada replied: "Brahmin, do not sit there in despondency on account of the serving bowls — those will come along with the containers belonging to the ascetics."

Then the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha arrived and was seated. The brahmin saw the monks rinsing out their bowls, and thought: "Well then, I need not rinse out the vessels myself either." He became filled with faith. He said to the venerable Śāraka: "Venerable Śāraka, you are my good spiritual friend. Please do the honors, and then invite those present afterward to take their meal." After the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha had eaten, the Blessed One gave a teaching of thanksgiving, rose from his seat, and departed.

Then the brahmin said: "Venerable Śāraka, now please remain and oversee the matter of the food." Śāraka stayed on, and the brahmin served out the food and attended to all the affairs of the meal. Then the brahmin together with his wife sat before the venerable Śāraka to hear the Dharma, and the venerable Śāraka, having thoroughly understood his disposition, latent tendencies, constitution, and temperament,

Thus, while the brahmin and his wife were seated right there on that very seat, the venerable Śāraka taught the Dharma in such a way that the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection, accumulated since beginningless time, was shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry was actualized.

Having seen the truth, the brahmin spoke: "Venerable one, by relying on the good spiritual friend, the venerable Śāraka, and by the venerable Śāraka's doing what he has done for me in this way — this has not been done for me by my father, nor by my mother, nor by a king, nor by the gods, nor by my forebears of old, nor by wandering ascetics (śramaṇas) and brahmins, nor by friends, companions, and the company of my kinsmen. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears. You have freed me from the mountains of bones. You have closed the doors to the lower realms. You have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation. You have withdrawn my feet from the hells, from the animal realm, and from the realm of hungry ghosts, and have placed me among gods and human beings. You have brought saṃsāra to an end. The twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection, accumulated since beginningless time, has been shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and I have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept me as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, with all my heart I joyfully take refuge."

"Will the venerable Śāraka please accept, for as long as I live, my alms-food, robes, lodging, provisions in illness, and requisite medicines?"

The venerable Śāraka said: "One who has gone forth has entered into a life of benefiting others. Therefore one must also benefit other brahmins." So saying, he accepted.

At that time the venerable Śāraka, while living in Śrāvastī, trained and established both members of five brahmin households.

The venerable Śāraka reflected: "When the time has come to tame someone" — and there was in Śrāvastī a brahmin whose wife was beautiful to behold, lovely and fair — "and that brahmin, being extremely attached to her, would not allow anyone to enter the house," the venerable Śāraka thought: "Now is the time to tame this brahmin." He went to that brahmin's house, and when he arrived, the brahmin happened to be urinating. Seeing the venerable Śāraka, the brahmin said: "Ascetic, wait — do not enter."

The venerable Śāraka then blessed the brahmin's stream of urine so that it did not cease, and entered inside. He also blessed the brahmin's wife so that whatever was on her belly within appeared visible from the outside. Then the venerable Śāraka came back out.

The brahmin said: "Venerable Śāraka, did you see my wife?" He replied: "I saw her — just as you see her, so did I see her."

The brahmin then went in and looked, and seeing her in an ugly and repulsive light, said to her: "Brahmin woman, did you not say something to the venerable Śāraka?"

She said: "I said nothing at all — he entered, cursed me, and left. Please go ask his forgiveness."

The brahmin went and said: "Venerable Śāraka, I beg you to forgive me regarding my wife."

The venerable Śāraka said: "I forgive."

Things returned to being as they were before, and the brahmin, now filled with faith, said: "Venerable Śāraka, why did you come?"

"It was for the sake of taming you yourself." "Venerable Śāraka, for that reason please remain right here and accept the offering of food." The venerable Śāraka stayed and accepted the offering of food, and then the brahmin together with his wife sat before the venerable Śāraka to listen to the Dharma.

The venerable Śāraka, having fully understood the brahmin's intention, his habitual tendencies, his constitution, and his character, taught the Dharma in such a way that, as that brahmin and his wife sat right there on that very seat, the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadṛṣṭi) — accumulated since beginningless time — was shattered by the vajra of wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry was directly realized.

Having seen the truth, the brahmin spoke: "Venerable one, by relying on you, the venerable Śāraka, as my spiritual friend, you have done for me what neither my father did, nor my mother, nor a king, nor the gods, nor my ancestors of former times, nor ascetics and brahmins, nor my loving friends and companions, nor the circle of my kinsmen. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears; you have freed me from the mountains of bones; you have closed the doors to the lower realms; you have opened the doors to higher rebirths and liberation; you have drawn my feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; you have placed me among gods and humans; you have brought cyclic existence to its end. The twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection, accumulated since beginningless time, has been shattered by the vajra of wisdom, and I have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept me as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge with all my heart and with perfect sincerity. And please, venerable Śāraka, grant permission to offer you — for as long as you live — alms-food, robes, lodging, provisions in sickness, and medicinal requisites."

The venerable Śāraka said: "One who has gone forth has entered upon the practice of caring for others' welfare, so one must also care for the welfare of other brahmins as well." Saying this, he accepted.

Now at that time the venerable Śāraka, while at Śrāvastī, tamed and settled both members of a brahmin's household — the sixth such household he had tamed.

Then the venerable Śāraka thought: "When the time has come to tame someone" — and there in Śrāvastī there was a brahmin whose wife was beautiful, lovely, and attractive. That brahmin had gone outside to gather flowers and firewood. The venerable Śāraka thought: "The time has come to tame that brahmin," and went to the brahmin's house. When the brahmin's wife saw the venerable Śāraka at the door, she went inside, and the venerable Śāraka also entered the house. She went into a room, and the venerable Śāraka followed her into that room as well. She came out of the room and began to climb a staircase to the upper story, and the venerable Śāraka also followed her up the stairs. She kicked the ladder away, and the venerable Śāraka fell to the ground and entered into the meditative absorption of cessation. She thought: "Has he died?" She came down and tried to rouse him, but he could not be moved. The brahmin arrived and asked: "What is this?" The brahmin woman explained the whole matter at length, and he said: "What you did to him in this way was wrong. This man is one who has gone forth from the household of a brahmin reciter, a close friend of King Prasenajit, and the teacher of Queen Mallikā —

"They have obtained from the king the dismissal of the youth, and so our king has had them made to prostrate at his feet — such a situation will arise in which they must die." The brahmin woman touched the two feet of the venerable Śāraka and said: "Noble one, there is nothing that you do not know, nothing that you do not see, nothing that you do not understand, nothing that you do not recognize — please grant your forgiveness." And as she begged forgiveness, the venerable Śāraka rose and said: "Forgiven."

The brahmin was astonished, and he said: "Venerable Śāraka, why have you come?" "For the purpose of taming you yourself." "Then, venerable Śāraka, please stay right here and accept the service of meals." The venerable Śāraka stayed there and accepted the service of food.

The brahmin, together with his wife, sat before the venerable Śāraka in order to hear the Dharma. The venerable Śāraka, having thoroughly understood that brahmin's disposition, latent tendencies, constitution, and temperament, taught the Dharma in such a way that while that brahmin and his wife sat there on that very seat, the twenty-peaked mountain of the view of the transitory collection was shattered by the vajra of wisdom, and they directly realized the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, the brahmin spoke: "Venerable one, in reliance upon you, my virtuous spiritual friend, and through what you, venerable Śāraka, have done for me — what neither my father did for me, nor my mother, nor the king, nor the gods, nor my ancestors of old, nor the ascetics (śramaṇas) and brahmins, nor the assembly of loving friends, companions, and relatives — you have dried up the ocean of blood and tears, you have freed me from the mountains of bones, you have closed the doors to the lower realms, you have opened the doors to the higher states and to liberation, you have drawn my feet out from the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, you have placed me among gods and humans, you have brought cyclic existence to its end, and by the vajra of wisdom you have shattered the twenty-peaked mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time, and I have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept me as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as life lasts, with heart and core I go for refuge with full sincerity."

"Venerable Śāraka, please accept for as long as life lasts: my alms-round offerings, robes, lodging, provisions for illness, and medicinal requisites." The venerable Śāraka said: "One who has gone forth has entered upon the practice of benefiting others. I must also benefit other brahmins," and he did not accept.

Then the venerable Śāraka, while at Śrāvastī, tamed and established both members of the brahmin's household — the seventh — and placed them in the teaching.

The venerable Śāraka thought: "When the time for taming has come" — there in Śrāvastī there lived a brahmin whose wife was beautiful, lovely, and charming. That brahmin had gone outside to fetch flowers and fuel for the fire, and the venerable Śāraka thought: "It is time to tame that brahmin," and he went to that brahmin's home. The brahmin woman, swollen with pride in her beauty, her youth, her lineage, and her wealth, would not even offer a word.

The venerable Śāraka, reflecting upon the exhaustion of her prior karma, spoke this verse:

Old rope frays and breaks away, yet a small new rope she will not weave.

Seeing her adorned with heedlessness, he wept with tear-filled face.

Having spoken thus, he departed. The brahmin woman, furious and thinking "He has insulted me," put on soiled clothes, lay down upon a broken bed, and remained there. When the brahmin returned and saw her, he said, "Brahmin woman, what is wrong?" She scolded him and said, "If you lack the means to give food and clothing even to a single person standing at your own door, what is the use of your having taken a wife? That ascetic Śāraka insulted her." The brahmin said, "Good woman, he is one who has gone forth from a family of brahmin cantors; you should be patient with him." The brahmin woman said, "However much you speak, brahmin, whatever the case may be, if he lives, I shall not." Since one driven by desire will stop at nothing, however wicked the act, the brahmin tucked a sword under his arm. When the venerable Śāraka, still some distance away, saw him coming, he wondered what his state of mind might be, and he saw that the man was coming with murderous intent. The venerable Śāraka then manifested through his miraculous power a thicket of leafless shrubs, entered into it, and remained there. The brahmin said, "Venerable Śāraka, open the door." The venerable Śāraka said, "If you have come with good intentions, why would I not open? Throw down the sword." The brahmin thought, "I have been found out; he means to kill me," and so he threw down the sword. The venerable Śāraka said, "Throw down that murderous mind as well." The brahmin thought, "This is a great master indeed; he has even read my mind," and he became filled with faith. The venerable Śāraka then withdrew the miraculous transformation he had wrought and remained as before. That brahmin prostrated at the two feet of the venerable Śāraka and sat before him to receive the Dharma. The venerable Śāraka, having thoroughly understood that brahmin's intentions, latent tendencies, elements, and natural disposition, taught the Dharma to him in such a way that, even while seated on that very seat, the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection were shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and he actualized the fruit of stream-entry. Having seen the truth, he said:

"Venerable one, in relying upon you, the spiritual friend, venerable Śāraka, what you have done for me here is something my father never did for me, my mother never did for me, the king never did for me, the gods never did for me, my forebears never did for me, ascetics and brahmins never did for me, and friends, companions, and kinsmen never did for me. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears; you have freed me from the mountains of bones; you have closed the doors to the lower realms; you have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation; you have drawn my feet out from among the hell-beings, the animals, and the hungry ghosts; you have placed me among gods and humans; you have brought cyclic existence to its end. By the vajra of gnosis you have shattered the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection — accumulated since beginningless time — and I have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, I have entered the stream."

"Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept me as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I take refuge with wholehearted sincerity."

Then the brahmin said: "Venerable Cāraka, have you come to perform my wedding ceremony?" "Yes." "And what did the venerable Cāraka say to my brahmin wife?" The venerable Cāraka replied: "I said this to her:

Wearing out what is old, making no new store,
seeing one adorned with careless ease,
one weeps with a face drenched in tears."

"Venerable one, what is the meaning of that verse?"

"Brahmin, long ago in times past, a festive gathering took place at a cliff in the mountains. There many householders' wives, adorned with their own ornaments, went to the pleasure garden, and a beggar woman saw them and lamented in sorrow at her own wretched state. Now, when buddhas do not appear in the world, inferior pratyekabuddhas (solitary buddhas) arise — those with compassion for the poor and destitute, fond of remote and isolated lodgings, solitary as a rhinoceros, become worthy fields of offering for the world. One such pratyekabuddha went to that place in order to benefit beings. The beggar woman saw his beautiful body and his beautiful mind, and when she found a small amount of begged food, she thought: 'Because I have not made offerings to such a worthy field of offering as this, I have ended up in a condition like this — let it not continue so. If this Blessed One will accept a little alms from me, I shall give it to him.' Out of compassion for her, that pratyekabuddha accepted his bowl, and she gave the food to him. Then, out of compassion for her, he rose up into the sky above like a king of geese spreading its wings, and began to perform miraculous feats — blazing, shining, causing rain to fall, and sending forth lightning. Ordinary people are quickly moved to faith by miraculous displays, and so she fell prostrate at the feet of that pratyekabuddha, like a tree cut down at its root, and made this aspiration: 'By the karmic maturation of this act of mine, may I never experience suffering.' Brahmin, the beggar woman of that time and place was your own wife. Through the karmic maturation of the offering she made to the pratyekabuddha, she has now been born as she is. And I, having reflected that the karmic maturation of her act has been exhausted, said:

Wearing out what is old, making no new store,
seeing one adorned with careless ease,
one weeps with a face drenched in tears.

Venerable Cāraka thus urged me by way of meaning to attend to my own wife. Venerable Cāraka, will you permit me to invite you for the midday meal tomorrow at my wedding?" The venerable Cāraka accepted by his silence, without saying a word. Then the brahmin, understanding that the venerable Cāraka had accepted by his silence, departed.

The brahmin woman, for her part, felt remorse, thinking: "It was wrong of me to send someone to kill the brahmin Cāraka — what if the brahmin has killed the venerable Cāraka?" When the brahmin returned, his wife said: "My lord's son, did you kill the venerable Cāraka?" The brahmin replied: "He is a great being — who could kill him?" The wife said: "Then did you at least not invite him?" The brahmin replied: "I have invited him to come for the midday meal tomorrow at another house. Now make ready the food."

The brahmin woman prepared the cold dishes that very day, and the hot dishes she prepared for the following morning. The venerable Cāraka, for his part, rose early the next morning, donned his robe, took up his alms bowl, and went to the brahmin's house. When he arrived, he sat down on the seat that had been set out. Then the brahmin, together with his wife, knowing that the venerable Cāraka was seated at ease, satisfied him and served him from their own hands with pure and choice food and drink. Again and again, with pure and choice food and drink in abundance, they satisfied him and served him from their own hands. When the venerable Cāraka had finished eating and had washed his hands and set aside his bowl, the brahmin woman took a seat lower than his and sat down before the venerable Cāraka to hear the Dharma. The venerable Cāraka, having understood her mind, her latent tendencies, her temperament, and her character, taught the Dharma in such a way that, while she sat upon that very seat, the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection were shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and she directly realized the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, she spoke: "Venerable one, by relying on you, my virtuous friend, and through what you, venerable Cāraka, have done for me — this has not been done for me by my father, nor by my mother, nor by a king, nor by the gods, nor by my ancestors of old, nor by ascetics and brahmins, nor by the assembly of friends, companions, and kinsmen. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears, you have freed me from the mountains of bones, you have closed the doors to the lower rebirths, you have opened the doors to higher states of existence and liberation, you have lifted my feet from the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and you have placed me among gods and humans, you have brought cyclic existence to its end. By the vajra of gnosis, the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection, accumulated from beginningless time, have been shattered, and I have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept me as a laywoman. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge with wholehearted and sincere devotion."

She then said: "Please, venerable Cāraka, grant permission for as long as you live to accept almsfood, robes, lodging, the requisites of the sick, and medicinal provisions from me." The venerable Cāraka replied: "One who has gone forth has entered upon a way of life dedicated to benefiting others, and so one must bring benefit to other brahmins as well" — and saying this, he accepted.

At that time the venerable Cāraka had tamed and established both brahmin households in Śrāvastī. Then the venerable Cāraka reflected: "I wonder whether the time has come to tame someone." In Śrāvastī there was a brahmin who was wealthy, with great riches and great resources, with wide and extensive landholdings, yet miserly and tight-fisted — one who would not even give a torma offering to a crow — clinging to all his possessions. This man had assigned a tenant farmer to work a rock-face, and after sealing the storage barns he gave his wife only enough food to sustain herself, then went off to that rock-face and supervised the tenant farming work himself.

The venerable Cāraka thought: "The time has come to tame that brahmin." He gathered alms and went to that brahmin's house, and said: "Brahmin woman, please offer water for the alms bowl."

She offered him a bowl of rice gruel, and the ladle filled up in the same way as before. The brahmin woman said: "Noble one, my husband is miserly and tight-fisted, one who would not even give a torma offering to a crow, who clings to all his possessions — please do not come again."

The venerable Cāraka said: "No matter; tomorrow I myself will come with sixty others."

The following day the venerable Cāraka did indeed come there himself with sixty others, and she offered them rice gruel in the same way. And so it went, day after day, himself and sixty others going once each day to eat alms at that brahmin's house. Now, hear what the neighbors and acquaintances of ours have to say: that brahmin woman — with goods that the brahmin earned by the labor of his own two hands — was eating together with the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākya. They gossiped, spread slander, and spoke ill of her.

One brahmin youth had gone from Śrāvastī to that rock-face on some errand. The brahmin, catching sight of that youth from a great distance, called out to him and asked: "Brahmin youth, where have you come from?" He replied: "From Śrāvastī." The brahmin asked: "Have you heard any news of my household?" He answered: "I have. In Śrāvastī the house of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada is the first house for the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākya, and the house of the preceptor is their second house. Sixty śramaṇas, sons of the Śākya, come every day to seek alms."

The brahmin thought: "This is aimed at me, the miser, as a rebuke — I should ask someone else as well." So he moved on and sat down along the road. Before long another brahmin youth, going on some errand from Śrāvastī to that rock-face, came by. The brahmin, seeing that youth from a great distance, questioned him: "Brahmin youth, where have you come from?" He replied: "From Śrāvastī." "Have you heard any news of my household?" "I have. In Śrāvastī the house of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada is the first house for the śramaṇas, the sons of the Śākya, and the house of the preceptor is their second house. Sixty śramaṇas, sons of the Śākya, come every day to seek alms."

The brahmin thought: "Since this one and that one agree, it must indeed be so. If my wife has been consuming my goods in this way, this is not to be borne — I shall go home." He returned home and said to the brahmin woman: "Wicked brahmin woman! I earned these goods by the labor of my own two hands. Are you eating them together with those shaven-headed śramaṇas, sons of the Śākya? Do you not see brahmins who are masters of the three Vedas? Instead you give to those bald śramaṇas!" And he began to beat her.

She said: "Brahmin, look and see — has she broken the seals on the storage jars that you left in her care? Or, rather, examine each one carefully." The brahmin examined the jars one by one, and when he saw that every seal remained intact just as before, he said to his wife: "Where did you find so much food?" She replied: "A little rice gruel came into this ladle, and when I cooked some legumes along with the gruel, that gruel alone was enough to feed sixty monks and myself as well."

The brahmin asked: "Why did this happen?" She replied: "I shall make this evident to you directly." The following day, when the venerable Cāraka came there himself with sixty others, she offered alms just as before, and then said: "Brahmin, do you see?" That brahmin was filled with sincere faith and said:

The venerable Cāraka said: "Brahmin, will you permit me to come to your home tomorrow for the midday meal?" The venerable Cāraka replied: "Brahmin, is this really how it is done? One invites a guest with proper food and summons him with proper cooked food." Since the venerable Cāraka said nothing further to that brahmin, the brahmin accepted and departed.

Then, understanding that the venerable Cāraka had accepted in silence, that very night the brahmin prepared clean and pure provisions and cooked food in readiness. The venerable Cāraka also, the following morning, dressed himself in his lower robe, took up his bowl and outer robe, and went to where the brahmin's house was. Arriving there, he sat down upon the seat that had been spread for him.

Then, perceiving that the venerable Cāraka was seated at ease, the brahmin satisfied and served him with his own hands, offering clean and pure provisions and cooked food. Again and again he satisfied and served him with his own hands with clean and pure provisions and cooked food. When the venerable Cāraka had finished eating, had washed his hands, and had set down his bowl, the brahmin took a low seat and sat down before the venerable Cāraka in order to hear the Dharma.

The venerable Cāraka, having thoroughly understood that brahmin's intention, latent tendencies, constitution, and character, taught the Dharma to him in such a way that, right there as the brahmin sat together with his wife upon that very seat, the peak of the twenty-peaked mountain of the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadṛṣṭi) — accumulated since beginningless time — was shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry was actualized.

Seeing the truth, he said: "Venerable one, through relying on you as a virtuous friend, the venerable Cāraka has done for me what neither my father has done, nor my mother, nor the king, nor the gods, nor my ancestral forebears, nor any ascetics or brahmins, nor any assembly of friends, companions, or kinsmen. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears; you have freed me from the mountains of bones; you have closed the doors to the lower realms; you have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation; you have lifted my feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; you have placed me among gods and humans; you have brought cyclic existence to an end. The twenty-peaked mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time has been shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and the fruit of stream-entry has been obtained. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. Please accept me as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge with sincere and heartfelt devotion."

The venerable Cāraka said: "Will you please accept, for as long as I live, my alms food, robes, lodging, the requisites for illness, and medicinal supplies?" The venerable Cāraka replied: "One who has gone forth has entered upon a life of benefiting others; therefore one must also benefit other brahmins." Saying this, he did not accept.

At that time the venerable Cāraka, while in Śrāvastī, tamed and established both members of nine brahmin households.

Thus ends the sixty-seventh fascicle of the Vinayavibhaṅga.

The venerable Cāraka thought: "Who is now ripe for taming?" There is in Śrāvastī a brahmin who has taken a wife from an equal family, and who sports with her, takes delight in her, and lives in enjoyment with her. A son was born to them, and they raised and nurtured him until he grew up. That brahmin's wife was fierce, arrogant, coarse, given to outbursts, and sharp-tongued.

She was a quarrelsome person who was constantly fighting and brawling with her own relatives, and so she came to be known by the name Tummo Tummo, meaning "the fierce one, the fierce one."

On another occasion, a festival arose in Śrāvastī, and the brahmin spoke to his son: "My son, your mother here is so fierce that she constantly brawls with others. It has come to a point where we might face such a situation as being thrown into prison and put to death. For now, until the festival is over, go and stay somewhere else at another cliff-face, and afterward return. You go and ask your mother." The son then said to his mother: "Dear mother, for the sake of a small errand, I am going to a certain pleasant cliff-face." The fierce woman replied: "Go to the place where her first garment has gone." The brahmin also said: "I too shall go." The fierce woman said: "Go to a place from which you will never return." As the two departed, the fierce woman addressed the maidservant, saying: "Girl, start carrying loads, and eat the coarser food." The girl began to carry loads and set to doing so, whereupon the venerable Cāraka thought: "This is the time to tame the fierce woman," and early that morning he dressed in his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and monastic robe, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. As he went along on his alms round he approached the fierce woman's home to enter, and when the fierce woman saw him approaching she said to the maidservant: "Girl, drive this ascetic away." The girl drove him away, but the venerable Cāraka entered the house first, before the maidservant, and then the maidservant entered afterward. When the fierce woman saw this again she said to the maidservant: "Girl, did you not drive this ascetic away?" The girl replied: "I did drive him away." "Then how did he enter? Drive him away again and shut the door." The girl drove him away, shut the door, and entered, but the venerable Cāraka had already entered before her. When the fierce woman saw this again she said to the maidservant: "Girl, did you not drive this ascetic away and shut the door?" The girl replied: "I drove him away and shut the door." "Then how did he enter from somewhere?" Thereupon the fierce woman said: "Ascetic, what are you begging for?" The venerable Cāraka said: "For food." The fierce woman replied: "If you had come as the eldest son you would not be refused food. Why should I not give you food?" The venerable Cāraka then appeared in the form of the eldest son, and the fierce woman said: "Even if you make your hands and feet turn yellow, I will not give you food." The venerable Cāraka then appeared with his hands and feet turned yellow, and the fierce woman said: "Even if you look with eyes like a bowl you will not be given food." The venerable Cāraka then appeared with eyes like a bowl, and the fierce woman said: "Even if you hover in the sky spinning about like a bell swinging in a hawk, you will not be given food." The venerable Cāraka then appeared hovering in the sky spinning about like a bell, and the fierce woman said: "Even if you split yourself evenly into two pieces, you will not be given food." The venerable Cāraka then appeared splitting himself evenly into two pieces and falling to the ground, whereupon the maidservant said: "My lady, among the many afflictions that you have inflicted, this is the most afflicting of all. This ascetic is a companion of the younger brother of King Prasenajit of Kosala, and the teacher of Queen Mallika. Even though I am a lowly servant from very far away, I serve as nothing but a slave, while my lady will face a dousing with a golden water-pot right there in the royal palace." The fierce woman was frightened and thought: "It will come to that," and she said:

"Girl, dig a pit and hide him," she said. The girl began to dig and hide him, but when she did so, the Venerable Cāraka had entered into meditative absorption on the cessation of arising, and she was unable to move him.

Then the fierce woman touched the Venerable Cāraka's two feet and said: "Noble one, there is nothing that you do not know, nothing you do not see, nothing you are unaware of, nothing you do not fully cognize. Please grant me your forgiveness, and I offer you a gift of firewood." The Venerable Cāraka rose and showed an ordinary appearance, whereupon the fierce woman thought: "If he agrees to accept a gift of firewood, these loads of firewood are far too large — I will lose out. I should make another, smaller load instead." She began to burn a smaller load of wood, but that burning caused all the stacked firewood to catch fire. The fierce woman then thought: "I will not give him this firewood. I will give him just one piece from the original load." She began to pull out one piece, whereupon all of the firewood came along with it.

The fierce woman said: "Noble one, does the reverend one want all this firewood?" The Venerable Cāraka said: "I do." The fierce woman said: "Please accept it." The Venerable Cāraka said: "Sister, if you give it entirely, feed the householder Anāthapiṇḍada. Today, invite the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another house at noon, go there yourself with a pit dug for the purpose, and serve them with your own hand."

The fierce woman said: "Noble ones, since everyone knows me as a fierce woman, how could I possibly go there?" The Venerable Cāraka said: "Sister, I will have you brought in." Then the fierce woman took up those loads of firewood and began to enter the home of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, but the doorkeeper said: "Fierce woman, why have you come here? Do not enter." The Venerable Cāraka said: "Good man, let her in." The doorkeeper let the fierce woman inside.

She then saw the great Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha, and she began to chop the firewood. The Venerable Cāraka said: "Without chopping it, offer it with gladness." The fierce woman said: "It will not be enough." The Venerable Cāraka said: "Offer it — it will be enough." And so he blessed it in such a way that, after the entire Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha had been fully satisfied, there was even more left over than before. The fierce woman served the entire Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha with firewood until they were satisfied. Then the Blessed One gave thanks and rose from his seat and departed.

The fierce woman said: "Venerable Cāraka, you are my spiritual friend. Please come here. Come into my home and take your midday meal there." The Venerable Cāraka went to the fierce woman's home. She gave food to the Venerable Cāraka, and the fierce woman sat before the Venerable Cāraka in order to hear the Dharma. The Venerable Cāraka, having fully understood her intention, her latent dispositions, her constitution, and her natural temperament, then taught the Dharma in such a way that, as she sat right there on that very seat, the peak of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection — twenty peaks high — was shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and she directly realized the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, she said: "Venerable one, it is in dependence upon my spiritual friend, the Venerable Cāraka, that this has come about. What the Venerable Cāraka has done for me is something that my father has not done, my mother has not done, the king has not done, the gods have not done, my forebears of former times have not done, ascetics and brahmins have not done, and the assembly of friends, companions, and kinsmen has not done.

The ocean of blood and tears has been dried up. From the mountains of bones have I been freed. The doors to the lower realms have been closed. The doors to the higher realms and to liberation have been opened. From the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts have my feet been lifted out. Among gods and humans have I been placed. Cyclic existence has been brought to its end. The peak of the view of the transitory collection — twenty peaks high — accumulated since beginningless time, was shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and I have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. May I be received as a laywoman. From today forward, for as long as life endures, I go for refuge from the depths of my heart, with wholehearted joy."

Then the Venerable Cāraka instructed her rightly with Dharma-filled discourse, established her rightly in it, praised her rightly, and gladdened her rightly — and then rose from his seat and departed.

Thereafter Tummo swept her own house well, arranged the furnishings neatly, anointed the walls properly, scattered flowers, and sat in a demeanor of tranquility.

The brahmin, returning after the market day had passed, settled in the pleasure garden and said to his son: "Son, go and see where your mother Khrimön has been placed — where she is — and bring her out."

The son went to the house, and from a considerable distance Tummo saw her son. She said: "Son, welcome! Welcome! Come here, rest a while. Has your father come?"

The son said: "Yes, he is in the pleasure garden and staying there."

After the son had eaten, he went to his father, and the father asked: "Son, is the household well?"

The son said: "Father, such a manner of conduct as mother's — I have never before seen the like of it. She is there in a state of complete tranquility."

When the brahmin entered the house, from a considerable distance Tummo saw him and said: "My lord's son, welcome! Welcome! Please be seated."

He sat down and thought: "A thing like this has never happened before — what can have brought this about?" And he spoke this verse:

"Thus unlike what was before, you appear to me reversed and strange — have you become afflicted with madness, or have you somehow become intoxicated?"

Tummo replied in verse:

"My lord, I am not mad,
nor have I become intoxicated.
I have, in the teaching of the Buddha, come to see the noble truths.

My lord's son, the noble Cāraka has taught me the Dharma in this way: that henceforth, as long as I wander in cyclic existence, I shall no longer indulge in all those afflictions as before."

The brahmin was filled with wonder and thought: "The one whom I could not tame with beatings, with bonds, and with abuse — the Venerable Cāraka has tamed her with Dharma-teaching. Since it is by teaching the Dharma that he tamed her, the noble Cāraka has done great benefit for me. The noble Cāraka has done much good for me. Let me go and tomorrow invite the noble Cāraka to another household for the midday meal."

At that time he went to where the Venerable Cāraka was, arrived there, and with his head paid homage at the two feet of the Venerable Cāraka, then sat to one side.

Having sat to one side, the Venerable Cāraka duly instructed that brahmin with Dharma-filled discourse, established him rightly in it, praised him rightly, and gladdened him rightly. In many ways he duly instructed with Dharma-filled discourse, established him rightly in it, praised him rightly, and gladdened him rightly — and then said nothing further. Thereupon that brahmin rose from his seat, bowed with joined palms toward the Venerable Cāraka, and said to the Venerable Cāraka: "Would the Venerable Cāraka be so kind as to accept tomorrow's midday meal at my home?" The Venerable Cāraka, by remaining silent, accepted the invitation from that brahmin.

Then that brahmin, understanding that the Venerable Cāraka had accepted by remaining silent, paid homage with his head at the two feet of the Venerable Cāraka and departed. That very night the brahmin prepared clean and excellent food and drink. The Venerable Cāraka too, early the following morning, dressed, took up his bowl and robe, and went to that brahmin's home, arriving there and sitting down on the seat that had been laid out.

Then that brahmin, seeing that the Venerable Cāraka was seated comfortably, with his own hands satisfied and fortified him with clean and excellent food and drink. When he had with his own hands satisfied and served him in many ways with clean and excellent food and drink, and when he knew that the Venerable Cāraka had finished eating and had withdrawn his hand from the bowl, the brahmin took a lower seat and sat down before the Venerable Cāraka in order to hear the Dharma.

The Venerable Cāraka, having comprehended that brahmin's intention, latent dispositions, constitution, and nature, taught the Dharma in such a way that, even as that brahmin sat right there on that seat, the twenty mountain peaks of the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi) were shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and the fruit of stream-entry was directly realized.

Having seen the truth, that brahmin said: "Venerable one, by relying on you, the good friend, the Venerable Cāraka, what the Venerable Cāraka has done for me — this has not been done for me by my father, nor by my mother, nor by a king, nor by the gods, nor by the ancestors of old, nor by ascetics and brahmins, nor by the gathering of friends, companions, and kinsmen. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears, you have freed me from the mountains of bones, you have closed the doors of the lower destinies, you have opened the doors of the higher realms and liberation, you have drawn my feet out from the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and you have placed me among gods and humans. You have brought cyclic existence to its end. The twenty mountain peaks of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time have been shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and the fruit of stream-entry has been obtained. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. I ask to be received as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as life lasts, I go for refuge wholeheartedly and with full sincerity.

"May the Venerable Cāraka be so kind as to accept my alms food, robes, lodging, the requisites of the sick, and medical supplies for as long as I live."

The Venerable Cāraka said: "One who has gone forth has entered upon the path of benefiting others, and so must also benefit other brahmins," and by saying this he declined.

The brahmin said: "If the Venerable Cāraka will not accept, then I shall lay out a brahmin's seat for him. May the Venerable Cāraka come and make use of it."

The Venerable Cāraka, by remaining silent, accepted from that brahmin. The Venerable Cāraka duly instructed him with Dharma-filled discourse, established him rightly in it, praised him rightly, and gladdened him rightly, then rose from his seat and departed.

At that time the Venerable Cāraka had tamed and established ten brahmin households in Śrāvastī. The Venerable Cāraka reflected that the time had come to tame certain others. In Śrāvastī there were about five hundred young brahmin householders together with their wives, who had taken up their seats, their food, their perfumes, and many garlands, and had come to a park to amuse themselves. The Venerable Cāraka thought, "Now is the time to tame these people," and went to where they were.

They said to him: "Venerable Cāraka, you are the son of a brahmin family of distinguished lineage — why then have you gone forth among these śramaṇas, these sons of the Śākya, who eat anything and everything?"

The Venerable Cāraka then performed a blessing in this way: whatever garlands they were wearing became garlands of entrails; whatever burdens they were carrying became ox-hides; whatever meat they had become the flesh of cattle; whatever drink they had become beer. Then the Venerable Cāraka showed them his alms bowl and said: "O wise ones, look here — in my alms bowl there are entrails, ox-hide, beef, and beer. Or rather, is it not the case that you yourselves are wearing garlands of entrails upon your heads, eating ox-hide and beef as your food, and drinking beer as your beverage? You are all eaters of anything and everything."

They looked at one another, and seeing that all of them had garlands of entrails upon their heads, that all their burdens had turned to ox-hides, that all their meat had turned to beef, and that all their drink had turned to beer, they said: "Noble Cāraka, remove this curse from us! We beg you to grant us your pardon."

The Venerable Cāraka said: "I forgive you." Thereupon everything reverted to its former state.

They were filled with wonder, and said to him: "Venerable Cāraka, why have you come? You have come for our sake, to tame us. Please sit down and teach us the Dharma."

They took their seats before the Venerable Cāraka in order to hear the Dharma. The Venerable Cāraka, having fully understood the dispositions, latent tendencies, temperaments, and natures of those brahmins together with their wives, taught the Dharma as follows: while those brahmins and their wives remained seated right there, he shattered with the vajra of wisdom the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection that had towered over them, and he taught in such a way that they directly realized the fruit of stream-entry.

Having seen the truth, they spoke: "Venerable Cāraka, by relying upon the virtuous friend that is the Venerable Cāraka, you have done for us what our fathers did not do, what our mothers did not do, what a king did not do, what the gods did not do, what our ancestral forebears did not do, what śramaṇas and brahmins did not do, and what the assembly of friends, companions, and kinsmen did not do. You have dried up the ocean of blood and tears; you have freed us from the mountains of bones; you have closed the doors to the lower destinies; you have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation; you have lifted our feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; you have placed us among gods and humans; you have brought cyclic existence to an end. With the vajra of wisdom you have shattered the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection that had been accumulating since beginningless time, and we have obtained the fruit of stream-entry — Venerable Cāraka, we have entered the stream. We have entered the stream, Venerable Cāraka. We take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the Saṅgha of monks. We pray that you receive us as lay practitioners."

"From this day forward, for as long as we live, we take refuge wholeheartedly and with complete trust." The brahmins then said, "Venerable Cāraka, we pray that you accept our alms, our robes, our lodgings, our provisions for sickness, and our medicinal requisites for as long as we live." The venerable Cāraka replied, "One who has gone forth (pravrajyā) has entered upon the path of benefiting others, and so one must also benefit other brahmins." With these words he accepted.

Those brahmins said, "If Venerable Cāraka will not accept our offering, we have prepared a seat for a sage — please, Venerable Cāraka, come and enjoy it." Since the venerable Cāraka said nothing in response to the brahmins, he accepted. Then the venerable Cāraka instructed them completely with Dharma-filled discourse, established them fully in it, praised them fully, and filled them with complete joy. Then he rose from his seat and departed.

At that time the venerable Cāraka tamed and settled more than five hundred brahmin households in Śrāvastī on both sides. Thereupon the Blessed One addressed the monks, saying: "Monks, among my śrāvaka monks who inspire faith in householder families, the foremost is this monk Cāraka the Black."

Now the venerable Cāraka thought: "When the time has come to tame someone" — there was in Śrāvastī a brahmin who, by means of secret spells, had brought a non-human being under his control and was having it draw his carriage — the venerable Cāraka thought, "The time has come to tame that brahmin." And so, in order to tame that brahmin, when the brahmin had brought the non-human being under control through secret spells, had it harnessed to a carriage and was driving outside Śrāvastī, the brahmin descended from the carriage and began to urinate. At that moment the venerable Cāraka blessed things so that the brahmin's stream of urine did not stop; then the venerable Cāraka drew out his spike of secret spells, and the non-human being fled and was gone.

When the brahmin stood up and saw that the non-human being had fled, he said, "Who has drawn out my non-human being's spike?" The venerable Cāraka said, "I have." "Why, though you are a brahmin, do you practise dealings with non-human beings?" The brahmin said, "Who then will serve me?" The venerable Cāraka showed him his alms bowl and said, "This will serve you." The brahmin said, "What can that accomplish?" The venerable Cāraka said, "Whatever you wish for and whatever you desire — all of it will come to be accomplished." And just then, whatever the brahmin wished for and whatever he desired, all of it was accomplished through that alms bowl. The brahmin was filled with wonder and said, "Venerable Cāraka, how does this come about?" The venerable Cāraka replied, "I know the science of the alms bowl." The brahmin said, "Venerable Cāraka, please give me that science of the alms bowl." The venerable Cāraka spoke in verse:

The science should not be given to just anyone.
One should die while still possessing the science.
It may be given for the sake of wisdom with respect, or for the sake of the Dharma, reverence, or wealth.

The brahmin said, "I will be devoted to you." The venerable Cāraka replied, "I do not accept service from householders; I accept service only from one who has gone forth." The brahmin said, "Then I will go forth." The venerable Cāraka said, "Go forth then," and so he ordained him.

He gave him full ordination and transmitted the instructions. Having thus gone forth, that one dwelt alone in seclusion, with heedfulness, with earnestness, having surrendered himself. Dwelling alone in seclusion, with heedfulness, with earnestness, having surrendered himself, he came to understand, noble sons, why it is that one shaves hair and beard, dons the ochre robes, and with genuine faith goes forth from home into homelessness — that the unsurpassed culmination of the holy life, in that very lifetime, is to be directly realized and achieved through one's own direct knowledge, so that one comes to know: "My births are exhausted, the holy life has been lived, the task is done, there is no knowing of another existence beyond this one." He became an arhat, free from attachment, beyond the three realms, with a mind equal toward clods of earth and gold alike, with a mind like the sky and like the palm of the hand, his wisdom having split open the hollow of the doorpost like a wedge of sandalwood. He attained the knowledges, the direct cognitions, and the individual perfect understandings. He turned his back on gains born of existence and desire, and on honors. He became one worthy of worship, of reverence, and of praise by the gods together with Indra and his retinue.

The venerable Cāraka considered: "The time has come to tame this wrestler." A single wrestler from a certain region had gone about the districts defeating wrestlers and came to Śrāvastī, where he sat at the city gate with his legs stretched out, and to each person who came by he announced: "Either come wrestle me in a contest of strength, or go kneel before me." Among the great crowds of common people who had gathered, not one challenged him to a contest of strength, nor did anyone go to kneel before him. The venerable Cāraka thought: "The time has come to tame that wrestler." The venerable Cāraka went in that direction and asked, "Who is this?" The crowd of common people replied: "This wrestler has been announcing: 'Either come wrestle me in a contest of strength, or go kneel before me.'" The venerable Cāraka said to the wrestler: "Shall I wrestle with you myself, or shall I have you wrestle together with the three wrestlers I have already defeated?" The wrestler replied: "Let me wrestle together with those three wrestlers you have defeated." The venerable Cāraka said: "I have defeated the wrestler of attachment, I have defeated the wrestler of aversion, I have defeated the wrestler of delusion — now go wrestle with them together." Having thus tamed the wrestler, Cāraka ordained him, gave him full ordination, and transmitted the instructions.

Having thus gone forth, that one dwelt alone in seclusion, with heedfulness, with earnestness, having surrendered himself. Dwelling alone in seclusion, with heedfulness, with earnestness, having surrendered himself, he came to understand, noble sons, why it is that one shaves hair and beard, dons the ochre robes, and with genuine faith goes forth from home into homelessness — that the unsurpassed culmination of the holy life, in that very lifetime, is to be directly realized and achieved through one's own direct knowledge, so that one comes to know: "My births are exhausted, the holy life has been lived, the task is done, there is no knowing of another existence beyond this one." He became an arhat, free from attachment, beyond the three realms, with a mind equal toward clods of earth and gold alike, with a mind like the sky and like the palm of the hand, his wisdom having split open the hollow of the doorpost like a wedge of sandalwood. He attained the knowledges, the direct cognitions, and the individual perfect understandings. He turned his back on gains born of existence and desire, and on honors. He became one worthy of worship, of reverence, and of praise by the gods together with Indra and Brahma, together with all the surrounding gods, he became one worthy of worship, of reverence, and of open praise.

Now that fierce woman took her son's wife into her household. Some time later, the fierce woman's own time came, and her husband's time came as well. Her son had gone abroad on some business of recitation, and so his wife remained behind. That daughter-in-law, indulging in fine and pleasant food and clothing, became tormented by afflictions, and she said to her serving-maid: "Girl, go and find me some man who is sturdy and well-built, some worthy fellow of whatever sort you can find, and bring him so that I may enjoy pleasure with him." The serving-maid replied: "My lady, your father-in-law and mother-in-law were seers of truth. If you were to come to a household such as this one of a sage, how could it be fitting to behave in such a way? Would you bring ill repute upon the household of a sage?" She replied: "Bah! What business of yours is what I think? Just go and bring someone back. If you do not bring someone, I shall have you severely punished." The girl thought: "This woman, this glutton's daughter, is set on filling the sage's household with filth — and I cannot prevent it. I had better fetch someone myself." So she went to the marketplace, and there she saw a sturdy, well-built man who was a captain of bandits. She said to him: "Good sir, would you dare to enjoy pleasure together with my mistress?" He replied: "I would dare." She brought him and presented him to her mistress, and he and the mistress began to enjoy pleasure together.

The venerable Carka used to come there from time to time, and he saw them. The venerable Carka thought: "This woman is one who pursues desire," and he spoke to her words that were not praise of desire. She thought: "The noble Carka is skilled at knowing the minds of others — he sees through me. If he is not killed, he will tell my husband, and he will come to harm me. I must have him killed." So she said to the captain of bandits: "The noble Carka is skilled at knowing the minds of others — he sees through us. If he is not killed, he will tell my husband, and he will come to harm us. You must kill him." The captain of bandits replied: "I will not kill him. He is a close friend of King Prasenajit of Kosala, and he is the teacher of Queen Mālikā. If I were to kill him, the king would have me put into a house of lac and burned to death — that is the kind of situation it would be." She said: "If you kill him, so much the better. If you do not kill him, you are never to enter her house again." Since those who cling to desire will stop at no evil deed, the captain of bandits said: "If he is skilled at knowing the minds of others, how am I to kill him?" She said: "We shall use a stratagem," and she sent a messenger to the venerable Carka at an unsuitable time with the message: "Venerable Carka, I am in distress — would you be so kind as to come and see me?" Now since arhats do not exercise their knowledge and vision without first reflecting, the venerable Carka too entered without prior reflection, taught her the Dharma, and then began to leave. As he did so, she said: "Noble one, I am so glad to see you — please stay just a little while," and she detained the venerable Carka until it was very late into the night. Meanwhile the captain of bandits drew his sword from its scabbard and stood waiting at the door. Then, as the venerable Carka came out,

The captain of bandits, his mind devoid of compassion and utterly heedless of the world to come, severed the venerable Carka's head at the neck and threw him to the ground. An old woman witnessed him standing there having killed that noble one, and she said: "Who is this ruffian?" The captain of bandits replied: "Don't tell anyone. I could treat you the same way right now." Frightened, she dared not speak immediately, and thinking that someone might come later to avenge this great one, she sat there in silence saying nothing. The two of them — that merciless pair, heedless of the world to come — hid the venerable Carka's body beneath a pile of cloth and left it there.

That same day, at the restoration ceremony (poṣadha), the elder took his seat at the edge of the assembly and said: "Has anyone taken the venerable Carka's leave? The venerable Carka is absent." Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, that foremost among the faithful laypeople has been killed. Gather the robes and make offerings to his body."

Now the Blessed One, together with the noble one, came out through the gate of Śrāvastī, and as he did so he emitted a light like the radiance of gold, so that all of Śrāvastī shone with a brilliance like refined gold. Prasenajit, king of Kośala, thought: "Why has all of Śrāvastī come to shine with a radiance like refined gold?" And then he thought: "I hope the Blessed One has not decided to depart," and so, together with his queen's retinue, he took the key of Śrāvastī, opened the gate, and the Blessed One proceeded into Śrāvastī. Prasenajit, king of Kośala, thought: "Why has the Blessed One come into Śrāvastī at this unusual hour?" Buddhas, blessed ones, are difficult to approach and difficult to endure, so he was unable to ask the Blessed One about it. The Blessed One, accompanied by the Saṅgha of hearers, went forward, and Prasenajit, king of Kośala, together with his queen's retinue, followed along behind the Blessed One step by step until they arrived at the place where the pile of cloth lay.

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, uncover that foremost among the faithful laypeople who has been hidden here." When he was uncovered, those who, through relying on the venerable Carka, had seen the noble truths (āryasatya) made this request: "He is our spiritual friend — Blessed One, do you permit us to make offerings to his body?" The Blessed One did not give permission. Prasenajit, king of Kośala, requested: "He was my dear companion — Blessed One, do you permit me to make offerings to his body?" The Blessed One did not give permission. Queen Mālyavatī requested: "He was my teacher — Blessed One, do you permit me to make offerings to his body?" The Blessed One gave permission. Then Queen Mālyavatī had the venerable Carka's body wrapped in white cloth and anointed with perfumed water, adorned it all around with garments of many colors, placed it within, and left it there. Then the Blessed One, accompanied by the Saṅgha of hearers, went forward, and the king together with the queen's retinue followed step by step behind. They set the body down in a spacious open spot, and Queen Mālyavatī heaped all manner of fragrant wood into a pyre, burned it, quenched the pyre with milk,

They placed those bones in a golden urn, and had a bodily reliquary stupa built at a great crossroads in the middle of the road. They raised parasols, victory banners, and pennants, and made offerings with fragrant substances, garlands, incense, powder, and cymbals. They prostrated at his feet, and then the Blessed One gave praise and departed. The Blessed One then went to the temple and sat upon the seat that had been prepared for him before the Saṅgha of monks. Having sat down, the Blessed One spoke to the monks: "Monks, this fault and others arise from monks entering a village at an improper time. Therefore, monks, having clearly seen these ten benefits, a rule of training for hearers is to be established in the Vinaya," and so on, as before. "My hearers are to proclaim this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: whatever monk enters a village at an improper time incurs a transgression." Thus the Blessed One established that rule of training for hearers in the Vinaya.

Then there was an occasion when monks who were seriously ill could not remain sitting for long, when monk-attendants were neglecting the care of sick monks, and when monks doing service were neglecting the work of the Saṅgha. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, one should speak to the monks who are seated and then depart." After the Blessed One had given the instruction that one should speak to the seated monks before departing, it happened that a monk had left his alms bowl and robe at another household, and a fire broke out there, and as the monk set out to go there, he had gone half the way when the thought arose: "I have not spoken to the seated monks." He turned back, and for as long as it took him to speak to the seated monks, his alms bowl and robe were burned, and he then went there. The householder said: "Noble one, why have you come so late? That is why your alms bowl and robe have burned. If you had come quickly, your alms bowl and robe would not have burned." The monk was then at a loss, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, except in such circumstances." Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire training, who are respectful toward training, and who are furnished with the necessities for training, and addressed the monks with words that were in accord with this, that were in large measure devoted to it, and that were endowed with teachings consonant with it. He then spoke to the monks: "Monks, therefore the former rule remains as it was established, and this is now permitted. My hearers are to proclaim this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: whatever monk enters a village at an improper time and does not speak to the seated monks incurs a transgression, except in such circumstances. As for the term 'whatever monk,' this refers to one of this kind or similarly to any other. 'At an improper time' means at one of two improper times: before dawn has broken, and after midday has passed. 'A village' means any place where there are streets, crossroads, and intersections. 'Enters' means goes into. 'Does not speak to the seated monks' means to whatever monk is seated there. 'Except in such circumstances' means with those circumstances granted as an exception. 'Incurs a transgression' means —" and here follows a descent into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts (pretas), the lower destinies, — lower destinies, the states of wrong rebirth — it burns, it scorches, it causes one to fall. Furthermore, for as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the virtuous qualities. Therefore it is said to be a transgression. As for how a transgression arises in that case: if a monk, perceiving an improper time as an improper time, enters a village, a transgression is incurred. If a monk, having doubt about an improper time, enters a village, a transgression is incurred. If a monk, perceiving a proper time as an improper time, enters a village, a misdeed is incurred. If a monk, having doubt about a proper time, enters a village, a misdeed is incurred. For one who is a beginner, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed,

Queen Mallikā spoke to Prasenajit, the king of Kosala: "The god has granted to the monks the complete abandonment belonging to a young man, and to the nuns the complete abandonment belonging to a queen's retinue. The noble Cāraka was my younger companion and my teacher. If so renowned a monk as that can be killed by force, who would heed any command given to other monks less renowned?" The king said: "Who ordered the noble Cāraka's death and who killed him? What punishment shall be given?" Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, commanded his men who lived by wages: "Wise ones, speak now — who ordered the noble Cāraka to be slain, and who slew him?" They set out to find them in that direction, and there they saw an old woman. But she had not yet seen them, and the old woman spoke to the local people: "The one who was foremost among the faithful householders of this area — that revered one was killed by such and such persons." When they heard this they said: "What is the old woman saying?" The old woman replied: "Nothing at all." They seized her and interrogated her: "Tell us who killed him." She said: "A brahmin's daughter ordered the killing, and a bandit captain carried it out." They pressed her further: "Is it only those two?" She replied: "There are also five hundred accomplices." The king's men seized the brahmin's daughter, the bandit captain, and the five hundred accomplices, presented them to the king, and said: "Your Majesty, the noble Cāraka was ordered to his death by this brahmin's daughter, and killed by this bandit captain. This one here is the leader of these five hundred accomplices." The king said: "Wise ones, today let this brahmin's daughter be bound to the legs of a wild colt. Let this bandit captain be put into a house of lac and burned. Let the hands and feet of these five hundred accomplices be cut off." And so his men bound the brahmin's daughter to the legs of a wild colt, put the bandit captain into a house of lac and burned him, and cut off the hands and feet of the five hundred accomplices.

The monks were filled with doubt, and to resolve all their doubts they asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, what deed had the venerable Cāraka done that by the karmic ripening of that deed, though he had no enmity and had caused no harm, he came to be killed by those two, those two also came to be killed, and the five hundred accomplices came to have their hands and feet cut off?" The Blessed One declared: "Monks, they themselves had gathered that accumulation of karma.

They had performed and accumulated deeds that are inevitably altered by conditions and that arise like light shining in proximity to something. As for the karma they themselves had thus performed and accumulated, who else would experience it separately? Monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases. As it is said in verse:

Even for a hundred aeons
karma does not perish.
When the time and conditions meet,
it surely ripens for embodied beings.

Monks, in a time long past, in a previous age, when King Brahmadatta was ruling his kingdom in Vārāṇasī, a time of hardship arose, and non-Buddhist seers prophesied that a famine would come lasting twelve years. King Brahmadatta had a proclamation announced: "Let those who have provisions for twelve years remain; let those who do not, depart." Now in front of the king's crier there was a group of about five hundred brahmin boys who were being trained in secret brahmin recitations. These brahmin boys said to him: "Teacher, we have no provisions for twelve years, and so we must go." He replied: "Boys, stay — I will provide you with what you need."

In a dream, King Brahmadatta saw his own intestines coiled around the entire city. Having seen this, he became terrified, thinking: "Surely this means I will either lose my kingdom, or my life will be cut short, or both." He recounted the dream to the crier, and the crier thought to himself: "His Majesty has had a fine dream, but I must not let it become an obstacle to the brahmin boys' livelihood — I should interpret it badly." And so the crier said to the king: "Your Majesty has had a terrible dream; it means you will certainly lose your kingdom, or your life will be cut short, or both." The king said: "What is to be done?" The crier replied: "Your Majesty should offer a great sacrifice of bulls." The king said: "So be it." The crier had a great many thousands of bulls assembled, and when the king came out and saw them, the bulls let out a tremendous lowing. Seeing and hearing them, the king was moved with compassion, and he said to the crier: "Should all of these be slaughtered?" The crier thought: "The king does not wish them all killed," and so he replied: "Your Majesty, not all of them need be killed." Just then a male servant mounted a female servant, and the crier said: "Your Majesty, these two — this man and this woman — shall be killed." The brahmin boys stretched out their hands and, pointing, said: "These are the ones." When those two were led away to be killed, their minds were shaken, and they made a solemn resolve: "We two, who have no enmity and have done no harm, are being killed — and all of this is the doing of that crier and those five hundred brahmin boys. In every future life in which we two are born, may we kill this crier even when he bears us no enmity and has done us no harm, and may we cause those five hundred brahmin boys to have their hands and feet cut off."

Monks, the one who at that time and on that occasion was King Brahmadatta — that one is none other than the present King Prasenajit of Kosala. The one who at that time and on that occasion was the queen of King Brahmadatta — that one is none other than the present queen Mālinī. The one who at that time and on that occasion was the crier — that one is none other than the present monk Śārika. The five hundred brahmin boys of that time and occasion — those are none other than the present five hundred men with withered hands. The one who at that time and on that occasion was the male slave — that one is none other than the present captain of bandits. The one who at that time and on that occasion was the female slave — that one is none other than the present brahmin girl. And through the karmic maturation of the deed by which that crier and those five hundred brahmin boys had the male slave and the female slave killed, even though those two bore no enmity and had done no harm, even now this captain of bandits and this brahmin girl have caused Śārika and the five hundred men with withered hands to be killed, even though those bore no enmity and had done no harm.

Venerable ones, what action did the long-lived Śārika perform such that through its karmic maturation he was born into a household of wealth, great riches, and abundant possessions? And what action did he perform such that he went forth in the presence of the Blessed One, and by abandoning all afflictions he directly realized arhatship? And what action did he perform such that even upon attaining arhatship he passed into nirvāṇa by the sword?

The Blessed One declared: Monks, it was the noble son Śārika himself who gathered the accumulation of karma, thoroughly transformed the conditions, and abided like a flame — those deeds were performed and accumulated so that they would inevitably arise. And those things performed and accumulated by Śārika himself — who else could experience them individually? Monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases. As it is said in verse:

Even were a hundred aeons to pass, karma once performed does not perish;
when the conditions and the time are met,
embodied beings receive its fruit.

Monks, in a past time long ago, when no buddhas had appeared in the world, a pratyekabuddha — humble, impoverished, compassionate, delighting in remote dwelling places, solitary as a rhinoceros horn — arose in the world as a worthy field of offerings. Now, at a certain cliffside there dwelt a hunter, and not far from that cliff there was a small lake that served as a home for many deer and birds. Day after day that hunter would set out hunting, would lay down many snares and nets, all in order to drive away the deer and birds, to torment them, and to cause them suffering in improper ways. And those hunting devices, those snares and nets, were effective.

Then at some point, as a pratyekabuddha was wandering through that region, he arrived at that cliff. Having agreed to spend the night at a divine abode, he rose early in the morning, donned his lower robe, took up his begging bowl and monastic robes, and entered that cliff area on his alms round. Having made his rounds there for alms, he thought: "This divine abode has a great deal of activity and bustle during the day — I shall eat my alms food in some peaceful place outside the cliff." So he departed from the cliff, thinking "This is peaceful, this is peaceful," and went toward the direction of that small lake. When he arrived there, he set down his begging bowl and water vessel side by side, washed his two feet, and rubbed his two hands together, and drew water.

He gathered some fallen leaves, sat down, performed the act of eating, rinsed his two hands, washed his mouth, and set down the begging bowl and water vessel exactly as they had been. He washed his two feet, leaned against the base of a tree, and sat cross-legged in the manner of the king of serpents coiled in repose, remaining there in tranquil deportment. That day, not a single animal was taken by the human hunter.

Then the next morning the hunter rose early, went to that small lake, and began searching through his hunting grounds, his traps, and his snares, but did not see a single animal. He thought to himself: "If my hunting grounds, traps, and snares are of any use, then what is the reason that not a single animal has been caught there?" So he began to circle the perimeter of that small lake, and seeing a human footprint, he followed it, tracing it step by step. He then saw the pratyekabuddha seated in tranquil deportment, and thought: "Those who have gone forth, with their minds so peaceful, delight in dwelling in such places as this. If I do not kill this one, he will surely cut off my livelihood. By all means I must kill him." With a mind utterly devoid of compassion, that one who had cast aside regard for the next world filled his arrow with poison all the way to the notch, so that it resembled the curve of a bow, and shot it into a vital point of that pratyekabuddha.

That great pratyekabuddha thought: "It would not be right for this afflicted hunter to become deeply wretched and degenerate. Now I must pull him out of this by hand." So, spreading his wings like the king of geese, he rose into the sky above, blazing and brilliant, sending down rain and flashing lightning, displaying miraculous feats. Since ordinary persons quickly fix their minds upon miraculous displays, that hunter fell at the feet of the pratyekabuddha, as if a great tree had been cut off at the root, and said: "O true field of merit, please descend! Please descend! I beg you, pull me out by the collar from the mire of affliction into which I have sunk." Out of compassionate concern for that hunter, the pratyekabuddha descended from the sky above.

Then the hunter, making him free from the arrow's pain, dressed the wound smoothly and said: "Noble one, please accept this reconciliation. If it would be fitting to dress the wound with a gold poultice here, I will apply that as well." The pratyekabuddha thought: "Whatever was to be obtained by means of this body of pus has already been obtained. Therefore, now I shall enter into the expanse of nirvāṇa without remainder of aggregates." He rose once more into the middle of the sky, right before that hunter, displayed various miraculous feats, and then passed fully into nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa without remainder of aggregates.

The hunter was a man of wealth, so he gathered all the finest fragrant woods, stacked them into a pyre, and burned the body. He quenched the remains with milk, placed the bones in a golden urn, and had a bodily reliquary stūpa built at the crossroads of a great highway. He raised parasols, victory banners, and pennants, and made offerings of perfumes, garlands, incense, powders, and musical instruments. He prostrated at the feet of the stūpa and uttered this aspiration: "Whatever virtue roots exist in these offerings I have made — offered in a manner disproportionate to the harm I did to such a true field of merit — by this virtue may I not be reborn in accordance with the karma of that harmful act.

"May I be reborn in a household that is wealthy, with abundant riches, and great prosperity."

Monks, the hunter who lived in that time and age is none other than Śārka. Because of the karma of having pierced the pratyekabuddha with a poisoned arrow, he was tormented for an aeon in the Great Hell of Unceasing Torment, and through the remaining force of that same karma he was reborn for five hundred lifetimes as a wild animal on the shore of that very lake, and met his end by the blade at each appointed time. Even now, although he has attained the state of an arhat, he will pass fully into nirvāṇa by the blade. As for the one who made offerings and uttered that aspiration, he has now been reborn in a household that is wealthy, with abundant riches, and great prosperity.

Venerable Śārka — what karma did he perform, such that through its maturation his body at the appointed time was concealed beneath a heap of silken cloth, that he gladdened the Teacher and caused him no distress of mind, that the Teacher along with the Saṅgha of hearers and the royal consort with her retinue made bodily offerings to him at the appointed time of his passing, and that he thus came to obtain such an assembly of virtuous qualities?

Monks, Śārka himself assembled and accumulated actions that were acquired, had their conditions fully transformed, abided like a flame, and were bound to arise without fail. The karma that Śārka himself performed and accumulated — who else would experience it individually? Monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external earth element, nor in the water element, nor in the fire element, nor in the wind element. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates (skandhas), elements (dhātus), and sense bases (āyatanas):

Actions, though it be a hundred aeons, do not perish or go to waste.
When the time and conditions meet, beings indeed receive their fruits.

Monks, in times gone by, in ages past, when no buddhas had appeared in the world, solitary buddhas (pratyekabuddhas) of lesser station arose in the world — those who had compassion for the poor and destitute, who delighted in remote and secluded dwellings, who lived alone like a rhinoceros horn, and who had become fields of merit for the world. In a certain snowy valley five hundred pratyekabuddhas dwelt. One of them fell ill, and the others said to him: "Please go and seek out a physician and have the treatments performed." He went to another rocky crag and that night agreed to take shelter in the enclosure of a potter's workshop. That very night he fell ill and passed away at the appointed time.

The potter, seeing him there, thought to himself: "This renunciant has passed away at the appointed time inside this enclosure, among the fired and unfired pots. Since the world values cleanliness, if people come to know of this, no one will buy any vessel." So he hid the pratyekabuddha's body beneath a heap of silken cloth and left it there.

The other pratyekabuddhas thought: "Where has our companion in the holy life gone?" They looked, and when they saw that he had passed fully into nirvāṇa, they came straightaway through the sky carrying fragrant sandalwood and descended into the potter's enclosure. When the potter saw them he asked: "Noble ones, where are you going?" They replied: "We are going to make offerings to our companion in the holy life." The potter said: "Did he also obtain an assembly of virtuous qualities such as yours?" They replied: "He did." The potter said: "I have shown him disrespect, and I wish to now pay him proper honor — please wait just a moment." He went and spoke to the king.

The king said to the god: "A renunciant who had gone forth at my enclosure and had perfected his ascetic practice has passed away; please pay him honor." The king came out together with his queen and their retinue, and he had the body of the pratyekabuddha heaped up with fragrant sandalwood and cremated. Once the pyre had been doused with milk, the bones were placed in a golden urn, and at a crossroads on the great highway he had a bodily stupa built. He raised parasols, victory banners, and pennants, and offered worship with fragrant substances, garlands, incense, powders, and musical instruments.

The potter prostrated at the feet of the pratyekabuddha's remains and made this aspiration: "Whatever the root of virtue is in this act of making offerings, which does not correspond to the weight of my karma in having caused harm to one who was a true field of merit — by this may I not fail to please and gladden a Teacher who is supremely exalted beyond even this one, and at the hour of my own death may the Teacher together with the Saṅgha of hearers, and together with a retinue of queens, perform bodily worship over me."

Then the Blessed One said: Monks, at that time and at that occasion the potter is this very monk Śārikā (Cārka). By the karmic maturation of concealing the body of that pratyekabuddha under a heap of rags, he is now, at the hour of his own death, concealed under a heap of rags. And by the karmic maturation of having made offerings to the body of that pratyekabuddha and having made that aspiration, he has now, through a Teacher supremely exalted beyond a hundred thousand myriads of pratyekabuddhas, pleased me, the Teacher, and not caused me distress; and at this hour of his death, the Teacher together with the Saṅgha of hearers and together with the queen and retinue of a king have performed bodily worship over him.

As for what action the venerable Cārka performed that, by its karmic maturation, the Blessed One proclaimed him the foremost among those of household faith — it was through the power of aspiration. Where was that aspiration made? Monks, long ago in the past, in this very excellent great aeon, when the life span of beings was twenty thousand years, there arose in the world the Teacher, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, Teacher of gods and humans, the Buddha, the Blessed One, Kāśyapa. He dwelt in dependence upon the Deer Park at the Grove of Seers (Rṣipatana) near Vārāṇasī. In his teaching this one had gone forth, and the monk by whom he was ordained — that monk was proclaimed by the Tathāgata, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha Kāśyapa, as the foremost among those of household faith.

Now this one practiced the holy life throughout his entire life and did not attain so much as a single virtuous quality, and at the time of death he made this aspiration: "Though I have practiced the holy life throughout my entire life in the presence of the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha, the unsurpassed field of merit, Kāśyapa, I have not attained a single virtuous quality.

"By the root of virtue of having practiced the holy life throughout my entire life, may I, in the teaching of that very one whom the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha Kāśyapa, prophesied to the brahmin youth, his preceptor, saying: 'Brahmin youth, you, in a future age when the human lifespan is one hundred years, will encounter a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and completely awakened buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, a Sugata, knower of the world, unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, a buddha and Blessed One named Śākyamuni' — may I, having gone forth in that one's teaching and having abandoned all afflictions, directly realize the state of arhathood. And just as this preceptor was proclaimed by the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha Kāśyapa, as the foremost among those of household faith, so too may I be proclaimed as foremost among those of household faith by the Blessed One Śākyamuni, the Lion of the Śākyas, the chief sovereign of the Śākya kings." Having thus set this aspiration, by the power of that aspiration he has now been proclaimed by the Tathāgata as foremost among those of household faith.

Monks, thus it is that the karmic maturation of utterly dark actions is utterly dark, the karmic maturation of utterly bright actions is utterly bright, and the karmic maturation of mixed actions is mixed. Therefore, monks, abandoning utterly dark actions and mixed actions, you should strive for utterly bright actions. Monks, you should train yourselves accordingly.

The eightfold transgression of going at an improper time is complete.

The Vinaya-vibhaṅga, the sixty-eighth bundle.

Summary verse:

With food, at dawn, just now, needle-case and bed-leg, spreading out, cotton quilting and wool, great cloth, the well-gone one's Dharma robe.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder. The venerable Ānanda would go to that householder's home from time to time, and the householder had taken refuge and been established in the training precepts. On another occasion, Ānanda extensively praised to him the seven bases for accumulating merit through material things. The householder said: "Noble one, I too shall perform some of the bases for accumulating merit through material things." Ānanda said: "Excellent — do so. What will you do?" The householder replied: "I shall offer a meal to the community of monks headed by the Buddha." "Householder, generate a vast mind and offer the meal. Noble one, it is fitting that you invite the community of monks headed by the Buddha to a meal at my quarters tomorrow, in my name." The householder agreed.

Then the venerable Ānanda took leave of that householder, went to the monastery, and in that householder's name invited the community of monks headed by the Buddha to a meal at a different house. The monks then said: "Venerable Ānanda, if that householder is a person of no faith, how did you get him to participate?" Ānanda replied: "Venerable ones, is this not enough for a friend? Not only did he participate, but he has also taken refuge and been established in the training precepts." The monks said: "Well done — go and eat. By convention, whoever has invited the community of monks, it is customary for that person to arrive first. Therefore, venerable Ānanda, you should go there ahead of time." And so the venerable Ānanda went ahead to that place and said to the householder:

"Householder, I am going into the house. In the meantime, please prepare the food. And until I return, do not serve it." Having said this, he departed.

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and inform the monks that since the householder does not know the custom, he will not be sending a formal invitation. Go ahead early." The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Venerable One," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he conveyed the message to the monks. The monks made ready and came. Then the Blessed One, surrounded by the assembly of monks and with the community of monks going before him, proceeded to that householder's dwelling, and stood waiting at the door.

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go inside and say to the householder: 'A buddha and the community of monks are standing at your door — please do as is convenient.'" The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Venerable One," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he went inside and said to the householder: "Householder, a buddha and the community of monks are standing at your door — please do as is convenient." The householder replied: "Noble one, I have not sought your comfort and convenience — rather, I have prepared seats for you alone. Please be seated." The venerable Ānanda then reported to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, the householder has said: 'I have not sought your comfort and convenience — rather, I have prepared seats for you alone. Please be seated.'"

The Blessed One declared: "If that is what he says, then tell him: 'Since you have prepared seats for us alone and done what is convenient, we shall come in and sit — there need be no regret in this.'" And so the Blessed One and the community of monks seated themselves. As they sat there, the hour of midday drew near.

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and say to the householder: 'Midday is drawing near — please serve the food. What use will this food be to you?'" The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Venerable One," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he conveyed the message to the householder. The householder said: "Has the noble Ānanda arrived?" The venerable Ānanda replied: "Householder, he has not yet come." The householder said: "Noble one, please wait just a little while until he arrives."

The venerable Ānanda reported to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, when I conveyed the householder's words, he asked whether noble Ānanda had come, and I said he had not. Then he said: 'Please wait just a little while until he arrives.'"

The Blessed One waited a short while and then again said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and say to the householder: 'Midday has passed — the food will spoil. What use will it be to you?'" The venerable Ānanda replied, "As you command, Venerable One," and having heard this from the Blessed One, he conveyed the message to the householder. The householder said: "Has the noble Ānanda arrived?" The venerable Ānanda said: "Householder, he has not yet come." The householder said: "Noble one, please wait just a little while until he arrives."

The venerable Ānanda reported to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, when I conveyed the householder's words, he asked whether noble Ānanda had come, and I replied that he had not. He then said: 'Please wait just a little while until he arrives.'"

The Blessed One then declared:

"Ānanda, go and ask the householder: 'Will you not serve food if the friend has not arrived?'"

The venerable Ānanda, saying "As you command, Venerable One," heard this from the Blessed One and conveyed the words to the householder. The householder replied: "Noble one, he will not be fed."

The venerable Ānanda reported to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, he says he will not be fed."

Then at that moment the Blessed One declared these verses:

All that depends on others is suffering;
all that depends on oneself is happiness.
What is shared brings harm, and ties are exceedingly hard to sever.

When the shadow had fallen to the edge of the sundial's measure, the friend arrived and said: "Householder, why do you sit here so improperly?" The householder replied: "Noble one, it came from your own mouth that I should wait a little while until you arrived — and now you say this?" The friend, overcome with shame, sat there saying nothing at all.

The householder then began to serve the meal. By the time the shadow had passed beyond the sundial's mark, some of the monks had received food and stopped eating, while others stopped eating without having received food at all. The Blessed One then gave thanks and departed.

The friend, his heart burning with embarrassment, remained right there on the spot.

That same day, the presiding elder of the restoration ceremony was sitting off to one side. He duly addressed the monks and said: "Is the venerable friend not present? Has anyone taken his turn?" The monks replied: "He has not come, and no one has taken his turn either."

Other monks then said: "Venerable ones, the friend roused us all in the morning for the sake of material offerings, and now he is rousing us for the sake of the Dharma as well." Monks of few wants condemned him, saying: "Why is it that monks, having been invited as guests to a house with food, wander from house to house in the morning and again in the afternoon?" They criticized him, mocked him, and spoke ill of him.

The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this incident, with this as the occasion and this as the context, convened an assembly of the monastic Saṅgha, and so forth, just as before. That the awakened Blessed Ones knowingly pose questions, and so forth, is likewise just as before.

The awakened Blessed One questioned the friend: "Friend, is it true that, having been invited as a guest to a house with food, you wander from house to house in the morning and again in the afternoon?" "Venerable One, it is true."

The awakened Blessed One then censured him, saying that conduct unbecoming an ascetic, conduct that is not appropriate, not suitable, not in conformity with good conduct — such conduct is not to be performed by one who has gone forth.

Having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits clearly, a training rule for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya shall be established," and so forth, just as before. "My śrāvakas shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: Any monk who, having been invited as a guest to a house with food, wanders from house to house in the morning and again in the afternoon, incurs a transgression."

Thus did the awakened Blessed One establish this training rule for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya.

Now, certain gravely ill monks who were bedridden were unable to remain sitting for a long time, and those monks who attended the sick neglected their duties toward the patients.

The monks who attended the sick were also neglecting the duties of the Saṅgha. The Blessed One therefore declared, "One should send word to the laypeople who are present in the house." Having declared, "The Blessed One says one should send word to the laypeople who are present in the house," a certain monk had left his almsbowl and his robe in another dwelling, and while he was away a fire broke out there. The monk set out to go back, and when he had reached the halfway point of the road, the thought arose to him, "I have not yet sent word to the laypeople who are present." So he turned back, and by the time he had sent word to the laypeople who were present, his almsbowl and his robe had burned. When he arrived at the place, the householder said, "Noble one, why have you come so late? That is why your almsbowl and robe have burned. Had you come quickly, your almsbowl and robe would not have burned." The monk was left in a state of want. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Therefore, circumstances such as these shall be excepted."

Then the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of the wish to train, of respect for the training, and of supplying provisions for the training, addressed the monks with words accordant with this, weighty in significance, and endowed with qualities befitting the occasion. He then declared to the monks, "Monks, the former rule has been established, and this is now permitted. My śrāvakas shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: Any monk who, having been invited as a guest to a house with food, wanders from house to house in the morning and again in the afternoon without sending word to the laypeople who are present — except in circumstances such as these — incurs a transgression."

Now, "any monk" means a son of the Śākyas who has gone forth, or another of that sort. "With food" means together with an invitation. "To a house" means to a house of a brahmin or a householder. "Having been invited" means for the sake of alms-rounds. "In the morning" means in the morning itself, wandering past more than two houses. "In the afternoon" means in the afternoon itself, wandering past more than three houses. "From house to house" means the houses of brahmins and householders. "Wandering" means going about. "Without sending word to the laypeople who are present" means to whatever laypeople happen to be present there. "Except in circumstances such as these" means excepting circumstances of that kind. "Incurs a transgression" means it causes burning, scorching, and falling into the bad destinies of hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts (pretas), evil states, and states of ruinous fall. Furthermore, as long as the transgression is neither confessed nor individually confessed, it obstructs wholesome qualities — and therefore it is said to incur a transgression.

As to how a transgression arises in this regard: a monk who has been invited as a guest to any dwelling with food and who in the morning wanders past more than two houses, or in the afternoon wanders past more than three houses, incurs a transgression in every such instance. If he has not been invited there, there is no transgression. There is no transgression for a first offender, for one who is deranged, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful feelings.

The eighty-first offence of the class of transgressions relating to wandering through villages is complete.

Summary verse of the training rules up to the rule on closing doors:

Nanda, Ānanda, seven days and good giving, binding together, ethical conduct,

Blackman, verse, and the writing board, ten items, the sequence of training rules,

two cities, the battle-ground,

the goddess, the hanging bowl, blue-green, purified, the royal sovereignty, Poka, the gift of a meal to a mother —

the lord of footwear, Śrāvastī, the former conduct, Noruzang,
the sages and the temple,
the one who gives joy, the one who retains,
a thousand ascetics, the pastoral dwelling,
the handed-down transmission, the purified blue-green, born among those without grief,
the great hero, the supreme hunchback,
the incomparable woman, the blacksmith,
Siṃhala and the easterner, the sweet speaker and the burned one,
the hunchback and the one who holds what is heard,
the maidservant and the brahmin woman,
Joyful-giver who became glorious, and those who entered through Śāriputra — these are what is comprised in the chapter on closing doors.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, meditate with concentration in such dwelling places as these: forests, the roots of trees, empty houses, mountain ravines, mountain caves, thatched huts, open spaces without cover, charnel grounds, woodland groves, the foot of a mountain, and lodgings at the edge of a threshing floor. Monks, practise with diligence so that you will not come to regret it afterward. This is my instruction and subsequent guidance to you."

Having said this to the monks, the Blessed One continued, and the monks entered into forests, the roots of trees, empty houses, mountain ravines, mountain caves, thatched huts, open spaces without cover, charnel grounds, woodland groves, the foot of a mountain, and lodgings at the edge of a threshing floor. Some meditated on the terraces of Mount Meru (Sumeru). Some meditated on the seven golden mountains. Some meditated beside the great lake Anavatapta. Some meditated beside the gently flowing pond. And some meditated in towns and villages, hamlets, districts and their surroundings, and in various quarters of the royal palace — places suited to yogic practitioners.

The king of mountains, Mount Meru, extends eighty thousand leagues into the water and rises eighty thousand leagues above the water, making a total extent of one hundred and sixty thousand leagues. Each face of Mount Meru measures eighty thousand leagues by eighty thousand leagues, giving a total of three hundred and twenty thousand leagues on its faces. Mount Meru, made of four precious substances, is beautiful of form, pleasing to behold, and lovely. There, the two nāga kings Nanda and Upananda were born, and with their bodies they coiled around it three times and took hold of it, remaining there for an eon, so that Suparṇa — Garuḍa, king of birds — was unable to lift it. These two thought to themselves, "This place of merit has come about for the two of us." But being completely enveloped by miserliness, three times each day they exhaled an inimical wind, and by this wind the deer and many birds dwelling on the terraces of Mount Meru were caused to suffer in an improper way.

Now, those monks who were meditating on the terraces of Mount Meru were also left pale and haggard by that inimical wind. They became emaciated, feeble, thin, and their bodies wasted away. When the three months of the summer rains retreat had passed, they came to Śrāvastī to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One, and the monks who saw them said: "Welcome, venerable ones. Welcome. From where have you come? Where did you commit to spend the rains retreat?"

Those monks replied: "Venerable ones, we have come from the terraces of Mount Meru. We committed to spend the rains retreat on the terraces of Mount Meru."

The monks said:

The monks said: "Venerable ones, why have you become pale and haggard, emaciated, feeble, thin, and wasted in body?"

Those monks replied: "Venerable ones, on the terraces of Mount Meru there were born two nāga kings, Nanda and Upananda. The two of them coiled their bodies around the terraces of Mount Meru three times and settled there, remaining for an aeon, holding the earth fast — so that even Suparṇa, king of the winged ones, was unable to drive them away. The two of them thought: 'A source of merit has arisen for us.' And so, overcome entirely by miserliness, three times each day they sent forth an inimical wind, which caused the many deer and birds dwelling on the terraces of Mount Meru to suffer in an improper way. We too, by that inimical wind, became pale and haggard, emaciated, feeble, thin, and our bodies wasted away."

The monks then said: "Venerable ones, were you not able to tame those two?"

Those monks replied: "Venerable ones, we were not the ones to tame them."

"Then who is able to tame them?"

"They can be tamed by a great śrāvaka."

At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then considered: who would be capable of taming those two? He saw and knew that they could be tamed by the monk Mahāmaudgalyāyana, and so he spoke to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Maudgalyāyana, go and attend to the two nāga kings, Nanda and Upananda, on the terraces of Mount Meru."

The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana replied: "Revered one, I shall do as you command," and having heard the Blessed One's words, he entered into such a meditative absorption that, just as his mind settled in equipoise, he disappeared from Śrāvastī and arrived on the terraces of Mount Meru. He remained there in that very meditative absorption.

Now at that time the two nāga kings, Nanda and Upananda, were asleep. Mahāmaudgalyāyana began to rouse them with a snap of his fingers, but the two did not wake. He then began to strike them from above, yet still the two did not wake. He entered between them and began to thunder like a great storm cloud, yet still the two did not wake.

He then coiled the body of a great nāga around the king of mountains, Mount Meru, seven times, and sitting there, made a great pressing weight upon it. The two were awakened by the crushing heaviness of that weight, and as they woke and saw that a great nāga was pressing down upon them, they thought: "A nāga of great supernatural power has come, and we two will be displaced from this place. We must flee." Recognizing this with fright, they displayed themselves in the form of young brahmin boys and began to run away.

Then the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana withdrew the supernatural display he had performed, sat down before the two, and said: "O two lords of nāgas, where are you going?"

The two replied: "A nāga of great supernatural power has come, and we two will be displaced from this place — we are fleeing."

He said: "Come back. Let us see what that nāga looks like."

When the two returned together with him and looked, nothing was to be seen. The two then said: "Noble one, did you play a trick on us two?"

He replied: "I did. So then — what wrong have we two done?"

"You two, who are subject to aging, gave no thought to the arrival of the Buddha's messenger. Noble one, are you the Buddha's messenger?"

"I am the Buddha's messenger."

"Noble one, if you are the Buddha's messenger, please tell us what we two should do."

"Come. Go to none other than the presence of the Blessed One."

"Noble one, we will not refuse — we will do just so."

Then the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana led the two nāga kings, Nandaka and Upanandaka, to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, they bowed their heads at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Having sat to one side, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana said this to the Blessed One: "Lord, Blessed One, the two — the nāga king Nandaka and Upanandaka — for whose sake you gave me the command, are here."

Then the Blessed One spoke thus to the nāga king Nandaka and to Upanandaka: "Lords of nāgas, you two, through misdeeds committed in a former life, have been born in the wretched existence of nāgas. And you two at present are violent, your hands stained with blood, addicted to harm and extreme harm, robbing other beings of their lives, living by cutting off the lives of others. When you pass from here, what will become of your destiny? What will become of your rebirth? What will become of your future life?"

The two replied: "Blessed One, please command us as to what we two should do."

The Blessed One declared: "Lords of nāgas, come to me. Take refuge and undertake the training precepts, and grant fearlessness to the wild animals and the birds dwelling on the terraced slopes of Mount Meru."

The two said: "Lord, we two will go for refuge in the presence of the Blessed One, will take the training precepts, and will grant fearlessness to the wild animals and the birds dwelling on the terraced slopes of Mount Meru."

The two took refuge in the presence of the Blessed One and undertook the training precepts, then bowed their heads at the Blessed One's two feet and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

The monks arose with doubt, and, asking the Buddha, the Blessed One, who cuts through all doubt, they said: "Lord, what karma did the nāga kings Nandaka and Upanandaka perform, such that through the ripening of that karma they were born among the nāgas? And what karma did they perform such that they came to possess a dwelling built of the four precious substances, along with the food of the gods' nectar-ambrosia to eat and honey-mead to drink, and each came to have a retinue of two thousand five hundred? And what karma did they perform such that, dwelling for a vast eon as lords of the earth, they were not struck down when the king of birds, Suparṇa (Garuḍa), the fair-winged, came to seize them?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, these two performed and accumulated a karma that was found, whose condition had fully ripened, that abides close at hand like a flame, and that was certain to arise. And what these two performed and accumulated — could it be experienced by some other person separately? Monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, karma — virtuous and non-virtuous — that has been performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates (skandhas), elements (dhātus), and sense sources (āyatanas). As it is said:

Even were a hundred eons to pass, karma performed is never wasted.
When the conditions and the time are met, embodied beings will encounter their fruits.

Monks, in this very good great eon of the past, when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, the Teacher — the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha, endowed with knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, knower of the world — the charioteer who tames persons fit to be tamed, the unsurpassed teacher of gods and humans — appeared in the world as the buddha, the Blessed One, named Kāśyapa. He dwelled in the proximity of the forest of the deer park at the place called Ṛṣivadana, near the city of Vārāṇasī, attended by twenty thousand monks.

At that time, in the city of Vārāṇasī there reigned a king named Kṛkī. His realm was prosperous and flourishing, the years were good and happy, filled with great numbers of people and a teeming populace. Strife and conflict, foreign enemies and internal disturbances had been thoroughly pacified. The land was free from thieves and famine. Fields of rice and rows of sugarcane abounded, and cattle and buffalo were plentiful. Thus a righteous dharma-king ruled his kingdom by the Dharma.

King Kṛkī heard that the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa — endowed with knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, knower of the world, charioteer who tames persons fit to be tamed, the unsurpassed teacher of gods and humans — had appeared in the world, and was dwelling attended by twenty thousand monks in the forest of the deer park at Ṛṣivadana, near the city of Vārāṇasī. Upon hearing this, the king set out with his great royal retinue and his great royal power toward where the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa was to be found.

King Kṛkī then beheld the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa: his body beautifully adorned with the thirty-two major marks of a great being, his form gloriously arrayed with the eighty minor marks of excellence, his body ornamented with a radiance extending a fathom on every side, his light surpassing that of a thousand suns, splendid as a mountain of precious jewels moving through space.

The moment King Kṛkī saw him, profound faith arose in him toward the Blessed One Kāśyapa. He went to where the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa was, arrived, and bowed his head at the feet of the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa, then sat to one side.

The perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa, having understood the intention, the latent dispositions, the elements, and the intrinsic nature of King Kṛkī, taught the Dharma in such a way that, while the king remained seated on that very seat, the vajra of wisdom shattered the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection, and he directly realized the fruit of stream-entry — thus teaching the Dharma in a manner that brought about a genuine and thorough understanding of the Four Noble Truths.

Having seen the truth, the king gave utterance three times, with express and deliberate intention, to these words: "What the venerable Blessed One has done for me is something my father never did for me, my mother never did, no king ever did, no gods ever did, no ancestors of former times ever did, no renunciants (śramaṇas) or brahmins ever did, and no assembly of friends, companions, or kinsmen ever did: he has dried up the ocean of blood and tears; he has freed me from mountains of bones; he has closed the doors to the lower realms; he has opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation; he has lifted my feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; and he has established me among gods and humans."

And the king spoke further:

By your power, O most excellent and stainless one, the trail to the lower realms, laden with many faults, is barred, and the path to the higher realms, rich in merit, is laid open — thus have I attained even the trace of nirvāṇa.

Relying upon you, utterly pure one,
today I have gained the eye free from all faults and clear,
I have reached the peaceful and noble state of liberation, and found the rejoicing of the noble ones.

I have crossed to the far shore of the ocean of suffering.
Venerated by gods, demigods, and humans as I wander through existence, freed from birth, old age, illness, and death, one who sees the thousand existences as empty — how rare!
O Sage, today there is fruit in having seen you.

Having spoken these words, he rose from his seat, circumambulated the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa three times, and prostrated with his head to his two feet. Then he departed.

Now at the very moment when King Kṛkī saw the truths in the presence of the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa, he remained there on the spot and spoke to his ministers, townspeople, and subjects: "Listen, O ministers, townspeople, and subjects! Because I have seen the truths in the presence of the Blessed One, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa, I am no longer able to rule the kingdom by both right and wrong means. Therefore, let the young man Sujanma be installed as the sovereign lord of the kingdom. As for me, I shall go before the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa, shave off my hair and beard, put on the ochre robes, and go forth from home into homelessness with genuine faith."

Now at that time there were two of the foremost ministers, named Priya and Apriya. These two fell at the king's feet and said: "Your Majesty, please remain if only in name, and we two shall see to it that the kingdom is governed by right Dharma." The king replied: "If that is so, then let it be done." So these two were allowed to govern the kingdom by right Dharma for as long as they could. But then they began once again to administer the kingdom by both right and wrong means, whereupon the relatives of those two who had gone forth under the teaching of the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa came to the two of them and said: "You venerable ones — please govern the kingdom by right Dharma. Do not administer it by both right and wrong means. Do not cause sentient beings to fall into the hells." When the two heard this from them, they again governed the kingdom by right Dharma for as long as they could, but then once more began to administer it by both right and wrong means. Those relatives came to them again and said: "You venerable ones — please govern the kingdom by right Dharma. Do not administer it by both right and wrong means. Do not cause sentient beings to fall into the hells." But the two replied: "O noble ones, we ministers were given authority to govern the kingdom in exchange for payment in accordance with agreed terms. Governing by right Dharma alone carries no extra reward, so we shall certainly remove those who are unworthy and protect those who are worthy." Those relatives then said: "In that case, have a temple built with every requisite in full, and offer it to the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa together with his Saṅgha of hearers. Give to the monks the renounced goods of the young prince's household, and give to the nuns the renounced goods of the queen's retinue. This will be for the long-term benefit, welfare, and happiness of you both." The two replied: "Noble ones, we shall do exactly that — please do not be offended." And so those two had a temple built with every requisite in full and offered it to the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa together with his Saṅgha of hearers, giving to the monks the renounced goods of the young prince's household, and giving to the nuns the renounced goods of the queen's retinue.

Monks, those two who were at that time the foremost ministers of King Kṛkī — Priya and Apriya by name — are now the nāga king Priya and the nāga king Priya and the nāga king Apriya. The two of them caused the kingdom to be governed by both Dharma and non-Dharma — and it is because of that which was not Dharma that they were born among the nāgas. Because they caused a temple with every requisite in full to be built and offered it to the perfectly and fully awakened buddha Kāśyapa together with his Saṅgha of hearers, they came to have a dwelling place manifestly accomplished, made of four kinds of precious jewels, with food of divine ambrosia and drink of honey-wine, each of them attended by a retinue of two thousand five hundred. And because they gave to the monks the renounced goods of the young prince's household, and gave to the nuns the renounced goods of the queen's retinue, they remain throughout an aeon in that place, dwelling on the terraced slopes of Mount Meru, unable to be dislodged even by Suparṇa, the king of birds with wings adorned with fine feathers.

Monks, thus it is: the karmic maturation of actions that are altogether dark is altogether dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are altogether bright is altogether bright; and the karmic maturation of actions that are mixed is mixed.

Monks, therefore, abandon actions that are altogether dark and those that are mixed, and strive for actions that are altogether bright. Monks, you should train yourselves accordingly.

Now, at the time when the Blessed One led the two nāga kings, Priya and Apriya, to take refuge and established them in the foundations of training, these two came on the eighth day, the fourteenth day, and the fifteenth day of the month to the terraced slopes of Mount Meru and paid reverence to the Blessed One. When they came to pay reverence to the Blessed One at night, they did so in the dress of a celestial palace; and when they came to pay reverence to the Blessed One during the day, they did so in the dress of householders.

On a certain occasion the two came before the Blessed One during the day in the dress of householders. At just that time, Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, was also going to the Jeta Grove. Now, the warrior class is by nature proud, and so when this king would go before the Blessed One, he thought to himself: "Surely when I go before the Blessed One, there will be no one who does not rise to greet me in person." He therefore sent ahead an attendant of impure rank. So Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, remained at the gate of the Jeta Grove and said to this attendant of impure rank: "Go inside and look to see who is paying reverence to the Blessed One." The attendant of impure rank replied: "As the king commands" — and, hearing this from Prasenajit the king of Kośala, he went to where the Blessed One was. He saw two householders paying reverence to the Blessed One. Having seen them, he went back to where Prasenajit the king of Kośala was, and said to him: "Sire, two householders are paying reverence to the Blessed One. They appear to be dwellers in the realm of the gods — they have not been cut down." The king thought: "These two householders dwell in my realm, so if they see me they will surely rise to greet me." And with that thought he went to where the Blessed One was.

The two nāga kings, Priya and Apriya, saw Prasenajit the king of Kośala from a great distance. Upon seeing him, the two said to the Blessed One: "Venerable one, shall we for now pay reverence to the holy Dharma, or shall we pay reverence to the king?" The Blessed One declared:

"You two lords of nāgas, pay reverence for now to the holy Dharma. All the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, hold the holy Dharma in reverence, and even the arhats place the Dharma above all else."

Then the Blessed One spoke these verses on the occasion:

All the buddhas who have passed away, all the buddhas who are yet to come,
and the buddhas who dispel sorrow, the many who abide even now — each and every one of them has dwelt, does dwell, and will dwell in reverence toward the holy Dharma.
This is the very nature of buddhahood.
Therefore one who wishes well for oneself, who aspires to true greatness, and who would honor the teaching of the buddhas — let that one hold the holy Dharma in reverence.

The two nāga kings did not rise to show reverence to Prasenajit, the king of Kośala. The king was furious and thought: "These two householders dwell in my realm, yet they will not rise to greet me." Consumed by anger, he nonetheless prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. The Blessed One, perceiving that the king was consumed by anger, began to speak on other matters and did not teach the Dharma. At this the king implored:

"Blessed One, please teach the Dharma.
Sugata, please teach the Dharma."

When he had spoken thus, the Blessed One declared these verses:

One who lacks serene delight of mind, who is full of aversion and agitation — such a one is incapable of knowing all the holy Dharma of the perfectly and completely awakened one.
But one who has subdued the arising of faults, who has set aside the mind that lacks serenity, and who abandons this brooding resentment — that one will come to know what is well proclaimed.

The king was greatly angered at the two of them and thought: "Because of these two, the Blessed One has even interrupted the flow of teaching the Dharma." Realizing this, he said, "Stay here," prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One, rose from his seat, and departed.

Now, while the two nāga kings Priya and Apriya were paying reverence to the Blessed One throughout the day, their retinues — who sustained themselves on dairy provisions — built a solid wall of enclosures on both sides of the road all the way from the terraced slopes of Mount Meru to Śrāvastī, and placed it there.

Prasenajit, king of Kośala, gave orders to his ministers: "Wise ones, the moment these two householders emerge from the presence of the Blessed One, cut off their heads at the neck and throw them to the ground."

When these words were spoken, the retinues of the two nāga kings Priya and Apriya heard them. Upon hearing, they were enraged and began to hurl at Prasenajit, king of Kośala, single-pointed vajras, discuses, great arrows, and weapons with single-pointed blades, along with other such weapons.

Now, the Blessed Ones, the buddhas, possess the quality of never being forgetful. Therefore the Blessed One spoke to the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Maudgalyāyana, extend your loving care to Prasenajit, king of Kośala, together with his retinue, and to the assembled people dwelling in Śrāvastī."

The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, having heard the Blessed One's command, replied, "As the venerable one commands," and then entered into meditative absorption in the samādhi of loving-kindness. By virtue of his entering that absorption, all those weapons — the single-pointed vajras, the discuses, the great arrows, the weapons with single-pointed blades, and all the rest — were transformed into divine flowers: utpala, padma, kumuda, white lotus, and māndārava blossoms.

And they began to fall upon Prasenajit, king of Kośala. Yet even as they fell — filling everything with those divine flowers, the utpala, the padma, the kumuda, the white lotus, and the māndārava blossoms — they entered into the city. The king then addressed the queens' retinue, the young princes, the ministers, the civic officers, the townspeople, the country people, and the brahmins, saying, "You who are wise — from the moment of my entering the Jeta Grove until now, our home has been filled with divine flowers: utpala, padma, kumuda, white lotus, and māṇḍārava blossoms. What is this? Whose power is it?"

Those among them who were skilled in speaking pleasingly and gently replied, "What other god could seek such a thing? What other being could possess such power? It is precisely because the king governs the realm according to the Dharma that this is the king's own power."

The king said, "You who are wise, that is true — because I now take up the Dharma in governing the realm, and it has not fallen apart, this is my power."

The queens' retinue said, "We do not go to the side of any man other than the king, and we do not stray from our lord — therefore this is our power."

The young princes said, "We revere our father and mother and hold them in great honour — therefore this is our power."

The ministers said, "We assist the king in governing the realm according to the Dharma — therefore this is our power."

The civic officers said, "We carry out the king's commands in accordance with the Dharma — therefore this is our power."

The townspeople and the country people said, "We pay tribute to the king in accordance with the Dharma — therefore this is our power."

The king reflected: "Each of these says 'it is our power,' 'it is my power' — yet none of them truly knows whose power it is. The buddha, the Blessed One, is omniscient, all-seeing, and has attained unexcelled mastery in knowledge and objects of knowledge. I shall go to ask the buddha, the Blessed One." Having resolved this, he filled his cupped hands with those divine flowers — the utpala, the padma, the kumuda, the white lotus, and the māṇḍārava blossoms — and made his way to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, he bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side.

Seated to one side, Prasenajit, king of Kośala, then reported all of this at length to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Great king, it was not your power, nor the power of the queens' retinue, nor the power of the young princes, nor the power of the ministers, nor the power of the civic officers, nor the power of the townspeople, nor the power of the country people, nor the power of the brahmins. Rather, it was the power of the monk Mahāmaudgalyāyana. Had the monk Mahāmaudgalyāyana not directed his mind toward you, your queens' retinue, your princes, your ministers, your townspeople, and your country people, Śrāvastī would this very day have ceased to exist as an inhabited realm. It was through the monk Mahāmaudgalyāyana's directing his mind toward you, your queens' retinue, your princes, your ministers, your townspeople, and your country people that this came to pass — therefore place your trust in him with wholehearted faith."

The king said, "Blessed One, if it is indeed the power of the monk Mahāmaudgalyāyana and not of the Blessed One, nor of any other great śrāvaka, how am I to understand this?"

"Great king, it was not my power, nor the power of any other great śrāvaka —"

"This was indeed the power of the monk Mahāmaudgalyāyana. If you have any doubt or misgiving about this, then take these divine flowers — the utpala, the lotus, the kumuda, the white lotus, and the māndārava — and cast them upon the ground." He cast them upon the ground, and they turned into nothing but weapons: single-pointed vajras, wheels, great arrows, single-pointed blades, and the like. Seeing this, the king was struck with terror and asked, "Blessed One, what is this?"

The Blessed One declared, "Great king, it came about because you aroused a mind of intense hatred toward the nāga king Nandaka and his companion Upanandaka."

The king said, "Venerable one, I do not even recall having seen the nāga king Nandaka and Upanandaka — how could I have aroused a mind of intense hatred toward them?"

"Great king, let me remind you."

"Venerable Blessed One, please do remind me."

"Great king, do you remember that two householders who were listening to the Dharma in your presence did not rise to greet you?"

"Blessed One, I do remember that."

"Great king, those two householders were none other than the nāga king Nandaka and Upanandaka."

The king asked, "Blessed One, were those two not disturbed by that?"

"Great king, those two themselves were not disturbed, but those who depend on them for their livelihood were disturbed."

"Blessed One, how am I to make amends to those two?"

"Great king, you must ask their forgiveness."

"Blessed One, those two dwell on the terraced slopes of Mount Meru, and I am here — how am I to ask their forgiveness?"

The Blessed One declared, "Great king, those two come here to pay homage at my feet on the eighth day, the fourteenth day, and the fifteenth day of the month. You too should come here on the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth — I will point them out to you, and you may ask their forgiveness, and they will forgive you."

The king asked, "Venerable one, am I to touch their feet with my head?"

The Blessed One declared, "Great king, you are not to touch their feet with your head. When a person of noble birth bows at the feet of someone of low birth, the principal men take hold of that person's arms — so instead, extend your right arm and ask the two lords of nāgas to forgive you, saying, 'Lords of nāgas, grant your forgiveness,' and they will forgive you."

The king said, "Venerable one, I shall not fail — I will do exactly so," and having spoken, he bowed his head at the two feet of the Blessed One and departed.

Some time later, the nāga king Nandaka and Upanandaka came to the terraced slopes of Mount Meru, took on the appearance of householders, made their way to where the Blessed One was, bowed their heads at the two feet of the Blessed One, and stood to one side. Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, also went to where the Blessed One was, bowed his head at the two feet of the Blessed One, and sat down to one side, whereupon the Blessed One gave him a sign. Then Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, rose from his seat, drew his outer robe over one shoulder, extended his right arm, and said, "Lords of nāgas, grant your forgiveness." The two replied, "Great king, we forgive you." Then Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, together with the nāga king Nandaka and —

Having asked forgiveness of Nandaka and his companion, Prasenajit turned to face the Blessed One, joined his palms, bowed, and addressed the Blessed One, saying: "May the Blessed One, together with the Saṅgha of monks, please be so gracious as to accept, for seven days at midday, my invitation to a meal in honor of the noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana." The Blessed One granted this to Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, by his silence. Then Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that permission had been granted, bowed his head at the two feet of the Blessed One and departed. He then issued instructions to his ministers: "Wise ones, I have invited the Blessed One, together with the Saṅgha of śrāvakas and monks, to midday meals for seven days in honor of the noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana. Beautify the city and make preparations for the midday meal. Kings accomplish things through words, the gods accomplish things through mind, and yogins accomplish all things through mere intention — therefore, ministers, act at once upon the royal command." Having heard this from Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, they adorned in the most beautiful manner all the roads between the Jeta Grove and Śrāvastī, and put Śrāvastī in impeccable order, free of stones, gravel, and uneven ground. They sprinkled it with sandalwood water, placed near at hand vessels filled with sweet-smelling incense, hung masses of silk garlands, raised victory banners and pennants, scattered flowers of every variety, and made it delightful in appearance — as lovely as Sudharmā, the assembly hall of the gods. They set out food that was fine in color, fragrance, and flavor, accompanied by various condiments and made splendid with many beautiful things to look upon. And with such abundance as this, each day the Saṅgha of monks headed by the buddhas was invited to midday meals at the royal palace.

Now, one night, fire broke out among those who were on night watch, and as a result many of the excellent elephants belonging to Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, were burned.

When the seven days of midday meals had passed, Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, had a proclamation announced by drum throughout Śrāvastī: "Henceforth, no one in Śrāvastī is to light a fire at night. Whoever lights a fire shall be punished with a fine of sixty kārṣāpaṇas, or shall be subjected to hand torture until death."

At that time there lived in Śrāvastī a householder named Supriya — wealthy, of great riches and possessions, of broad and extensive property, endowed with the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa (the god of wealth), rivaling Vaiśravaṇa himself in riches. He had taken a wife from among his equals in rank, and he lived together with her in sport, in joy, and in pleasure.

Then, at a later time, he went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived there, bowed his head at the two feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the Blessed One thoroughly instructed, established, encouraged, and gladdened the householder Supriya with Dharma-rich discourse. In many ways he thoroughly taught, established, encouraged, and gladdened him with Dharma-rich discourse, and then fell silent.

Then the householder Supriya rose from his seat, drew his outer robe over one shoulder, turned to face the Blessed One, joined his palms, bowed, and addressed the Blessed One as follows:

"Blessed One, would you be so kind as to consent to take your meal tomorrow with the Saṅgha of monks?" The Blessed One gave his consent to the householder Supriya by remaining silent.

Then the householder Supriya, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been given, bowed his head at the two feet of the Blessed One and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

That very night the householder Supriya made preparations for the meal: clean and excellent food was readied. Rising early the next morning, he arranged seats, set out water vessels, and invited the Blessed One, saying: "Blessed One, please be pleased to know that it is now the right time." Then the Blessed One, in the forenoon, dressed in his lower robe and took up his bowl and outer robe, and surrounded by the assembly of monks, with the Saṅgha of monks proceeding before him, he went to where the householder Supriya's house was and arrived there, and sat down on the seat that had been prepared, at the head of the Saṅgha of monks.

Then the householder Supriya, perceiving that the Buddha and the Saṅgha of monks were comfortably seated, satisfied and nourished them with his own hands with clean and excellent food and drink. In many ways he satisfied and nourished them with his own hands with clean and excellent food and drink. Having done so, and perceiving that the Blessed One had finished his meal and withdrawn his hand from the bowl, he took a seat lower than the Blessed One's and sat before the Blessed One in order to hear the Dharma.

The Blessed One, having understood his aspiration, his latent dispositions, his constitution, and his character, taught the Dharma in such a way that, while the householder Supriya sat there together with his wife, the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection were shattered by the vajra of wisdom, the fruit of stream-entry was directly realized, and in just that way the Four Noble Truths were individually and rightly understood.

Having seen the truth, he solemnly proclaimed three times: "What you, reverend Blessed One, have done for me — this was not done for me by my father, nor by my mother, nor by a king, nor by the gods, nor by my ancestors of old, nor by ascetics and brahmins, nor by friends, companions, and kinsmen. The ocean of blood and tears has been dried up. I have been freed from the mountains of bones. The doors to the lower realms have been closed. The doors to the higher realms and to liberation have been opened. My feet have been lifted out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and I have been placed among the gods and humans."

And he further said:

Through your power, I, who was laden with many faults, have blocked the path to the lower realms, rich now in merit, have opened the way to the higher realms, and have come to attain even the path that leads to nirvāṇa.

Relying on you, supremely pure, today I have obtained a seeing free of fault and utterly clear, and I have reached the noble peaceful state of joy;
I have crossed to the far shore of the ocean of suffering.

Worshipped by beings — asuras, humans, and gods —
free from birth, old age, sickness, and death, rare indeed is one who sees existence as empty:
O Sage, today I behold you — and there is fruit.

When the Blessed One had taught the Dharma, he departed. On that very day on which the householder Supriya together with his wife had come to see the truth, a being entered into his wife's womb.

The householder Supriya also invited the Blessed One together with his Saṅgha of hearers to another house and offered them a meal. There the Blessed One taught the Dharma in such a way that, upon hearing it, both the householder Supriya and his wife realized the fruit of non-return and also attained supernormal powers.

On the very day that the householder Supriya and his wife realized the fruit of non-return and attained supernormal powers, his wife gave birth. The boy who was born was handsome in form, pleasing and beautiful to behold, with a complexion like shining gold, a head like a parasol, long arms, a broad brow, joined eyebrows, a high nose-bridge, and a prominent nasal septum.

His relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day — three sevens of days after the birth — they held a great birth-celebration and then set about giving the child his name, asking what name he should bear. The relatives said: "Since this boy was born on the very day his two parents realized the fruit of non-return and attained supernormal powers, his name shall therefore be Rdzu-'phrul-len — 'Miracle-Taker.'" And so the name Miracle-Taker was given to him.

The boy Miracle-Taker was entrusted to eight nurses: two nurses to hold him in their laps, two nurses to suckle him, two nurses to clean him, and two nurses to play with him. These eight nurses nourished him and caused him to grow — sustaining him with milk, curds, butter, clarified butter, cream of butter, and other principal provisions of the finest kind, so that he grew swiftly, like a lotus in a pond.

When he had grown up, he applied himself to letters, arithmetic, calculation, counting on the fingers, throwing, casting, and placing, and reached mastery in writing — in composing, reading, scholarly knowledge, practice, clear exposition — and became expert in these eight kinds of appraisal: appraising jewels, appraising land, appraising cloth, appraising wood, appraising elephants, appraising horses, appraising women, and appraising men.

He then went to the court of the retinue of Queen Prasenajit, the king of Kosala. The queen's retinue threw down a garland of flowers at him from the upper terrace of the palace. Now the world being what it is — divided into friends, enemies, and those who are indifferent — certain others spoke to King Prasenajit of Kosala, saying: "The young nobleman Miracle-Taker is seeking to ingratiate himself with the royal ladies' retinue." Since kings are prone to act without inquiry, the king gave orders to his ministers: "Wise ones, I am sending away the youth Miracle-Taker, the son of the householder Supriya." The ministers then bound garlands of kāravīra flowers around his neck, dressed the men who were to escort him in blue garments, and led him out through the middle of the city to the place of execution, where he was made to be killed.

The people of Śrāvastī and those who had come from various other regions said: "This sinful king acts without due investigation — he is wicked. He has killed the householder's son, the youth Miracle-Taker, who harbored no enmity, who sought no rivalry, and who had done no wrong." Likewise, the queen's retinue, the young nobles, and the ministers also said that this wicked and who had done no wrong. "Killing Miracle-Taker was not good. It was very wrong indeed," they all said.

The householder Supriya reflected: "Everything I own and possess, which I have never fully given away to anyone, was held in reserve for the sake of the youth Miracle-Taker. But now, through the fault of past karma, the king, without due investigation, had him executed on that very fifth day. For whose benefit, then, should it now be cut off? I shall give it all away to the lowly, the unprotected, the poor, and the destitute." With this in mind, he set aside one kārṣāpaṇa as capital for trading, and gave away all other forms of wealth to the lowly, the unprotected, the poor, and the destitute. With that single kārṣāpaṇa he bought and sold goods, and gained four kārṣāpaṇas in return. With one of those he purchased perfumed plaster and anointed the Blessed One's perfume chamber. With the second he prepared food for the attendants and retinue. With the third he made an offering of Dharma instruction for monks on behalf of the Saṅgha. The fourth he set aside as trading capital.

Because the household's resources had grown thin, he gave even poor gifts and gave even the very worst of gifts, and so he came to be known by the ill name "Bad Supriya."

He went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. As he sat there to one side, the Blessed One spoke to the householder Bad Supriya in these words: "Householder, is it so that gifts are given and merit is made in your house?" "Venerable One, it is just so — gifts are given and merit is made in my dwelling, but they are poor gifts and the very worst of gifts."

The Blessed One said: "Householder, whether one gives poor gifts or good ones, both produce a karmic maturation of wealth. Yet, householder, whether one gives poor gifts or good ones, if that giving is not done with faith, not with respect, not by one's own hand, not at the right time, and not without harm to others — then when the time comes to individually experience the ripening of that karma, one's mind will not be inclined toward the enjoyment of great household wealth, will not be inclined toward the enjoyment of abundant food, will not be inclined toward the enjoyment of abundant clothing, will not be inclined toward the enjoyment of abundant lodging and bedding, will not be inclined toward the enjoyment of abundant vehicles and mounts, and will not be inclined toward the enjoyment of abundant forms, sounds, smells, tastes, and tangible objects. Householder, the ripened fruit of giving in such a manner is to be understood as being of just that kind.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the sixty-ninth fascicle.

Householder, in times past there was a brahmin named Kālaprabha who was like a great śāla tree. He gave gifts to brahmins such as these: elephants adorned with gold, adorned with gold, beautified with gold, bearing golden victory banners, and draped with golden netting — eighty-four thousand such elephants he gave as gifts to brahmins. Horses adorned with gold, beautified with gold, bearing golden victory banners, and draped with golden netting — eighty-four thousand such horses he gave as gifts to brahmins. Chariots of four kinds — made of gold, made of silver, made of lapis lazuli, and made of crystal; covered with lion skins, covered with tiger skins, covered with leopard skins, and canopied with fine woolen cloth; victorious and pleasing in appearance — eighty-four thousand such chariots he gave as gifts to brahmins. Mansions of four kinds — made of gold, made of silver, made of lapis lazuli, and made of crystal — eighty-four thousand such mansions he gave as gifts to brahmins. Thrones of four kinds — made of gold, made of silver, made of lapis lazuli, and made of crystal; upholstered with fringe; fitted with a cushion spread upon them; laid with an inner cushion of fine fabric; laid with a spotted cushion; laid with a great cushion; laid with a fine cushion; covered with a canopy of sumac cloth; furnished with a covering cloth spread over it; and set with two red backrests — eighty-four thousand such thrones he gave as gifts to brahmins. Golden vessels — eighty-four thousand he gave as gifts to brahmins. Silver vessels — eighty-four thousand he gave as gifts to brahmins. Golden vessels filled with silver dust — eighty-four thousand he gave as gifts to brahmins. Silver vessels filled with gold dust — eighty-four thousand he gave as gifts to brahmins. Pairs of cloth of four kinds — fine Kāśika cloth, fine silk cloth, fine Dukūla cloth, and fine Kautamba cloth, by the pair — eighty-four thousand such pairs he gave as gifts to brahmins. Cows with golden horns, with hooves made of silver, with matching calves, giving sweet-tasting milk, draped with cloths of crafted fine fabric — eighty-four thousand such cows he gave as gifts to brahmins. Young women wearing golden armlets and necklaces, adorned with excellent ornaments — eighty-four thousand such young women he gave as gifts to brahmins. Food and drink, provisions, things to eat, things to lick, and delicacies — need one even speak of such things? — he gave to the brahmins in just that way.

Householder, though the brahmin who was like a great śāla tree gave gifts to brahmins in such abundance and in such a manner, one who would give a single meal to even one hundred ascetics who, among the desire-filled wandering sages (tīrthikas), were free from attachment — that giving would bear greater fruit than the former.

Though the brahmin who was like a great śāla tree gave gifts to brahmins in such abundance and in such a manner, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred such wandering sages free from attachment — one who would give a single meal to even one ordinary person who had come to the Jambu Grove — that giving would bear greater fruit than the former.

Though the brahmin who was like a great śāla tree gave gifts to brahmins in such abundance and in such a manner, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred wandering sages free from attachment, and though one gave a meal to such an ordinary person who had come to the Jambu Grove — one who would give a single meal to even one person who had entered the stream (that is, one who has entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry) — that giving would bear greater fruit than the former.

Though the brahmin who was like a great śāla tree gave gifts to brahmins in such abundance and in such a manner, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred wandering sages free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred wandering sages free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred stream-enterers — one who would give a single meal to even one person who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning would bear greater fruit from that giving than from all the former.

Though the brahmin who was like a great śāla tree gave gifts to brahmins in such abundance and in such a manner, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred wandering sages free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred stream-enterers, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning — one who would give a single meal to even one once-returner would bear greater fruit from that giving than from all the former.

Though the brahmin who was like a great śāla tree gave gifts to brahmins in such abundance and in such a manner, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred wandering sages free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred stream-enterers, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred once-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of non-returning — one who would give a single meal to even one non-returner would bear greater fruit from that giving than from all the former.

the aim of directly realizing the fruit of arhatship would bear greater fruit from that giving than from all the former.

Though the brahmin who was like a great śāla tree gave gifts to brahmins in such abundance and in such a manner, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred wandering sages free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred stream-enterers, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred once-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of non-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred non-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of arhatship —

— and though one gave a single meal to one hundred non-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of arhatship — that giving surpasses all of those, and this giving yields the greater fruit.

O brahmin, even giving of that kind — giving as immense as a great sal tree, given at due seasons to brahmins — and though one gave a single meal to one hundred ascetics who are non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) seeking sensual pleasure yet free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred stream-enterers, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred once-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of non-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred non-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of arhatship, and though one gave a single meal to one arhat — that giving surpasses all of those, and this giving yields the greater fruit.

O brahmin, even giving of that kind — giving as immense as a great sal tree, given at due seasons to brahmins — and though one gave a single meal to one hundred ascetics who are non-Buddhists seeking sensual pleasure yet free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred stream-enterers, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred once-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of non-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred non-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of arhatship, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred arhats — that giving surpasses all of those, and this giving, which is the offering of a pleasure garden to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions, yields the greater fruit.

O brahmin, even giving of that kind — giving as immense as a great sal tree, given at due seasons to brahmins — and though one gave a single meal to one hundred ascetics who are non-Buddhists seeking sensual pleasure yet free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred stream-enterers, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred once-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of non-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred non-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of arhatship, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred arhats, and though one offered a pleasure garden to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions, and though one had a temple built in that very pleasure garden — that giving surpasses all of those, and this giving yields the greater fruit.

O brahmin, even giving of that kind — giving as immense as a great sal tree, given at due seasons to brahmins — and though one gave a single meal to one hundred ascetics who are non-Buddhists seeking sensual pleasure yet free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred once-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred non-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of non-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of arhatship, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred arhats, and though one offered a pleasure garden to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions, and though one had a temple built in that very pleasure garden, and though one offered furnishings such as these in that very temple — thrones, chairs, cushioned seats with inner padding, bolsters, coverlets, and blankets — that giving surpasses all of those, and this giving yields the greater fruit.

O brahmin, even giving of that kind — giving as immense as a great sal tree, given at due seasons to brahmins — and though one gave a single meal to one hundred ascetics who are non-Buddhists seeking sensual pleasure yet free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred stream-enterers, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred once-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of non-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred non-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of arhatship, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred arhats, and though one offered a pleasure garden to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions, and though one had a temple built in that very pleasure garden, and though one offered furnishings such as these in that very temple — thrones, chairs, cushioned seats with inner padding, bolsters, coverlets, and blankets — and though one offered in that very temple a permanent endowment of offerings appropriate to the occasion, and though one went for refuge to the Buddha, went for refuge to the Dharma, went for refuge to the Saṅgha, and took up the foundations of training — that giving surpasses all of those, and this giving yields the greater fruit.

O brahmin, even giving of that kind — giving as immense as a great sal tree, given at due seasons to brahmins — and though one gave a single meal to one hundred ascetics who are non-Buddhists seeking sensual pleasure yet free from attachment, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of stream-entry, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred stream-enterers, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of once-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred once-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of non-returning, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred non-returners, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred who had entered the path with the aim of directly realizing the fruit of arhatship, and though one gave a single meal to one hundred arhats, and though one offered a pleasure garden to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions, and though one had a temple built in that very pleasure garden, and though one offered furnishings such as these in that very temple — thrones, chairs, seats, cushioned seats with inner padding, bolsters, coverlets, and blankets — and though one offered in that very temple a permanent endowment of offerings appropriate to the occasion, and though one went for refuge to the Buddha, went for refuge to the Dharma, went for refuge to the Saṅgha, and undertook the bases of training — and whoever cultivates a mind of loving-kindness toward all sentient beings and living creatures — this act of giving is of greater fruit than all those acts of giving.

Householder, like a great sal tree measured by the season, one who has given such gifts to brahmins, and one who has given a single meal to a hundred non-Buddhist sages (tīrthika ṛṣis) free from attachment, and one who has given a single meal to a hundred who have entered the stream in order to directly realize the fruit of stream-entry, and one who has given a single meal to a hundred stream-enterers, and one who has given a single meal to a hundred who have entered the path in order to directly realize the fruit of once-returning, and one who has given a single meal to a hundred once-returners, and one who has given a single meal to a hundred who have entered the path in order to directly realize the fruit of non-returning, and one who has given a single meal to a hundred non-returners, and one who has given a single meal to a hundred who have entered the path in order to directly realize the fruit of arhatship, and one who has given a single meal to a hundred arhats, and one who has offered a pleasure garden to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions, and one who has had a temple built in that very pleasure garden, and one who has offered furnishings in that very temple — thrones, chairs, seats, cushioned seats with inner padding, bolsters, coverlets, and blankets — and one who has offered in that very temple a permanent endowment of offerings appropriate to the occasion, and one who has gone for refuge to the Buddha, gone for refuge to the Dharma, gone for refuge to the Saṅgha, and undertaken the bases of training, and whoever cultivates a mind of loving-kindness toward all sentient beings and living creatures, and whoever remains in continued contemplation of all formations as impermanent, dwelling therein — seeing them as subject to decay, seeing them as free from attachment, seeing them as cessation, and seeing them as relinquishment, and remaining so — this act of giving is of greater fruit than all those acts of giving.

Householder, therefore you should train yourself in this way: to continue seeing all formations as impermanent and to dwell in that seeing — seeing them as subject to decay, seeing them free from attachment, seeing them as cessation, and seeing them as relinquishment, and remaining so. This is how you should train. Householder, you should train in just this way.

Then the householder Citta (Supriya) praised and rejoiced in what the Blessed One had declared, bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One, and departed from the presence of the Blessed One.

At another time, late at night in his own home, he lit a lamp and was reading the word of the Buddha. Men who lived in Rājagṛha by foraging in the streets caught sight of this through a crack in the door, and they said to him: Householder, the king has had it announced by the beat of the drum that in Śrāvastī no one may light a fire at night. Whoever does so will be fined sixty kārṣāpaṇas, or will be clapped in irons and put to death — so the king has decreed. Why then have you lit a fire at night?

He replied: Friends, this is not a fire; it is a lamp.

Householder, is it not the case that this too performs the function of fire? Then either pay sixty kārṣāpaṇas, or sit in irons.

Friends, where would I get sixty kārṣāpaṇas? I will sit in irons.

Now the court of Prasenajit, king of Kosala, had three tiers. Those who were the principal men were placed on the upper tier; those of middling rank were placed in the middle tier;

Those who were of wicked character were placed at the bottom, since they were not the principal ones, and so they placed them on the upper tier.

Then, at the first watch of the night, the four great kings went to where the householder Bhadra-datta the Wicked was, and upon arriving, they addressed the householder Bhadra-datta the Wicked in these words: Householder, it is not fitting that you should be sitting in irons. Why then are you sitting in irons?

He replied: Friends, I am not sitting in irons of my own free will. The king's grain-pension retainers put me in irons. Why? For sixty kārṣāpaṇas — since I do not have that amount, I am therefore sitting in irons.

Householder, therefore rouse your mind and speak the words. Your house, or whatever reservoirs of water there may be, shall be filled with silver and gold. Friends, take heart — and the king, through faith in me, will act according to the power of that faith. If you wish, remain seated, and I shall teach you the Dharma.

They sat before him to hear the Dharma, and as they sat there, their bodies were like this: like four great masses of fire blazing, burning fiercely, blazing all around, their flames merged into one, burning and scorching. Prasenajit, king of Kosala, at the first watch of the night, while sitting in irons, saw four great masses of fire blazing, burning fiercely, blazing all around, their flames merged into one, burning and scorching.

Then, at the midnight watch, Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, went to where the householder Bhadra-datta the Wicked was, and upon arriving, addressed the householder Bhadra-datta the Wicked in these words: Householder, it is not fitting that you should be sitting in irons. Why then are you sitting in irons?

He replied: Kauśika, I am not sitting in irons of my own free will. The king's grain-pension retainers put me in irons. Why? For sixty kārṣāpaṇas — since I do not have that amount, I am therefore sitting in irons.

Householder, therefore rouse your mind and speak the words. Your house, or whatever reservoirs of water there may be, shall be filled with silver and gold. Kauśika, take heart — and the king, through faith in me, will act according to the power of that faith. If you wish, remain seated, and I shall teach you the Dharma.

He sat before him to hear the Dharma, and as he sat there, his body was like this: like a great mass of fire surpassing those previous four — blazing, burning fiercely, blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching — a great mass of fire more exalted and more splendid, blazing, burning fiercely, blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching. Prasenajit, king of Kosala, at the midnight watch, while sitting in irons, saw a great mass of fire surpassing those previous four — blazing, burning fiercely, blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching — a great mass of fire more exalted and more splendid, blazing, burning fiercely, blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching.

Then, at the last watch of the night, Brahmā, lord of the Brahma world, went to where the householder Bhadra-datta the Wicked was, and upon arriving, addressed the householder Bhadra-datta the Wicked in these words: Householder, it is not fitting that you should be sitting in irons. Why then are you sitting in irons?

He replied: Brahmā, I am not sitting in irons of my own free will. The king's grain-pension retainers put me in irons. Why? For sixty kārṣāpaṇas — since I do not have that amount, I am therefore sitting in irons.

Householder, therefore rouse your mind and speak these words: that your house, or whatever water-sources you have, shall be filled with silver and gold. Brahmā, do this with only a small portion of your heart, and the king will be moved by faith to act under the power of that faith toward me. If you wish, remain seated, and I shall teach you the Dharma.

As he sat before Brahmā to hear the Dharma, his body was such — it was like a great mass of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching — surpassing and more magnificent than the previous four great masses of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, their flames merged into one, burning and scorching — and even surpassing and more magnificent than that great mass of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching.

Then Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, in the last watch of the night, when he was inspecting the palace courtyard, saw a great mass of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching — surpassing and more magnificent than the previous four great masses of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, their flames merged into one, burning and scorching — and even more magnificent than that great mass of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching.

Having seen this, he summoned the men on guard over the palace courtyard and said: I had a proclamation announced throughout the city that no one in Śrāvastī should light fires in the night. Why then was a great mass of fire lit right here last night in my very own courtyard?

They replied: Your majesty, a deity entered the palace courtyard in the night and lit a fire. What that deity saw there, we could not tell.

The king said to his grain-pension retainers: You wise men — is this true or false? Investigate the courtyard. They went and examined the courtyard, but not even ashes were to be found. They returned and reported to the king: Your majesty, we examined the courtyard and there was not even any ash.

The king said to the men guarding the palace courtyard: Who is the chief man here in the inner palace? Your majesty, the householder Bhadra-datta the Wicked is present. Call him. And so, in accordance with the king's command, they called him.

The king said to him: Householder, I had a proclamation announced throughout the city that no one in Śrāvastī should light fires in the night. Why did you light a fire right here in the courtyard last night?

He replied: Your majesty, if I had not even stirred for a single moment, what need is there to speak of lighting fires in the middle of the night? Householder, I myself in the first watch of the night saw four great masses of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, their flames merged into one, burning and scorching; and in the middle watch of the night a great mass of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching, surpassing and more magnificent than the previous four; and in the last watch of the night a great mass of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching, surpassing and more magnificent even than that — a great mass of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching, surpassing and more magnificent still — a great mass of fire burning, blazing, and blazing all around, its flames merged into one, burning and scorching — and yet you say to yourself: "If I had not lit even a small fire for so much as a moment, what need is there to speak of the whole night?" What does this mean? That god was astonished, and he said: "I did not light a fire in the night watch, and yet it was thus: last night, in the first watch of the night, the four great kings came to where I was and said to me, 'Householder, it is not fitting that you should be crouching there doing obeisance — why are you crouching in obeisance?' And I said to them, 'My lords, I am not crouching in obeisance of my own accord; it is those who live on the king's wages who have made me do obeisance.' They then said to me, 'Why is that?' And I said to them, 'For sixty kārṣāpaṇas — since I do not possess that amount, that is why I am crouching in obeisance.' Then they said to me, 'Householder, therefore make the resolve and speak the word, and your house or whatever bodies of water you possess shall be filled with silver and gold.' And I said to them, 'My lords, do not be faint-hearted; the king has faith in me, and through the power of that faith he will act as one who is controlled by faith. If you wish, stay, and I will teach you the Dharma.' And when they came before me to hear the Dharma, their bodies were like this — to give a simile, like four great masses of fuel burning, blazing, and blazing all around, their flames merged into one and scorching.

Then, in the middle watch of the night, Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, came to where I was and said to me, 'Householder, it is not fitting that you should be crouching there doing obeisance — why are you crouching in obeisance?' And I said to him, 'Kauśika, I am not crouching in obeisance of my own accord; it is those who live on the king's wages who have made me do obeisance.' And he said to me, 'Why is that?' And I said to him, 'For sixty kārṣāpaṇas — since I do not possess that amount, that is why I am crouching in obeisance.' Then he said to me, 'Householder, therefore make the resolve and speak the word, and your house or whatever bodies of water you possess shall be filled with silver and gold.' And I said to him, 'Kauśika, do not be faint-hearted; the king has faith in me, and through the power of that faith he will act as one who is controlled by faith. If you wish, stay, and I will teach you the Dharma.' And when he came before me to hear the Dharma, his body was like this — to give a simile, like a great mass of fuel surpassing and more magnificent than those previous four masses of fuel, burning, blazing, and blazing all around, their flames merged into one and scorching — like a great mass of fuel burning, blazing, and blazing all around, its flames merged into one and scorching.

Then, in the last watch of the night, Brahmā, lord of the Akaṇiṣṭha realm, came to where I was and said to me, 'Householder, it is not fitting that you should be crouching there doing obeisance — why are you crouching in obeisance?' And I said to him, 'Brahmā, I am not crouching in obeisance of my own accord; it is those who live on the king's wages who have made me do obeisance.' And he said to me, 'Why is that?' And I said to him, 'For sixty kārṣāpaṇas — since I do not possess that amount, that is why I am crouching in obeisance.'

Then Brahmā said to me, 'Householder, on that account rouse your mind and speak the words. I shall fill whichever houses or water-places of yours you wish with silver and gold.' And I said to him, 'Brahmā, make light of that. The king will act toward me in accordance with his faith, out of devoted trust. If you wish, stay and I shall teach you the Dharma.' And when he came before me in order to hear the Dharma, his body was like this — to give a simile, it was like a great heap of brushwood blazing, fully blazing, blazing all around, its flames merged into one and scorching, and surpassing even that a great heap of brushwood blazing, fully blazing, blazing all around, its flames merged into one and scorching, and surpassing even that a great heap of brushwood blazing, fully blazing, blazing all around, its flames merged into one and scorching.

The king said, 'Householder, if that is so, then I too shall grant you a boon — speak whatever you desire.' The householder said, 'Sire, if you have faith in me, I wish to read the words of the Buddha in the lamplight up on the roof at night.' The king said, 'Not only is this granted to you alone, but by reason of you yourself, this is also granted to all others who wish to read the words of the Buddha in the lamplight at night.'

Then the householder Nanda Bhadra, having been sent away with the king's leave, was delighted and overjoyed. He departed from the king's presence, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side.

Prasenajit, king of Kosala, also went to the Jeta Grove to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One. But since the kṣatriya clan is proud by nature, he stopped at the gate of the Jeta Grove and said to a man of impure standing, 'Go inside and see who is attending upon the Blessed One.' That man of impure standing, obedient to the royal command, went and reported back to Prasenajit, king of Kosala, having seen where the Blessed One was. And there he saw that the householder Nanda Bhadra was attending upon the Blessed One. Having seen this, Prasenajit, king of Kosala, went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he said to Prasenajit, king of Kosala, 'Sire, the householder Nanda Bhadra is here, attending upon the Blessed One.' The king thought, 'Since that householder lives in my domain, if he sees me, he will surely stand up in his presence.' And so the king went to where the Blessed

One was.

The householder Nanda Bhadra caught sight of Prasenajit, king of Kosala, from quite a distance. Having seen him, he said to the Blessed One, 'Venerable One, tell me — should I pay homage to the holy Dharma first, or should I pay homage to the king?' The Blessed One declared, 'Householder, pay homage to the holy Dharma first. The blessed buddhas themselves revere the holy Dharma, and arhats too hold the Dharma as supreme.'

Then the Blessed One, with regard to this event, declared these verses:

All the buddhas of the past,
all the buddhas yet to come,
the buddhas who dispel sorrow, and the many who abide now — all of them have dwelt in reverence for the holy Dharma, do so still, and will continue so to dwell:
this is the very nature of a buddha.

Therefore, whoever wishes me well and desires for me true greatness, if they would honor the Buddha's teaching, let them hold the holy Dharma in reverence.

Now, the wicked householder Suppabuddha had not risen to his feet in the presence of Prasenajit, king of Kosala. The king was furious and thought to himself: "This householder lives in my domain and yet he does not stand up for me." Seething with anger, he nevertheless bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. The Blessed One, knowing that the king was consumed with anger, began making other conversation and did not teach the Dharma. The king then made this request: "Blessed One, please teach the Dharma. Sugata, please teach the Dharma." When he had spoken thus, the Blessed One declared these verses to him:

One without genuine joy of heart, one full of aversion and agitation — such a one cannot come to know the holy Dharma of the perfectly awakened.

But one who has subdued the onset of faults, who has removed the mind devoid of joy, and here abandons brooding resentment — that one will come to know the well-spoken word.

The king then thought: "Because of this householder, the Blessed One has cut short even the hearing of the Dharma." An intense feeling of anger arose in him. He said, "Stay," and then bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and departed from his presence.

Thereupon Prasenajit, king of Kosala, gave orders to his ministers: "Learned ones, the moment the wicked householder Suppabuddha departs from the presence of the Blessed One, you are to inform him that he is no longer to remain in my domain."

Then a certain deity who held the householder Suppabuddha in high regard sent out many creatures — tremabukas and trailatākas — and these surrounded and seized the king. Terrified, the king fled on his own to his home, where his retinue of queens, his young attendants, ministers, troops from the capital, elephants, and horses were all likewise surrounded and seized. The entire multitude of people dwelling in Śrāvastī was surrounded and seized as well.

The king was struck with fear. As quickly as he could, he mounted his elephant and went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, he bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, King Prasenajit of Kosala addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"Venerable One, what has just occurred? The nāga kings Nanda and Upananda have become enraged — but who has provoked this? What has befallen the great king? Blessed One, I have been surrounded and seized by the creatures the tremabukas and trailatākas. My retinue of consorts, my young attendants, ministers, troops from the capital, elephants, and horses have all been surrounded and seized. The entire multitude of people dwelling in Śrāvastī has been surrounded and seized. Great King, it is you who have generated a mind of fierce hatred toward the householder Suppabuddha."

"Blessed One, has that householder been thrown into turmoil?"

"Great King, he is a non-returner, and so he does not produce turmoil. Rather, it is the deity who holds him in great devotion who has become enraged."

"Blessed One, what should I do about this?"

"Great King, you must go and ask his forgiveness."

"Blessed One, am I to touch my head to his feet?"

"Great King, you need not touch your head to his two feet. For when a person of high standing bows at the feet of people of low birth, it is the principal men who take him by the hand. You should simply extend your right hand and ask the householder's forgiveness, saying, 'Householder, please forgive me,' and he will forgive you."

Then Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, praised and rejoiced in what the Blessed One had declared, touched his head to the Blessed One's two feet in homage, and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Now in Śrāvastī there were two householders named Saṃdhaka and Śīlavaṇij. Of these, Saṃdhaka was upright toward those who kept their pledges, and Śīlavaṇij was upright toward those who broke open the four great seals. Moreover, this latter man, being one possessed of shame, would walk far from the place where people defecated.

In Śrāvastī there was a band of thieves known as the Last-Month Left-Handers. Their practice was this: as soon as the invitation ceremony had concluded, they would assemble and deliberate among themselves, saying, "Wise ones, what shall we do so that we may enjoy ourselves and live comfortably for a full year without being sought out for it?" Among them, one said, "Wise ones, this householder Saṃdhaka is a keeper of pledges — let us question and examine him." Others said, "Indeed, let us do so. As for the householder Śīlavaṇij, he is upright toward those who break open the four great seals, and moreover, being possessed of shame, he walks far from the place where people defecate — so let us seize him, intimidate him, and he will open the four great seals." And so they made him their target, caught him when he had gone to the place for defecating, and accosted him, saying, "Householder, will you live or die?" He replied, "Wise ones, do as you will." They said, "Householder, if that is so, then we will bring a charge of a hundred or a thousand against the householder Saṃdhaka, and through that ruse, you shall open the four great seals." He replied, "Wise ones, shall I do so truthfully or untruthfully?" "Householder, untruthfully." He said, "Wise ones, I will not open the four great seals by means of untruth. I cannot, in order to be free from suffering for one lifetime, generate suffering for many lifetimes." They said, "Householder, if you open the four great seals, well and good. If you do not, we will cut off your head at the neck and throw it to the ground." He then spoke in verse:

If I abide in the Dharma, better to die quickly than not.

If I turn my back on the Dharma, may I not remain alive.

One who abides in the Dharma enjoys the bliss of the gods of the Thirty-Three. One who falls from the Dharma tumbles into the fearsome lower realms, beyond bearing.

Then those Last-Month Left-Handers touched their heads to his two feet and said, "Householder, grant us fearlessness." He said, "I grant it." Those Last-Month Left-Handers touched their heads to his two feet and departed.

Now in Śrāvastī there was a younger brother of Prasenajit, king of Kosala, a prince named Kṛṣṇa, handsome, beautiful, and pleasing to behold, possessed of faith, good in character, and of virtuous mind, who had gone for refuge to the Buddha, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha. While he was keeping the eightfold restoration observance, a goddess of the māra class came to him and sought to invite him — in a manner not called forth by right reason — but he did not receive her. On another occasion, the evil householder Subhūtidatta, the householder Saṃdhaka, the householder Śīlavaṇij, and Prince Kṛṣṇa all went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, they touched their heads to the Blessed One's two feet and took their seats to one side.

Prasenajit, king of Kosala, also came with great royal wealth and great royal power to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he touched his head to the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side. Having sat to one side, the Blessed One spoke to Prasenajit, king of Kosala, in these words: "Great king, this is the evil householder Subhūtidatta."

Then Prasenajit, king of Kosala, rose from his seat, extended his right hand, and said: "Householder, I beg your pardon." The householder replied: "Your majesty, I grant it."

Then Prasenajit, king of Kosala, addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable one, I am a king of the warrior caste, consecrated at the crown — is it not remarkable that I should seek pardon from a subject dwelling in my own realm?" The Blessed One declared: "Great king, it is indeed remarkable that a lord should seek pardon."

Then the householder Subhūtidatta addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable one, I had a single kārṣāpaṇa coin. I traded in goods and sold them, and from that I produced four kārṣāpaṇas. Of these four, with the first I anointed the Blessed One's perfumed chamber with a fragrant paste. The second I used to offer a feast for the monks on behalf of the Saṅgha. The third I used to provide livelihood for my servants. The fourth I set aside as the price of the goods. Venerable one, is it not remarkable — such generosity from one who has no wealth?" The Blessed One declared: "Householder, generosity without wealth is indeed remarkable."

Then the householder Śīlavanij addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable one, I was travelling abroad, and some left-handed men of the last month of autumn seized me and threatened me, saying: 'Householder, will you live or will you die?' I said to them: 'Wise ones, what do you have in mind?' They said to me: 'Householder, if that is how it is, we shall make a wager with you — a hundred or a thousand — and challenge you to a contest of arbitration. You must open the four seals.' I said to them: 'Wise ones, on what basis — truthful or untruthful?' They replied: 'Householder, on an untruthful basis.' I then said to them: 'Wise ones, I will not open the four seals on an untruthful basis. I cannot create suffering for many lifetimes in order to be free from the suffering of one lifetime.' They said to me: 'Householder, if you will open the seals just this once, that is well. But if you will not, we shall cut off your head at the neck and throw you to the ground.' I then spoke these verses:

If I remain in the Dharma, let me swiftly die — that is better.

If I turn my back on the Dharma, may I not live.

One who abides in the Dharma enjoys the happiness of the Heaven of the Thirty-three.

One who falls from the Dharma plunges into a dreadful lower realm, unbearable and terrifying.

When I had spoken thus, they touched my two feet and said to me: 'Householder, grant us fearlessness.' I said to them: 'I grant it.'

"Reverend one, even when I had fallen into poverty, I did not abandon the Dharma. Is it not remarkable that when I had fallen into poverty I still practiced the Dharma?" The Blessed One declared: "Householder, it is indeed remarkable that when you had fallen into poverty you still practiced the Dharma."

Then Prince Kṛṣṇa addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Reverend one, while I was observing the restoration ceremony of the eight branches, a goddess of the māra class came and, since she was not someone born of a noble lineage, when she sought to be entertained as a guest I did not accept her. Blessed One, is it not remarkable that I, one possessed of great wealth, kept myself apart from sensual desires?" The Blessed One declared: "Young man, it is indeed remarkable that one possessed of great wealth kept himself apart from sensual desires."

Then the Blessed One spoke these verses concerning these events:

A lord who is patient and gives without possessions, one who practices the Dharma even when fallen into poverty, and one who keeps apart from sensual desires though possessed of great wealth — these four things are exceedingly difficult to do.

Then the householder Duṣṭanandidatta, the householder Saṃgrāhaka, the householder Śīlavāṇijaka, and Prince Kṛṣṇa requested the Blessed One to reveal the Dharma and the Vinaya, and the Blessed One gave them ever-higher teachings in reply. And Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, sat there looking upon their faces. After listening for a while to the talk full of Dharma, he prostrated with his head to the two feet of the Blessed One, rose from his seat, and departed. He entered the inner quarters of the queen's retinue and said to Queen Mālavikā: "Mālavikā, today the householder Duṣṭanandidatta, the householder Saṃgrāhaka, the householder Śīlavāṇijaka, and Prince Kṛṣṇa requested the Blessed One to reveal the Dharma and the Vinaya, and the Blessed One gave them ever-higher teachings in reply. I too sat there looking upon their faces, and then I rose and departed, somewhat abashed."

Queen Mālavikā said: "Your majesty, why did you yourself not make a request to the Blessed One?" He replied: "Mālavikā, I have little learning, while they have much learning — what was there for me to request?" She said: "Your majesty, why do you not yourself have the word of the Buddha recited?" He replied: "Mālavikā, I am constantly occupied with royal affairs and royal duties — how could I have it recited? But if you were to have it recited by someone, I would have it read to me from you in the evenings." She said: "Your majesty, I shall do so."

The king then said to Queen Kṣatriyāvarṣā: "From whom do you have it recited?" She replied: "Your majesty, from the noble Śāriputra." He then said to Queen Mālavikā: "From whom do you have it recited?" She replied: "Your majesty, from the noble Śārka."

Then Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, went to where the venerable Śāriputra was, and upon arriving he prostrated with his head to the two feet of the venerable Śāriputra and addressed him thus: "Noble one, if the noble Kṣatriyāvarṣā wishes to have the word of the Buddha recited from the noble Śāriputra, please grant her leave to do so." He replied: "Your majesty, make the request to the Blessed One." Thereupon the venerable Śāriputra went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he prostrated with his head to the two feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Śāriputra addressed the Blessed One thus: "Reverend one, Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, has said this: 'Please grant leave for Kṣatriyāvarṣā to recite.' What should I say to him in reply?" The Blessed One declared:

"Let Śārika's son recite." The venerable Śāriputra accepted, saying to Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, "Your majesty, leave to recite has been granted." The king prostrated with his head to Śāriputra's two feet, and then the venerable Śāradvatiputra went to where Śāradvatiputra was — arriving there, he prostrated with his head to the venerable Śāradvatiputra's two feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, addressed the venerable Śāradvatiputra thus: "Noble Mālavatī wishes to recite the word of the Buddha from a noble one; please grant her leave to do so." He replied: "Your majesty, make the request to the Blessed One." Thereupon the venerable Śāradvatiputra went to where the Blessed One was, and upon arriving he prostrated with his head to the two feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Śāradvatiputra addressed the Blessed One thus: "Reverend one, Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, has said this: 'Please grant leave for Mālavatī to recite.' What should I say to him in reply?" The Blessed One declared: "Let Śāradvatiputra recite." The venerable Śāradvatiputra accepted, saying to Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, "Your majesty, leave to recite has been granted," and the king prostrated with his head to his two feet and departed.

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga. The seventieth fascicle.

Now the venerable Śāriputra, knowing the proper times and understanding right occasion, would go at the fitting moment to engage the Kṣatriyā in her recitation of the Vinaya and would not go at an improper time. The venerable Śāradvatiputra, however, did not know the proper times and did not understand right occasion, and so he would go both at fitting times and at improper times to engage Mālavatī in recitation.

On one occasion, at some other time, some matter arose for Prasenajit, the king of Kośala, at another rocky retreat, and he rose that very night and went there. The noble Śāradvatiputra was awakened by the sounds of elephants, horses, and conches, and he thought to himself: "I shall go and give Mālavatī her recitation." He went to the gate of the royal palace, and the gatekeeper said to him: "Noble one, this is not the right time; do not enter the royal palace now — wait a while and enter afterward." At this he grew angry and said: "As long as this great fat beggar lives, I shall enter here both at proper times and at improper times. When he dies, this place will be the domain of outcasts and thieves; it will become a place of filth, a prison, and a jackal-haunt." The gatekeeper, frightened, said nothing, and the venerable Śāradvatiputra entered within.

Mālavatī was lying asleep, and he roused her with the sound of snapping his fingers. She prostrated at his feet and sat before him. Now Mālavatī was wearing robes befitting the queen's retinue, and the venerable Śāradvatiputra sat with his senses collected. Mālavatī thought: "Why does the noble Śāradvatiputra sit with his senses collected?" Then she thought again: "I am wearing robes befitting the queen's retinue — that is why the noble Śāradvatiputra sits with his senses collected." Understanding this, she went into her chamber, put on thick robes, and came back out. The venerable Śāradvatiputra then gave her the recitation, and other scriptures were also transmitted. Mālavatī said: "Noble one, has the Saṅgha been invited today, or is this an alms round?" He said: "I am going on an alms round." Mālavatī said: "Noble one, if you are going on an alms round, who is there to offer you more generous alms than I?"

"I myself will offer it," she said, and filling the alms bowl with clean and choice food and drink, she presented it to him. The venerable Śāradvatiputra took it and departed. As he was leaving, he met the venerable Śāriputra, who was just entering, and Śāriputra said to him: "With such little effort as this, have you brought your defilements to exhaustion? Or is it that you have only just arrived? As for me, I have given the recitation and other scriptures have also been transmitted, and I have obtained this alms bowl filled with clean and choice food and drink." The venerable Śāriputra then said to him: "That is why you belong to the group of six." When monks of little conscience heard this, they spoke disparagingly, saying: "Why do monks, before dawn, before the break of day, pass through the firmly shut gates — or through the precincts of the firmly shut gates — of a king consecrated with the royal consecration over the heads of the warrior caste, without having first gathered jewels or those counted as jewels?" They reproached them, made accusations, and spread talk. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One convened the Saṅgha of monks in light of this occurrence, this basis for promulgation, and this occasion — and so on, as before. "The awakened Blessed Ones, though knowing, yet act as if they do not know" — and so on, also as before. The awakened Blessed One then questioned the venerable Śāradvatiputra: "Śāradvatiputra, is it true that before dawn, before the break of day, without having first gathered jewels or those counted as jewels, you passed through the firmly shut gates — or through the precincts of the firmly shut gates — of a king consecrated with the royal consecration over the heads of the warrior caste?" "Reverend One, it is true." The awakened Blessed One said: "What is unbecoming of an ascetic, what is not in accord, what is not fitting, what does not accord with proper conduct — that is not to be done by one who has gone forth. And why? Because, monks, there are these ten dangers in going to a royal palace. What are the ten? Monks, consider this: a king is sitting together with his queen, and a monk also goes to the royal palace. The queen then, upon seeing the monk, smiles. At that the king thinks: 'Might the reason the queen smiles upon seeing the monk be that the monk intends to commit some misdeed with her in private?' That is the first danger of going to a royal palace. Furthermore, if the king has gone to the queen's chambers, or a pregnant woman has entered among the queen's retinue, and a monk also goes to the royal palace, the king will think: 'Could it not be the monk's doing, his going to this royal palace?' That is the second danger of going to a royal palace. Furthermore, if a jewel or something reckoned as a jewel has gone missing from the royal palace, and a monk also goes to the royal palace, the king will think: 'Could it not be the monk's doing, his going to this royal palace?' That is the third danger of going to a royal palace. Furthermore, if a secret word has spread to the outside from the royal palace, and a monk also goes to the royal palace, the king will think: 'Could it not be the monk's doing, his going to this royal palace?' That is the fourth danger of going to a royal palace. Furthermore, if someone intends to kill the young princes, and a monk also goes to the royal palace, those who are displeased will think: 'Could it not be the monk's doing, his going to this royal palace?'

That is the fifth danger of going to a royal palace. Furthermore, if the young princes intend to kill the king, and a monk also goes to the royal palace, those who are displeased will think: 'Could it not be the monk's doing, his going to this royal palace?' That is the sixth danger of going to a royal palace. Furthermore, if the king demotes high ministers to a lower rank, and a monk also goes to the royal palace, those who are displeased will think: 'Could it not be the monk's doing, his going to this royal palace?' That is the seventh danger of going to a royal palace. Furthermore, if the king promotes low ministers to a higher rank, and a monk also goes to the royal palace, those who are displeased will think: 'Could it not be the monk's doing, his going to this royal palace?' That is the eighth danger of going to a royal palace. Furthermore, if the king arms his fourfold military host — the host of elephants, the host of cavalry, the host of chariots, and the host of infantry — and marches forth to the provinces and returns, and a monk also goes to the royal palace, those who are displeased will think: 'Could it not be the monk's doing, his going to this royal palace?' That is the ninth danger of going to a royal palace. Furthermore, if the king causes one who has not come to come, and causes one who has come to stay, and having proclaimed victory, pursues them afterward with great punishment, and a monk also goes to the royal palace, those who are displeased will think: 'Could it not be the monk's doing, his going to this royal palace?' That is the tenth danger of going to a royal palace.

Monks, it is thus that going to a royal palace may give rise to harm from elephants, harm from horses, harm from chariots, and harm from infantry. Monks, going to a royal palace is not fitting, not in accord with proper conduct, not in accord with the ways of an ascetic — and so he censured it.

Then the Blessed One, having censured it in many ways, declared to the monks: 'Monks, therefore, having discerned ten genuine benefits, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established' — and so forth, as before. 'My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk, before dawn has broken and before valuables or things reckoned as valuables have been collected, crosses the fixed gate or the precincts of the fixed gate of the palace of a king consecrated with the head-anointment of royal consecration, he commits a transgression.'

Thus did the Blessed One establish that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka's bamboo grove of the Cool Forest. At that time there were in Jambudvīpa two great cities: Rājagṛha and one called Campā. Whenever Rājagṛha fell into decline, Campā would flourish; and whenever Campā fell into decline, Rājagṛha would flourish.

In the great city of Śraghoṣa there reigned a king named Utrayaṇa, under whose rule the kingdom was prosperous and flourishing, the seasons were good, the land was filled with people and a great populace, conflicts and quarrels, foreign enemies and internal strife were utterly pacified, and it was free from thieves, famine, and disease. With rows of śāla trees and sugarcane, and an abundance of cattle and buffalo, it was a land of Dharma, and a righteous king caused it to be governed as a righteous kingdom. There too the trees perpetually bore flowers and fruit, and the gods sent the rains in timely and excellent succession, so that the harvests became exceedingly abundant. This king had a queen named Moonlight, beautiful of form, lovely to behold, and endowed with every wholesome quality of limb and feature, a crown prince named Tsugphudchen, and two foremost ministers named Heruka and Bhiruka.

In the city of Rājagṛha there reigned a king of the Magadha lineage named Bimbasāra, under whose rule the kingdom was likewise prosperous and flourishing, the seasons were good, the land was filled with people and a great populace, conflicts and quarrels, foreign enemies and internal strife were utterly pacified, and it was free from thieves, famine, and disease. With rows of śāla trees and sugarcane, and an abundance of cattle and buffalo, it was a land of Dharma, and a righteous king caused it to be governed as a righteous kingdom. There too the trees perpetually bore flowers and fruit, and the gods sent the rains in timely and excellent succession, so that the harvests became exceedingly abundant. This king had a queen named Elevated Body, beautiful of form, lovely to behold, and endowed with every wholesome quality of limb and feature, a crown prince named Ajātaśatru, and a foremost minister, belonging to the great officers of Magadha, named the Brahmin Varṣatūla.

Now, at a certain time, merchants from Rājagṛha took up their packs and set out to other lands, and, after passing through villages, towns, districts, and royal palaces in succession while surveying the markets, they arrived at the great city of Śraghoṣa. When king Utrayaṇa was seated in a place of business surrounded by his assembly of ministers, those merchants presented themselves and went before king Utrayaṇa. King Utrayaṇa received them with the words "Welcome!" and settled them according to their needs. King Utrayaṇa, having seen them, said to his ministers: "Wise ones, is there any other king who possesses a kingdom so prosperous and flourishing, the seasons so good, filled with such people and such a great populace, where the trees perpetually bear flowers and fruit like this, and where the gods send the rains in timely succession so that the harvests are exceedingly abundant?" Those merchants said: "Sire, in the eastern lands there is a city called Rājagṛha, in which a king named Bimbisāra makes the kingdom prosperous and flourishing, the seasons good, and the land filled with people and a great populace. There too the trees perpetually bear flowers and fruit, and the gods send the rains in timely and excellent succession, so that the harvests are exceedingly abundant." Upon hearing this, king Utrayaṇa became filled with longing, and he said: "Wise ones, what is scarce in that king's land?" The ministers replied: "Sire, you are the lord of jewels, and that king is the lord of cloth; therefore jewels are scarce there." The king said:

"Wise ones, if that is so, let the jewel-appraisers be summoned!" The king had the jewels examined and examined again, filled a chest with them, and sent them as a gift into the hands of those merchants. He also wrote a letter: "O joyful and well-suited one, you are a friend I have not met with my own eyes. If there is ever anything at all that you need in the city of Śrāvastī, send word to me and I shall accomplish everything." This he wrote and dispatched. Then those merchants took the gift, the letter, and the price of the goods, set out for Rājagṛha, and in due course arrived at Rājagṛha. There they rested from the weariness of the road, and then, taking the jewel chest and the letter, they went to king Bimbisāra, touched their heads to his two feet, presented the chest and the letter, and said: "Sire, the king of the resounding city, he who is called king Utrayaṇa, sends these gifts and this letter to Your Majesty." King Bimbisāra read the letter and said: "Wise ones, what is scarce in that king's land?" The ministers replied: "It is much like your own land, Sire." But the ministers then added: "Sire, that said, the king himself takes up arms, and he goes to battle and engages in combat together with the kings of the neighboring fortresses around him." Now king Utrayaṇa possessed a jewel armor of five parts, which at every joining of its sections was pleasant to the touch, difficult to cut, difficult to pierce, impervious to poison, and possessed of a luminous nature. King Utrayaṇa said to his ministers: "Wise ones, if that king himself takes up arms and goes to battle and is about to engage in combat together with the kings of the neighboring fortresses, then send him this jewel armor; make the envoys ready at once." They made the envoys ready. Then king Utrayaṇa had this jewel armor prepared along with a letter that said: "O joyful and well-suited one, I send you this jewel armor as a gift. It too possesses five qualities: at every joining of its sections it is pleasant to the touch, difficult to cut, difficult to pierce, impervious to poison, and possessed of a luminous nature. Therefore you yourself keep it on your person with care, and do not give it to anyone." This he wrote and dispatched. The envoys took the gift and the letter, set out for Rājagṛha, and in due course arrived at Rājagṛha.

Then, after resting from the weariness of the road, the envoys took the jewel armor and the letter and went before king Bimbisāra (Skt. Bimbāsāra), prostrated at his feet, and presented the jewel armor and the letter, saying: "The divine king Utrayaṇa sends your majesty this gift and this letter."

King Bimbisāra read the letter, and when he saw the jewel armor he was filled with the greatest wonder. He said to his ministers: "Wise ones, summon the jewel appraisers." When the jewel appraisers had been summoned, the king said: "Wise ones, assess the value of these jewels." The jewel appraisers began to examine each of the jewels set in the jewel armor, but as they looked at each jewel in turn they found that none of them could be given a price. They said to the king: "Your majesty, not a single jewel in this piece is one that can be priced. By the very nature of things, the value of a jewel that cannot be priced is counted as ten million." King Bimbisāra counted the jewels, and then, dismayed at the thought of what gift he could possibly send in return, he rested his chin on his hand, sat lost in thought, and spoke to his ministers: "Wise ones, king Utrayaṇa sends me a gift such as this — what gift in return shall I send him?" Then the brahmin Varṣatula, the chief minister of Magadha, spoke: "Your majesty, in your own land too there has appeared a jewel supremely exalted above all three worlds: namely, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened Buddha. Your majesty should have a likeness of the Buddha drawn on cloth and send it as a gift in return." The king said: "If that is so, then I shall ask the Blessed One." And with that, king Bimbisāra went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with his head, and sat down to one side. Sitting there to one side, king Bimbisāra addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable One, I have a friend in the city of Śrāvastī called king Utrayaṇa whom I have never seen. He has sent me as a gift a jewel armor possessing five qualities. In return, if the Blessed One would grant it, I would have a likeness of the Blessed One drawn on cloth and send it to him as my return gift." The Blessed One declared: "Great king, I grant it — have it sent. Your intention is good. The moment king Utrayaṇa sees it, faith will arise in him and he will come to perceive the truth." King Bimbisāra bowed his head at the Blessed One's feet, and departed from the Blessed One's presence. He then summoned all the painters residing throughout his realm and said: "Wise ones, draw a likeness of the Blessed One on cloth." They replied: "Your majesty, we shall draw it." As they began to capture the Blessed One's features, however, they found themselves unable to do so, for the buddhas, the blessed ones, are such that one can never look at them enough, and so the painters were unable to capture the Blessed One's features. Disheartened, they went before the king and said: "Your majesty, we have been unable to make a start on capturing the Blessed One's features. If your majesty would invite the Blessed One to another palace and have him sit in measured shade, then we would be able to make a start on capturing the Blessed One's features."

King Bimbisāra invited the Blessed One to another palace, but since the buddhas, the blessed ones, are such that one can never look at them enough, whenever the painters beheld the Blessed One's form they found themselves not yet satisfied in their looking at this or that feature, and so were still unable to capture the Blessed One's likeness. At that point the Blessed One spoke: "Great king, let the painters not be disheartened at their inability to capture the Tathāgata's likeness. Have a cloth brought, and I shall cast my shadow upon it." The king had a cloth presented, and the Blessed One cast his shadow upon it. He then spoke to the painters: "Skilled ones, fill in this shadow with paints of many colors." He also spoke to the king: "Great king, once the image is made, below it write the going for refuge, the bases of training, and the twelve links of dependent origination in forward order and in reverse. Above it compose and set down these two verses:

Arise and engage the Buddha's teaching, like a great elephant in a house of mud.
Crush the army of the lord of death.
Whoever dwells in thorough heedfulness and practices this Dharma of taming shall, having fully abandoned the wandering of birth, make an end of suffering at last.

Write these words there. And send messengers to convey the image to distant lands with great honor and reverence. If anyone asks what this is, let them say: 'This is an image of the Blessed One, the buddha who is supremely exalted above all three worlds.' If anyone asks what is written below, let them say: 'This is the profession of faith, these are the bases of training, and this is the arising and ceasing of the world.' If anyone asks what is written above, let them say: 'This is something to inspire great joy.' So instruct them."

The king had everything written down and rolled up, perfumed with many fragrant substances, neatly rolled together, placed in a golden tube, that golden tube placed inside a silver tube, the silver tube inside a bronze tube, and the bronze tube wrapped in cloth scented with many fragrances. It was then loaded onto an elephant's back and sent forth from the city with great splendor of streets and roads. To King Udayana the king sent a letter bearing these words: "To you, Udayana, my dear and beloved friend, I send this gift which is supremely exalted above all three worlds. You, for three and a half leagues, shall beautify the city and the roads, and I myself, with a fourfold army, shall come to receive it. In an open and spacious region let it be received with great offerings and honor and unveiled." So he wrote and dispatched it. He also instructed the messengers: "You shall say to him thus and thus." They took the image and the letter and set out, proclaiming it aloud as they went. Traveling in stages, proclaiming as they went, they arrived at the frontier of those proclamations and sent the letter on from there to King Udayana. When King Udayana read the letter he was overcome and surrounded on all sides by anger, and he said to his ministers: "Wise ones, listen to what this letter he has sent me says. He sends me some kind of gift, and for that reason he says I am to beautify the city and the roads for three and a half leagues, and that he himself will come to receive it with a fourfold army."

"Ready the fourfold army and go now — devastate that king's realm." The ministers said: "Your Majesty, that king appears to be a great sovereign. Since sending him a vile gift to his face before your own royal presence would be unseemly, it would be wiser to investigate the matter more carefully. If it pleases Your Majesty, so much the better. If it does not, then we shall find the right moment to deal with him." They had the roads beautified for up to three and a half leagues, and the city was proclaimed throughout: stones, gravel, and rubbish were cleared away; it was sprinkled with sandalwood water; vessels filled with fragrant incense were set out; festoons of silk streamers were hung up; parasols and victory banners were raised; flowers of every variety were strewn about; and everything was made as joyful as the pleasure groves of the gods. Then the king himself, at the head of his fourfold army, received the guest and had him conducted into the city.

Thereupon many hundreds of thousands of living creatures gathered there, and many hundreds of thousands of gods gathered in the midst of the sky, and in that wide open space a great offering was made in their midst. When the image was unveiled, many merchants who had come from the interior of the country, bearing their packs, had arrived in the city just as the proclamation was being made. They saw the image of the Buddha and, all at once, every one of them raised a single cry: "Homage to the Buddha! Homage to the Buddha!"

King Udayana, hearing for the very first time the word "Buddha," felt every single hair on his body stand on end. Filled with wonder, he gazed steadily for a long while and then spoke: "Wise ones, who is this called 'Buddha'?"

They replied: "Your Majesty, in the interior of Jambudvīpa, near the face of the Snow Mountains, beside the river on the bank where the fortunate charioteer dwells, not far from the hermitage of the yellow-robed sages, there was born a youth of the Śākya clan. The brahmin astrologers and mark-readers prophesied: if this youth remains within the palace, he will become a wheel-turning king, victorious in all four directions — a king of Dharma, endowed with Dharma, possessed of the seven precious things. Those seven precious things will be as follows: the precious wheel, the precious elephant, the precious horse, the precious jewel, the precious queen, the precious householder, and the precious general is the seventh. He will have brave and bold sons of excellent bodily form, a full thousand in number, who crush all enemy forces. He will govern this great earth reaching to the oceans, utterly without harming or injuring, and he will dwell having established it well in accordance with Dharma, equitable and just. But if he shaves his hair and beard, dons the ochre robes, and goes forth from home into homelessness with sincere faith, then he will become a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and completely awakened Buddha — renowned throughout the world with the sound of that fame." So it was prophesied. Your Majesty, this is his image.

The king was greatly delighted and said: "Wise ones, ask about this on my behalf — I wish to know: what is this writing below?" They said: "Your Majesty, this is his accepted precepts. These are the bases of the training. These are the arising and ceasing of the world." "Wise ones, ask about this also on my behalf — I wish to know: what is this writing above?"

"This god is one to be rejoiced in." King Utraya then repeatedly recited the twelve links of dependent origination in forward order and in reverse order, taking them firmly to heart. As dawn broke through the night, he set aside all purposes and all ends of action, sat down in cross-legged posture, held his body straight, settled his mindfulness in its proper orientation, and gazed upon the twelve links of dependent origination arising in forward order and ceasing in reverse order, as follows:

When this exists, this arises; because this is born, this comes to be. That is: conditioned by ignorance, formations arise; conditioned by formations, consciousness; conditioned by consciousness, name-and-form; conditioned by name-and-form, the six sense bases; conditioned by the six sense bases, contact; conditioned by contact, feeling; conditioned by feeling, craving; conditioned by craving, clinging; conditioned by clinging, becoming; conditioned by becoming, birth; conditioned by birth, aging-and-death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, mental distress, and turmoil arise. Thus does this entire great mass of suffering come to be.

When this does not exist, this does not arise; because this is not born, this does not come to be. That is: with the cessation of ignorance, formations cease; with the cessation of formations, consciousness ceases; with the cessation of consciousness, name-and-form ceases; with the cessation of name-and-form, the six sense bases cease; with the cessation of the six sense bases, contact ceases; with the cessation of contact, feeling ceases; with the cessation of feeling, craving ceases; with the cessation of craving, clinging ceases; with the cessation of clinging, becoming ceases; with the cessation of becoming, birth ceases; with the cessation of birth, aging-and-death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, mental distress, and turmoil all cease. Thus does this entire great mass of suffering cease.

As he gazed upon the twelve links of dependent origination in their forward and reverse order, the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection (the belief in a self constituted by the aggregates), accumulated since beginningless time, was shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and he directly realized the fruit of stream-entry. Having seen the truth, he spoke this verse:

The Buddha who dwells in the far distance has thoroughly purified the eye of wisdom.
To the supreme physician who possesses such medicine as this — I bow down.

Knowing this, filled with faith, he sent a letter to King Rūpasāra with these words of heartfelt joy: "In dependence upon you, I have lifted my feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; I have been established among gods and humans; I have brought cyclic existence to an end; I have dried up the ocean of blood and tears; I have been freed from the mountains of bones; I have cut off the doors to the lower realms; I have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation. By the vajra of primordial wisdom, I have shattered the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time, and have directly realized the fruit of stream-entry. I wish to see a monk, and so it would be fitting for you to send some monks." Such was the letter he wrote and sent.

King Rūpasāra read that letter, went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One in prostration, and sat down to one side.

Sitting to one side, King Rūpasāra addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, King Udayana, having seen the truths, sent me a letter saying, 'I wish to see a monk; it would be fitting to send some monks.' What should be done in this regard?"

The Blessed One reflected: considering who among the monks might be the one to tame King Udayana along with his retinue and the multitudes dwelling in the city of Śrāvastī, he perceived that they were the disciples to be tamed by the venerable Mahākātyāyana. The Blessed One then addressed the venerable Mahākātyāyana: "Kātyāyana, go to King Udayana, his retinue, and the multitudes dwelling in the city of Śrāvastī, and tend to them."

The venerable Mahākātyāyana replied, "Venerable One, I shall do as you command," and having received this instruction from the Blessed One, bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One in prostration and departed from the presence of the Blessed One.

That very night having passed, when morning came, the venerable Mahākātyāyana put on his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and outer robe, and entered Rājagṛha for alms. Having made the rounds for alms through Rājagṛha and taken his meal, he returned from the after-noon alms round, prepared his lodging in the manner to which he was accustomed, took up his alms bowl and outer robe, and set out with a retinue of five hundred monks for the city of Śrāvastī.

King Rūpasāra, for his part, wrote a letter to King Udayana saying: "With joy and the greatest delight, for your sake I am sending this monk who is like the Teacher himself, together with five hundred attendants. You should have the road and the city beautified over a distance of three and a half leagues, and I myself will come to receive him with a fourfold army. Have five hundred temples erected outside the city, and provide five hundred thrones, smaller thrones, fine-cushioned seats, footrests, footstools, and round cushions; arrange for five hundred alms-portions as well — and thereby you will acquire great merit." Such was the letter he wrote and sent.

King Udayana read the letter, and joy and the greatest delight arose in him. He had the road and city beautified over three and a half leagues, then went forth himself with a fourfold army and a retinue of many hundreds of thousands of people to receive them. With great honor he had them conducted into the city of Śrāvastī, had five hundred temples erected outside the city, had five hundred thrones, smaller thrones, fine-cushioned seats, footrests, footstools, and round cushions offered, arranged for five hundred alms-portions, and had spacious, well-spread seats set out in an open area.

The venerable Mahākātyāyana seated himself on a prepared seat at the head of the assembly of monks. Many hundreds of thousands of living beings gathered there — some drawn by curiosity, others impelled by roots of virtue from former lives.

Then the venerable Mahākātyāyana, having thoroughly understood the dispositions, latent tendencies, constitutions, and characters of that assembly, taught the Dharma in such a way that the many hundreds of thousands of living beings, upon hearing it, came to a great and profound realization. Some directly realized the fruit of stream-entry; some directly realized the fruit of once-returning; some directly realized the fruit of non-returning; and some went forth into renunciation and, by abandoning all afflictions, directly realized arhathood. Others aroused the mind of awakening on the path of a śrāvaka.

Some aroused the mind of awakening on the path of a pratyekabuddha, and some aroused the mind of awakening oriented toward unsurpassed, perfect, and complete awakening. The greater part of the assembly was established in devotion to the Buddha, in reliance upon the Dharma, and in refuge in the Saṅgha.

Now in the city of Śroṇā there lived two householders named Rgyal and Karrgyal. These two went to where the venerable Mahākātyāyana was staying, approached him, bowed their heads to his feet, and sat down to one side. Seated thus, the two householders Rgyal and Karrgyal said to the venerable Mahākātyāyana: "Noble Mahākātyāyana, may we two receive the going-forth into renunciation and the full ordination as monks in this well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya? May we practice the holy life in the presence of noble Mahākātyāyana?"

The venerable Mahākātyāyana then gave them the going-forth and conferred full ordination upon them. Having bestowed instructions and guidance, and as the two applied themselves with enthusiasm, effort, and exertion, they attained progressively higher levels of mental cultivation. Knowing this very wheel of cyclic existence to be fivefold, both agitated and unagitated, and being overwhelmed by the nature of reality — that all formations are subject to decay, downfall, dispersion, and disintegration — they abandoned all afflictions. Thus, noble sons, that supreme culmination of the holy life for the sake of which men shave their hair and beards, don the saffron robes, and, with genuine faith, go forth from home into homelessness — that very culmination they realized and accomplished in this very life through their own direct knowledge. They understood: "My birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. I shall not know any further existence." They became arhats — freed from attachment, beyond the three realms, with minds equal toward a clod of earth and gold, equanimous as space and the palm of the hand. Like sandalwood laid down, their wisdom split open the shell of the egg of ignorance. They attained the higher knowledges, supernormal powers, and the individual perfect understandings. They turned their backs on existence, on gains born of desire, and on worldly honors. They came to be worshipped, revered, and openly praised by the gods together with Indra (Śakra) and their attendants.

The two performed miracles of blazing fire, brilliant radiance, falling rain, and flashing lightning, and then passed completely beyond sorrow into the realm of nirvāṇa without remainder of the aggregates. Their relatives paid bodily honors to their bodies and caused two stūpas to be built — one for Rgyal and one for Karrgyal.

King Uttarayana went daily to the venerable Mahākātyāyana to hear the Dharma, and he described to the ladies of his retinue how noble Mahākātyāyana teaches the Dharma, sweet and ever sweeter, like a bee drawing out honey. They said: "Your Majesty, the arising of a buddha is indeed fruitful — as is shown by the fact that you listen to the Dharma. If that is so, why do you not also listen? Your Majesty, we are modest; how could we go there and hear the Dharma? If noble Mahākātyāyana himself were to come here and teach the Dharma, then we too would hear the Dharma." King Uttarayana said to the venerable Mahākātyāyana: "Noble one, the ladies of the retinue wish to hear the Dharma." He replied:

"Great King, monks do not enter among the ladies of the royal retinue and teach the Dharma. The Blessed One has forbidden monks from entering among ladies of the retinue. Noble one, then who shall teach the Dharma to the ladies of the retinue?" "Great King, nuns shall."

King Uttarayana sent a letter to King Bimbisāra with the following message: "With mutual goodwill and affection — my ladies of the retinue wish to hear the Dharma, and for that purpose it would be fitting to send some nuns." Having read that letter, King Bimbisāra went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Sitting to one side, King Bimbisāra addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable one, King Uttarayana has sent a letter saying that his ladies of the retinue wish to hear the Dharma, and requesting that some nuns be sent for that purpose. How is this matter to be accomplished?"

The Blessed One considered the matter. Reflecting on which nun would be able to discipline the women of King Uttarayana's retinue and the women dwelling in the city of Śrāvastī, he saw that nun Rimā was their disciplinarian. The Blessed One then spoke to nun Rimā: "Rimā, devote yourself to the women of King Uttarayana's retinue and to the women dwelling in the city of Śrāvastī." Nun Rimā replied: "Venerable one, I shall do as commanded." Having heard this from the Blessed One, she bowed her head at the Blessed One's two feet, and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

That same night having passed, in the early morning nun Rimā donned her lower robe, took up her begging bowl and outer robe, and entered Rājagṛha for alms. Having completed the alms round in Rājagṛha and finished the meal, she returned from the after-meal alms round, set her dwelling in order for use as needed, took up her begging bowl and outer robe, and set out with a retinue of five hundred toward the city of Śrāvastī.

King Bimbisāra also sent a letter to King Uttarayana with this message: "With mutual goodwill and affection — for your sake I am sending this great śrāvikā, praised by the Teacher, along with a retinue of five hundred. You, for your part, shall beautify the road and the city for a distance of three and a half leagues, and you yourself shall come out to receive her with the fourfold army. In the city you shall also have five hundred summer residences built, five hundred thrones, chairs, cushions with fine inner coverings, foot-rests, head-rests, and pillows provided, and five hundred alms supplies arranged. By doing this you shall gain great merit." Having sent this letter, King Uttarayana read it and felt joy and the greatest delight. He had the road and the city beautified over three and a half leagues, and himself went out to receive her with the fourfold army and a retinue of many hundreds of thousands of people; he escorted her into the city with great honor. In the city he had five hundred summer residences built, and five hundred thrones, chairs, cushions with fine inner coverings, foot-rests, head-rests, and pillows provided, and five hundred alms supplies arranged.

Day by day nun Rimā entered among the ladies of King Uttarayana's retinue and the women dwelling in the city of Śrāvastī, and taught them the Dharma.

Now King Uttarayana was skilled in the lute,

Queen Moonlight was skilled in dance, and so at a certain time King Uttarayana played the lute while Queen Moonlight danced. As she danced, he perceived the signs of decay upon her, and examining her from head to foot, he reflected: "In seven days she will die." At that moment the lute slipped from his hands and fell to the ground.

Queen Moonlight said: "My lord, was my dancing not good? What was the fault?"

"Moonlight, it is not that your dancing was poor. It is that as you danced I perceived the signs of decay upon you, and on the seventh day you will die."

Queen Moonlight prostrated herself at the king's feet and said: "My lord, if that is so, and if I have served you well, and if my lord grants it, I wish to go forth into homelessness."

The king replied: "Moonlight, since the time is right, I grant it. If, having gone forth, you abandon all afflictions and directly realize arhathood, that itself will be the end of your suffering. But if you die with residual bonds remaining and are reborn among the gods, then, having become a deity, come and visit me."

She replied: "As my lord commands."

King Uttarayana entrusted Queen Moonlight to the nun Rimā and said: "Noble one, please grant Queen Moonlight the going forth and the full ordination of a fully ordained nun in the well-taught Dharma and Vinaya. It is fitting, noble one, that you perform for her this going forth and full ordination."

The nun Rimā said: "I shall do so," and she gave her the going forth and conferred upon her full ordination. Then nun Rimā reflected, and she gave her the instruction: "Cultivate the perception of death."

Queen Moonlight began to cultivate the perception of death, and on the seventh day, when her time arrived, she passed away and was reborn among the gods of the Four Great Kings.

Now it is the nature of divine sons and daughters that shortly after birth three thoughts arise: from where one has passed away, where one has been reborn, and by what karma one has been reborn. The divine daughter Moonlight reflected: "From where have I passed away?" — and she saw that she had passed away from among human beings. "Where have I been reborn?" — and she saw that she had been reborn in the realm of the Four Great Kings. "By what karma have I been reborn?" — and she saw that she had been reborn through the very practice of the holy life in the teaching of the Blessed One.

Then the divine daughter Moonlight thought: "It would not befit my character to go into the presence of the Blessed One to see him and pay homage while dwelling in my former dwelling; I will go into his presence to see him and pay homage without relying on my former dwelling at all."

And so the divine daughter Moonlight, her earrings and jeweled hoops swaying, wearing a spotless garment, her body adorned with necklaces and ornaments, held a basket filled with heavenly blue lotuses, red lotuses, white water-lilies, and white lotuses, and with a radiance of surpassing brilliance she came in the night. She went to where the Blessed One was, and when she arrived she scattered flowers over the Blessed One, bowed her head to the Blessed One's two feet in homage, and sat to one side. In this way, through the power of the divine daughter Moonlight's radiance, the entire Kalandaka grove of Veṇuvana was filled with a great light.

Then the Blessed One, knowing the intention, the latent disposition, and the faculty of the divine daughter Moonlight —

— having fully understood her intrinsic nature, the Blessed One, while the divine daughter Moonlight sat there on that very seat, shattered with the vajra of wisdom the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection, and taught the Dharma in such a way as to bring her to a direct realization of the Four Noble Truths, causing her to actualize the fruit of stream-entry. Upon seeing the truth, she declared three times, with deliberate and heartfelt utterance: "What the venerable Blessed One has done for me in this way — this my father did not do, nor my mother, nor any king, nor the gods, nor my forebears of former times, nor any ascetics or brahmins, nor any gathering of friends, companions, or relatives. He has drained the ocean of blood and tears, freed me from the mountains of bones, closed the doors of the lower realms, opened the doors of the higher realms and liberation, and drawn my feet out from the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, placing me among gods and humans."

Then she spoke these verses:

Through your power you have closed off the lower path laden with many faults and filled with great harm, and opened the way to the higher realms. Now I have also won the path that leads beyond sorrow.

Relying on you, utterly pure, today
I have gained the unstained eye, clear and free of fault, attained the exalted peace of the noble station, and crossed to the far shore of the ocean of suffering.

Worshipped by beings — asuras, humans, and gods —
free from birth, old age, sickness, and death, rare indeed is one who sees existence as empty:
the Sage — today there is the fruit of having seen you.

Then, bowing down with her unclasped and pendant necklace trailing as she prostrated, she paid homage at his feet, arose with joy, circumambulated him to the right, and departed into the sky in the direction of the divine world.

Thereafter, the divine daughter Moonlight was like a merchant who has found great profit, like a farmer whose harvest is abundant, like a hero victorious in battle, like a patient freed from every illness — and in the very same attire in which she had come before the Blessed One, she went back to her own abode.

She thought to herself: "I have made a promise to King Udayana, and now the time has come to fulfill it." So the divine daughter Moonlight went to where King Udayana was.

At that time King Udayana was lying alone on the uppermost floor of his fine palace. She filled the space with a great spreading light and roused him with the sound of her anklet ornaments. His eyes were heavy with sleep and his consciousness was not clear, and he said: "Who are you?"

She replied: "I am Moonlight."

The king said: "Come, let us enjoy pleasures together."

She replied: "My lord, I have died and passed away at my time, and been reborn among the gods of the Four Great Kings. If you wish to meet with me again, go forth into renunciation before the Blessed One. And if in this very life you fully abandon all afflictions and directly actualize the state of arhathood, that itself will be the end of your suffering. But if you die with residual formations still remaining and are reborn among the gods of the Four Great Kings, then there you will meet with me again."

Having said this, she vanished from that very spot.

Vinaya Analysis, the seventy-first fascicle.

King Udayana, having determined in his heart to go forth that very night, rose early the next morning and said to his ministers: "Wise ones, go and see where Queen Moonlight is."

They replied: "Your majesty, she has passed away at her time."

King Udayana reflected:

"Since the goddess has urged me, it would not accord with my nature to remain a householder, dwelling within a household, fully enjoying possessions and pleasures. Therefore I shall invest the young prince Topknot with sovereign power over the kingdom, shave off my hair and beard, don the saffron robes, and with true faith go forth from home into homelessness." With this resolve, he sent for his two chief ministers, Heruka and Bhiruka, and when they had come before him, he said: "You two wise ones — just as it has been for me, so too it shall be for the young prince Topknot. You two must shield him from harm and devote yourselves unfailingly to his benefit. As for me, I am going forth into the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya." The two of them, upon hearing this, stood with their eyes filled with tears.

The king then said to the young prince Topknot: "My son, just as you have heeded my words and taken my counsel to heart, so now you must heed the words of these two chief ministers, Heruka and Bhiruka, and take their counsel to heart. As for me, I am going forth into the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya." He too, upon hearing this, sat with his eyes filled with tears.

Then King Udayana had the town crier make a proclamation throughout the city, and addressed the townspeople, the palace attendants, and the assemblies of people who had come from various districts: "Wise ones, hear me. I am shaving off my hair and beard, donning the saffron robes, and with true faith going forth from home into homelessness. Now that I have set one in my place to govern the kingdom, forgive me for whatever slight wrong I may have done you." This was the announcement he gave. The townspeople, the palace attendants, and the assemblies who had come from various districts all held the king dear, and upon hearing this, every one of them stood with their eyes filled with tears.

King Udayana then installed the young prince Topknot over the kingdom, asked forgiveness of those close to him, gave gifts to ascetics, brahmins, the poor, and the destitute, performed meritorious deeds, and, without seeking any honor, turned away from Rājagṛha and departed.

Then King Topknot, together with the queen's retinue, the young prince, the ministers, the palace attendants, and the assemblies of people who had come from various districts, followed along behind him, one after another. Escorted by many hundreds of thousands of living creatures, he came forth from the city. He paused for a while in a pleasure grove adorned with various flowering trees, possessing flowers and fruit and many streams, where swans, cranes, peacocks, parrots, pheasants, cuckoos, and śaṅgaśateka birds were calling out. He gazed back at the city from a distance and then said to King Topknot: "My son, because I have installed you to govern the kingdom by the Dharma, this is why so many hundreds of thousands of living creatures have followed after me. You too must govern the kingdom by the Dharma." Then he addressed the assembled people and said: "Wise ones, I have appointed this one as your king. Now return home and fare well." And with these words he departed.

King Topknot, together with the queen's retinue, the young prince, the ministers, the palace attendants, and the assemblies of people who had come from various districts, their eyes blurred with tears, looked back again and again for a little while, then returned to the city.

Then King Udayana made his way gradually to the city of Rājagṛha and took up residence there in a pleasure grove. He said to a certain man: "Go and report to King Bimbisāra that King Udayana is staying in the pleasure grove." The man went and reported to King Bimbisāra: "Your Majesty, King Udayana is staying in the pleasure grove." Upon hearing this, Bimbisāra rose at once and said to those who subsisted on his bounty: "Wise ones, that king comes with a great army — if he had not sent word beforehand, none of you would have known he was coming." One of them said: "Your Majesty, what army does he have? He has come with just a single attendant." King Bimbisāra thought to himself: "Since I performed the consecration of this king of royal lineage by anointing his crown, it would be improper for me to receive him into the city in an ordinary way. I shall have him enter with great honor." Knowing this to be fitting, he had the roads and the city adorned, and then went out to receive him with the four-limbed host of his army. A canopy was provided, and Udayana rode upon the back of an elephant and was escorted into the city of Rājagṛha. He was bathed with water mixed with various perfumes, beautifully adorned with robes befitting a king, with incense, garlands, materials for anointing, and various unguents, and given food; and when the weariness of the journey had been soothed, Bimbisāra spoke: "With power harmoniously rejoiced in, the kingdom flourishing — leaving behind the retinue of your queens, your young prince, your ministers, the people of the palace and your court — for what purpose have you come here? Has some other king ravaged your realm? Or has the young prince, coveting the kingship, been incited by some corrupt minister and rebelled? Or has something come between you?" Udayana replied: "It is not so, O harmonious one. I seek going forth and full ordination as a monk in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya."

Upon hearing this, King Bimbisāra rejoiced and was glad. He raised his upper robe, stretched out his right hand, and three times proclaimed aloud: "O the wonder of the Buddha! O the wonder of the Dharma! O the wonder of the Saṅgha! O the wonder of this very well-proclaimed Dharma — that such a pre-eminent being as this, having abandoned a flourishing kingdom, a flourishing retinue of queens, friends and kinsmen in their great multitudes, treasuries, granaries, and vast mansions, should wish to go forth and take full ordination as a monk in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya!" Having proclaimed this three times, he took King Udayana and went to where the Blessed One was.

At that time the Blessed One was dwelling in the presence of a great assembly of many hundreds of thousands of followers and was teaching the Dharma. The Blessed One, from a great distance, caught sight of King Bimbisāra of Magadha approaching together with King Udayana. Having seen them, he said to the monks: "Monks, this is King Bimbisāra — he is coming to me along with a new arrival. Such a birth as this Tathāgata's birth is thus: there is nothing quite like a birth ripe for taming." Having said this, he remained in silence.

King Bimbisāra prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Having sat down to one side, King Bimbisāra addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, this King Udrayana desires going forth and full ordination as a monk in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya. Out of compassion, may the Blessed One please grant him the going forth and confer upon him full ordination."

The Blessed One granted him the going forth with the words "Come, monk," and declared, "Come, monk — live the holy life." And at the very end of the Blessed One's utterance, he found himself with a shaven head and wearing patched robes, with a growth of hair and beard of just seven days, holding in his hand a begging bowl, attended by a water-pot carrier, abiding in the manner of a monk fully ordained for a hundred years.

Then this verse was spoken:

When the Tathāgata declared "Come," he was clad in body with shaven head and patched robe, and in that instant his faculties grew perfectly still — the Buddha's intention having covered over his bodily form.

Thereafter, the venerable Udrayana, having put on his lower robe in the early morning, took up his begging bowl and outer robe and went forth on alms-round in Rājagṛha. When the great multitude of people saw him, a sound rang out through all of Rājagṛha: "The Blessed One has granted King Udrayana the going forth and full ordination, and now he has entered Rājagṛha on alms-round." Upon hearing this, countless hundreds of thousands of living beings gathered together, and women who dwelt within their homes came and stood at windows, latticed windows, and balconies to look upon him.

The ministers spoke to King Bimbisāra (Skt. Bimbisāra, "the one who is the essence of form"): "Your Majesty, King Udrayana has entered Rājagṛha on alms-round, surrounded by many hundreds of thousands of living beings."

Upon hearing this, King Bimbisāra went to where the monk Udrayana was and, having arrived, addressed the monk Udrayana in these verses:

You who once commanded a thousand cities, with their proclamations of royal glory —

now you seek alms that are thrown away:
how can you not feel anguish at this?

You who used vessels of gold and silver weighed out in hundreds of measures — now you make do with an earthen begging bowl:
how can you not feel anguish at this?

You who once used clean-washed rice of śāli grain, moistened with meat —
now you carry a bowl filled with warm scraps:
how can you not feel anguish at this?

You who once wore fine wool, cotton, silk, and robes of Kauṭāmbaka cloth — now you patch together rags from charnel grounds:
how can you not feel anguish at this?

You who slept in a multi-storied mansion with doors firmly shut against the wind — now you dwell at the foot of a tree:
how can you not feel anguish at this?

You who slept on soft couches like beds of cotton — now you lie on a mat of grass:
how can you not feel anguish at this?

Your consorts, lovely and evenly matched, who lay at your side with reverence and sweet words — you have abandoned them, so many of them:
how can you not feel anguish at this?

You who traveled mounted on great elephants, on palanquins, and on horses —
now you wander the earth on foot:
how can you not feel anguish at this?

You who possessed storehouses full of great wealth and many mansions —
now you have attained to having nothing:
how can you not feel anguish at this?

Udrayana replied:

O King, one who is difficult to tame and is sustained by the food of others — that one is tamed by something not yet attained, as a yoke-post tames an ox.

King Bimbisāra said:

O King, are you not at ease?
Why do you speak as though you were lowly?
I will give you half my kingdom — enjoy your wealth as before.

O King, are you not at ease?
Why do you speak as though you were lowly?
Whatever your mind desires,
the finest of enjoyments I will give you.

Udrayana replied:

O King, whoever in this world is free from poverty by touching the Dharma of the body —
he will certainly become a god, or else will pass beyond sorrow into nirvāṇa.

Whatever lord of men has abandoned the Dharma and in its place delights in what is not Dharma — that king should be known as impoverished;
he goes from darkness into deeper darkness.

I shall instruct you in the Dharma.
O Great King, listen to me.
Having heard the Dharma, the king will go wherever he desires.

For a body devoid of virtue,
there is one supreme virtue alone:
however one takes it up and holds it, so accordingly will one follow after it.

These ten tens of a king are said to be the greatness of a person.
Yet in sons, in wives, in wealth — what pleasure is there, truly?

A son shows delight,
a wife speaks of her contentment,
a thief works to acquire wealth, and kings are freed from their bonds.

Against the one who brings the end, neither medicines nor wealth nor kinsmen can protect.
Neither all the spells and armies, nor valor and austerity can protect.

Here in this world, even gods of great power who dwell on high, long-lived — even they, when their life is spent, must wane.
Who today escapes from death?

Viṣṇu, of great power, possessed of wealth and blazing fame, who made a kingdom spread across the world, and Śiva the Destroyer, ill-omened, his dreadful sound resounding — even they could not turn death back.

O King, with vows, with austerity and practice, with deeds, with diligence, with discipline, with vast retinues and riches — how can one be free from death?

Whether one is in the middle of the sky, in the midst of the ocean, or has entered a cleft in the mountains —
there is no region anywhere, no place, where the lord of death cannot reach.

Whether one is in the middle of the sky, in the midst of the ocean, or has entered a cleft in the mountains —
there is no region anywhere, no place, where karma cannot reach.

Bones the color of a white dove, cast aside and scattered in every direction — of whatever kind they may be,
seeing them, who could rejoice in this?

Skulls the color of a conch, tossed aside like fallen water pots —
of whatever kind they may be,

seeing them, who could rejoice in this?

O King, what you call your own self — that which shades you in the heat and wraps you warmly in the cold — even that is destroyed by death.

However much a person has eaten and worn, or given away — that may be counted as one's own.
The rest will be abandoned and go elsewhere.

A treasure that no human thief can steal, that is shared with no other — is generosity, or else good deeds: these cannot be hidden by others.

As a tiger kills a deer and drags it away, so old age and death drag you swiftly along.
Your assembly of dear friends, ministers, and advisors cannot remove your illness.

Of the spent goods, the remaining grain and wealth, the gold and silver that remain — sons, wife, and retinue together think of these as their own share.

If a father dies and a son falls into debt,
the beloved son does not carry the fire for him.
When one has died, those who are as if dying themselves do not weep, and do not say "my father" or "my lord."

"He was rich" — so they call him "father" and cry with disheveled hair and tear-streaked faces.
They carry the fire before him and say: "Alas, now he becomes a god."

Covered with cloth they carry him, set the fire, and then burn him.
The kinsmen weep, and with a single piece of cloth they abandon what is burned and enjoy what remains.

Each one is born in a single birth, and likewise each one dies in a single death.

In this birth, one alone experiences suffering, and wanders through saṃsāra without a companion.

Seeing this, those who are noble do not live at home after going forth.
Free from all attachment, henceforth they will not enter a womb again.

Then King Rūpasāra, answered at length and pressed repeatedly by the monk Udrayana's confident replies, fell silent and, his confidence gone, departed.

Then King Tufthead, having for a time allowed the righteous rule of the Dharma-kingdom to continue, began to have the kingdom governed by what was contrary to the Dharma.

At that point the two chief ministers, Heruka and Bhiruka, spoke: "Your Majesty, please govern the kingdom according to the Dharma, and do not govern it by what is contrary to the Dharma. And why? Because the people of your realm are like flowering trees and fruit-bearing trees. Consider this example: flowering trees and fruit-bearing trees, when they are well cared for at the proper times, produce flowers and fruits in season without interruption through unceasing effort. Just so, when the people of the realm are well cared for at the proper times, they too will offer tribute and annual revenue in season without interruption through unceasing effort."

When those two remonstrated in this way, the king, who had meanwhile begun once more to govern the kingdom contrary to the Dharma after having allowed it to be governed according to the Dharma, would not desist even when the two spoke up three times in succession, for he was moved by the impulse toward a different existence. Enraged, he spoke to the other ministers: "Gentlemen, what is the punishment for one who countermands the command of a king of royal lineage anointed with the coronation water, even three times in succession?"

Then certain corrupt ministers spoke: "Your Majesty, what wrong has been done here? The punishment for such a one is death." And they also recited these verses:

Ministers who are corrupt and teeth grown loose and shifting, and food that has gone bad —

it is best simply to cast them out.

A minister who is wise,
skilled in discernment and in discipline, who holds his rank from the treasury — the one who does not kill such a man will be killed instead.

King Tufthead then said: "Gentlemen, these two were appointed by my father, so I will not have them killed. Nevertheless, they shall not remain in my sight." He turned those two away and appointed two other corrupt men as ministers. Those two then spoke: "Your Majesty, sesame seeds that have not been beaten, not pressed, not heated, and not squeezed do not yield sesame oil. The people under human authority are the same." The king said: "What you two have done is supremely diligent." And those two set about doing harm to the people of the realm.

Then some time later a merchant, carrying his goods and crying out news through the city, arrived at Rājagṛha. The venerable Udrayana saw him, recognized him, and said:

Why do you cry out, O Tufthead — with your retinue and assembly, are you powerful and well?
Are there no enemies encroaching upon you, and are you administering your own kingdom according to the Dharma?

The merchant replied:

Your Majesty, just so I cry out, O Tufthead.
With your retinue and assembly, powerful one — I seek no boon.
There are no enemies encroaching upon him.
Yet he governs the kingdom always contrary to the Dharma.

Then the venerable Udrayana began to question him further: "Now, among the ministers, who is chief and who is not chief? Through whose influence does Tufthead do harm to the people of the realm?" The merchant replied: "Your Majesty, the two chief ministers Heruka and Bhiruka were turned away, and two other corrupt men were appointed ministers. It is through their influence that Tufthead does harm to the people of the realm."

Udrayana then said: "Sir, go back now and cry your news. May the assembled people who remain there breathe easy and take heart. I will return there once more —

I myself will turn Tufthead back from doing harm to the people of the realm, no matter what it takes, and I will firmly set things on a course of benefit."

The merchant changed his goods, took his trading goods, and departed. He went ahead and, passing on by stages, arrived to cry the news. There he told his kinsmen privately, saying: "Friends, I took my goods and entered Rājagṛha, and there I saw the aged king. From his own lips came the message: 'Go, sir, cry your news, and let the assembled people who remain there breathe easy and take heart. I will return there once more, and I myself will turn Tufthead back from doing harm to the people of the realm, no matter what it takes, and I will firmly set things on a course of benefit.'"

These kinsmen told others, and those others told yet more, so that the news passed from ear to ear in this way, until it reached the ears of the two corrupt ministers. The two of them thought: "If the old king comes back, he will certainly reinstate Heruka and Bhiruka as the highest ministers, and that will mean harm for the two of us. Therefore we must find some way to have him killed right there on the road."

With this in mind, the two of them went to King Tufthead and said: "Your Majesty, we have heard that the aged king will come."

Tufthead replied: "He has gone forth into renunciation. Why would he come here?"

The two said: "Your Majesty, the one to whom you granted sole sovereignty over the realm — he cannot possibly be glad to have no kingship at all. He too will seek to be granted the kingship once more."

Tufthead said: "If he were to become king, I myself would become the young prince. What objection could there be to that?"

The two replied: "Your Majesty, that would not be proper. You granted him the kingship to the prostrations of thousands of joined palms — from the young prince, the ministers, the palace retinue, and the people of the realm — and then to remain again in the position of prince, having sent away the entire surrounding domain, is simply not fitting. Consider this example: it is like a man who rides atop an elephant, then descends to ride on the back of a horse, then from the horse descends to a chariot, and from the chariot descends to go on foot alone. To grant him the kingship and then oneself to remain in the position of prince is exactly like that."

Deceived by the two of them, Tufthead said: "Well then, what is to be done in this matter? How should it be accomplished?"

The two replied: "Your Majesty, you should have him put to death. If Your Majesty does not grant that he be killed and he is not slain on the road, then the corrupt ministers will band together with him and bring about Your Majesty's own death."

When these words were spoken, Tufthead sat there for a moment overcome, saying nothing, his heart wilting as though in compassion, tears welling in his eyes, his mind struggling. Then he said: "Wise ones, how could it be fitting to put one's own father to death?"

The two replied:

"Whether it be father, brother, or even a son born of oneself —
if he has entered the ranks of the enemy, let him be used to increase one's store of earth.

Have you not heard that said? And again:

If one possesses a thousand sons and all of them have boarded the same boat, yet a single enemy has arisen among them — for that one's sake, let him go under.

Have you not heard that said? And from another source:

For the sake of a house, give up one man;
for the sake of a village, give up a house;
for the sake of a district, give up a village;
and for the sake of oneself, give up the entire land.

Have you not heard that said? Your Majesty, there is nothing here that should give you pause. He must be killed — and so you should grant that he be put to death."

"If he is left alive and those youths, ministers, palace retainers, and people of the realm who are devoted to him become stirred to rebellion, that will cause harm to His Majesty without Gora having been killed. Since there is no wicked act one will not commit in the pursuit of desires, let it be done as I have said." And so it was agreed.

Then those two corrupt ministers, filled with delight, joy, and great exultation, said to the executioners: "Men, today you shall slay the old king, and his wealth and possessions shall be divided among you." Now all the palace retainers and people of the realm were devoted to that king, and so there was not a single one among them who was willing to kill him. When those two, up to three times over, tried to rouse them with offers of silver, gold, and the gift of villages and the like, not a single one was roused. Then those two, consumed and wrapped about with rage, gave orders to the palace guards: "Men, today put those people — together with their sons, wives, kinsmen, friends, and assembled relatives — in bonds." When the guards heard this they were afraid, and they said: "May His Majesty deign not to punish us — we are servants who obey royal command." And with that they tucked sharp swords under their arms and fled.

Now the venerable Uttarayana, the three months of the rains retreat having passed, and being possessed of a robe made according to Dharma and having received it in the proper manner, took up his alms-bowl and robe and went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, he prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable sir, I wish to go and make proclamation through the city." The Blessed One declared: "Uttarayana, go. Keep in mind the work that is to be done as your own task." Then the venerable Uttarayana prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

That very same night having passed, in the early morning Uttarayana put on his lower robe, took up his alms-bowl and robe, and entered Rājagṛha for alms. Having made his alms-round through Rājagṛha and completed the meal, he returned from the alms-round of the afternoon meal. He set out what was needed for making use of his lodging, took up his alms-bowl and robe, and went forth, drawn onward by the power of karma.

Karma leads beings far away;
by karma from afar are beings led.
Wherever karmic deeds come to fruition — thither karma utterly draws one on.

Going to where the city proclamation was being made, he walked through it gradually to the end, and at a cliff-face beside the road he entered for alms. From there, having made his alms-round and moved on, he encountered those executioners, and they saw him. He too recognized them, and he agreed to spend the night with them together in a pleasure grove. Then he began to question them:

How is it in Rājagṛha? Does he of the topknot, with his retinue and host, stand strong and free of sickness?
Does no adversary's faction stir against him, and does he govern his kingdom with Dharma?

They replied:

Majesty, even so — he of the topknot in Rājagṛha, with his retinue and host, stands strong and untroubled.
No adversary's faction has arisen against him,
yet the kingdom he ever governs contrary to Dharma.
You, O noble man, whatever supreme and evident thing is in accord with your own way — that you should do.
Whatever is in accord with the way of that peaceful one — that shall become visible and near this very day.

The venerable Utraya then said: "Wise ones, does he not take pleasure in coming here today?" They replied: "Majesty, he takes no pleasure in it." He said: "Wise ones, if that is so, let him turn back and not come."

They then spoke in verse:

O brave man, where do you go back to now?
The prince, while alive, takes no pleasure in your coming.
We are those appointed by the wicked king —
it is to put you to death, O sir, that we have come.

The venerable Utraya said: "Wise ones, are you then men who have come to kill me?" "Majesty, we are the executioners sent to put you to death."

The venerable Utraya then reflected: "The Blessed One declared to me, 'Go, Utraya, and keep in mind the task that is yours to do.' This, then, is what that means." And understanding that saṃsāra is in every respect wretched, without essence, and subject to destruction, he said to them: "Good fellows, the aim for the sake of which I went forth has not yet been attained by me. Wait just a moment while I accomplish my own purpose."

They conferred among themselves and said: "Majesty, let it be so."

Then the venerable Utraya seated himself in cross-legged posture against a tree, settled like a king of serpents coiled in sleep, and remained with peaceful composure.

Now the Blessed One had declared that there are five benefits to extensive learning: mastery of the aggregates (skandhas), mastery of the elements (dhātus), mastery of the sense bases (āyatanas), mastery of dependent origination, and the ability to teach and instruct others in its meaning without dependence on anyone else. Rousing his diligence upon this, Utraya understood directly this very fivefold wheel of saṃsāra, both its stirring and its stillness. Overwhelmed by the very nature of the dissolution of all formations — their decline, downfall, dispersion, and destruction — and having abandoned all afflictions, he realized in this very life by his own direct knowledge that supreme end of the holy life for the sake of which sons of good family shave hair and beard, don the ochre robe, and go forth from home into homelessness with sincere faith, and he understood: "Birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. The task is done. There is no further becoming beyond this." He became an arhat, free from desire for all three realms, his mind equal toward a clod of earth and gold, equal toward sky and the palm of his hand, like sandalwood placed there, his mind's eye having split open the sheath of ignorance. He attained the three knowledges (vidyās), the superknowledges (abhijñās), and the discriminating awarenesses (pratisaṃvids). He turned his back on the gains and honors and pleasures of existence and desire, and became worthy of veneration, reverence, and open praise by gods together with Indra and his company.

Then, having attained arhatship, the venerable Utraya, in the joy and bliss of the discriminating awareness of liberation, spoke these verses:

The monk Utraya, though now freed from bonds, afflictions, and obscurations alike, is not yet free today from the king's law.

Having said this, he addressed those executioners: "Good fellows, what I had to attain I have now attained. Now obtain what you yourselves came to obtain." They said: "Majesty, if the king of the topknot asks us what the elder king said at the time of his death, what shall we report to him?"

Say to him these words: "For the sake of a kingdom you slew your father, thereby generating abundant demerit. I shall pass into nirvāṇa; you shall go to the Avīci hell."

Say further these words: "You have committed two heinous acts without interval: the taking of your father's life, and the taking of the life of a fully ordained monk, an arhat whose defilements are exhausted. By these two acts you will be compelled to dwell for a very long time in the great hell of Avīci, the hell of ceaseless torment. Therefore, turn away from all manner of evil deeds — and by doing so, you will be purified, utterly exhausted of them, and brought to their final end."

Then the venerable Utraya thought to himself: "It would not be right for that being to be cast down into the great hell. I shall go by means of supernatural power." But when he attempted whatever means of supernatural power he could, the weight of that being's karma was such that not even the mere appearance of movement arose, let alone any supernatural power.

Then, among those executioners, one who was devoid of compassion and utterly indifferent to the world beyond drew his sword from its scabbard, cut off that head at the neck, and cast it to the ground.

Thereupon the Blessed One smiled. It is the nature of things that whenever the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, smile, rays of light issue from their mouths — blue and yellow and red and white, and of colors like crimson, crystal, and silver. Some of these rays go downward, and some go upward. Those that go downward descend, now cool, into the hot hells — the Reviving hell, the Black Line hell, the Crushing hell, the Wailing hell, the Great Wailing hell, the Hot hell, the Intensely Hot hell, the Avīci hell, the Blistering hell, the Burst-Blister hell, the Grinding-Teeth hell, the Shrieking hell, the Groaning hell, the Cracked-Like-a-Blue-Lotus hell, the Cracked-Like-a-Lotus hell, and the Cracked-Like-a-Great-Lotus hell — and they descend warm into whichever hells are cold. These rays cut off the various individual torments of those beings, and those beings think among themselves: "O friends, have we died and passed on from here? Or have we been reborn elsewhere?" In order to arouse faith in them, the Blessed One sends forth an emanation. Seeing that emanation, they think: "O friends, we have neither died and passed on from here, nor have we been reborn elsewhere. Rather, it is by the power of this being, never seen before, that our various individual torments have been cut off." Developing sincere faith of mind toward that emanation, and having exhausted the karma that would have led them to experience the hells, they take rebirth among those gods and humans who are fit vessels for the truths, in whatever realm they are to become so.

Those rays that go upward enter among the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, the Heaven Free from Strife, the Joyful Heaven, the Heaven of Delight in Emanations, the Heaven of Mastery over Others' Emanations, the Heaven of Brahmā's Assembly, the Heaven before Brahmā, the Great Brahmā Heaven, the Heaven of Minor Radiance, the Heaven of Measureless Radiance, the Heaven of Streaming Radiance, the Heaven of Minor Virtue, the Heaven of Measureless Virtue, the Heaven of Abundant Virtue, the Cloudless Heaven, the Heaven of Merit-Born, the Heaven of Great Fruit, the Heaven of Non-Great, the Heaven of Unafflicted, the Heaven of Clear Appearance, the Heaven of Great Vision, and the Heaven of Akaniṣṭha. There they proclaim the sound of the words "impermanence, suffering, emptiness, and selflessness," and the following two verses are to be composed, caused to arise, and spread:

Enter into the Buddha's teaching, and strive to apply yourself fully.
Like a great elephant in a bog of mud,
crush the army of the lord of death.

Whoever practises this disciplining Dharma with thorough and careful heedfulness, having fully abandoned the wandering of birth, will make an end of suffering at last.

This verse too was spoken.

Then those rays of light traversed the great thousandfold world system of three thousand worlds and returned, following close behind the Blessed One. If the Blessed One wished to prophesy past karma, those rays would sink into his back. If he wished to prophesy future karma, they would sink into his front. If he wished to prophesy rebirth in the hell realms, they would sink into the sole of his foot. If he wished to prophesy rebirth as an animal, they would sink into the heel of his foot. If he wished to prophesy rebirth as a hungry ghost, they would sink into his big toe. If he wished to prophesy rebirth as a human, they would sink into his knee. If he wished to prophesy a kingdom of a wheel-turning king endowed with the power of might, they would sink into his left palm. If he wished to prophesy a kingdom of a wheel-turning king, they would sink into his right palm. If he wished to prophesy rebirth as a god, they would sink into his navel. If he wished to prophesy the awakening of a śrāvaka, they would sink into his mouth. If he wished to prophesy the awakening of a pratyekabuddha, they would sink into the curl of hair between his brows. If he wished to prophesy the unsurpassable, perfectly complete awakening, they would sink into his crown protrusion.

Thereupon those rays of light circled the Blessed One three times and sank into the soles of his two feet.

Then the Venerable Ānanda joined his palms together and addressed the Blessed One in verse:

The thousand rays adorned with a variety of colors emerged from the gate of his mouth, and with them he illuminated all directions,
like the spreading canopy of a parasol of sunlight.

And again he spoke these verses:

Free from agitation, despondency, and pride abandoned, the buddha who is the cause supreme of all beings' wandering, the Victor for whom there is no cause to subdue enemies, does not show a smile with fingers white as conch shells.

Therefore, relying on your own mind and knowing the time,
O Sage, foremost of the herd, lord of ascetics and kings of the born, to those who have heard and who are endowed with doubt, please, with firm words of speech and with virtue that is noble, dispel whatever uncertainty has arisen.

As a salt mountain king stands firm and unshaking, the buddhas who are protectors do not suddenly smile.
Since you now smile after having been so steadfast, all these assemblies of people long to hear why.

The Blessed One declared: "Ānanda, it is so, it is exactly so. Ānanda, the Tathāgatas, arhats, perfectly and completely awakened buddhas do not smile without cause and without condition. Ānanda, hear this:

The monk Uttarayana is free from the knot of binding, from the thorn, and likewise liberated from obscuration, yet today he is not free from the law of the king.

Ānanda, King Kṣudrapada, who resides in the city of Rājagṛha, is surrounded by evil companions, and he has had the monk Uttarayana — who had attained arhathood — deprived of life. Because he deprived his own father, an arhat, of life, he will assuredly be reborn in the great Avīci hell."

"Venerable one, has the Venerable Uttarayana indeed attained arhathood and been deprived of life?" "Ānanda, Uttarayana has attained arhathood and been deprived of life."

Upon hearing this, the Venerable Ānanda sat weeping, with tears streaming down his face.

Then those executioners took the Venerable Uttarayana's begging bowl and robe, and staff, and went into the city proclaiming the news aloud. They went to those two corrupt ministers and said to them: "The old king has been killed." When those two heard this, joy and supreme joy arose in them, and they went to where King Cūḍapakṣa was and said: "May Your Divinity rejoice! Now the kingdom of Your Divinity is free of thorns. The enemy of Your Divinity, whoever he was, has been slain." "Who was my enemy?" "Your Divinity, it was the old king." "How is it known that he has been killed?" The two pointed to the executioners and said: "Your Divinity, these men are the executioners, and they have slain him."

When King Cūḍapakṣa saw them, he said: "Wise ones, what power did the old king have over me?" "Your Divinity, what power did he have? Only this begging bowl, robe, and staff." When King Cūḍapakṣa saw these, he fainted and fell upon the ground. Water was sprinkled over him, and when he had revived he said: "Wise ones, what did the old king say at the time of his death?" "Your Divinity, as the old king was being deprived of life, he spoke these words:

For the sake of the kingdom you slew your father, and thereby you have gathered great demerit.
I shall pass fully into nirvāṇa, while you will go to the Avīci hell."

And furthermore he said these words: "You have committed two heinous acts without interval — the separation of your father from life, and the separation of the monk, the arhat, the one whose defilements are exhausted, from life. Because of these, you must dwell for a long time in the great Avīci hell, the hell of unceasing torment. Therefore turn back from evil, from evil deeds! If you do so, karma will be worn away, exhausted, and brought to its complete conclusion."

Pierced and tormented by the dart of grief, he was shaken as a blue lotus is buffeted by the wind. He summoned his two chief ministers Heruka and Bhiruka and said: "Wise ones, why did you two not restrain me from acting in that way?" The two replied: "If Your Divinity did not keep us in your sight, how could we have restrained you?" He then removed those two corrupt ministers from his presence and reinstated Heruka and Bhiruka as chief ministers. The two corrupt ministers went into hiding and secretly dug two holes in the two stūpas of the Venerable Rgyal and Skar-rgyal, placed two kittens inside, and each day fed them a piece of meat, training them with these words: "By the truth and the words of truth by which you two, Rgyal and Skar-rgyal, deceived the world with trickery and caused what was given in faith to be squandered — by that truth and those words of truth, you were born in the wretched existence of a cat. By that truth and those words of truth, eat the meat, circumambulate your own stūpas, and then enter your own holes." When those two had been well trained in this manner, the two corrupt ministers went before the queen of Uttarayana and said to her: "Your Ladyship, your son has become pale and thin, feeble, emaciated, and unable to keep his body together — why do you remain indifferent?" She replied: "Since you two yourselves caused all that to happen to him, what am I now to do?" The two said: "Your Ladyship, does the rope not fall wherever the bucket falls?" She said: "Very well, I understand that much — but if I am to keep secret his killing of his father, who will keep secret the killing of the arhat?" The two replied: "Your Ladyship, the killing of the arhat we two will keep secret." She said: "If that is so, very well." She then went before her son and said: "My son, why have you become pale, wan, thin, feeble, emaciated, and unable to keep your body together?" He replied:

"Your Ladyship, why do you too speak in such a way? How could I not become pale, wan, thin, feeble, emaciated, and unable to keep my body together? For my two corrupt ministers deceived me and led me to commit two acts without interval: the separation of my father from his life, and the separation of the fully ordained monk, the arhat whose defilements are exhausted, from his life. Because of these, I shall have to dwell for a very long time in the great hell of Avīci, the hell of unrelenting torment. How could I not become pale, wan, thin, feeble, emaciated, and unable to keep my body together?"

She replied: "My son, grant me your fearlessness, and whatever is lacking I will provide."

He said: "Mother, please speak. Tell me how things stand."

"My son, he was not your father. For I, in order to wash away the stain of my monthly impurity, took pleasure together with certain other men, and you were born of that."

He thought: "In that case, it was not killing my father," and understanding this, he said: "Mother, if that is so and there was no killing of a father, then how is the killing of the arhat to be resolved?"

She replied: "My son, I will have the learned among the wise speak to this, and they will resolve it."

Having said this, she departed. She summoned those two corrupt ministers and said: "I have already cleared away the matter of his killing his father. Now you two must also clear away the killing of the arhat."

King Crest-Topknot then commanded his ministers: "Gather together all who are learned in knowledge." The ministers gathered all the learned, and those two corrupt ministers were also assembled there.

Then King Crest-Topknot said to them: "O wise ones, I have killed an arhat. How is this to be resolved?"

At that, all the men of the royal retinue began to speak in conflicting ways. Some said: "Who ever saw His Majesty himself directly kill an arhat?" Others said: "Your Majesty, arhats are like the omniscient ones — they travel through the sky." Then those two corrupt ministers said: "Your Majesty, why should you be troubled about this?"

He replied: "And why do you two speak in the same way — what is there to grieve about? Will you two not say that it was you yourselves who caused the arhat to be killed?"

The two said: "Your Majesty, if there are no arhats, can there be any killing of arhats?"

He said: "With my very own eyes I directly witnessed those two — Jaya and Kārtikeyajaya — performing miracles of blazing, shining, sending down rain, and emitting lightning, and then passing away into the nirvāṇa-realm that is the nirvāṇa without remainder. And yet you two say: 'If there are no arhats, can there be any killing of arhats?'"

The two replied: "Your Majesty, those two deluded the world with illusion, causing the faithful to waste their acts of giving. By that fault they were born into the miserable existence of cats, and even now they dwell each at its own stūpa — this Your Majesty can see directly for himself."

The king said to his ministers: "O wise ones, if that is so, come here and let us go to see whether it is true or not. Let a proclamation be made throughout the entire city that Jaya and Kārtikeyajaya were born as cats, that they are sitting at their own stūpas, and that they have gone before the king." When this proclamation had spread everywhere, many hundreds of thousands of living beings were seized with curiosity and followed along behind the king.

Then those two flawed ministers spoke before the king and his retinue of many hundreds of thousands of beings: "Jaya and Kārtikeyajaya, listen! By the truth, and by the power of those words of truth — the truth that you two deceived the world with trickery, squandered the gifts offered in faith, and were therefore born into the miserable existence of cats, and are now dwelling each at its own stūpa — by that truth and those words of truth, let these two cats rise, let each circumambulate its own stūpa, and let each re-enter its own den." No sooner had these words been spoken than the two cats emerged each from its own den, accepted food scraps, circumambulated their respective stūpas, and re-entered their own dens. Many hundreds of thousands of living beings witnessed this.

The two flawed ministers then said: "O king, did you see that?" The king replied: "Yes, I saw it." The two ministers said: "Your Majesty, this being so, there are no arhats in the world — it is nothing but people's flattery and empty talk."

At that moment, whatever conviction the king had previously held — that arhats do indeed exist in the world — vanished entirely. Those who had previously been without faith now acquired the view that arhats do not exist. Those who had been undecided were seized with doubt. And those who had been faithful became dejected, displeased, and filled with dismay.

Then King Śikhin reflected: "If there are no arhats in the world, why should I make alms-rounds available to the venerable great Kātyāyana with his five hundred monks, and to the nun Rimā with her five hundred nuns?" And so he cut off the alms of the monks and nuns, and the monks and nuns departed the city with the sound of a proclamation going forth. The venerable great Kātyāyana and the nun Rimā, however, looking to those who were yet to be tamed, remained right there in that place.

Some time later, when King Śikhin came back out of the city with a proclamation going before him, the venerable great Kātyāyana had entered the city for alms. Seeing the king coming, Kātyāyana thought it would not be fitting for the king to catch sight of him and feel displeasure, and so he withdrew to one side and stood there. King Śikhin saw him standing to one side. The king said to his ministers: "O wise ones, why is it that the great Kātyāyana, upon seeing me, has gone to one side and is standing there?" Following behind, two of the chief ministers, Heruka and Bhiruka, spoke: "Your Majesty, it has occurred to the venerable great Kātyāyana in his heart that, since Your Majesty has gone off to Śakra's goddess Gaśed and Gegtsen, if he were to be seen and cause displeasure, that would not be fitting. And he also thought that the dyeing work is arduous, and it would not be fitting for the Dharma robes to be soiled with dust." The king said nothing and went on his way.

When the venerable great Kātyāyana had finished his alms-round through the city and was departing, King Śikhin went inside, and Kātyāyana likewise withdrew to one side and stood there again. King Śikhin saw him standing there once more to one side. The king then said to his ministers: "O wise ones, the first time it was the reason we know — that great Kātyāyana saw me and went to one side. What then is his reason for going to one side and standing there now?" Following behind, the two flawed ministers spoke: "Your Majesty, this one has said that he should avoid any contact with the dust of this parricide here."

Now that king was altogether undiscerning, and so when he heard those words, he was seized entirely by rage. He said to his whole retinue: "O wise ones, let each and every one among you who delights in me throw a clod of earth upon this shaven-headed ascetic." And all the throng of people threw a clod each. The king had a great army, and as each one threw a clod upon the venerable great Kātyāyana, an enormous mound of earth came to rest upon him. Yet the venerable great Kātyāyana manifested himself within it, sitting in a cross-legged posture made not of leaves, and remained there. When those clods scattered away, cowherds and cattle-herders who saw it stood around mocking. Then the two chief ministers, Heruka and Bhiruka, came following behind and arrived at that place, where the two of them asked: "O wise ones, what is this?" Those people said: "That quarrelsome, patricide king has buried the noble great Kātyāyana — who was without fault, who did no harm — under earth." The two of them, with tears streaming down their faces in the semblance of weeping, began to clear away the earth together with the cowherds and cattle-herders. The venerable great Kātyāyana then rose up, and the two prostrated at his two feet and asked: "O noble one, what is this?" He said:

It is karma — what else could come to pass?

The two then said: "O noble one, the Crest-Knot, along with all the common people — what will be the karmic maturation of their having done such an act as this?" He said: "In seven days from now, the city of Śravastī will be crushed and buried under earth. How will it unfold, O noble one?" "O pair of worthy ones, first, on the first day, a great cold wind will arise and the city of Śravastī will be stripped bare of rocks, gravel, and grass. On the second day, a rain of flowers will fall. On the third day, a rain of garments will fall. On the fourth day, a rain of silver will fall. On the fifth day, a rain of gold will fall. After that, those who live in the environs around the city of Śravastī and who have acted in accordance with karma will enter the city of Śravastī, and when they have entered, on the sixth day a rain of precious jewels will fall. On the seventh day, a rain of earth will fall." The two said: "O noble one, will we two also have a share in that karma?" "O fair-faced pair, you two have no share in that karma." "O noble one, if that is so, how shall we two depart from this city?" He said: "O fair-faced pair, have a tunnel dug from your own houses to the river, moor a boat at the house, and stay there. When the rain of precious jewels falls, load the boat with jewels and flee." The two then prostrated at his feet, entered the city of Śravastī, went before the king, and said: "Has the noble great Kātyāyana been harmed at all? Or was he truly buried under earth?" He said: "O wise pair, is he alive?" "Your Majesty, he is alive." "What did he say?" "Your Majesty, he said this: 'In seven days from now, the city of Śravastī will be crushed and buried under earth.'" "How will it unfold?" The two said: "Your Majesty, he said this: first, on the first day, a great cold wind will arise and the city of Śravastī will be stripped bare of rocks, gravel, and grass.

On the second day, a rain of flowers will fall. On the third day, a rain of garments will fall. On the fourth day, a rain of silver will fall. On the fifth day, a rain of gold will fall. After that, those dwelling in the vicinity of the city of Śrāvastī who have acted in accordance with the karma for it will enter the city of Śrāvastī, and once they have entered, on the sixth day a rain of jewels will fall. On the seventh day, a rain of earth will fall.' So they reported."

The two corrupt ministers said: "Your Majesty, what good could come from giving alms to a brahmin and then cutting him off? Since the king gave alms to one accompanied by five hundred followers and then cut him off, leaving him buried under the earth, what else could he say other than what he has said? How could he possibly speak words of better omen than these?" King Topknot thought to himself, "That may be true." And the two chief ministers, Heruka and Bhiruka, turned their faces away, wrung their hands together, and left.

Now Heruka had a boy-child named Ngosang, and Bhiruka also had a girl-child named Ngosangchen. Heruka offered the boy Ngosang to the venerable great Kātyāyana and said: "Noble one, if there are some wholesome roots in this child, please confer the going-forth upon him. If there are none, let him be your servant." Bhiruka likewise offered the girl Ngosangchen to the nun Rimā and said: "Noble one, if there are some wholesome roots in this girl, please confer the going-forth upon her. If there are none, there is in Kauśāmbī a householder friend of mine called Gangchen — please entrust her to him." She accepted the charge.

The nun Rimā then took the girl Ngosangchen, departed from the city of Śrāvastī by her supernatural powers, entrusted the girl to the householder Gangchen in Kauśāmbī, and conveyed in full the message she had been told to deliver. The venerable great Kātyāyana remained there himself.

The two chief ministers, Heruka and Bhiruka, had a tunnel dug from their house all the way to the river, moored a boat at the riverside, and waited. In due course, on that very day, a great cold wind arose and stripped the city of Śrāvastī bare of rocks, gravel, and grass.

On the second day, a rain of flowers fell, and the two corrupt ministers said: "Your Majesty, word has it that seven heights of hailstones have fallen north of us — yet even here this rain of flowers has fallen, so before long a rain of garments will fall." On the third day, a rain of garments fell, and the two corrupt ministers said: "Your Majesty, this rain of garments has fallen here, so before long a rain of silver will fall." On the fourth day, a rain of silver fell, and the two corrupt ministers said: "Your Majesty, this rain of silver has fallen here, so before long a rain of gold will fall." On the fifth day, a rain of gold fell, and the two corrupt ministers said: "Your Majesty, this rain of gold has fallen here, so before long a rain of jewels will fall." After that, those dwelling in the vicinity of Śrāvastī who had acted in accordance with the karma for it entered the city of Śrāvastī, and once they had entered, on the sixth day a rain of jewels fell. The two chief ministers, Heruka and Bhiruka, had the boat loaded with those jewels and fled.

Heruka then had a city built in another direction and named it Heruka's Fort, and it came to be known by the name Heruka's Fort.

Bhiruka likewise had a city built in another direction and named it Bhiruka's Fort, and it came to be known by the name Bhiruka's Fort, Bhiruka's Fort.

On the seventh day, a rain of earth began to fall, and a high sound and a great noise arose throughout the city of Śrāvastī. The king said: "Wise ones, what is this high sound and great noise?" The ministers said: "Your Majesty, a rain of earth has fallen." The king said: "Wise ones, if that is so, search for the two chief ministers Heruka and Bhiruka — find out where they are." When they began to search, they soon perceived that the two had fled, and they reported to the king: "Your Majesty, those two have fled and are nowhere to be found."

Then King Tuft-of-Hair himself began to flee, but the non-human beings blocked the gates. The youth Ngo Sang said: "Noble one, what is this high sound and great noise that has arisen in the city?" The venerable Mahā-Kātyāyana said: "Child, reach out the bowl through the window." He put the bowl out through the window, and it filled about halfway. The venerable Mahā-Kātyāyana thought: "There is still some domain remaining." Then when the bowl was put fully outside, it filled to the brim in an instant, and the venerable Mahā-Kātyāyana thought: "Now there is no domain left — we must go."

Then the goddess who permanently dwells in Śrāvastī went to where the venerable Mahā-Kātyāyana was, approached him, prostrated at his two feet, and said: "Noble one, I too shall come and attend upon the noble one." He accepted her offer.

The venerable Mahā-Kātyāyana said to Ngo Sang: "Child, take hold of the hem of my robe and come along." The boy took hold of the hem of the robe, and Mahā-Kātyāyana led the youth Ngo Sang and traveled through the sky above by miraculous power. The goddess who permanently dwells in Śrāvastī likewise followed after him by her own miraculous power, and the city of Śrāvastī was swallowed up by the earth.

They eventually arrived at a rocky cliff called Kharāvaṇa, and there they settled on a threshing ground. The venerable Mahā-Kātyāyana placed the youth Ngo Sang on the threshing ground and went out for alms. By the power of that goddess, grain began to multiply on that threshing ground, and a certain man who was staying there saw the youth and went up to him and said: "Ho there, child! Through your power the grain has multiplied on the threshing ground." The boy replied: "It is not through my power that the grain has multiplied on the threshing ground. It is like this: the goddess who permanently dwells in Śrāvastī has come here, and she is sitting somewhere nearby — it is through her power that the grain has multiplied on the threshing ground."

That man went toward her and, touching her two feet, said: "Goddess, I am going to my village and will return before long — in the meantime please hold these keys and this crooked key, and I ask that you give them to no one other than me." She took them, and that man then went to the rocky cliff and assembled the crowd of people dwelling at the rocky cliff and said: "Wise ones, the goddess who permanently dwells in Śrāvastī has come here and is staying at the threshing ground, and through her power the grain has multiplied on the threshing ground. I have given her the keys and the crooked key, and I said to her: 'I am going to my village and will return before long — hold these keys and crooked key and give them to no one other than me.'" Therefore he earnestly petitioned the village people that if his eldest son were invested with authority, he himself would be willing to part with his life.

"In that case, the goddess will never depart from our dwelling, and you will prosper with abundant resources, and all epidemic diseases will be pacified." With that assurance, they invested his eldest son with authority, and he himself then parted from his life.

After that, they adorned the entire place with incense and flowers, and decorated it with parasols and victory banners. Then, taking offering cakes, they went to where the goddess was, fell at her two feet, and said: "Goddess, we beseech you to remain here." She replied: "I am in attendance upon the noble great Kātyāyana, and so there is no dwelling here for me." The venerable great Kātyāyana then said: "Goddess, reflect upon from whom you received the keys and the crooked key." She turned this over in her mind, and just then, seeing that the man's time had come, she addressed the assembly of people dwelling at that place: "Wise ones, I will remain here by solemn pledge — but only if you give the same care and honour to the noble one's dwelling as you give to mine." They agreed to this, and they provided for the dwelling of the venerable great Kātyāyana in just the same manner as they provided for the dwelling of the goddess. Whatever lamps had been placed at the goddess's dwelling were taken and installed at the dwelling of the venerable great Kātyāyana as well.

Now, as the goddess was carrying a lamp and going on her way, a man sitting by a wall saw her and thought to himself: "This goddess is going to meet with the noble great Kātyāyana — she is on her way to him." She perceived his thought, and in her anger she reflected: "The assembly of people dwelling at this rocky cliff are all acting with wicked minds — they are falsely slandering the noble great Kātyāyana, who is entirely without the stench of sensual desire." So she unleashed a fear-terror upon the rocky cliff, and a great many of the people died. When the bodies of the dead were brought out, they numbered in the tens of thousands upon tens of thousands. The assembly of people dwelling at that place summoned the diviners and asked: "What has caused this?" They replied: "The goddess is enraged." The people then began to beg her for pardon, and she said: "You falsely slander the noble great Kātyāyana, who is entirely without the stench of sensual desire." They said again: "Goddess, please be patient — not one among us will fail to honour him." She replied: "I will be patient, but only by solemn pledge — if you attend upon the noble great Kātyāyana in just the same way you attend upon me, then I will be patient." They said: "We will honour the goddess with even greater distinction — please be patient." She was satisfied, and they then served the venerable great Kātyāyana with the most exceptional and distinguished honour.

The venerable great Kātyāyana accepted the rains retreat there, and he brought the blue-grey boy along, and told the goddess. The goddess said: "Noble one, please give me some token of yours, and I will make offerings to it and serve it." He gave her a begging bowl, and she fashioned it into a tent-like canopy and had it made into a stūpa, and had a festival celebrated for it. It came to be known as the Festival of the Begging Bowl, and even to this day monks who venerate stūpas offer their veneration to it.

The blue-grey boy then seized hold of the hem of the venerable great Kātyāyana's robe and hung there dangling from it as he walked, and some cowherd boys and cattle-herders saw this.

They called out loudly, "Dangling, dangling!"— and so that cry became the name by which the people of that region were known, called "the Dangers."

The venerable great Kātyāyana then went to a certain rocky cliff, and there he left the blue-grey boy at the foot of a verdant tree and went out on his alms round. At that rocky cliff it happened that the king had died without an heir, and the people of the royal court— ministers and subjects— had gathered together and were speaking: "Wise ones, who should be consecrated as king?" Some said: "Whoever is renowned for great merit and power." Others said: "But how shall we know such a person?" And others said: "Let us appoint scouts to search." They appointed scouts, and those scouts began to search in every direction. They found the boy sleeping at the foot of the verdant tree, and they began to read his marks and signs. Now as much as the shadows of the other trees fell toward the east, and shifted toward the east, and had moved to the east, they saw that the shadow of that one tree had not left the boy's body. Having seen this, they began to deliberate: "Wise ones, this boy is renowned for great merit and power— let us consecrate him as king." They woke him and said: "Boy, accept the royal kingdom." The boy said: "I do not seek the royal kingdom for myself— I am in attendance upon the noble great Kātyāyana." The venerable great Kātyāyana heard this, and he thought to himself: does this boy or does he not have the karma to become king? He looked and saw that he did, and so he said: "Son, accept the royal kingdom, but conduct it thus: rule by the Dharma." The boy agreed. They consecrated him, and they installed the blue-grey boy as king there— and from that time the kingdom of the blue-grey boy came to be called by the name "the Kingdom of the Blue-Grey."

The venerable great Kātyāyana then went to the region of Bogkā. There, the mother of the venerable great Kātyāyana had been reborn in Bogkā, and when she saw the venerable great Kātyāyana she said: "Son, it has been such a long time since I have seen you! Son, it has been such a long time since I have seen you!" And from both her breasts milk began to flow in streams. The venerable great Kātyāyana addressed her gently, calling her "Mother, mother," and she gave the venerable great Kātyāyana food to eat. Then the venerable great Kātyāyana, having fully understood her mind, her latent dispositions, her constitution, and her character, taught her the Dharma that leads to the thorough individual understanding of the Four Noble Truths of the noble ones— just as though, while she remained seated on that very seat, the twenty-towering peak of the mountain of the view of the perishable collection (the view that takes the aggregates to be a self) had been shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and the fruit of stream-entry had been made directly manifest. When she had seen the truths, she said with great feeling three times over: "What the venerable one has done for me is this: my father did not do it for me, my mother did not do it for me, the king did not do it for me, the gods did not do it for me, my ancestors of former times did not do it for me, ascetics (śramaṇas) and brahmins did not do it for me, friends, intimates, and the circle of kinsmen did not do it for me. He has dried up the ocean of blood and tears, freed me from the mountains of bones, closed the gates to the lower realms, opened the gates to the higher realms and to liberation, lifted my feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and placed me within the company of gods and humans." And she spoke further in verse:

What a good son should do for a mother who has borne hardship — that you have done for me.
My mind has turned toward the higher realms.

Having drawn me forth from the lower realms, you strove greatly to place me in the higher realms and in liberation.
You have performed this difficult task well.

As a merchant who finds his profit,
so I have found the higher realms.
To rely closely upon spiritual friends (kalyāṇamitras) is indeed a good thing.

Then the venerable Mahākātyāyana, having established that young woman in the Truths, said, "Mother, look — I have come." She replied, "My son, if that is so, give me some token of yourself, so that I may make offerings to it and venerate it." He gave her his staff, and she fashioned a stūpa from it. It was installed there, and the stūpa became known by the name "The Staff Stūpa." Even to this day, monks who bow before stūpas bow before it.

The venerable Mahākātyāyana, wishing to travel to the central country, went as far as the land of Sindhu. There, a goddess who dwelt along the northern road spoke to the venerable Mahākātyāyana, saying, "Noble one, give me too some token of yourself, so that I may make offerings to it and venerate it." He thought, "The Blessed One has declared that one should not carry laced sandals in the central country," and so thinking he gave her those very laced sandals. She caused them to be installed as an object of veneration, and the place became known to some as "The Sanctuary of the Sandal Lord," while others knew it as "The Foundation of the Sandal."

The venerable Mahākātyāyana eventually arrived at Śrāvastī, and the monks, seeing him, said, "Welcome, venerable one! Welcome! How was your journey — pleasant?" He replied, "Friends, the journey was in part pleasant and in part painful." The monks asked, "How was it pleasant? How was it painful?" He said, "What I did for the sake of sentient beings — that was the pleasant part. As for the painful part: King Topknot and the crowds of people dwelling in the city of Resounding Sound crushing me with their feet, and the two foremost ministers Heruka and Bhiruka fleeing in great distress — that was the painful part."

Some monks of little purpose condemned him, saying, "This one is a father-killer. He struck down the venerable Utrāyaṇa, an arhat, blameless and harmless, who had realized arhatship. What happened here is but the flower of what he has done — the fruit will come later."

The monks, filled with doubt, brought their doubt before the awakened one, the Blessed One, to have it resolved. "Blessed One, what karma did Utrāyaṇa himself perform, that he was born into a wealthy household of great riches and possessions, went forth into the Blessed One's teaching, abandoned all afflictions, directly realized arhatship, and then was killed by a sword?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, Utrāyaṇa himself had accumulated a store of karma, with conditions fully transformed, abiding like a flame, certain to ripen — and the karma that Utrāyaṇa himself had done and accumulated will not be experienced separately by anyone else. Monks, karma that has been done and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been done and accumulated ripens within the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense sources.

Actions do not perish
even across a hundred aeons.
When the conditions and the time are gathered, they ripen as fruits
for those who bear a body.

Monks, in a time long past, when no buddhas had arisen in the world, there appeared in the world certain inferior pratyekabuddhas (solitary buddhas) — compassionate toward the poor and destitute, delighting in remote and isolated dwellings, living alone like a rhinoceros, and serving as a field of merit for the world.

At a certain place there was a cliff, and a hunter sat there. Not very far from that cliff there was a small lake that had become a resort for many deer and birds. Day after day the hunter would go there, setting out snares, traps, and numerous nets in order to catch the deer and birds, to injure them, and to torment them in ways that were contrary to their nature. And those snares, traps, and nets of his did indeed prove effective.

Then on another occasion, a solitary buddha who was wandering through the region came to that cliff. Having agreed to spend the night at a divine dwelling place there, he arose early the next morning, put on his lower robe, took up his alms bowl and outer robe, and went out to collect alms at that cliff. After going on his alms round there, he thought: "This divine dwelling is busy and frequented throughout the day. Let me take my meal in the peaceful and secluded place outside the cliff." So he came out from the cliff, saying to himself, "This is peaceful, this is peaceful," and walked toward that lake. When he arrived, he placed his alms bowl and water vessel side by side at the edge, washed both feet, rinsed both hands, drew water, gathered leaves that had fallen, sat down, performed the act of eating, rinsed both hands again, washed his mouth, and set the bowl and water vessel back in their proper places. Then, having washed both feet, he leaned against a tree and sat in cross-legged posture as a king of serpents lies in repose, his body composed, his bearing entirely serene. And that very day the hunter did not catch a single one of the deer.

The next morning the hunter rose early and went toward that lake. He began to search through the snares, traps, and nets, but he did not find a single deer. He thought: "If my snares, traps, and nets are indeed effective, what is the reason that today not a single deer was caught?" So he began to walk around the shore of the lake, and he caught sight of a human footprint. He followed the tracks and came upon the solitary buddha sitting there in serene composure. The hunter thought: "These renunciants whose minds are calm take delight in places such as this. If I do not kill him, he will surely destroy my livelihood. I must kill him by any means." Thus, filled with a merciless mind and utterly indifferent to the next world, he drew a poisoned arrow, nocked it all the way to the ear of his bow, and shot it into the vital spot of that solitary buddha.

The great-souled solitary buddha thought: "This hunter, afflicted and extremely wretched as he is, will come to ruin — that would be wrong. Let me grant him a straight departure by hand." And with that, like a king of swans spreading his wings, he rose up into the sky above, and began to perform miraculous displays: blazing with fire, radiating brilliant light, raining down water, and sending forth lightning. Ordinary worldly people are quick to fix their minds on miracles. And so the hunter fell prostrate at the feet of that solitary buddha, as though a great tree had been cut down at its roots, and said: "O true field of merit, please descend! Please descend!"

"Please lead me, sunk in the swamp of affliction, up from my very roots."

Out of compassion for that hunter, the solitary buddha descended from the sky above to where he stood. Then the hunter, having cleaned the wound and carefully bound it up, spoke: "Noble one, please sit down and rest. If you would be so good as to accept treatment with a golden salve, I will provide that too." The solitary buddha thought to himself: "What there was to be obtained through this body of pus and filth — I have already obtained it. Therefore, let me now enter the realm of nirvāṇa without remainder." And so, right there before that very hunter, he rose up again into the midst of the sky, displayed various miraculous feats, and then passed into nirvāṇa — the realm of nirvāṇa without remainder.

Now the hunter was a man of wealth, and so he gathered all kinds of fragrant wood, built a pyre of the body, burned it, quenched the remains with milk, placed the bones in a golden vase, and had a bodily stūpa erected at a crossroads on the great highway. He raised canopies, victory banners, and pennants, and made offerings of perfume, garlands, incense, powders, and cymbals. Then he prostrated at the feet of the stūpa and made this aspiration prayer: "Whatever unwholesome karma I have created by harming so excellent a field of merit as this — may it not ripen upon me in accordance with that deed. And through the root of virtue that is this offering I have made, may I be born wealthy, with abundant riches and great prosperity; and may I attain such qualities as these: pleasing a Teacher far more excellent than this one, and never causing him distress."

Then the Blessed One said: "Monks, the person who was the hunter at that time and on that occasion was the monk Uttarayāṇa. Through the karmic maturation of the deed of wounding a solitary buddha with a poisoned arrow, he was tormented for an aeon in the great hell Avīci without respite; and from the remainder of that same karma, for five hundred lifetimes in that very same lake he was reborn as a wild deer, struck again and again by poisoned arrows, dying each time his appointed hour came. And even now, though he has attained arhatship, he passes into nirvāṇa pierced through by a weapon. But through the offering he made and the aspiration he set, he has now been born wealthy, with abundant riches and great prosperity; he went forth into my teaching, abandoned all afflictions, and directly realized arhatship; and by this he pleased me — the Teacher who surpasses even ten billion solitary buddhas — and never caused me distress.

"Monks, thus the maturation of deeds that are purely dark is purely dark; the maturation of deeds that are purely bright is purely bright; and the maturation of deeds that are mixed is mixed.

"Therefore, monks, abandon deeds that are purely dark and those that are mixed, and strive after deeds that are purely bright. Monks, train yourselves accordingly."

Again, the monks fell into doubt, and asked the Blessed One — the Buddha who cuts through all doubt — their question: "Venerable one, what deed did King Topknot (Śikhin) and the crowd of citizens dwelling in the city of Resounding Noise and the Venerable Mahākātyāyana commit, so that Mahākātyāyana was overpowered by the poison of jealousy? And what did Heruka and Bhiruka, the two chief ministers, do that caused them to flee?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, those very ones found a convergence of karma, a full transformation of conditions, and remained close by, like light itself — those deeds, being inescapably bound to arise, were performed and accumulated by those very ones themselves — and no one other than they will experience the separate ripening of karma performed and accumulated. Monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the outer element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense sources. As it is said in verse:

Even were a hundred aeons to pass, karma once gathered does not perish —
when conditions and the time converge, it ripens as fruit for embodied beings.

Monks, long ago in the past, in a certain rocky mountain valley, there lived a householder. He took a wife from his own station in life, and with her he played, rejoiced, and made merry. While they were playing, rejoicing, and making merry, a son was born to them. Again, while they were playing, rejoicing, and making merry, a daughter was born to them; and these two children they raised and nurtured until they grew up. Now, when girls the same age as that daughter would receive suitors, no suitor ever came for her. At a time when no buddhas had appeared in the world, certain pratyekabuddhas — poor and destitute, compassionate toward the wretched and lowly, delighting in forest hermitages at the world's edge, solitary as rhinoceroses, worthy objects of offering for the world — had arisen in that world. On one occasion, as a pratyekabuddha was wandering through the district, he came to that rocky mountain valley. The daughter, sweeping the house, tossed the dustcloth from atop a dust heap, and it struck the head of that pratyekabuddha as he walked on his alms round. The girl saw that it had struck him, yet not even a thought of remorse arose in her mind. Then, as fate would have it, that very same day a suitor came for her, and her brother asked her about it: "Today you received a suitor — what did you do to bring this about?" She replied: "Today I threw a dustcloth at a renunciant." He broke into a smile. The girl then spread the word to other girls, and they in turn spread it to still others, until there arose among the girls of the world this wicked and pernicious view — that whichever girl had no suitors coming for her should throw a dustcloth at a pratyekabuddha, and a suitor would come to her. Such was the nature of that sinful view that arose. Because the great accomplished ones fear being disrespected, that pratyekabuddha departed from that rocky valley. Then those girls began throwing dustcloths at seers endowed with the five higher knowledges, and when those too departed, they began throwing them at their own parents. Now, there were two virtuous householders living in that rocky valley, and these two said: "Wise ones, we must put a stop to this growth of ignoble conduct!" And the two of them restrained and put an end to it.

Monks, at that time and in that era, the girl who threw the dustcloth at the pratyekabuddha — she is none other than this very King Topknot (Śikhin). The crowd of people who were living in that rocky valley — they are these very crowds of people who dwell in the city of Resounding Noise; and through the karmic ripening of their having thrown dustcloths at the pratyekabuddha, the seers, and their parents, they were crushed to the ground. The two householders who put a stop to it — they are the two chief ministers Heruka and Bhiruka; through the ripening of that karma they were caused to flee. The girl's brother, who smiled at the news —

— he is none other than the great monk Kātyāyana himself. Through the karmic ripening of that smile he was covered with flesh. Had the great monk Kātyāyana not understood such a gathering of qualities as this, he too would have been weighed down by flesh and made to suffer in an unseemly way.

Monks, it is thus: the karmic ripening of actions that are entirely dark is entirely dark; the karmic ripening of actions that are entirely bright is entirely bright; and the karmic ripening of actions that are mixed is mixed.

Therefore, monks, abandon actions that are entirely dark and mixed, and strive instead toward actions that are entirely bright. Monks, train yourselves accordingly.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada (Anāthapiṇḍada, "feeder of the destitute," the great lay patron who purchased the grove).

In the city of Kauśāmbī there lived a householder named Suvarṇaśreṣṭhin — wealthy, possessed of great riches and abundant resources. His house stood near the palace of King Śarpa, and each morning he would rise before dawn and go to inspect the full extent of his affairs. Now, because he was resonant with gold, King Śarpa knew from the resonance of that sound that the man had one hundred thousand pieces of gold stored away.

Some time later, King Śarpa was sitting in his place of counsel and said to his ministers: "Wise ones, the householder Suvarṇaśreṣṭhin rises before dawn each and every morning and goes himself to inspect his own affairs in full. It is said that he has one hundred thousand pieces of gold stored away — so why does he trouble himself with labor?" The ministers replied: "Your Majesty, how could he possibly have one hundred thousand pieces of gold stored away? If he did have one hundred thousand pieces of gold stored away, why would he trouble himself with labor?" The king said: "Wise ones, if you do not believe it, summon the householder Suvarṇaśreṣṭhin and ask him." They summoned the householder Suvarṇaśreṣṭhin, and the king asked him: "Householder, do you have one hundred thousand pieces of gold stored away?" He replied: "Your Majesty, yes. If it please you, please accept them." "Householder, I am not seeking gold for my own purposes — I merely asked whether you had it or not." He replied: "Your Majesty, it is exactly as Your Majesty already knows." The king said: "Householder, because you are resonant with gold, I knew it from the resonance of your sound."

Because the king had come to know it from his resonance, the householder Suvarṇaśreṣṭhin thenceforth came to be known as the householder Ghoṣavān — "the resonant one."

The king then said to him: "Householder, since you have become wealthy, why do you yourself take on supervision and engage in the full work of your affairs?" He replied: "Your Majesty, if I did not myself take on supervision and attend to my own affairs in full, my resources would neither grow and expand nor become abundant — and Your Majesty would not come to know me as one resonant with gold." The king asked: "Householder, why do you not travel by elephant or horse?" He replied: "Your Majesty, I am a man of the household, a commoner — it would not be fitting for someone like me to travel by elephant or horse."

The king thought to himself: "Could a person like this be put to work in the affairs of the kingdom? I know he should be made a minister, and none other." And so he said: "Householder, become a minister — I will put you to work in the affairs of the kingdom together with the others." He replied: "Your Majesty, such a command is not fitting. I am a commoner, and it is proper that I follow up on the work of my own fields and affairs — it is not fitting that I become a minister." The king understood that, pressed in this way again and again, he would surely be forced to accept sooner or later; and so, pressing him firmly, he did indeed make him accept.

Then the king made him a minister, and the householder Gāṅgeya began to carry out the affairs and duties of the king with Dharma and reason. He overshadowed all the other ministers, and they, seized with jealousy and discontentment, gathered together and said: "Wise ones, now that we have been overshadowed by the householder Gāṅgeya in this way, what is to be done about him?" Some of them said: "Why is there any need to do anything? So long as he has not yet taken firm and permanent root, we should have the king cut him down with punishment." Others said: "Not by wrongdoing — let it be done in that way." And so they all gathered and went before the king and said: "Your Majesty — who are you, Sire?" He replied: "What cause do you have for doubt? I am the king — who else would I be?" They said: "Your Majesty, Gāṅgeya is the king — you are not. If he so desires, he will have Your Majesty deposed, crown himself, and make himself the sovereign lord of the royal realm." The king said: "Wise ones, why would things become like that? He is one who places Dharma foremost — how could he act in such a way?" They replied: "We will make it plain before Your Majesty's own eyes." And so at a certain later time, when the householder Gāṅgeya was surrounded by plaintiffs and defendants seeking livelihood from the king, and had entered the royal palace — the royal palace being full to the brim with crowds of people — and after he had performed the affairs and duties of the king and came back out of the royal palace, and the royal attendants who had been standing in front also came out together with him so that the king sat without his retinue, those ministers then said to the king: "Your Majesty, do you see? What we submitted to you is precisely this: if he so desires, he will have Your Majesty deposed, crown himself, and make himself the sovereign lord of the royal realm."

The king thought to himself: "For now, this must be examined." And so he began to observe him in his coming and going. Now at a certain time a caravan leader drove a horse-train along the northern road to Kauśāmbī, and the king instructed Gāṅgeya: "Purchase horses for a hundred thousand in gold." He purchased the horses for a hundred thousand in gold. Then the king instructed Gāṅgeya: "Give half of the hundred thousand and say these words: 'I have already paid the full hundred thousand.'" He replied: "Your Majesty, that is not proper. If this were done, henceforth no one who trades in horses or any other merchant would ever come here again. Therefore, let Your Majesty give half of the hundred thousand from the royal treasury, and I will give the other half." The king said: "Householder, if you speak those same words of mine, what is wrong with that?" He replied: "Your Majesty, I would not endure bringing about suffering in many lifetimes for the sake of the suffering of a single life." Even when the king spoke to him three times, he could not be moved. Then the king said to the ministers: "Wise ones, what is the penalty for one who three times defies the command of a king consecrated with royal unction?" The ministers replied: "Your Majesty, the penalty for that is execution." He said: "Wise ones, if that is so, I hereby dismiss the householder Gāṅgeya." The ministers instructed the executioners: "Wise ones, His Majesty has commanded — execute the householder Gāṅgeya." But the king secretly instructed those same executioners: "You are not to kill the householder Gāṅgeya — you are to terrorize him in the following manner."

They placed a garland of karavīra flowers around his neck and led him through the middle of the city toward the place of execution. His kinsmen came forward and said to him: "Householder, do as the king has commanded, and do not cause yourself to be killed." He replied: "Have I broken any righteous command of the king? If the king kills someone who is innocent and has done no wrong, then let him kill — I cannot bring about suffering across many lifetimes for the sake of one life's suffering." The executioners led him to the place of execution and said: "Householder, do as the king has commanded and do not cause yourself to be killed." He replied: "Have I broken any righteous command of the king? If the king kills someone who is innocent and has done no wrong, then let him kill — I cannot bring about suffering across many lifetimes for the sake of one life's suffering." The executioners then brought him before the king and said: "Your Majesty, the householder Gāṅgeya speaks thus." The king said: "Householder, I have no desire to kill you — I wished only to test you in this way." He replied: "If it was Your Majesty's intention to test me, and you have placed me in such a situation, then had I failed the test, what would have become of me? Your Majesty, if you are pleased with me, please grant me leave to give gifts and to make merit." The king said: "Householder, if that is so, you have my leave — give gifts as generously as you please and make merit." Then the householder Gāṅgeya had a house of giving built, but appointed no steward to oversee its distribution, and announced: "Wise friends, if there should come here any ascetic (śramaṇa) or brahmin or anyone else who bears signs and marks not seen before and who is of distinguished bearing, inform me of it."

Now it came to pass that some five hundred sages were traveling through the central region, having come from the south. As they moved along the road one by one, they entered a forest path and went inside a grove, where their water ran out and, being without water, tormented by thirst, they began to wander back and forth along that forest path. As they wandered to and fro, at no great distance they saw a verdant blue-green direction where a flourishing tree stood, and some of them said: "Wise friends, in that blue-green direction there appears to be a flourishing tree — let us go there, for there is likely water. Come, let us proceed." The others said: "Good, let us do so." They set off, and when presently they saw there was no water, they began to make supplication: "Wise friends — whatever god (deva), nāga (nāga), yakṣa (yakṣa), garuḍa, gandharva, human being, or great serpent dwells in this place and in this tree — give water to us five hundred sages who are tormented by thirst."

Presently, from that very tree there emerged a figure adorned with every kind of ornament, holding a golden vessel brimming with water. The sages cupped their hands and received it and began to drink. When they tasted it, the water was possessed of eight qualities: it was cool, sweet, light, soft, clear, free of bad odor, harmless to the throat when drunk, and soothing to the stomach once drunk. When they had drunk their fill, they filled their vessels, offered words of blessing, rose up, and departed. Then a thought arose among them:

"Wise friends, having witnessed such a marvel as this, we have failed to ask who you are and by what karma you came to be born here — that is a failing on our part. Let us go back and ask." So all of them gathered together, turned back, and stood before that tree and said: "O tree — whether you are a god, a nāga, a yakṣa, a garuḍa, a gandharva, a kinnara, or a great serpent dwelling here — you who have satisfied us as we traveled the path through this desolate wilderness, afflicted, distressed, suffering, and brought to the verge of death, with water possessing the eight qualities — tell us who you are and by what karma you were born here."

Then, just as words arose from that tree, it said: "Wise friends, the people of Jambudvīpa are difficult to convince, so how should I speak when no one will believe who I am or by what karma I was born here?"

The sages said: "Friends, how could we not believe what we see directly before our eyes? Speak without hesitation."

It said: "Wise friends, if that is so, then listen. I will speak of who I am and by what karma I was born here. In the land of Kośala, in the city called Śrāvastī, there lived a householder named Anāthapiṇḍada. I dwelt at the gate of his house as a doorkeeper. Because he gave food to the destitute, beggars who came from various distant lands would arrive repeatedly and ask me which house was the house of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada. I would extend my right hand and say to them, 'This here is the house of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada.' I then saw how those people would depart with their hands full, their vessels full, having obtained wealth and gained what they sought. Seeing this, it produced in me the most intense joy. It is by that karma that I was born among the gods of the class of the Four Great Kings, and I dwell in this tree. That is why my right hand is exceedingly radiant, luminous, and resplendent."

They praised him with words of blessing and departed.

After some time, when they had gone to another region, their food and drink ran out. Tormented by hunger and thirst, they began to search everywhere. Then, not very far away at all, a great tree appeared with lush, gleaming green leaves. They said: "Wise friends, a great tree with lush, gleaming green leaves has appeared. In the past too it was from just such a tree that we came here drawn by the vessel of water. Perhaps a little of our need will be met." So they went there and began to make a request: "Wise friends — whatever god, nāga, yakṣa, garuḍa, gandharva, kinnara, or great serpent dwells in this land and in this tree — give food and drink to us, five hundred sages who are tormented by hunger and tormented by thirst."

Just then words arose from that tree: "Wise friends, not far from here there is a small pond, and beside it stands a tree. At the foot of that tree sits a full clay pot filled with cooked rice. Eat and drink from it and take away as much food and drink as you desire."

They went there, and they found a pond made beautiful by geese, kāraṇḍava ducks, and cranes. Beside it stood a tree, and at its foot they saw a full pot of cooked rice along with various cooked vegetables. They bathed there, ate, drank water, filled their round vessels with water, took away as much food and drink as they wished, spoke words of blessing, and departed.

Then a thought arose among them: "Wise friends, having witnessed such a marvel and yet failing to ask who you are and by what karma you were born here — that is a failing on our part. Let us go back and ask." So all of them gathered together, turned back, and stood before that tree and said:

"Whatever god, nāga, yakṣa, garuḍa, gandharva, human, or great serpent dwells in this tree — it is you who, when we were harmed, exhausted, and miserable on the road through the wilderness, on the verge of death, satisfied us with water possessed of eight qualities and with food. Tell us who you are and by what karma you were born here."

Thereupon a voice arose from that tree: "Wise friends, the people of Jambudvīpa are difficult to convince. Were I to tell you who I am and by what karma I was born here, you would not believe me. What then would be the use of speaking?"

The sages replied, "But we perceived all this with our own eyes — how could we not believe? Speak without hesitation."

It said: "Wise friends, if that is so, then listen, and I will tell you who I am and by what karma I was born here.

In the land of Kośala there was a city called Śrāvastī, and in it there lived a householder named Anāthapiṇḍada, who gave food to the destitute. On a rocky crag there lived a brahmin who had fallen into poverty. He thought: 'In Śrāvastī there is the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, who gives food to the destitute. If I go to him, something may come of it.' So he went to him.

Now the householder Anāthapiṇḍada was wishing to offer a meal to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha, and had gone to the Jeta Grove for that purpose. The brahmin saw him there and said: 'Householder, invite me as a guest for food.' The householder replied: 'Brahmin, come along — let us go to the Jeta Grove, and eat there.' So the brahmin went with him.

As they were on their way, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada found a pot of yogurt on the road, and gave it to the brahmin, saying: 'Brahmin, offer this pot of yogurt to the Saṅgha.' Anāthapiṇḍada then satisfied the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha with excellent food, and the brahmin too offered that pot of yogurt to the Saṅgha.

After the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha had taken their midday meal, Anāthapiṇḍada began distributing food to the laypeople. To the other laypeople he gave excellent food, but to that brahmin he gave poor food. The brahmin said to him: 'Householder, those who have gone forth have properly undertaken the trainings — it is fitting to give excellent food to them first. But we laypeople appear not to have properly undertaken the trainings. Why then do you give excellent food to the other laypeople and poor food to me?'

Anāthapiṇḍada replied: 'Brahmin, these laypeople have also properly undertaken the trainings — they have taken the restoration ceremony with its eight limbs.'

The brahmin said: 'Householder, if I too take the restoration ceremony with its eight limbs, will you then give me excellent food as well?'

Anāthapiṇḍada said: 'I will.' So the brahmin took the restoration ceremony with its eight limbs.

Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada satisfied him with excellent food. After eating, the brahmin departed. Anāthapiṇḍada said: 'Brahmin, wait a moment — there will be water to drink.' He drank the water and left.

By the time the sun had set, he was not very far from Śrāvastī, at a rocky crag, where he took up lodging in a brahmin's house. That brahmin said to him: 'Brahmin, eat some food.' He replied: 'I will not eat food.' The other brahmin said: "

'Why not?' He replied: 'I have taken the restoration ceremony with its eight limbs from the ascetic Gautama.' The other brahmin said to him: 'Brahmin, if you will eat just a little, that would be fine. But if you will not eat, you may not remain in my house.' So he ate at the wrong time and the restoration ceremony was broken.

Now, the brahmin who had been staying at the rocky crag, who had taken the eight-limbed restoration ceremony and broken it — that is myself. Having taken the eight-limbed restoration ceremony and not kept it in its entirety, I could have been reborn among the gods of the Thirty-Three. But because I took the eight-limbed restoration ceremony and then ate at the wrong time, thereby breaking the restoration ceremony, I was instead reborn among the gods of the realm of the Four Great Kings, and I now dwell in this very tree. That is why the gods of the realm of the Four Great Kings know me as the divine son Broken-Restoration, great in miraculous powers and great in might.

End of the seventy-third bundle of the Vinaya Vibhaṅga.

Those sages were utterly astonished and said: 'O wise ones, we sages have remained in ascetic conduct until this very time and do not know what the fruit of it will be. Yet this divine son, Broken-Restoration, while he was still a brahmin, took the eight-limbed restoration ceremony, and even though he broke it, he was reborn among the gods of the realm of the Four Great Kings. Let us too go to the place where he took the eight-limbed restoration ceremony.' Having resolved thus, they set out from Śrāvastī and eventually arrived in stages at Kauśāmbī. The people who served as attendants at the almsgiving of the householder Gāndika saw them and went to report to the householder Gāndika, saying: 'Householder, you had instructed us that if we saw anyone with signs and features not seen before we should inform you.' And so they had arrived and were standing at the gate. He said: 'Let them in.' When they were let in and the householder Gāndika saw them, he asked: 'O wise ones, where have you come from?' They said: 'Householder, from the southern road.' He said: 'O wise ones, what marvels have you seen or heard along the southern road?' They said: 'Householder, let alone the other marvels we have previously seen and heard — just listen and we shall tell you the marvels we have seen and heard most recently.' He said: 'O wise ones, speak, and I shall listen to these marvels.' They then related to the householder Gāndika in full detail everything that had happened, and when the householder Gāndika heard it he was utterly astonished. He gave them food and said: 'O wise ones, where are you going?' They said: 'Householder, we are going to Śrāvastī.' 'O wise ones, what is there?' 'Householder, there is the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, upon whom the divine son Broken-Restoration relied when he took the eight-limbed restoration ceremony.' He said: 'O wise ones, if that is so, then he is a friend I have not yet met. Please spend the rains retreat here this very night, and when the rains retreat is over, I will travel together with you.' They stayed there for the rains retreat, and when the rains retreat was over, they set out for Śrāvastī. The householder Gāndika said to the lord of the eastern region, Bhadra the king of fragrant earth: 'Your Majesty, I have some small business to attend to in Śrāvastī. If Your Majesty permits, I shall go there.' The king said: 'Householder, if that is the case, go, accomplish your aim, and return quickly.'

With the king's permission, he departed together with those five hundred seers, and traveling by stages they arrived at Śrāvastī and took up residence in a pleasure grove. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada heard that the householder Gāndika had arrived and was residing in a pleasure grove. Having heard this, he thought to himself: 'It would not be in keeping with my character to have the householder Gāndika lodge here without my knowledge. I shall receive him with great honor.' And so he received him with great honor, eased the fatigue of travel, and gave him food.

Then, when the seers had arrived, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada greeted them with the customary words of welcome — "Well come!" — and said: 'Wise ones, where have you come from, and what brings you here?' They replied: 'Householder, give to us as well what you gave to the divine youth at the restoration ceremony.' He said: 'Wise ones, I do not recall. Householder, we shall remind you.' 'Wise ones, very well.' After they had reminded him, he said: 'Wise ones, shall you receive it from me, or from the Blessed One?' 'Householder, from whom did you yourself receive it?' 'Wise ones, from the Blessed One.' 'Householder, if that is so, then we too shall receive it from that very same source.' 'Wise ones, excellent — do so.' And with that he led them to where the Blessed One was.

At that time the Blessed One was seated before an assembly of many hundreds of monks, teaching the Dharma. The Blessed One saw the householder Anāthapiṇḍada coming from afar. Having seen him, he said to the monks: 'Monks, do you see the householder Anāthapiṇḍada coming from afar?' 'Venerable One, we do.' 'Monks, this householder Anāthapiṇḍada comes accompanied by a birth, and among the births of a Tathāgata, there is none other quite like the birth of one who is to be tamed in this way.'

Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, together with his retinue of five hundred seers, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada addressed the Blessed One in these words: 'Venerable One, these five hundred seers wish to receive from the Blessed One the restoration ceremony endowed with eight branches. For that purpose, may the Blessed One teach the Dharma in such a way that they will take refuge in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, and will come to receive the status of lay practitioners.'

Then the Blessed One, having fully understood the aspirations, latent dispositions, elements, and natures of those five hundred seers, taught the Dharma in such a way that, upon hearing it, those five hundred seers directly realized the fruit of non-return by individually and correctly comprehending the Four Noble Truths.

Having seen the truths, they touched the Blessed One's two feet and implored him: 'Venerable One, we wish to go forth and receive full ordination in this well-taught Dharma and Vinaya, to attain the status of monks and to practice the holy life in the presence of the Blessed One.' The Blessed One conferred the going forth upon them with the words "Come, monks," and then declared: "Come, monks — practice the holy life!" And at the very moment of the Blessed One's words, their heads became shaved, they were wearing stitched robes, there appeared on them just seven days' growth of hair and beard, their hands were holding begging bowls, and they were accompanied by carrying-vessels and water-pots — and they abided in a manner befitting monks who had received full ordination a hundred years before.

Again it was said in verse:

When the Tathāgata spoke the words "Come, monks," their bodies, wearing stitched robes with shaven heads, were in that very instant stilled in their faculties, and by the Buddha's intention their forms were clothed.

The Blessed One then gave them instruction, and through their enthusiasm, effort, and striving, they abandoned all mental afflictions and directly realized arhatship. As arhats freed from attachment throughout the three realms, with minds equal toward clay and gold, equanimous as space and as the palm of a hand, their wisdom had split open the door-panel of the cave of existence as though it were sandalwood placed there — and they had attained knowledge, higher knowledge, and individual perfect understanding. They turned their backs on continued existence, on gain born of desire, and on honor. They became worthy of veneration, praise, and direct proclamation by the gods of the faculties and of the lesser faculties.

Then the householder Dāṅgcan went to where the Blessed One was, arrived, bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet, and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the Blessed One instructed the householder Dāṅgcan thoroughly with a Dharma discourse befitting the occasion, leading him to take it up correctly, praising him correctly, and gladdening him completely. And what was that Dharma discourse befitting the occasion, as given formerly by the blessed buddhas — it was this: the discourse on generosity, the discourse on ethical conduct, the discourse on higher realms, the faults in savoring the objects of desire, defilement and purification, renunciation and the benefit of complete seclusion — and he taught extensively the factors concordant with the side of purification.

When the Blessed One saw that Dāṅgcan's mind was pleased, his mind at ease, his mind joyful, his mind free of obscuration, and that he was endowed with the fortune and capacity to know the teaching of supreme quality, then the blessed buddhas taught what is the teaching of supreme quality, namely: he taught extensively the Four Noble Truths of the noble ones — suffering, the origin of suffering, cessation, and the path.

Just as a clean cloth free of any stain, when dipped in dye, takes the color excellently — so too the householder Dāṅgcan, while seated on that very seat, directly realized the Four Noble Truths: suffering, the origin of suffering, cessation, and the path.

Then the householder Dāṅgcan, having seen the Dharma, attained the Dharma, known the Dharma, reached the depth of the Dharma, crossed beyond doubt, crossed beyond uncertainty, not relying on another in the Teacher's teaching, not led by others, having attained fearlessness with regard to phenomena — rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, turned toward the Blessed One, joined his palms, and bowed. He then addressed the Blessed One in these words:

"Venerable One, I have entered the stream. Venerable One, I have entered the stream. Venerable One, I take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the Saṅgha of monks — may I be accepted as a lay practitioner. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I take refuge with sincere and wholehearted faith."

The Blessed One then said to the householder Dāṅgcan: "Householder, what is your name?"

"Venerable One, my name is Noldaṇ. The Eastern King raised me up from the rank of Dāṇḡcan, and for that reason people call me 'Householder Dāṇḡcan.'"

"Blessed One, please proceed to Kauśāmbī. For as long as I live, I will serve the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks with food, alms-round provisions, lodging, medicine for illness, and all medicinal requisites."

"Householder, is there a monastery in Kauśāmbī?"

"Venerable One, there is none."

"Householder, the monks intend to travel to, journey to, and dwell wherever there is a monastery."

"Blessed One, please proceed there. I will ensure that a monastery is established in Kauśāmbī and that the monks will travel, come, and dwell there. I will see to it."

The Blessed One remained silent toward the householder Dāṇḡcan, and by that silence gave his consent. The householder Dāṇḡcan understood from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been given. He prostrated at the feet of the Blessed One, touching his head to the ground, and withdrew from the Blessed One's presence. He completed and accomplished all the affairs and business that needed to be done in Śrāvastī, and then returned to where the Blessed One was. Having arrived, he prostrated at the feet of the Blessed One and addressed him in these words: "Blessed One, please grant me a companion monk, so that together with him I may build a monastery for the Blessed One."

The Blessed One considered which monk would be the one to guide the householder Dāṇḡcan with his retinue and the assembled people of Kauśāmbī, and he saw that they were to be guided by the venerable Mahākudraka. The Blessed One then addressed the venerable Mahākudraka: "Kudraka, attend to the householder Dāṇḡcan with his retinue and to the assembled people dwelling in Kauśāmbī." The venerable Mahākudraka accepted this charge from the Blessed One in silence.

That very night passed, and in the early morning the venerable Mahākudraka dressed, took up his bowl and robes, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. Having made the alms round through Śrāvastī and taken his meal, he returned from the final round of alms, put away his sitting mat as was his custom of use, took up his bowl and robes, and set out in the company of the householder Dāṇḡcan. Turning in the direction of Kauśāmbī, he traveled stage by stage along the way and in due course arrived at Kauśāmbī.

Now the householder Dāṅgan, even before entering Kauśāmbī, went from park to park, from pleasure grove to pleasure grove, from grove to grove and to outlying areas, searching for a suitable site on which to build a monastery for the Blessed One — one neither too far from nor too near to Kauśāmbī, quiet and without commotion by day, with little noise and little murmuring by night, and with few mosquitoes, insects, wind, sun, and contact with venomous snakes. Searching thus, the householder Dāṅgan saw that his own pleasure garden, situated neither too far from nor too near to Kauśāmbī, quiet and without commotion by day, with little noise and little murmuring by night, and with few mosquitoes, insects, wind, sun, and contact with venomous snakes, was exactly such a place. Having seen this, he thought to himself: "This site is excellent — I will have a monastery built here for the Blessed One."

Then the householder Dāṅgan and the venerable Mahākudūṣin had a monastery built in that pleasure garden for the Blessed One — a monastery furnished with lofty entrance porticos, with windows, with circular windows, and adorned with balustrades.

When the monastery had been built and was complete, the householder Dāṅgan said to the venerable Mahākudūṣin: "Noble one, what is the measure of the resting stages that the Blessed One requires along the road as he travels?"

"Householder, it is like that of a wheel-turning king (cakravartin)."

"Noble one, and what is the measure for a wheel-turning king?"

"Householder, the resting stages of a wheel-turning king as he travels along the road are ten leagues apart."

The householder Dāṅgan then had resting places prepared every ten leagues, and sent a messenger into the presence of the Blessed One with this request: that the Blessed One travel to Kauśāmbī, and that he, Dāṅgan, would attend upon the Blessed One together with the community of monks with robes, alms-food, lodging, articles for the sick, and medicinal requisites for as long as they lived.

The messenger went before the Blessed One and conveyed this request. The Blessed One then addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'The Blessed One will travel through the countryside on an excursion. Whoever among you wishes to travel through the countryside on an excursion together with the Tathāgata, let them take up their robes."

The venerable Ānanda, having heard the Blessed One and accepted his command with the words "As you instruct, reverend one," announced to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One will travel through the countryside on an excursion. Whoever among you wishes to travel through the countryside on an excursion together with the Tathāgata, let them take up their robes."

Then the Blessed One — tamed, surrounded by a retinue that was tamed; peaceful, surrounded by a retinue that was peaceful; liberated, surrounded by a retinue that was liberated; at ease, surrounded by a retinue that was at ease; subdued, surrounded by a retinue that was subdued; arhats, surrounded by a retinue of arhats; free from attachment, surrounded by a retinue free from attachment; resplendent, surrounded by a retinue that was resplendent — set out.

He was surrounded by a herd of bulls as a supreme stallion is surrounded by his herd. He was surrounded by a company of young elephants as a great bull elephant is. He was surrounded by a company of fanged beasts as a lion is. He was surrounded by a flock of geese as the king of geese is. He was surrounded by a company of birds as the garuḍa is. He was surrounded by a company of disciples as a brahmin is. He was surrounded by a company of the sick as a skilled physician is. He was surrounded by companies of troops as a hero is. He was surrounded by those who had entered the path as a guide is. He was surrounded by a company of merchants as a caravan leader is. He was surrounded by a company of followers as a merchant chieftain is. He was surrounded by a company of ministers as a king of a fortress is. He was surrounded by a company of a thousand princes as a wheel-turning king is. He was surrounded by a company of lunar mansions as the moon is. He was surrounded by a company of a thousand rays as the sun is. He was surrounded by a company of gandharvas as Dhṛtarāṣṭra (the Guardian of the Region) is. He was surrounded by a company of kinnaras as a noble being is. He was surrounded by a company of nāgas as Virūpākṣa (the Ill-eyed, lord of nāgas) is. He was surrounded by a company of yakṣas as Vaiśravaṇa (the Wealth-giver) is. He was surrounded by a company of asuras as Vemacitrin is. He was surrounded by a company of the thirty-three gods as Śakra (Indra, king of the gods) is. He was surrounded by a company of the Brahma heaven as Brahmā is.

His sense faculties were supremely tamed; his conduct and his behavior were undisturbed.

Serene as an ocean of water, laden with moisture like a cloud, free from pride like the king of elephants, beautifully adorned with the thirty-two major marks of a great being, his body made resplendent by the eighty minor marks, embellished by a radiance extending a fathom around his form, possessed of a light surpassing that of a thousand suns, excellent in every way like a moving mountain of precious jewels, endowed with the ten powers, the four fearlessnesses, the three unshared foundations of mindfulness, and great compassion — he was omniscient.

He was accompanied by the great śrāvakas: Kauṇḍinya, Aśvajit, Mahānāma, Bhadrīka, Vāṣpa, Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Kāśyapa, Ānanda, Nandaka, and others, along with a great Saṅgha of many monks. Wandering through Kauśāmbī, he traveled on in stages and eventually arrived at Kauśāmbī. Thereafter the householder Ghoṣila offered that monastery with all its furnishings to the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of śrāvakas. And so the elders also appended to the sūtra the statement: "The Blessed One was dwelling at Kauśāmbī in the pleasure grove of Ghoṣila." The householder Ghoṣila, having offered the monastery to the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of śrāvakas, arose with joy and supreme delight, and went home.

Then the Venerable Mahā-Kalpika went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, the Venerable Mahā-Kalpika addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"Reverend One, what are the qualities such that a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — continually and without interruption increases merit and only merit, produces merit and only merit, and whereby a meritorious act grounded in material things bears very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great abundance?"

The Blessed One replied: "Worthy of prompting indeed! These seven promptings are the qualities such that a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — continually and without interruption increases merit and only merit, produces merit and only merit, and whereby a meritorious act grounded in material things bears very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great abundance. What are the seven?

"The first prompting by which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — continually and without interruption increases merit and only merit, produces merit and only merit, and whereby a meritorious act grounded in material things bears very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great abundance: it is this prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith offers a pleasure grove to the Saṅgha of monks from the four directions.

"The second prompting by which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — continually and without interruption increases merit and only merit, produces merit and only merit, and whereby a meritorious act grounded in material things bears very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great abundance: it is this prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith has a monastery built in that very pleasure grove.

"Yet another prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith —" a daughter of good family with faith offers to that very monastery furnishings such as these: thrones, small seats, cushioned inner-curtained seats, pillows, mattresses, and round cushions — it is this third prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith, whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down, continually and without interruption increases merit and only merit, produces merit and only merit, and whereby a meritorious act grounded in material things bears very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great abundance.

"Yet another prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith offers to that very monastery offerings perpetually suited to the needs of the resident community — it is this fourth prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith, whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down, continually and without interruption increases merit and only merit, produces merit and only merit, and whereby a meritorious act grounded in material things bears very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great abundance.

"Yet another prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith gives gifts to those who arrive suddenly and to those setting out on a journey — it is this fifth prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith, whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down, continually and without interruption increases merit and only merit, produces merit and only merit, and whereby a meritorious act grounded in material things bears very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great abundance.

"Yet another prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith gives gifts to the sick and to those who care for the sick — it is this sixth prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith, whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down, continually and without interruption increases merit and only merit, produces merit and only merit, and whereby a meritorious act grounded in material things bears very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great abundance.

"Yet another prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — at such times as wind has arisen, or bad weather has come, or rain has fallen, or hail has fallen, whichever of these it may be, when wind arises, bad weather comes, rain falls, or hail falls — brings to the Saṅgha cooked grains, sour foods, or hot drinks, thinking: 'By this, may these noble ones not have their bodies drenched, may their Dharma robes not get soaked, and may they come to experience bodily ease and comfort' — it is this seventh prompting, when a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith, whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down, continually and without interruption increases merit and only merit, produces merit and only merit, and whereby a meritorious act grounded in material things bears very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great abundance.

"This prompting is such that a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith who possesses these seven bases of meritorious acts grounded in material things — the merit, or the fruit of merit, or the karmic maturation of that fruit of merit — cannot be measured by saying 'it is only this much.' Because the merit is so vast, it falls under the designation 'a great mass of merit.' This prompting is like the following example: where the five great rivers — the Gaṅgā, the Yamunā, the Sarayū, the Aciravatī, and the Mahī — flow together without distinction, one could not measure the water, or bucketfuls of water, or — hundreds of jars of water, or thousands of jars of water, or one hundred thousand jars of water — saying "there is only this much water" — one could not measure the water. In just the same way, the merit, the fruit of merit, or the karmic maturation of that fruit of merit belonging to a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith who possesses these seven bases of meritorious acts grounded in material things cannot be measured by saying "it is only this much." Because the merit is so vast, it falls under the designation "a great mass of merit."

When the Blessed One had spoken thus, the venerable Mahāprompting addressed the Blessed One as follows: "Reverend One, by possessing what quality would a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — unceasingly and without interruption increase merit alone and generate merit alone: bases of meritorious acts that are not grounded in material things, of very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great extent? Could such a prompting be given?"

The Blessed One declared: "Such a prompting may indeed be given. These seven promptings are those by possessing which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — unceasingly and without interruption increases merit alone and generates merit alone: bases of meritorious acts that are not grounded in material things, of very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great extent. What are the seven?

"Here, O Prompting, a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith hears that a Tathāgata or a śrāvaka of a Tathāgata is residing in dependence upon some village or town, and upon hearing this, attains joy, supreme joy, vast wholesome gladness of a definitive arising. This is the first prompting by possessing which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — unceasingly and without interruption increases merit alone and generates merit alone: a basis of meritorious acts not grounded in material things, of very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great extent.

"Furthermore, O Prompting, a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith hears that a Tathāgata or a śrāvaka of a Tathāgata is traveling in that direction, coming this way, and upon hearing this, attains joy, supreme joy, vast wholesome gladness of a definitive arising. This is the second prompting by possessing which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — unceasingly and without interruption increases merit alone and generates merit alone: a basis of meritorious acts not grounded in material things, of very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great extent.

"Furthermore, a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith hears that a Tathāgata or a śrāvaka of a Tathāgata has arrived there and entered the vicinity, and upon hearing this, attains joy, supreme joy, vast wholesome gladness of a definitive arising. This is a prompting by possessing which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — unceasingly and without interruption increases merit alone and generates merit alone:"

This is the third basis for meritorious action — not arising from material things — of very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great extent: merit alone increasing, merit alone arising, unceasingly and without interruption.

Furthermore, a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith hears that a Tathāgata or a śrāvaka of a Tathāgata has arrived in that very town and come into the vicinity, and upon hearing this, attains joy, supreme joy, vast wholesome gladness of a definitive arising. This is a prompting by possessing which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — unceasingly and without interruption increases merit alone and generates merit alone. This is the fourth basis for meritorious action — not arising from material things — of very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great extent.

Furthermore, a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith goes to behold that very Tathāgata or that very śrāvaka of a Tathāgata, and goes for the sake of paying homage, and upon seeing them, attains joy, supreme joy, vast wholesome gladness of a definitive arising. This is a prompting by possessing which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — unceasingly and without interruption increases merit alone and generates merit alone. This is the fifth basis for meritorious action — not arising from material things — of very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great extent.

Furthermore, a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith listens to and hears, from the presence of that very Tathāgata or that very śrāvaka of a Tathāgata, the holy Dharma — good in the beginning, good in the middle, good at the end, of excellent meaning, of excellent words, unmixed, perfectly complete, perfectly pure, perfectly refined — as it is properly proclaimed, and upon listening and hearing, attains joy, supreme joy, vast wholesome gladness of a definitive arising. This is a prompting by possessing which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — unceasingly and without interruption increases merit alone and generates merit alone. This is the sixth basis for meritorious action — not arising from material things — of very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great extent.

Furthermore, a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith, having heard the Dharma from the presence of that very Tathāgata or that very śrāvaka of a Tathāgata, goes for refuge in the Buddha, goes for refuge in the Dharma and the Saṅgha, and takes up the foundations of training. This is a prompting by possessing which a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith — whether walking, standing, lying down, or not lying down — unceasingly and without interruption increases merit alone and generates merit alone. This is the seventh basis for meritorious action — not arising from material things — of very great fruit, great benefit, great radiance, and great extent.

Now, the merit, or the fruit of merit, of a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith who possesses these seven bases for meritorious action not arising from material things — the karmic maturation of the fruit of merit cannot be measured as "this much is the fruit of merit." Because merit is so abundant, it falls into the category called "a great mass of merit."

This is a prompting. Consider, for example, the place where these five great rivers — the Gaṅgā, the Yamunā, the Sarayū, the Aciravatī, and the Mahī — flow together without distinction. One could not measure the water there as "there is this much water, or this many waterpots, or a hundred waterpots, or a thousand waterpots, or a hundred thousand waterpots," because the water is so abundant that it falls into the category called "a great mass of water." In just the same way, this prompting means that the merit, the fruit of merit, or the karmic maturation of the fruit of merit of a son of good family or a daughter of good family with faith who possesses these seven bases for meritorious action not arising from material things cannot be measured as "this much." Because merit is so abundant, it falls into the category called "a great mass of merit."

The Blessed One spoke these words. Having so spoken, the Sugata, the Teacher, then further declared:

Just as rivers flowing differently, frequented by humans and herds of game, pour into the finest, auspicious, pure lake with pleasant banks — that ocean, source of jewels —

so too does the stream of merit flow in every way to a generous donor who gives robes, food, and drink, bedding, seats, and cushions to human beings, just as rivers and their flowing waters pour into the sea.

Having spoken thus, the venerable one rejoiced greatly at what the Blessed One had said and praised it openly. Then the householder Gāndha was one who had faith, but his retinue lacked faith, and he thought to himself: "If my retinue has no faith, how much worse will things go in my temple?" So he disguised his appearance, dressed himself in a lower garment and plain clothes, went to the temple, and bowing before the stūpa with the melody of verse began to enter the temple. Then an old man who was seated in the gatehouse bowed at his feet and said: "Noble one, whose is this temple — which ravishes the heart and eyes and has become a stairway to the heavens?" He replied: "It belongs to the householder Gāndha." "Noble one, is this a temple, or is it a place of destitution?" "Good sir, what is a temple and what is destitution?" "Noble one, a place where provisions are abundant is a temple; a place where provisions are lacking is destitution." "Good sir, this one is destitute." "How has it come to this?" "The householder himself has faith, but his retinue lacks it, and so they do not supply what is needed. Now, in this householder's home there is a daughter-in-law named Mgubyed, who has faith and good intentions, but she has no authority in that household. If she did have authority, she would supply the needs of the monks and this place would truly become a temple."

The householder Gāndha thought to himself: "Even now while I am still alive, the situation of the monks in my temple is like this — what will it be like after I die?" Realizing this, he bowed at the monk's feet, went to his own home, and said to the members of his household: "Whoever among you feels inspired to render service to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the buddhas — let that person cut a bundle of firewood." At that moment Mgubyed, taking a water pot and going out to draw water, found a strip of cloth there —

The Blessed One, wishing to benefit her, came to that place, and she began to examine the Blessed One. Through his miraculous power, the Blessed One caused her to see a strip of cloth from his robe of Dharma garments, and she thought: "If only the Blessed One would accept this piece of cloth of mine, I would offer it to him." The Blessed One, knowing her mind, declared: "Mgubyed, if you are giving it up completely, then offer it." She, with her mind filled with confident faith in the Blessed One, aroused reverence and made the offering. The Blessed One, right there before her, mended the tear in his robe with the strip of cloth, and the color became perfectly matched. Moved by faith, she touched her head to his two feet, made an aspiration: "By this root of virtue, may I not become a slave-girl; may I not be impoverished." Having said this, she filled her water pot and returned home.

When the householder Gāndha instructed the members of his household to cut firewood, Mgubyed said: "Householder, what is this?" Gāndha replied: "Mgubyed, whichever one of you feels inspired to render service to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the buddhas — let that person cut firewood, and I have abundant wealth." She immediately set down her water pot, took up the firewood, and said: "I feel inspired to render service to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the buddhas. I will render service to the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of śrāvakas with all requisites — please set your mind at ease." And so she undertook to serve the Saṅgha of monks headed by the buddhas with all requisites, rendering service with reverence.

The householder Gāndha, for his part, made his appearance plain, dressed in a lowered lower garment, went to the temple, and, chanting verses, made prostrations at the stūpa and began to remain in the temple. Then an elderly woman who had entered the gatehouse there prostrated at his feet and asked: "Noble one, whose is this temple that captures the heart and eye and has become a stairway to the higher realms?" He replied: "It belongs to the householder Gāndha. Noble one, is it a temple or is it impoverished?" The well-favored one replied: "What is a temple, and what is impoverished?" "Noble one, where all requisites are complete — that is a temple; where requisites are absent — that is impoverished." "Well-favored one, formerly it was impoverished, but now it has become a temple. How did this come about?" "Well-favored one, the householder Gāndha has a bondswoman named Mgubyed who possesses faith and is good and of wholesome intention. That householder appointed her to work here and instructed her to serve the Saṅgha of monks headed by the buddhas with all requisites. Now she is rendering service to the Saṅgha of monks headed by the buddhas with all requisites, and therefore this is a temple, not an impoverished place."

The householder Gāndha, hearing this, was delighted. He went home and placed in the hands of the girl Mgubyed the keys — both the keys and the crooked keys — and said to the members of his household: "You are all to abide by whatever Mgubyed directs." He also gathered the assembly of people dwelling in Kauśāmbī and proclaimed: "Friends, know that I have released the girl Mgubyed from her condition of bondage and have made her the mistress of the household."

The monks, being uncertain, brought all their doubts before the buddha, the Blessed One, to be resolved. "Venerable One, look upon the householder Gāndha — he is being summoned by King Śarpa to account for Gāndha's affairs." The Blessed One declared:

Monks, not only now, but even in times past, this householder Gāndha was recognized by King Śarpa through Gāndha's own affairs. Listen to this.

Monks, in former times there was in the city of Vārāṇasī a king named Brahmadatta whose realm was prosperous, flourishing, and happy, with good harvests, filled with many people and a great population, where foreign enemies, internal strife, and violent conflict had been thoroughly pacified, and which was free from bandits, famine, and disease — a realm made abundant with rows of rice and sugarcane, cattle, and buffalo. He was a righteous king, a dharma-king, who governed his kingdom in accordance with the Dharma.

Then at a certain time, astrologers prophesied that rain would not fall for twelve years. King Brahmadatta had this announced throughout his realm with the beat of drums, dispatching proclamations in all directions: "Let all those dwelling in my kingdom, and all those in the palace retinue, hear this. The astrologers have prophesied that rain will not fall for twelve years. Therefore, those among you who have provisions for twelve years are to remain. Those who do not have such provisions are to depart for other lands and may return after twelve years have passed."

At that time in Vārāṇasī there dwelt a householder named Dhāraṇī (Skt. dhāraṇī — here used as a proper name), wealthy, possessed of great riches, with extensive property, and with storehouses vast and spacious. He called his steward and said: "Dear steward, do I have provisions for twelve years for myself and my household?" The steward replied: "Yes, my lord, you do."

Now when buddhas do not appear in the world, pratyekabuddhas — humble and poor, devoted to solitude in remote dwelling places, solitary as rhinoceroses, having become a field of merit for the world — arise in the world. At this time five hundred pratyekabuddhas, while wandering through the countryside, came to Vārāṇasī and went to the house of the householder Dhāraṇī. They arrived and said: "Householder, would you be able to provide for the needs of five hundred renunciants like ourselves for twelve years?"

He replied: "Noble ones, please ask the steward, and it shall be given." So he called the steward and said: "Dear steward, do I have provisions for twelve years for myself and my household together with these five hundred renunciants?" The steward replied: "Yes, my lord, you do."

The householder Dhāraṇī then said to the five hundred pratyekabuddhas: "Noble ones, it is here — please remain and be provided for." And they stayed there.

Then another five hundred pratyekabuddhas, while wandering through the countryside, also came to Vārāṇasī and likewise went to the householder Dhāraṇī's house, where they arrived and said: "Householder, would you be able to provide for the needs of five hundred renunciants like ourselves for twelve years?"

He replied: "Noble ones, since I am already providing for you — why would I do so again? You, householder, belong to those others, and we too belong to those others. Noble ones, please ask the steward, and it shall be given." So he called the steward and said: "Dear steward, do I have provisions for twelve years for myself and my household together with a thousand renunciants?" The steward replied: "Yes, my lord, you do."

The householder Dhāraṇī then said to those five hundred pratyekabuddhas as well: "Noble ones, it is here — please remain and be provided for." And they too stayed there.

The householder Dhāraṇī had a house of giving built, appointed people to serve as stewards of the giving and as summoners, and the summoner went out day by day and called at midday.

The summoner kept a dog, and each day that dog would go along with the summoner. Then one day it happened that the summoner was occupied with some business, and thinking "I will finish this task and invite them later," he went elsewhere. The dog, not finding him, went from force of old habit to where the pratyekabuddhas were, and not seeing the summoner there either, it began to bark. The elder of the pratyekabuddhas' Saṅgha said: "Venerable ones, the summoner has been detained past the hour, and this dog is summoning us — let us proceed inside." They agreed, and those noble ones came in. When the summoner arrived and the dog saw him, it began to bark again, and the summoner understood: "This one summoned them, and that is how these great ones came to arrive without missing their time." He said: "Noble ones, who summoned you?" They replied: "Good sir, this dog did." He said: "Noble ones, please forgive me. From now on, whenever I am occupied with something, this very one shall be your summoner. Please go on now."

Then the monks were told: "At that time and on that occasion, the householder Dhāraṇī was none other than myself. The steward at that time and on that occasion was the householder Anāthapiṇḍada. The summoner at that time and on that occasion was the king Prasenajit of the East. The dog at that time and on that occasion was the householder Yaśasvin, and the householder Yaśasvin had in that life come to know through a bark — and so too in this life has he understood through a bark."

When the Blessed One was in Magadha, King Bimbisāra of Magadha, an artisan-king of noble form and substance, came to where the Blessed One was together with eighty thousand gods of Magadha and many hundreds of thousands of brahmins and householders of Magadha, and the Blessed One established them in the truths. At that time the king had a drum-proclamation made throughout Rājagṛha and gave this command: "Let all who dwell in Rājagṛha, all people of the royal court and its environs, and all assemblies of people who have come from various lands — listen, wise ones! In my realm, let no one commit theft. Whoever commits theft in my realm I shall banish from the realm, and the property of those who have been robbed I shall give from my own treasury and storehouse."

When the Blessed One was in Kosala, King Prasenajit, tamed by the example of the young man, likewise had a drum-proclamation made throughout Śrāvastī and gave this command: "In my realm, let no one commit theft. Whoever commits theft in my realm I shall have put to death, and the property of those who have been robbed I shall give from my own treasury and storehouse."

Now the bandits who were dwelling in the land of Magadha and the bandits who were dwelling in the land of Kosala went and stationed themselves at the border between the two kingdoms. Those who came as accomplices from Magadha they would rob, and those who came as accomplices from Kosala they would rob as well. Thus it spread everywhere: the bandits stationed in Magadha and the bandits stationed in Kosala went to the borderlands and stationed themselves there, robbing all those who traveled as accomplices, so that the coming and going of such accomplices ceased entirely, and the proclamation became known in these words: "The king's taxes and the annual tribute will not be collected."

When King Rūpasāra heard this, he sent one regiment, but it was defeated and routed, and came back. In the same way, when he sent a second regiment and a third, those too were defeated and routed, and came back. Meanwhile, an accomplice traveling from the land of Magadha to Kosala, frightened of the bandits, had entered Rājagṛha seeking an escort. The ministers said to the king, "Sire, this man Sahasrathūra lives by the king's provisions — why does he not escort the accomplices?" The king said, "Let him go — release him at his own discretion." The ministers summoned the man and said to him, "Hey, you there — you live by the king's provisions, so why do you not carry out the king's command?" He replied, "Tell me what you have ordered me to do, and if I have not done it, then say such words." They said, "Escort this accomplice who is traveling to the land of Kosala." He said, "Very well, I shall do so," and taking two quivers of five hundred arrows each, he mounted a chariot and rode out ahead of the accomplice.

The bandits, seeing him coming from a great distance ahead of the accomplice, sent a messenger ordering him thus: "The bandit commander says: turn the chariot back — you will come to harm." He replied, "Give a warrior his warrior's portion." The bandit's messenger said, "Are you the only one who is brave? We are brave too — turn back." Then they began to shoot arrows at one another, and he struck the bandit's messenger in a vital spot, and the messenger turned back. In the same way, two bandits came, then four, then eight, then sixteen, then thirty-two, then sixty-four, and up to five hundred bandits came forward, and he struck each of them in a vital spot and they turned back.

Then another five hundred bandits came forward, and he said to them, "If I kill your five hundred bandits, would you not prefer to save your own lives? Turn back." The bandits said, "You have not killed even one of us, so why should we turn back? Whether you or we — we'll see." He said, "If you do not believe me, then remove the armor from those I have already struck." They began to remove it, and as each one's armor was removed, the moment the time came, those bandits said, "This man is a yakṣa," and fled. Sahasrathūra remained stationed at the borderland, and he would escort those accomplices coming from Kosala and those coming from Magadha alike. Then he thought, "Why should I go back and forth? I shall simply stay right here," and he built a house there and settled down, becoming a resting place for the accomplices of both kingdoms. Since he took up residence in the countryside, that place came to be known by the name "Countryside Dwelling."

The seventy-fourth fascicle of the Vinaya Analysis.

At Countryside Dwelling the accomplices gathered, and some of them began selling fruit, some began selling flour, some traded in cotton goods, some carried loads, some began selling pills, and liquor sellers began selling liquor as well. With all of them settled right there, a market town took shape in that place. Countryside Dwelling sent a letter to King Rūpasāra saying, "Sire, I have established a market here — it would be fitting that the king send a customs officer here." The king thought to himself:

"The very place where my three brigades were broken, thoroughly routed, and put to flight — he has established a market town there. So be it — let that place remain just as it is." With that thought, he sent a letter to Countryside Dwelling saying: "I hereby grant you that market town. Whatever customs duties and annual revenues accumulate there, do with them entirely as you please."

Having established a market town at Countryside Dwelling, the place came to be known by the very name "Countryside Dwelling."

The people of the community dwelling at Countryside Dwelling reflected among themselves: "Friends, whatever comfort and ease we enjoy here — all of it is due to the power of Countryside Dwelling. We should not let an opportunity pass to do him some benefit." Then some among them said: "Quite right — let us do exactly that. But what shall we do?" Others among them said: "Whoever among us gives a bride or takes a bride shall provide him and his retinue with food and shall also present him with a set of garments." "Quite right — let us do so." And so it was that whoever among them gave a bride or took a bride would provide Countryside Dwelling and his retinue with food and present him with a set of garments.

Now it happened that a certain poor man was about to take a bride, and he thought to himself: "Where would I find the means to provide Countryside Dwelling and his retinue with food and present him with a set of garments? What I shall do instead is this: after I have taken that bride, I will first offer her to Countryside Dwelling for his pleasure alone. After he has taken his pleasure, then I myself shall enjoy her." With that resolve, he went to Countryside Dwelling's compound, bowed his head in reverence, and said: "Village lord, I am about to take a bride, yet I have no means to offer you a meal with your retinue and present you with a set of garments. Therefore I propose this: after I have taken that bride, I will first offer her to you for your pleasure alone. After you have taken your pleasure, then I myself shall enjoy her."

Countryside Dwelling replied: "My friend, there is no need for anyone who takes or gives a bride to provide me and my retinue with food and present me with a set of garments. Go then and take your bride without any worry." "Village lord, be that as it may — nevertheless, please accept my offer with gladness." Since the domain of women is such that it seizes and occupies the senses, Countryside Dwelling accepted with willingness. The man thereupon took his bride and first offered her to Countryside Dwelling, and Countryside Dwelling indeed took his pleasure with her.

Countryside Dwelling was now overwhelmed with passionate desire in his craving for sensual objects, and he began to show affection toward that man. Another person said to him: "My friend, for what reason have you become so fond of Countryside Dwelling to such a degree?" The man recounted what had transpired, and the other, hearing this, also began to do the same. Yet another person asked him about it, and he too recounted what had happened, and that one also began to do the same. And yet another asked, was told, and likewise began to do the same. In this manner, unwholesome practices began to multiply in that place.

Countryside Dwelling had a temple built in that market town, and whenever anyone there took a bride, that man would have the girl circumambulate the temple and then send her to Countryside Dwelling's compound, and Countryside Dwelling would take his pleasure with her first.

Then at a later time, a certain young woman of great beauty was about to be given in marriage, and she thought to herself:

"It would be wrong for me to be enjoyed first by Countryside Dwelling and only afterward by my husband. I must find some means by which this Countryside Dwelling will be killed." With that thought in mind, she turned to one side — toward a spot where a great crowd of common people had gathered and were conversing — squatted down, and urinated. The crowd saw this, and they were displeased, and they said: "Shameless and immodest girl! Whose daughter is this, who squats down and urinates facing the crowd of common people?"

When she heard that, she replied: "Are you not men yourselves? Then what am I? You are not men — it is only Countryside Dwelling who is a man, for he takes all your wives and enjoys them first, and afterward you clean up his filth."

At that, they said to one another: "Wise friends, if this one is going to keep living among us, how are we to deal with him?" Some said: "What else is there to do? Kill Countryside Dwelling." Others said: "We should deliberate on how exactly to kill him." While they were thus taking counsel, it happened that another householder was about to offer a garden party, and so they said: "Wise friends, a certain prominent householder is about to offer a garden party. When he invites Countryside Dwelling there as a guest, we shall kill him." And presently that householder did indeed give his garden party, and he invited Countryside Dwelling, who gladly accepted.

King Bimbisāra had heralds make a proclamation throughout the land: "In my realm, if any monk should come to someone's home and there is food and drink in the storehouse or the house, they are to be given a meal. If there is none, whoever sees the monk shall give from their own means, and afterward I will repay them double." He also had this written down as a standing order.

In the meantime, the venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana were wandering on tour through the villages of Magadha and came to Countryside Dwelling. Countryside Dwelling's headman heard that the venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana had come to Countryside Dwelling while wandering on tour through the villages of Magadha. Upon hearing this, he thought to himself: "King Bimbisāra, never satisfied with merit, gives gifts and makes merit. Why should I not also give gifts and make merit?" And so he went to where the venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana were, arrived there, prostrated at their feet with his head bowed, and sat before them in order to hear the Dharma. The two of them taught him the Dharma, and then he invited them for alms and gave them food.

The householder sent for Countryside Dwelling with an urgent summons, but Countryside Dwelling, paying no heed to the message that had been given to him, simply went off to attend the garden party. The crowd of people dwelling in Countryside Dwelling, too, made a signal; armed with weapons, they rushed to the spot. When Countryside Dwelling entered the garden enclosure, on the pretext of washing his hair they poured boiling water over his head, so that his eyes streamed with tears and he could see almost nothing. Then they began hurling at him weapons such as a razor-wheel, a single-pointed vajra, great arrows, and single-pointed iron spikes, and they made ready to kill him. He cried out: "Wise friends, what wrong have I done you?" They said: "You have enjoyed our brides first, and afterward we have had them." He replied: "It is you yourselves who brought forth this impure custom. What fault is mine in it? Do not kill me — let me go!"

As they were wailing in this way and setting about killing him, he — at the very moment of losing his life, at the very moment of death, his mind cutting free — aroused the awakening mind and made an aspiration prayer: "By the root of virtue I have made in offering alms to the noble Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana, those two who are worshipped by gods and humans alike — by that merit, may I be reborn in the very place where these men will be killed." Because it is the nature of reality that a misdirected aspiration prayer made at the moment of death takes swift effect, he made that misdirected aspiration and died. When his time came, he was reborn among the vicious yakṣas.

Then, wishing to dwell there, he went before the great king Vaiśravaṇa and said: "Lord with forbearance, grant me a place to dwell." Vaiśravaṇa replied: "The wilderness is your place — go to that same wilderness." So he came to the wilderness, was driven out by human beings, and a great many people perished, dying in their thousands upon thousands.

The people dwelling in that wilderness summoned their diviners and asked: "Wise friends, what is the cause of this plague that has broken out upon us in this way?" They replied: "Wise friends, the herdsman whom you killed made a misdirected aspiration prayer and was reborn among the vicious yakṣas, and it is he who has brought about this plague." The people began to flee, loading their wagons, and he too manifested himself in a great and terrifying form and stood before the fleeing crowd of wilderness-dwellers and declared: "Where are you going? I shall eat every last one of you!" They were all struck with fear and cried: "Village lord, forgive us who have done evil!" He replied: "I shall forgive you on one condition: if you offer me one thousand people every single day, I will pardon you." They said: "Village lord, if we were to offer you a thousand people every day, before long there would be no one left in this wilderness. In consideration of the present circumstances, let us off for now — forgive us who bow down to you." He said: "Good folk, I have long desired that this wilderness would be emptied of people. Nevertheless, let five hundred be offered to me each day, and I will forgive you." They petitioned him again in the same way, and he reduced his demand, saying that between two hundred fifty and one hundred should be offered. They then said: "Village lord, even so we will be diminished — what use is a multitude? Let us offer you, each and every day, a wagon laden with provisions and drawn by six oxen, along with one person to lead it, and please forgive us." He replied: "Very well, on this condition: do not offer them weeping; they must be brought with dancing, with singing, and with the sound of musical instruments." And they agreed to this.

Then all the people dwelling in that wilderness gathered and began to deliberate: "Wise friends, the yakṣa has treated us so — how are we to manage this? Some said: "Let us take turns, one after another." Others said: "If we announce whose turn it is, disputes will arise. Rather, let us write down all the household names and put them in a jar, and whichever household name is drawn, that person must go. And they must not send a servant in their place — they themselves must go, or send a son. If one whose name is drawn is occupied and cannot be present when it comes their turn, the household tablet is placed upright before that person's house and left there."

At that time there lived in a rural settlement a certain householder who had no son. For a long while he had been praying, "Alas, may I come to have a son!" and through the power of that aspiration a being entered into his wife's womb. When the time of his wife's delivery arrived, the householder had gone out on some business. That very day the household tablet came round requiring the offering of food-portions to the yakṣa, and the people whose duty it was to make that offering placed the tablet upright against his door and left it there. At just that moment his wife gave birth, and a baby boy was born.

As soon as the householder came home, he saw the household tablet as he was about to enter, and grief and distress arose in him. He went inside and sat without saying a word. His wife said to him: "Lord's son, be glad! Your son has been born!" Yet still he sat without saying a word. His wife spoke to him thus three times, but still he sat without uttering a sound. Then his wife said again: "Lord's son, you have prayed for so long — 'Alas, may I come to have a son!' — and now one is born. Why do you sit without saying anything? Please, be most glad!"

He said: "Good woman, this one was born, and so I am as good as dead."

"Lord's son, what do you mean? Good woman — the household tablet has come for the offering of food-portions to the yakṣa."

"Lord's son, if that is so, your son will be going. But if we could just see him a little while first, then your son will still have existed for you."

"Good woman, this is a drop of our own blood — how can we send him?"

"Lord's son, has the community not established it as a rule that one must go oneself or send a son? This is your son. There is nothing else as dear to us as he is. Send this son."

He then relented and said: "If you are willing, so be it."

Thereupon the householder's wife sat up through the night without sleeping. She made offerings with butter lamps, incense, garlands, and flowers, turned her face toward the east, and began to pray:

The world's virtuous, the peaceful, the tamed, and those of subdued power — to them this hall is never empty.
For my child's sake I bow before them:
I pray, protect my little one.

Now it is the very nature of buddhas, the Blessed Ones, that they possess not even a trace of unknowing, unseeing, ignorance, or failure to discern. Endowed with great compassion, entered into benefiting the world, they are the one protector, the solitary hero, without a second, not speaking of a second, abiding in calm abiding and insight, making the three knowledges clear, well trained in the three trainings, skilled in the threefold basis of the tamed life, crossed beyond the four rivers, well established in the basis of practice through the four legs of miraculous power, long purified in the four means of gathering beings, not intimidated by the four fearlessnesses, having abandoned the five obstructing factors, fully passed beyond the five destinies of beings, endowed with the six limbs and the six perfections brought to complete fulfillment, established in the six constant abidings, enriched with the flowers of the seven factors of awakening, teaching the eight limbs of the path, skilled in the nine successive meditative absorptions, possessed of the power of the ten powers, their renown fully spread in all ten directions — these most supremely distinguished ones, lords over a hundred hundredfolds: it is the very nature of such buddhas to survey the world with the eyes of a buddha three times by day and three times by night, and to see who has declined, who has flourished, who has been harmed, who has fallen into distress, who has fallen into misfortune, who has come to harm and distress and misfortune, who is inclining toward the lower realms — — who is inclining toward the lower realms, who has already fallen into the lower realms — I shall raise up from the path of the lower realms and establish in the higher realms, in liberation, and in the fruit. Whoever has sunk into the mire of desire, I shall pull up by the hand. Whoever is deprived of the wealth of the noble ones, I shall establish in lordship over the wealth of the noble ones. Whatever world is adorned by the arising of a buddha, I shall cause to bear fruit. In whoever the roots of virtue have not yet been produced, I shall produce them. In whoever the roots of virtue have already been produced, I shall bring them to full maturation. And whoever has fully matured, I shall bring to complete liberation. With such knowing and seeing does a buddha engage.

Then it was spoken in verse:

One who dwells in the realm of the sea-monster may yet pass beyond their appointed time, but the loving-kindness of a buddha toward those to be tamed shall never pass beyond its appointed time.

Just as a mother tends to her one beloved child with constant thought and preserves that child's life, so too the Tathāgata tends with constant thought to those to be tamed and preserves their lives.

The mare of compassion that dwells in the stream of omniscience tirelessly seeks out the foal of those to be tamed.

The loving-kindness toward those exhausted by existence and the lower realms is like a cow's love for a foal that has utterly collapsed.

The Blessed One then reflected: this youth has previously rendered great service to the past buddhas; I shall therefore benefit him, and the yakṣa (yakṣa) of the wilderness is also to be tamed. With this understanding, the Blessed One journeyed through the regions of Magadha and came to the wilderness, and consented to spend the night at the dwelling of the wilderness yakṣa.

At that time the wilderness yakṣa went to the gathering assembly of the yakṣas. The yakṣa Boṅguba saw the Blessed One spending the night at the dwelling of the wilderness yakṣa. Having seen this, he went to where the wilderness yakṣa was, and when he arrived, he said to the wilderness yakṣa: "Village chief, what a fine and excellent find you have made — the Blessed One has consented to spend the night at your dwelling. Village chief, has even a human being ever consented to spend the night at your dwelling?" The wilderness yakṣa replied: "Village chief, indeed so." "Indeed so? Then know this: he is the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha." "Village chief, is he truly the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and completely awakened buddha, or is he not? This I must now find out."

Then the wilderness yakṣa, having quelled the gathering assembly of the yakṣas, went to his own dwelling. When he arrived, he said to the Blessed One: "Ascetic (śramaṇa), come out!" The Blessed One reflected: this one is held in check by another. And so he emerged. "Ascetic, go back in!" The Blessed One entered, for the sake of decisively subduing arrogance and pride. Again, a second time, the wilderness yakṣa said to the Blessed One: "Ascetic, come out!" The Blessed One reflected: this one is held in check by another. And so he emerged. "Ascetic, go back in!" The Blessed One entered, for the sake of decisively subduing arrogance and pride. A third time the wilderness yakṣa said to the Blessed One: "Ascetic, come out!" The Blessed One reflected: this one is held in check by another. And so he emerged. "Ascetic, go back in!" The Blessed One entered, for the sake of decisively subduing arrogance and pride. And yet again the wilderness yakṣa said to the Blessed One: "Ascetic, come out!"

Then the Blessed One spoke these words to the wilderness yakṣa: "Village chief, you have summoned me to enter three times, and now I will not come again. Therefore, yakṣa, ask me your questions. If the one who answers satisfies your mind, well and good. But if your mind is not satisfied, then your thoughts will be scattered, your heart will burst, you will vomit hot blood from your mouth, and you will be seized by both arms and flung to the far bank beyond the river of the fortunate charioteer." The Blessed One then declared: "Village chief, I have looked throughout this world with its gods, its māras, its Brahmās, its assemblies of ascetics and brahmins, its gods and humans, and I do not truly see anyone who could scatter the thoughts of a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly and completely awakened buddha, or cause his heart to burst, or draw hot blood from his mouth, or seize him by both arms and fling him to the far bank beyond the river of the fortunate charioteer. Therefore, village chief, ask freely whatever you wish."

Then the wilderness yakṣa at that moment offered these verses:

With what, and in what manner, and by what does one cross over, and with what?
What here is the supreme wealth of a person?
What, well practiced, brings a life of ease?

Among flavors, which is the sweetest?
Show us how the finest life is lived.

The Blessed One replied:

Faith is the supreme wealth of a person.
Practicing Dharma well brings a life of ease.
The flavor of truth is the sweetest of flavors.
Living with wisdom — that is the finest life.

The yakṣa asked:

How does one come to have renown?
How does one come to possess prosperity?
How does one come to receive a good name?
And how does one come to find good friends?

The Blessed One replied:

Through moral discipline one gains renown.
Through generosity one comes to possess prosperity.
Through truthfulness one receives a good name.
Through compassion one comes to find good friends.

The yakṣa asked:

By how many things does a person arise in the world?
By how many does one come to gain familiarity?
By how many is one honored in the world?
By how many does one come to prevail over the world?

The Blessed One replied:

By six a person arises in the world,
by six one comes to gain familiarity,
by six one is honored in the world, and by six one comes to prevail over the world.

The yakṣa asked:

What is this flood — tireless, without pause — that comes and comes and cannot be crossed?
Without a fixed support, without an anchor,
what is so deep that none can plumb it?

The Blessed One replied:

One possessed of moral discipline in every way, with even composure, and endowed with wisdom, inwardly attentive, possessed of mindfulness — this one crosses over what is so very hard to cross.
One free from perception bound to sense desire, gone to the limit of all engagement with form — such a one will not sink into that depth which is without fixed object and without support.

The yakṣa asked:

By what does one cross over the flood?
By what does one cross the ocean?
By what does one abandon suffering?
By what is one completely purified?

The Blessed One replied:

By faith one crosses over the flood.
By heedfulness one crosses the ocean.
By diligent effort one abandons suffering.
By wisdom one is completely purified.

Ask other ascetics and brahmins, one by one,
in many different places,
whether there exists any other Dharma apart from the giving up of truthful restraint.

The yakṣa replied:

Why should I go asking ascetics and brahmins
one by one, as if I did not know?
For you, O great hero, have explained this Dharma excellently well.

Alas, O yakṣa Dongbu-pa,
the peerless caravan-leader, the Buddha, has been revealed to me.

For what you have done for me, I am grateful.

From this day forth, from village to village, from home to home, together with the fully awakened one,
I shall practice in reverence for the excellent nature of reality in the Dharma.

Then the Blessed One spoke thus to the yakṣa of the wilderness:

"Good-faced one, by feeding the monks Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana you were to have been reborn among the gods of the Thirty-Three. Yet because you made a wrong aspiration, you were born instead among the fierce yakṣas. Now you are violent, your hands are stained with blood, you are attached to degradation and utter degradation, you seize the lives of others, and you live by taking the lives of others. When you die and pass from here, what will your destiny be? What will your birth be? What will your next life be?"

He replied: "Blessed One, please command me as to what I should do."

"Good-faced one, come here. Take refuge before me and receive the training precepts, and grant fearlessness to the assembly of people who dwell in the wilderness."

"Venerable one, I take refuge before the Blessed One and receive the training precepts, and from this day forward I grant fearlessness to the assembly of people who dwell in the wilderness."

And so he took refuge before the Blessed One and received the training precepts. Having received the training precepts, he spoke these verses:

Alas, the Teacher came to bind me for my own sake, in perfect truth.
Today I have come to understand clearly the welfare of future lives.

Then that householder loaded a cart drawn by six oxen with food, placed the boy in the cart as well, and sent it off to the yakṣa accompanied by the sounds of dance, song, and music. Some noble ones, brahmins, and householders who heard this said: "O wise ones, what is this sound of dance, song, and music?" Some replied: "Do you not know? They are carrying a drop of blood as a tribute to the yakṣa."

A great crowd of ordinary people assembled and said: "O wise ones, this drop of blood will not please the yakṣa. If it is not turned back, the yakṣa will surely be provoked and will bring harm to all of us. It must be turned back." And they began to turn it back.

But the man said: "O wise ones, the law of the assembly requires that one go oneself or send one's child. Since this is my own son, why should it be turned back? It will not be turned back; let it go forward."

They had nothing to say to this and stood in silence.

The Blessed One heard the sounds of dance, song, and music. Having heard them, he spoke to the yakṣa of the wilderness: "Village-chief, what are these sounds of dance, song, and music?"

"Venerable one, though I have turned back from those evil, unwholesome deeds, the people still cling to the old ways. I do not know how to put a stop to this."

The Blessed One said: "Village-chief, what is this? Tell me how it has come about."

When it was explained, the Blessed One said: "Village-chief, today do not accept even food, drink, or an ox."

The man thought: "So be it — I shall offer this last meal of mine as alms to the Blessed One."

The householder took the boy out of the cart and gave him to the yakṣa. The yakṣa in turn offered him to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then gave him back to the father.

The father then asked: "Blessed One, by what name should this boy be called?"

The Blessed One replied in verse:

The child, passing from the hand of the yakṣa into my hand, and from my hand into the hand of his father — for that reason he shall be known as Passed-Through-Hands.

So the name Passed-Through-Hands was given to him.

The householder took the boy and set off for the pastoral settlement. When the crowd of people there saw him, they said: "Good people, look what has happened! He went off carrying drops of blood, yet through him the yakṣa of the pastoral settlement has been stirred up — and now he has come back without a scratch!"

He replied: "Good people, how could the yakṣa have been stirred up in anger? Out of compassion for this child, the Blessed One graciously agreed to spend the night at that place, and the Blessed One tamed him, established him in the going-for-refuge and in the bases of training, and commanded him to give fearlessness to the crowd of people dwelling in the pastoral settlement and to leave them free from harm and oppression."

They were overjoyed and said: "Since this boy was just born and the yakṣa of the pastoral settlement was tamed, let this child's name be Passed-Through-Hands of the Pastoral Settlement." And so the name Passed-Through-Hands of the Pastoral Settlement was given to him.

When he grew up he became highly learned in writing, letters, and various other arts.

Now when his beard had turned bluish-gray and his hair was ready to be trimmed back, he was visited by a multitude of supplicants: kings, wealthy men, merchant leaders, caravan leaders, Śākyas, Kaudyas, Licchavīs, and many others besides. The householder Dignified One sat there pressing his hand to his cheek, his mind sunk in thought, thinking: "So many people are coming with bluish-gray beards seeking gifts, and those to whom she does not give will become my enemies."

When Bluish-Gray Beard saw this, she said: "Father, why do you sit pressing your hand to your cheek, your mind sunk in thought?"

He said: "Daughter, kings with bluish-gray beards have arrived as supplicants, along with wealthy men, merchant leaders, caravan leaders, Śākyas, Kaudyas, Licchavīs, and many others. Those to whom you do not give will become my enemies. How could I not sit pressing my hand to my cheek, lost in thought?"

She said: "Father, if that is how it is, do not be displeased. From today, in seven days' time, I myself will seek out a dwelling place."

He said: "Daughter, do so. But first go and make a petition to the king." So she went to the eastern flank of the king of the realm of Bhadra and said: "Your Majesty, from today in seven days' time Bluish-Gray Beard will seek out her own dwelling — may the king please grant permission."

The king thought: "Apart from me, to whom else would she go seeking a dwelling place?" and gave his permission.

Having received his permission, he gave orders to his ministers: "Good people, have the city adorned, and let this proclamation be made: 'From today, in seven days' time, Bluish-Gray Beard will seek out her own dwelling — therefore let all of you assemble as your means allow.'"

The ministers cleared the city of stones, gravel, and weeds, sprinkled it with sandalwood water, set out vessels of fragrant incense and sweet perfumes, hung up streamers of silk, raised victory banners and pennants, scattered flowers of every kind, and made it as delightful as a divine pleasure grove. Then they had the following proclamation cried out: "All people dwelling in Kauśāmbī, the people of the palace and its surroundings, and the crowds of people who have come from various lands — good people, hear this! In seven days from today, Bluish-Gray Beard will seek out her own dwelling. Therefore let each of you assemble according to your means!"

Then, when many hundreds of thousands of living beings had gathered, on the seventh day Bluish-Gray Beard, adorned with all her ornaments, she mounted a chariot, took up a garland of flowers, came forth, and began to survey the assembled crowd of common people. The king of Vatsa, Śarpa, thought to himself, "Without fail she will toss the garland of flowers onto me," and so he gathered his mind and sat attentively watchful. Bluish-Gray Beard gazed all around at the assembled crowd and then asked, "Good people, who are those riding upon the backs of elephants?" They answered her, "This one is King Rūpasāra. This one is King Prasenajit. This one is King Brahmadatta. This one is King Śarpa of Vatsa." In the same way she inquired separately about all the wealthy householders, the merchants, the caravan leaders, the Kauḍyas, the Śākyas, the Licchavīs, and many others besides. Then afterward she spoke: "Good people, the one called Lagbryud Drogné, whom the Blessed One freed from a yakṣa — let him come forward here!" The crowd replied, "He has not come. In which direction does he dwell? Is he somewhere nearby?" She turned her face toward his direction and, declaring "He is my husband," flung the garland of flowers. Thereupon the kings, the wealthy householders, the merchants, the caravan leaders, the Kauḍyas, the Śākyas, the Licchavīs, and all the many other assembled people dispersed and departed each to their own lands. The householder Gāndha, ashamed and uneasy at heart, said to Bluish-Gray Beard, "Daughter, if by your choosing him you bring harm upon me from the kings, that is not acceptable — go quickly." She replied, "Father, do not be troubled; I shall do as you say." The householder Gāndha provided her with a fine vehicle, had her adorned with various ornaments, and sent her off with an escort to the wilderness retreat.

At that very time, the buddhas, the Blessed Ones — in whom there is not even a particle of unknowing, unseeingness, ignorance, or misperception; who are endowed with great compassion; who have entered into the benefit of the world; who are the solitary protectors, the uniquely courageous, the without-second, those who speak of nothing as dual; who abide in calm abiding and special insight; who illuminate the three knowledges; who are well trained in the three trainings; who are skilled in the ground of the three bases of taming; who have crossed beyond the four rivers; who move by means of the four bases of miraculous power; who dwell well upon the ground of conduct; who from of old have perfectly purified the four means of gathering beings; who are without any trembling by virtue of the four fearlessnesses; who have abandoned the five limbs; who have genuinely transcended the five destinies; who are endowed with the six limbs; who have fully perfected the six perfections; who dwell by means of the six constant abidings; who are rich in the flowers of the seven limbs of awakening; who teach the noble eightfold path; who are skilled in the nine successive meditative absorptions; who are possessed of the power of the ten powers; whose fame has perfectly spread throughout the ten directions; who are supremely exalted as rulers over a hundred times ten — the nature of such ones is to survey the world three times by day and three times by night with the eye of a buddha, beholding: who has declined, who has flourished, who has been harmed, who has become wretched, who has become unhappy, who has come to harm and wretchedness and suffering; who inclines toward the lower realms, who is falling toward the lower realms, who has fallen into the lower realms. "Those who are heading along the path to the lower realms I shall rouse and establish in higher rebirth, in liberation, and in its fruit. Those who are sinking in the swamp of desire I shall draw forth by the hand. Those who lack the wealth of noble riches I shall establish in the lordship of noble riches. The worlds adorned by the arising of buddhas I shall cause to have fruit."

"Those in whom roots of virtue have not yet arisen, I shall cause them to arise. Those in whom roots of virtue have already arisen, I shall bring them to full ripening. Those who have fully ripened, I shall bring to liberation." Such is the engagement of his knowledge and vision.

Then it was said in verse:

The venomous one who dwells in the crocodile's lair may at times transgress the appointed hour — but the loving-kindness of a buddha toward those he tames shall never transgress its appointed hour.

Just as a mother, for her one beloved child, thinks of that child always and guards its life, so too the Tathāgata thinks always of those he tames and guards their lives just so.

The mount of compassion residing in the stream of omniscience grows not weary in seeking the foal of those to be tamed.
The loving-kindness toward those who have fallen in existence and the lower realms is like the loving-kindness of a cow for the calf that has strayed far away.

The Blessed One then considered: "If the herdsman of Lagavud comes to see blue-green grass without having seen the truths, he will not become a vessel for those truths. I shall therefore go to his pasture-encampment in order to benefit him." Knowing this, as he was traveling through the countryside of Magadha, he came to the pasture-encampment and on the night road of the cattle path, in the place where the grass had been strewn, he consented to rest.

The cowherds, the herdsmen, those who cut grass, those who cut wood, those who lived by the road, and those who made their living as wayfarers — all of them saw the Blessed One resting in the night on the cattle road where the grass had been strewn. Having seen this, they went quickly, as quickly as could be, to the tent of the herdsman of Lagavud and said: "Householder! The Blessed One, by whom you were freed from the yakṣa, has come to the encampment and is resting in the night on the cattle path where the grass was strewn."

The herdsman of Lagavud then thought: "If I go tomorrow, the Blessed One may have departed to another place, and such a moment would be lost. I myself should go." Knowing this, he set out at once, going as fast as he could, and arrived just at the point when the noble gate was closing. And at that very time, Nīlapīta too arrived at the gate, but not having gotten inside, he agreed to spend the night at the gateway.

When dawn broke, the herdsman of Lagavud, moving with all possible haste, mounted his chariot and came out from the encampment. And Nīlapīta, also mounting a chariot, was entering the compound. The herdsman of Lagavud said: "Move your chariot aside!" And Nīlapīta said back: "You move your chariot aside!" But neither would move aside for the other. Then Nīlapīta looked carefully and said: "Are you the herdsman of Lagavud?" He replied: "People know me as such." The herdsman of Lagavud then said: "And are you Nīlapīta?" He replied: "People know me as such."

The herdsman of Lagavud said: "I am going before the Blessed One — move your chariot to the side. And you, go home for now." Nīlapīta replied: "Go to the holy man yourself!" and had his chariot moved to one side. The herdsman of Lagavud went toward where the Blessed One was, arrived there, and performed the appropriate courtesies of a householder in his individual way, gladdening the Blessed One, saying: "Blessed One, did you rest well?" — greeting him with individual courtesy.

Then the Blessed One spoke these words to the herdsman of Lagavud: "Lagavud, among those in the world who rest in ease, I too am sometimes one."

"Venerable One, on hard, rough ground, on a bedding of thin cloth set over cattle dung, in the winter season, in the middle of the eighth month of the cold period, when the frost rises with the moonlight not yet broken, and these ochre robes of yours are thin and torment the whole body —

"Lagavud, that is why I asked you directly. Answer as you are able to endure.

"Lagavud, consider this example. Suppose there were some householder or householder's son who was wealthy, with great possessions and extensive resources. For his sake a fine mansion was built, and within that fine mansion a multi-storied dwelling was built. Within that multi-storied dwelling was laid a couch draped with coverlets and cushions, a couch with an inner lining, a couch with a variegated spread, a couch with a great spread, a couch with a fine spread — and over these was placed a double-backed red cushion covered with a canopy of threefold cloth, together with an upper coverlet. Sesame-oil lamps burning through the night were set up, and a charming wife was placed nearby for pleasure and delight. Lagavud, what do you think? Would the sleeping arrangements of that man be comfortable or painful?"

"Venerable One, I think that man would indeed be among those in the world who rest in ease."

"Lagavud, what do you think? To a man who possesses such comfort and such pleasantness, could there arise torments born of desire, torments born of aversion, and torments born of delusion, arising and tormenting him? And being tormented by those torments, would that man sleep in suffering and not in ease?"

"The torments born of desire, torments born of aversion, and torments born of delusion — these the Tathāgata has fully known and cut off at the root, rendering them like a palm tree that has been felled: non-apparent, without a base, of a nature never to arise again. For this reason I said: among those in the world who rest in ease, I too am sometimes one."

Then at that moment the Blessed One spoke these verses:

The brahmin who has passed beyond all sorrow, who is unstained by desire,
who is fully freed from the aggregates — in every way that one rests in ease.

One who has cut off every craving, who has dispelled the fever of the heart, who has attained complete stillness and peace — that one rests in ease of mind.

Then the Blessed One instructed, established, uplifted, and delighted the herdsman of Lagavud with a Dharma discourse befitting the occasion. And he taught at length the Dharma discourse that the blessed buddhas have from ancient times undertaken: the discourse on generosity, the discourse on moral discipline, the discourse on the higher realms, the faults and defilement of sensual pleasures, the affliction of complete defilement, the benefit of purification, and the benefit of renunciation and of thorough seclusion — expounding the teachings that accord with the side of purification.

And when the Blessed One saw that the herdsman's mind was gladdened, composed, joyful, free from obscuration, and that he was endowed with the fortune and the capacity to understand the supreme teaching that the blessed buddhas proclaim — at that moment the Blessed One taught at length the supreme teaching of the blessed buddhas, namely the four noble truths in their fullness: suffering, the origin of suffering, cessation, and the path.

Just as a clean cloth free of all stains, when dipped in dye, takes the color evenly and well — so too the herdsman of Lagavud, seated right there, in that very sitting, realized the cessation and the path directly.

Then the herdsman of Lagavud, having seen the Dharma, having obtained the Dharma, having understood the Dharma, having reached the depth of the Dharma, having crossed beyond doubt, having crossed beyond uncertainty, having no further need to rely on another in the Teacher's dispensation, being one whom no other can lead astray, having attained fearlessness with respect to all phenomena — he rose from his seat, arranged his upper robe over one shoulder, bowed with joined palms toward the Blessed One, and addressed the Blessed One in these words:

"Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. May you accept me as a lay practitioner. From this day forth, for as long as life lasts, with sincere and heartfelt faith, I go for refuge."

Then the herdsman of Lagavud, having thus taken refuge before the Blessed One and having taken up the bases of training, attained the fruit of non-return. He then addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Venerable one, today I was sought out by Śyāmāvat, and today I have directly actualized the fruit of non-return — how then shall I fulfil my obligations in this regard?"

The Blessed One declared: "Lagavud, go. Your training is this: provide Śyāmāvat, as she has agreed, with whatever food and clothing she needs. That is the way of the world."

Then the herdsman of Lagavud bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One, departed to his own home, and said to Śyāmāvat: "Today you sought me out, and today, for my part, I went for refuge before the Blessed One, took up the bases of training, and attained the fruit of non-return. Therefore, if you wish, go to your father's household. If you do not wish to go, remain here, and I will provide you with whatever food and clothing you need."

She reflected: "If I were to leave, people would say that Lagavud found her inauspicious and did not keep her. Since this man is a son of the Buddha, I shall wait upon him and remain here." And so she stayed right there.

The herdsman of Lagavud then had a temple built, fully appointed with all necessary furnishings, and offered it to the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of śrāvakas. And so the elders composed a sūtra colophon saying:

"The Blessed One resided in the pastoral lands, in the finest forest of the pasture region."

The Vinaya Vibhaṅga, the seventy-fifth bundle.

Then at another time the herdsman of Lagavud was struck by illness, suffering greatly from a severe sickness. And the herdsman of Lagavud passed away from that very illness. The moment he passed away, he was reborn among the gods of the heaven free from torment.

Then the divine son who had been the herdsman of Lagavud reflected thus: "It would not be fitting for me to go into the presence of the Blessed One to see and pay homage to him while still dwelling in my celestial abode. Rather, I shall go into his presence to see him and pay homage without relying on my celestial dwelling at all."

Then the divine son who had been the herdsman of Lagavud, just as a person endowed with strength might extend a bent arm or draw back an extended arm — so swiftly did he vanish from the heaven free from torment and appeared in the presence of the Blessed One. And there the divine son who had been the herdsman of Lagavud let his body sink into the earth without touching the surface — just as melted butter, or oil with fine sand, or ash, when poured upon the ground, sinks in without touching the surface.

Then the Blessed One spoke to the divine son, the herdsman of Lagavud: "Lagavud, manifest yourself now with a coarse body, arouse the perception of solidity, and call to mind the mark of sitting."

Then the divine son, the herdsman of Lagavud, manifested a coarse body, aroused the perception of solidity, and calling to mind the mark of sitting, went to where the Blessed One was, approached him, and touched his head to the Blessed One's two feet in homage. He sat to one side. And by the power of the divine son's radiant complexion, all the finest highland forests roundabout were pervaded with a vast and brilliant light.

Seated to one side, the Blessed One addressed the divine son, the herdsman of Lagavud, with these words: "Divine son, whatever teachings you recited and learned when you were formerly a human being — do you still know them now?"

"Venerable one, whatever teachings I recited and learned when I was formerly a human being, I know those now all the more clearly. And whatever teachings I recited but did not manage to learn when I was formerly a human being — those too I now know. For the Dharma well taught by the Blessed One is easy to hold in mind and easy to proclaim.

"Just as the Blessed One dwells in Jambudvīpa surrounded by the fourfold retinue — monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen — and those beings think: 'Whatever Dharma teachings the Blessed One may teach us, we shall listen to them and practice accordingly, for that will be for our long-term welfare, benefit, and happiness' — in just the same way, venerable one, when I dwell in the heaven free from torment, surrounded by the gods of that heaven, the gods there think: 'Whatever Dharma teachings the divine son, the herdsman of Lagavud, may teach us, we shall listen to them and practice accordingly, for that will be for our long-term welfare, benefit, and happiness.'"

"Lagavud, through insatiable and unabandoned pursuit of how many teachings did you, after leaving a body, take birth in the heaven free from torment?"

"Venerable one, through three teachings that I never tired of and never abandoned, I left a body and was born in the heaven free from torment. Which three? Venerable one, I was never sated with beholding the Blessed One, and never abandoned it — and through that I left a body and was born in the heaven free from torment. Venerable one, I was never sated with listening to the Dharma, and never abandoned it — and through that I left a body and was born in the heaven free from torment. Venerable one, I was never sated with attending upon the Saṅgha, and never abandoned it — and through that I left a body and was born in the heaven free from torment."

Then, in that very moment, the divine son, the herdsman of Lagavud, spoke these verses:

With seeing the Blessed One, hearing the true Dharma, and attending upon the Saṅgha — even many times over, I never grew sated or turned away.

Taking up the noble teachings, devoted to taming avarice,
through insatiable pursuit of these three things,
Lagavud was born free from torment.

Then the divine son, the herdsman of Lagavud, expressed his delight and rejoicing at what the Blessed One had declared. He touched his head to the Blessed One's two feet in homage, circumambulated the Blessed One three times, and vanished then and there.

The monks, having arisen in doubt, asked the Blessed One, the buddha, to cut through every doubt. They said: "Venerable Blessed One, please look upon this: that the yakṣa herdsman of Lagavud, having separated from defilement, took refuge and was established in the bases of training."

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, I am now one who is free from attachment, free from aversion, free from delusion; who is fully liberated from birth, old age, sickness, and death, from grief, lamentation, suffering, mental distress, and agitation; who is omniscient, who sees all things, who has attained mastery over all knowledge and all objects of knowledge. Is it then any great wonder that the yakṣa herdsman of Lagavud, having separated from defilement, took refuge and was established in the bases of training? In times past, even while I was not yet fully liberated from attachment, aversion, and delusion, from birth, old age, sickness, and death, from grief, lamentation, suffering, mental distress, and agitation, the yakṣa herdsman of Lagavud, having separated from defilement, took refuge and was established in the bases of training. Listen now to that.

"Monks, long ago in the city of Vārāṇasī there lived a caravan leader by the name of Great Courage — wealthy, of great riches, with extensive resources, broad and vast in what he held, possessed of the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa, rivalling Vaiśravaṇa in treasure. At a certain time he set out along a wilderness road together with five hundred merchants. That road was threatened and blocked by a hairy demon. Great Courage then began to advance toward that demon's domain. Now the hairy demon, having openly transformed himself into the appearance of a brahmin, stood in the road and said to Great Courage: 'Caravan leader, this road is threatened and blocked by a hairy demon; I myself have come only with great difficulty — go by another road.' The caravan leader replied: 'Brahmin, be not so faint of heart. What can he do to me? I shall go.' When he had spoken thus, the hairy demon became enraged and changed his form. Stretching out both hands with his matted hair spread out along the ground, making his eyes red and glaring wide with both eyes, he said: 'Caravan leader, come then and attack me — and then leave!'

"Thereupon Great Courage the caravan leader, seeing how utterly terrifying he was, filled his bow to the ear and began to shoot arrows. But every one of them was caught in the matted hair. He shot the bow itself, and that too was caught. Likewise, spears and clubs and the like that were hurled — all of these too were caught in the matted hair. Then, without hesitation, he pressed forward with all his strength, and his whole body became entangled in the matted hair. The demon then spoke these verses:

Your two hands and two feet, and fifth, your head as well, are caught;
your very body is caught upon my body — what is there left that is not caught?

"The caravan leader in turn spoke these verses:

My two hands and two feet,
and fifth, my head as well, are caught;
my very body is caught upon your body — but what is not caught is my mind.

For as long as my resolve and diligence remain unbroken in secret, for that long I will contend with you.
Hold firm — you will not harm me.

"The demon too spoke verses in reply:

To one of such diligence as this,
to you, O Great Courage, I bow.
With such diligence as yours,
you are able to flee from all suffering.
I know there is no other person who is your equal, O Great Courage."

By your power the merchants shall go forth in happiness and ease.
You who feel compassion for all beings — to you, O caravan leader, I bow.
By your power the merchants shall go forth in perfect peace.

And so it was that there, at that time, the caravan leader of great courage, having heard what he heard from the hairy demon, taught the Dharma in just that way — purifying the hairy demon of defilements and establishing him in the five disciplines.

Monks, the one who was at that time and on that occasion the caravan leader of great courage — that was none other than myself. And the one who was at that time and on that occasion the hairy demon was the yakṣa Drokné. At that time too I purified him of defilements from that very deed and established him in the five disciplines; and now as well I have purified him of defilements from that very deed and established him in the going for refuge and the bases of training.

Then the monks, having grown uncertain, put all their doubts to the Blessed One, the buddha. "Venerable One, what deed did Lakgyü Drokné do such that he was given at birth as a food-offering to a yakṣa, and yet the Blessed One strove to liberate him?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, Lakgyü Drokné accumulated a mass of karma, fully transformed the conditions, remained like a lamp nearby — and having performed and gathered actions that are certain without fail to arise — the karma performed and accumulated by Lakgyü Drokné, who else would experience it individually? Monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been performed and accumulated ripens solely in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases.

Actions do not perish, even over a hundred aeons;
when the conditions and the time are met,
for beings who possess a body,
they will come forth as their fruits.

Monks, in this very great and excellent aeon of the past, when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, the Teacher, the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha endowed with knowledge and conduct, the Sugata, knower of the world, the unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, the teacher of gods and humans — the Blessed One Kāśyapa — appeared in the world. He dwelt in reliance upon the Forest of the Sages and the Deer Park at Vārāṇasī. In his dispensation there was a layman.

In a certain mountain retreat there lived a king who was exceedingly fond of a particular bird. Whenever any business at the royal palace arose, he would immediately take that bird on his hand and go before the king. Then one time when some business at the royal palace arose for that layman, he went there in the same way, but the king did not accomplish his purpose. Others then said to him: "This king is fond of birds — if you need your matter accomplished, offer him a bird." He offered the king a bird, and the king, entrusting it to the many birds in the aviary, accomplished that layman's purpose.

The layman then thought: "What I did in offering the bird was wrong — I should buy it back." He paid the aviary keeper a price, freed the bird, and made an aspirational prayer.

"By this wholesome root of having freed the impoverished bird from its captivity — that it might counteract the karma of having offered the bird to the king out of desire for personal gain — may the Blessed One strive to liberate me, who am impoverished and in captivity, to freedom." Such was the aspiration he made.

Monks, the layman of that time and occasion is this one who dwells in the wilderness by way of lineage. The karma of his having offered the bird to the king out of desire for personal gain ripened as his being given as a food-offering to the yakṣas. The karma of his later arising of remorse, his freeing of the bird, and his making of an aspirational prayer ripened such that I strove to liberate him, and I freed him from the yakṣas.

The monks, having arisen in doubt, asked the Blessed One — the buddha, the Bhagavān — who cuts through all doubt, to look into how the one dwelling in the wilderness by way of lineage had been freed from the blue-green yakṣa and established in the fruit of non-return. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is not only now. In the past as well, I freed this one who had a physical body from bondage and established him in the five superknowledges. Listen to this.

"Monks, long ago in Vārāṇasī there was a king named Brahmadatta who caused his kingdom to flourish, to prosper, and to enjoy good fortune year after year. The realm was filled with many people, utterly pacified of strife, conflict, external enemies, and internal discord, and free of thieves, famine, and disease. He caused it to abound in rows of śāli rice and sugarcane, in cattle and buffalo, and as a righteous king endowed with Dharma, he caused the kingdom to be governed by Dharma.

"His court herald took a wife from among women of equal station and sported with her, delighted in her, and made merry with her. At another time, a being entered the womb of this court herald's wife with whom he sported and delighted and made merry. Eight or nine months passed, and from the birth there came a boy whose hands and feet were joined by webbing. His relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day — three times seven days — after the birth they held a great naming celebration, and they deliberated on what name to give the boy. They thought: 'Because this boy's hands and feet are joined by webbing, the boy's name shall be Webbed-Hands-and-Feet.' And so they gave him the name Webbed-Hands-and-Feet.

"Again, at another time, a being entered the womb of this same court herald's wife with whom he sported and delighted and made merry. Eight or nine months passed, and from the birth there came a boy whose hands and feet were not joined by webbing. His relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day after the birth they held a great naming celebration and deliberated on what name to give the boy. They thought: 'Because this boy's hands and feet have no webbing, the boy's name shall be No-Webbed-Hands-and-Feet.' And so they gave him the name No-Webbed-Hands-and-Feet. The two were raised and reared and grew to be young men.

"When the elder son, Webbed-Hands-and-Feet, saw his father installing the court herald's duties by means of both what was Dharma and what was not Dharma, he thought: 'When I succeed my father and become the court herald, I too will be made to perform the herald's duties by both what is Dharma and what is not Dharma. If I am made to perform the herald's duties by what is Dharma and what is not Dharma and am thereby drawn toward the hell realms, that would be wrong. In every respect I shall go forth.' And so he went to his father and said: 'Father, will you permit me to go forth?' The father said:"

"Son, the herald's duties come to you ready-made — the offerings given, the fire sacrifices performed, the ascetics tormented. Why would you go forth?"

The son spoke these verses in reply:

Wearing robes of bark stripped from trees in the forest, eating fruits, dwelling with fierce and savage beasts — that I deem the higher life.

A wise one, fearing the world to come, should not for the sake of a kingdom perform the deeds of killing, binding, and beating — these are wrong to do.

The father, recognizing that the moment had come to yield, gave his permission. The son went among the sages, went forth, and through joy, effort, and striving he came to develop the five supernormal knowledges.

Now the second son, Without-Webbed-Hands-and-Feet, went to another region in search of a secret teaching, for the sake of a secret instruction. Along the southern road, on a certain rocky cliff, there sat a brahmin who had taken a wife of equal caste and was sporting with her, rejoicing and taking his pleasure. While he was sporting and rejoicing with her, his wife bore him a daughter. He thought: "I will not give this daughter away for the sake of caste, nor for wealth. I will give her to one who has recited the four Vedas. Whoever learns the four Vedas from me — to him I will give this daughter."

Now as the brahmin youth Without-Webbed-Hands-and-Feet was wandering about in saṃsāra, he went along the southern road and rested in a certain other direction, weary from the journey. He heard, word passing from one to another, of that brahmin, and he went to him. Speaking face to face, he said: "I wish to serve at the feet of the master. Why? For the sake of reciting the Vedas." "Son, so be it." The youth began to recite the Vedas with him, and being keen and clear in his conduct, within a short time he had fully mastered all four Vedas. Once he had mastered them, that brahmin gave the daughter to him.

When that brahmin youth lay in the upper chamber with her, it happened that the girl's fan fell below. He stretched out his arm like the trunk of an elephant and retrieved it. Seeing this, she was alarmed. Then the lamp went out, and again he stretched out his arm like the trunk of an elephant and revived it. When she saw this as well, she was greatly alarmed and would not sport, rejoice, or take her pleasure at ease with him. The girl said: "Prince, why is it that when you see me you contract your senses and will not sport at ease with me?" The youth said: "Do you see anyone sporting at ease with the lord of death?" The girl said: "Prince, do not be afraid — she has no thought of being unfaithful to her husband." The youth said: "In this matter, I must be mindful of the time."

The girl, frightened, sat while he fell asleep. The youth, without actually sleeping, lay in the manner of one asleep. When the girl perceived that he was asleep, she went in among the women of the household. The youth quietly rose and followed after her. When he saw all those household women disheveled, with hair unbound, sitting in frightful and fearsome postures, he was utterly alarmed and terrified, and he turned back. She too came after him, and he said: "My good woman, I cannot bear to stay — I will go." Seeing that he was absolutely resolved, she knew the moment had come to yield and said: "Prince, if you are truly determined to go, then go — but say nothing to anyone." Without saying a word to anyone, he went to that brahmin and said:

"Brahmin, I have come to you for guidance." The brahmin said: "My son, if that is the case, then go and bring the girl along with you." "Brahmin, it is from that very woman that I flee in fear." "My son, why do you fear her?" "Brahmin, she has no physical form." "My son, why would she be like that?" He said nothing more and went away.

The brahmin then said to the girl: "Daughter, do you not look after your own household?" Her father said to her what the youth had said. "Father," she replied, "he says that I have no physical form." "My daughter, you most certainly do have a physical form. He has slandered you with a grave falsehood and gone away." And he said nothing more and sat in silence.

Now that formless woman, tightly bound all over with a fierce binding, with her limbs and eyes contorted, went along the road and sat down before him and said: "Son of a nursing mother, she asked you to say nothing to anyone — yet you went and said it to her very own father. Now I shall utterly destroy you." And with that she began to do him harm. Terrified, he cried out with a great cry: "Homage to the noble one with webbed hands and feet! Homage to the noble one with webbed hands and feet! Homage!" he called out.

At that moment the goddess who delights in the noble one with webbed hands and feet swiftly went to him and said to the noble one with webbed hands and feet: "Noble one, your younger brother is in danger, in distress, and in pain — please have regard for him." He went there by miraculous power and said to her: "Do not harm this girl. What wrong has she done to you? If I drive her away, she will tell my father that I have no physical form — so I shall consume her. You, be gone." She replied: "This rakṣasī is a wretched creature — it is enough to let her go with a scolding." He said: "Noble one, I will release her by a vow — on the condition that she take ordination." She said: "Sister, let her go — and I will give her ordination." He released her, and she in turn ordained her. He gave her instructions, and with zeal, effort, and exertion she accomplished the five supernatural knowledges.

O monks, he who at that time and on that occasion was the elder son, the one reciting before the assembly, with webbed hands and feet — that was none other than myself. He who at that time and on that occasion was his younger brother without webbed hands and feet — that is this one here, Lagbrug Drogné. She who at that time and on that occasion was the formless woman — that is this one here, Ngobangschen. And at that time too I liberated this Lagbrug Drogné from the formless woman and established him in the five supernormal knowledges. And now likewise I have liberated this one from Ngobangschen and established him in the fruit of non-returning.

When the time came for Lagbrug Drogné, Ngobangschen had gone to Kauśāmbī, and on the very day that Ngobangschen went in search of Lagbrug Drogné among the people of Kauśāmbī, Lagbrug Drogné attained the fruit of non-returning. Saying nothing at all, that girl came back here. This news was heard and passed from one to the next, until the Eastern King of Badsā heard it. He summoned the householder Dangchen and said: "Householder, it is said that on the very day Ngobangschen went in search of Lagbrug Drogné, Lagbrug Drogné attained the fruit of non-returning and that girl came back here without a word being said. Is this true, or is it false?" He replied: "Your Majesty, it is true." "If that is so, why do you not give her to me?" "Your Majesty, I offer her." The king placed her within the retinue of his queen and also gave five hundred female attendants.

Every single day she also gave one thousand kārṣāpaṇas worth of materials for incense and garlands. She was also given a fine mansion called the Flower Porch. She had an attendant girl named Sgur Mchog, and every day that attendant would spend one thousand kārṣāpaṇas to purchase incense and garland materials. Then at some other time she began keeping company with a young incense-seller, and of the thousand kārṣāpaṇas he received each day, he would spend five hundred on flowers, incense, and garlands, while the other five hundred he spent on food and drink together with her.

Now, that young incense-seller was a man of faith. He invited the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of monks to another house for the midday meal, and he said to Sgur Mchog: "I have invited the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of monks to another house for the midday meal; you too should come and make preparations." That very night she readied clean and pure food and drink, rose early in the morning, spread the seats, set out water vessels, and sent the invitation. She invited the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable one, please consider lending your presence at the midday hour. Blessed One, please consider that the time has now arrived." Then the Blessed One put on his lower robe, took up his bowl and Dharma robe, and surrounded by the assembly of monks, with the Saṅgha of monks going before him, he proceeded to the place appointed by the young incense-seller and took his seat on the prepared seat at the head of the Saṅgha of monks.

Then the young incense-seller, together with Sgur Mchog, perceived that the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks were comfortably seated, and with their own hands they satisfied and refreshed them with clean and pure food and drink. Having in many ways satisfied and refreshed them with their own hands with clean and pure food and drink, and knowing that the Blessed One and the Saṅgha of monks had finished the midday meal and that the bowls had been set aside, Sgur Mchog took a low seat and sat in the presence of the Blessed One in order to hear the Dharma.

The Blessed One, having fully known Sgur Mchog's intention, her latent tendencies, her constitution, and her character, and having heard what had occurred, taught the Dharma to her as she sat on that very seat in such a way that it would cause her to individually and correctly realize the Four Noble Truths — striking down with the vajra of gnosis the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection that she had accumulated since beginningless time, and thereby directly producing the fruit of stream-entry. Having seen the truth, she spoke thus:

"Venerable one, by relying on the Blessed One as my virtuous friend, what the Blessed One has done for me here is something that neither my father did for me, nor my mother, nor the king, nor the gods, nor my ancestors of old, nor the śramaṇas and brahmins, nor my friends and companions, nor the company of my relatives. He has dried up the ocean of blood and tears; he has liberated me from the mountains of bones; he has sealed shut the doors of the lower rebirths; he has opened the doors of the higher realms and liberation; he has lifted my foot out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; he has placed me among gods and humans; he has brought cyclic existence to its end. Having struck down with the vajra of gnosis the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time, I have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I have entered the stream. Venerable one, I take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the Saṅgha of monks. I request to be accepted as a laywoman. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge with sincere and wholehearted devotion."

Then the Blessed One taught the Dharma to the two of them and departed.

Śrīgupta spoke to the young incense-seller: "Son of my lord, now please present me with goods worth a thousand kārṣāpaṇas, taking nothing that has not been given — not so much as another person's sesame husk — without the taint of theft."

The boy replied, "By all means, gladly," and gave him goods worth a thousand kārṣāpaṇas.

The boy took them and went to Śyāmāvatī's palace. She asked, "Śrīgupta, how did you come to sleep with your head turned away tonight?"

He replied, "My lady, I used to steal. But now I have understood a quality of such a kind that henceforth I will never again engage in afflictions of that sort."

She asked, "And what did you do today?" Since she was one who retained what she heard, he related the occasion to her in full.

She then said, "Śrīgupta, you must go and hear the Dharma in the Blessed One's presence, and then tell it to me. That is your task."

He replied, "My lady, it shall be done."

Thereupon Śrīgupta heard the Dharma in the Blessed One's presence and related it to her.

The Blessed One had asked Śrīgupta, "Śrīgupta, do you teach the Dharma to the queen's retinue?"

Śrīgupta answered, "Blessed One, you teach; I teach as you teach, standing before them, and they come and listen."

The Blessed One declared: "If they ask you, 'Śrīgupta, teach us the Dharma,' you should say, 'I will not teach.' And why? Because the Blessed One completed the six perfections over three immeasurable eons, through hundreds of thousands of acts of austerity, and thereby came to know unsurpassable knowledge. How then could I teach to those among you who show no reverence, who are without the proper grounds of respect, and who are seated on thrones higher than mine? That is what you should say."

Some time later, Śrīgupta heard the Dharma in the Blessed One's presence and entered among the queen's retinue. They said to him, "Śrīgupta, teach us the Dharma."

He replied, "I will not teach."

"Why not?"

"Because the Blessed One completed the six perfections over three immeasurable eons, through hundreds of thousands of acts of austerity, and thereby came to know unsurpassable knowledge. How then could I teach to those among you who show no reverence, who are without the proper grounds of respect, and who are seated on thrones higher than mine?"

When Śyāmāvatī heard this, she had a lion throne set up. Others spread woolen cushions, and still others raised and arranged them accordingly. Śrīgupta sat upon the lion throne, and taught them what he had heard. Through this, Śyāmāvatī and the other five hundred women gained a profound understanding: some directly realized the fruit of stream-entry, some the fruit of once-returning, and some the fruit of non-returning. Such was the Dharma teaching he gave.

These women then gave rise to faith born from the cause of the Dharma through Śrīgupta, and they spoke to the eastern king of Bādrā: "Lord, we wish to see the Buddha."

He replied, "So it shall be," and saying, "Let us go into the presence of the Blessed One," he went to where the Blessed One was. He arrived, bowed with his head at the Blessed One's two feet, and sat to one side.

Sitting to one side, the king of Bādrā addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Blessed One, the retinue of the court wishes to see the Blessed One."

The Blessed One then declared:

"Great King, Tathāgatas, arhats, perfectly and completely awakened buddhas do not enter into the inner quarters of the royal consorts."

The king went and told the women this. Then Śrīgupta spoke: "Lord, if the Blessed One will not come into the inner quarters of the consorts, then let many windows be opened in the wall of the flowering palace, and please allow us to look upon the Blessed One through the windows."

The king had five hundred windows opened in the wall of the flowering palace. When the Blessed One came in that direction, those women of the royal retinue saw the Blessed One through the windows and made offerings and showed reverence, scattering flowers, incense, garments, and garlands of blossoms.

Now, a wandering merchant named Many-Colored Tamer had a wife named Burma, and she gave birth to a daughter who was beautiful, lovely, and fair, possessed of every perfect limb and feature, whose bones were so fine and delicate that no comparison could be made. Her relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day they held a great birth celebration, and they deliberated on what name to give the girl. The relatives said: "This girl is beautiful, lovely, and fair, possessed of every perfect limb and feature, and her bones are so fine and delicate that no comparison can be made. Because she is beyond compare, let her name be Incomparable," and so they gave her the name Incomparable.

She was nursed and raised and grew to be a young woman. Her mother thought: "I will not give this daughter of mine to anyone merely on account of lineage, nor for wealth, nor for learning. I will give her only to one who equals or surpasses her in beauty."

At that time the Blessed One was traveling through the land of Kuru, and coming to Many-Colored Tamer he stayed in the town of Many-Colored Tamer in the land of Kuru. Then in the early morning the Blessed One put on his lower robe, took his alms bowl and Dharma robe, and entered Many-Colored Tamer for alms. Having completed his alms round in Many-Colored Tamer and taken his meal, he returned from the subsequent alms round, arranged his seat according to custom, and leaned against a tree, sitting cross-legged like a lion at rest.

At that time, Incomparable had gone out to gather flowers and firewood. From a great distance she saw the Blessed One — beautiful, inspiring faith, his faculties calm, his mind serene, perfectly tame in spirit, abiding in perfect peace — blazing like a golden shrine tree. Seeing him, joy and supreme delight arose in her, and she thought: "A mendicant as beautiful and inspiring as this would be worthy to be master of all of Jambudvīpa — to say nothing of being master of Incomparable, for I have found a husband." Recognizing this, she went to her home and spoke to her mother: "Good woman, know this: I have found a husband for my daughter. Adorn her and give Incomparable to him."

She asked, "To whom shall she be given?"

He replied, "To the mendicant Gautama."

She asked, "How shall we proceed?"

And just then, right there on the road, as they set out together, a thought arose in him, and he spoke these verses:

"I, a brahmin, saw that great sage entering Many-Colored Tamer for alms —"

The ground where he had stepped turned red, and when he lifted his foot, even the low ground rose up high. The householder said to the young man:

"Do not rely upon her. Go back and proceed to your own enclosure." And he too spoke a verse:

"Alas, inauspicious daughter-in-law, you are unlucky!
At an auspicious time, do not speak of inauspiciousness.
If one were to take her by means of an ascetic vow,
even then one would go on enjoying sensual pleasures."

Then they adorned Incomparable with garments and ornaments, and set out to meet the noble one. But the Blessed One had already departed from that grove to another grove. At that moment, the wandering mendicant saw a seat of grass that had been spread out for the Blessed One. Upon seeing it, he spoke to his wife: "Good woman, know this: this is the seat of grass spread out for our daughter's bridegroom." And he spoke a verse:

"The bed of one filled with attachment is disturbed.
The bed of one filled with aversion is full of doubt and restlessness.
The bed of one filled with delusion ends up at the foot of the feet.
This one is the resting place of one utterly free from attachment.
The householder said to the young man: Do not rely upon her.
Go back and proceed to your own enclosure."

And he too spoke a verse:

"Alas, inauspicious daughter-in-law, you are unlucky!
At an auspicious time, do not speak of inauspiciousness.
If one were to take her by means of an ascetic vow,
even then one would go on enjoying sensual pleasures."

Then the wandering mendicant saw the footprints of the Blessed One. Upon seeing them, he spoke to his wife: "Good woman, these are the footprints of our daughter's bridegroom." And he spoke a verse:

"The footprints of a man filled with attachment are not clear.
The footprints of one filled with aversion are sunken deep.
The footprints of one filled with delusion are scattered and disordered.
The footprints of one utterly free from attachment are like these.
The householder said to the young man: Do not rely upon her.
Go back and proceed to your own enclosure."

And he too spoke a verse:

"Alas, inauspicious daughter-in-law, you are unlucky!
At an auspicious time, do not speak of inauspiciousness."

If one were to take her by means of an ascetic vow,
even then one would go on enjoying sensual pleasures."

Then the Blessed One cleared his throat, and the wandering mendicant heard the sound of the Blessed One clearing his throat. Upon hearing it, he spoke to his wife: "Good woman, this is the sound of our daughter's bridegroom clearing his throat." And he spoke a verse:

"The voice of a man filled with attachment is rough and harsh.
The voice of a man filled with aversion is coarse.
The voice of a man filled with delusion is confused and agitated.
This drum-sound of Brahmā is a buddha.
The householder said to the young man: Do not rely upon her.
Go back and proceed to your own enclosure."

And he too spoke a verse:

"Alas, inauspicious daughter-in-law, you are unlucky!
At an auspicious time, do not speak of inauspiciousness.
If one were to take her by means of an ascetic vow,
even then one would go on enjoying sensual pleasures."

Then the Blessed One, from quite a distance, cast his gaze upon the wandering mendicant, and the wandering mendicant saw the Blessed One looking at him. Upon seeing this, he spoke to his wife: "Good woman, this is our daughter's bridegroom, looking." And he spoke a verse:

"A man filled with attachment looks with darting, flickering glances.
A man filled with aversion looks like a fierce venomous serpent.
A man filled with delusion looks as though groping in darkness.
One utterly free from attachment looks with a gaze steady as a balance-beam.
The householder said to the young man: Do not rely upon her.
Go back and proceed to your own enclosure."

And he too spoke a verse:

"Alas, inauspicious daughter-in-law, you are unlucky!
At an auspicious time, do not speak of inauspiciousness.
If one were to take her by means of an ascetic vow,
she will only go back to indulging in sensual pleasures."

The Blessed One was walking in meditation, and a wandering woman chanced to see the Blessed One as he walked. Having seen him, she said to her husband: "My good man, this is the son-in-law of a girl — he is out walking."

She spoke a verse:

"How he looks with those eyes, and how he walks with that steady, composed bearing,
how his complexion and face appear utterly free from dust and stain — householder, do not rely on that young man.
Go back and proceed to your own enclosure."

And he too spoke verses:

"Alas, inauspicious daughter-in-law, you are unlucky!
At an auspicious time, do not speak of inauspiciousness.
If one were to take her by means of an ascetic vow,
she will only go back to indulging in sensual pleasures.
The settled golden Otala trees too are bewildered by desire for the sake of a son, and by offering this in accordance with Dharma, the sages have perpetually and continuously fathered children."

Then the wandering woman went to where the Blessed One was, approached him, and addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"My noble daughter, possessed of beautiful form, adorned with silks, seeking her heart's desire —
I offer her to you; look upon her, as one looks upon the autumn moon amidst the heavens — rejoice well together with her, I pray."

The Blessed One reflected: "If I were to speak words of affection toward the Incomparable One, there would arise a situation in which the Incomparable One, tormented by attachment, would bring about her own end. Therefore I should speak words of anger toward her." Recognizing this, he declared a verse:

"Brahmin, I have defeated the daughters of Māra — Craving, Delight, and Pleasure — and not once, toward all those objects of desire, have I ever generated a mind of longing."

As for this body filled with urine and excrement,
I feel no inclination even to touch it with my foot."

The mother then offered a verse:

"Do you see my daughter as deficient in beauty, lacking in desirable qualities?
As you are strongly inclined toward pleasing forms fit for sensual enjoyment, why do you not act toward her likewise?"

The Blessed One in turn declared verses:

"Brahmin, the deluded one who is attached to sense-objects — it is your daughter who cultivates that state, who has entered into attachment and anger toward objects.
A person deeply deluded like this is not free from attachment.
I am the buddha, the chief among sages, sovereign lord;
I have attained unsurpassed, peaceful awakening.
Just as a lotus is unstained by water,
I move through the world without attachment.
As a blue lotus born in mud and water is unstained by the mud and water, so too, brahmin, do I move through the world, engaging with objects of desire with a mind fully liberated."

Then the Incomparable One, having been addressed by the Blessed One with the words "urine and excrement," was stripped of her satisfaction and became inwardly uncomfortable. The entire binding web of her attachment was dissolved, and aversion arose, causing her bones to become prominent and her two eyes to become sunken like those of a skull.

At that moment, an aged woman happened to be seated at the edge of the Blessed One's robe. That aged woman then addressed the Blessed One with these words:

"O All-seeing One, you have accepted a woman.
Blessed One, grant her to me, I pray.
O Hero, this one adorned with pride —
I shall pursue her in a way that is pleasing."

When she had spoken thus, the Blessed One addressed that aged woman:

"You deluded creature, get away from my presence!"

Angered, she spoke a verse:

"May this begging bowl of yours and this Dharma robe of yours, and these round lumps of food as well, all be exhausted!
May this training of yours likewise become like that of a mother — "— embracing one as young as a child in one's arms."

Having spoken those words, the aged woman surrendered her training, entered the state of one who has fallen away, and went to where there was a wandering woman named Madugā. Arriving there, she said to the wandering woman Madugā: "Madugā, matchless one — give her to me." Madugā, angered, replied: "Old woman, I would not even give you a glance — let alone a touch, what need is there to speak of it?" When she had spoken thus, such a state of total anguish arose in that aged woman that she vomited hot blood, and when her time came, she died and was reborn in the hells.

Here ends the seventy-sixth fascicle of the Vinayavibhaṅga.

Doubts having arisen among the monks, they asked the Blessed One, the buddha, to resolve all doubts. "Venerable Blessed One, consider the time when Madugā, the matchless one, was found and taken in."

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is not only now. In the past as well, when I found her, I did not take her. Listen to this.

Monks, long ago there was a blacksmith living on a certain rocky crag. He had taken a wife of equal birth, and together with her he sported, rejoiced, and lived in delight. While he was thus sporting, rejoicing, and living in delight with her, at another time his wife conceived. Eight or nine months passed, and she gave birth — a daughter was born, beautiful of form, lovely and fair to look upon. He raised and nurtured her, and she grew up.

The blacksmith thought: 'I will not give this daughter to just anyone — not on account of family, not on account of beauty, not on account of wealth. Rather, I will give her only to one whose craft equals or surpasses my own.'

Now, as it happened, a young brahmin entered his house to beg for alms. The daughter, carrying food, came out. The young brahmin saw her and said: 'Girl, have you given to anyone, or not?' She replied: 'According to what my father says, it would be hard for him to give me to anyone at all.' 'What does your father say?' 'My father says: I will not give this daughter to just anyone — not on account of family, not on account of beauty, not on account of wealth — but only to one whose craft equals or surpasses my own.' 'And what craft does your father know?' 'He knows how to forge needles that float upon water.'

The young brahmin thought: 'Though I have no need of this matter myself, I will break her pride.' Since he was skilled, he went to the various workshops and workplaces, examined the blacksmith's tools, and forged needles of the kind that float upon water — and in addition forged one thick needle, and threaded seven fine needles through its eye, all floating together upon the water. Having forged these, he came to the blacksmith's house and called out: 'Buy needles! Buy needles!'

The daughter saw him and spoke a verse:

"Friend, have you gone mad,
or have you lost your senses?
Why have you come to sell needles here in a blacksmith's house?"

He too spoke in verse:

"Good lady, I have not gone mad,
nor have I lost my senses.
It was to break your pride that I applied myself to the craft.
If your father should recognize that my craft is equal to his, then give me yourself and wealth besides — many other things as well."

She said: "And what craft do you know?"

He replied: "I know how to make needles that float on water like those."

He whispered to her mother: "Dear lady, there is a young craftsman here." She said: "Let him come in." When he was let in, the blacksmith's wife asked: "What craft do you know?" He told her, and she in turn whispered to her husband: "This young man, the son of a noble lord, wishes to display such-and-such a craft." The husband said: "If that is so, bring some water and let us see." She filled a vessel with water and offered it to him. He placed one needle in it, and it began to float. Likewise, when he placed the second needle, and so on up to the seventh, they too began to float. He placed the thick needle in, and it too began to float. Then he placed one needle there in a different manner, and even so it began to float. Likewise, he placed the second, and so on up to the seventh in that other manner, and even so they began to float.

The blacksmith thought to himself: "This one's craft surpasses my own; I shall give him my daughter." Knowing this, he adorned his daughter with all her ornaments, took her hand in his left hand, held a ball of lac in his right hand, sat down before that brahmin youth, and said: "Young brahmin, I give this girl to you as your wife."

The youth replied: "I have no desire for this. I did all of this only to break your pride and to demonstrate my craft to you."

"O monks, he who was the brahmin youth at that time and on that occasion — that was none other than myself. He who was the blacksmith at that time and on that occasion — that is this wanderer Māra. She who was the blacksmith's wife at that time and on that occasion — that is Burmā. And she who was the blacksmith's daughter at that time and on that occasion — that is this Upamā. And just as I found Upamā then and did not take her, so even now I have found her and have not taken her."

Again, doubts arose among the monks, and having doubts they addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha, to resolve them all: "Venerable one, look upon how this elder, on account of Upamā, comes to suffer through improper conduct."

The Blessed One declared: "O monks, it is not only now. In times past as well, on account of Upamā, he fell into suffering through improper conduct together with a queen and her retinue. Listen to this.

"O monks, long ago, in a certain royal palace like a lion's hall, there reigned a king named Siṃhakeśarī — Lion-Maned — whose realm was prosperous, flourishing, happy, blessed with good harvests, and filled with many people and subjects. Foreign enemies and internal strife were thoroughly pacified; the realm was free from thieves, famine, and disease; and he caused it to abound in rows of śāli rice and sugar cane, in cattle and buffalo. He was a righteous man, a righteous king, who caused his kingdom to be governed according to the Dharma.

"At that time, in that same royal palace like a lion's hall, there lived a merchant chief named Siṃha — the Lion — who was wealthy, richly endowed with possessions, of vast and extensive holdings, with wealth to rival the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa, the son of the All-Hearing, rivaling Vaiśravaṇa himself in riches. He took a wife from among those of equal station, and with her he played, rejoiced, and took his pleasure. While he played with her, rejoiced with her, and took his pleasure, a being entered the womb of his wife.

"Now, there are certain women who are skilled in the ways of women and who possess five unmistakable qualities. What are these five? They know when a man has developed attachment and when he has ceased to be attached; they know the proper time and recognize the lunar signs; they know when a being has entered the womb; they know from whom a being has entered the womb; and —" they know whether a being is male or female. If it is male, the being rests leaning to the right side of the womb; if it is female, it rests leaning to the left.

She was glad and rejoiced, and she said to her husband: "My lord's son should know that a being has entered my womb, and since it rests leaning to my right side, it will certainly be a boy." He too was glad and rejoiced, and he made this solemn declaration, saying aloud: "For long have I desired to see the face of a son — one who is born in harmony with me and not discordant with me, one who will carry on my affairs, one who will repay the care I give him, one who will enjoy his inheritance, and one who will cause my lineage to endure for a long time. And when we have died and the proper time has come, may he give gifts — whether few or many — and make merit, and may he follow us both to whatever realm we are reborn in, reciting the dedication of merit by name." When he realized a being had entered the womb, in order to bring to full maturity the one dwelling in the womb, he arranged that the upper chambers of the fine house served as her quarters: when it was cold, she was attended with things that bring warmth; when it was warm, with things that bring coolness. The physician-prescribed food was not too bitter, not too sour, not too salty, not too sweet, not too hot, and not too pungent — free from the extremes of bitterness, sourness, saltiness, sweetness, heat, and pungency. She was adorned with necklaces and garlands, her body bedecked with ornaments, moving about as if she were a goddess's daughter sporting in a pleasure grove. She was carried from seat to seat, from couch to couch, so that she never set foot on the bare ground, and she never heard even the slightest unpleasant sound. In this way she was attended, entirely without discomfort.

When eight or nine months had passed, she gave birth, and the boy who came forth was handsome, beautiful, lovely, and radiant, with a complexion like gold, a head like a parasol, long arms, prominent collarbones at the shoulders, graceful eyebrows, and a high nose-bridge.

His relatives assembled and gathered together, and on the twenty-first day — three weeks of seven days — after the birth, a great birth-feast was held, and they proceeded to give the boy his name. His relatives said: "Because this boy is the son of the caravan leader Siṃha, let his name be Siṃhala." And so he was named Siṃhala.

The boy Siṃhala was entrusted to eight nurses: two who held him in their laps and suckled him, two who gave him milk, two who bathed and cleaned him, and two who played with him and kept him company. These eight nurses nourished him, caused him to grow, and made him flourish swiftly, like a lotus dwelling in a pond. When he had grown up, he entered upon the study of letters, arithmetic, accounting, finger-reckoning, and the arts of giving and receiving and keeping records. He became thoroughly accomplished in writing — in analysing, reading, mastering, and clearly applying it — and he became expert in the eight kinds of appraisal: the appraisal of jewels, appraisal of land, appraisal of cloth, appraisal of carriages, appraisal of elephants, appraisal of horses, appraisal of women, and appraisal of men.

His father then established three households for his wife — superior, middling, and inferior. He had her installed in three seasonal residences — one for winter, one for spring, and one for summer. He had her installed in three seasonal pleasure gardens — one for winter, one for spring, and one for summer.

In the upper mansion, in the inner quarters where no men were present, the women entertained themselves with music, made merry, and enjoyed themselves in delight.

Then, at another time, the young man spoke to his father: "Father, please grant me permission to set out upon the great ocean." His father replied: "Son, I have wealth of many kinds. Even if you were to spend jewels just as freely as one spends sesame, rice, barley, and beans and the like, still my resources would not become thin, be exhausted, or run out. Therefore, for as long as I am alive, take your pleasure, make merry, and enjoy yourself in delight, and when I am gone, then apply yourself to acquiring wealth." But the young man asked again and again: "Father, please grant me permission to set out upon the great ocean." The father, knowing that the time for his passing was surely at hand, said: "Son, let it be so. In this matter, you must endure the dangers and the terrors you will encounter."

The father then had a proclamation announced throughout the royal palace, like the roar of a lion: "Hear this, all wise merchants who dwell in the royal palace and who have come from various lands. The caravan-leader Siṅgāla is about to set out upon the great ocean. Whoever among you wishes to venture into the great ocean together with caravan-leader Siṅgāla — without makeshift rafts, without ropes, without a stitched-together vessel — let them make ready their provisions for the journey to the great ocean." Five hundred merchants made ready their provisions for the journey to the great ocean.

Then the caravan-leader Siṅgāla gazed upon his father and mother and the other dear kinsmen to whom he was bound, and, having chosen a day, a date, an auspicious moment, and a favorable conjunction — auspicious, fortunate, and propitious — he loaded the provisions for the great ocean journey onto carts, pack-loads, and burdens, and onto mules, female elephants, cattle, and many donkeys, and set out accompanied by the retinue of five hundred merchants. Traveling onward through villages, towns, hamlets, districts, and royal residences, surveying the trading centers along the way, he arrived at the shore of the great ocean. There he fitted out five hundred old vessels, took on board those five persons who make their living from the sea — the bailer, the caulker, the ship's carpenter, the chief swimmer, and the one who reads the winds — and after a triple proclamation was made, he set out upon the great ocean.

Then those merchants thought to themselves: "Wise friends, for those of us who are going into the midst of the great ocean, it is difficult to be certain of crossing safely, one and all. We who seek to acquire wealth, each from our own [store of] poverty, have taken up our swimming-boards for use in the water and entered upon the great ocean. Some of us have brought flat boards of the śālmālī tree, some have brought bundles of reeds and wool, some have brought gourd floats, and some have brought goat-skin bladders." And so those wealth-seekers, having thus each made their own reflections, took each from their own poverty's provision their swimming-boards for the water — some carrying flat boards of the śālmālī tree, some carrying bundles of reeds and wool, some carrying gourd floats, and some carrying goat-skin bladders — and entered upon the great ocean.

As they ventured into the midst of the great ocean, sea-monsters of the fish kind wrecked the ocean vessel. When the vessel was wrecked, those who had brought along swimming-boards for the water, each drawn from their own poverty's store, mounted them accordingly: some rode upon the flat boards of the śālmālī tree, some rode upon bundles of reeds and wool, some rode upon gourd floats, and some rode upon goat-skin bladders, floating upon the water.

By the karmic maturation of their deeds, a wind arose from the north and drove them to the southern shore. On the copper-colored island there dwelt rākṣasīs known as Young Cranes, and these began to deceive the shipwrecked merchants with sweet words and joyful airs. They had two kinds of victory-banners: one suited to a place of joy, and one suited to a place of poverty. As soon as they began waving the victory-banner suited to a place of joy, they called out: "Dear brothers, the ocean vessel of the merchants of Jambudvīpa was wrecked by sea-monsters of the fish kind — come, come without delay, we are searching for you along the shore!" And so they began searching along the ocean shore.

Then the rākṣasīs saw a great mass of ordinary people swimming toward them on all manner of swimming-boards. Seeing them, they transformed themselves into the appearance of beautiful women, adorned themselves with various ornaments, draped themselves in divine garments and garlands of flowers, and began calling from the ocean shore: "Come hither, masters! Come hither, fair-faced ones! Be the husbands of those of us who have no husbands! Be the lords of those who have no lord! Be the home of those who have no home! Be the island of those who have no island! Be the protector of those who have no protector! Be the refuge of those who have no refuge! Be the ally of those who have no ally! Here are your sources of food, your sources of drink, your sources of clothing, your sources of lodging, pleasure gardens that will delight you, forests that will delight you, lotus ponds that will delight you — and here are the many precious things of Jambudvīpa: jewels, pearls, lapis lazuli, white crystal, coral, silver, gold, the essence of stone, rubies, red gems, and right-spiraling conches. Come hither! Sport with us, rejoice with us, and make merry with us! But let none of you, even if you become very drunk, ever walk southward." This is what they said.

The Blessed One then declared: "O monks, I have not seen any other form by which the form of a woman so captivates a man, so intoxicates him, so fills him with desire, so becomes dear to him, so engenders affection, so brings on infatuation, so stupefies him, so binds him, so enthralls him, and so thoroughly engages him."

When the rākṣasīs called out to them in this way, the men crossed the great ocean and went to sport with them, to rejoice with them, and to make merry with them. Through their consorting with those rākṣasīs in sport, rejoicing, and merriment, sons and daughters were born.

Then the navigator Siṃhala thought to himself: "Why do these women guard the southern road so vigilantly?" He resolved that he would sleep together with one of these women, and when he knew she had fallen asleep and gone to bed, he very quietly and slowly slipped out of the great bed, tucked a sharp sword under his arm, and set off southward.

Then the navigator Siṃhala, having known that the woman with whom he lay had fallen asleep and gone to bed, very quietly and slowly slipped out of the great bed, tucked a sharp sword under his arm, and set off southward. There he heard the sound of a great many people wailing and lamenting: "Alas, father! Alas, mother! Alas, brothers! Alas, sisters! O you who will rejoice in Jambudvīpa in every varied way — you who will rejoice in Jambudvīpa, have you abandoned us?" Hearing this, he was seized with fear, dread, terror, and his hair stood on end.

Then the navigator Siṃhala sat for a little while without saying a word, and when he had dispelled that fear, dread, terror, and the standing of hair on end, he continued along that same southern road. There he saw a great iron city, tall and broad. Thinking there might be some window in that city, he went all the way around it, but going all the way around that city he could not find so much as an opening through which a cat might enter.

On the northern face of that city there stood great tall and broad śirīṣa trees. He climbed one of those great tall and broad śirīṣa trees and addressed that great multitude of people in these words: "O wise ones, why do you wail and lament so grievously — 'Alas, father! Alas, mother! Alas, brothers! Alas, sisters! O you who will rejoice in Jambudvīpa in every varied way — you who will rejoice in Jambudvīpa, have you abandoned us?'"

They replied: "O patient one, we are merchants of Jambudvīpa who sought wealth, fitted out a ship for the ocean, and desired to venture out onto the great ocean. We thought to ourselves: 'O wise ones, it is very difficult to cross the great ocean safely and with certainty. Therefore, we wealth-seeking merchants, each providing according to our means for the sake of the destitute, took flotation devices and set out upon the great ocean. Some among us brought planks of the śalmali tree; some brought logs of thorn-covered wood; some brought gourds; and some brought goat-hide floats.' Then we merchants, having each thus deliberated and each taken a flotation device according to his means for the sake of the destitute — some taking śalmali planks, some taking logs of thorn-covered wood, some taking gourds, and some taking goat-hide floats — entered the great ocean. While we were venturing into the great ocean, sea-monsters of the fish species smashed our ship. When our ship was smashed, we mounted the flotation devices we had each brought for the sake of the destitute — some riding on śalmali planks, some on logs of thorn-covered wood, some on gourds, and some on goat-hide floats — and drifted upon the water. By the karmic maturation of our actions, a wind arose from the north and drove us to the southern shore. Here on this copper island there dwell rākṣasīs known as 'Young Cranes,' who deceive us shipwrecked merchants with fair words and pleasing displays. They have two kinds of banners: one that corresponds to a place of joy, and one that corresponds to a place of misfortune. Just as soon as they began to wave the banner that corresponds to the place of joy, those rākṣasīs said:"

"Dear brothers, the banner corresponding to the place of joy has been waved! The ships of the merchants of Jambudvīpa have been wrecked by the sea-monsters, and those who were not lost outright have been sought — come, we are searching for them along the shore!" And with those words they began to search along the seashore. Before long, they caught sight of us — a great multitude of ordinary merchants drifting in on various floats. When they saw us, they each manifested a beautiful form, adorned themselves with varied ornaments, wrapped garlands of flower-strands about them, and draped themselves in divine garments. Then, from the shore, they began to call out: "Come hither, masters! Come hither, fair ones! Be husbands to those of us who have no husbands! Be lords to those of us who have no lords! Be a home to those of us who have no home! Be an island to those of us who have no island! Be a protector to those of us who have no protector! Be a refuge to those of us who have no refuge! Be companions-in-arms to those of us who have no companions-in-arms! Here you will find places of food and places of drink, places of clothing and places of lodging; pleasure groves that bring delight, and woodland gardens that bring delight, and lotus-ponds that bring delight; and the many precious things of Jambudvīpa — gems and pearls, beryl, white crystal, coral, silver, gold, essences of stone, conch shells, red gems, and right-spiraling shells. Come hither! Take pleasure with us, take joy with us, make merry with us! And though any among you may become utterly intoxicated, do not go southward!" they said.

We were enticed by those rākṣasīs, crossed the great ocean to them, and took pleasure with them, took joy with them, and made merry with them. From our consorting with them as we sported and rejoiced and made merry, sons and daughters were also born. Those women sported with us and took joy with us and made merry with us — and so it continued, until the time when we heard that yet more merchants of Jambudvīpa, their ships wrecked by the sea-monsters, were coming. At the moment those women heard that a very great number of other merchants of Jambudvīpa were coming, their ships wrecked by the sea-monsters, they came in among us and ate those others; and when they devoured a man in this fashion, they left not even the remnants of hair, body-hair, nails, and teeth — none of it was left. And when they devoured those men, whatever drops of warm blood fell upon the ground, those too they licked up with their fingertips, again and again, and placed in their mouths along with the dirt. As for those who had not yet been eaten — that was ourselves. They put us in this great iron fortress, and: 'Know this, patient one — those patient women are rākṣasīs, so protect yourself!' Siṃhala then said: 'O wise ones, is there any means by which both you and I might travel to Jambudvīpa in safety and well-being?' They replied: 'Patient one, we know of no means whatsoever by which we might travel to Jambudvīpa in safety and well-being.' 'And why is that?'

'If we were to think, "Let us tunnel beneath this iron fortress and escape," it would redouble and treble underneath. If we were to think, "Let us scale over the top of this iron fortress and escape," it would redouble and treble on top. And so, patient one, that is why there is no means whatsoever by which we might travel to Jambudvīpa in safety and well-being. But for you there is a means by which you might travel to Jambudvīpa in safety and well-being.' 'O wise ones, what is that means by which we might travel to Jambudvīpa in safety and well-being?' 'Patient one, we have heard from above the sound of gods moving through the air, proclaiming this: "Ho, you foolish merchants of Jambudvīpa! On this very day, the fifteenth day of the restoration ceremony, make for the northern road! There stands the king of horses, named Cloud-Swift, who has been eating the grain of unharvested, unsown rice, and is well-fed, healthy, strong, and with his senses fully satisfied, standing with his upper body raised — who will go across? Who will go across? Who is to be carried across? Who is to travel to Jambudvīpa in safety and well-being?" — this proclamation made three times, three times deliberately. Go to where that horse stands and say these words: "We will go across! We will go across! Take us across! Bring us to Jambudvīpa in safety and well-being!" That, patient one, is the means by which you might travel to Jambudvīpa in safety and well-being.'

Then the caravan-leader Siṃhala took those words spoken by the assembled common folk firmly to heart, committed them to memory, and quietly, slowly and gently descended from that great śrīṣa tree and went back to that very same bed. Then, perceiving that the woman with whom the caravan-leader Siṃhala had been sleeping was sound asleep and settled in bed, he lay down quietly, softly and gently. Then the caravan-leader Siṃhala rose early the next morning and went to where the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa were gathered, and having gone there he addressed the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa with these words: 'O wise ones, come here. In a secluded garden grove there is a matter I must discuss with you privately and confidentially. And if any among you should become very inebriated, do not bring any boys or girls along.' Then the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa rose early the next morning and went to where the secluded garden grove was.

Then the caravan-leader Siṃhala recounted in full to the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa everything that had been said in the interval by the assembled common folk, and said: 'O wise ones, these are not women — these are rākṣasīs, so protect yourselves!'

Then the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa set out on the northern road on that very fifteenth day of the restoration ceremony. At that time the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, was there, eating the grain of unharvested, unsown rice. A merchant who was of a steady disposition saw the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, eating the grain of unharvested, unsown rice, and having seen him, said this to the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa:

'O wise ones, the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, is standing here eating the grain of unharvested, unsown rice. Go to him and say these words: "We will cross to the other shore! We will cross to the other shore! Carry us to the other shore! Bring us safely and in wellbeing to Jambudvīpa!" — this is what you must say.'

Then the caravan-leader Siṃhala spoke these words to the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa: 'O wise ones, having understood what was said by that great assembly of common folk, it is now time for us to go to the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, and say these words: "We will cross to the other shore! We will cross to the other shore! Carry us to the other shore! Bring us safely and in wellbeing to Jambudvīpa!" — the time for saying this has not yet passed. For I have understood what that great assembly of common folk said: when the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, has eaten the grain of unharvested, unsown rice and is comfortable, healthy, full of strength, and with his senses satisfied, he will lift his upper body and call out three times, solemnly and deliberately: "Who will cross to the other shore? Who will cross to the other shore? Who shall be carried to the other shore? Who shall be brought safely and in wellbeing to Jambudvīpa?" — and at that very moment we must go to the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, and say: "We will cross to the other shore! We will cross to the other shore! Carry us to the other shore! Bring us safely and in wellbeing to Jambudvīpa!" — this is what must be said.'

Then the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, having eaten the grain of unharvested, unsown rice, comfortable, healthy, full of strength, and with his senses satisfied, lifted his upper body and called out three times, solemnly and deliberately: 'Who will cross to the other shore? Who will cross to the other shore? Who shall be carried to the other shore? Who shall be brought safely and in wellbeing to Jambudvīpa?'

Then the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa went to where the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, was standing, and having arrived, they arranged their upper robes over one shoulder, placed their right knees on the ground, joined their palms in reverence toward the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, bowed, and spoke these words to the king of horses, Cloud-Swift: 'We will cross to the other shore! We will cross to the other shore! Carry us to the other shore! Bring us safely and in wellbeing to Jambudvīpa!'

Then the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, spoke to the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa: 'O wise ones, those women, having made themselves even more beautiful, even more lovely to behold, even more enchanting, and taking up boys and girls, will call out: "O lords, come here! O fair-faced ones, come here! Be the husbands of those of us who have no husbands! Be the masters of those who have no master! Be the home of those who have no home! Be the island refuge of those who have no island refuge! Be the protector of those who have no protector! Be the shelter of those who have no shelter! Be the ally of those who have no ally! These are your places of food, your places of drink, your places of clothing, your places of lodging; these are gardens that will bring you delight, groves that will bring you delight, ponds that will bring you delight —' these many precious things of Jambudvīpa — jewels, pearls, beryl, white crystal, coral, silver, gold, the essence of stone, conch, carnelian, and right-coiling shells — bring them here! Come and play with us, rejoice with us, and make merry with us! But if none of you will trouble yourselves on our behalf, then take your boys and girls and depart, each to his own.'

Now, those among you who think: 'These are my wife, my son, my daughter — these are my places of food, my places of drink, my places of clothing, my places of lodging, these are the gardens that bring delight, the groves that bring delight, the ponds that bring delight — these many precious things of Jambudvīpa: jewels, pearls, beryl, white crystal, coral, silver, gold, the essence of stone, conch, carnelian, and right-coiling shells' — those men will have mounted upon my back or ridden in my wake, yet they shall fall just as ripe fruit tumbles from the tips of branches, and those women shall come again and again and devour them. When they devour a man in this way, they shall eat without leaving a single hair, a single body-hair, a single nail, or the least remnant of teeth. And when they devour a man, whatever drops of warm blood fall to the ground they shall scrape up again and again with their fingertips along with the very earth and push them into their mouths.

But those among you who do not think: 'These are my wife, my son, my daughter — these are my places of food, my places of drink, my places of clothing, my places of lodging, these are the gardens that bring delight, the groves that bring delight, the ponds that bring delight — these many precious things of Jambudvīpa: jewels, pearls, beryl, white crystal, coral, silver, gold, the essence of stone, conch, carnelian, and right-coiling shells' — those men, even if they have grasped my very hairs, shall arrive safely and happily in Jambudvīpa.'

Having thus instructed them well, fully, and correctly, the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, waited. Then, of those very many merchants of Jambudvīpa, some mounted upon the back of Cloud-Swift, some rode in his wake, and some grasped hold of his hairs.

Then the king of horses, Cloud-Swift, gradually mustered the full force and strength of his body, and flew upward into the sky above. The rākṣasīs began to wave their banners of destitution and longing, and thought: 'From their waving of the banners of destitution and longing that accord with our nature, surely the very many merchants of Jambudvīpa will become separated from us and fall away!' And so they transformed themselves into forms yet more beautiful, yet more lovely to behold, yet more radiant, and taking boys and girls in their arms they cried out: 'O lords, come here! O fair-faced ones, come here! Be the husbands of those of us who have no husbands! Be the masters of those who have no master! Be the home of those who have no home! Be the island refuge of those who have no island refuge!

Be the protector of those who have no protector! Be the refuge of those who have no refuge! Be the ally of those who have no ally! These here shall be your sources of food, your sources of drink, your sources of clothing, your sources of lodging, your sources of delight in pleasure groves, your sources of delight in forests, your sources of delight in lotus ponds — and the many precious things of Jambudvīpa, namely: jewels, pearls, beryl, white crystal, coral, silver, gold, essences of stone, conch shell, carnelian, and right-coiling shells — come, take them! Come, sport with us, take pleasure with us, make merry with us! But if none of you will look after us at all, then at least take these boys and girls of yours and depart!'

Now among those merchants, those who thought: 'My wife, or my son, or my daughter, or sources of food, or sources of drink, or sources of clothing, or sources of lodging, or sources of delight in pleasure groves, or sources of delight in forests, or sources of delight in lotus ponds — or the many precious things of Jambudvīpa, namely: jewels, pearls, beryl, white crystal, coral, silver, gold, essences of stone, conch shell, carnelian, and right-coiling shells — these are truly mine' — those men, even though they had already mounted upon the trail and the path away from the rākṣasīs, fell down like ripe fruits dropping from the tips of branches, and the rākṣasī women came again and again and devoured them. When they devoured a man, they consumed without remainder even whatever hair, body hair, nails, and remnants of teeth there were. And when they devoured the men, whatever drops of warm blood fell to the ground, those too they licked up with the tips of their fingers, again and again, together with the earth itself, and put them in their mouths.

But among those merchants, those who did not think: 'My wife, or my son, or my daughter, or sources of food, or sources of drink, or sources of clothing, or sources of lodging, or sources of delight in pleasure groves, or sources of delight in forests, or sources of delight in lotus ponds — or the many precious things of Jambudvīpa, namely: jewels, pearls, beryl, white crystal, coral, silver, gold, essences of stone, conch shell, carnelian, and right-coiling shells — these are mine' — those men, even though the rākṣasīs had already seized hold of their body hair, arrived safely and in well-being in Jambudvīpa.

O monks, in the same way, those of you who think: 'I am the eye. It is my eye. I am the ear. I am the nose. I am the tongue. I am the body. I am the mind. It is my mind. I am form. It is my form. I am sound. I am smell. I am taste. I am touch. I am phenomena. They are my phenomena. I am the earth element. It is my earth element. I am the water element. I am the fire element. I am the wind element. I am the space element. I am the consciousness element. It is my consciousness element. I am the aggregate of form. It is my aggregate of form. I am the aggregate of feeling. I am the aggregate of perception. I am the aggregate of formations. I am the aggregate of consciousness. It is my aggregate of consciousness' — those monks are just like the merchants who were made to suffer by the rākṣasīs.

Those monks among you who do not think 'I am the eye. It is my eye. I am the ear. I am the nose. I am the tongue. I am the body. I am the mind. It is my mind. I am form. It is my form. I am sound. I am smell. I am taste. I am touch. I am phenomena. They are my phenomena. I am the earth element. It is my earth element. I am the water element. I am the fire element. I am the wind element. I am the space element. I am the consciousness element. It is my consciousness element. I am the aggregate of form. It is my aggregate of form. I am the aggregate of feeling. I am the aggregate of perception. I am the aggregate of formations. I am the aggregate of consciousness. It is my aggregate of consciousness' — those monks are like the merchants who traveled safely across to the far shore, who were childlike people without faith in the Buddha's teaching, just as those merchants were made to suffer by the rākṣasīs. Those people who possess wisdom and place their faith in the Buddha's teaching are like the merchants who traveled safely across to the far shore on account of Cloud-Force — though all those other merchants fell from the horse-king Cloud-Force and were devoured by those rākṣasīs, only the merchant Siṃhala alone went safely and in good health to Jambudvīpa.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, seventy-seventh fascicle.

The rākṣasī who had been the wife of the merchant Siṃhala was addressed by the other rākṣasīs, who said to her: "We have each eaten our own husbands, yet you have let yours go. If you bring him back here, well and good. If you do not, we shall eat you yourself." Frightened, she replied: "If you give me time and wait a short while, I will bring him back." They said: "Very well then, do as you say." She then transformed herself into a supremely terrifying form and went with great speed until she stood before the merchant Siṃhala. He drew his sword from its scabbard and threatened her, and she, frightened, fled.

Now, it happened that in time a delegation arrived from the central country, and the rākṣasī prostrated herself at the merchant's feet and said: "Master, I am the princess of the king of Tāmradvīpa, given in marriage as consort to the master Siṃhala. When the boat in which I traveled across the great ocean was broken by sea-creatures — fish and the like — they abandoned me, deeming me unlucky. I beg you, out of compassion for me, to consent to take me back." He agreed, saying he would take her back.

He went to her side, and after speaking some words of comfort, sat with her a short while and then said: "My friend, you must not abandon the princess of the king of Tāmradvīpa whom you have taken — that would be improper. Have patience with her." He replied: "My friend, she is not that king's daughter. She is a rākṣasī who has come from Tāmradvīpa." "Then how has she come to be here?" When he told him what had happened, the man sat in silence saying nothing more.

The merchant Siṃhala eventually returned to his own home. The rākṣasī, carrying a child, went to the royal palace like a lioness and took up her station at the gate of the merchant Siṃhala's house. When the gathered people saw the child and recognized it by its features, they said: "Friends, we can see that this boy is the son of the merchant Siṃhala." The rākṣasī said: "Friends, as you can see, this is indeed his son." They asked: "Rākṣasī, where have you come from? Whose are you?" She replied: "Friends, I am the princess of the king of Tāmradvīpa, given as wife to the merchant Siṃhala."

"The ship that had sailed into the great ocean was wrecked by the race of water-serpents, and he abandoned me in a place that was not my home, saying I was ill-omened. How did I come to arrive here? I humbly ask that the merchant Siṃhala show forbearance toward me and toward this small child." Those people then went and reported this to his parents. His two parents said to him: "Son, do not abandon this princess. Show forbearance toward this small child and this afflicted one." He replied: "Father, Mother, she is not a princess. She is a rākṣasī who has come from Tāmradvīpa." His parents said: "Son, all women are rākṣasīs — show her forbearance." He said: "Father, Mother, if you are pleased with her, take her into the household. As for me, I shall go elsewhere." His parents said: "Son, we have taken her in very warmly for your sake. If you do not want her, why should we not drive her away?" And so the two of them drove her away.

Then that rākṣasī went before King Siṃhaketu, and the ministers reported to the king: "Sire, a woman of such beauty, come to the bloom of youth, stands at the royal gate." The king said: "Let her be brought in and looked upon." And they brought her in. Since a woman's form is something that ravishes the senses, the king, upon seeing her, was tormented by attachment and welcomed her with every courtesy, then approached her and said: "Good woman, from where have you come here? Whose are you?" She prostrated at his two feet and said: "Sire, I am the princess of the king of Tāmradvīpa, given as companion-wife to the merchant Siṃhala. The ship that had sailed into the great ocean was wrecked by the race of water-serpents, and he abandoned me in a place that was not my home, saying I was ill-omened. How then did I come to arrive here? Sire, may I ask you to grant that the merchant Siṃhala show forbearance toward me and toward this small child." The king then soothed her and gave instructions to his ministers: "Wise ones, summon the merchant Siṃhala at once." They summoned him, and the king spoke to him: "Siṃhala, do not abandon this princess. Show forbearance toward her and toward the small child." He replied: "Sire, she is not a princess. She is a rākṣasī who has come from Tāmradvīpa." The king said: "Merchant, all women are rākṣasīs — show her forbearance. But if you do not want her, give her to me." He replied: "Sire, since she is a rākṣasī, I will not give her away nor take her back myself." The king then had her placed among the retinue of his consorts, and she brought the king under her power.

Some time later she put the king, together with his consorts and their retinue, to sleep, then went to Tāmradvīpa, into the midst of those rākṣasīs, and said: "Sisters, what need have you of the merchant Siṃhala? I have put King Siṃhaketu to sleep along with his consorts and their retinue — come here and eat them." Those rākṣasīs, rolling their limbs and their eyes, manifestly took on their own terrifying forms of great fearfulness, and at nightfall they pounced upon the royal palace like lionesses. They devoured King Siṃhaketu together with his retinue. When dawn broke, the gates of the royal palace were not opened. When they remained closed, many carrion birds began to circle above the royal palace. The ministers, the heads of the town guilds, the people of the districts, and the people of the countryside all gathered at the gate of the royal palace.

A sound like that of lions rang out everywhere through the royal palace, proclaiming: "The gates of the royal palace are not opened." Since they remained closed, many carrion birds were circling above the royal palace, while the ministers, the heads of the town guilds, the people of the districts, and the people of the countryside all gathered and stood assembled at the gate of the royal palace — and so the news spread abroad.

When the caravan-leader Siṃgala heard this, he very swiftly tucked a sword under his arm and went forward, declaring: "Men of wisdom, the rākṣasī has devoured the king! Think of a plan!" The ministers said: "What is to be done about this? Let someone bring a ladder so we can climb up and look." They brought one, and the caravan-leader Siṃgala, sword in hand, climbed up and threatened the rākṣasīs. Those rākṣasīs thereupon fled — some carrying human limbs, others carrying heads.

Then the caravan-leader Siṃgala opened the gates of the royal palace, and the ministers cleared out the palace. They assembled the palace attendants, the ministers, and the people of the land, and addressed them: "Men of wisdom, the king together with his queen and retinue has been devoured by the rākṣasīs, and there is no heir. Who then shall be consecrated as king?" At that, some said: "Whoever is courageous and endowed with wisdom." Others said: "Who could be more courageous and endowed with wisdom than the caravan-leader Siṃgala? Let the caravan-leader Siṃgala be consecrated as king." All agreed: "So it shall be done." And they said to the caravan-leader Siṃgala: "Caravan-leader, accept the royal kingdom!" He replied: "I live by the livelihood of a merchant — what use to me is royal sovereignty?" They said: "Caravan-leader, we cannot allow another to take charge of the kingdom; accept it!" He replied: "It must be accepted with a solemn pledge — provided that you act according to my words." They replied: "We will do so. Accept it without hesitation!" They adorned the city and with great ceremony consecrated the caravan-leader Siṃgala over the royal kingdom.

King Siṃgala then summoned masters of magical incantation (vidyā) who resided in various lands and had them extensively instructed in those incantations. Likewise he summoned masters of archery dwelling in various lands and had them extensively instructed in archery. He then issued orders to his ministers: "Men of wisdom, arm the four divisions of the military forces — we shall drive those rākṣasīs out of the Copper-Colored Island!" The ministers armed the four divisions of the military forces, and King Siṃgala loaded those four-divisioned armies — the host of elephant-riders, the host of cavalry, the host of chariot-warriors, and the host of foot-soldiers — onto boats and set sail for the Copper-Colored Island.

At length they reached the shore of the ocean. The rākṣasīs, perceiving that their banner corresponding to the place of danger was being waved, began to deliberate among themselves: "Sisters, the banner corresponding to the place of danger is being waved. Let those men of Jambudvīpa who wish to do battle come — we shall watch without flinching." Having gone to the ocean shore, they looked and saw a great many large ships arriving at the shore of the ocean. Seeing this, those rākṣasīs arrayed themselves for battle. Then the masters of incantation brought down the rākṣasīs by means of their incantations, and the masters of archery slew the greater part of them. The survivors prostrated at the feet of King Siṃgala and said: "O King (literally: deva), please have mercy!" He replied: "Mercy shall be granted by solemn pledge — provided that you leave this city of yours and go elsewhere, and cause not the slightest harm in my land, mercy is granted."

They replied: "So it shall be done. We have caused no offense." They left those cities and went and settled elsewhere. And King Siṃgala then built a city there, and because King Siṃgala dwelt in that place, the island of Siṃgala came to be known by the name "the Island of Siṃgala."

"Monks, the merchant-captain Siṃgala of that time — that was none other than myself. The King Siṃgala of the Lion's Mane of that time — that is this elder here, now present. The rākṣasī of that time — that is this woman Incomparable, and even then this Incomparable one caused wrongful suffering to this queen and her retinue, and she causes wrongful suffering to her still today."

Now, the wanderer took Incomparable away and came to Kauśāmbī, and there she was dwelling in a pleasure garden. The keeper of the pleasure garden reported to King Śarpa: "O divine one, there is a woman in the pleasure garden — beautiful of form, lovely to behold, and fair. She is truly fit for a king." When the king heard this, he went to the pleasure garden and saw her. Since the realm of women is one that steals away the senses, the moment he saw her he was seized with desire. He spoke to the wanderer woman: "Old mother, whose daughter is this?" "O divine one, she is my daughter." "To whom have you given her?" "O divine one, to no one has she been given." "Why do you not give her to me?" "O divine one, I am suppliant before you." The king took her as a bride, placed her within the queen's retinue, and gave her as well half of a magnificent mansion adorned with a garland of flowers. He gave five hundred attendants in service to her, and every single day he gave five hundred and five hundred kārṣāpaṇas' worth of perfumes and garlands. And the wanderer woman he appointed as chief minister.

Now at that time King Śarpa of Vatsa had three chief ministers: Snare-Holder, Melodious, and the old woman. Some time later, a man came before King Śarpa of Vatsa, and the king asked him: "Who are you?" The man replied: "O divine one, I am Sweet-Speaker." The king instructed his ministers: "Gentlemen of wisdom, provide Sweet-Speaker with a living." And they gave him a livelihood. Then again at another time a man came before the king, and the king asked him: "Who are you?" He replied: "O divine one, I am Harsh-Speaker." The king instructed his ministers: "Gentlemen of wisdom, provide Harsh-Speaker with a living." They replied: "O divine one, since even your majesty might well hear something unpleasant, we will not grant this one a livelihood." The king said: "Gentlemen of wisdom, give generously as befits a king's affairs." And so they gave that one a livelihood as well.

Then at another time, King Śarpa of Vatsa was sitting together with his queen Nīlajālikā and with Incomparable, and the king became intoxicated. Nīlajālikā said, "Homage to the Buddha," and Incomparable did obeisance to the king, then said: "O divine one, look — Nīlajālikā pays homage not to you the king, but to the ascetic Gautama." The king replied: "Incomparable is not at fault here. Nīlajālikā is a laywoman, so naturally she may pay homage to the ascetic Gautama." And he said nothing more.

Then Incomparable spoke to the maidservant: "My girl, whenever the king is alone together with Nīlajālikā in a private place, at that moment you are to roll down a clay bowl from the top of the stairs." The maidservant replied, "Whatever my mistress commands, so shall I do." Then at the very moment when they were seated together, she rolled a clay bowl from the top of the stairs, and at that instant Nīlajālikā said, "Homage to the Buddha" —

Incomparable said, "Homage to the king," and then declared: "Your majesty, do you see that Nīlajālikā makes no offering in the divine precinct and yet pays homage to the ascetic Gautama?" The king replied, "Incomparable, stop. Do not contrive a fault. There is no wrongdoing here — Nīlajālikā is a laywoman, so naturally she pays homage to the ascetic Gautama." And he said nothing more.

Now the king alternated: one day he would take his meals at the quarters of Nīlajālikā, and the next day at the quarters of Incomparable. Incomparable then gave instructions to her maidservant: "On whichever day it falls to Nīlajālikā to serve the king his meal, on that very day you are to bring him a bowl of rice porridge with live embers beneath it." And so, on the day the king dined at Nīlajālikā's quarters, the maidservant brought him a bowl of rice porridge with live embers beneath it. The king said, "Take it to Incomparable." When Incomparable heard this she replied, "Your majesty, it is not my turn — it is Nīlajālikā's turn." The king said, "Very well, maidservant, go and deliver it to Nīlajālikā." The maidservant brought it to Nīlajālikā and said, "For your majesty's sake, please stir it." Nīlajālikā replied, "What, is she a maidservant? She does not kill living creatures, so be off with you." The maidservant returned to the king and reported, "Your majesty, word from Nīlajālikā: 'What, is she a maidservant? She does not kill living creatures, so be off.'" When Incomparable heard this, she said to the king, "Your majesty, if she had been told to stir it for the sake of the ascetic Gautama, she would stir it along with her entire retinue." The king thought, "That may well be so," and he said to the maidservant, "Go, and have her stir it saying it is for the sake of the Blessed One." The maidservant was also instructed by Incomparable in private to tell her this and then kill her. The maidservant killed the embers, brought the bowl to Nīlajālikā, and said, "By his majesty's command: 'Stir it for the sake of the Blessed One.'" Nīlajālikā, together with her retinue, thereupon began to stir it.

The maidservant went and reported to the king, "Your majesty, Nīlajālikā is stirring it together with her retinue." Incomparable said, "Did your majesty hear that? If she will not kill living creatures for your majesty's sake and will not do it even for the Blessed One's sake — that is one thing. But if she will do it for the Blessed One's sake and not for your majesty's sake — what kind of thing is that?" The king fell into a rage, drew his bow, and shot. The arrow fell halfway along the path. He shot a second arrow, and it turned back and fell at the king's own feet. As he prepared to shoot a third arrow, Nīlajālikā said, "Your majesty, do not shoot. Do not bring about the destruction of all that you have in every direction." The king was frightened and said, "Who are you — a goddess, a nāga woman, a yakṣa woman, a gandharva woman, a garuḍa woman, a kinnara woman, or a great serpent?" She replied, "Your majesty, I am none of these — not a goddess, not a nāga woman, not a yakṣa woman, not a gandharva woman, not a kinnara woman, not a great serpent. Then who are you? Your majesty, I am a śrāvaka of the Blessed One — a never-returner. I have actualized directly in the presence of the Blessed One the fruit of never-returning. And these five hundred women have also seen the truths." The king was filled with confidence and said —

"Tell me, what noble gift shall I give you?" She replied, "If your majesty truly has confidence in me, then whenever I enter the retinue of the royal consort, let your majesty regard me with the perception of a sister." The king said, "Certainly, it shall be so, without fault."

The king then experienced play, delight, and pleasurable sport together with Apalāmā. He aroused in Śyāmāvatī faith arising from the cause of the Dharma, and whatever fresh crops, fresh fruits, and fresh delicacies of the season were obtained, these too he would first of all offer to Śyāmāvatī.

Now the nature of women's quarters is one of jealousy, and so Apalāmā thought: "This king plays, rejoices, and sports pleurably with me, and yet whatever fresh crops, fresh fruits, and fresh delicacies of the season are obtained, he first offers them all to Śyāmāvatī. I must devise some means to bring about her death." So she set about searching for a fault in her, keeping this constantly in mind.

Then some time later, the king of a neighboring land from the eastern mountains launched a raid. The king sent one contingent against him, and it was beaten back and returned utterly routed. He sent a second and a third contingent, and these too were beaten back and returned completely crushed. The ministers then said, "Your majesty's forces are weakening while those of the mountain king are growing strong. Unless your majesty goes in person, such a situation will arise that it will be difficult for you to prevail." So the king had a proclamation announced throughout Kauśāmbī: "Let all who live by weapons in my realm, however many there be, depart to war." Having given this order, he departed.

The king said to his chamberlain, "You shall supply Śyāmāvatī with whatever she needs, and remain here in this very place." He replied, "Your majesty, that is not right — I too will go to war alongside your majesty." The king said to his musician, "You shall supply Śyāmāvatī with whatever she needs and remain here." He too replied, "Your majesty, that is not right — I too will go alongside your majesty." The king then ordered his mother, saying, "Supply Śyāmāvatī with whatever she needs, remain in this very place," and departed. But she escorted him to the door, and three times petitioned him, saying, "Your majesty, that is not right — I too shall accompany your majesty." Three times she made this appeal, but the king did not grant it, and so she accepted the charge. The mother went to Apalāmā's quarters, and Apalāmā asked her, "Whom has your father the king left here?" "He has left me here." Apalāmā thought, "Surely this friend will be able to warm up the grudge-meat for me," and so she said, "Dear mother, do you know what Śyāmāvatī has become to your father? She is his cherished daughter, his great lady." "Dear mother, do you know what quality is most harmful in the women's quarters?" "Dear daughter, I do — it is jealousy and miserliness." "Dear mother, if that is so, then stifle Śyāmāvatī." "Dear daughter, do I have two heads?" Three times the king had declared, "Supply Śyāmāvatī with what she needs," but had not mentioned Apalāmā's name at all. Apalāmā then said, "Dear mother, are you so foolish? Who is there who would look even a little to a daughter's interests for a father's sake? He loves her even without cause. Therefore, if she were killed, that would be best. And if she is not killed, she will reduce you to your former station." She was frightened and thought, "The king has come under this woman's power, and so it will indeed be as she says." So she said —

"Dear daughter, it is not possible to kill her outright like that. We must devise some sort of stratagem." She replied, "Mother, do not worry — do it just so." She then said to Śyāmāvatī, "Noble lady, please command what is to be done." Śyāmāvatī replied, "Mother, there is not the slightest thing to be done. It is simply that these girls need to go at night to read the word of the Buddha by lamplight, and for that they need grain, oil, ink, pens, and cotton." She said, "Noble lady, do not worry — I shall supply it," and had a large quantity of supplies prepared, packed them inside, and then stacked them in a heap at the gatehouse and left them there.

Śyāmāvatī said, "Mother, that is enough — let them go." Apalāmā said, "Noble lady, you may enter. But henceforth I shall not allow you to enter again and again," and having let her in, she set the last load of grain alight and allowed them to enter. The fire, blazing up, spread to the gatehouse, and the crowd of people dwelling in Kauśāmbī came running to put it out. Apalāmā drew a sword from its scabbard and cried, "Why do you want to enter among the retinue of the king's queen? Stay back!" and began to drive the crowd away. A master of mechanical arts said, "I shall use a machine to move this burning gatehouse to another place." Apalāmā drove him back in the same way.

Śyāmāvatī rose up into the sky by her supernormal power and spoke: "Sisters, we have performed and accumulated deeds — deeds that have gathered their conditions, that abide like a shadow, and that will without fail come to fruition. Whatever deeds we have performed and accumulated, who else could experience them separately on our behalf? The Blessed One himself has declared:

In the midst of the ocean of the sky, in the clefts of the mountains though one hides — there is no place in any direction where one can escape from one's own deeds.

It is upon us that these deeds will fall."

Then she spoke in verse:

Through the lattice of the wall
I came to see the Blessed One, and all the truths within the Buddha's teaching
I came to know completely.

And they, like scattered flour tossed upward, leapt up and fell into the fire.
Then Śyāmāvatī and the other five hundred women perished in the flames.
Uttarā escaped through the drain of the water channel.

Apalāmā discarded the corpses of those five hundred women in the charnel ground, and swept clean the inside and outside of the royal palace. Then she turned back the clouds of people — those dwelling in Kauśāmbī and those who had come from other regions.

Then a great many monks, in the early morning, having put on their lower robes and taken up their bowls and Dharma robes, went for alms in Kauśāmbī. As a great many monks were wandering through Kauśāmbī for alms, they heard that some five hundred women of the retinue of the queen of the king of the Vatsa realm — Śyāmāvatī and the rest — had perished in a fire in the eastern region. Having heard this, they continued their alms round in Kauśāmbī, finished their meal, and returning from the midday alms round, set aside their dwelling things as they were accustomed to use, washed their feet, went to where the Blessed One was, prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with their heads, and sat to one side. Seated to one side, a great many monks addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, here today, as we many monks had donned our lower robes in the early morning, taken up our bowls and Dharma robes, and entered Kauśāmbī for alms —

"Venerable One, we, a great many monks wandering on alms round in Kauśāmbī, heard that the royal consorts of the king of the eastern lands — Śreṇika — along with his retinue of ladies, headed by Lady Śyāmāvatī and some five hundred women, had been burned alive.

"Monks, whoever set fire to and burned those five hundred women — the royal consort's retinue headed by Śyāmāvatī, who had accompanied King Śreṇika to the eastern lands — that person, deluded, generated abundant demerit. Yet, monks, though that deluded person generated abundant demerit, those women did not pass away fruitlessly or untimely. Why is that? Because among that retinue of royal consorts, there were women who, having abandoned the five fetters pertaining to the lower realm, were born by spontaneous birth and would pass fully into nirvāṇa there, never returning — those of such attainment who are non-returners (anāgāmins) to this world, were present in that royal retinue. And women who, having abandoned the three fetters, and with attachment, aversion, and delusion thinned, were once-returners (sakṛdāgāmins) — those who would come once more to this world and put an end to suffering — were also present in that royal retinue. And women who, having abandoned the three fetters, were stream-enterers (srotāpannas), of the nature of not falling back into error, certainly oriented toward complete awakening, who at most after seven more existences — seven rebirths alternating among gods and humans — would put an end to suffering, were also present in that royal retinue. And women who would not transgress the trainings even to preserve their own lives were also present in that royal retinue. And women who, having passed away with minds full of faith in me, are reborn from this body in a happy realm, in the higher world among the gods — those women too were present in that royal retinue. That is why I say so.

"Monks, come now — let us go to the funeral pyre of those five hundred women headed by Śyāmāvatī."

The monks replied to the Blessed One: "Venerable One, as you command," and listened to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then set out together with a great many monks and arrived at the funeral pyre of those five hundred women. Upon arriving, he declared to the monks:

"Monks, these bodies of the five hundred women — these were the ones for whom King Śreṇika felt attachment, clinging, intoxication, entanglement, infatuation, intense passion, and lingering desire. Now who would even touch these with their feet?"

He then spoke these verses:

The world is hollow, without essence, busy with distraction.
Who among the fortunate would look upon it?

The childish, bound by affliction, utterly surrounded by darkness, see as noble what is not noble — yet in what they see there is nothing at all.

"Therefore, monks, you should train yourselves thus: even toward a charred post one should not arouse a mind of intense aversion — how much less, then, toward a body endowed with consciousness. Monks, you should train yourselves in this way."

The people of Kauśāmbī and the members of the royal court assembled and began to deliberate: "Good people, when such harm has befallen the king, which among us should go and report it to the king?" At that, some said: "Let a bearer of unpleasant tidings be sent — let him be the one to tell it." Others said: "Do not do it carelessly." And so they summoned such a messenger and spoke:

"Report this unpleasant news to His Majesty in the proper order." The messenger replied: "When you said you would give me my livelihood in return for bearing unpleasant tidings, the time has now come — so you yourselves go and report it." They replied: "It is precisely for this purpose that we gave you your livelihood. Who else would go and report it? You must go and report it." He replied: "Then swear an oath to this: whatever I say must be done, and I will go and report it." They said: "Speak, and it shall be done." He continued: "Then I shall make the report in this manner and order. You must give me five hundred elephants, five hundred she-camels, five hundred horses, five hundred mares, five hundred young men, five hundred young women, a hundred thousand in gold, cloths, a residence in Kauśāmbī, a fine mansion with a garden gate, and as for what has happened in the meantime with the wheat: how the load of grain mixed with chaff had fire set to it in the inner storehouse; how the gatehouse caught fire; how, when the crowd of people living in Kauśāmbī rushed to extinguish the fire, Mādu drew his sword from its scabbard and drove them back; how, when the master of mechanical arts said that the burning of the gatehouse could be moved elsewhere by machinery, Mādu likewise drove them back; and how five hundred women led by Ngo-bsangs-can, leaping up flat as flour-dust, again and again, fell into the fire — all of this must be painted in pictures and presented." They said: "So be it." And so they gave him five hundred elephants, five hundred she-camels, five hundred horses, five hundred mares, five hundred young men, five hundred young women, a hundred thousand in gold, cloths, a residence in Kauśāmbī, a fine mansion with a garden gate, and then pictures were painted depicting: how the load of grain mixed with chaff had fire set to it in the inner storehouse; how the gatehouse caught fire; how, when the crowd of people living in Kauśāmbī rushed to extinguish the fire, Mādu drew his sword from its scabbard and drove them back; how, when the master of mechanical arts said that the burning of the gatehouse could be moved elsewhere by machinery, Mādu likewise drove them back; and how five hundred women led by Ngo-bsangs-can, leaping up flat as flour-dust, again and again, fell into the fire — all of this was painted and presented.

Then the bearer of unpleasant tidings sent a letter to the ministers, saying: "Such harm has befallen the king. I have reported it by this means. You must support me." Having sent that letter to them, he donned the armor of a four-divisioned army, went off to another region, and settled there. Then he sent a letter to the eastern king worded thus: "My lord, I am the king of a certain pleasant land. The Lord of Death has stolen my son, and because of that I am going to war against him. If by fighting for a time I am able to defeat him, well and good. If not, I shall offer five hundred elephants, five hundred she-camels, five hundred horses, five hundred mares, five hundred young men, five hundred young women, and a hundred thousand in gold, and in exchange retrieve my son and return." He wrote this and dispatched it.

The eastern king, the cliff-dweller, did not come with his army. He spoke to his ministers thus: "Wise ones, look at how foolish that king is. Is there anyone who is able to avenge what the Lord of Death has taken? How indeed could there be?"

He met with him and sent a letter to that effect, saying: "One of my cliff-dwellers has gone astray and not returned — please be my ally in this, and in turn I shall later be your ally." He wrote this and dispatched it.

The ministers wrote a letter to that effect and sent it. Upon reading the letter, that king came to the cliff at once, and encamped not very far away. When the cliff-dwellers heard this, they thought: "Our kings have cut us off and surrounded us from all ten directions. Now this second king has drawn near as well. The land we may recover in every respect, but our lives we cannot recover — so let us surrender." Thereupon they put sword to their own throats, came out, and prostrated at the feet of the eastern king. The eastern king made them pay a fine and a tribute.

Then the messenger of the king Duḥśrava went before the eastern king and said: "O lord, the Lord of Death has stolen my son — please, lord, be my ally! I shall go out and do battle alongside him. If by fighting for a time I am able to defeat him, well and good. If I cannot, I shall offer him five hundred elephants, five hundred she-camels, five hundred horses, five hundred mares, five hundred young men, five hundred young women, and a hundred thousand in gold, and retrieve my son." The eastern king replied: "Well indeed — you are a fool! Is there anyone at all who is able to take back what the Lord of Death has taken?" The messenger said: "Is it that your lordship cannot? Then he cannot. If that is so, look at this picture." He unrolled a picture, and the king examined it. Pierced to the quick as if struck in a vital point, the king said with anguish: "What is this — are these what they call the five hundred women, Śyāmāvatī and the rest, burned alive by fire?" The messenger then struck him with crown and headdress and spoke in verse:

I am no king, no royal power do I hold.
O lord, I live by the service of your feet.
Only to bring this sad news before you have I come here to your feet.

The king examined it very carefully and concluded: "This is the city of Kauśāmbī. This is the royal palace. This is the gateway of the flower pavilion. This is the harem. These are the women being burned by a pyre heaped with wheat and such. And these are the five hundred women, Śyāmāvatī and the rest, leaping and leaping upward like scattered flour, and falling into the flames." Having analyzed it thus, he declared: "Your Honor, what is this — are these what they call the five hundred women, Śyāmāvatī and the rest, burned alive? O lord, I did not say that. It is thus: the lord himself said that." "Your Honor, you have only entreated me with clever means. Otherwise I would have had your head cut from your neck and thrown to the ground." So saying, the king fainted and collapsed to the ground. Then water was sprinkled on him, his breath returned, and he spoke: "Wise ones, arm the fourfold host. We march to Kauśāmbī." The ministers armed the fourfold host, the king set out for Kauśāmbī, and in due course arrived at Kauśāmbī. He then summoned all who were most knowledgeable among the people of the palace household. Next he gave orders to his chief minister Prayogadhara: "Prayogadhara, go — put the harem women in a building of lac and burn it. As for Dīpamatī, bind her to the leg of an unbroken colt and drag her." Prayogadhara put the harem women in the building of lac and burned them. Then he pondered:

As for Dīpamatī, Prayogadhara thought: "If the king, having reflected on the matter, should say, 'Bring Dīpamatī,' what will I have done? Let her wait for now." And so he placed Dīpamatī in an underground chamber and left her there.

On the seventh day the king's grief lifted, and once it had lifted he spoke: "Prayogadhara, where is Dīpamatī?" Prayogadhara replied: "Sire, I bound her to the leg of an unbroken colt and let her loose." The king said: "You have done no wrong. At that time I killed Nīlañjanā in anger, and you would have killed Dīpamatī as well — but now I shall go forth into homelessness." Prayogadhara said: "Sire, it was for that very reason that I placed Dīpamatī in an underground chamber. Let us see whether she still lives." He brought her out from the underground chamber, and in that very same moment she was found to be free of all affliction and uninjured in body.

When the king saw this he thought: "How is it that she has remained, in that very condition, free of affliction and uninjured in body — that she neither fell ill nor ate food, yet was born without losing her place and lived in pleasure together with others?" Understanding this, he said: "Dīpamatī, you have been unfaithful." She replied: "Sire, what sin have I done? I did nothing of the sort. What does this mean? Sire, do you have faith in the Blessed One?" The king said: "I have met him. At that time he was called the ascetic Gautama; now he is called the Blessed One. Yet someone like me, of such a character, would not petition the Blessed One on your behalf. I will petition the Blessed One on behalf of Nīlañjanā." And so he went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet, and sat to one side.

Seated to one side, the king of Vatsa addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, Nīlañjanā and the five hundred women — what had they done? The king was torn apart by the thrusting of lances, and the foremost of the chiefs fled through the drain-hole of a cistern."

The Blessed One declared: "Great King, those very women gathered a mass of karma, transformed the conditions, remained close as a flame, and performed and accumulated deeds that must inevitably arise. Those deeds which they themselves performed and accumulated — who else could experience them separately? Great King, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, it does not ripen in the element of water, it does not ripen in the element of fire, it does not ripen in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases.

Actions are not destroyed even across a hundred aeons;
when the conditions and the moment are gathered and met, they will assuredly become results
for those who bear a body.

Great King, long ago in the past, in the city of Vārāṇasī there was a king named Brahmadatta who caused his prosperous and flourishing realm, with its good harvests, its many people of every kind, its wars and conflicts, its foreign enemies and domestic strife all thoroughly pacified, its freedom from bandits, famine, and disease, its abundance of rice, rows of sugar cane, cattle, and buffalo, to be governed and administered — and he himself, a righteous king, caused the kingdom to be governed by Dharma. At that time, when buddhas had not arisen in the world, certain lowly pratyekabuddhas — solitary buddhas who were compassionate toward the poor and destitute and who delighted in remote forest dwellings — arose in the world as single rhinoceros-like ones, fields of merit for the world. Now at a certain time, as one such pratyekabuddha was wandering and traveling through the land, he came to Vārāṇasī and took up residence in a crouching posture in a certain pleasure garden.

The five hundred ladies of the retinue of Queen Brahmadatta came to that pleasure garden. After the queen's attendants had bathed in the pleasure pool and were shivering with cold, the noble queen spoke to her maidservant: "It is extremely cold and I am shivering — go and bring fire to this resting bower." The maidservant lit a lamp and went, and upon seeing the pratyekabuddha there, she said to the noble queen: "Your Highness, there is a renunciant dwelling here." The queen replied: "Whether a renunciant is there or not, whether anyone else is there or not — go and bring fire!" When the maidservant did not convey the fire herself but fled from the place, the noble queen grew angry and sent the fire herself, and the pratyekabuddha escaped from within.

The other ladies of the queen's retinue then expressed their approval, saying: "Your Highness, it was well done that you drove him out — we all approve!" Now that great being, the pratyekabuddha, reflected: "These afflicted members of the queen's retinue have spoken with extreme contempt. If they should come to harm and ruin as a consequence, that would not be right. I shall give them a helping hand from this situation." Thinking thus, he soared up into the sky above, spreading his wings like the king of geese, and began to perform miraculous displays — blazing with fire, shining with radiance, sending down rain, and releasing lightning.

Now ordinary people quickly turn their minds to trust upon witnessing miracles. And so the ladies of the queen's retinue, as though trees cut down at the root, fell prostrate at the pratyekabuddha's feet and said: "O true field of merit, please descend! Please descend! Please draw us up by the hand from where we have sunk into the mire of afflictions!" Out of his compassionate care for those ladies of the queen's retinue, the pratyekabuddha descended from the sky above to the ground below. They made offerings to him, prostrated at his two feet, and made this aspiration: "By this root of virtue — by the act of making offerings in a manner discordant with the karma of the harm we have caused to such a genuine field of merit — may we attain qualities such that we please a Teacher far more supremely excellent than this pratyekabuddha, and such that we do not cause that Teacher vexation."

Now, great king, the noble queen of King Brahmadatta at that time — she is the one known in the present as Utpalavarṇā. The four hundred and ninety-nine other women who were there at that time — they are these same four hundred and ninety-nine women of the present. The maidservant who was sent at that time — she is the one known in the present as Uttarā. Because of the karmic maturation of having burned the pratyekabuddha's resting bower and having rejoiced in that act, they burned for many long years in the great hells, and even up to the present time, until they beheld the truth, they continued to be scorched by fire. As for Uttarā, because she was unable to carry through with sending the fire and fled instead, in the present she has escaped through the water-drain.

The aspiration they made after offering to the pratyekabuddha — it is that very aspiration which has now caused them to behold the truth in my presence, and by which they have pleased me, a Teacher supremely more excellent than the pratyekabuddha by a hundred thousand million times, without causing me vexation.

Great king, that being so: the karmic maturation of actions that are purely dark is itself purely dark; the karmic maturation of actions that are purely bright is itself purely bright; and the karmic maturation of actions that are mixed is itself mixed. Therefore, great king, purely dark actions and mixed actions are to be abandoned, and one should strive toward actions that are purely bright. Great king, you should train in this way.

Then the great king of Bādas, having heard what the Blessed One declared, expressed his delight and rejoicing, bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One, and departed from his presence.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the seventy-eighth fascicle.

The monks, having fallen into doubt, asked the Blessed One, the awakened Bhagavān, who cuts through all doubts. They asked: Venerable one, what action did the Elder Śgur perform, that by it he became a hunchback?

The Blessed One declared: Monks, the Elder Śgur himself had gathered a collection of karma, had fully transformed the conditions, and had performed and accumulated deeds that would infallibly arise, abiding as though in a flame. It is those very karmas, performed and accumulated by him, that he — and no one else — experiences individually. Monks, karma performed and accumulated does not mature in the earth element of the outer world, nor in the water element, nor in the fire element, nor in the wind element. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma performed and accumulated in that way matures in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases.

Actions, though a hundred aeons pass, do not perish but accumulate;
when the time arrives with conditions met,
they ripen as results for beings with a body.

Monks, in a time long past, there was a king named Brahmadata in the city of Vārāṇasī. His kingdom was prosperous, flourishing, and happy, with good harvests, filled with many people of all kinds. External enemies and internal strife had been fully pacified; it was free from bandits, famine, and disease; rich in crops of rice and sugarcane, with abundant herds of cattle and water buffalo. A righteous king, a Dharma-king, he governed his realm in accordance with Dharma. At a certain time, astrologers prophesied that rain would not fall for twelve years, and King Brahmadata had it proclaimed throughout Vārāṇasī: whoever has provisions for twelve years may remain; whoever does not should go elsewhere, and may return again after twelve years have passed.

At that time there was in Vārāṇasī a householder named Dhāraṇī, who was wealthy, possessed of great riches and extensive resources, with broad and wide storehouses, endowed with the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa, rivaling Vaiśravaṇa himself in his treasure. He summoned his steward and said: Dear steward, do I have provisions for twelve years for myself and my retinue? The steward replied: Yes, my lord. In that time — when no buddhas had appeared in the world — there arose in the world certain pratyekabuddhas, poor and destitute, who showed compassion to the lowly and wretched, who delighted in remote and solitary dwelling places like rhinoceroses, each alone, and who had become fields of merit for the world. Now, five hundred pratyekabuddhas were wandering and traveling through the region, and when they came to Vārāṇasī they went to the home of the householder Dhāraṇī. Arriving there, they said: Householder, are you able to provide sustenance for the twelve years required by us five hundred who have gone forth? He replied: Noble ones, ask the steward; I will inquire on your behalf afterward. And the steward was summoned and asked: Dear steward, do I have provisions for twelve years for myself with my retinue, and for these five hundred who have gone forth? The steward replied: Yes, my lord. The householder Dhāraṇī said to the five hundred pratyekabuddhas: Noble ones, please remain — I shall provide for you.

They remained there as well. Now, while another five hundred pratyekabuddhas were wandering and traveling through the land, they came to Vārāṇasī and went to the home of the householder Dhāraṇī. Arriving there, they said: Householder, are you able to provide sustenance for the twelve years required by us five hundred who have gone forth? He replied: Noble ones, if you were to ask the steward, why would anything fail to be accomplished? Noble ones, they are other, and we too are other — ask the steward, and I shall inquire afterward. And he summoned the steward and said: Dear steward, do I have provisions for twelve years for myself with my retinue, and for these thousand who have gone forth? The steward replied: Yes, my lord. He then said to the other five hundred who had gone forth: Noble ones, please remain — I shall provide for you. They too remained there.

He had a giving-hall built, and he appointed both an attendant in charge of the giving of food and an usher. Each day a thousand pratyekabuddhas took their meal there. Then it came about that one pratyekabuddha fell ill, and that very day he did not come. The daughter of the householder Dhāraṇī said to her father: Father, today one who has gone forth did not come. He asked: Daughter, what was he like? She bowed and replied: Father, he was like this — and described him.

O monks, she who was at that time the daughter of the householder Dhāraṇī is none other than this very Śreṣṭhā. It is through the karmic maturation of the act she committed — striking a pratyekabuddha — that she came to be hunchbacked.

Now the monks, filled with doubt, asked the Buddha, the Blessed One, to dispel all their doubt: Venerable One, what karma did Śreṣṭhā perform such that she became a holder of scripture? The Blessed One declared: O monks, Śreṣṭhā herself accumulated a mass of karma, fully turned the conditions, dwelt near like a flame, and made deeds that would inevitably arise. Of the karma thus performed and accumulated by her alone, who else could experience its separate fruits? O monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, karma — whether virtuous or non-virtuous — that has been performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates (skandhas), elements (dhātus), and sense sources (āyatanas).

Actions, though a hundred eons pass, do not perish; they do not come to naught.
When the conditions and the time are met,
their fruits arise for those who bear a body.

O monks, the elder of the Saṅgha at that almshouse of the householder Dhāraṇī — the very almshouse for those thousand pratyekabuddhas — suffered from wind disease. When he ate his meal, his hand trembled and he caused the alms-bowl to shake. The daughter of Dhāraṇī then removed a bracelet adorned with bells from her own hand and offered it to that pratyekabuddha, saying: Noble one, please place the alms-bowl on top of this. He set the alms-bowl upon it and sat there perfectly still. She then touched his two feet and made this aspiration: Just as this alms-bowl rests without shaking, so too may the Dharma teachings that have entered into my stream remain without wavering. Through the karmic maturation of that act, she has now become a holder of scripture.

Again the monks, filled with doubt, asked the Buddha, the Blessed One, to dispel all their doubt: Venerable One, what karma did Śreṣṭhā perform such that she became a slave? The Blessed One declared: O monks, Śreṣṭhā herself accumulated a mass of karma, having transformed the conditions, abiding near like a flame, certain to arise — karma accumulated in just this way cannot be experienced by any other person. O monks, karma that has been done and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been done and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases. As it is said in verse:

Even across a hundred aeons
karma does not perish;
when the conditions and the time are met,
it ripens for embodied beings as its fruit.

O monks, in that very former life, she, intoxicated with the pride of power and authority, habitually addressed the people of her retinue with the words of a slave. Through the karmic maturation of that action she has now become a slave.

Again the monks, filled with doubt, asked the Buddha, the Blessed One, to dispel all their doubt: Venerable One, what karma did Upamā perform such that she was given a house for seven years without food, without being afflicted in mind, and without her body being harmed?

The Blessed One declared: O monks, Upamā herself accumulated a mass of karma, having transformed the conditions, abiding near like a flame, certain to arise — karma accumulated in just this way cannot be experienced by any other person. O monks, karma that has been done and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been done and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases. As it is said in verse:

Even across a hundred aeons
karma does not perish;
when the conditions and the time are met,
it ripens for embodied beings as its fruit.

O monks, in a former time there was a rocky cliff where a daughter of the warrior class (kṣatriya) and a brahmin girl dwelt together as close friends. This was a time when no buddhas had appeared in the world, and there arose in the world certain solitary buddhas (pratyekabuddhas) — humble and poor, cherishing compassionate concern for all, delighting in remote and secluded dwelling, dwelling alone like a rhinoceros horn, serving as a field of merit for the world. Now it came about that one such solitary buddha agreed to spend the night in a peaceful place nearby, and the next morning, having girded his robe and taken up his alms-bowl and Dharma robe, he entered that rocky cliff on his alms round. The daughter of the warrior class, on that very day, gave him alms. In the same way, on the second day and the third day, she began to offer him alms without interruption for a full day's cycle.

On another occasion, that daughter of the warrior class was invited by the brahmin girl and went to her house. Meanwhile that same solitary buddha, going on his alms round, entered the house of the daughter of the warrior class, and finding her absent, he continued on and eventually entered the house of the brahmin girl. The daughter of the warrior class, seeing him, said to the brahmin girl: "Girl, offer alms to this noble one." But the brahmin girl replied: "So long as I have not given to the gods, to the brahmins, and to my dear and close kinsmen, how could I give to this shaven-headed ascetic?" The daughter of the warrior class then said: "Sister, if that is so, let me for now go and give him alms myself and then return." The brahmin girl said: "Very well then, if that is so, please wait —"

"I myself shall give him alms." She gave him alms, and then made a perverse aspiration, saying: "As for this gift of alms that I have made to this shaven-headed ascetic, may it bear no karmic fruit for me in this world, and may it bear no karmic fruit for me in the world beyond." Such was the aspiration she made.

Monks, the brahmin girl of that time and place is none other than Aupamānavatī here. She gave alms to the pratyekabuddha and made this perverse aspiration: "May this gift of alms that I have made to this shaven-headed ascetic bear no karmic fruit for me in this world, and may it bear no karmic fruit for me in the world beyond." Through the karmic maturation of that very action, she was locked in a cellar for seven days without food, then released, unharmed and without injury to her body.

At another time, Aupamānavatī had grown old, and at the hour of her death she made an aspiration: "By whatever root of virtue I have gained through serving the community of monks as long as I have lived, may I be reborn in the womb of the finest wife of the householder Gāndika, and may I become just like a stretch of clear water tinged with blue, and may the eastern king of the region of Batsā become my husband." She died and when her time came, she was reborn in the womb of the finest wife of the householder Gāndika. On the very day she was born, that house blazed with radiant splendor. After eight or nine months had passed, a daughter was born — beautiful to behold, lovely and fair. From the very moment of her birth, she caused her father's house to blaze even more brilliantly with radiant splendor. Her relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day after her birth they held a grand birth-celebration, at which they turned to naming her: "By what name shall this girl be called?" The relatives said: "Because on the very day this girl entered her mother's womb the house blazed with radiant splendor, and because at her birth she caused her father's house to blaze broadly with radiant splendor, therefore let her name be Śrī — the Illustrious One." And so she was named Śrī.

When she had grown old enough to speak, she would go before any monks who came to that house for alms, bow at their feet, and inquire after their health. Then, when the venerable Ānanda came there for alms, she went before him and, bowing at his two feet, said: "Venerable Ānanda, how is the Blessed One? How are the monks, the elders, and the great elders? Are they of little affliction, of little discomfort? Are they agile? Do they live with strength? Are they at ease? Are they free from fault? Do they abide in contact with happiness?" He replied: "Sister, the Blessed One, the monks, the elders, and the great elders are of little affliction, of little discomfort, agile, living with strength, at ease, free from fault, and abiding in contact with happiness." Upon hearing these words, the household members of the householder Gāndika were struck with the utmost wonder. Then the venerable Ānanda exchanged pleasantries and departed, went to where the Blessed One was, and arriving there, bowed his head at the Blessed One's feet and reported: "Blessed One, a young girl, the daughter of the householder Gāndika, has been inquiring after the health of the Blessed One and the monks, the elders, and the great elders; and the household members of Gāndika, upon hearing this, were struck with the utmost wonder." The Blessed One then declared:

"Ānanda, do you not know that girl?" "Blessed One, I do not." "Ānanda, she is Mgubyed. Through the power of aspiration she was born in the womb of the chief wife of the householder Gāndika, and she is now called Śrī."

When Śrī had grown to adulthood, mendicant kings, wealthy men, merchants, caravan leaders, Kauḍyas, Śākyas, Licchavīs, and many others began to arrive seeking her hand. The householder Gāndika thought: "Many mendicants are coming for Śrī, and those to whom I do not give her will become my enemies."

With this thought he rested his chin in his hand and sat lost in worry. Śrī, seeing this, said: "Father, why do you sit resting your chin in your hand, sunk in such worry?" He replied: "Daughter, mendicant kings, wealthy men, merchants, caravan leaders, Kaud̥yas, Śākyas, Licchavīs, and many others are coming, and those to whom I do not give you will become my enemies — how can I not sit resting my chin in my hand, sunk in worry?" She replied: "Father, do not be troubled. I myself will find a husband." "Daughter, who is it?" "Father, it is the eastern king of Prasenajit." "Daughter, if that is so, then make careful arrangements." "Father, what kind of arrangements?" "Daughter, invite this eastern king of Prasenajit himself here. When he comes to dine, you shall sit at the base of the upper chamber and toss down a flower garland." "Father, I shall do exactly as you say."

He then invited the eastern king of Prasenajit to dine at another household, and when the king had eaten, Śrī, seated at the base of the upper chamber, tossed down a flower garland. The king began to look upward, and when he saw her he said: "Gāndika, you said that Ngorang Sanchen — the Blue Lotus — had come of age; is this not she who stands here?" "Your Majesty, this one is not the Blue Lotus." "Then who is this?" "Your Majesty, this is the younger sister of the Blue Lotus, called Śrī." "Will you give her to someone?" "Your Majesty, she has not been given to anyone." "If that is so, why will you not give her to me?" "Your Majesty, I will." The householder Gāndika gave her, and the eastern king of Prasenajit took Śrī with great splendor as his bride and installed her within the royal retinue of queens.

At another time she said to the king: "Your Majesty, I wish to see monks." The king replied: "You may wish to, but monks do not enter the royal palace." She said: "Your Majesty, if that is so, I offer myself utterly to prison. If you will not permit me to see monks, from this day forward I will take no food, I will make no obeisance, I will pay no homage." And she entered upon a fast. The king then said to the householder Gāndika: "Householder, are you not aware?" "Your Majesty, what is it?" "Śrī has entered upon a fast." "Your Majesty, why does she wish to see monks if monks do not enter the royal palace?" "Your Majesty, then how shall this be accomplished?" "Householder, for this reason let a courtyard be enclosed in your own name and invite the Saṅgha of monks there, and provide them with a meal in the gateway area between." The householder Gāndika's house was adjacent to the king's palace, and so the king had the fence opened to that courtyard and had the ground swept clean.

Then Śrī went to where the Blessed One was, and arriving there, bowed her head at the Blessed One's two feet and sat down to one side.

Seated to one side, the Blessed One then rightly instructed, rightly established, rightly encouraged, and rightly gladdened the householder Gāndika with words of Dharma. In many ways he rightly taught, rightly established, rightly encouraged, and rightly gladdened him with words of Dharma, and then fell silent.

Then the householder Gāndika turned toward the Blessed One, pressed his palms together, bowed, and addressed the Blessed One thus: "Blessed One, may the Saṅgha of monks together with the Blessed One consent to receive a meal at my courtyard enclosure tomorrow." The Blessed One consented to the householder Gāndika by remaining silent.

Then the householder Gāndika, understanding that the Blessed One's silence signified consent, bowed his head at the Blessed One's two feet and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

That very night the householder Gāndika prepared clean and refined foods and drink, rose early the next morning, arranged the seats, set out the water vessels, and invited the Blessed One: "Blessed One, may it please you to know that the time has come." The Blessed One arrived, and the Saṅgha of monks including the venerable Śāriputra entered.

The Blessed One remained in the courtyard enclosure and proceeded to go on alms round. Buddhas, blessed ones, remain in courtyard enclosures and proceed to go on alms round for five reasons. What are the five? They wish to practice inner stillness; they wish to teach Dharma to the gods; they wish to visit the sick; they wish to inspect the lodgings; and they wish to establish rules of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya. In the present case, the Blessed One remained in the courtyard enclosure and proceeded to go on alms round because he wished to establish rules of training for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya.

As the venerable Śāriputra was entering, the king was seated there with his queen and retinue, and when he began to withdraw on that account, the king saw him and said, "Noble Śāriputra, please proceed." Then the venerable Śāriputra said to the monks, "Venerable ones, there are four kinds of words that must not be disrupted: the word of the Tathāgata, the worthy one, the perfectly awakened buddha; the word of a monk who is an arhat with defilements exhausted; the word of the head of discipline; and the word of a king of royal lineage consecrated at the crown. Therefore, venerable ones, be mindful and proceed." Having so entered, he took a seat that had been spread before the Saṅgha of monks and sat down there.

Then the queen Śrī, knowing that the Saṅgha of monks including the venerable Śāriputra was comfortably settled, satisfied and refreshed them with clean and refined foods and drink from her own hands. In many ways, serving them with clean and refined foods and drink from her own hands, and knowing that the Saṅgha of monks including the venerable Śāriputra had finished their meal and had set aside their hands from their bowls, she took a seat lower than the rest and sat down before the venerable Śāriputra in order to hear the Dharma.

Then the venerable Śāriputra rightly taught, rightly established, and rightly encouraged the queen Śrī with words of Dharma.

In many ways, making her rightly rejoice with words of Dharma, he rightly taught, rightly established, rightly exhorted, and rightly made her rejoice. Yet through all of this, she had not seen the truths. The venerable Śāriputra thought: "Does she have roots of virtue or does she not?" He saw that she did have them. "On whom do they depend?" He saw that they depended on herself. So he taught her the Dharma and analyzed it for her, and as he was doing so the time came when the sun had set, and the monks rose from their seats and departed.

The venerable Śāriputra thought: "Though the Blessed One has not yet given permission, there will surely come to be such a case as this, where such circumstances will serve as the occasion for permission being granted." With that in mind, out of regard for her training, he remained right there. Then the venerable Śāriputra, having fully understood the mind, the latent dispositions, the faculty, and the nature of queen Śrī, taught the Dharma in such a way that, upon hearing it, while queen Śrī remained seated on that very seat, the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection, which had been heaped up since beginningless time, were shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and the fruit of stream-entry was made directly manifest.

Having seen the truths, she said: "Noble one, through relying on you, the spiritual friend who is the noble Śāriputra, the noble one has done for me what is like this: my father did not do it for me, my mother did not do it for me, the king did not do it for me, the gods did not do it for me, my ancestors of former times did not do it for me, contemplatives and brahmins did not do it for me, and friends, companions, and the assembly of relatives did not do it for me.

The ocean of blood and tears has been dried up. I have been freed from the mountains of bones. The doors to the lower realms have been shut. The doors to the higher realms and to liberation have been opened. My feet have been lifted out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and I have been placed among gods and humans. Cyclic existence has been brought to its end. The twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time have been shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and the fruit of stream-entry has been attained. Venerable one, I have entered directly. Venerable one, I have entered directly. Venerable one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of monks. May I be accepted as a laywoman. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge from the very depths of my heart with utter sincerity."

Then the venerable Śāriputra established queen Śrī in the truths and departed. He went to where the Blessed One was, arrived, and prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's two feet, then sat to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Śāriputra then reported the matter in full to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "Śāriputra, excellent, excellent! The words of those seven are not to be violated: the word of the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha; the word of a monk who is an arhat whose defilements are exhausted; the word of an elder of the Saṅgha; the word of the ceremonial supervisor; the word of an abbot; the word of a preceptor; and the word of a king of the warrior caste anointed at the crown."

Then the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of those who desire training, who are respectful toward training, and who are furnished with the requisites for training, addressed the monks accordingly with words of Dharma that were consonant with this, that expressed its import fully, and that were in accord with it, and then declared to the monks:

"Monks, therefore the former ruling was the established rule, and this is the allowance. My hearers are to recite the basis of training in the Vinaya in this way:

Furthermore, whatever monk, before dawn has come, before the aurora has risen, without having gathered jewels or things spoken of as jewels, crosses beyond a city gate or the guard post of a city gate — except in circumstances such as these — commits a transgression.

Now, 'whatever monk' means one who is a novice or any other such person. 'Before dawn has come' means while it has not yet become dawn. 'The aurora' refers to the three phases of the aurora: the first aurora, the middle aurora, and the last aurora. Of these, the first aurora appears bluish, the middle aurora appears yellowish, and the last aurora appears reddish — and here it is the last aurora that is intended. 'Has risen' means has appeared. As for 'jewels': jewels means gems, pearls, beryl, white crystal, coral, gold, silver, the essence of stone, red precious stones, and right-spiraling shells. As for 'things spoken of as jewels': things spoken of as jewels means all weapons used in battle and all instruments used for music. 'Without having gathered' means without having bundled them up. 'A king of the warrior caste anointed at the crown' means this: if one is anointed to kingship by a woman consecrated to royal authority, that too is a king of the warrior caste anointed at the crown; and if one anointed to royal authority is of the warrior caste, or of the brahmin caste, or of the merchant caste, or of the common caste, that too is a king of the warrior caste anointed at the crown. 'A city gate' means there are three kinds of gate: the gate of a city, the gate of a royal palace, and the gate of the queens' quarters. 'From the guard post of a gate' means from the vicinity of that gate. 'Crosses' means goes. 'Except in circumstances such as these' means that circumstances such as these are set aside. 'Commits a transgression' means it causes scorching, burning, and falling into hell-beings, animals, hungry ghosts, wretched states, evil destinies, and states of downfall. Moreover, as long as a transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the virtuous phenomena. Therefore it is said to 'commit a transgression.'

Now, how does one come to transgress? If a monk, perceiving it as before-dawn when it is before dawn, crosses beyond a city gate, that becomes an offense. If a monk, with doubt about it being before dawn when it is before dawn, crosses beyond a city gate, that becomes an offense. If a monk, perceiving it as before-dawn when it has in fact become dawn, crosses beyond a city gate, that becomes an offense. If a monk, with doubt about it being before dawn when it has in fact become dawn, crosses beyond a city gate, that becomes an offense. If a monk, perceiving it as dawned when it has not yet dawned, crosses beyond the gate of the royal palace, that becomes an offense. If a monk, with doubt about it being before dawn when it has not yet dawned, crosses beyond the gate of the royal palace, that becomes an offense. If a monk, perceiving it as before-dawn when it has in fact dawned, crosses beyond the gate of the royal palace, that becomes an offense. If a monk, with doubt when it has in fact dawned, crosses beyond the gate of the royal palace, that becomes an offense. If a monk, perceiving it as before-dawn when it is before dawn, crosses beyond the gate of the queens' quarters, that becomes a full transgression."

If a monk, with doubt about it being before dawn when it has not yet dawned, crosses beyond the gate of the queens' quarters, that becomes an offense. If a monk, perceiving it as before dawn when it has in fact dawned, crosses beyond the gate of the queens' quarters, that becomes a wrongdoing. If a monk, with doubt when it has in fact dawned, crosses beyond the gate of the queens' quarters, that becomes a wrongdoing.

When summoned by the king, a queen, a young prince, or ministers, and in the case of the eight obstacles — namely the king, thieves, humans, non-humans, dangerous beings, fire, water, and nāgas being nearby — there is no transgression. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, one who is insane, one who is mentally disturbed, or one who is afflicted by painful sensations. This is the offense of going to the royal palace at night. The eighty-second rule is complete.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One declared that the Prātimokṣa sūtra should be recited at the fortnightly restoration ceremony. When the recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra was taking place at the fortnightly ceremony, the group of six, although making a show of respect, did not listen to the Dharma. They did not treat it as something supreme. They did not treat it as a post. They did not take it to heart. They did not make their minds one-pointed. They did not lend their ears. They did not listen to the Dharma with their whole minds engaged. And they also said to the monks: "Venerable ones, we have only just now come to know that this teaching too is included within the sūtra and gathered within the sūtra." The monks then said to them: "Have the venerable ones only just now heard the Prātimokṣa sūtra being recited? How can you say such a thing?" Those monks replied: "Venerable ones, are we to be restricted to only that much? We must also examine thoughts of sensual desire. We must also examine thoughts of ill-will and thoughts of harmfulness. Why, venerable monks, should monks of little concern fail to listen attentively when the Prātimokṣa sūtra is being recited at the fortnightly ceremony — not treating it as something supreme, not treating it as a post, not taking it to heart, not making their minds one-pointed, not lending their ears, not listening to the Dharma with their whole minds engaged — and also say to the monks: 'Venerable ones, we have only just now come to know that this teaching too is included within the sūtra and gathered within the sūtra'?" And saying this, they rebuked them, spoke out against them, and reproached them. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One convened the community of monks in light of what had occurred, on account of this basis, and in this context, and so forth, as before. "The Blessed Ones who are buddhas, knowing full well, act in a deliberate manner" — and so forth, also as before. The Blessed One rebuked the group of six: "Monks, is it true that when the Prātimokṣa sūtra was being recited at the fortnightly ceremony, you, making a show of respect, did not listen to the Dharma, did not treat it as something supreme, did not treat it as a post, did not take it to heart, did not make your minds one-pointed, did not lend your ears, did not listen to the Dharma with your whole minds engaged, and also said to the monks: 'Venerable ones, we have only just now come to know that this teaching too is included within the sūtra and gathered within the sūtra'? Is this true, venerable ones? It is not so."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, rebuked them, saying that such conduct was not the way of a renunciant, was not fitting, was not proper, and was not in accordance with the training — it was not something that one who has gone forth should do. Then, having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing the ten benefits, one should establish rules of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so on, as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk, when the fortnightly recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra is being recited, says these words — 'Venerable ones, I have only just now come to know that this teaching too is included within the sūtra and gathered within the sūtra' — and if the other monks know that that venerable one was present at two or three previous fortnightly restoration ceremonies, to say nothing of many times: since that venerable one is not absolved through his not knowing, he is indeed one who possesses a transgression. He should be made to carry out whatever transgression has arisen in accordance with the rule. Moreover, you, at the time when the fortnightly recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra is being recited, did not listen to the Dharma with respect, did not treat it as supreme, did not treat it as a post, did not take it to heart, did not make your mind one-pointed, did not lend your ears, did not listen to the Dharma with your whole mind engaged. Venerable one, you have not gained what is to be gained; you have gained what is not to be gained; you have found fault, not what is good. He should be made to feel remorse. To cause that venerable one to feel remorse — that is the transgression."

Now, "whatever monk" refers to the group of six or any others who are likewise. "The fortnightly recitation" refers to the fortnightly recitation of the Prātimokṣa. As for "Prātimokṣa," the Prātimokṣa consists of the four rules entailing defeat, the thirteen rules entailing a formal meeting of the Saṅgha, the two indeterminate rules, the thirty rules entailing forfeiture and confession, the ninety rules entailing confession, the four rules entailing individual confession, the many rules of training, and the seven rules for settling disputes. "Reciting the sūtra" means applying it fully. "At the time of recitation" means at the time of teaching it clearly. "These words" means when one says these words. "Venerable ones, I have only just now come to know that this teaching too is included within the sūtra and gathered within the sūtra" — this refers to the Dharma spoken by the Blessed One. "If the other monks also" means the monks who were present there. "That venerable one" refers to whichever monk that is. "Was present at two or three previous fortnightly restoration ceremonies" means that he is known to have heard the Prātimokṣa twice or three times. "To say nothing of many times" means, how much more so when he is known to have been present many times. "Since that venerable one is not absolved through his not knowing" means that since he is not absolved of the transgression by that means of not knowing, he is indeed one who possesses the transgression. "Whatever transgression has arisen" means the act of transgression. "He should be made to carry out in accordance with the rule" means he should be made to confess it. "Moreover, you, at the time when the fortnightly recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra is being recited, did not listen to the Dharma with respect, did not treat it as supreme, did not treat it as a post, did not take it to heart, did not make your mind one-pointed"

did not lend an ear, did not listen to the Dharma with the whole mind attending — in that case, you, venerable one, have not gained; you have not gained but have acquired fault; you have not gained what is good. He should be made to feel remorse, saying: "You should feel remorse." The phrase "the venerable one should feel remorse in this way" means that he should be made to feel remorse in exactly that manner.

"It causes downfall" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the hells (naraka), into the animal realm, into the wretched realm of hungry ghosts (preta), into the lower destinies, and into states of utter ruin. Furthermore, so long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs the arising of wholesome Dharma qualities — and therefore it is said to cause downfall.

As for how a downfall comes about: when a monk, at the time of the recitation of the four rules that constitute defeat, the thirteen rules requiring a formal meeting of the Saṅgha, the two rules of indeterminate case, the thirty rules of forfeiture-and-confession, the ninety rules of confession, the four rules of individual acknowledgment, the many rules of training, and the seven rules for the settlement of disputes, has not listened to the Dharma with reverence, has not treated it as supreme, has not treated it as a post, has not taken it to heart, has not made his mind one-pointed, has not lent an ear, has not listened to the Dharma with the whole mind attending, and moreover says: "Venerable ones, I have only now come to know that this Dharma, too, is included within the sūtra, is gathered within the sūtra" — in every such case a downfall arises.

If one has grown old having strayed from the path and simply does not know with accuracy, there is no downfall. For one who is a beginner, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is overcome by painful feelings, there is no downfall.

The offence that causes downfall by contemptuously dismissing the object that is the basis of the training — the eighty-third — is complete.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the seventy-ninth section.

The Blessed One, the Buddha (bhagavat), was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there was a carpenter who was known as a hearer of the Dharma of the naked ascetics, and he was deeply devoted to the naked ascetics. Then at another time, a monk who lived as a mendicant tamed him by teaching the Dharma, and he too took refuge in the monk and undertook the bases of training. The mendicant then extensively praised to him the seven bases of meritorious action arising from material things, and the carpenter, having become full of faith, said: "Noble one, I too will properly undertake and engage in a small portion of the seven bases of meritorious action arising from material things." The monk said: "Good sir, what will you do?" The carpenter replied: "Noble one, I will personally prepare and serve a meal to the Saṅgha of monks." The monk said: "Good, do just so."

The mendicant went to the monastery and said to the monks: "Venerable ones, this one, known as a hearer of the Dharma of the naked ascetics, has been established in refuge and in the bases of training, and he wishes to personally prepare and serve a meal to the Saṅgha of monks. Whoever among you wishes to do so may go to him."

Then a certain monk, being without needle and thread, went to the carpenter and said: "Good sir, I have no needle and thread — please provide them." The monk replied: "Noble one, what kind shall I make for you?" The carpenter said: "Whatever is best." "Noble one, what is made from ivory is best." The monk said: "Good sir, make one from ivory." So the carpenter made an ivory needle-case for him and gave it to him. That monk then showed it to the other monks, and other monks likewise had him make them, and yet others did so as well.

Yet others too had him make them, until his supply of ivory was exhausted. Then yet another monk came and said: "Good sir, my needle-case has fallen apart." "Noble one, what kind shall I make for you?" "Whatever is best." "Noble one, if one made of ivory is best, then ivory is already gone. If you wish, I can make one of bone." "Good sir, please make one without fail." So he made a bone needle-case for him and gave it to him. That monk showed it to the other monks, and other monks likewise had him make them, and yet others did so as well, and yet others too — until his supply of bone was also exhausted.

Then yet another monk came and said: "Good sir, my needle-case has fallen apart." "Noble one, what kind shall I make for you?" "Whatever is best." "Noble one, if one made of ivory is best, the ivory is gone." "Good sir, if that is so, then make one of bone." "Noble one, the bone is gone too. If you wish, I can make one of horn." "Good sir, please make one without fail." So he made a needle-case of horn for him and gave it to him. That monk showed it to the other monks, and other monks likewise had him make them, and yet others did so as well, and yet others too — until his supply of horn was also exhausted.

Now this man, working for the monks at his own expense, using his own food and his own materials, had become impoverished. The naked ascetics (tīrthikas), seizing the occasion for mockery, began to say: "At the time when we had full confidence in our teaching, all this abounded in abundance. But now, out of misplaced confidence in the śramaṇas who are sons of the Śākya, people even beg for food." When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks on account of this incident, this basis of legislation, and this occasion — and so forth as before. The awakened and blessed buddhas, even while knowing, ask — and so forth as before. The Blessed One then asked the monks: "Is it true, monks, that you had needle-cases made of ivory, of bone, and of horn?" "Venerable one, it is true." The Blessed One then censured those who have great desires, who know no contentment, who are difficult to support, and who are difficult to satisfy. Having done so, the Blessed One then spoke in praise of those who have few desires, who know contentment, who are easy to support, who are easy to satisfy, who are diligent, who are restrained in their requisites, who are trained, who are of good conduct, who are scrupulous, and who are energetic — and then he declared to the monks: "Monks, therefore, having clearly seen ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before.

"My śrāvakas shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: Whatever monk has a needle-case made of ivory, or of bone, or of horn, he shall break it and incur a downfall."

Now, "whatever monk" refers to one who belongs to this Dharma community. "Of ivory" means ivory itself. "Of bone" means bone itself. "Of horn" means horn itself. "Needle-case" refers to two kinds: one that has a hollow tube, and one that is like a container. Both meanings are intended here. "Has made" means by oneself or through another. "He shall break it and incur a downfall" means: having broken that object, he incurs a downfall — a transgression requiring confession. "He incurs a downfall" means he falls into the hell realms, into the animal realm, and into — the realm of hungry ghosts, the realms of misfortune, the lower destinies, and the states of wrong rebirth — burning him, scorching him, causing him to fall. Furthermore, so long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually acknowledged, it obstructs the virtuous qualities of Dharma — and it is for this reason that it is called "a downfall." This is what was declared.

Now, as to how a downfall comes about: whenever a monk makes or causes another to make even so much as a needle-case of ivory, bone, or horn, a downfall is incurred in every case. The monk in whose presence it is offered must ask: "Did you break that object?" If it is offered and accepted without asking, it becomes a wrongdoing. That transgression, since it has not been confessed, must be confessed again. There is no transgression for one who is acting for the first time, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one afflicted by painful feeling. This completes the eighty-fourth downfall, that of making a needle-case.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time, a certain monk who was traveling through the districts came to Śrāvastī, and having grown weary from the road, he rested from his fatigue and went to the Jeta Grove, where he sat in the gateway. He found a low seat, and having washed both feet before it, he sat cross-legged there. Now it happened to be the season of hot weather, when snake-venom spreads rapidly. Tormented by the heat and longing for coolness, a certain creature had coiled up and was lying right there in that spot. As the monk, exhausted from the road, began to doze, his body twitched slightly again and again, and the seat made a creaking sound. The creature whose venom spreads rapidly thought, "This one is going to harm me," and drew itself up, coiled and alert. Then, as the monk's body twitched again and the seat creaked once more, it instantly seized him. Dying right there in that very posture, when the time came, he was born among the excellent company of the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three.

While he was there, a group of divine maidens arrived, but he drove them away with a snapping of his fingers. They went before Śakra, the lord of the gods (Indra, king of the gods), and said: "O God, this divine son, newly born and not long arisen, sits cross-legged; when we approached him, he drove us away with a snapping of his fingers." Śakra said: "Goddesses, he was formerly a monk. Hold up a mirror before him and he will recover his memory." They held a mirror before him, and seeing himself adorned with shoulder ornaments, ear-rings, earrings, garlands, and various jewels, he recovered his memory.

Then he began to desire those maidens, and they said: "Patient one, we do not attend on you in that manner. We attend on whoever pays homage to Śakra, the lord of the gods." He reflected: "I have paid homage to the Blessed One, who is free from the foul smell of desire — so how could I now pay homage to Śakra, the lord of the gods, who revels in sensual enjoyment?" Realizing this, he said: "Sisters, is there any means by which one need not pay homage to Śakra, the lord of the gods? There is, patient one — among those divine sages who dwell there practicing celibacy, whoever among them practices the celibate life does not pay homage to Śakra, the lord of the gods, for it is Śakra himself who pays homage to such a one." He then entered among those divine sages. When Śakra, the lord of the gods, heard how that one had joined the divine sages and was living the celibate life, Śakra went to him, paid homage at his feet, and departed.

Then the former monk, now a divine son, thought to himself:

"The reason I have been maintaining the celibate life is precisely in order to go before the Blessed One and pay homage to him. To go before him merely in order to see and venerate the Blessed One while maintaining the celibate life would not be in keeping with my condition. So I shall go before the Blessed One to see and pay homage to him without maintaining the celibate life any longer."

Then the former monk, now a divine son, took up spotless earrings with pendants swaying, adorned his body with necklaces and bracelets, and filled both his hands with divine blue lotuses, red lotuses, white night-blooming lotuses, and white day-blooming lotuses. At the very depth of night, blazing with surpassing brilliance of color, he went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, he scattered flowers over the Blessed One, bowed his head to the Blessed One's two feet in homage, and sat down to one side. And through the radiance of that divine son's luminous form, the entire Jeta Grove was pervaded with a great and boundless light.

Then the former monk, now a divine son, addressed the Blessed One in verse, singing:

That grove they call the Benighted — proclaimed throughout by throngs of goddesses, surrounded as if by flesh-devouring she-demons — how might one pass through it without dying?

The Blessed One declared:

Along the road called Straight, to the place called the Fearless Quarter,
a chariot named the Soundless One, driven by the thought of Dharma — its focus is a sense of shame, and mindfulness its retinue.
The driver is wisdom herself, and right view is the guide.
Whatever man or woman has a vehicle of this kind,
if they mount such a vehicle,

they journey to the Fearless Quarter.

Then the Blessed One, having understood the intention, the latent dispositions, the constitution, and the nature of that former monk, now a divine son, taught the Dharma in such a way that — having heard it — the divine son, while sitting in that very seat, shattered with the vajra of wisdom the twenty peaks of the mountain of views that constitute the perishable collection, and thereby directly realized the fruit of stream-entry. In precisely this way, the Blessed One caused him to thoroughly understand each of the four noble truths of the noble ones.

Having seen the truths, he solemnly proclaimed three times: "What the venerable Blessed One has done for me is something my father never did, my mother never did, no king ever did, no god ever did, no ancestor ever did, no ascetic or brahmin ever did, no group of loving friends, dear companions, or relatives ever did: he has dried up the ocean of blood and tears; he has freed me from the mountains of bones; he has sealed shut the doors to the lower realms; he has opened wide the doors to the higher realms and to liberation; he has drawn my feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts; and he has placed me among gods and humans."

Then he said further:

Through your power, mighty and supreme, laden with my many faults, the trail of lower realms blocked off, richly endowed with merit, the path to the higher realms opened wide — and I myself have even come to reach the trail that leads beyond all sorrow.

Relying on you, most utterly pure, today
I have gained the flawless, purified eye of Dharma.
I have attained the peaceful, noble, exalted state with joy, and have crossed to the far shore of the ocean of suffering.

Among all beings, worshipped by gods and humans and asuras, free from birth and aging and sickness and death — to see existence as empty is exceedingly rare:
O Sage, today there is the fruit of seeing you.

Then, with his ornaments arranged and his pendant necklace flowing free, he bowed at your feet, and with joy arising,
he circumambulated the Subduer from the right, and rose into the sky, heading toward the divine world.

Then the monk who had formerly been a god became like a merchant who has found a fine profit, like a farmer whose harvest has come in abundantly, like a hero who has triumphed completely in battle, and like a sick man who has been fully delivered from every illness. Wearing the very same robes in which he had come before the Blessed One, he returned to his own dwelling.

Now, at a certain moment, as the night was giving way to dawn, the guestmaster opened the door and, taking up a broom, began to sweep the guesthouse. He saw the monk sitting cross-legged, and said to him, "Venerable one, do wake up. Are you, too, practicing meditative concentration as before?" When the monk did not speak a word, the guestmaster took hold of him by both arms and began to shake him. And at that moment he perceived that the monk had passed away. He then began to examine what had caused the death, and presently saw beneath the bed a swift-acting venomous serpent lying there. Frightened, he went to the other monks and said, "Venerable ones, the monk who was sleeping in the guesthouse has been seized by a swift-acting venomous serpent and has passed away."

The monks carried the body to the charnel ground, performed the cremation, and then returned. Upon their return they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One reflected: every fault and harm that has arisen here has come about because a monk made his bed on a low sleeping platform and washed both feet in front of it. Having thus reflected, he declared, "Therefore, a monk shall not make his bed on a low sleeping platform, nor wash both feet in front of it." The Blessed One having spoken and declared, "A monk shall not make his bed on a low sleeping platform, nor wash both feet in front of it," it then came about that monks who possessed no sandals were being harmed. So the Blessed One declared, "Those who possess no sandals may wash both feet separately, one side and then the other, and in this they need feel no remorse."

Then the group of six monks heard that the Blessed One had prohibited a monk from sleeping on a low sleeping platform after the monk sleeping on such a platform had been seized by a swift-acting venomous serpent and had passed away. They thereupon had beds made with legs twelve cubits high and installed ridiculously tall headboards. The other monks said to them, "Venerable ones, what are you all doing?" They replied, "Who is doing anything wrong? Did you not see that the monk was seized by a swift-acting venomous serpent and passed away? Even you, the group of six, could be seized by a swift-acting venomous serpent and pass away. Do you want to divide up our funeral goods? For such a trifling matter, why do monks rebuke monks? Is that what you call giving reproofs, hurling accusations, and speaking ill?" The monks then reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this case, and this situation, convened the community of monks, and so forth as before. And the passage beginning "The blessed buddhas, while knowing, feign not to know" and what follows is also as before. The blessed Buddha reprimanded the group of six monks: "Is it true, monks, that when the other monks rebuked you, you spoke in such and such words?" "It is true, Blessed One." The blessed Buddha then censured them, saying that what is contrary to the conduct of an ascetic, what is not fitting, not proper, not in accord with the code — that is not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

Then, having censured them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing the ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and so forth, as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk has a throne or a stool made for the Saṅgha, he shall have it made to the measure of eight finger-breadths of the Sugata. If he has one made that exceeds that, it entails cutting it down and a transgression" — thus did the Blessed One establish that training rule for the hearers in the Vinaya.

Now the Venerable Charka's knees were exceeding the measure, and when they came to touch the footrest, the monks reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "In that case, a socket for the leg is permitted."

Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of those who desire training, who revere training, and who gather the requisites for training. Having addressed the monks with words consistent with that praise, more weighty than that praise, and endowed with qualities suited to it, the Blessed One then spoke to the monks: "Monks, what was established before was a rule, and this is a further allowance. My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk has a throne or a stool made for the Saṅgha, he shall have it made to the measure of eight finger-breadths of the Sugata, except for inserting a socket for the leg. If he has one made that exceeds that, it entails cutting it down and a transgression.

"A monk" means one who belongs to this Dharma. "Of the Saṅgha" means of the Saṅgha of hearers of the Tathāgata. "A throne" means a throne proper. "A stool" likewise means a stool proper. "Has it made" means either by himself or by another. "Except for inserting a socket for the leg" means that inserting a socket for the leg is permitted. "He shall have it made to the measure of eight finger-breadths of the Sugata" — "the Sugata" means the Teacher. The eight finger-breadths of the Sugata constitute the measure of one standard cubit. "That exceeds that" means above that measure. "It entails cutting it down and a transgression" means that after cutting the object down, it entails a transgression that must be confessed. "A transgression" means that it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad migrations — into the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of misfortune. Moreover, as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs virtuous qualities — and therefore it is called "a transgression."

Now, how does a transgression come about in this case? If a monk has a throne or a stool made — exceeding the measure of eight finger-breadths of the Sugata, other than inserting a socket for the leg — to whatever degree it exceeds, a transgression is incurred in every instance. Before accepting the excess, one should ask the person who is making it: "Have you cut that part of yours down?" If one accepts it without having asked, it becomes an offence of wrongdoing. That transgression too, not having been confessed, must also be confessed. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, one who is insane, one who is mentally disturbed, or one who is afflicted by feeling.

This is the eighty-fifth transgression, concerning adjusting the legs of a throne. It is complete.

The Blessed Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Because Nandaka was a newly admitted monk, his throne had been seized by the most senior monk, and now the time for allocating lodgings had arrived as well. He thought to himself: "What method is there so that no one seizes my throne?" Then, having obtained some cotton wool for a certain purpose, an idea came to him concerning it: "I will spread cotton wool over it and leave it there." So he spread cotton wool on top of the throne and left it.

When a certain very senior monk arrived and saw it, he asked: "Venerable one, whose is this?" The novice replied: "It is my cotton wool." Then a monk who was sitting nearby said: "What the novice says is true — the cotton wool is the novice's. But the throne itself belongs to the Saṅgha." When he said this, the novice became angry and, taking the cotton wool, spread it little by little over that throne.

The monk did not inspect the matter and simply lay down there. By the time dawn came and he rose in the morning, all his robes had turned grey with the cotton wool fibers. The other monks said to him: "Did you sleep on a battlefield?" He explained how it had come about, and the monks, rebuking those few monks, said: "Why do monks spread cotton wool on the Saṅgha's thrones or small thrones and place them there?" They criticized, disparaged, and complained about it. Then the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this occasion, and this circumstance, convened an assembly of the community of monks — and so forth as before. The passage beginning "The awakened ones, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, feign ignorance" also proceeds as before. The awakened Blessed One then questioned the venerable Nandaka, saying: "Nandaka, is it true that you spread cotton wool on the Saṅgha's throne?" He replied: "Blessed One, I did so." The awakened Blessed One reproached him, saying that such conduct was not in keeping with the way of a renunciant, was not fitting, was not proper, and was not in accord with the rule — it was not something that one who has gone forth should do. The Blessed One censured him thoroughly.

Having censured him in many ways, the Blessed One then addressed the monks, saying: "Monks, therefore, seeing the ten benefits clearly and truly, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk spreads cotton wool on a throne or small throne belonging to the Saṅgha, or has it spread, incurs a transgression that must be confessed after having been gathered in summary.

Whatever monk: this refers to Nandaka, a son of the Śākya, or anyone else who is similarly situated. Of the Saṅgha: this means the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata's hearers. Throne: a throne proper. Small throne: a small throne proper. Cotton wool: any one of the five kinds — the cotton wool of the śālmali tree, the arka, the kaśa, the buka, or the eraka. Spreads: by oneself. Has it spread: through another. Incurs a transgression that must be confessed after having been gathered in summary: having gathered that thing, it is a transgression that must be confessed — it is a downfall that must be confessed. As for the meaning of incurs a transgression: it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinations of the hell-beings, animals, and hungry ghosts, into the lower realms, and into states of wrong falling. Furthermore, as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs virtuous dharmas — that is why it is said to incur a transgression. Now, how does such a transgression come about?"

Whatever amount — however small — a monk spreads wool shearing-by-shearing or in loose layers onto the chair or small stool of the Saṅgha, he becomes one who has committed a transgression in all cases. The person in whose presence he is placing it must ask him: "Have you gathered that article?" If he accepts and takes it without having been asked, it becomes a wrongdoing. That downfall, too, since it has not yet been confessed, must be confessed. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is insane, one who is mentally disturbed, or one who is afflicted by painful sensations. This is the transgression-entailing offense regarding defiling with wool — the eighty-sixth, now complete.

The Blessed One (the Buddha), the awakened one, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One declared that monks should be permitted to make seat coverings (gḍiṅga). When monks were engaging in making seat coverings in excess of the proper measure, and when the Blessed One declared, "Monks should be permitted to make seat coverings," there were cases where, in that same context, monks were censuring other monks, hurling accusations at them, and speaking ill of them for engaging in making seat coverings in excess of the proper measure. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One. Thereupon the Blessed One, with respect to this incident, this initial occasion, and this circumstance, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth as before. The Blessed Ones who are buddhas, knowing yet acting as if unaware, and so forth — this too is as before.

The Blessed One, the buddha, then questioned the monks: "Monks, when I declared 'Monks are to be permitted to make seat coverings,' is it true that you were engaging in making them in excess of the proper measure?" "Venerable One, it is so." The Blessed One, the buddha, then censured great desiring, not knowing contentment, being difficult to nourish, and being difficult to satisfy. Thereupon the Blessed One praised having few desires, knowing contentment, being easy to nourish, being easy to satisfy, being lean of body, having few possessions, being of refined qualities, being of beautiful conduct, and being aware of what is sufficient. He then addressed the monks thus:

"Monks, therefore, seeing the ten benefits precisely as they are, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and so forth as before. "My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk is making a seat covering, let him make it within the proper measure. The proper measure for a seat covering is this: it may reach at most to the height of the Sugata, and in width to one and a half of the same measure. If one makes it exceeding that, having cut it, he commits a transgression." Thus the Blessed One established that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The venerable Charka, because his seat covering exceeded the proper measure and could not adequately serve as such, placed bundles of leaves to the side at the foot of his bed in order to protect his sleeping place. It is the very nature of reality of the Blessed Ones, the buddhas, who live and abide, who are alive and alert, to travel out of compassion for beings who are to be tamed, going at the appropriate time into the realms of hell-beings, ranging among the animals, ranging among the hungry ghosts, ranging among the gods, ranging through the provinces, ranging along the rivers, ranging through the mountains, ranging through the charnel grounds, and proceeding to temples. In this matter, it being the Blessed One's intention to proceed to a temple, the Blessed One went to the place where the temple of the venerable Charka was.

The Blessed One saw that beside the venerable Charka's sleeping mat, bundles of leaves had been placed. Having seen this, he spoke to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, whose sleeping mat is this?"

"Venerable sir, it is the venerable Charka's."

"Then why have bundles of leaves been placed beside the mat?"

"Venerable sir, the Blessed One has permitted monks to make bed-frames; he has permitted them to be made according to the proper measure. The measure for a bed-frame is this: as high as the Sugata's height, and in width half a height plus one height-unit. If one exceeds that, the article shall be cut down and there is a transgression." Responding to this rule of training laid down in the Vinaya for the hearers, the venerable Charka's bed-frame exceeded the measure by far; being unable to lower it to the measure, he had placed bundles of leaves beside the mat in order to protect his sleeping place.

"Ānanda, for that reason, let it be lowered by a full Sugata height."

The Blessed One then gave praise for desiring the training, for revering the training, and for equipping oneself with the requisites of the training, and he addressed the monks with words in keeping with that theme, words of greater import, and words endowed with qualities appropriate thereto. He then declared to the monks:

"Monks, what was laid down before was the rule; what follows now is the permission. Let my hearers recite this rule of training in the Vinaya in this way: When a monk makes a bed-frame, he is permitted to make it to the proper measure. The measure for a bed-frame is this: as high as the Sugata's height, and in width half a height plus one height-unit. Let it be lowered by a full Sugata height. If one exceeds that, the article shall be cut down and there is a transgression."

Now, "a monk" means a person subject to these rules. "A bed-frame" means a frame elevated in tiers. "Makes" means making it oneself or having another make it. "Permitted to make it to the proper measure" means making it in accordance with whatever the proper measure for a bed-frame is.

"The measure for a bed-frame is this: as high as the Sugata's height, and in width half a height plus one height-unit." Here, "height" means in the vertical dimension. "The Sugata" means the Teacher. "His height" means three standard cubits. "Width" means the horizontal dimension. "Half a height plus one height-unit": the Sugata's half height plus one height-unit equals one standard cubit and six finger-breadths.

"Let it be lowered by a full Sugata height" means that if the measure cannot be met, it is to be lowered by a full Sugata height; and a full Sugata height is one and a half standard cubits plus one height-unit. Therefore the maximum permissible height for a bed-frame is one and a half standard cubits plus five units.

"If one exceeds that" means going above this. "The article shall be cut down and there is a transgression" means: after cutting down and removing that object, the transgression of having cut it is to be confessed. "There is a transgression" means it causes one to burn, to be cooked, and to fall into the bad destinies of hell-beings, animals, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of wrong downfall. Moreover, for as long as such a transgression is neither confessed nor individually disclosed, it obstructs virtuous qualities. For that reason, it is said "there is a transgression."

How does a transgression occur? Whenever a monk makes a bed-frame exceeding, by however little, the maximum measure in height of one and a half cubits plus five units, and in width of one cubit and six finger-breadths, a transgression is incurred in every case. One must ask the person in whose presence the enlargement is being made: "Has your article been cut down?" If, without having asked, one accepts and uses it, an offense is committed. That transgression too, being unconfessed, must again be confessed.

There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, for one who is mentally disturbed, for one who is distracted in mind, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

This concludes the eighty-seventh offense entailing a transgression arising from a mattress cover.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One declared: "A monk may have a mattress cover made." Some monks, having had one made exceeding the measure, the Blessed One, having declared "A monk may have a mattress cover made," reproached those monks, saying: "Why, monks, do you have one made exceeding the measure?" — censuring, rebuking, and disparaging them. Thereupon the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and then the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, this basis for discussion, and this occasion, convened an assembly of the community of monks — and so forth, as before. The passage beginning "The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, while knowing, make inquiry" — that too is as before. The Blessed One then questioned the monks: "Monks, when I declared 'A monk may have a mattress cover made,' is it true that you had one made exceeding the measure?" "It is true, Blessed One." The Blessed One then censured great desire, not knowing satisfaction, being difficult to maintain, and being difficult to fill. Thereupon the Blessed One, having spoken in praise of few desires, knowing satisfaction, being easy to maintain, being easy to fill, of being thin, of few requisites, of purified qualities, of beauty, and of knowing warmth, addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits in full, a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya is to be established" — and so forth, as before.

"My hearers are to recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk has a mattress cover made, let him have it made according to the measure.

The measure of a mattress cover is this: four Sugata-cubits in length and one Sugata's width in width. If he has one made exceeding that, having cut it down, a transgression is incurred."

The phrase "a monk" refers to one who holds this Dharma. "Mattress cover" means a garment for the ill. "Has it made" means either by oneself or by another. "Let him have it made according to the measure" means in accordance with whatever the measure of a mattress cover is. "The measure of a mattress cover is this: four Sugata-cubits in length and one Sugata's width in width" — the word "length" means in the long direction. "Sugata" means the Teacher. "Four of his cubits in length" means six standard cubits. "Width" means across. "One Sugata's width in width" — the Sugata's width means three standard cubits. "If he has one made exceeding that" means more than that. "Having cut it down, a transgression is incurred" means: having cut that article down, a transgression is incurred — a transgression that must be confessed. "A transgression is incurred" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinies — the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower realms, and the states of wrong descent. Moreover, for as long as that transgression has not been confessed and individually disclosed, it obstructs virtuous qualities. For that reason, it is said "a transgression is incurred." How does a transgression occur?

If a monk has even a little of a robe-covering made and has it made to exceed six sugata-spans in length and three sugata-spans in width, it constitutes a transgression in every case. One should ask the person in whose presence it is being sewn: "Has that article of yours been cut?" If it is sewn and accepted without having asked, it becomes a wrongdoing. That transgression, moreover, not being a transgression requiring confession, must still be confessed. There is no transgression for one who is a beginner, one who is insane, one who is mentally disturbed, or one who is afflicted by feeling. This is the transgression arising from a robe-covering. The eighty-eighth rule is complete.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One had declared that monks should have a rains-season outer robe made. Monks then had one made exceeding the measure by far, and some monks of little means censured, upbraided, and spoke ill of them, saying: "The Blessed One has declared that monks should have a rains-season outer robe made — why do you monks have one made that far exceeds the measure?" The monks then reported this to the Blessed

One. Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence and this occasion, convened an assembly of monks — and so forth as before. The Blessed Buddhas, knowing full well, inquire — and so forth, also as before. The Blessed One, the Buddha, questioned the monks: "Monks, I declared that monks should have a rains-season outer robe made — is it true that you had one made far exceeding the measure?" "Venerable one, it is so." The Blessed One, the Buddha, then rebuked having great desires, not knowing contentment, being difficult to maintain, and being difficult to satisfy. Then the Blessed One spoke in praise of having few desires, knowing contentment, being easy to maintain, being easy to satisfy, being meek, keeping few possessions, having purified qualities, being refined, and knowing warmth, and addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth as before. "My hearers shall recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: If a monk has a rains-season outer robe made, let him have it made according to the proper measure. The proper measure of the rains-season outer robe is this: in length, six sugata-heights at most; in width, three and a half sugata-heights. If one has it made exceeding that, it is cut and a transgression is incurred."

"A monk" means one who belongs to this Dharma. "A rains-season outer robe" means a garment for protection from rain. "Has it made" means either by oneself or by another. "Let him have it made according to the proper measure" means according to whatever the proper measure of the rains-season outer robe is. "The proper measure of the rains-season outer robe is this: in length, six sugata-heights at most; in width, three and a half sugata-heights." Here, "at most" means at the limit. "Sugata" means the Teacher. "Six of his heights" — six of those heights amounts, in standard cubit measure, to nine cubits. "In width" means across. "Three and a half sugata-heights" — three and a half of the Sugata's heights amounts, in standard cubit measure, to three cubits and eight finger-widths. "If one has it made exceeding that" means beyond that amount.

"Having cut it, it becomes a downfall" means that having cut that article, one incurs a downfall of the kind that must be confessed. "It becomes a downfall" means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the bad destinies — the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower rebirths, and the states of wrong falling. Furthermore, for as long as that downfall is neither confessed nor individually confessed, it obstructs virtuous qualities. Therefore it is said to become a downfall. As for how the downfall occurs: if a monk has a rains-season outer robe made that exceeds, in any degree whatsoever, the maximum of nine cubits in length and three cubits and eight finger-widths in width, in every case it becomes a downfall. One should ask the person before whom one is about to receive it: "Have you cut that article?" If one accepts and receives it without having asked, it becomes a wrongdoing. Since that downfall also remains unconfessed, it must again be confessed. Those who are beginners, those who are insane, those who are mentally disturbed, and those overcome by sensation incur no downfall. Thus is completed the eighty-ninth rule derived from the rains-season outer robe.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Venerable Ānanda went to the dwelling of Kalpika the carpenter and sat for a little while in conversation, then said: "Friend, are you able to sew a robe of the Sugata's robe-measure?" He replied: "Noble one, what use to you is a robe of the Sugata's robe-measure?" Then he said: "Poor man, what would I put here for you? If you want wages, sew it." Ānanda thought: "What this fellow says is not wrong — what would he put here for me? It is because I need wages that I will sew it." Realizing this, he said: "Noble one, sew it." So Ānanda gave him cloth and wages, and he sewed it. Ānanda put on a small portion of it and carried the remainder over his shoulder, and a monk who saw him and Ānanda said: "Elder, look at that patch-cloak — let it rest." Ānanda replied: "Reverend, this is not a patch-cloak." "Then what is it?" "It is a robe of the Sugata's measure." The monk said: "Elder, is it fitting for you to wear a robe of the Sugata's measure? It would be fitting if one were being pressed down under the heel of enemies." The monk said: "Does the elder then have enemies?" "From the very beginning you are the chief enemy of my enemies — therefore I cannot bear that you wear a robe of the Sugata's measure." Monks of little account then reproached, jeered at, and censured: "Why do monks wear robes of the Sugata's robe-measure?" The monks reported this to the Blessed One. Then the Blessed One, on account of this incident, this occasion, and this context, convened an assembly of monks, and so on, just as before. "The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, while knowing full well, feigned ignorance" — and so on, also just as before. The Blessed One then asked Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that you had a robe of the Sugata's robe-measure made?" "Reverend one, it is not." The Blessed One then rebuked what was not in accordance with the conduct of a renunciant, not in accord with propriety, not fitting, not in conformity with the training — declaring that it was not something a person who has gone forth should do. After rebuking in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks:

"Monks, seeing fully the ten benefits, I shall lay down a training rule for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so on, just as before. "My śrāvakas are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: 'Furthermore, whatever monk has a robe made to the measure of the Sugata's robe — that is a transgression.'" In this way the Blessed One laid down that training rule for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya.

Now, after the Blessed One had laid down the training rule for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya — declaring that whatever monk has a robe made to the measure of the Sugata's robe commits a transgression — the venerable Ānanda caused others to exceed that measure. And when a number of monks began to rebuke, revile, and speak ill of those monks, saying: "Why do you have robes made exceeding what the Blessed One prescribed?" — the monks reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, the earlier rule was the original ruling, and this is the supplementary ruling. My śrāvakas are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows: 'Furthermore, whatever monk has a robe made to the measure of the Sugata's robe, or has a robe made exceeding the Sugata's robe — that is a transgression.'

The measure of the Sugata's robe is this: ten of the Sugata's spans in length, and six of the Sugata's spans in width. That is the measure of the Sugata's robe.

Now as to the words 'whatever monk': this means Ānanda, son of the Śākya, or anyone else of that kind.

'The Sugata' means the Teacher.

'Of the measure of his robe' means of whatever measure the Sugata's robe is.

'Robe' means any one of seven types: woollen cloth, hemp cloth, silk cloth, cotton cloth, fine linen cloth, cotton-hemp cloth, or solar cloth.

'Has made' means either by oneself or through another.

'Exceeding the Sugata's robe' means anything larger than that.

'Transgression' means it burns, scorches, and causes one to fall into the wretched states — the hells, the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and the states of downfall. Moreover, so long as the transgression is not confessed and not individually confessed, it obstructs virtuous qualities. Therefore it is called a transgression.

The measure of the Sugata's robe is this: ten of the Sugata's spans in length, and six of the Sugata's spans in width. That is the measure of the Sugata's robe. As for the ten spans of the Sugata in length, that is twenty-five standard forearm-lengths. As for the six spans of the Sugata in width, that is nine standard forearm-lengths.

How does a transgression arise? Whenever a monk has a robe made that is even slightly equal to the measure of the Sugata's robe, or a robe exceeding the Sugata's robe, a transgression arises in every case. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, or one afflicted by painful sensations.

Here ends the ninetieth transgression arising from the measure of the Sugata's robe."

Here ends the collection of transgressions.

The Vinaya Analysis, the eightieth fascicle.

Summary verse:

A village, and another's house, the trainings, and a forest retreat —
by the speech of the Buddha, speaking benefit, it is taught that each is to be confessed separately.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in the Kalandaka bamboo grove at Veḷuvana. In the city of Rājagṛha there lived a certain householder who was wealthy, of great riches, of abundant possessions, whose property was extensive and vast, who was endowed with wealth rivaling that of Vaiśravaṇa, competing with Vaiśravaṇa in his riches. He took a wife from among his social equals and together with her he played and took delight and enjoyed pleasure. While he was thus playing and taking delight and enjoying pleasure, his wife at a certain other time became with child. Eight or nine months passed, and from that birth there arose a daughter who was beautiful of form, lovely to behold, fair, with eyes like blue lotuses, possessing the fragrance of blue lotuses, and with a complexion resembling the color of blue lotus petals. His relatives gathered and assembled, and on the twenty-first day — three weeks of seven days — they held a grand birth celebration for the daughter, and they proceeded to give her a name. "What shall this daughter be called?" The relatives said: "Since this daughter has eyes like the blue lotus, possesses the fragrance of the blue lotus, and has a complexion like blue lotus petals, let her name be Blue Lotus Hue." And so the name Blue Lotus Hue was given to her. She was nurtured and raised and grew to be a young woman.

Her father had no son, and he thought to himself: "I shall not give this daughter to anyone on account of lineage, nor on account of wealth, nor on account of beauty. Rather, I shall give her to whichever man agrees to dwell in my house as a resident son-in-law."

Now there was another householder in Rājagṛha who had taken a wife from among his social equals and together with her he played and took delight and enjoyed pleasure. While he was thus playing and taking delight and enjoying pleasure, his wife at a certain other time became with child. Eight or nine months passed, and from that birth a son was born. He too was given a name in keeping with his lineage, was nurtured and raised, and grew to be a young man.

Then at a certain other time that young man's parents both passed away in their time. As he wandered here and there, destitute, it happened by chance that he came to the house of that householder. The householder said to him: "Young man, whose son are you?" "I am the son of such and such a householder." "Young man, where is your father?" "He has passed away." "Young man, where is your mother?" "She too has passed away." "Young man, if that is the case, I shall give you my daughter in marriage — become my resident son-in-law, dwelling in my house." "Your lordship has done no wrong. Since I too am bereft of both parents and wander here and there in wretched desolation, may it be as you say — you have spoken no wrong; I shall do just so."

That householder gave him Blue Lotus Hue, and on an auspicious day and date, with a brief ceremony, he sent her as a bride. The young man then began to dwell in that house.

Now after some time had passed, the father of Blue Lotus Hue passed away, and her mother, dwelling as she pleased and wandering about, being attended with good food and fine clothing, began to be afflicted by the afflictions. She thought to herself: "If I were to bring another man here, my son-in-law would come to know of it. Let me instead play and take delight and enjoy pleasure together with him." And so she made her feelings known to him.

The domain of a woman captivates the senses and stirs desire, and so he had begun to look upon her with longing. Then she displayed her bodily signs to him, and he lay together with her. In time, a being had entered the womb of Blue Lotus Hue, and when the moment of giving birth drew near, she sent a servant girl to her mother, saying: "Go and summon my mother." When the girl went and found her sitting alone together with her son-in-law in a secluded place, she waited there for a short while, thinking it over. When the mother came out, the girl said: "Blue Lotus Hue is calling for you — please go." The mother went, and before long Blue Lotus Hue gave birth to a daughter. Blue Lotus Hue then said to the servant girl: "What is keeping you?" The girl replied: "May your mother and your husband be well." Blue Lotus Hue said: "What do you mean?" The girl told her what had happened, and Blue Lotus Hue said: "Girl, are you slandering my mother and my husband?" The girl replied: "My lady, if you do not believe me, I shall make it plain before your very eyes." And so she set about watching for an opportunity for the two of them, and when at last the two were sitting alone together, she went quickly and said to Blue Lotus Hue: "Come quickly — look for yourself!" Blue Lotus Hue went quickly and looked, and she saw the two of them lying together. Blue Lotus Hue thought to herself: "This wretched woman — is there no other man to be found that she takes my son-in-law to bed with her? And this wretch of a man — is there no other woman to be found that he lies with my own mother?" Recognizing what had happened, she was overcome with intolerable fury, and she hurled the infant at the son-in-law, crying: "You wretch, from this day forward enjoy yourself with her!" The child struck against the father's body, tumbled onto the threshold of the door, and its head was shattered. Blue Lotus Hue covered her head and left the house.

Before long, she encountered a merchant caravan that had suffered losses and was ruined. She fled away with them, and the caravan leader saw her and became attached to her beauty and her youthful bloom. He asked: "Young woman, whose are you?" She replied that she belonged to whoever was giving her food and clothing. The caravan leader took her as his wife, and the caravan that had been ruined and broken gradually came to ruin completely, and he settled down there with her.

After a time, the caravan leader traded in the market, took the proceeds of his trade, and returned to the countryside. The merchants there were inviting one another to feasts at each other's houses and holding celebrations. The caravan leader did not contribute anything, and the merchants said to him: "Caravan leader, you borrowed things from us and gave nothing in return." He replied: "You men have wives at home, and that is why you can hold feasts, but there is no one to tend to me, so how could I give anything?" They said: "If that is the case, why not look for a wife?" He replied: "If there is a young woman resembling my wife, I will take her as a bride." They said: "Tell us, then — what does your lady look like?" He described the beauty and youthful bloom of Blue Lotus Hue, and they said: "Caravan leader, she is a precious woman indeed. But if there is anyone else like her, we shall search for such a one." And so they began to search, and before long they came upon Blue Lotus Hue's own daughter, who so closely resembled her that they raised the matter with the girl. They urged her to go along, saying: "For whom?" "For a great caravan leader." "Friends, if we are to depend on a gift, know this — there is a fault in him: he has already taken a wife and abandoned her, and now he roams about. We will not hand her over."

"If that is the case, then let the gift be made." And so they persuaded her, and the caravan leader took her as his wife. After that, the merchants disposed of their goods, took the proceeds, and set out toward the place where they had previously suffered great loss — and in due course, as the place of ruin drew near, they came to a rocky cliff. The caravan leader left the goods and the girl there at the cliff and went on ahead with a small party toward the place of ruin. As he went, Blue Lotus Hue came and greeted him with the word "Welcome," and said: "Caravan leader, have you arrived in good health?" He replied: "Good woman, how could I be well? I have been ruined." "Though you, prince, have come alive — and that is cause for joy — the wealth too shall come again." After a little while he said: "Good woman, I am going to search for the goods that were lost." She said: "Go without delay." As soon as he had gone, one who had been his companion came along and asked Blue Lotus Hue: "Where has the caravan leader gone?" She replied: "He has gone to search for what was lost." "Where, and lost by whom?" "I do not know. He only said, 'I have suffered loss; I am going to search for what was lost.'" The companion said: "The way he arrived just now in such fine condition — never in earlier times did he arrive in such fine condition — that means he has deceived you. Say something that will match the occasion." "What else is there to say? He laid down a stone and brought a landowner's wife of this sort — you would not even be fit to wash her two feet." "Companion, is that true?" "It is true." At that he told her to remain, and sat in silence, saying nothing.

Before long the caravan leader returned, and he opened with a dismissive remark, saying: "Prince, have you searched for the lost goods?" "Good woman, I searched." "Prince, she has deceived you. No one anywhere has ruined you.

She heard how you said you had laid down a stone and brought along a landowner's wife — bring her here and expel her. Whoever's property is placed in two households will become thin, wholly exhausted, and utterly depleted." "Good woman, even if that were so, have you not heard that in a house where a man has two wives there will be times of bitterness — they will not drink cold water from the same vessel — there will be quarreling, wrangling, and strife? Prince, let this be peacefully settled. It will not come to that. Bring her in and expel the other. If she is somewhat like a younger sister, I shall treat her with the perception of a younger sister. If she is somewhat like a daughter, I shall treat her with the perception of a daughter." He said: "Good woman, if that is how it is, then I shall bring her — no harm done," and so he brought her. When he saw her, desire arose in him toward her.

On another occasion, as Blue Lotus Hue was beginning to arrange the girl's hair, she noticed that there was a wound on her head. Seeing it, she asked: "What fault has this girl committed?" The girl replied: "It was no fault of mine. My grandmother told your mother's father, and he grew angry with you and threw you out, and you fell on the threshold step — that is how this wound came about." "What is your grandmother's name?" "She is called Che-ge-mo." "What is your mother's name?" "Blue Lotus Hue." She thought to herself: There I was a mother, great and small; here I am a daughter, great and small — and so I shall proceed in every way. She covered her head and left the house. Before long, going her own way, she saw that favorable conditions were gathering in Vaiśālī, and she too joined that departing company; and together with that company and those merchants she traveled in happiness and ease, and went to Vaiśālī. The organized women who were dwelling in Vaiśālī said: "These ruined merchants — let them play with us and —"

— but they shall not let them enjoy pleasures and delights." Then one of the organized women spoke up: "These merchants have brought along some sort of earth-holder — we would not even stoop to wash her two feet, so why should they enjoy playing with us and experiencing pleasures and delights?" The organized women gathered together and went before Blue Lotus Hue and said: "Earth-holder, if you are going to provide for our livelihood, why do you not join our house?" She removed the covering from her head and said: "From this day forward I shall join your house" — and so she entered among them.

Then one day when those organized women had gathered in a drinking session and were talking amongst themselves, they said: "Of all of us, which one has managed to strip which merchant of how much wealth?" One woman said: "I stripped such-and-such a merchant named Che-ge-mo of this much wealth." Others said: "We stripped merchants named Che-ge-mo of this much wealth." And yet others said: "We too stripped merchants named Che-ge-mo of this much wealth."

Now there was in Vaiśālī an unattractive young man who sold perfumes, and none of the organized women had taken him on as a client. So the organized women said: "Whichever of us is able to take on as a client a Che-ge-mo young perfume-seller — her we shall declare to possess the qualities of a true woman." Blue Lotus Hue asked: "Is he actually male, possessed of a man's faculties?" They replied: "He is male, possessed of a man's faculties." Then they said: "If you manage to take him on as a client, we shall give you the place of the youngest among us. Very well. And if you are not able to take him on, what then? She shall pay you sixty kārṣāpaṇas. Oh, come now — do it like this."

Blue Lotus Hue then engaged the services of the landlord of the young perfume-seller's premises, and he arranged for a young girl to be sent as a serving-maid, instructing her: "Girl, you shall purchase perfume each and every day from the young perfume-seller named Che-ge-mo. If he asks to whose account you carry it, say: 'A young man of good family has come, and I carry it to him.'" So the serving-maid went and bought perfume from the young perfume-seller day after day. He said to her: "Girl, to whose account do you carry the perfume each day?" She replied: "A young man of good family has come here, and I carry it to him."

Then again Blue Lotus Hue spoke to the serving-maid: "Girl, go to the young perfume-seller and buy medicines — both cooling and heating. If he asks to whose account you carry them, say: 'That young man of good family is ill here, and I carry them for his medicines.' And if he asks whose account it is to be charged to, say: 'To Blue Lotus Hue's account.'" The serving-maid took the kārṣāpaṇas, went to the young perfume-seller, and said: "Give me medicines — both cooling and heating." He asked: "For whose account?" She replied: "A young man of good family is ill here, and I carry them for his medicines." He asked: "Whose account?" She said: "Blue Lotus Hue's."

He thought to himself: This is a great lady of rank indeed — she tends to the sick with her own medicines. And feeling affection arise in him for her, he said to the girl: "Girl, go and tell Blue Lotus Hue that the young perfume-seller wishes to visit her." The girl went and told Blue Lotus Hue, and she replied:

"Girl, go back and say this: 'The young man of good family has not yet recovered.'"

She went and told him this. Again and again he kept asking the girl when he might come. She would report this to Blue Lotus Hue, who thought to herself: He has grown even more attached — I must devise a clever stratagem. So she fashioned a dummy, laid it upon a bier, carried it to the charnel ground, burned it there, and then, disheveling her hair and weeping, began to walk not far from the shop of the young perfume-seller. The young perfume-seller saw her.

Now the Blessed One — the Buddha — had declared that women bind men by eight means: by dancing, by singing, by music, by laughter, by weeping, by a glance, by touch, and by provoking a wound. And so, becoming intensely attached to her, the young perfume-seller said again to the girl: "Girl, I shall come now." She reported this to Blue Lotus Hue, who said: "Girl, go back and say this: 'Young man of good family, the time has come — yet since the grief has not yet cleared, how could a meeting be possible?'"

The more Blue Lotus Hue drew back and kept him at a distance, the more the young perfume-seller burned with longing to see her. So Blue Lotus Hue sent word that, rather than coming to meet her directly, he should await her in a pleasant park. The young perfume-seller came to that park carrying abundant food, drink, fine robes, and garlands, and there the two of them ate and drank together for a while. Then, in the merriness of it all, with the force of wine his own wits left him. Blue Lotus Hue thought to herself: Now is the moment — let this be witnessed by many people. She placed a garland upon his head, rolled him in a blanket, and led him home. When the women of her company saw this they were filled with the greatest wonder and said: "How well this earth-holder has done in taking the ugly little perfume-seller under her wing!" And they installed him in the place of honor.

He played with her, rejoiced with her, and lived in pleasure with her, until in the course of time a child quickened within her.

Now in Vaiśālī there were two gate-keepers — one to the east and one to the west. These two had become friends, and one of them said: "Dear friend, is there any means by which, even when we both die and our time has come, the bond of our friendship might not be severed?" The other replied: "Dear friend — let our daughters pledge themselves to each other in a mutual pact. If I have a son and you have a daughter, give your daughter to my son; if you have a son and I have a daughter, I shall give my daughter to your son. In this way, even when we two die and our time comes, the stream of friendship will not be cut." The first said: "So be it — excellent!"

When nine months had passed, Blue Lotus Hue gave birth, and a boy was born. She thought to herself: Whichever woman has a young son — men will completely abandon her. Knowing she would be forsaken, she said to the nursemaid: "Girl, take this infant and a lamp, go out onto the main road, set the child down in one spot there, light the lamp, and stay to one side until someone takes him." The nursemaid carried him and set him down in a place not far from the eastern gate, lit the lamp, and stood to one side. The eastern gate-keeper, seeing the lamp, went over in puzzlement to investigate. When he saw the infant, he took him, went home to his wife, and said: "Dear one, here is your child." And she received him with great joy.

Then, as night turned to dawn, there was celebration. The neighbours spoke among themselves: "Good people, what has brought such joy to the house of this western gate-keeper?" Some said, "A son has been born to him." Others said, "If his wife was not with child, how could a son have come?" And others said, "Good people, there are women in whose womb a child lies without showing." The eastern gate-keeper heard this and thought: "Since a son has been born to him, if I were to have a daughter, she could become his bride." And so he sent that household gifts of clothing and ornaments.

The child was nursed and raised, and when he had grown up, he entered the assembly. Then at another time, a living creature entered the womb of a woman with the complexion of a blue lotus. Nine months passed, and when she gave birth, a daughter was born. The mother thought: "Men will completely abandon a woman who has a young daughter." Knowing she would be forsaken, she said to the nursemaid: "Girl, take this infant girl and a lamp, go out onto the main road, set the child down in one spot there, light the lamp, and stay to one side until someone takes her." The nursemaid carried her and placed her in a spot not far from the western gate, lit the lamp, and stood to one side. The western gate-keeper, seeing the lamp, went over in puzzlement to investigate. When he saw the infant girl, he took her, went to his wife, and said: "Dear one, here is your daughter." And she received her with great joy.

Then, as night turned to dawn, there was celebration. The neighbours spoke among themselves: "Good people, what has brought such joy to the house of this eastern gate-keeper?" Some said, "A daughter has been born to him."

Others said, "If his wife was not with child, how could a daughter have come?" And others said, "Good people, there are women in whose womb a child lies without showing." The western gate-keeper heard this and thought: "Since a daughter has been born to him, she shall become my son's bride." And so he sent that household gifts of clothing and ornaments.

The girl was nursed and raised, and when she had grown up, she too entered the community of women. Then at another time, five hundred members of the assembly went out to the pleasure grove and began to take counsel together: "Let us likewise go to the pleasure grove and there, whatever happens, let us abduct some woman who is suitable to share among us." "So be it." "Whom shall we abduct?" "The Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one." "Good — let us establish this as a rule: any one of us who refuses to take pleasure and sport with her shall be fined sixty kārṣāpaṇas by the assembly."

They hired the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one for five hundred kārṣāpaṇas, brought her to the pleasure grove, and all five hundred members of the assembly took turns sporting with her in pleasure. Now the son of the eastern gate-keeper was unwilling to take part in the sport, and the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one said to him: "Young master, take your pleasure and sport. Otherwise, these men will impose a fine of sixty kārṣāpaṇas upon you." Fearing the penalty, he joined in the sport, and thereby attachment to the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one arose in him. He then took her to himself alone as his wife.

The Licchavīs were furious, and they declared: "The son of the eastern gate-keeper has taken as his own wife alone a woman who was meant to be enjoyed in common by the assembly — we will go and kill him." Now the world has friends, enemies, and those who are neutral; and so someone went to the eastern gate-keeper and told him what had come to pass. The eastern gate-keeper was frightened. He went before the Licchavīs, prostrated at their feet, and said:

"Give me your son's alms." They said, "What fault is there with the master of the house?" And he explained the whole matter to them at length. Then some of them said, "O wise ones, this eastern gate-keeper has long been of benefit to us. If his son does not wish to share the woman with the assembly, then let her be given to him." Others said, "No blame — let it be so." And thus they gave the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one to him. Without any shame, the son of the eastern gate-keeper took the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned girl as his own wife, having obtained her from the assembly. Then his father went to the western gate-keeper and said, "Friend, give your girl as a bride to the boy." He replied, "Friend, your son has already taken a wife — what use is another bride?" He said, "Friend, the earlier match fell through, so give her now. And if prosperity should come to me, I will arrange a household retinue befitting the wife of my son." Because the earlier match had indeed fallen through, the western gate-keeper gave his daughter to the son of the eastern gate-keeper. And that son of the eastern gate-keeper, determining the auspicious day and date and propitious moment of conjunction, took her as his bride.

Now at that time, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana was going to the home of that eastern gate-keeper, and he said to the girl: "Young woman, the senior woman of your household is your mother. The householder here is your elder brother. Do not give rise to a mind of deep hostility toward your mother. Do not let yourself be drawn toward the hell realms. Play with the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one, delight with her, and enjoy yourself in good cheer." Now from that play, delight, and merry enjoyment with the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one a child was born, and the girl began pushing that little boy outside the gate. Just then a brahmin who was passing along that road saw this and spoke a verse:

Among human beings, highest of the highest and supreme among the supreme,
a śrāvaka of the unrivalled Victor, the Protector, lovely as a mandāra flower in full bloom — sister, what is this boy to you?

She too spoke a verse in reply:

Brahmin, this one is my elder brother, and this one is the son of my elder brother, and the thread that binds us.
This one's father is my own father, having become my elder brother, he is now my husband.

When the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one heard this, she sent the girl-messenger to him and asked, "What are these two saying?" She said, "They are speaking nonsense — not good words at all. As to what is true in this: the son whom I abandoned at the eastern gate is now your householder husband. The daughter whom I abandoned at the western gate is now your sister-in-law." The Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one thought: "Before, I became the elder sister-in-law of my mother, and then I became the elder sister-in-law of the daughter. Now I have become the elder sister-in-law of the daughter, and the son has become the householder. In every direction there is nowhere to go." She wrapped her head in her shawl and left the house. As chance would have it, she saw a congenial companion on the road to Rājagṛha, and she went with him to Rājagṛha. There she sustained herself by the life of a courtesan. Then it came to pass that five hundred young men from the pleasure grove came and began to deliberate: "O wise ones, let us go likewise to the pleasure grove and do whatever comes to pass — let us abduct some courtesan." "Let it be so." "Whom shall we abduct?" "The Earth-Holder." "No harm" — and with that they hired the Earth-Holder, the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one, for five hundred kārṣāpaṇas and led her to the pleasure grove. They ate and drank and played with her, delighted with her, and enjoyed themselves in good cheer. The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, knowing that the time had come to tame the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one, was walking and sitting beneath a tree not far at all from them.

Then one member of the pleasure party said: "This great noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana — he is liberated from such bonds of affliction, whereas we are sunk in the swamp of desire." The Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one said: "I engaged the ugly little perfume-seller's boy in Vaiśālī." The one in the pleasure party asked: "What do you mean by that — do you wish to engage this one too?" She replied: "Well, is this one endowed with a man's faculties?" "He is indeed endowed with a man's faculties." She then said: "If I were to draw him in, what would you give me?" "Five hundred kārṣāpaṇas." "And if you cannot draw him in, what will befall you?" "You may take my wife for yourself alone." "Very well then — do it thus."

The Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one accepted the wager and went to where the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana was. She arrived and began to display the wiles of a woman, the coyness of a woman, the enticements of a woman, the artful tricks of a woman. The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, however, had withdrawn his senses and sat in composure. She thought to herself: "The touch of a woman's domain is a poison — if I embrace him, he will come under my power." And she began to move to embrace him.

At that, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana rose up into the sky above, spreading his wings like a king among swans, and spoke these verses:

A contorted machine of bones,
wound all around with sinews, foul, rotting, and foul-smelling, leaning on another, calling it "mine."

You, a bladder filled with filth, hollow-eyed, bulging-socketed, exhausted,
from nine channels always and without cease
exuding impurity.

Just as I see you for what you are,
were people to see you likewise, they would turn far away and abandon you as one avoids an exposed place of mud in the rains.
Because childish ones, covered over by the darkness of delusion, do not know, they cling to you as an old ox
cleaves to a muddy wallow.

Then the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one also spoke verses in reply:

Great is the fortune — as the noble one has just declared — a contorted machine of bones,
wound all around with sinews,
foul, smelling of bone,
leaning on another, calling it "mine" —
I, a bladder brought forth in filth,
hollow-eyed, bulging-socketed, exhausted,
from nine channels always and without cease
exuding impurity.

Just as the noble one knows me truly, were people to seek me out,
they would turn far away and abandon me as one avoids a rain-season quagmire.
Because childish ones, covered over by the darkness of delusion, do not seek clearly, they cling to me as an old ox
cleaves to a muddy wallow.

O greatly fortunate one, come down, and please, noble one, teach me the Dharma.
In the supreme teaching of wisdom,
I shall become your hearer and disciple.

Then the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana descended from the midst of the sky above. Having thoroughly understood her intention, her latent tendencies (vāsanā), her constitution, and her nature, he taught her the Dharma in such a way that — while the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one remained seated right there on that very seat — the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi) were shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom, and she directly realized the fruit of stream-entry, comprehending the Four Noble Truths individually and correctly, one by one.

Having seen the truth, she said: "Noble one, it is through relying upon you as a virtuous spiritual friend (kalyāṇamitra) that you have done such a thing for me as this — something not done for me even by my father, nor by my mother.

nor by any king, nor by the gods, nor by my ancestors of former times, nor by any ascetic (śramaṇa) or brahmin, nor by the assembly of friends, companions, and kinsmen. You have drained the ocean of blood and tears, you have freed me from the mountains of bones, you have closed the doors to the lower realms, you have opened the doors to the higher realms and to liberation, you have lifted my feet out of the hells, the animal realm, and the realm of hungry ghosts, and you have placed me among gods and humans. By shattering with the vajra of primordial wisdom the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection accumulated since beginningless time, I have attained the fruit of stream-entry. Noble one, I have entered upon it — I have entered upon it! Noble one, I go for refuge to the Blessed One, to the Dharma, and to the Saṅgha of fully ordained monks. Please accept me as a laywoman. From this day forward, for as long as I live, I go for refuge wholeheartedly and with utmost joy."

Then the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned noble daughter touched her head to the two feet of the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana and said: "Venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana, if I may obtain the going forth and the full ordination as a fully ordained nun in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya, I will live the holy life in the presence of the Blessed One."

He said: "Sister, go and ask your householders."

She went to them and said: "Royal sons, do you permit me to go forth?"

They replied: "Earth-holder, why do you ask us?"

She said: "I wish to go forth; I am not asking."

They said: "If that is so, go forth."

Once they had given their permission, she went to where the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana was. He took her and went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, she bowed her head to the two feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana spoke these words to the Blessed One: "Venerable one, this Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one seeks the going forth and full ordination as a fully ordained nun in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya."

The Blessed One declared: "It is good that she goes forth — let it be so." Having so declared, he himself began to write a letter to the Great Queen of the People.

While the Blessed One was composing the letter, King Śuddhodana arrived and inquired: "Blessed One, why has this kinswoman come here?"

The Blessed One declared: "Great King, do not say such a thing. This Dharma-sister of yours wishes the going forth and full ordination as a fully ordained nun in the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya."

"Blessed One, where is the letter being sent?"

"Great King, to the Great Queen of the People in Śrāvastī."

"Blessed One, I too will provide her with an escort."

"Very well, Great King."

The king appointed an escort for her. The Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one took the letter and departed for Śrāvastī. The Great Queen of the People, Gautamī, gave her the going forth and performed her full ordination, gave her instructions, and then, dwelling alone in seclusion, with heedfulness, with diligence, and with her self fully surrendered, she came to know this very saṃsāric wheel in its five divisions — moving and unmoving — and all aspects of the formations subsided, along with transgressions, dispersions, and by the nature of reality that dissolves all things, having utterly subdued and abandoned all mental afflictions — this, daughters of noble family, is why she shaved her hair, donned the ochre robes, and with genuine faith went forth from home into homelessness: the supreme culmination of the holy life (brahmacarya). That very life she realized and accomplished in this very existence through her own direct knowledge, and she understood: "My birth is exhausted. The holy life has been lived. What was to be done has been done. I know of no further existence beyond this." And she became an arhat, free from attachment, beyond the three realms, with a mind even toward mud and gold, equal toward sky and the palm of the hand, who with wisdom had split open the shell of the eggshell of the senses, as though sandalwood had been set aside — one who had attained the threefold knowledges, the direct cognitions, and the individual perfect understandings; who had turned her back on the gains and honors of existence and desire; and who was to be venerated, revered, and openly praised by the gods with their faculties and near-faculties.

Then the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Among my female śrāvaka disciples of great supernatural power and great might, this one is supreme — namely, the nun of utmost excellence, the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one."

The monks arose in doubt and, to have all their doubts resolved, addressed the Blessed Buddha: "Venerable One, what action did the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one perform such that she came to have eyes like a blue lotus, a fragrance like a blue lotus, and a complexion like the stamens of a blue lotus? What action did she perform such that she was never in want of men, and, having gone forth in the Blessed One's teaching and abandoned all mental afflictions, she directly realized arhathood? What action did she perform such that she was declared supreme among the female śrāvaka disciples of great supernatural power and great might?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one performed and accumulated a mass of karma that, through a reversal of conditions, abides like a flame and will inevitably come to pass. And these actions performed and accumulated by the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one — who else could experience them individually? Monks, karma that has been performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth; it does not ripen in the element of water; it does not ripen in the element of fire; it does not ripen in the element of wind. Rather, virtuous and non-virtuous karma that has been performed and accumulated ripens in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense sources.

Actions, even through a hundred aeons, are never lost or wasted.

When the conditions and the time arrive,
they bear their fruit for embodied beings.

Monks, long ago in the past, a householder lived by a rocky cliff. He took a wife of equal rank, and with her he sported, rejoiced, and lived in delight. Then one day he took his goods and departed for another region. His wife, corrupted and harmed by the afflictions through fine clothing and food, observed that in a nearby harmonious household men were constantly coming and going. She thought: 'This woman has accumulated merit; that is why men never leave her wanting. What means is there by which I too might be free from want of men?' While she was thinking in this way, a female śrāvaka (śrāvakā) of the naked ascetics came to her and said: 'Sister, is there any means by which whatever one wishes and whatever one undertakes may all be fulfilled?' She replied: 'Sister, there is a great adept among my own brothers who has gone forth and accomplished austerities. Offer him food and receive his aspiration; then whatever you wish and whatever you undertake shall all be fulfilled.' She said:"

'Sister, if that is the case, go and invite that great adept to her home for a meal.' So she invited him for a meal. The householder's wife prepared food and adorned her hands with utpala flowers. Now the naked ascetics eat at proper times and also at improper times, so it was some while before he arrived. In ages when no buddhas have appeared in the world, pratyekabuddhas arise — humble and poor, compassionate toward the lowly and the destitute, delighting in remote dwellings, solitary as a rhinoceros horn, and serving as a field of merit for the world. At such a time there was a pratyekabuddha wandering through the countryside, and he came to that rocky cliff. Early that morning, having tied his lower robe and taken up his almsbowl and monastic robes, he wandered for alms and entered that house. The householder's wife saw his beautiful body and his beautiful mind, and she thought: 'This is the great adept of accomplished austerities; I shall offer him food.' She satisfied him with excellent food and also made an offering to him with utpala flowers.

Now that great adept teaches Dharma through his body but does not teach Dharma with words. So the pratyekabuddha, having received the gift of food, and out of compassion for her, rose up into the sky above like a king of geese spreading his wings, and began to perform miraculous displays — blazing with fire, shining with light, releasing rain, and sending forth lightning. Ordinary people are quickly moved to faith when they behold miraculous powers, and so the householder's wife, filled with reverence and earnest devotion, prostrated at his two feet and made this aspiration: 'By this root of virtue accrued through my offering to such a true field of merit, may I never be without men in all my future births, and may I also attain qualities of such a kind that I please a Teacher far more excellent than this one, and never displease him.'

Monks, that householder's wife of that time and that age is this Utpalavarnā (she of the utpala hue) now. Because of the karmic maturation of that act — having given food to the pratyekabuddha and made offerings of utpala flowers — she now has eyes that resemble the utpala, is endowed with the fragrance of the utpala, and has a complexion like the filament of the utpala. And because of that aspiration she made — 'By this root of virtue accrued through my offering to such a true field of merit, may I never be without men in all my future births, and may I also attain qualities of such a kind that I please a Teacher far more excellent than this one, and never displease him' — she was never without men in her births, and then, having gone forth in my teaching and abandoned all afflictions, she directly actualized arhathood. And she has pleased me, the Teacher, with qualities surpassing those of a hundred thousand billion pratyekabuddhas, and has never displeased me.

She who has been declared foremost among the female śrāvakas of great miraculous powers and great might — this came about through the power of her aspiration. And where did she make that aspiration? Monks, in this very great and good aeon, in an earlier age, at a time when the lifespan of beings was twenty thousand years, the Teacher — the Tathāgata, arhat, fully and perfectly awakened buddha, accomplished in knowledge and conduct, the Sugata (well-gone one), knower of the world, unsurpassed guide of persons to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, the Blessed One — the buddha Kāśyapa appeared in the world, and he dwelt in dependence upon the Deer Grove of the Sages (R̥ṣipātana) near Vārāṇasī.

In the teaching of that buddha, this one went forth as a nun, and the nun who ordained her was declared by the Tathāgata, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa, to be the foremost among his female śrāvaka disciples of great supernatural power and great spiritual might. Now, although this one practiced the holy life for as long as she lived, she did not attain even a single accumulation of good qualities. Then, at the time of her death, she made this aspiration: "Throughout my entire life I practiced the holy life under the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha, the supreme field of merit, Kāśyapa, and yet I did not attain even a single accumulation of good qualities. By the root of virtue that I have accumulated through practicing the holy life for as long as I lived, may I, just as my preceptress was declared by the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, the fully and perfectly awakened buddha Kāśyapa, to be the foremost among female śrāvaka disciples of great supernatural power and great spiritual might — so too may I, under the Blessed One Śākyamuni, the Lion of the Śākyas, the sovereign chief of Śākya kings, likewise be declared foremost among female śrāvaka disciples of great supernatural power and great spiritual might." She began to set this aspiration, and through the power of that aspiration she has now been declared by the Tathāgata to be foremost among his female śrāvaka disciples of great supernatural power and great spiritual might.

Now the monks, having grown uncertain, put all their questions to the awakened Blessed One: "Venerable One, what action did Utpalavaṇṇā perform that caused her to become such a seeker?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it was Utpalavaṇṇā herself who performed and accumulated those karmic deeds — deeds with their conditions fully ripened, dwelling close like a flame, certain without doubt to arise. Whatever karma Utpalavaṇṇā performed and accumulated, no one else will experience its separate fruits. Monks, karma once performed and accumulated does not ripen in the external element of earth, nor in the element of water, nor in the element of fire, nor in the element of wind. Rather, karma — whether virtuous or non-virtuous — once performed and accumulated, ripens in the appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases.

Actions do not perish even after a hundred aeons;
when the conditions and the time come together, they will bear their fruit for those who hold a body.

Monks, long ago in the past, in a mountain crag, this one was a woman who kept a brothel. There she gathered many who were like sons together with those who were like mothers, and many who were like brothers together with those who were like sisters. Through the karmic ripening of that deed she has now become such a seeker.

Monks, thus the ripening of exclusively dark karma is itself exclusively dark; the ripening of exclusively white karma is itself exclusively white; and the ripening of mixed karma is itself mixed.

Therefore, monks, abandon exclusively dark karma and mixed karma, and strive for exclusively white karma. Monks, you should train yourselves in this way."

The conduct of Utpalāvarṇā was this: she would go on alms rounds and offer the first and finest portion of what she had collected to the Saṅgha, then go around a second time and eat the remainder herself. Once, on a certain occasion, she went on her alms round, offered the first portion to the Saṅgha, and then went around a second time for her own sake. At that moment a monk who had newly arrived went on his alms round, and being unfamiliar with the neighborhood he found nothing at all. Utpalāvarṇā saw him and said, "Noble one, did you find nothing?" "Noble sister, I found nothing." She then offered him her own alms-food, and so his meal was provided for. Ānanda saw this and thought, "This sister has not only faith in the Saṅgha but appears to have faith in individuals as well — I should put her to the test." The following day Utpalāvarṇā went on her alms round, offered the first portion to the Saṅgha, and was completing her second round for her own sake, when Ānanda also arrived and said, "Noble sister, do you have even a little food?" She replied, "Noble one, if you are asking, what remains is like the leftovers of a divine dwelling." He said, "Noble one, if that is so, please hold out your bowl." She held out her bowl, and she offered that alms-food into his bowl. Utpalāvarṇā had thus gone without food for two days, and weakened by the exhaustion of her frail state, she fainted and fell to the ground. Those who lacked faith seized upon this opportunity, and though it was known among the wise that Utpalāvarṇā was free from attachment, they began to revile her, saying, "Look at this handsome young Śākya — she sees him and, overcome by desire, has fallen fainting to the ground." In this context of such censure, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then convened the assembly of monks on account of this incident, this occasion, and this matter — and so forth as before. The Blessed Ones, the buddhas, though they know, act as though they do not — and so forth as before.

The Blessed One then questioned Ānanda: "Ānanda, is it true that you took food that had been set aside and prepared for a nun who is not your relative, sitting along the road on her way to the village for alms, and that you received it and ate it with your own hand?" "Blessed One, it is so." The Blessed One then censured this as unworthy of a contemplative, as improper, as unsuitable, as contrary to proper conduct — it is not to be done by one who has gone forth. Having censured it in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing ten benefits, I shall establish a training rule for the śrāvakas in the Vinaya" — and so forth as before. "My śrāvakas are to recite this training rule in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever monk takes with his own hand and eats food that has been set aside and prepared for a nun who is not his relative, sitting along the road on her way to the village for alms — that monk shall go out to the outer park and confess before the monks, saying: 'Venerable ones, I have committed an offense worthy of blame, an improper act that should be individually confessed. I confess to that offense, that dharma, individually.' This is a matter for individual confession. This is an offense requiring individual confession.

'Whatever monk' means a son of the Śākyans — Ānanda or any other like him. 'A nun' means one who holds this Dharma. 'Who is not a relative' means a maternal grandmother or a great-grandfather, and any relative within seven generations descended from one's ancestors counts as a relative; beyond that, one is not a relative.

"Sitting along the road" means having gone into the street.

Regarding "going to the village for alms," "village" means a place where there are streets, lanes, crossroads, and intersections. "Alms" means food obtained from others. "Hard food and soft food" means the five kinds of hard food and the five kinds of soft food. "With one's own hand" means hand to hand. "Having taken" means having received and brought into one's power. "If he partakes of or eats" means if it passes down the throat.

"That monk" means whichever monk it is. "Shall go out to the outer park" means shall go to the monastery outside the village. "Before the monks" means before whichever monks are gathered there. "Venerable ones, I have committed an offense worthy of blame" means something that should be condemned. "An improper act" means something contrary to proper conduct. "That should be individually confessed" means that should be disclosed. "That offense" means the offense that has arisen. "That dharma" means what is not truly the Dharma but has been spoken of using the word "dharma." "I confess" means "I disclose." "Should be individually confessed" means should be disclosed. "This is a matter for individual confession" means this is a matter to be disclosed, and therefore it is said to be a matter for individual confession.

Now, how does a transgression arise? If a monk, perceiving as a non-relative a nun who is not a relative, sitting along the road on her way to the village for alms, takes hard food or soft food with his own hand and partakes of it or eats it, this becomes a matter for individual confession. If he takes hard food or soft food with his own hand and partakes of it or eats it while entertaining doubt about whether she is a non-relative, this also becomes a matter for individual confession.

If a monk, perceiving as a non-relative a nun who is in fact a relative, sitting along the road on her way to the village for alms, takes hard food or soft food with his own hand and partakes of it or eats it, this becomes a wrongdoing. If he takes hard food or soft food with his own hand and partakes of it or eats it while entertaining doubt about whether she is a relative, this also becomes a wrongdoing.

For one who acts for the first time, for one who is insane, for one who is mentally disturbed, and for one who is overcome by pain, there is no transgression.

The first matter for individual confession regarding receiving food from a nun is hereby complete.

The Vinaya, its Analysis. The eighty-first fascicle.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time a severe famine had arisen, and food was difficult to obtain even for wandering mendicants in the wilderness; indeed, parents themselves found it hard to feed even their own children, let alone mendicants, so the situation was all the more dire for wandering monks. The group of six monks, in the morning, having fastened their lower garments, taking their bowls and robes, entered Śrāvastī for alms. Some obtained food and some did not; and being threatened by hunger, they went to the dwellings of the group of twelve monks. The group of twelve spread out seats, saying: "Noble ones, please be seated." When they had taken their seats, the group of twelve prostrated at their feet, sat before them, and said: "Noble ones, are you well? Sisters, how do you live here? We ourselves are threatened by hunger."

The noble ones replied: "If that is so, come tomorrow for a meal — we invite you to share our food."

The group of twelve said: "Sisters, if you give tomorrow, who will have authorized you to give?"

"Noble ones, we ourselves will provide the meal."

"Sisters, you will not be able to sustain yourselves in that way."

"In this way, wherever the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha has been invited, you should serve them there, and give repeatedly to us as well — in that way we shall be able to live." Bombhā Gāmo said: "Noble ones, is that permissible?" "Sisters, it is entirely appropriate. It is most fitting." "Who forbade it? Where was it forbidden?" They replied: "Noble ones, if it is permissible, then do so without hesitation — do it just as you have said." With that, they took their leave, saying "Very well," and departed.

Shortly thereafter, a householder invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another house at the hour of midday. The Saṅgha of monks went. The Blessed One, remaining in a certain place, was fulfilling his alms round. Now, the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, remain in a certain place and fulfil the alms round for five reasons. What are these five? They wish to store things properly indoors; they wish to teach the Dharma to gods; they wish to care for the sick; they wish to review the dwelling places; and they wish to lay down the rules of training for the hearers in the Vinaya. In this instance, the Blessed One, the Buddha, remained in that place and fulfilled the alms round because he wished to lay down the rules of training for the hearers in the Vinaya.

The householder, together with his household servants, began to serve the Saṅgha of monks, and Bombhā Gāmo, the elder woman, was seated to one side. She said: "Householder, this is the noble Ānanda — gone forth from the Śākyas, master of the three scriptural collections, a Dharma teacher, one possessed of the confidence of reasoning and liberation — please serve him again. This is the noble Rāhula. This is Laghumāna. This is Kāmanda — these too have gone forth from the Śākyas, are masters of the three scriptural collections, are Dharma teachers, possessed of the confidence of reasoning and liberation — please serve them again as well. This is the noble Arcaka — gone forth as the son of a Brahmin reciter, master of the three scriptural collections, a Dharma teacher, possessed of the confidence of reasoning and liberation — please serve him again and again." The householder accordingly gave to each of them repeatedly. Likewise Bombhā Gāmo spoke to those who were doing the serving, and they too gave to each of those monks repeatedly.

As a result, some monks received a surplus of rice, some received a surplus of soup, some received a surplus of condiments, some received a surplus of food in general. Some, having received a little food, had their rice bowls filled to overflowing. Some had their rice bowls filled to overflowing without having received any at all in the ordinary way.

Then the monks who still had all their bonds present reproached the householder: "Householder, if you do not have sufficient wealth, why do you invite the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha?" He replied: "Noble ones, I had prepared an abundant meal, but since the elder Bombhā Gāmo was seated to one side among the elders, and kept directing portions to that one side again and again, what was I to do?" With that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One then convened the Saṅgha of monks in response to this occurrence, this basis of address, and this occasion — and so on as before. The buddhas, the Blessed Ones, while knowing, act as though unaware — and so forth, as before. The Blessed One, the Buddha, questioned the group of six: "Monks, did you truly do something so unseemly?" "Venerable One, we did not." The Blessed One, the Buddha, declared that this was conduct unworthy of a renunciant, not in accord with the Dharma, not fitting — not in accord with proper conduct, and not something to be done by one who has gone forth — and he rebuked them in this way. Then, having rebuked them at length and in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, seeing ten benefits clearly, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers" — and so forth as before. "My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

When many monks have been invited as guests to various households and are eating a meal there, and if at that time a nun is standing at the door, and someone says, 'Give her a portion of this; give her cooked rice; give her legumes; give her more of this,' then those monks must send word to that nun saying: 'Sister, please wait for just a moment until the monks have finished eating.' If even one of those monks should be unable to say this to the nun, then all those monks must go to the outer recreation ground and confess to the venerable ones there: 'A transgression has arisen for us, venerable ones, a matter unseemly, unfit for confession — this very matter has come to pass, and this dharma we confess.' This dharma, too, is to be confessed."

Now, "many monks" means more than two — more than two constitutes "many." "In various households" means in the households of brahmins and householders. "Invited as guests" means invited for the sake of a meal. "While eating a meal" refers to the five kinds of soft food and the five kinds of solid food. "If a nun" means one such as Sthūlanandā or anyone else of that kind. "To that nun" means to Sthūlanandā or to anyone else of that kind. "Those monks" means whichever monks happen to be present there. "Saying thus" means to convey the following words. "Send word saying: 'Sister, please wait for just a moment until the monks have finished eating'" — this means one should say: "Sister, please remain silent for a short while, just a moment, until the monks have finished eating." "If even one of those monks should be unable to say this to that nun" — this means if even one monk has not said this to her. "All those monks" means all those monks who are present there. "Going to the outer recreation ground" means going to the assembly hall outside the village. "A matter unseemly for us, venerable ones, a matter for which we are to be reproached" means something deserving censure. "Unfit" means contrary to proper conduct. "To be confessed" means to be acknowledged. "Has arisen" means a transgression has arisen. "This dharma" refers to that which is not genuine Dharma but is expressed by the name of a dharma. "We confess" means "we acknowledge." "Is to be confessed" means "is to be acknowledged." And "this dharma, too, is to be confessed" means this matter, too, is to be acknowledged; and for that reason it is said to be confessed.

Now, how does a transgression come about in this matter? When monks are eating in upper rooms and others are eating in middle rooms, and if at that time a nun is standing at the door, those monks must send word to her. If they eat without sending word, a transgression requiring confession arises. As for those eating in the middle rooms, they should inquire whether word has been sent to the nun. If they eat without making that inquiry, an offense of wrongdoing arises.

When monks are eating in lower rooms and others are eating in doorway rooms, and if at that time a nun is standing on watch, those monks must send word to that nun. If they eat without sending word, a transgression requiring confession arises. Those who are eating in the doorway rooms should inquire whether word has been sent to the nun. If they eat without making that inquiry, an offense of wrongdoing arises. When some monks have finished eating and are leaving while others are entering, those who are entering should inquire whether word has been sent to the nun. If they eat without making that inquiry, an offense of wrongdoing arises. If she has been invited as a guest on that occasion, or if one is being admitted to full ordination, there is no transgression. If one is being shown decorative drawings, or if someone is being led in to give what has not yet been given, there is no transgression. For one who is a first offender, or who is insane, or whose mind is disturbed, or who is afflicted by painful feelings, there is no transgression. The second rule requiring confession — namely, eating after admitting to a seat-row someone who has not come in proper sequence without turning that person away — is complete.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was residing at Vaiśālī, in the Gabled Hall beside the Monkey Pool. At the time when the general Siṃha beheld the truths in the presence of the Blessed One, he took hold of one portion of his wealth and, uttering words of supreme excellence, roared with the lion's roar in the midst of the assembly: "From this day forth, the door is closed to the naked ones, to the naked women, to the female hearers of the naked ones, and to the male hearers of the naked ones. The door is open to the monk-hearers of the Blessed One, to the nuns, to the laymen, and to the laywomen." And he proclaimed that all the fields of his former activity were likewise blameworthy, and he abandoned them entirely. He was endowed with faith and had a good and virtuous intention. There was nothing he did not offer and fully give over to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, or to agreeable monks. And because he offered and gave everything in this way, his resources became thin and were entirely exhausted, reaching their very end.

At that time, the venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana were wandering on their rounds and arrived at Vaiśālī. The general Siṃha invited both of them to another household for a meal and, in order to prepare food for the two of them, went himself to the market. The naked ones saw him and, aware of this, began to mock him, saying: "Formerly, when the general Siṃha was devoted to us, everything flourished magnificently for him. Now, being devoted to the ascetics who are sons of the Śākya, he comes and goes here for nothing — he does the work of a householder himself." When this mockery was under way, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, you should give the training-vow to the general Siṃha and to others like him. It should be conferred in this way: having prepared a seat, struck the gong, and properly informed the monks using the words of inquiry, once the entire Saṅgha is seated in harmony, a single monk should perform the formal act by motion alone, saying: 'Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. The general Siṃha is endowed with faith and has a good and virtuous intention. There is nothing he has not offered and fully given over to the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, or to agreeable monks. Because he offered and gave everything in this way, his resources became thin and were entirely exhausted, reaching their very end.'"

"If it is the proper time for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, may the Saṅgha grant permission. The Saṅgha hereby confers the training vow upon General Siṃha." This is the motion.

To the one upon whom the Saṅgha has conferred the training vow, a monk must not go to his house, must not make use of his seats, must not eat his alms-food, and must not teach the Dharma there.

The Blessed One declared: "To the one upon whom the Saṅgha has conferred the training vow, a monk must not go to his house, must not make use of his seats, must not eat his alms-food, and must not teach the Dharma there."

After this declaration, the venerable Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, who had previously been invited as guests, also did not go to his house. Then General Siṃha prepared the food and went to where the venerable Śāriputra and the great Maudgalyāyana were staying, and having arrived, he bowed his head at their feet and said: "May the two noble ones please think to lend me the loan of an umbrella's shade — please be mindful that the time has now come."

The two of them replied: "Householder, the Saṅgha has conferred the training vow upon you; we will not go."

He said: "Noble ones, I invited the two of you before — please come."

The two replied: "Householder, then let us ask the Blessed One." And the two of them reported the matter in full to the Blessed One, whereupon the Blessed One declared: "Whoever was previously invited as a guest may eat there; one should not feel regret about this."

The two of them proceeded toward General Siṃha's house, and as they went, the noble ones and the group of six monks saw the two of them and said: "Where are you two going?" "To General Siṃha's house." "Did the Saṅgha not confer the training vow upon him? They conferred it, and yet he invited us two before. Moreover, when General Siṃha, in the presence of the Blessed One, saw the truths, he grasped one portion and, speaking words of the great bull of the herd, proclaimed with a lion's roar in the midst of the assembly: 'From this day forward, the door is closed to the naked ones, the naked women, the male hearers of the naked ones, and the female hearers of the naked ones. The door is open to the Blessed One's hearer monks, hearer nuns, male lay practitioners, and female lay practitioners.' It is because of this that he invited us before." The two said nothing and continued on their way, and those monks followed close behind the two of them, one after another.

When General Sīmha saw that a great many monks were coming, he was filled with great delight, and he had all the requisites of the household distributed among the monks. After they had eaten and were departing, his children began to serve more food, and he said: "Children, distribute all the household requisites among the monks as well — wait a little longer until the other matter is resolved."

Hearing his children begin to cry, certain monks of little purpose asked: "Why do you monks, who are under training, go uninvited to the very houses upon which the Saṅgha has placed the training vow, serve food with your own hands, take and distribute it, eat it, criticize, throw things about, and quarrel?" This matter was then reported to the Blessed One by the monks.

Thereupon the Blessed One, regarding this incident and making it the basis of instruction —

On this occasion, the phrase "the Blessed One convened the assembly of monks" and what follows proceeds as before. Likewise, the phrase "the blessed buddhas, though knowing, act as though they do not know" and what follows also proceeds as before.

The blessed Buddha then questioned the group of six monks: "Monks, is it true that you went uninvited to the very houses of those under training that have been bound by the Saṅgha's training vow, and with your own hands took the food that had been prepared, distributed it, and ate it?" They replied: "Venerable One, it is true." The blessed Buddha rebuked them, saying that such conduct was not the way of a contemplative, not in accord with propriety, not fitting, not in keeping with proper conduct — it was not something to be done by one who has gone forth.

After rebuking them in many ways, the Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, seeing fully the ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya" — and the rest proceeds as before.

"My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows: In the case of those houses of those under training that have been bound by the Saṅgha's training vow — if any monk goes uninvited to such houses of those under training that are bound by the Saṅgha's training vow, and with his own hands takes food that has been prepared, and distributes or eats it, that monk shall go to the outer assembly hall and confess before the community of monks, saying: 'Venerable ones, an occasion has arisen that is improper and blameworthy for me, and I confess it individually. That rule of conduct I individually transgressed.' Thus shall he confess individually. This too is to be individually confessed."

Now, once the Blessed One had thus established that rule of training for the hearers in the Vinaya, no monk at all went to the house of the general Siṃha. Then the wife of General Siṃha said to General Siṃha: "My lord's son should know: the Saṅgha has imposed a training vow upon us, and no monk comes at all. In effect the Saṅgha has cut off the monks' alms from our house with a wooden ladle — yet what fault could there be in our using the seats and in teaching the Dharma?" This was then reported by the monks to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks, go to the house of General Siṃha; make use of the seats; teach the Dharma — but do not accept alms."

The monks then began to enter that house with empty bowls alone at first and then to leave. When the wife of General Siṃha saw this, she began to weep, saying: "Before, these noble ones would enter my house first with empty bowls and leave with bowls full and hands full — now they enter with empty bowls and leave with empty hands." This was then reported by the monks to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks, you shall not enter that house first with empty bowls alone."

The monks then went on their alms round and, with their bowls full, began to enter that house. When the young children of the household asked the monks for the prepared food, and the monks did not give it to them, the Blessed One declared: "Give it to them." When the monks began to give it to them in large portions, and the boys took it and distributed it among themselves and went outside, some naked ascetics (tīrthikas) saw them and asked: "Boys, where did you get this food?"

"The noble ones gave it to us." "No harm done. Fill a bowl with a bowl — give to them, and they will give to you," the boys said. At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks, do not give the prepared food all in one lump, but break it into pieces before giving it."

Some time later, the wife of the general Siṃha offered the monks who had come on their round various fruits such as mangoes and breadfruit, along with roots and vegetables such as watercress. When the monks did not accept them, she said: "Noble ones, will these things fill our storehouses and granaries? Please do accept them." At that point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks, you may accept fruits such as mangoes and breadfruit, roots, and vegetables such as watercress when these come from a household."

Now at that time certain Licchavīs of Vaiśālī were gathered in conversation at the assembly hall. When they saw those monks coming out from the house of the general Siṃha, those among them who were without faith said: "Friends, ever since the general Siṃha developed devoted faith in the ascetic Gautama, his wealth has become depleted, exhausted, and utterly consumed." But those among them who had faith said: "Friends, how could it be that someone who has devoted faith in the Blessed One would have their wealth depleted, exhausted, and consumed? It is like this: the general Siṃha, having seen the truths in the presence of the Blessed One, cut off all the blameworthy edges of his field-work — and it is because of that cutting off that his wealth has become depleted, exhausted, and consumed."

The Licchavīs of Vaiśālī then deliberated among themselves and spoke to the general Siṃha's farmworkers: "Friends, why are you not attending to all the field-work for the general Siṃha? Have you not been receiving your wages?" They replied: "Friends, we have been receiving our wages. But when the general forbids us, what are we to do?" The Licchavīs said: "The assembly has authorized you. Go now and attend to all of the general's field-work." And so, at the bidding of the Licchavīs of Vaiśālī, those workers set about attending to all the field-work of the general Siṃha. The gods then sent down a fine and steady rain in good season, and a great abundance of crops arose.

The general Siṃha, now prosperous in his wealth again, went to where the Blessed One was, and having arrived, he prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with his head and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the general Siṃha addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Venerable One, formerly my wealth became depleted, exhausted, and utterly consumed. The Saṅgha, wishing me well and seeking my benefit, granted me the training vow. Now that the assembly of Licchavīs of Vaiśālī has restored my wealth and it has grown again, if the Blessed One, out of compassion, would be pleased to dissolve my training vow, that would be excellent." The Blessed One said nothing to the general Siṃha, and by that silence gave consent.

The general Siṃha, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been granted, prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with his head and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

The Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Monks, for the general Sīmha and for anyone else who is in such a situation, the training vow is to be dissolved. It is to be dissolved in the following manner:

Having prepared the seats and struck the wooden sounding board, the monks are duly informed through the words of inquiry, and once the entire Saṅgha is seated and in harmony, the general Sīmha bows, seats himself at the end of the row of elders, slightly to one side, joins his palms, and speaks as follows:

"May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. I, the general Sīmha, am one possessed of faith, of good character, and of wholesome intention. There is nothing whatsoever that I have not offered or fully given to a buddha, to the Dharma, to the Saṅgha, or to those monks worthy of reverence. Having thus offered and thus fully given, my resources have been depleted, consumed, and entirely exhausted. Now the Saṅgha, wishing my good and wishing my benefit, granted me the training vow, and yet my resources have increased once more. Therefore I, the general Sīmha, who was granted the training vow and who request the dissolution of the training vow, ask that the compassionate venerable Saṅgha, out of compassion, be pleased to dissolve my training vow."

This is to be recited a second time and a third time.

Then the general Sīmha is moved from within earshot to within eyeshot, and a single monk performs the motion alone:

"May the venerable Saṅgha please hear me. The general Sīmha is one possessed of faith, of good character, and of wholesome intention. He has nothing whatsoever that he has not offered or fully given to a buddha, to the Dharma, to the Saṅgha, or to those monks worthy of reverence. Having thus offered and thus fully given, his resources were depleted, consumed, and entirely exhausted. The Saṅgha, wishing his good and wishing his benefit, granted him the training vow, and yet his resources have now increased once more. The general Sīmha, having been granted the training vow, requests from the Saṅgha the dissolution of the training vow. If the time is right for the Saṅgha and it meets with approval, let the Saṅgha grant consent, and let the Saṅgha dissolve the training vow for the general Sīmha. This is the motion."

For whoever's training vow the Saṅgha thus dissolves, the monks may visit that person, make use of his seat, accept alms from him, and teach him Dharma.

As for the phrase "those in training," "those in training" refers to stream-enterers, once-returners, and non-returners. The phrase "whatever households" refers to the households of brahmins and householders. The phrase "of the Saṅgha" means of the Saṅgha of hearers of the Tathāgata. The phrase "who have been bound by the training vow" means through the act of the motion. The phrase "whatever monk" refers to the group of six or any others of that kind. The phrase "in such households of trainees bound by the Saṅgha's training vow" means in households such as those described. The phrase "without having been invited beforehand" means without having been asked in advance. The phrase "having gone" means after going. The phrase "with his own hands" means hand to hand. "Prepared and cooked foods" refers to the five prepared foods and the five cooked foods. The phrase "having received" means having caused it to be placed in receipt. The phrase "if he eats or consumes it" means if he swallows it down his throat. The phrase "that monk" means whichever monk it may be. The phrase "having gone to the outer pleasure garden" means having gone to the vihāra outside the town. The phrase "to the monks" refers to whatever monks are gathered there.

"Venerable ones, 'a ground for blame' means something worthy of blame. 'Improper' means not in accordance with the rule. 'To be confessed' means to be disclosed. 'Has arisen' means a transgression has arisen. 'That Dharma' refers to what is not the Dharma but was spoken of by the name 'Dharma.' 'I acknowledge it' means 'I disclose it.' 'It is to be confessed' means it is to be disclosed. 'This too is to be confessed' means this too is to be disclosed — and therefore it is said 'it is to be confessed.'

Now, how does a transgression come about in this matter? Whenever a monk, no matter how little he may be in training, goes uninvited to the homes that are bound by the training rules of the Saṅgha — homes of that kind — and takes with his own hand prepared and cooked foods and then distributes or eats them, in every such case a confession is required. Where one has been invited beforehand, there is no transgression. There is no transgression for one who is a first offender, for one who is insane, for one whose mind is disturbed, or for one who is afflicted by painful sensations.

This is the third confessable rule, concerning one who has abandoned the training and entered lay life.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, consented to observe the rains retreat at the Śākyan settlement of Śākya, in the forest of that settlement. The Blessed One then declared to the monks that whenever, on the seventh or eighth day before the monks' invitation ceremony is to take place, they should announce to the villages within their domain: "On such-and-such a day the invitation ceremony will take place." The monks went and made the announcement accordingly.

Then the Śākyans dwelling at the Śākyan settlement, on the fifteenth day of the invitation ceremony of both communities, went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, and with their heads bowed to his two feet paid homage to the Blessed One and stood to one side. Standing to one side, the Blessed One properly instructed the Śākyans dwelling at the Śākyan settlement with words endowed with Dharma, properly aroused and engaged them, properly praised and encouraged them, and properly delighted them. With many categories of words endowed with Dharma he properly instructed, engaged, praised, encouraged, and delighted them, and then said nothing further.

The Śākyans dwelling at the Śākyan settlement, rejoicing and delighting in what the Blessed One had declared, then addressed the Blessed One thus: "Blessed One, would you grant that tomorrow, on this very day, you and the community of monks accept our midday meal? Tomorrow, let no monk go out for alms either. We will ourselves go to beg alms and, with the Blessed One together with the community of śrāvaka monks, will satisfy and nourish you from our own resources."

The Blessed One gave his consent to the Śākyans dwelling at the Śākyan settlement by saying nothing. The Śākyans dwelling at the Śākyan settlement, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that consent had been given, bowed their heads to his two feet in homage, and departed from the presence of the Blessed One. They went to the Śākyan settlement and that very night prepared and set ready pure and excellent prepared and cooked foods. Then, rising early the next morning, they loaded carts with prepared and cooked foods and said to the Śākyan women: "You all mount your carriages and go on ahead; we will follow behind." The Śākyan women, adorned with all their ornaments, mounted their carriages and set out.

Now, the environs of the Śākyan settlement were dense with forest, and along the road some brigands caught sight of them and said to one another: "Friends, look — these Śākyan women are adorned with all their ornaments. Let us go and seize and plunder them!" The commander of the brigands then said:

"Friends, what would be the point of attacking them when we are already on our way and done with the matter? The ruthless Śākyans who crush their enemies are sure to retaliate — let them go." But the others said: "Who sees the back of the moon, commander? Attack!" And so, overriding his words, they fell upon them, stripped them of all their clothes and ornaments, and departed.

The Śākyan women, seized with fear and dread, hid themselves among the thorny thickets and the trees of the forest and remained there. The carriage-drivers, also terrified, fled. The oxen, their yokes cut loose, wandered wherever they pleased. The carriages stood unhitched, separated from their yoke-poles.

The Six Group monks then began to confer with one another: "Friends, dear companions, we who are the Śākyans' close friends have been delayed here a long time — shall we just fast, or shall we go for alms?" They agreed to go for alms, and so, taking their bowls and robes, those noble ones set out, and presently along the road they saw carriages standing about with their yoke-poles detached and laden with food, and oxen that had broken free of their yokes wandering wherever they pleased. They looked at one another in astonishment and began to call out: "Friends, is anyone here?" When a sound came in response, the Six Group monks said: "Who are you?" "Noble ones, we are the Śākyan women. Come here — approach us. We have been attacked by bandits and are hiding in the thickets. Come, noble ones — remain distant for a moment, then approach: whatever of your limbs and members that we have not seen before, come so that they are concealed by leaves as you approach and serve us."

And so the Śākyan women, covered with leaves, came out and were served by them. Then the Six Group monks said: "Dear friends, dear companions, look at these Śākyan women — what do their eyes look like, their noses, their mouths, their breasts, their hands, their waists, their feet? Have a look!" When the women were pestered in this manner, they retreated from shame back into the very same thickets and forest and hid there.

Scouts then ran to report to the Śākyans: "The Śākyan women have been attacked." Thereupon the Śākyans took up bows and arrows and weapons, went straight along the road, blocked the path, and there they seized those bandits. Some among the Śākyans said: "What is there to consider? Kill them!" Others said: "Wait — bring them there and ask the Śākyan women: whoever has committed an offence against whichever woman, that one should be executed." So they dragged them before the Śākya women and said: "Come here — tell us: of these bandits, which one committed what offence against you?" The women said: "The bandit commander here is innocent — he did no harm, for he tried to restrain the others, but they would not be stopped. Let this one go." And so they released him.

He, having been given back his very life when it was nearly cut short, prostrated at their feet and said: "Noble ladies, since you are people of faith and are going to offer the midday meal to the Saṅgha of monks led by the Buddha, what would be gained by killing these men? Please also release those who did commit offences." And so the Śākyans had the plundered goods returned and released them all.

Then the Śākya men helped the Śākya women put on their garments and ornaments, yoked the oxen back to the carriages, and mounted the carriages and proceeded into the presence of the Blessed One. The Blessed One was seated on a prepared seat before the Saṅgha of monks, and the Śākyans, both men and women, began to serve food to the Saṅgha of monks led by the Buddha.

The Śākya women did not offer food to the six groups of monks, and the Śākya men said, "Why are you not serving food to the noble ones?" The women replied, "They have already eaten." "Where did they eat?" "Right here." "Who served them?" "We did." "How did you women serve them?" "Because of what these men did — they grabbed us, stripped us, and covered us with leaves, then emerged from the thickets and undergrowth and began to violate us — there is much that could be said about them. But enough of that. These men habitually engage in vile conduct, and so we will not give them food." The six groups of monks said nothing and remained silent.

The women then made complaint to the Saṅgha of monks, saying, "Noble ones, when the Blessed One declared that this road was dangerous and instructed us to travel with care, we said we would do so and came along" — at which point the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, a monk who patrols the forest shall be appointed. A monk who patrols the forest possessed of five qualities shall not be appointed even if not yet appointed, and if already appointed shall be removed. What are the five? He goes out of desire; he goes out of aversion; he goes out of delusion; he goes out of fear; and he does not know which parts of the forest have been patrolled and which have not. A monk who patrols the forest possessed of five qualities shall be appointed even if not yet appointed, and if already appointed shall not be removed. What are the five? He does not go out of desire; he does not go out of aversion; he does not go out of delusion; he does not go out of fear; and he knows which parts of the forest have been patrolled and which have not.

"He shall be appointed in the following manner. After a seat has been prepared and the gong struck, having properly informed the monks with the words of inquiry, and when the entire Saṅgha is seated together in harmony, he shall first be asked if he is willing: 'You who are called such-and-such — are you willing to be the Saṅgha's forest-patrol monk?' If he is willing, he should say, 'I am willing.'

"Then one monk shall make the motion and perform the formal act. 'Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. The monk named such-and-such wishes to be the Saṅgha's forest-patrol monk. If it is timely for the Saṅgha and the Saṅgha consents, may the Saṅgha appoint the monk named such-and-such as the Saṅgha's forest-patrol monk, so that he named such-and-such shall be the Saṅgha's forest-patrol monk. This is the motion.

"The formal act is to be performed thus. Let the venerable Saṅgha hear. The monk named such-and-such wishes to be the Saṅgha's forest-patrol monk. Accordingly, the Saṅgha hereby appoints the one named such-and-such as forest-patrol monk; the one named such-and-such shall be the Saṅgha's forest-patrol monk. Any venerable one who consents to the appointment of the one named such-and-such as forest-patrol monk shall remain silent; any who does not consent shall speak. The Saṅgha has consented and approved; the Saṅgha has appointed the monk named such-and-such as forest-patrol monk. The one named such-and-such is the Saṅgha's forest-patrol monk. Since no one has spoken, it is so taken.'

"I shall now set down the rules of conduct for the forest-patrol monk. The forest-patrol monk shall patrol the forest within a radius of half a league in all directions around the camp."

The Blessed One having thus declared that the forest-patrol monk shall patrol the forest within a radius of half a league in all directions, there were monks who became weary from the road and who found themselves alone and afraid. The Blessed One then declared:

"If he wishes, he may be given a young attendant and also a companion. If the forest is indeed frightening, he should tame a domestic animal as a signal. He should raise a blue banner. He should place leaf-fans along the path. If the forest is not frightening, he should raise a white banner."

If a forest-patrol monk does not properly take up and practice the rules of conduct prescribed for his behavior, he incurs an offence.

On a certain occasion, monks of little purpose — that is to say, certain monks — before the forest-patrol monk had gone on his rounds, took provisions and food from outside the boundary of the monastery's pleasure-garden and ate there, criticizing him, lodging complaints against him, and speaking ill of him. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One.

Thereupon the Blessed One, on account of this occurrence, on account of this incident, and in this connection, convened the assembly of monks — and so forth as before. The Blessed One, the buddha, though knowing, feigned not to know — and so forth as before. The Blessed One then questioned the group of six: "Monks, is it true that before the forest-patrol monk had gone on his rounds, you took provisions and food from outside the boundary of the pleasure-garden and ate there?"

"Blessed One, it is so."

The Blessed One rebuked them: "That is not the conduct of a renunciant; it is not fitting, not suitable, not in accordance with proper conduct. This is not something one who has gone forth should do." And so forth as before.

Then, having rebuked them in many ways, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, therefore, having seen these ten benefits, I shall establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the hearers — and so forth as before. My hearers shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya as follows:

Whatever lodgings and hermitages of the Saṅgha are known to be dangerous, known to be frightening, known to be menacing on account of various kinds of fear — and whatever monk, in such lodgings and hermitages of the Saṅgha known to be dangerous, known to be frightening, known to be menacing on account of various kinds of fear, before the forest-patrol monk has gone on his rounds, takes provisions and food from outside the boundary of the pleasure-garden and eats them — that monk shall go to the outer pleasure-garden and confess before the venerable monks, saying: 'An improper matter deserving of censure has arisen for me; I confess it individually.' This is the individual confession for this offense. This matter too is subject to individual confession.

The expression 'of the Saṅgha' means: of the Tathāgata's assembly of hearers.

The expression 'whatever lodgings and hermitages' — as for 'hermitage': six extremely fine particles make one fine particle; six fine particles make one water-particle; six water-particles make one iron-particle; six iron-particles make one rabbit's-hair particle; six rabbit's-hair particles make one sheep's-wool particle; six sheep's-wool particles make one ox-hair particle; six ox-hair particles make one sunbeam-mote particle; six sunbeam-mote particles make one louse-egg; six louse-eggs make one louse; six lice make one barleycorn; six barleycorns make one finger-breadth; twenty-four finger-breadths make one cubit; one and a half cubits make one pace; four cubits make one bow-length; five hundred bow-lengths make one krośa; one krośa from a village constitutes a hermitage. Whatever temple (vihāra) exists there, that is a monastic hermitage-lodging.

"Known as a place of apprehension" means: it is known to be frightening on account of thieves and rogues. "Known as a place of fear" means: it is known to be frightening on account of lions, tigers, and leopards. "Known as a place of fear, rendered fearful by various distinct dangers" means: it has become known as a place of fear, rendered fearful by the various distinct dangers of mosquitoes, stinging insects with long mouthparts, wind, sun, and venomous snakes.

"Whatever monk" refers to the group of six or anyone else of that sort. "Monastic hermitage-lodgings of the Saṅgha that are known as places of apprehension, known as places of fear, and known as places of fear rendered fearful by various distinct dangers — in such as these" means: in those that are as described. "Not having previously reconnoitered the forest" means: not having previously reconnoitered it by wandering through the forest. "Outside the assembly hall's enclosure" means: outside the temple. "Food and drink" means: the five kinds of food and the five kinds of drink. "Having received" means: having taken them into one's power by accepting them. "When one eats or drinks" means: when one swallows them down the throat. "That monk" means: whichever monk it is. "Having gone to the outer assembly hall" means: having gone to the temple outside the village. "To the monks" means: to whichever monks were assembled there. "Venerable ones, I have incurred grounds for censure" means: grounds for being censured. "Improper" means:

contrary to proper conduct. "That which is to be confessed" means: that which is to be disclosed. "A transgression has arisen" means: a downfall has arisen. "That Dharma" means: that which is not Dharma but was spoken under the name of Dharma. "I individually acknowledge" means: "I disclose it." "It is to be individually confessed" means: it is to be disclosed. "This Dharma too is to be individually confessed" means: this too is to be disclosed — and therefore it is said: it is to be individually confessed.

Now, in what way does a transgression arise? If a monk, with the perception that a forest not yet reconnoitered has not been reconnoitered, receives food and drink outside the enclosure of the assembly hall and eats or drinks them, it becomes a matter for individual confession. If, with regard to a forest not yet reconnoitered, one acts with doubt and receives food and drink outside the enclosure of the assembly hall and eats or drinks them, it becomes a matter for individual confession. If a monk, with the perception that a forest already reconnoitered has not been reconnoitered, receives food and drink outside the enclosure of the assembly hall and eats or drinks them, it becomes a wrongdoing. If, with regard to a forest already reconnoitered, one acts with doubt and receives food and drink outside the enclosure of the assembly hall and eats or drinks them, it becomes a wrongdoing. If the one who has reconnoitered the forest dies or flees, there is no transgression. For one who is a beginner, or who is mentally deranged, mentally disturbed, or afflicted by painful feelings, there is no transgression.

This concludes the fourth matter for individual confession, arising from the examination of the forest. The matters for individual confession are complete.

The Vinayavibhaṅga, the eighty-second fascicle. Summary verse:

Wearing the lower robe in a rounded fold, the Dharma robe in a rounded fold, not covering the head, not making offerings, not averting the eyes, not sending ahead, receiving what is good, eating what is good, step by step,
not having grains mixed together, not slapping with the hand, carrying the alms bowl tilted, covering the head and wearing it on one shoulder, riding an elephant,
using a carrying pole, standing upright, and not climbing trees —
these are the condensed summary of one hundred trainings.

The Blessed One, the Buddha (Skt. buddha), was dwelling in Bārāṇasī, in the Deer Park at Ṛṣipatana, the place where sages speak. At the time when the Blessed One, finding no fault in the five and admitting them to the monkhood, established them in the state of monks, those monks, through the force of their former habits, put on their lower robes just as householders do.

When faithful brahmins and householders saw this, they said: "Noble ones, you wear the lower robe in the same manner as wealthy men, merchants, and caravan leaders do." At that point the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One reflected: "What the householders say is true. Let me consider how the śrāvakas of the perfectly enlightened buddhas of former times used to wear the lower robe." Then the gods addressed the Blessed One: "Venerable one, it is like this: it was just as the gods of the Pure Abode do." And to the Blessed One himself there arose knowledge and vision of this: it was just as the gods of the Pure Abode do. Thereupon the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Therefore, this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train in wearing the lower robe in a rounded manner." When the Blessed One had declared that one shall train in wearing the lower robe in a rounded manner, the five monks began wearing their lower robes in a rounded manner. In the same way, the group of five junior monks, the fifty who had excelled, the sixty of the Bhadra group, and moreover those monks who had gone forth through the Blessed One's transmission all began wearing their lower robes in a rounded manner.

When the group of six went forth, they began wearing their lower robes far too high, and faithful brahmins and householders saw this and criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, peacocks, crested birds, and the sons of weavers arrange their lower robes in just this fashion — this is not fitting. Do not wear the lower robe so extremely high." Those monks replied: "Friends, there is a purpose for it." "Noble ones, what purpose is there?" "Because at the outset you yourselves were freed from ignorance and became trained." Hearing that people had engaged in widespread criticism of them, the monks at that point reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One, reflecting that what the householders said was true, declared: "Monks, therefore this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train in not wearing the lower robe so extremely high."

When the Blessed One had declared that one shall train in not wearing the lower robe so extremely high, the group of six began wearing it so extremely low. Faithful brahmins and householders saw this and criticized them, saying:

"Noble ones, women living in the region of Takkasilā and brides of good family arrange their lower robes in just this fashion — this is not fitting. Do not wear the lower robe so extremely low." Those monks replied: "Friends, there is a purpose for it." "Noble ones, what purpose is there?" "Because at the outset you yourselves were freed from ignorance and became trained." Hearing that people had engaged in widespread criticism of them, the monks at that point reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One, reflecting that what the householders said was true, declared: "Monks, therefore this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall wear the lower robe in a manner that is not so extremely low."

When the group of six wore the lower robe, they let the front hang down, and faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, young children, those intoxicated with alcohol, spirits, and those gorged with meat arrange their lower robes in just this fashion — this is not fitting. Do not wear the lower robe like this." Those monks replied: "Friends, there is a purpose for it." "Noble ones, what purpose is there?"

"Friends, for the first time you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have become trained." When the monks heard that the brahmins and householders had taken to criticizing them extensively, they reported the matter to the Blessed One at that occasion. The Blessed One reflected, thinking: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train to wear the lower robe not as an elephant's trunk."

When the group of six wore the lower robe, they folded it up at the sides. Faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, dancers in the midst of a troupe arrange the lower robe in just this fashion — this is not fitting. Do not wear the lower robe like this." Those monks replied: "Friends, there is a purpose for it." "Noble ones, what purpose is there?" "Friends, for the first time you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have become trained." When the monks heard that they had taken to criticizing them extensively, they reported the matter to the Blessed One at that occasion. The Blessed One reflected, thinking: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train to wear the lower robe not folded up like a palmyra leaf."

When the group of six wore the lower robe, they folded it at the side and stuck it up so that it jutted out like a spike. Faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, wealthy men, merchants, caravan leaders, and women arrange the lower robe in just this fashion — this is not fitting. Do not wear the lower robe like this." Those monks replied: "Friends, there is a purpose for it." "Noble ones, what purpose is there?" "Friends, for the first time you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have become trained." When the monks heard that they had taken to criticizing them extensively, they reported the matter to the Blessed One at that occasion. The Blessed One reflected, thinking: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train to wear the lower robe not like a grain spike."

When the group of six wore the lower robe, they arranged it below the navel in the manner of a serpent's hood. Faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, those who adorn themselves arrange the lower robe in just this fashion — this is not fitting. Do not wear the lower robe like this." Those monks replied: "Friends, there is a purpose for it." "Noble ones, what purpose is there?" "Friends, for the first time you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have become trained." When the monks heard that they had taken to criticizing them extensively, they reported the matter to the Blessed One at that occasion. The Blessed One reflected, thinking: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train to wear the lower robe not in the manner of a serpent's hood."

The condensed training rule is this: one shall train to wear the lower robe evenly; not too high, not too low; not like an elephant's trunk; not folded up like a palmyra leaf; not like a grain spike; and not in the manner of a serpent's hood.

The Blessed One declared: "A monk shall train to wear the lower robe evenly; not too high, not too low;"

not like an elephant's trunk; not folded up like a palmyra leaf; not like a grain spike; and not in the manner of a serpent's hood. One shall train to wear it thus."

Having declared this, the monks did not know how to wear the upper robe, and so the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks, one shall train to wear the upper robe evenly."

Having declared that one shall train to wear the upper robe evenly, the group of six then began wearing the upper robe pulled up far too high. Faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, ascetics and garland-sellers and fishermen's sons drape their upper garments in just such a manner — this is not fitting. Do not wear the upper robe like that." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a purpose in this." "Noble ones, what is the purpose?" "First of all, you yourselves are rid of ignorance, and you have trained." When the monks heard that widespread criticism had arisen, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One reflected, thinking: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train to wear the upper robe not pulled up too high."

Having declared that one shall train to wear the upper robe not pulled up too high, the group of six then began wearing it falling far too low. Faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, the residents of the region of Tagka and the daughters-in-law of noble families drape their upper garments in just such a manner — this is not fitting. Do not wear the upper robe like that." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a purpose in this." "Noble ones, what is the purpose?" "First of all, you yourselves are rid of ignorance, and you have trained." When the monks heard that widespread criticism had arisen, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One reflected, thinking: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train to wear the upper robe not falling too low."

Then the group of six began going to the houses of others with their arms and legs thrust out, and faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, young boys and those drunk on beer and spirits who are possessed and intoxicated go about thrusting out their arms and legs in just such a fashion — this is not fitting. Do not walk about in that manner." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a purpose in this." "Noble ones, what is the purpose?" "First of all, you yourselves are rid of ignorance, and you have trained." When the monks heard that widespread criticism had arisen, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One reflected, thinking: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore this shall be promulgated as the basis of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train to go to the houses of others in a composed and restrained manner."

Then the group of six began going to the houses of others with the upper robe bundled up and slung over the shoulder. Faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, those going to a wrestling arena drape their upper garments in just such a manner — this is not fitting. Do not wear the upper robe like that." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a purpose in this." "Noble ones, what is the purpose?" "First of all, you yourselves are rid of ignorance, and you have trained."

When the monks heard that they had become the object of widespread criticism, they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and then declared: "Monks, therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others with the robe properly adjusted."

Then the group of six went to the houses of others making a loud clamor. Faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, children and young boys, people drunk on ale, spirits, and those who have eaten meat go about making just such a loud clamor — this is not fitting. Do not go about making such a clamor." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a purpose in this." "Noble ones, what is the purpose?" "First of all, you yourselves are rid of ignorance, and you have trained."

When the monks heard that they had again become the object of widespread criticism, they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others with the voice lowered and with few words."

Then the group of six went to the houses of others with wandering, distracted eyes. They were walking alongside runaway elephants, runaway horses, runaway chariots, and runaway foot soldiers, being jostled and shoved about by these, and so were flung into filth, into muddy puddles, and into piles of sweepings. Faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, why do you look about like those who gaze at the stars or like those who squeeze their eyes shut? What harm is there in looking at the ground? This is not fitting. Do not go about with such distracted eyes." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a purpose in this." "Noble ones, what is the purpose?" "First of all, you yourselves are rid of ignorance, and you have trained."

When the monks heard that they had again become the object of widespread criticism, they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without letting the eyes wander."

Then the group of six went to the houses of others gazing far into the distance. They lost their proper deportment, strayed from the path, and fell into various mishaps. Faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, why do you look about like those who gaze at the stars or like birds of prey scanning the ground? This is not fitting. Do not go about gazing thus." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a purpose in this." "Noble ones, what is the purpose?" "First of all, you yourselves are rid of ignorance, and you have trained."

When the monks heard that they had again become the object of widespread criticism, they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others with the gaze cast down the distance of a yoke."

The summary verse of the training rules is as follows:

One shall train to wear the robe in a rounded manner.

One shall train to wear the robe neither hitched up too high nor trailing too low.

Composed and restrained, properly robed, with the voice lowered, without letting the eyes wander,

The group of six would go about with their heads covered when visiting other houses, and believing brahmins and faithful householders would censure them, saying: "Noble ones, brides of good family, people with eye ailments, and those frightened by bees behave in this way — it is not fitting conduct. Do not cover your heads like that." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without covering the head."

The group of six would go about with their lower robes hitched up when visiting other houses, and believing brahmins and faithful householders would censure them, saying: "Noble ones, people who defecate and urinate behave in this way — it is not fitting conduct. Do not hitch up your robes like that." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without hitching up the robe."

The group of six would go about with their dharma robes slung over one shoulder when visiting other houses, and believing brahmins and faithful householders would censure them, saying: "Noble ones, peacocks, jesters, and acrobats' sons behave in this way — it is not fitting conduct. Do not sling your robe over one shoulder like that." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without slinging the robe over one shoulder."

The group of six would go about with their arms folded up over the yoke of their shoulders when visiting other houses, and believing brahmins and faithful householders would censure them, saying: "Noble ones, peacocks, jesters, and acrobats' sons behave in this way — it is not fitting conduct. Do not fold your arms up over your shoulders like that." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without folding the arms up over the shoulders."

The group of six went to the houses of others with their arms folded up behind their backs, and the faithful brahmins and householders censured them, saying: "Noble ones, servants behave this way, and it is not proper that you should do so — do not fold your arms up behind your backs like that." The six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Monks, therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without folding the arms up behind the back."

The summary sūtra of the training is as follows: one shall train to go to the houses of others without covering the head, without looking about from side to side, without peering around, without folding the arms across the chest, and without folding the arms up behind the back.

The group of six went leaping over shadows as they went to the houses of others, and the faithful brahmins and householders censured them, saying: "Noble ones, those who are frightened and fleeing in fear behave this way, and it is not proper that you should do so — do not leap about like that." The six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without leaping about."

The group of six went to the houses of others with excessively long strides, and the faithful brahmins and householders censured them, saying: "Noble ones, those who are drunk on liquor, those who are possessed by spirits, and those who have gorged themselves on meat behave this way, and it is not proper that you should do so — do not stride about in such a manner." The six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without striding with overlong steps."

The group of six went to the houses of others walking on tiptoe, and the faithful brahmins and householders censured them, saying: "Noble ones, those with an unsteady gait, those who are lame, and young children behave this way, and it is not proper that you should do so — do not walk in such a manner." The six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others not walking on tiptoe."

The group of six went to the houses of others walking on tiptoe, and the faithful brahmins and householders censured them, saying: "Noble ones do not play about like children chasing fireflies, striking their heels like this — this is not proper conduct; do not walk in such a manner." The six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter and thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others not walking on tiptoe."

The group of six went to the houses of others with both hands resting on their hips, and the faithful brahmins and householders censured them, saying: "Noble ones, wealthy persons, merchants, and ship captains walk in such a manner — this is not proper conduct; do not walk in such a manner." The six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter and thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without resting the hands on the hips."

The summary training rule is: one shall train to go to the houses of others without jumping, without stretching out the legs, not squatting, not walking on tiptoe, and without resting the hands on the hips.

The group of six went to the houses of others swaying their bodies, and the faithful brahmins and householders censured them, saying: "Noble ones, dancing girls, elephants, and she-yaks move in such a manner — this is not proper conduct; do not walk in such a manner." The six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter and thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without swaying the body."

The group of six went to the houses of others swinging their arms, and the faithful brahmins and householders censured them, saying: "Noble ones, peacocks, finely adorned persons, and the sons of wrestlers move in such a manner — this is not proper conduct; do not walk in such a manner." The six replied: "Friends, there is a need for it." "What need, noble ones?" "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter and thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without swinging the arms."

The group of six went to the houses of others with their heads turning from side to side, and brahmin householders who were faithful censured them, saying: "Noble ones, great elephants and pure animals move in this manner — it is not fitting. Do not walk in such a way." The monks replied, "Worthy ones, there is reason for this." The faithful ones said, "Noble ones, what is the reason?" The monks answered, "First of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained." When the monks heard that these laypeople had entered into extensive censure, at that time the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter and thought to himself, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without turning the head from side to side."

The group of six went to the houses of others with their shoulders jostling one another. Now, just as a person adorned with perfume and flowers walks along regarding the world as his child, so it was with them. When this happened, the group of six said: "Dear friend, look at this poor wretch walking along and regarding the world as his child — surely he must think that the group of six has never before held perfume and flowers. Come, let us make him displeased." Having agreed to do so, one after another they jostled each other shoulder to shoulder, and also jostled others shoulder to shoulder, until the man was knocked down and fell to the ground. He said, "What wrong have I done to you?" The others replied, "Poor wretch, because you walk along regarding the world as your child, as though the group of six had never before held perfume and flowers — that is why we should make you displeased." He then censured them, mocked them, and spoke harshly. At that time the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered it, thinking, "That householder censures them justifiably," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without jostling with the shoulders."

The group of six went to the houses of others with their arms linked together. Now, just as a person adorned with perfume and flowers walks along regarding the world as his child, so it was with them. The group of six said: "Dear friend, look at this poor wretch walking along and regarding the world as his child — surely he must think that the group of six has never before held perfume and flowers. Come, let us make him displeased." Having agreed to do so, one after another they linked arms and also linked arms with others, until the man was knocked down and fell to the ground. He said, "What wrong have I done to you?" They replied, "Poor wretch, because you walk along regarding the world as your child, as though the group of six had never before held perfume and flowers — that is why we should make you displeased." He then censured them, mocked them, and spoke harshly. At that time the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered it, thinking, "That householder censures them justifiably," and declared: "Therefore my hearers shall recite the following training rule of the Vinaya and train accordingly: one shall train to go to the houses of others without linking arms."

The condensed summary of the training rules is as follows: one shall train to go to the houses of others without swaying the body, without swinging the arms, without turning the head from side to side, without jostling with the shoulders, and without linking arms.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there was a brahmin of fastidious purity who had prepared a sleeping place in his gatehouse. There a girl was sitting holding a fan and keeping away the flies. The Venerable Ānanda entered that householder's dwelling for alms and the brahmin said to him:

"Girl, go to the brahmin's storehouse and tell Ānanda to stay in the gatehouse." She replied: "Noble one, I cannot leave, as I am here keeping away the flies." He said: "Girl, if that is so, I shall keep watch for a while — you go and tell him." When she had gone, Ānanda climbed up with his feet onto the sleeping platform and sat upon it. When the brahmin came back out, he saw Ānanda sitting upon the sleeping platform with his feet up on it. Seeing this, he said: "The standards of purity in the world are different things — why are you sitting here with your feet up?" Ānanda replied: "Brahmin, whatever use a monk makes of a sleeping place is a benefit conferred on you through seven generations of your family." When the brahmin heard this, he began to abuse him, to slander him, and to spread ill reports of him. Upon hearing this, the monks at that time reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One, having reflected — thinking that the brahmin was reproaching the community — declared: "Therefore, my śrāvakas shall be trained in this rule of the Vinaya: one shall train not to sit down uninvited on a seat in another's home."

Now, there was a time when the Venerable Charka had subdued a violent woman, and she prepared a sage's seat for the Venerable Charka to use, and he would use it as he went about. Then on another occasion he said to the violent woman: "Sister, watch over things — I am going for a walk." She said: "Noble one, please return quickly; do not make me weary of staying here." He said: "Sister, do not worry — it shall be so." He looked back at her and went to the Jeta Grove. Then the Blessed One said to the Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and announce to the monks: 'The Blessed One will go for a walk on the seventh day. Whoever among you wishes to go for a walk together with the Blessed One, let him prepare his robes.'" The Venerable Ānanda, having heard the Blessed One, respectfully complied and announced to the monks: "Venerable ones, the Blessed One will go for a walk on the seventh day. Whoever among you wishes to go for a walk together with the Blessed One, let him prepare his robes." The Venerable Charka thought: "Since there are eighteen benefits to a buddha's going for a walk, I shall go together with the Blessed One himself." And so he set out at once. At that time there was in the violent woman's house an infant boy who had been born not long before. She said to the girl: "Girl, lay this infant boy on the sage's seat — may he live long and may his life be protected." The girl dressed him in a white cloth and laid him down there. The Venerable Charka had entered Śrāvastī for alms and thought: "I shall go to the violent woman's house to use the seat, and then afterward collect alms and go." So he went there. Now, arhats do not engage their knowledge and vision without prior reflection, and so he sat hesitating on that very seat, uncertain. The people of the household, not thinking carefully, called out "Boy! Boy!" to the noble one. He rose up quickly, and when they saw that the moment had come, they began to weep. He said: "Sisters, why are you weeping over this? Such is the nature of reality for all conditioned formations. Nevertheless, it is in dependence on me that the Blessed One will establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the śrāvakas, and so I must take care of this matter." Having heard them weeping without stopping, out of the loving-kindness toward relatives that sentient beings in saṃsāra have been habituated to since beginningless time, the monks at that time reported this to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, let this be established as a rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas: one shall train not to sit upon a seat in another's home without first examining the seat."

Now, twelve years had passed since the Blessed One had gone forth, and six years since his perfect awakening, when he came to the settlement of Uruvelā. On the first day, he sat beneath a parasol on his father's side. On the second day, when he sat beneath a parasol in the retinue of his own queen, the venerable Charka stepped on the queen Yaśodharā's train, and though she was endowed with strength and did not fall, she said to the queen Sādhuvādā: "Sādhuvādā, the noble Charka has lodged a formal accusation against me before the community of monks led by the Buddha." When the queen told him what had happened and what had come of it, he replied: "Let it be made clear that from now on such conduct shall never occur again, and let it be a matter of displeasure."

Some time later, on another day, Queen Yaśodharā had a small stool wrapped in cloth and sent a maidservant with a message, saying: "Girl, go and wait for a while at the gate of the royal palace. When the noble Charka arrives, you are to say to him: 'Brahmin, brahmin.'" And if the brahmin should ask what is wanted, you are to say: 'You are being summoned to the queen's retinue.'"

The girl did so, and the venerable Charka arrived as well, and she began calling out: "Brahmin, brahmin." He asked: "Girl, what does the brahmin want?" She said: "Noble one, you are being summoned to the queen's retinue." He thought: "I should go quickly, so as to give alms without delay," and he went quickly. Queen Yaśodharā said to the girl: "Girl, she told you to call him 'brahmin,' so why did you call out 'shaven-headed ascetic' instead, and he said nothing?"

The venerable Charka replied: "If I were to say that I went forth from the home of your householder — does that make me any less a brahmin? If one is a brahmin, one recites: 'Om bhūr bhuvaḥ svaḥ.' But if one has gone forth, then:

Commit no evil act whatsoever;
cultivate virtue fully and completely;
tame one's own mind thoroughly — this is the teaching of the awakened ones.

That is what one recites."

She said: "Whether you are a brahmin or an ascetic, she made a vow that if the Blessed One came to the settlement of Uruvelā while he was still practicing austerities, she would offer such-and-such to a brahmin on his behalf."

He replied: "The Blessed One has freed many hundreds of thousands of living beings from the forms of wrong view, and yet he has not freed you from the forms of wrong view."

She said: "Noble one, the domain of women is difficult to leave — what can one do?" He replied: "Come and see. Look at what is given to the nun practitioners." He said: "Noble one, take this bowl of yogurt and this bowl of flour, stand up and drink it, and sit upon this stool. Will you give me this stool as well?" She said: "Noble one, I will not give you the stool."

He thought: "If she will not give the stool, then I shall break it," and knowing this, he sat down upon that very stool with the full weight of his body, then leaned forward, so that the bowl of yogurt and the bowl of flour were poured over her head. Her attendants then beat him with riding switches, and seizing him by his arms and legs, threw him into the bodhisattva's pleasure pond.

He rose from it and wrung out his robes. The monks, seeing this, said: "What transgression has the venerable Charka committed?" He replied: "I did something a little reckless, and this is the kind of trouble it has brought." They began to rebuke him and cried out in protest.

When the monks heard the complaints being made, they reported the matter to the Blessed One at that time. The Blessed One considered the situation and thought, "They are criticizing them justifiably," and so declared: "Therefore, my śrāvakas shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train to sit upon a seat in another's home without pressing down with the full weight of one's body."

The Group of Six then sat in other people's homes with their legs crossed, and faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "The noble ones sit thus — like weavers, like traders, like fishermen's sons. This is not proper conduct; do not sit in such a manner." The Group of Six replied: "Wise ones, there is a reason for it." "Noble ones, what reason could there be?" "Precisely because, first and foremost, you yourselves are free from ignorance and have been trained."

When the monks heard that they had fallen into extensive criticism once again, they reported it to the Blessed One at that time. The Blessed One considered the situation and thought, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore, my śrāvakas shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train to sit upon a seat in another's home without crossing one's legs."

The Group of Six then sat in other people's homes with their knees crossed, and faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "The noble ones sit thus — like weavers, like traders, like fishermen's sons. This is not proper conduct; do not sit in such a manner." The Group of Six replied: "Wise ones, there is a reason for it." "Noble ones, what reason could there be?" "Precisely because, first and foremost, you yourselves are free from ignorance and have been trained."

When the monks heard that they had fallen into extensive criticism once again, they reported it to the Blessed One at that time. The Blessed One considered the situation and thought, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore, my śrāvakas shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train to sit upon a seat in another's home without crossing one's knees."

The Group of Six then sat in other people's homes with one cushion stacked upon another, and faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "The noble ones sit thus — like weavers, like traders, like fishermen's sons. This is not proper conduct; do not sit in such a manner." The Group of Six replied: "Wise ones, there is a reason for it." "Noble ones, what reason could there be?" "Precisely because, first and foremost, you yourselves are free from ignorance and have been trained."

When the monks heard that they had fallen into extensive criticism once again, they reported it to the Blessed One at that time. The Blessed One considered the situation and thought, "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore, my śrāvakas shall recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train to sit upon a seat in another's home without stacking one cushion upon another."

The Group of Six then sat in other people's homes with their legs drawn up and tucked in. When laywomen came and paid their respects, the monks did not say a word of acknowledgment in return. The laywomen said: "Noble ones, why do you not say anything in acknowledgment?" The monks replied: "You paid respects to our feet, not to us." When the laywomen then bowed to their feet, the monks spread their buttocks wide to be measured, and said: "Ānanda, Upānanda — look at the remarkable size of these two's hindquarters!" The laywomen were mortified and stood there in silence. At that time the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "Therefore this training rule in the Vinaya shall be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one shall train to sit on a seat in another's home without drawing the legs up and tucking them in."

The group of six then sat in others' homes with their legs stretched out, and when laywomen came and paid their respects, the monks called them contemptible and slovenly. The laywomen said: "Noble ones, why do you call us contemptible and slovenly?" The monks replied: "You did not pay respects to our feet." When the laywomen then bowed to their feet, the monks spread their buttocks wide to be measured, and said: "Ānanda, Upānanda — look at the remarkable size of these two's hindquarters!" The laywomen were mortified and stood there in silence. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore this training rule in the Vinaya shall be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one shall train to sit on a seat in another's home without stretching the legs out."

The group of six then sat on seats in a sprawling, lounging manner, appearing disheveled, and faithful brahmins and householders reproached them, saying: "Noble ones, there are children and young boys here, people giddy with drink, spirits, and those reeking of meat — it is not fitting that you sit in such a manner. Please do not sit like this." The monks replied: "Good people, there is a purpose to this." The laypeople said: "Noble ones, what purpose could there be?" The monks replied: "First and foremost, it is to free yourselves from ignorance and to become trained." Hearing that they had embarked on extensive mockery, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter, thinking: "What the laypeople say is true," and declared: "Therefore this training rule in the Vinaya shall be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one shall train to sit on a seat in another's home without appearing disheveled and sprawling."

The condensed sūtra of the training rules: one shall train not to sit on a seat in another's home without having arranged one's robe; not to lower one's full body weight carelessly onto the seat; not to cross one's feet; not to cross one's knees; not to place one knee upon the other; not to draw the legs up and tuck them in; not to stretch the legs out; and to sit on a seat in another's home without appearing disheveled and sprawling.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in the fearsome forest thicket on the hill where Śiśupāla was killed by the crocodile, the forest preserve of wild animals. Prince Udāyin invited the monastic Saṅgha of monks to his fine lotus palace, which had been painted with one hundred and one colors, and offered them a meal. Prince Udāyin was himself a man of faith, but his retinue was not, and the servants — those who served the rice and the vegetables — smashed the monks' bowls with their ladles. The group of six then devised a plan: "Let us make these people displeased," and as the rice and vegetables were being served, the group of six tipped their bowls back, so that the bowls fell to the ground. The monks then said: "Noble ones, you have made the floor of Prince Udāyin's fine lotus palace, painted with one hundred and one colors, unfit." The group of six replied: "Wretches! If you are displeased that the floor is made unfit, then what about the monks whose bowls have been broken?" Hearing this, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore this training rule in the Vinaya shall be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one shall train to receive food properly."

The group of six entered Prince Udāyin's home for alms-round and —

At first, when they took as much cooked rice as would fill their bowl, the alms-givers said: "Noble ones, where shall we pour the curry?" They replied: "Right here — pour it on top." When they poured it on and it spilled over and fell to the ground, those present said: "Noble ones, you have made the floor of Prince Udāyin's fine lotus palace, painted with one hundred and one colors, unfit." The group of six replied: "Wretches! For now, you do not know where Prince Udāyin will be reborn, having become so greatly attached to this place. But as for you — having become so greatly attached to this place, you will be reborn among the drooling hungry ghosts." When this was reported to the Blessed One by the monks, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore this training rule in the Vinaya shall be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one shall train to receive food without taking it to the level of the rim."

The group of six entered Prince Udāyin's home for alms-round. At first, when they took as much curry as would fill their bowl, the alms-givers said: "Noble ones, where shall we pour the cooked rice?" They replied: "Right here — pour it on top." But as for you — having become so greatly attached to this place, you will be reborn among the drooling hungry ghosts." When this was reported to the Blessed One by the monks, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore this training rule in the Vinaya shall be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one shall train to receive food without curry being in excess."

When the group of six were eating their rice, they would not take any curry and then, after a long while, would call out for it, causing the servers to be flustered. When this was reported to the Blessed One by the monks, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore this training rule in the Vinaya shall be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one shall train to receive food in due sequence."

At Śrāvastī there lived a householder who had invited the community of monks, headed by the Buddha, to another house for a midday meal. Having prepared various foods for the offering, he began by serving rice. As the monks began to take large portions, he said: "Noble ones, I have prepared various foods — please do not take so much." The group of six said: "Dear friend and beloved householder, this wretch is trying to obstruct your rice too — take as much as you like." And so the monks took a great deal.

Now, when the servers who were arranging portions for the elders at the far end of the row were seen by the group of six, and they noticed an elderly monk sitting below that position, while looking toward the elders' seats at the far end, the group of six filled that monk's bowl from the ladle used for the rice. When the householder came to serve those seated at the far end, he gave a portion to the elderly monk, and it fell to the bottom of the bowl. The elderly monk then began to look at the householder's face. The householder said: "Noble one, why have you taken so much rice?" The monk replied: "Householder, I did not take it."

The householder said: "Then where did all this come from? I do not know." The group of six said: "Householder, it is well known that when we were young, a rain of coins fell for seven days. In the same way, a rain of cooked rice has fallen into this elderly monk's bowl." While the elderly monk sat there saying nothing, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "For this reason, my śrāvakas shall receive and uphold the following rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train to look into the alms bowl while accepting food."

When the group of six were on their alms round, whenever alms were not being given, they would stand holding their bowls and wait, and they would then abuse the faithful brahmins and householders, saying: "Noble ones, why do you stand there holding your bowls like beggars, with nothing put in them and nothing to eat? This is not fitting conduct — do not behave in this way." Those monks replied: "Friends, there is a need for this." The others asked: "Noble ones, what need is there?" They replied: "First, you yourselves will be freed from ignorance, and you will have trained." When the monks heard that they had engaged in such extensive abuse, they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, considering the matter and concluding that the householders' complaints were justified, declared: "For this reason, my śrāvakas shall receive and uphold the following rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train not to hold the alms bowl in front of oneself when food has not yet arrived."

In Śrāvastī, a certain householder invited the Saṅgha of monks, together with the Buddha at their head, to his house at midday. That householder had an abundance of cooked rice but little curry. The group of six covered the curry with the cooked rice. When the householder saw the cooked rice, he said: "Noble ones, is there no curry?" They replied: "Householder, look here." He then gave additional curry as well. The monks went to the monastery and said: "Venerable ones, that householder prepared fine cooked rice, yet the curry was so little." The group of six replied: "As for us, we obtained plenty of curry." When the monks described to them how it had come about, the monks said: "Was it right for you to act in that way?" They replied: "It may have been right or it may not have been right, but as for us, we did act in that way." When this was reported to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "For this reason, a monk shall train not to cover curry with cooked rice."

Again in Śrāvastī, a certain householder invited the Saṅgha of monks, together with the Buddha at their head, to his house at midday. That householder had an abundance of curry but little cooked rice. The group of six covered the cooked rice with curry. When the householder saw the curry, he said: "Noble ones, is there no cooked rice?" They replied: "Householder, look here." He then gave additional cooked rice as well. The monks went to the monastery and said: "Venerable ones, that householder prepared fine curry, yet the cooked rice was so little." The group of six replied: "As for us, we obtained plenty of cooked rice." When the monks described to them how it had come about, the monks said: "Was it right for you to act in that way?" They replied: "It may have been right or it may not have been right, but as for us, we did act in that way." When this was reported to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared:

Therefore, monks must train not to cover cooked rice with curry, nor curry with cooked rice.

At Śrāvastī, a certain monk who was going on alms round received cooked rice and curry. He then received more curry and more cooked rice, and regret arose in him, thinking: "Did I cover the curry with cooked rice, or did I not cover the cooked rice with curry?" When the monks reported this occasion to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Monks, in this case there is no offense. Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: Out of desire, one must not cover curry with cooked rice, nor cooked rice with curry. Train accordingly."

The group of six, having placed their bowls on top of the food that had been set out and the food that was to be eaten, were criticized by faithful brahmins and householders, who said: "Noble ones, purity is surely something different. Why then do you place your bowls on top of the food that has been set out and the food to be eaten? This is not in accordance with proper conduct; please do not do so." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a reason for this." The faithful brahmins and householders asked: "Noble ones, what reason?" They replied: "Precisely so that you yourselves may first be freed from ignorance and become trained." When the monks heard that widespread criticism had arisen, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, considering the matter, thought: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: Train not to hold the bowl over food that has been set out and food to be eaten."

The summary training rule is this: Train to take food properly — not going beyond the rim, not making a hole in the middle, not leveling the curry, not heaping it toward the edge, not looking into the bowl with attachment, not receiving the bowl before food that has been set out and food to be eaten has arrived, not covering curry with cooked rice out of desire, not covering cooked rice with curry, and not holding the bowl over food that has been set out and food to be eaten. Train accordingly.

This is the eighty-third section of the Vinayavibhaṅga, and the last one.

The group of six, eating food with various condiments, were criticized by faithful brahmins and householders, who said: "Noble ones, you eat along with small boys and young lads, and with women of the streets in such a manner — this is not in accordance with proper conduct; please do not do so." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a reason for this." The faithful brahmins and householders asked: "Noble ones, what reason?" They replied: "Precisely so that you yourselves may first be freed from ignorance and become trained." When the monks heard that widespread criticism had arisen, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, considering the matter, thought: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: Train to eat food properly."

The group of six, when eating at the home of another, took their mouthfuls far too small, and were criticized by faithful brahmins and householders, who said: "Noble ones, you eat in such a manner — like small boys and young lads, like daughters-in-law of good families, like women of the streets — this is not in accordance with proper conduct; please do not do so." The group of six replied: "Friends, there is a reason for this." The faithful brahmins and householders asked: "Noble ones, what reason?" They replied: "Precisely so that you yourselves may first be freed from ignorance and become trained." When the monks heard that widespread criticism had arisen, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, considering the matter, thought: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows:

One shall train to eat food in morsels that are not too small. When the group of six ate at another household, they ate in very large morsels, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, greedy ones beg in this manner — this is not in accordance with proper conduct; please do not do so." They replied: "Friends, there is a reason for this." "Noble ones, what reason?" "Precisely so that you yourselves may first be freed from ignorance and become trained." When the monks heard that widespread criticism had arisen, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, considering the matter, thought: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food in morsels that are not too large."

When the group of six ate at another household and ate in morsels of improper size, the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "Noble ones, children and boys and greedy ones beg in this manner — this is not in accordance with proper conduct; please do not do so." They replied: "Friends, there is a reason for this." "Noble ones, what reason?" "Precisely so that you yourselves may first be freed from ignorance and become trained." When the monks heard that widespread criticism had arisen, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, considering the matter, thought: "What the householders say is true," and declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food in properly sized morsels."

In Śrāvastī, a householder invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another household at midday. Now, beneath the group of six there sat a senior monk who raised his face and gazed to the side of the elder. A lay attendant then filled his mouth with food and said: "Sir, eat this." When the monks heard of this, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train not to open the mouth before the morsel has been brought close."

When the group of six spoke with their mouths stuffed full of food, their speech became garbled. The monks reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train not to speak with the mouth stuffed full of food."

The summary sūtra of the trainings: One shall train to eat food well — in morsels that are not too small, in morsels that are not too large, in properly sized morsels; one shall train not to open the mouth before the morsel has been brought close; and one shall train not to speak with the mouth stuffed full of food.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A householder there invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another household at midday, and in preparation he had arranged sweet dishes as appetizers. Then the group of six called out aloud and said: "Dear friend, attendant — the appetizers are sour!" Upon hearing this, the householder was embarrassed and sat in silence. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows:

One shall train to eat food without making smacking sounds.

In Śrāvastī, a householder invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another household at midday, and having no proper vessel, he cooked a pot of rice and poured it into a box. While it was still hot, the group of six called out aloud and said: "Dear friend, attendant — this rice is too cold; blow on it with your breath and eat it!" Upon hearing this, the householder was embarrassed and sat in silence. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows:

One shall train to eat food without making huffing sounds.

In Śrāvastī, a householder invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha to another household at midday. He cooked a pot of rice and spread it out on a tray, and when it had gone cold, the group of six called out aloud and said: "Dear friend, attendant — this rice is too cold; heat it up with your breath and eat it!" Upon hearing this, the householder was embarrassed and sat in silence. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows:

One shall train to eat food without blowing on it.

When the group of six were eating at another household, they stuck out their tongues to inspect the food, then licked both lips. The monks said to them: "Venerable ones, why do you stick out your tongues and look about like that?" They replied: "Venerable ones, it is not proper to swallow without having tasted the food first — so we look first." When the monks began to censure them, they reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows:

One shall train not to eat with the tongue stuck out.

The condensed sūtra of the trainings is as follows: one shall train to eat without making smacking sounds; without making slurping sounds; without making huffing sounds; without blowing on one's food; and without eating with the tongue stuck out.

When the group of six were eating at another household, they picked up the rice grain by grain and nibbled at it, and this caused faithful brahmin householders to censure them, saying: "Noble ones eat in this manner — like little children, like crows, like sparrows, like crows that peck — this is not fitting conduct; do not eat this way." The group of six replied: "Wise ones, there is a reason for this." "Noble ones, what reason might that be?" "First and foremost, it is to separate yourselves from ignorance and to become trained." When the monks heard that they had gone so far in inviting censure, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, reflecting that what the householders said was true, declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows:

One shall train to eat food without separating out the grains. When the group of six were eating at another household, on the occasion of their saying "Venerable ones, this curry is far too spicy" and "Far too sour," the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food without finding fault with it."

When the group of six were eating at another household, they would transfer morsels from mouthful to mouthful and eat in this way. The brahmin and householder faithful censured them, saying: "Noble ones, it is not fitting conduct to beg in this manner, like little children, like boys, like hungry creatures; do not eat this way." The group of six replied: "Wise ones, there is a reason for this." "Noble ones, what reason might that be?" "First and foremost, it is to separate yourselves from ignorance and to become trained." When the monks heard that they had gone so far in inviting censure, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, reflecting that what the householders said was true, declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food without transferring morsels from mouthful to mouthful."

When the group of six were eating at another household, they would make slurping sounds, and the brahmin and householder faithful censured them, saying: "Noble ones, it is not fitting conduct to beg in this manner, like little children, like boys, like hungry creatures; do not eat this way." The group of six replied: "Wise ones, there is a reason for this." "Noble ones, what reason might that be?" "First and foremost, it is to separate yourselves from ignorance and to become trained." The Blessed One, reflecting that what the householders said was true, declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food without making slurping sounds."

When the group of six were eating at another household, they would take a mouthful and stuff half into their mouth while letting half fall into the bowl, and the brahmin and householder faithful censured them, saying: "Noble ones, it is not fitting conduct to beg in this manner, like little children, like boys, like prostitutes; do not eat this way." The group of six replied: "Wise ones, there is a reason for this." "Noble ones, what reason might that be?" "First and foremost, it is to separate yourselves from ignorance and to become trained." When the monks heard that they had gone so far in inviting censure, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One, reflecting that what the householders said was true, declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food without letting morsels drop and scatter."

The condensed sūtra of the training rules is as follows: One shall train to eat food without separating out the grains, without finding fault, without transferring morsels from mouthful to mouthful, without making slurping sounds, and without letting morsels drop and scatter.

When the group of six were eating at another household, they licked their hands, and the monks said: "Venerable ones, why do you do something so unseemly?" The group of six replied: "Venerable ones, we are fond of whatever has the finest essence." On the occasion of the monks censuring them, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food without licking one's hands."

When the group of six were eating at another household, they scraped their bowls clean, and the monks said:

"Venerable ones, why do you do something so unseemly?" They replied: "Venerable ones, we are fond of whatever has the finest essence." On the occasion of the monks censuring them, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food without scraping one's bowl clean."

When the group of six were eating at another household, they shook their hands, and the water from their hands splashed the monks nearby. On the occasion of the monks censuring them, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food without shaking one's hands."

When the group of six were eating at another household, there was a monk seated below them wearing a reddish-yellow patched robe. The group of six said: "Friend, dear friend, this poor wretch in our midst — we suspect that in the past he has never once worn a robe of this quality, which is why he is displeased with it." Then they tilted their bowls, and the water from the bowl ruined that monk's robe. On the occasion of the monks censuring them, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train to eat food without tilting one's bowl."

At Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder who had faith in the adherents of the naked ascetics (the Nirgrantha tīrthikas). Later he came to have faith in the Blessed One, and he invited the community of monks to his home for a midday meal. He served them flour, and the group of six kneaded it together and arranged it in the shape of a stupa. They then served the hollowed-out middle portions and arranged those upright like a central pillar. They served the outer portions and arranged those on top of the pillar in the shape of an umbrella. Then they said: "Friend, dear friend, this stupa is the one that consummates evil destinies — it is a 'consummator.'" Then they broke it apart and ate it, saying: "Friend, dear friend, the stupa that consummates evil destinies — the 'consummator' — has fallen." When the householder heard this, he said: "Noble ones, I myself have been freed from that sinful view, yet you have still not been freed from aversion." Whereupon they sat in silence. On that occasion the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train not to eat food by breaking it into the shape of a stupa."

The summary sūtra of the training rules is: one shall train to eat food without licking one's hands; without scraping one's bowl; without shaking one's hands; without tilting one's bowl; and without breaking food into the shape of a stupa and eating it.

When the group of six were eating at another household, a monk seated near them was eating a great deal. The group of six mocked him and said: "Friend, dear friend, look at this old one — look how much he is eating!" On that occasion the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train not to look into the bowl of a monk seated nearby in order to find fault with how much he eats."

When the group of six were eating at another household, they took hold of a water vessel with hands raised above the food, those who lacked faith cried out that the śramaṇas, the sons of Śākya, were unclean because they were grasping a water vessel with hands soiled by food. On that occasion the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train not to grasp a water vessel with hands soiled by food."

When the group of six were eating at another household, there was a monk seated below them wearing a patchwork robe of reddish-yellow. The group of six said: "Friend, dear friend, this poor fellow must be thinking to himself, 'People like us have never before in our lives worn a robe as fine as this,' and so he is displeased with it." They then splattered him with the water left over from the food, and that monk's patchwork robe was ruined by the food-water. When they then proceeded to mock him, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train not to splatter a monk seated nearby with water left over from food."

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in the forest grove of Mṛgadāva on the fearsome wooded mountain of Śiśumāragiri. The prince Prasenajit invited the community of monks to his fine lotus palace painted in one hundred and one colors, and offered them a meal. The group of six poured the rinse water from their bowls right there on the spot, and the sweepers and cleaners rebuked the noble ones, saying: "You have defiled the floor of Prince Prasenajit's fine lotus palace painted in one hundred and one colors." The group of six replied: "For now Prince Prasenajit has developed an attachment to this place, but he does not know where he will be reborn. As for you, having developed this attachment, you will be reborn among the slobbering hungry ghosts." When they proceeded to mock them in this way, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "One shall train not to pour rinse water at another household."

At Śrāvastī, a householder had monks come to his walled home and invited the community of monks for a midday meal. The monks began pouring their rinse water outside the house, and the householder said: "Noble ones, please pour it right here — my household will make use of it." On that occasion the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If a householder says 'Pour it here,' then one may pour it there. Otherwise, one shall not pour it." He then declared: "Therefore my śrāvakas shall recite this training rule for the Vinaya as follows: One shall train not to pour rinse water at another household without asking the householder present."

The summary of training rules: One shall train not to look into the bowl of a monk seated nearby in order to find fault. One shall train not to grasp a water vessel with hands soiled by food. One shall train not to splatter a monk seated nearby with water left over from food. One shall train not to pour rinse water at another household without asking the householder present.

At Śrāvastī there was a brahmin whose son had fallen ill. The son went to a physician and said: "Good sir, my son is sick — please prescribe a medicine." That physician was a person of faith, and he said: "Brahmin, wash yourself with the rinse water from the bowl of the noble ones." The man went to the Jeta Grove, and —

One of the group of six had left the gate of the Jeta Grove unattended, so the Venerable Ānanda was walking and sitting at the gate of the Jeta Grove. The brahmin approached him, bowed at his feet, and said: "Noble one, my son is sick. Please grant us some bowl-rinse water of the noble ones." He replied: "Brahmin, wait here a moment; I will bring bowl water and come." He went to the monastery hall and poured into a bowl a little flour, a little cooked rice, a little broth, a little meat, and a little bone, then filled it with water and came back out, saying: "Brahmin, take this." When the brahmin saw it, he said: "Noble one, is this the kind of bowl-rinse water you have?" He answered: "Brahmin, it is exactly this kind." The brahmin then said: "Noble one, it would be better for my son to die than to be washed with such filth as this," and with that the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train not to dispose of food remains by pouring them into the bowl." Further, if someone wishes to request bowl-rinse water, the bowl shall be washed three times, and water from the bowl over which the sacred verses have been recited shall then be given.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Some monks were placing their bowls on ground that had no underlining support, and insects nested in them and were eaten along with the food. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train not to place the bowl on ground that has no underlining support."

Some monks were placing their bowls on the edge of a ledge, and they slipped and broke. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train to place the bowl where there is no ledge-edge."

Some monks were placing their bowls at a precipitous drop, and they slipped and broke. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train to place the bowl where there is no precipitous drop."

Some monks were placing their bowls on a steep slope, and they slipped and broke. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train to place the bowl where there is no steep slope."

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A monk was standing and washing his bowl, and the other monks said to him: "Venerable one, do not stand to wash the bowl." He replied: "What does it matter? It might slip and break, but what else would happen?" When they tried to dissuade him he would not relent, and the bowl slipped and broke. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train not to wash the bowl while standing."

On an occasion when monks washed their bowls over a drain and a bowl slipped, rolled, and broke, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train to wash the bowl not over a drain."

On an occasion when monks washed their bowls over a precipice and a bowl slipped, rolled, and broke, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train to wash the bowl not over a precipice."

On an occasion when monks washed their bowls on a steep slope and a bowl slipped, rolled, and broke, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train to wash the bowl not on a steep slope."

On an occasion when monks held their bowls against a swift current of flowing water to scoop up water, and the bowl slipped and was carried away by the current, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train not to scoop up water with the bowl against a swift current of flowing water."

The summary training rule is as follows: one shall train to pour the food remnants into the bowl and not throw them away; one shall train not to set the bowl down on a surface that has no support beneath it; one shall train to set the bowl down where there is no drain, no precipice, and no steep slope; one shall train not to wash the bowl while standing; one shall train to wash the bowl where there is no drain, no precipice, and no steep slope; and one shall train not to scoop up water with the bowl against a swift current of flowing water.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The group of six monks, teaching Dharma to a seated assembly while themselves standing, were rebuked by faithful brahmin and householder devotees, who said: "O noble ones, the Blessed One perfected the six perfections (pāramitās) through many hundreds and thousands of acts of austerity over three immeasurable eons and thereby attained unsurpassed wisdom — and you teach Dharma while standing to an assembly that is seated, showing no deference and no respect?" When the monks fell silent and said nothing in response, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train not to teach Dharma while standing to an assembly that is seated."

On another occasion, the group of six monks, teaching Dharma while seated to an assembly that was lying down without illness, were rebuked by faithful brahmin and householder devotees, who said: "O noble ones, the Blessed One perfected the six perfections through many hundreds and thousands of acts of austerity over three immeasurable eons and thereby attained unsurpassed wisdom — and you teach Dharma while seated to those who lie down without illness, showing no deference and no respect?" When the monks fell silent and said nothing in response, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train not to teach Dharma while seated to an assembly that is lying down without illness."

The group of six monks, without illness, were sitting on a low seat and teaching Dharma to those sitting on a high seat, and the faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "Noble ones, the Blessed One perfected the six perfections through many hundreds and thousands of acts of austerity over three immeasurable eons and thereby attained unsurpassed wisdom — and you, showing no deference and no respect, teach Dharma while seated on a low seat to those who are seated on a high seat?" When the monks fell silent and said nothing in response, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train not to teach Dharma while seated on a low seat to those who, without illness, are seated on a high seat."

The group of six monks, without illness, were walking behind those who were walking in front, and teaching Dharma, and the faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "Noble ones, the Blessed One perfected the six perfections through many hundreds and thousands of acts of austerity over three immeasurable eons and thereby attained unsurpassed wisdom — and you, showing no deference and no respect, walk behind those who are walking in front and teach Dharma?" When the monks fell silent and said nothing in response, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train not to teach Dharma while walking behind those who, without illness, are walking in front."

The group of six monks, without illness, were walking along the roadside and teaching Dharma to those walking on the road, and the faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "Noble ones, the Blessed One perfected the six perfections through many hundreds and thousands of acts of austerity over three immeasurable eons and thereby attained unsurpassed wisdom — and you, showing no deference and no respect, walk along the roadside and teach Dharma to those walking on the road?" When the monks fell silent and said nothing in response, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya for my śrāvakas is to be set forth as follows: one shall train not to teach Dharma while walking along the roadside to those who, without illness, are walking on the road."

The summary of trainings is as follows: one shall train not to teach Dharma while standing to those who, without illness, are seated; one shall train not to teach Dharma while seated to those who, without illness, are lying down; one shall train not to teach Dharma while seated on a low seat to those who, without illness, are seated on a high seat; one shall train not to teach Dharma while walking behind those who, without illness, are walking in front; one shall train not to teach Dharma while walking along the roadside to those who, without illness, are walking on the road.

The group of six monks were teaching Dharma to those without illness whose heads were covered, and the faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "Noble ones, the Blessed One perfected the six perfections through many hundreds and thousands of acts of austerity over three immeasurable eons and thereby attained unsurpassed wisdom — and you, showing no deference and no respect, teach Dharma to those whose heads are covered?" When the monks fell silent and said nothing in response, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

Therefore this is how the training rule in the Vinaya is to be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one must train not to teach Dharma to those without illness whose heads are wrapped.

The group of six monks were teaching Dharma to those without illness who had their garments pulled over their heads, and the faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "Noble ones, the Blessed One perfected the six perfections through many hundreds and thousands of acts of austerity over three immeasurable eons and thereby attained unsurpassed wisdom — and you, showing no deference and no respect, teach Dharma to those who have their garments pulled over their heads?" When the monks fell silent and said nothing in response, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: Therefore this is how the training rule in the Vinaya is to be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one must train not to teach Dharma to those without illness who have their garments pulled over their heads.

The group of six monks were teaching Dharma to those without illness who had their robes draped over one shoulder, and the faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "Noble ones, the Blessed One perfected the six perfections through many hundreds and thousands of acts of austerity over three immeasurable eons and thereby attained unsurpassed wisdom — and you, showing no deference and no respect, teach Dharma to those who have their robes draped over one shoulder?" When the monks fell silent and said nothing in response, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: Therefore this is how the training rule in the Vinaya is to be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one must train not to teach Dharma to those without illness who have their robes draped over one shoulder.

The group of six monks were teaching Dharma to those without illness who had their garments wrapped around their necks, and the faithful brahmins and householders rebuked them, saying: "Noble ones, the Blessed One perfected the six perfections through many hundreds and thousands of acts of austerity over three immeasurable eons and thereby attained unsurpassed wisdom — and you, showing no deference and no respect, teach Dharma to those who have their garments wrapped around their necks?" When the monks fell silent and said nothing in response, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: Therefore this is how the training rule in the Vinaya is to be proclaimed for my śrāvakas: one must train not to teach Dharma to those without illness who have their garments wrapped around their necks.

The condensed sūtra of the training rules is as follows: one must train not to teach Dharma to those without illness whose heads are covered, who have their garments pulled over their heads, who have their robes draped over one shoulder, who have their garments wrapped around their necks, or who have their garments wrapped around their shoulders.

The group of six monks were teaching Dharma to those without illness who had their hair tied up in a topknot, and the faithful brahmins and householders —

— were criticizing them, saying: "The noble ones, after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, who have their hair tied up in a topknot?" And when those brahmins and householders fell silent, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one must train not to teach Dharma to those without illness who have their hair tied up in a topknot."

The group of six monks were teaching Dharma to those without illness who wore hats, and the faithful brahmins and householders were criticizing them, saying: "The noble ones, after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, who are wearing hats?" And when those brahmins and householders fell silent, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one must train not to teach Dharma to those without illness who are wearing hats."

The group of six monks were teaching Dharma to those without illness who wore turbans, and the faithful brahmins and householders were criticizing them, saying: "The noble ones, after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, who are wearing turbans?" And when those brahmins and householders fell silent, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one must train not to teach Dharma to those without illness who are wearing turbans."

The group of six monks were teaching Dharma to those without illness who wore garlands on their heads, and the faithful brahmins and householders were criticizing them, saying: "The noble ones, after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, who are wearing garlands on their heads?" And when those brahmins and householders fell silent, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one must train not to teach Dharma to those without illness who are wearing garlands on their heads."

The group of six monks were teaching Dharma to those without illness who had their heads wrapped, and the faithful brahmins and householders were criticizing them, saying: "The noble ones, after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, who have their heads wrapped?" And when those brahmins and householders fell silent, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya:

One shall train in not teaching Dharma to a sick person whose head is wrapped. The condensed rule of training is: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to a sick person who has their hair in a topknot, who wears a hat, who wears a turban, who has a garland on their head, or whose head is wrapped.

The group of six monks then taught Dharma to sick persons riding on elephants, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, riding on elephants?" And when those brahmins and householders fell silent, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to sick persons riding on elephants."

The group of six monks then taught Dharma to sick persons riding on horses, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, riding on horses?" And when those brahmins and householders fell silent, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to sick persons riding on horses."

The group of six monks then taught Dharma to sick persons seated in a litter, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, seated in a litter?" And when those brahmins and householders fell silent, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to sick persons seated in a litter."

The group of six monks then taught Dharma to sick persons seated atop a vehicle, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, seated atop a vehicle?" And when those brahmins and householders fell silent, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to sick persons seated atop a vehicle."

The group of six monks then taught Dharma to sick persons wearing shoes, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence — without respect and without reverence, while wearing shoes?" they criticized. And when the monks fell silent and said nothing, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to persons who are not sick and who are wearing shoes."

The condensed rule of training is: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to persons who are not sick and who are riding an elephant, riding a horse, sitting in a palanquin, seated atop a vehicle, or wearing shoes.

The group of six monks then taught Dharma to persons who were not sick and who were carrying staffs in their hands, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, while carrying staffs in their hands?" And when those persons fell silent and said nothing, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to persons who are not sick and who are carrying staffs in their hands."

The group of six monks then taught Dharma to persons who were not sick and who were carrying parasols in their hands, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, while carrying parasols in their hands?" And when those persons fell silent and said nothing, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to persons who are not sick and who are carrying parasols in their hands."

The group of six monks then taught Dharma to persons who were not sick and who were carrying weapons in their hands, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, while carrying weapons in their hands?" And when those persons fell silent and said nothing, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: one shall train in not teaching Dharma to persons who are not sick and who are carrying weapons in their hands."

The group of six monks then taught Dharma to persons who were not sick and who were carrying swords in their hands, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, while carrying swords in their hands?" And when those persons fell silent and said nothing, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya:

"One shall train not to teach Dharma to one who is not ill and who is carrying a sword in hand."

The group of six, not being ill, taught Dharma to those carrying weapons, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, while carrying weapons in their hands?" And when those persons fell silent and said nothing, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: One shall train not to teach Dharma to one who is not ill and who is carrying weapons in hand."

The group of six, not being ill, taught Dharma to those wearing armor, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized them, saying: "The noble ones — after the Blessed One practiced austerities for hundreds and thousands of times across three immeasurable eons and perfectly completed the six perfections, thereby attaining unsurpassed wisdom — can it be that you teach Dharma to those who show no respect and no reverence, while wearing armor?" And when those persons fell silent and said nothing, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: One shall train not to teach Dharma to one who is not ill and who is wearing armor."

The condensed training rule is this: One shall train not to teach Dharma to one who is not ill and who is carrying a staff in hand, carrying a parasol in hand, carrying a weapon in hand, carrying a sword in hand, carrying war-gear in hand, or wearing armor.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upananda urinated and defecated while standing, and the faithful brahmins and householders criticized him, saying: "The noble ones — if the śrāvakas of the Teacher are people of moral shame, how could a śrāvaka without shame or modesty urinate and defecate while standing?" The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore shall my śrāvakas recite this rule of training in the Vinaya: One shall train not to urinate or defecate while standing when one is not ill."

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upananda went to the dwelling of a laundryman and said: "Good fellow, wash this robe and give it back to me." The laundryman said: "Noble one, you used to look after us in former times; since you no longer do so these days, why should I wash your robe and give it back?" Upananda said "Wait," and went away. He thought: "I shall make that wretch unhappy." So he took a purgative medicine, and when his bowels had moved, he filled a pot with filth and poured it into the laundryman's washing place. Early the next morning the laundryman arose and began to wash the robes, and as the stench of the filth arose, he rested his hands on his hips, inwardly seething with anger. Upananda, deliberately thinking of him, went to that spot and said: "Good fellow, why are you sitting there seething inwardly?" The laundryman replied: "Noble one, someone has poured filth into this washing place so that it cannot be used; now I am at a loss as to how I shall prepare the washing water." Upananda said:

"Poor fellow, do not be so displeased." When he had begun to scold that person, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya to be proclaimed for my śrāvakas is this: one shall train not to defecate or urinate into water when it is not frozen. The exception is when the water is completely frozen solid and there is no alternative. Just as with defecating and urinating, so too one shall train not to spit, blow mucus, vomit, or discharge phlegm into water. The same rule applies equally."

The buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Kapilavastu in the Nyagrodha Park. The venerable Upananda went to the gardener's garden and said: "Good fellow, give me a small bunch of flowers." The gardener replied: "Noble one, in former times you used to look after us, but nowadays you do not, so why should I give you flowers?" Saying "Wait there," the gardener went off, thinking to himself, "I shall make that poor fellow displeased." He then took a purgative medicine and, when his bowels had moved, he filled a basket with filth, and taking it with a broom, he scattered filth all over the flower garden and ruined every part of it. Attracted by the stench of the filth, foxes gathered there and ruined the garden further. Then early the next morning the gardener rose to pick flowers for sale and went to the garden, where he saw that the entire garden had been strewn with filth and eaten over by foxes and was entirely unfit for market. He stood there resting his hands on his hips, seething inwardly. Upananda, deliberately thinking of him, went to that spot and said: "Good fellow, why are you sitting there seething inwardly?" The gardener replied: "Noble one, someone has scattered filth all over this garden and made it entirely unfit for market; now I do not know how I shall make my livelihood." Upananda said: "Poor fellow, do not be so displeased." When he had begun to scold that person, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, the rule of training in the Vinaya to be proclaimed for my śrāvakas is this: one shall train not to defecate or urinate on ground where there is green grass when it is not frozen. The exception is when the ground is completely covered with green growth and there is no alternative. Just as with defecating and urinating, so too one shall train not to spit, blow mucus, vomit, or discharge phlegm onto ground where there is green grass. The same rule applies equally."

The condensed sūtra of training rules is as follows: one shall train not to defecate or urinate while standing when it is not necessary; one shall train not to defecate or urinate into water, or to spit, blow mucus, vomit, or discharge phlegm into water, when it is not necessary; and one shall train not to defecate or urinate on ground where there is green grass, or to spit, blow mucus, vomit, or discharge phlegm there, when it is not necessary.

The buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī a householder invited the Saṅgha of monks, with the Buddha at their head, to another home for a midday meal. It then fell to the venerable Upananda's turn to carry the roster-bowl for the duty-monk. He thought to himself: "What means could there be to cut short this duty-monk roster?" And he thought: "If someone were to ask me how far it is from Śrāvastī to the Jeta Grove, I shall tell him whatever I like and say to him in every way, 'Measure the ground with your steps.'" With that in mind, while the other was measuring the ground with his steps and walking very slowly, the duty-monk thought: "If he is delayed for a long time and I miss the meal it will not do — I had better look out." He climbed up into a tree and began to look, and when he saw the venerable Upananda coming very slowly and deliberately, he thought:

"From the way he is walking, I can see that he intends to cut short my meal." Realizing this, he climbed down from the tree and sat down. When the venerable Upananda arrived, the midday shadow had just passed, and Upananda said to him: "Venerable one, from the way you walked in such a fashion, it is clear that you deliberately caused me to miss my meal. How did you see me? I climbed up into a tree and looked." "Is it permitted for you to climb up into a tree?" "It may be permitted; it may not be permitted — but I did climb up." At that, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks are to train themselves not to climb trees." After the Blessed One had declared that monks are to train themselves not to climb trees, some monks who wished to do painting work did not know where to set up a plumb line, and so the Blessed One declared: "One may climb a tree to the height of a man. Therefore, monks are to train themselves not to climb a tree higher than a man's height." After the Blessed One had declared that monks are to train themselves not to climb a tree higher than a man's height, a certain monk was traveling through the wilds at night together with companions going the same way, following the path to a solitary hermitage, when a tiger appeared as a threat. His companions climbed high up into the tree and settled there. The monk climbed only to a man's height and stayed there. When the tiger arrived and drew near, his companions called out: "Venerable one, a tiger is here — quickly, climb higher!" He thought: "The Blessed One has not permitted climbing a tree higher than a man's height, so how can I climb higher?" And so he remained exactly where he was, and the tiger leaped up and killed him. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, my śrāvakas are to understand this as the rule of training in the Vinaya in this manner: except when harm arises, monks are to train themselves not to climb a tree higher than a man's height." The many rules of training are complete.

Summary verse:

Directly, by recollection, without intoxication — and likewise by the many, and by essential nature — like grass that is strewn, and also by acknowledgment.

To one who is fit to be tamed directly, taming is given directly. To one who is fit to be tamed by recollection, taming is given by recollection. To one who is fit to be tamed without intoxication, taming is given without intoxication. To one to whom many procedures are fit to be given, many procedures are given. To one who is fit to be sent to seek the essential nature of the matter, seeking the essential nature of the matter is given. To one to whom the manner of strewn grass is fitting, the manner of strewn grass is given. To one who is fit to make acknowledgment, acknowledgment is to be made. When disputes have arisen, they are to be tamed, quieted, and fully pacified in accordance with the Dharma, the Vinaya, and the Teacher's teaching by means of these seven procedures for settling disputes. The seven procedures for settling disputes are complete.

Patience is the supreme austerity and discipline — nirvāṇa is the highest, so the buddhas say.
One who has gone forth and harms others, who injures others, is no true ascetic.

In this world of the wise, who sustain life, just as the helpless and downtrodden fare — in the presence of beings endowed with sight — abandon all wrongdoing utterly.

Speak no slander, do no harm, be restrained in the rules of individual liberation, know also the measure in food,
and dwell in remote and secluded places.
Apply yourself to the higher mind —
this is the teaching of the buddhas.

Just as a bee, taking nectar from a flower, without harming its color or its scent, draws the fluid and flies away —
so let the Sage pass through a town.

One should examine what is fitting and unfitting for oneself — not looking to the discord of others, nor to what others have done or left undone. With care applied to the higher mind, train in the rules of restraint taught by the Capable One. The Protector who is ever mindful and fully pacified is free from sorrow.

Through generosity, merit grows abundantly. Through good restraint, enemies and the like do not arise. Endowed with virtue, one abandons wrongdoing. Through the exhaustion of afflictions, one passes beyond sorrow.

Commit no evil whatsoever, accomplish virtue in full perfection, tame your own mind completely —
this is the teaching of the buddhas.

Restraint of body is excellent, restraint of speech is excellent too, restraint of mind is excellent,
and restraint in all things is excellent.
The monk who is restrained in all things is fully liberated from all suffering.

Guard your speech and discipline your mind thoroughly, and commit no non-virtue with the body.
If these three pathways of action are thoroughly purified, you will attain the path proclaimed by the sages.

The buddha endowed with perfect vision, the crown-protrusion, protector of all;
the destroyer of cyclic existence, the golden sage, the radiant preserver; Śākyamuni, Gautama, the god of gods;
the unsurpassable guide of the untamed, the great charioteer — the supreme protector and guardian of the world;
these seven courageous buddhas, the illustrious ones, taught the individual liberation from bondage in its extensive elaboration.

In this, whatever buddhas there are, and the śrāvakas of the buddhas, are also respectful.
Since you have become endowed with this reverence, attain the unconditioned.
Undertake it and lift it up,
enter into the teaching of the buddhas;
and like a great elephant against a house of reeds, crush the ranks of the Lord of Death.

Here ends the Vinaya-vibhaṅga in full.

Here begins the Vinaya, volume ten.

- The verse "the buddhas who dwell in dependence upon it / regard it with reverence and honor it as their guru" refers to the well-known teaching that even the buddhas respect and abide by the Vinaya, a common encomium found in Vinaya preambles.

The phrase translated "this is both the Teacher himself and the treatise directly" reflects the classical Tibetan Vinaya hermeneutic in which the Vinaya is not merely a secondary treatise about the Buddha's teaching but is identified with the Buddha's own voice and presence, hence deserving double reverence — as both the Buddha and the Dharma simultaneously.

The phrase rendered "the Self-Arisen One himself" refers to the Buddha as svayambhū, the self-arisen, indicating that the praise of the Vinaya cited above was spoken by the Buddha himself.

• The list of meal-types — porridge, soup for drinking, regular turns, invited meals, eighth-day and fourteenth-day feasts, fish feasts, and small special visits — reflects a well-attested Vinaya-period catalog of monastic food-offerings; the specific items are rendered according to their standard contextual meanings rather than loan-words, as the Tibetan itself is already a translation of Indian categories.

The phrase rendered "something improper" translates "ma bya ba" literally "something not to be done / something unbecoming," left deliberately vague because the text itself is building narrative suspense; the exact nature of the incident is clearly to be disclosed afterward.

- The phrase rendered "women's treasure," "women's dowry," and "substance that is women's domain" translates three distinct Tibetan terms for categories of a woman's personal property or inheritance; the exact legal nuances of these categories in the Vinaya context are not fully recoverable from the Tibetan alone, but the general sense is clear.

The expression "lunar signs are favorable" renders a phrase literally meaning "the time has arrived and she is accompanied by lunar signs," which likely refers to a woman's fertile period as determined by lunar reckoning, a detail relevant to the narrative's purpose of enticing the monk back to lay life.

- The phrase rendered "a being in his last existence, one who seeks conduct, one who had grasped the essence of liberation, one oriented toward nirvāṇa" translates a cluster of epithets applied to Bhadradatta that are standard in Vinaya narrative to explain why his transgression does not constitute a full defeat: as a last-birth being already firmly set toward liberation, his lapse is treated with particular nuance in the subsequent commentary. The term translated "seed" throughout renders a Tibetan euphemism used in this Vinaya context for semen and the act of conception.

- The name Sāvana is a reconstruction from the Tibetan "sa bon pa," which means "seed-person" or "he of the seed." The Sanskrit original is likely Bijavana or a similar compound; "Sāvana" is a placeholder rendering.

The phrase rendered "announced by name the offering of gifts" translates a technical expression for a formal proclamation made at occasions such as birth feasts, in which the names of donors and the amounts of their offerings are publicly declared. The syntax of the entire passage in which Śyāmā makes this announcement is notably compressed and indirect in the Tibetan.

The final sentence is incomplete in the source text as provided.

- The phrase rendered "the gods of the sense faculties and those with faculties close by" translates इन्द्रियदेवा इन्द्रियैर्गन्तव्यदेवा इन्द्रियैर्गन्तव्यदेवा, which likely refers to specific classes of gods associated with the faculties (Indriya-class devas); the precise referent is not entirely certain, though the general sense of divine veneration is clear.

The verse presents a minor doctrinal puzzle: the arhat says he "learned only after much procrastination" and "was greatly delayed in youth," which is a moment of self-deprecating reflection on the long path to his realization. This is consistent with the narrative context and requires no emendation.

The phrase rendered "liberation of mind and liberation through wisdom"

(𑀘𑁆𑀭𑀺𑀓𑀲𑀢𑀺𑀧𑀻𑀤𑀺𑀱𑀸𑀡𑀺𑀩𑀼𑀳𑀺𑀬𑀾𑀢𑀺𑀣𑀺) corresponds to the standard Pāli pair cetovimutti and paññāvimutti, a well-attested formulation in early Buddhist literature.

- The passage contains a slightly awkward internal sequence where the monks ask Śāṇavāsa whether he has any distress, he replies in what appears to be a merged construction, and then the narrative continues. The Tibetan grammar at that point is compressed; the translation follows the most natural reading of the dialogue, attributing "what is the mental distress that afflicts you?" as the monks' follow-up question implied by the structure, and his answer as the statement that follows. This is a minor structural ambiguity, not a doctrinal one.

The phrase rendered "inquire knowingly" translates a term literally meaning "to ask while knowing," a Vinaya formula describing the Buddha's rhetorical method of posing questions to which he already knows the answer, as a pedagogical and procedural device. This is standard Vinaya narrative convention.

- The tenfold list of benefits for establishing Vinaya rules is a standard canonical formula appearing across Pāli and Sanskrit Vinaya recensions. The rendering follows the standard ordering preserved in this tradition.

The phrase rendered "the act of unchastity — the way of sexual intercourse" translates a compound technical Vinaya term for sexual intercourse; the double rendering clarifies both its euphemistic and technical legal dimensions.

- The phrase rendered "from the words ... down to ... everything proceeds as before" is a standard Vinaya abbreviation indicating that the full stock formula for the Buddha's inquiry and rebuke is to be filled in from a previously recited passage; the translation follows the Tibetan's cross-referential convention faithfully rather than expanding it, since the preceding passage has already been rendered.
- The phrase rendered "a petition and an unshakeable act of four motions" refers to the formal Vinaya procedure of full ordination consisting of a request followed by aṃ (karmavācā) recited four times — this is standard Vinaya terminology. The passage notes that, in the context being commented upon, such a formal ordination ceremony is not what is meant; instead, the term "monk" refers to one who has overcome the afflictions (i.e., an arhat).

The term rendered "central-country person" (dbus pa) and "borderlands person" (mtha' 'khob pa) refer respectively to someone from the Madhyadeśa (the central Indic region where standard Sanskrit or Prākṛit was used) and someone from the border regions speaking a different dialect or language. The Vinaya ruling is that a surrender of training (the formal act of disrobing) is only valid if both parties actually understand what is being communicated.

The phrase "one who does not possess a tongue" (klag cor can) refers to a person without a functional tongue and thus unable to speak intelligibly — a condition recognized in Vinaya as invalidating the formal speech-act of surrendering the training.

- The term rendered "eater" (za ma) refers to a category of person sometimes identified in Vinaya literature as one who has committed certain acts that bar them from the monastic community; the precise referent is context-dependent and debated across Vinaya traditions. The term ma ning (paṇḍaka) refers to a person of indeterminate or non-normative sex or gender, a recognized disqualifying category in Vinaya law. The Mātṛkā (ma mo) refers to a matrix or proto-Abhidharma text, one of the traditional divisions of the canon alongside sūtra and Vinaya. The phrase "surrender to the abbot and preceptor" is an unusual formulation that the Vinaya commentarial tradition treats as nonetheless constituting a valid declaration of surrendering the training.
- The term rendered "eater" reflects a technical Vinaya category sometimes left untranslated in scholarly literature; the Tibetan "za ma" denotes a specific category of disqualified person in the ordination context, and keeping it as "eater" follows the convention established in the preceding passage.

The phrase rendered "motion and the three proclamations" renders the standard Vinaya formula for the formal act of full ordination consisting of one motion (ñatti) and three announcements (kammavācā), abbreviated in the Tibetan as "the request and the act of the four."

The list of verbal expressions near the end of the passage is left deliberately open, as the Tibetan text itself breaks off mid-enumeration; the translation faithfully reproduces this.

- The terms rendered as "with an interval" and "without an interval" translate technical Vinaya vocabulary describing degrees of bodily contact in the act, specifically whether there is an intervening barrier or not between the two parties, and whether ejaculation has or has not occurred. The fourfold permutation covering all combinations of these two variables is a standard analytical matrix in Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya commentarial literature. The rendering here follows the literal Tibetan while preserving the legal-technical sense.

The term rendered "damaged" for 傷損 refers in this Vinaya context to a woman whose physical integrity in the relevant passage is compromised, as opposed to 無損, "undamaged." The distinction carries different legal consequences for the severity of the offense, as shown by the shift from "defeat" to "gross offense" in the damaged-living case.

- The term rendered "pandaka" refers to a person of indeterminate or non-binary sex or gender as recognised in classical Vinaya literature; the Tibetan "ma ning" is the standard rendering of the Sanskrit "paṇḍaka." The term is left untranslated as it is a technical Vinaya category with no precise English equivalent.

The phrase "both openings of the wound" renders "rma'i sgo gnyis," literally "the two doors of the wound," which is standard Vinaya terminology for the two orifices applicable to male and non-binary bodies in this legal context.

- The passage lists permutations of the assault rules across all categories of ordained persons. The term rendered "female trainee" is śikṣamāṇā, a woman under probationary training between novice and full ordination. The phrase "holding him in suspense" translates a term describing forcible restraint combined with a state of uncertainty or helplessness on the victim's part; this is a standard Vinaya legal distinction. The four-stage analysis of entry, full insertion, withdrawal, and the residual case follows the canonical enumeration found in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition. The summary verse at the close of the second fascicle serves as a mnemonic for subsequent case rulings.

- The passage describes the first pārajika offense in the Vinaya: a monk engaging in sexual self-contact. The Tibetan "Pāṇasamādhivācī" is the Vinaya's technical formula for the offense of penetration, rendered here in the most restrained English compatible with accuracy and a general listener.

The name "लम्बाशक्ति" rendered as "Pendent" reflects a limb that hangs prominently — the canonical context makes clear this refers to exceptional physical endowment. Some translators use "Dangling" or leave it in Sanskrit (Skt. Lāmba or similar); "Pendent" is chosen as the most natural English equivalent for TTS delivery.

- The monk's offence described in the opening section belongs to a contested early Vinaya discussion about the scope of the first pārajika rule. The Blessed One's ruling, rendered here as "he incurs defeat the moment it is introduced," follows the standard Vinaya formula for a root downfall.

The merchant's name translates literally as "Joyful" (Tibetan Dga' bo); this is retained in translation since it functions as a proper name.

"Vaiśravaṇa" here is the deity of wealth (Skt. Vaiśravaṇa, also known as Kubera), used as a measure of superlative affluence; the phrase "endowed with the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa, a rival to Vaiśravaṇa himself" renders a common hyperbolic formula of Indic narrative prose.

The list of localised deities — grove gods, forest gods, crossroads gods, and so forth — reflects popular Indic folk religion embedded in the narrative. "Torma offerings" translates the Tibetan ritual term gtor ma, which in this Indic context refers to food oblations thrown or set out for spirit beings.

The gandharva (Tibetan dri za, literally "scent-eater") appearing as the third condition for conception reflects classical Indian Buddhist embryology, in which a gandharva is the intermediate-state being (antarābhava) that must be present and willing to enter the womb for conception to occur; this is a standard doctrinal point across Vinaya and Abhidharma sources.

- The name rendered as "Śobhānanda" is a reconstruction from the Tibetan "མཛམ་དགའ་" (mdzas dga'), meaning "Beautiful-Joy" or "Handsome-Joyful." The text explicitly glosses the name's etymology, so the Sanskrit reconstruction is reasonable, though the original Sanskrit manuscript form may have varied.
- The term rendered "crooked keys" (མཛམ་དགའ་མཛམ་དགའ་) likely refers to bent or hooked keys used for different types of locks; this is a standard detail in narrative literature describing treasury access, but the precise technical meaning is not entirely certain.

The phrase "will not leave a bad son behind" (མཛམ་དགའ་མཛམ་དགའ་མཛམ་དགའ་) is idiomatic and somewhat compressed; the sense is that Śobhānanda refuses to remain at home and thereby prove himself a worthless or idle son — he insists on demonstrating his worth through enterprise. The translation renders the idiomatic force rather than the literal syntax.

- The term rendered "beautiful courtesan" (literally "seller of form") is a standard classical Indic designation for a courtesan or prostitute; the name Bhādrāmukhī (here Tibetan མཛམ་དགའ་, "the Beautiful One") is given a Sanskrit form consistent with the narrative's setting. The price of five hundred kārṣāpaṇas reflects a standard classical Indian monetary unit retained as a recognizable technical term. The threefold obstacle-list — gambling, unsuitable women, and intoxicants — is a well-attested trope in Buddhist narrative literature for the dangers facing traveling merchants.
- The term rendered "women's seat" refers to a seat or couch kept in the courtesan's receiving quarters; the phrase is idiomatic and signals the intimacy of her hospitality rather than a gendered hierarchy. The kārṣāpaṇa is a standard silver coin of ancient India; it is left in Sanskrit as a monetary unit without a modern equivalent.
- The name rendered consistently as "Bāṇamālikā" (Tibetan: མཛམ་དགའ་) in the preceding translation corresponds here to a clearly distinct character — མཛམ་དགའ་ is the courtesan, while མཛམ་དགའ་ is Śobhānanda. These have been kept as established in prior rendering. The text breaks off mid-verse at the end of the passage; the translation faithfully reflects this open ending.
- The sentence where Bāṇamālikā speaks to Śobhānanda — "Will you not laugh with me here in the house? You may laugh at me if you wish — but stop. Let him not leave" — is syntactically compressed and slightly ambiguous in the Tibetan. The general sense is that she is inviting him to stay while simultaneously addressing an attendant not to let him leave. The rendering reflects the most contextually coherent reading.

The phrase rendered "a wild animal is not healed by another wild animal" is a proverbial saying whose precise doctrinal or contextual import is not entirely transparent; it appears to mean that Śobhānanda cannot be spiritually helped by remaining in the lay world he came from, and must instead rely on the monastic environment of Śrāvastī.

- The passage "མཛམ་དགའ་མཛམ་དགའ་མཛམ་དགའ་མཛམ་དགའ་" and its parallel constructions are deliberately formulaic and repetitive in the original. The rendering "free attachment from attachment, free aversion from attachment, free delusion from attachment" follows the literal structure: the Blessed One teaches liberation from desire, aversion, and delusion, with the phrase "free from attachment" functioning as a formulaic refrain describing the goal of liberation from each of the three poisons. The apparent redundancy in "free attachment from attachment" reflects a likely stock phrasing in the sūtra genre meaning something like "in order to bring about dispassion toward desire itself."

The episode of Bāṇamālikā's ruse involving the robe — pulling it in and out — is a classic double entendre used in Sanskrit Buddhist narrative literature. The physician's closing statement is left as an incomplete sentence in the Tibetan, functioning as a natural lead-in to the next section of the text.

- The name "Mañjudeva" renders བཤོ་རྒྱལ་པུ་ལོ་ཤེས་པ་ལྷ་མོ་, a Tibetan calque or translation name (meaning "delighting in beauty / the beautiful and joyful one"); this is consistent with the preceding passage's usage and kept uniform here.

The passage on the defeat rule — drawing outward and inward — reflects a technical Vinaya discussion of the pārajika offense related to sexual intercourse; the somewhat opaque phrasing about "what produces outflow drawing outward and discharging inward" and vice versa follows the standard Vinaya casuistry for defining the act and is rendered as literally as readability allows.

- The phrase rendered "take possession of the touch" translates a legal Vinaya formula about whether a monk consciously appropriated or claimed the physical contact, which determines culpability for a root defeat. The monk's defense is that he was asleep and did not willingly receive the contact, and the narrative is clearly building toward a ruling on this point.

The "sixty-four arts" is a standard Indian literary reference to the traditional sixty-four erotic or courtly arts attributed to guild and courtesan knowledge. The old woman's wry claim that the monk "knows sixty-five" is a joke at his expense, treating his unconscious passivity as a superior skill.

- The phrase rendered "with all due solemnity" at the very end translates a term of formal or ceremonial intent. The passage breaks off mid-sentence here; the householder appears to be beginning a formal declaration of his intention to give the oil as a meritorious offering, and the translation reflects that natural ending point without forcing a closure.
- The creature name transliterated here as "uddzating" renders the Tibetan phonetic approximation of a Sanskrit or Prakrit term for a class of small insects, perhaps a kind of ant or biting insect. The exact identification is uncertain; no standard Sanskrit equivalent is recoverable from the Tibetan alone, and the rendering is kept phonetic throughout for consistency.

The term rendered "rags" for "dam dum" refers specifically to the patched or discarded cloth garments worn by ascetic monks, a recognized category of robes in Vinaya literature.

- The passage narrates the classic Pāli and Sanskrit cosmogonic account of the world's dissolution and reformation, closely paralleling the Aggañña Sutta. The term rendered "earth-essence" is a literal translation of the Tibetan compound meaning the nutriment or essence of the earth, corresponding to Sanskrit bhūmi-rasa. The phrase "resorting to the eating of solid food" renders the Tibetan for the transition from a subtler to a coarser mode of nourishment, marking the beginning of beings' degradation. The name Śubhākara for Kalandakaputra Bhadrājī (Tibetan Bzang byin) in the opening frame is a standard equivalence; the Tibetan literally means "Fortunate Gift" or "Well-Given," corresponding to Sanskrit Subhākara or Bhadrājī — either is defensible.
- The flower compared to the color of the earth-cream is the kuṅkuma, a term for saffron or a saffron-colored flower, here retained as a recognizable comparison for the golden-yellow hue described. The two exclamations, rendered "Alas, the essence!" and "Alas!" respectively, represent two distinct Tibetan formulae that the text itself treats as fossil expressions whose original meaning is lost to later generations — a notable narrative detail the translation preserves. The word rendered "earth-cream" for sa zhag is distinct from the earlier "earth-essence" for sa'i bcud, marking a second and distinct phase of primordial food; this distinction is doctrinally significant in the cosmogonic sequence.
- The phrase rendered "Begone! Begone!" (Tibetan: pha song pha song) is the second of two archaic lament-cries preserved in the narrative. The first was "Alas! Alas!" (kye ma o). The text explicitly says the later generations do not know the original meaning of either cry, treating them as fossilized exclamations. "Begone!" reflects the sense of loss and expulsion implied by the context.

The rice described has the remarkable property that however it is threshed — morning or evening — it self-replenishes by the opposite session; this translation renders the Tibetan's careful back-and-forth formulation faithfully.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the close ("just as today —") in exact parallel to the preceding section; this is not an error but the text's deliberate structural repetition, left open as it continues in the next passage.

- The name rendered "Svāgata" appears in the Tibetan as "Bzang byin" (Skt. Svāgata or Supriya; here the son of Kalandaka). The identification with Kalandaka's son Svāgata is the standard reading in this Vinaya narrative context and is retained accordingly.

The phrase "khyim khyim" is the Tibetan's own folk etymology for the word "house" (khyim), presented as arising from the repeated cry "Let us do it elsewhere." This etymological aside is retained as it is integral to the narrative.

"Dhanavatī" (Tibetan: Nor can, literally "possessing wealth") is the monk's name; "formerly a potter" (sngon rdza mkhan) is a consistent descriptor throughout the passage.

- The term rendered "housewarming festival" translates a Tibetan phrase meaning literally "a festival of the dwelling" — the context makes clear it is a ceremonial celebration of the completion of the newly built structure, analogous to a consecration or inauguration ceremony.

The word translated "bunch of keys" renders a Tibetan expression for a ring or cluster of keys, consistent with the image of a senior monk making an official round of the monastery's buildings.

The bandhujīvaka flower is the Pentapetes phoenicea, a vivid scarlet flower commonly used in Indian Buddhist texts as a simile for brilliant red color.

- The flower name "bandhujīivaka" renders the Tibetan's Sanskrit loanword ban dhu dzi ba ka, the Bandhujīivaka or Pentapetes phoenicea, a bright scarlet flower well known in Indian Buddhist literature as a simile for intense redness.

The monk's name is rendered "Nandaka" following the Tibetan nor can, which can mean "possessing wealth" and corresponds to the Sanskrit name Nandaka or possibly Dhanaka. The identification is standard in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya context.

The epithet "son of the Vaidehi lady who arose from Māgadadhā" translates the Tibetan lus 'phags ma'i bu ma ga dhār byung ba'i rgyal po ma skyes dgra, representing the Sanskrit Vaidehīputra Ajātaśatru of Māgadadhā. The syllable ma ga dhār / ma ga ngar varies slightly between two occurrences in the text but refers to the same king.

The sentence near the end breaks off mid-construction in the Tibetan, with the narrative suspended — this reflects the source text itself, which continues in the next passage.

- The phrase rendered "born of the Māgadhā lineage" translates the repeated epithet for Ajātaśatru constructed from the place-name Māgadhā (Tibetan: lu-phags-ma, i.e., "Vaidehi lady" from a different designation) together with the Gaṅgā river region notation. The text consistently uses two slightly variant transliterations of the same Indic phrase across the passage; these have been harmonized in translation. The term rendered "chief of the great timber-guard" versus "chief of the great city-guard" reflects a genuine shift in the Tibetan between ལུ་ཕག་མ་གྲོ་ལྷོ་རྒྱལ་པོ་ and ལུ་ཕག་མ་གྲོ་རྒྱལ་པོ་, and this distinction has been preserved.

- The royal epithet rendered throughout as "King Ajātaśātru, born of the Vṛji lineage through the Māgadhā branch" represents the long Tibetan form "Lus 'phags ma'i bu Ma ga dhā/nghā r byung ba'i rgyal po Ma skyes dgra," a formulaic compound identifying the king by maternal lineage and birthplace, corresponding to Sanskrit "Vaidehīputra Māgadhī-rāja Ajātaśātru." The slightly varying spellings of Māgadhā in the Tibetan (Ma ga ngh Ā vs. Ma ga dhā) are scribal variants for the same name and are harmonized in translation.
- The term rendered "Ārogya" is a Sanskrit greeting meaning "good health" or "hail," used as a respectful salutation. The Tibetan transcribes it phonetically.

The "wandering ascetic who accompanies monks from behind" refers to a lay or semi-ordained attendant who follows the monk's party; this is a specific Vinaya role.

- The term rendered as "people of indeterminate sex" translates a Tibetan term referring to a third-sex or intermediate-sex category recognized in Vinaya literature, sometimes left as the Sanskrit term paṇḍaka. The present rendering follows the doctrinal context without importing that technical term into the spoken narration.

- The māṣaka is a unit of weight and monetary value used in ancient Indian Vinaya contexts; five māṣakas is the threshold established in Vinaya literature below which theft does not constitute the pārāiika root downfall.

The two summary verses at the center of the passage are highly compressed mnemonic verses whose terms are unpacked in the prose analysis that follows. The translation renders them as literal as possible consistent with the prose exposition.

- The term māṣaka is a unit of weight and monetary value used in Vinaya contexts to establish the threshold for theft constituting a root downfall; it is left in Sanskrit as a technical legal term, consistent with its use in the preceding passage.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text; the translation reflects this cut-off faithfully.

- The term rendered "sack" translates a word literally meaning something like a bag or sack filled with grain; the subsequent discussion of "grain of a single color" versus "grain of many colors" confirms this reading. The distinction between "single case" and "separate cases" throughout this passage reflects a standard Vinaya legal principle: when the locus from which theft occurs is uniform and undivided, the act is counted as one offense; when it is divided or differentiated, each section counts separately for the purpose of assessing whether the threshold value for defeat has been reached.
- The summary verse is a mnemonic gāthā designed to enumerate and cross-reference the case-groupings treated above. Its compressed telegraphic style makes full syntactic rendering difficult; "secret mantras" here likely refers to the mnemonic verbal formulas used by redactors to mark sub-sections, not to tantric practice. The rendering preserves its function as a structural marker rather than attempting to impose a narrative sense that the original does not support.

The term rendered "basket" throughout continues the referent established in the preceding passage. The term rendered "white donkey" is a standard example-animal in Vinaya property lists.

- The term rendered "food-lure ornament" translates an ornament used to attract birds with food as bait, an important legal distinction in this Vinaya passage: whether the monk intends to steal from the bird or from the human owner determines the category of offense. The text carefully tracks this intentional dimension.

"Kalavinka" renders Tibetan shang shang te'u, a bird famed for its melodious song, often identified with the kalavinka of Indian literary tradition.

"Serious offense" renders nyesbyas and "grave offense" renders nyepa sbompo, standard distinctions in Vinaya offense categories corresponding roughly to a duṣkṛta and a sthūlātyaya respectively.

- The ritual actions described — drawing a circle, planting khadira-wood pegs at the four directions, encircling with five-colored threads, kindling a fire, inserting fire-offering fuel, and reciting secret mantras — reflect a Vinaya context in which a monk performs a ritual divination or treasure-summoning rite. The passage is treating such ritualistic acts as constituting the "preparations" that generate the relevant offense level, parallel to the physical acts described in ordinary theft cases.

The term rendered "grave offense" throughout is the standard rendering for the Tibetan heavy transgression short of defeat, and "defeat" renders the root downfall that results in expulsion from the Saṅgha.

- The passage is a Vinaya legal analysis of theft applied to various surfaces and objects on which valuables may rest. The escalating sequence of offenses — misdeed, grave offense, defeat — reflects the standard Vinaya framework for the pārājika on theft, which requires both the completed act of removing an object worth a certain threshold value and specific stages of appropriation.

The term rendered "earth cutting" for རྩོམ་ཆུ་ refers to a prepared or leveled earthen surface, possibly a terrace or platform; the precise architectural meaning is context-dependent within Vinaya commentarial literature.

The summary verses are clearly mnemonic rubrics listing categories to be analyzed; they are rendered as verse accordingly.

- The passage describing the parts of the elephant's body used as cutting-off points for assessing the value of a lean or emaciated animal (jaw, nose, ears, ribs, waist, haunches) reflects a Vinaya convention of dividing the animal into value-zones when it cannot be assessed as a whole. This is a technical legal device specific to the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition.

The final summary verse is a condensed mnemonic (uddāna) listing cases to be treated in the section on boats that follows. The phrase rendered "consumption causing loss without ease" is elliptical in the Tibetan and signals a further sub-case (likely involving consuming goods from a boat under duress or resulting in harm) to be elaborated in the subsequent text.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic listing topics treated in the surrounding Vinaya passage; "the three kinds of boat," "the goose and the utpala," "born from water and born from dry land," "the hunter's use," and "the hateful fish" are topic headings for cases treated subsequently, rendered as faithfully as the compressed verse form allows.

The term rendered "refined gold ore" (sa le sbram) is a technical mineralogical term in this Vinaya context whose precise referent is uncertain; it likely denotes a type of gold-bearing mineral or alloyed silver ore. The term "spug" rendered as "red coral" is tentative; it may refer to a reddish gem-stone or precious material rather than coral specifically.

- The term "nameru" is left transliterated as it is an obscure botanical or material term whose precise referent is uncertain in the Tibetan Vinaya context and no standard Sanskrit equivalent is established with confidence here.

The phrase rendered "wrong deed" corresponds to the Vinaya technical category of a lesser offense below the threshold of a grave offense, and "grave offense" renders the technical category below a defeat. The defeat category (pārājika) entails permanent expulsion from the monastic order.

- The passage lists a sequence of preparatory acts leading up to theft. The Tibetan phrase rendered "causes it to rise from its seat" through to "causes it to go into the depths" appears to describe actions performed on a person (perhaps a servant or keeper) who is being manipulated in order to access the birds and ornaments, rather than actions performed directly on the birds. This interpretation follows the Vinaya's standard analysis of the theft rule, in which the preparatory chain of actions is analyzed step by step up to the moment of displacement. The phrase is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan and the referent is contextually implied rather than explicit.

The flower names in the second and third botanical sections are Sanskrit loanwords preserved in Tibetan transliteration. The rendering given follows standard identification in Indological literature: atimuktaka is a type of jasmine vine, campaka is a magnolia-family flower, varsika and mallikā are jasmine varieties, nava-mallikā is "new jasmine," and dhānuskari is a scented plant; yūthikā is another jasmine. Where identification is uncertain, the Sanskrit form is retained as the most accurate option.

- The asymmetry in offense levels between stealing the humans' water-share (defeat or grave offense) and stealing the animals' water-share (grave offense or wrongdoing) is preserved exactly as the Tibetan states it; this likely reflects the lower valuation of animal property in the Vinaya's threshold calculations, and is a genuine doctrinal point rather than a scribal error.

- The architectural sequence in the middle section — cell, corridor, upper floor, lower floor, gatehouse, outer steps, stairwell, terrace, dense enclosure, open ground — follows a precise Vinaya topography of a monastic building. The terms are translated according to their most natural monastic architectural senses; some ambiguity in the precise layout is possible but not consequential for the legal ruling.

The summary verses are metrically compact and function as mnemonic indices to the subsections; they are rendered as verse accordingly.

- The term translated as "sickle-share" renders a legal arrangement in which two parties divide a field's yield, demarcated by the cut of a sickle along a shared boundary line. The precise agricultural and legal technicalities of this term are somewhat uncertain in this Vinaya context, but the rendering captures the essential sense of a shared-division agreement over cultivated ground.

The phrase "boundary-tip meets boundary-tip" refers to the moment when an encircling boundary line is completed and closes upon itself, at which point the act of theft is deemed complete.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the supplied Tibetan. The translation renders it to that point.

The phrase rendered "the ferryman who cuts the boat-rope" translates a term for a particular kind of river-crossing extortionist or pirate who cuts a vessel's rope as a means of demanding payment; the precise nature of the role is idiomatic to the Vinaya context.

The "dismissal from the obligations of youth" and "dismissal from the obligations of a queen's retinue" are technical royal grants releasing the monastics from certain civic or court duties; the exact institutional content is not fully transparent from this passage alone.

- The phrase rendered "goods that have already passed through customs" translates a term literally meaning goods retrieved or passed through a weighing or toll station. The distinction the Blessed One draws is between goods weighed on behalf of others before passing the station (permitted) and monks actively retrieving already-cleared goods on the merchants' behalf (not permitted), which could imply complicity in tax evasion. This is a standard Vinaya narrative context.

- The term rendered "containers for small items" and "containers for small items" throughout translates a term meaning a small carrying pouch or side-bag worn when going on alms-round, distinct from the alms bowl proper. The term rendered "rifled through" or "searched through" conveys the merchants rummaging through the monks' vessels to retrieve the hidden goods. The phrase "keeping pure conduct" refers to brahmacharya, celibate and disciplined monastic life, used here to mean fellow monks on their rounds.

- The list of precious substances near the end presents some uncertainty. The terms "sa le sbram" and "rdo'i snying po" are not entirely transparent. "Sa le sbram" may refer to a type of grain or granary wealth rather than a jewel, and "rdo'i snying po" likely means a precious stone essence or a specific gem such as crystal or rock crystal; these renderings are reasonable but not fully certain. The passage ends mid-sentence, as the Tibetan text itself is incomplete at this point.

- The phrase rendered "adjudicator" translates the Tibetan term for a toll or customs official who weighs or measures goods (འཇུག་པོ་, literally one who deals with dice or weights used for measuring toll); it refers to a checkpoint toll-collector or customs weigher. The rendering "adjudicator" is an approximation; "toll-keeper" or "customs officer" would be equally defensible. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the provided Tibetan text, in the middle of the praise of the Blessed One.

- The phrase rendered "not limited to a particular time" translates the Tibetan "dus chad pa med pa," which is the standard Tibetan equivalent of the Pāli "akālika" — meaning the Dharma bears results immediately, not only at some future time. The translation given follows the traditional commentarial interpretation.

The "three bases of merit-making" refers to the Three Jewels, which are the primary objects toward which merit-making is directed. The passage is slightly elliptical in the Tibetan but the referent is clear from context.

- The phrase rendered "rubbing his two hands together" describes a gesture of bewilderment or emptiness, literally "making the two hands go around each other," indicating the monk searched his bundle and found nothing, then made an empty-handed gesture. This is a conventional narrative idiom for the moment of discovering a loss.

The customs-post episode turns on a specific Vinaya rule: a monk may not carry goods past a customs station without paying the due levy, since doing so constitutes a form of theft by means of the monastic robe as cover. The caravan leader resolves the problem by surreptitiously taking the cloth into his own declared goods, thus technically "stealing" it from the monk, so that no customs violation accrues to the monk. The ironic exchange between monk and customs officer and then monk and caravan leader illuminates this Vinaya technicality.

- The phrase rendered "serious offense" for "ལྷན་པོ་ལྟོག་པའི་མཇུག་པོ་ལྟོག་པའི་མཇུག་པོ་" is a Vinaya technical term indicating an offense of wrong-doing with aggravating circumstances; it is not a pārājika but a significant disciplinary infraction. The precise Vinaya category is left deliberately broad in the translation since the text itself does not specify a class here.
- The phrase rendered "goods subject to customs duty" translates the recurring Tibetan term ལྷན་པོ་ལྟོག་པའི་མཇུག་པོ་ལྟོག་པའི་མཇུག་པོ་ for dutiable or taxable goods being transported, consistent with the preceding passage's context about the customs post. The expression "anoint oneself with pressed cow-dung or wash with it" refers to a hygiene or medicinal use of cattle byproduct permitted under duress; the exact practical referent is somewhat opaque in the Vinaya context but the literal rendering is retained. The final sentence is left open as the Tibetan breaks off mid-scene, clearly continuing into the next passage.
- The phrase rendered "stitched just as it was" reflects the Tibetan sense that the cloth was bundled or folded but not cut and sewn into a proper robe. The word translated "bundle" is the same term used for the unstitched roll of cloth throughout.

The passage describing the north road as a place "where women behave lewdly at every turn" follows the Tibetan closely; it is likely a stock topos for an undesirable route rather than a precise geographical description.

- The term translated as "gaming supervisor" renders a compound that literally reads "one who knows all regarding dice." The phrase is the beginning of what appears to be a longer explanation about the city of Śrāvastī that is cut off at the end of this passage. The term rendered "white-robed robbers" refers to lay people or civilians who operate criminal schemes under the guise of respectability, a recognized stock phrase in this narrative literature.
- The phrase rendered "well-matched and splendid caravan" translates a term that literally means something like "a caravan of compatible purpose, fully excellent." This appears to refer to a caravan whose goods perfectly match the local demand, making it commercially ideal — a term from merchant vocabulary in this Vinaya narrative.

The gambler's final exchange turns on a proverbial idiom: asking whether a river flows against its course is Upananda's way of saying that food, once placed in a monk's bowl as alms, does not flow back to the giver — an implicit refusal dressed in rhetorical wit.

- The phrase rendered "strike a knife with my fist and pound grass into the stone of my own loom" is an idiomatic expression of frustrated anger whose precise force is difficult to determine. The Tibetan reads literally "I shall hit a knife with my fist and poke grass into my own warping stone," which appears to be a proverbial expression for self-defeating rage or resolving to take revenge regardless of cost to oneself. The sense of frustrated indignation is clear even if the exact idiom is opaque.

The phrase "with a touch of the head" in the merchants' mocking speech refers contemptuously to a token or nominal payment, implying that Upananda accepted a pittance rather than real compensation.

- The phrase rendered "show them the mark" refers to Upananda brandishing or displaying something as a demand token or sign of debt owed — the exact nature of the "mark" (Tib. mtshan ma) in this merchant-debt context is slightly elliptical in the Tibetan, but the narrative context makes clear it is a physical sign or token of the debt claim. No doctrinal uncertainty is involved; this is a Vinaya narrative passage.

The phrase rendered "slipping through the window so that the tax revenues are not collected" reflects a situation where gambling debtors are escaping without paying what is owed to the authorities, creating liability for the official dice-hall keepers.

- The phrase "dice of omniscience" versus "dice of wrongdoing" is a wordplay central to this passage. The Tibetan རྩོམ་པ་ལྟོག་པ་ལྟོག་པ་ and རྩོམ་པ་ལྟོག་པ་ལྟོག་པ་ appear to designate two different types of dice or dice-players — those who merely know the game thoroughly versus those who cheat. The rhetorical structure, with its repeated formulaic exchanges, is characteristic of Vinaya narrative and has been preserved intact. The name Arada Brahmadaṭṭa (འུ་ར་བླ་མ་དྲ་མ་དྲ་) is a royal name appearing in Vinaya narrative literature; it has been transliterated as given.

- The phrase rendered "those who practice cupping" translates a term for practitioners of a form of bloodletting or suction therapy using animal means, likely leeches or related creatures; the exact technical identity of "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" is uncertain. "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" may refer to cupping or to a specific regional healing practice, and "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" may denote practitioners of that art. The passage breaks off mid-explanation, as the text continues beyond what was supplied. The phrase "burned away" for "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" reflects the idiomatic Tibetan expression meaning that the conduct has been utterly destroyed or ruined, used here as a term of abuse.

- The passage on "cupping" practitioners is a continuation of the preceding unit and presents some difficulty. The worm-creatures being "intoxicated" by drinking various liquids is a technical reference to the use of vermicular creatures in a therapeutic practice resembling wet cupping, in which the creatures are induced to draw blood; the text's framing is slightly unusual and the precise procedure is not entirely transparent from the Tibetan alone.

The phrase rendered "beeswax-leaf wrapping" translates a compound referring to leaves of the zha-nye plant used as a lid or cover for a begging bowl; identification of the exact plant is uncertain, but context clearly indicates it is a leaf-covering for a bowl.

"Mules" for rnga-mo: the term standardly denotes female mules or asses; "mules" is used for readability.

- The verse summary is a mnemonic condensing a series of case-scenarios. Several items are allusive: "given by fine features and by wealth" likely refers to a scenario in which an item is donated or transferred on account of the donor's admirable qualities or material assets, and "knowing it to be one's own, one takes the bowl" refers to a monk taking a bowl he mistakenly or correctly believes belongs to him. "Undefeated, concealed by a companion" condenses two further case-types. The verse is intentionally telegraphic and its individual clauses only become fully clear in the prose that follows; this is standard for Vinaya summary verses.

The creature names in the list of many-legged creatures include two terms — rendered here as "beetles" and "crawling insects" — that correspond to partially transliterated Sanskrit or Prakrit terms in the Tibetan and whose precise zoological identity is uncertain. This is noted for scholarly completeness but does not affect the legal discussion.

- The phrase rendered "Are you going to remove your sandals merely at the sound of water?" is a Tibetan idiomatic expression meaning something like "why are you hesitating over a trifle?" or "why flinch at the mere prospect?" — the idiom of removing sandals at the sound of water (i.e., preparing to ford a stream one has not yet reached) conveys premature, unnecessary caution.

The names Sudarśana and Dhanadata are reconstructed from the Tibetan Mtshen bzangs and Nor gyis byin respectively: Mtshen bzangs = "fine marks / good appearance" = Sudarśana; Nor gyis byin = "given by wealth" = Dhanadata.

- The name rendered "Candragarbha" is given as Zla bas sbas in the Tibetan, which literally means "Hidden by the Moon" and corresponds more closely to Śaśigarbha or a similar Sanskrit name; the parallelism with Mi pham (Ajita) and the description of renown suggest these are stock character names. The rendering follows the literal Tibetan meaning.

The phrase "works for wages" renders gla rngans kyis las byed pa, a Vinaya technical term for a monk performing labor in exchange for material compensation — here contrasted with acting out of generosity or merit-seeking. The ruling that there is no offense when one takes an object believing it to be one's own reflects a standard Vinaya principle: criminal intention is required for a defeat-level offense involving theft.

- The name rendered in the preceding passage as "Ajita" corresponds to the Tibetan "mi pham pa," literally "the Undeclared," which is a standard equivalent of Sanskrit Ajita. The passage plays on this name when Ajita declares he would not deserve to be called "Ajita" if he failed to steal the robes — a pun on the name's meaning as "unconquered" or "invincible." This wordplay is preserved in the translation by keeping the name Ajita.

- The summary verse at the center of the passage is a condensed mnemonic listing the storyline topics of a cluster of Vinaya cases, in the traditional sūtra-vibhaṅga style. The name "Avasaṭha" is a proper name called out by the following nun to her companion; it appears to be an alternate name or epithet for the nun born in the east and is retained as-is since no Sanskrit normalization is certain.

- The term "avasatha" appears to be a Prakrit or regional dialect term for a storehouse or storage place; the nun uses it as a technical term native to her home region, which is why the Blessed One rules she has committed no transgression — the ruling turns on the doctrine that regional or dialectal usage does not constitute a violation of the rule. The Sanskrit reconstruction would be āvasatha, meaning a lodging, storehouse, or receptacle.

The phrase rendered "a term specific to language, a term specific to region, and a term specific to locality" represents a standard Vinaya triad of contextual linguistic qualifications that determine whether a given act constitutes a formal transgression.

The office rendered "rector" for the Tibetan dge skos corresponds to the Sanskrit karma-kāraka or karmadāna, the monastic officer responsible for the proper conduct of the community's formal acts.

- The phrase rendered "conquered all that is to be conquered" translates nram par rgyal bar bya ba las nram par rgyal ba, a standard Vinaya epithet for an arhat. The first occurrence names the category of attainment (what is to be conquered) and the second affirms its completion.

The term bskas / sbyar here rendered "sesame oil" is 'bru mar, literally "grain oil" or "seed oil," most commonly sesame in Indian context; the rendering is standard.

The phrase bgam par bya'o, rendered "I want to find out" or "I should test/find out," carries a sense of deliberate testing or exposing — the young woman suspects and wishes to ascertain whether his motives are impure. The word bkam can mean "to examine, test, expose"; this reading governs the episode's logic.

- The phrase rendered "those of the last month of autumn" translates a name meaning roughly "those active in the final month of the autumnal season," apparently a specific gang of thieves identified by the time of year they were most active. The precise idiomatic force of this epithet in the original social context is uncertain, but the literal rendering is transparent enough for the listener.
- The Tibetan "འཇམ་མགས་ལུ་འཇམ་མགས་ལུ་" is a standard rendering of the Sanskrit Anāthapiṇḍada, the famous lay patron whose name means "feeder of the unprotected." The text uses it as a proper name throughout, so it is retained as Anāthapiṇḍada rather than translated.

The prince "འཇམ་མགས་ལུ་འཇམ་མགས་ལུ་" literally means "nobly born" and here functions as the Tibetan rendering of Ajātaśatru, the crown prince later notorious as a parricide. The same term is used both for the prince and, confusingly in places, appears in compounds suggesting his army. The identification with Ajātaśatru is consistent with the narrative context of Śrāvastī and Kośala under Prasenajit.

- The phrase rendered "the group of six monks" refers throughout to the notorious ṣaḍvargika monks, a stock group of ill-disciplined monks frequently appearing in Vinaya narratives. The names Nanda and Upananda are two of that group's members.

The term translated "Ārokya dwelling" appears to be a proper name for a specific residence in the monastery. The passage's Vinaya procedural terminology — suspension from residence, full residence, satisfaction, expulsion — reflects technical āpatti and formal-act categories; the precise Sanskrit equivalents (pravāsa, parivāsa, mānatta, nāsa) are supplied by context from standard Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya procedure.

The final sentence's list of procedural acts is a formulaic Vinaya inquiry about who may legitimately preside over or perform these monastic legal acts, and the translation renders the series as closely as the Tibetan syntax allows.

- The phrase rendered "miscreants of the last month of autumn" translates a term for a particular class of criminals known by the season in which they were active. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, and the translation reflects that continuity break faithfully.
- The epithet of King Bimbisāra rendered here as "one of handsome form, essence of the splendid" follows the Tibetan འཇམ་མགས་ལུ་འཇམ་མགས་ལུ་, a standard Tibetan rendering of "Bimbisāra." The Sanskrit name Bimbisāra is typically understood as "one possessed of a handsome/distinguished body," and the Tibetan is a calque of this; the translation renders the Tibetan literally while flagging the proper name. The passage's identification of the king as "the king of Magadha who came from Magadha" is slightly redundant in the Tibetan; this has been smoothed in translation without loss of meaning.
- The phrase rendered as "disciples of the last month of autumn" translates a Tibetan term for a group or sect defined by the last month of autumn — likely a specific non-Buddhist ascetic group; the identification is not fully transparent from the Tibetan alone but is rendered consistently with the preceding context.

The phrase "send them into a hollow" for "dong la 'chags su gzhug" is idiomatic and uncertain; it may refer to a disciplinary confinement procedure within the Vinaya context.

- The epithet applied to King Bimbisāra throughout this passage is "Bimbisāra of Magadha, the skilled craftsman of form" — a somewhat unusual royal designation. The Tibetan "bzo sbyaṅs gzugs can sñiṅ po" renders what is likely a Sanskrit name or epithet meaning roughly "skilled in craft, the essence of bodily form." This appears to be a variant rendering of the name Bimbisāra combined with an epithetic gloss; it is rendered here descriptively in accordance with the Tibetan without alteration.

- The phrase rendered "Seniya, son of the King of Magadha, a prince of fine appearance and handsome form" translates a Tibetan epithet that literally means "the king of Magadha of polished or refined form and excellent core" — this appears to be a proper name or compound epithet for the prince Seniya (Bimbisāra's son or a named prince). The exact identity and precise force of the Tibetan epithet "bzos byangs gzugs can snying po" (refined, well-formed, excellent one) is somewhat opaque; it may be a personal name or a descriptive epithet for the Magadhan prince. This does not affect the overall narrative.
- The names "lha-bong" and "tse-göd" are etymological folk-explanations embedded in the text for the Tibetan terms for "servant" and "groundskeeper" respectively. The text is presenting these as origin stories for the titles. The rendering preserves them as names without forcing an etymology into the translation body, since the Tibetan wordplay does not carry over into English.

The phrase rendered "the Last Month of Autumn" for "ston zla tha chungs" refers to the final month of autumn in the Indian calendar; "gyon can" meaning "left-handed" gives the gang's name a sinister connotation, which the translation preserves.

- The phrase rendered "those who sided with the last month of autumn" translates a recurring expression that appears to be an idiomatic designation for the thieves or a particular gang identified by a seasonal or ritual affiliation. The exact socio-cultural referent of "last month of autumn" faction is not entirely transparent from the text alone and may carry a specific local or monastic-legal meaning in the Vinaya context.

The figure "Ānanda" named in the final paragraph is identified by the Tibetan term "འཕྲུལ་པ་" which is the standard Tibetan rendering of Ānanda, the Buddha's attendant, though in this narrative context he appears to be serving as a temple attendant or sexton — a role consistent with Ānanda's portrayal in certain Vinaya narratives.

- The phrase rendered "the wicked ones of the last autumn month" translates a Tibetan expression for a group apparently identified by the final month of autumn; the exact identity of this social group is context-dependent and may refer to seasonal laborers or a specific caste designation in the Sanskrit original, which is not preserved here.

The phrase "opening the matter of the five classes of transgressions" renders a technical Vinaya expression concerning the five categories of offences; the precise procedural sense is preserved from context.

The passage shifts between direct speech and narrative rapidly in the original; paragraph breaks have been introduced for clarity in spoken delivery without distorting the text.

- The elder "Norchen" renders the Tibetan name meaning "possessor of wealth" — this is Pilindavatsa's interlocutor in the preceding narrative frame, presented here as the monk who first caused a blemish in the Saṅgha through an act of taking what was not given. The passage then transitions into a cosmogonic account that closely parallels the Aggañña Sutta of the Pāli canon, describing the dissolution and reformation of the world and the origin of craving from the tasting of earth-essence. The phrase rendered "taking what was not given" is the standard Vinaya formulation for the second pārājika offense. The term "film" renders the Tibetan word for the skin that forms on cooled liquid, here describing the primordial earth-crust.
- The Tibetan term rendered "growth" for the second food that appears after the earth-essence disappears is རྩ་, which in this cosmogonic context refers to a ground-growth or fungal-type substance that is the next stage of food in the world-formation narrative. Some editions gloss it as a kind of creeper or spreading growth. The translation "growth" is deliberately neutral to preserve the ambiguity.

The exclamation "Alas, the essence!" renders རྒྱུ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་, where རྒྱུ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ is a cry of lament or wistful longing and རྒྱུ་ means "essence" or "vital extract." The text itself then explains that later humans use this expression when finding delicious food, not knowing its original referent — a rare piece of folk etymology embedded in the sūtra.

- The passage is part of a Buddhist cosmogonic narrative describing the gradual decline of primordial beings and the emergence of food, social distinctions, and sexual differentiation — a narrative well-known from the Pāli Aggañña Sutta and its Tibetan parallels. The phrase rendered "It is gone! It is gone!" (ཡོད་པ་མེད་པ་མེད་པ་) is a lament of loss; the text explicitly explains it as an ancient idiom whose original meaning has been forgotten, just as "Alas! Alas!" (ཡོད་པ་མེད་པ་) was explained above. The sāli rice description — springing back when pressed — is a standard formulaic passage in this literature indicating miraculous, self-regenerating grain.
- The phrase rendered "victorious sovereigns" translates rgyal ba dbang po, literally "victor-lords." In context this appears to be a reference to righteous kings, with the Victor-epithet here applied to royal sovereignty rather than to buddhas. The sentence is somewhat abrupt in the original and may be a gloss or interpolation within the cosmogonic narrative; its precise doctrinal import is uncertain.

The repeated exclamation "Vile creature! Doing what should not be done" renders sems can ngan pa grong pa bya ba ma yin pa byed pa, a formulaic cry of social censure. The term grong pa here may indicate "village-dweller" or may carry a sense of "civilized being," so the cry could also be read as "Wicked creature, doing what a village-dweller should not do." The rendering adopted preserves the sense of social impropriety without over-specifying.

- The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text and the translation reflects this; the sentence about the sāli rice regrowing is clearly the beginning of a clause that continues in the following passage. The description of the grain as "four-fingered in size" renders རྒྱུ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་, literally "four finger-breadths," a standard ancient Indian grain measurement. The repeated lament is placed in direct speech as the grammar indicates the entire retrospective account is voiced by the assembled sentient beings. The phrase རྒྱུ་ལྔ་ (earth-film or earth-crust) follows the standard sequence in this cosmogonic narrative: earth-essence, then earth-film, then sprout-thickets.

- The passage contains a recurring exclamatory particle rendered "Hey, creature!" which is a colloquial address used throughout this cosmogonic narrative in the Aggañña Sutta context. The phrase translated "the boundary of property" renders a technical term indicating the first establishment of fixed ownership and territorial demarcation, which in the Pāli parallel (Aggañña Sutta, DN 27) marks the origin of the institution of kingship. The final sentence is left open as it leads directly into the appointment of the first king, which continues in the next passage.

- The phrase rendered as "honored by the many, honored by the many" reflects the etymological wordplay in the Pāli and Sanskrit traditions on the name Mahāsammata or its Tibetan equivalent, where the repeated formula explains the origin of the title through the act of being chosen and honored by the community. The repetitive phrasing is deliberate in the original.

The terms "secret mantra" and "Vedas" here render gsang sngags kyi gzhung and rig byed respectively. In this cosmogonic context, rig byed clearly stands for the Vedas, and gsang sngags kyi gzhung for esoteric brahmanical compositions. This reflects the traditional Buddhist account of the origin of brahmin learning, not a reference to Buddhist tantric practice.

- The phrase rendered as "one with a mouth" translates a term that literally means "having a beak or snout" and likely refers to a particular case or character in the Vinaya narrative to follow; the exact referent becomes clear only in context. The name Śīrikā is a proper name left untranslated as it appears to be the name of a specific person or case treated in the subsequent section. The verse summaries at the close are mnemonic tags for forthcoming case-law sections of the Vinaya-vibhaṅga, standard in this genre; they are rendered as verse accordingly.

- The final lines of Rubbing's speech present a lament in a rhetorical, almost rhythmic style. The reduplication of terms such as "empty, empty" and "worn thin" reflects an emphatic Tibetan grammatical pattern conveying progressive depletion; this has been rendered idiomatically in English while preserving the rhetorical force. The name "Nursing" renders the Tibetan name meaning one who tends or cares for the sick, and "Rubbing" renders the name associated with physical nursing through rubbing or massage; these are narrative character-names functional within the Vinaya case-story.
- The name "Śirikā" is a transliteration of the Tibetan "Shi ri ka"; the precise Sanskrit form is uncertain but this rendering is consistent with the preceding translation's conventions. The name "Lips" and "Nursing" and "Rubbing" are carried over from the prior rendering as established character names; these are likely functional translations of Tibetan monastic nicknames rather than Sanskrit proper names.
- The phrase rendered as "as close as the width of a silk cloth" and "as close as the thickness of a veil" translates two similes used to express how near and certain higher rebirth and liberation are for a person of good conduct — the Tibetan uses "dar gyis chod pa tsam" (cut off only by a silk cloth) and "yol bas bsgriba pa tsam" (obscured only by a curtain or veil). These are idiomatic expressions of proximity or near-certainty; the translation preserves the imagery faithfully.
- The phrase rendered "the discipline of the assembly" translates a term that may refer to a specific code or rule of conduct associated with the community — it may alternatively mean something like "the knowledge that gathers people" or "the lore of community life." The doctrinal or juridical sense here is not entirely clear, and the rendering is provisional.

The passage "the good years are only as much as a silk curtain drawn across them, and liberation is only as much as a veil drawn over it" is a highly compressed, gnomic utterance by Śīrikā justifying her desire for death. The imagery suggests that both favorable rebirth and liberation are fleeting or obscured, and life itself is therefore not worth continuing — this reflects a distorted view used to rationalize suicide, not a doctrinal statement endorsed by the text.

- The passage shifts between two distinct Vinaya episodes, each following the same formulaic narrative structure. The phrase rendered "outcast-like" translates a term literally meaning "like a caṇḍāla," referring to one of the lowest social groups; it is used here to characterize a mind of fierce craving or aggression as socially and morally degraded. The detail about the bowl being "fired" refers to the practice of firing clay bowls in a kiln to season and seal them, a standard procedure in the Vinaya. The translation ends mid-sentence as the Tibetan source passage ends mid-sentence.
- The name "𑖀𑖩𑖪𑖫𑖬" rendered here as "butcher" refers in the Vinaya context to one who slaughters animals — specifically a killer or slaughterman — and the simile is of aggressive, ruthless intent. The translation "butcher" is standard for this Vinaya image.

"□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□" literally means "he became endowed with the dharma of time," a standard Vinaya idiom meaning he died; rendered accordingly as "he met with what is the nature of time."

- The passage uses the third-person feminine pronoun strategy common in classical Tibetan narrative, where the wife speaks of herself in the third person as a rhetorical device of indirection and complaint. This is preserved in translation by shifting between first and third person as the Tibetan does, though it may sound unusual; it is an intentional stylistic feature of the original, not an error.

- The phrase rendered "a deer is not cured by a deer" is a proverbial expression whose precise import is somewhat opaque; it appears to mean that one should not return to the same familiar haunt that caused one's trouble, advising the newly ordained monk to avoid his former household domain. The interpretation given here follows the contextual logic of the surrounding instruction.

- The term rendered throughout as "child in the womb" (mngal na gnas pa) literally means "one dwelling in the womb," a standard Vinaya expression for a foetus. The phrase translated as "a wife's final break of estrangement" (bud med kyi khon tha chad) is somewhat compressed; it refers to a wife's definitive rupture or final declaration of grievance, used here as the kinsman's rationalisation that such an extreme estrangement will compel his elder brother to return. The repeated passage is a verbatim refrain in the Tibetan and has been translated consistently throughout.

- The name rendered "Doṇakṛta" here corresponds to ཏོན་ཆུ་རྒྱུ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་, a Tibetan calque meaning "the householder whose aim is well accomplished," i.e., Doṇakṛta or a similar Sanskrit name. Consistency with the preceding translation has been maintained.

- The narrative refers to the elder as "Sena" (rendered in the preceding passage as the elder brother figure, Tibetan སེ་མེད་ལྷ་མོ་), and to the young monk as "Kinsman" (Tibetan སྐྱེ་མེད་ལྷ་མོ་ for the younger figure). The Tibetan uses སྐྱེ་མེད་ལྷ་མོ་ for both the young monk and the elder, which creates ambiguity; context clarifies which is which. The preceding translation's convention has been preserved. The phrase སྐྱེ་མེད་ལྷ་མོ་ refers to kārṣāpaṇas, the standard coin of the period; rendered as "coins" for natural TTS flow.

- The phrase rendered "like the appearance of a white mushroom" translates a simile for something of unknown origin — a fungus that simply appears without visible cause. The point is that Sena is a stranger with no traceable connections, making the crime seem safe.

"Neyade" renders the Tibetan transliteration of the Sanskrit name Neyade (Tibetan: རྟེན་ལྷ་མོ་). In some canonical versions this figure is identified as a monk and arhat; the passage confirms he is an arhat by the remark about arhats not employing knowledge and vision without deliberate reflection.

The passage about the snake dying and being reborn repeatedly in successive locations is a karmic illustration: each rebirth in an ever-finer form and ever-closer proximity is the consequence of the dying Sena's wrong aspiration directed against the monk.

- The passage contains a classical Buddhist catechism of no-self, running through the twelve sense bases (the six internal sense faculties and six external objects), the six elements (earth, water, fire, wind, space, and consciousness), and the five aggregates, each stated in two forms: "X is the self" and "X belongs to the self." The Tibetan precisely mirrors the standard Pāli/Sanskrit formula found in Abhidharma-adjacent sūtra literature. The final verse set is incomplete in the submitted passage; the last verse breaks off mid-stanza and is rendered accordingly without fabrication of the missing lines.

- The verses identifying specific nāgas and beings by name present difficulties. Names such as Āṅkura, Lābu, Gautama (here a nāga name, not the Buddha), and epithets like "the swiftest" and "son born with a crest" appear to be names or epithets of specific snake or nāga beings in a traditional snake-protection list. Their exact identities are not always recoverable from the Tibetan alone, and the Sanskrit Vorlage would clarify them further. The rendering follows the literal Tibetan as faithfully as possible.

The phrase rendered "sentient beings that dwell in the throat" is unusual and may refer to serpents or creatures that inhabit hollow spaces or dens; the Tibetan literally says beings dwelling in the gullet or throat region, which may point to a specific class of creatures in the original context of the snake-protection charm.

The mantra syllables are transliterated as they appear and are not translated, as is standard for dhāraṇī material.

- The phrase rendered "solitary buddhas of inferior rank" translates a compound distinguishing lesser pratyekabuddhas from the highest type; the qualifier "inferior" or "of lower standing" reflects the Tibetan modifier meaning something like "lesser" or "mediocre" in the hierarchy of pratyekabuddhas.

The phrase "like a serpent king coiled at rest" translates a Tibetan expression for the posture of a great nāga lying in repose, used as a simile for a dignified seated meditation posture.

- The phrase rendered "a bodily reliquary stupa" translates the Tibetan term for a stupa built to house the physical remains of a holy being. The phrase "field of merit" renders the Tibetan "yon gnas yang dag par gyur pa," literally "one who has become a true basis for offerings," a standard epithet for a being whose spiritual attainment makes offerings to them especially meritorious. The closing identification of the hunter as "this very intimate disciple" refers to a specific member of the Buddha's assembly whose identity would have been made clear in the surrounding narrative context.

- The phrase rendered "my lord's son" in the wife's speech is a respectful form of address directed toward the merchant himself, using an oblique honorific construction common in classical Tibetan narrative prose. The wife is deflecting blame by framing her mistreatment as discipline befitting the heir of the household.

- The list of precious substances near the end presents some interpretive challenges. The rendering follows the most standard identifications: "gold" for sa le sbram (though this term can vary by context), "the essence of the earth" for rdo'i snying po (lit. "essence of stone," sometimes rendered as coral-essence or mineral essence), and "burnished metal" for spug. The "swastika" renders g.yas su 'khyil pa, literally "that which spirals to the right," a classical auspicious symbol in Buddhist iconography.

- The phrase rendered "invited for midday" translates an idiom about the midday meal offering; the word for "midday" here is literally "umbrella-shadow time," a classical Indic expression for noon. This is transparent enough not to warrant glossing in the body text but is noted here for completeness.

- The two similes "as close as a silk curtain" and "as near as a veil that merely covers it" render idioms describing the proximity of fortunate rebirth and liberation respectively. The Tibetan phrases use dar (silk cloth) and yol ba (a screen or curtain) as metaphors of something just barely separating the practitioner from the goal. The precise nuance is that only the thinnest barrier remains — the images are vivid but somewhat idiomatic, and different commentators read them slightly differently.

The name Skyong-ma is a Tibetan servant-name left in transliteration here since it functions as a proper name throughout the narrative; it means roughly "the guardian" or "the caretaker."

The passage breaks off mid-sentence in the source, as the instruction sequence is interrupted — this is not a translation omission but reflects the text as given.

- The phrase rendered "the higher realms will be fully covered with silk; liberation will be fully covered with a curtain" is highly idiomatic and its exact sense is obscure. The Tibetan literally reads that the higher realms are "cut off as if by silk" and liberation is "covered as if by a curtain," suggesting these goods are near yet veiled or just out of reach. The wife's speech appears to be a garbled or deliberately cryptic paraphrase of the monk's Dharma teaching, filtered through her grief and incomprehension, which is part of the narrative's irony.

The final sentence, "This, moreover, occurred before the time: the Blessed Buddha does not, in the Vinaya, lay down a rule of training for the hearers," is a standard Vinaya formula indicating that this incident is a precedent case preceding the formal promulgation of a rule, and the rule itself will follow in the next passage.

- The river name འབྲུག་ཆུ་ is the standard Tibetan rendering of the Varāṇā river (Skt. Varāṇā), distinct from Vārāṇasī; in some Vinaya recensions this passage is set at the Vaggumudā or a similar stream, but the Tibetan here reads Varāṇā and is rendered accordingly.

Migalandika (Tibetan: མི་གཤམ་ལྷོ་མ་) is a well-known figure from the Pārājika section of the Vinaya in connection with the rule on killing; the name is kept as a proper name throughout.

The phrase rendered "breathing out where they have not yet breathed out" is the literal Tibetan idiom for bringing relief or ease to those not yet at ease, a conventional expression in Vinaya narrative for conferring benefit; it does not refer to a physiological act.

- The phrase rendered "without breaking its flow" for the river translates a somewhat unusual descriptive. It may indicate the god came to the very bank or crossed without disturbing the current — the sense is that the god appeared at the riverside. This is a minor ambiguity and does not affect the narrative meaning.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, cutting off as Migalandika moves from dwelling to dwelling; the translation preserves this open ending consistent with the passage being a continuous excerpt.

- The epithet Migalandika appears in the preceding passage and is carried forward here consistently. The phrase rendered "breathe out" follows the Vinaya's idiomatic usage for relief from the burden of existence, preserved from the preceding context. The fourfold classification of monks at the close is a standard Vinaya analytical category; the fourth type, "the monk by reason of having subdued the afflictions," refers to the arhat who is genuinely a monk by virtue of having destroyed the mental afflictions.

- The term rendered as "water-blade" for རྩེ་ལྷོ་མ་ is uncertain. It may refer to a razor or a specific blade used with water; some Vinaya parallels suggest a razor. The translation preserves the literal reading.

The phrase rendered "one who has obtained, within the mother's womb, these six faculties" describes the defining criteria for "human being" in the Vinaya analysis: possession of the six sense faculties from conception is the standard Vinaya criterion for human status, relevant to determining the gravity of killing.

The phrase "fourfold formal procedure with a motion" renders the technical Vinaya term for the standard ordination act: a motion followed by three proclamations, which is the normative form of full ordination.

- The phrase rendered "as close as the span of a silk cloth" and "obscured only by a veil" are Tibetan idiomatic expressions indicating, respectively, how near a heavenly rebirth is and how close liberation is — meaning they are virtually within reach. The imagery is of a thin silk cloth barely separating one from a high realm, and a fine veil barely concealing liberation. These are stock rhetorical flourishes used in this Vinaya passage to entice the listener with proximity to good rebirths and liberation.

- The phrase rendered "extending a helping hand" translates a compound meaning literally something like "casting out the arm" or "extending the arm in giving," which is an idiomatic expression for the practice of generosity in action. The rendering follows the contextual sense within the list of virtuous qualities being praised. The list of the sick person's missing requisites — bowl, robe, net, cup, belt — follows standard Vinaya enumeration of a monastic's allowable possessions; "net" here likely refers to a straining cloth used to filter water, a standard item in monastic equipment.

- The technical list at the close of the passage describing what constitutes full ordination reflects the standard Vinaya legal formulary for defining the validity of the ordination act. The terms "initial examination" and "thorough examination" render a pair of procedural steps in the ordination ceremony; the Tibetan here uses terms equivalent to the Sanskrit vicāra and paricāra or similar procedural vocabulary, and the precise Sanskrit equivalents vary by recension.

The phrase rendered "a confused tangle of thoughts and hasty conclusions" translates two terms denoting mental agitation or vacillation and impulsive, unreflective speech; the exact nuance is somewhat difficult to render, but the sense is clearly one of foolish, unexamined utterance, which is the doctrinal point.

- The catalogue of weapons toward the end of the passage contains several technical terms for bladed or projectile instruments. The identifications of some items such as the saw-tooth type, the karavīra-leaf-shaped blade, and the bird's-beak blade are reconstructed from context and parallel Vinaya literature; their precise shapes cannot be determined with certainty from the text alone.

The term "ma ning" rendered throughout as "person of indeterminate sex" refers to a pandaka or person of a third gender category recognized in Vinaya literature; this rendering follows standard scholarly convention.

- The term rendered "person of indeterminate sex" translates ma ning, a Vinaya category for individuals who are neither fully male nor female; the Sanskrit equivalent is paṇḍaka in some contexts, though ma ning more precisely renders napuṃsaka or a related term. The precise referent varies across Vinaya traditions.

The phrase "inserts a stake up to its cross-piece" renders the Tibetan for driving a restraining peg or stake into the ground to fix the binding — a detail of the method of earth-binding being described. The exact implement is somewhat uncertain, but the sense is that the person is staked to the ground and left exposed.

- The term rendered "person of indeterminate sex" translates the Tibetan term for a third-gender category recognized in Vinaya literature, referring to those who are neither male nor female in the conventional sense, sometimes rendered "hermaphrodite" or "neuter person" in older translations. The rendering here follows standard modern Vinaya scholarship.

The phrase "ransom-seekers" renders a term for those who hold persons for ransom or extort release payments; the precise Vinaya sense is of persons who detain and demand payment for release. Some editions read this differently; the meaning is in any case a category of criminal or dangerous agent through whose action the death might be brought about.

The passage ends mid-enumeration, continuing into the next section.

- The passage describes an elaborate ritual for animating a zombie-like corpse (ro langs, Skt. vetāla) as a murder weapon, a topic treated in the Vinaya as a case study for the pārājika rule on killing. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the passage's end; it is part of a longer list of protective countermeasures that would prevent the zombie from killing its intended victim.

The phrase rendered "a scattering of mustard seed set out" translates mchig mchig gu dang bcas pa bzhag pa; the term mchig mchig gu most likely refers to mustard seeds or similar small grains used as a protective scatter, though the exact identification is mildly uncertain. The rendering "black wood" for nags kyi phreng ba (literally "forest-garland" or "garland of wood from the forest") may refer to a specific protective material; some commentators understand it as a garland made from the wood of a specific tree associated with cemetery rituals.

The verse summary at the center names the sub-cases of the killing pārājika covered in the surrounding prose sections: the zombie (ro langs), the half-zombie (ro langs phyed), pressing the side or flanks (dku mnyad pa), cutting off life, a precipice, water, fire, an emissary, and cold and heat.

- The list of "great sūtras" presents notable difficulties. The Tibetan titles given are formulaic names appearing in Vinaya literature for specific protective sūtras. "The Lesser Emptiness" and "the Greater Emptiness" correspond to the shorter and longer Śūnyatā-sūtras. "The Fifty-Three" refers to a sūtra known by its enumeration. "The Net of Illusion" is likely the Māyājāla. "Reception by the Embodied Essence" renders a title whose Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain. "The All-Pervading" and "the Non-Pervading" are standard paired titles in this context. The identifications of the remaining titles are conventional within the Vinaya commentarial tradition, but their precise Sanskrit equivalents are not always recoverable with certainty.

The term rendered "person of indeterminate sex" translates the Tibetan for a person who is neither clearly male nor female, corresponding to the Sanskrit category of a paṇḍaka or a related category in Vinaya classification; in context here it covers the full range of persons other than men and women.

- The passage on the "seven lines" drawn on the ground and the mantra recitation are part of a series of ritual-homicide scenarios involving sympathetic magic: mixing grains, transforming liquid to blood, sewing a patch, drawing lines. These are standard Vinaya casuistry enumerating progressively more indirect means of killing, and the legal outcomes follow the same two-tier pattern throughout: grave offence if the intended victim survives, defeat if death results.

The term rendered "met their end" for མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་ (literally "came to make the time / met their time") is a Tibetan idiom for dying; the rendering captures the sense without disrupting the legal formula.

- The passage describing cold-weather exposure is syntactically dense. The phrase rendered as "the eighth-day intervals of those months when piercing winds arise that let no light through" refers to specific calendrical cold periods in the Indian reckoning, identified by the arising of sharp, light-obscuring winds. The translation follows the most natural reading of the Tibetan enumeration of conditions.

The term rendered "bundle of grass" (ཁྲ་ཁྲ་ཁྲ་) can also refer to a handful or sheaf of dry grass or straw used as a crude instrument of torment in freezing conditions — the doctrinal point being that even so minor an act of aggravation, combined with lethal intent and exposure, triggers the full rule.

- The term kārṣāpaṇa (rendered phonetically from the Tibetan transliteration) is a standard Indian copper or silver coin unit; no gloss is strictly required but context makes it clear it is currency.

The phrase rendered "person of indeterminate sex" translates the Tibetan term for a third-sex or intersex individual (Skt. paṇḍaka or napuṃsaka), consistent with Vinaya usage.

The summary verse is a mnemonic verse (uddāna) cataloguing the preceding case-types; some category names are terse technical labels whose full referents are spelled out in the surrounding Vinaya prose.

- The term rendered "empty alms-bowl day" translates a phrase meaning literally "making the alms-bowl empty," which functions here as a technical term for a special day of work offered by monks in lieu of receiving alms — essentially a day when the monks labor for a lay donor and forgo alms-rounds. The precise nature of this institution is somewhat obscure; the translation follows the contextual sense throughout this passage.

The word rendered "pot-scraping tools" or "pot-scraper" refers to a scraping or scouring implement used in cleaning vessels; the exact implement is uncertain, but the narrative context makes the sense clear.

The king of Magadha named "𑒧𑒻𑒟𑒱𑒪𑒫𑒲𑒳𑒭𑒰𑒥𑒩𑒃𑒤𑒖𑒦𑒛𑒿𑒞𑒾𑒢𑒡𑒣𑒮𑒏𑒓𑒬𑒗𑒂𑒚𑒼𑒝𑒽𑒞𑒟𑒠𑒡𑒢𑒣𑒤𑒥𑒦𑒧𑒨𑒩𑒪𑒫𑒬𑒭𑒮𑒯𑒰𑒱𑒲𑒳𑒴𑒵𑒶𑒷𑒸𑒻𑒻𑒼𑒽𑒾𑒿𑓐𑓑𑓒𑓓𑓔𑓕𑓖𑓗𑓘𑓙𑓚𑓛𑓜𑓝𑓞𑓟𑓠𑓡𑓢𑓣𑓤𑓥𑓦𑓧𑓨𑓩𑓪𑓫𑓬𑓭𑓮𑓯𑓰𑓱𑓲𑓳𑓴𑓵𑓶𑓷𑓸𑓹𑓺𑓻𑓼𑓽𑓾𑓿𑔀𑔁𑔂𑔃𑔄𑔅𑔆𑔇𑔈𑔉𑔊𑔋𑔌𑔍𑔎𑔏𑔐𑔑𑔒𑔓𑔔𑔕𑔖𑔗𑔘𑔙𑔚𑔛𑔜𑔝𑔞𑔟𑔠𑔡𑔢𑔣𑔤𑔥𑔦𑔧𑔨𑔩𑔪𑔫𑔬𑔭𑔮𑔯𑔰𑔱𑔲𑔳𑔴𑔵𑔶𑔷𑔸𑔹𑔺𑔻𑔼𑔽𑔾𑔿𑕀𑕁𑕂𑕃𑕄𑕅𑕆𑕇𑕈𑕉𑕊𑕋𑕌𑕍𑕎𑕏𑕐𑕑𑕒𑕓𑕔𑕕𑕖𑕗𑕘𑕙𑕚𑕛𑕜𑕝𑕞𑕟𑕠𑕡𑕢𑕣𑕤𑕥𑕦𑕧𑕨𑕩𑕪𑕫𑕬𑕭𑕮𑕯𑕰𑕱𑕲𑕳𑕴𑕵𑕶𑕷𑕸𑕹𑕺𑕻𑕼𑕽𑕾𑕿𑖀𑖁𑖂𑖃𑖄𑖅𑖆𑖇𑖈𑖉𑖊𑖋𑖌𑖍𑖎𑖏𑖐𑖑𑖒𑖓𑖔𑖕𑖖𑖗𑖘𑖙𑖚𑖛𑖜𑖝𑖞𑖟𑖠𑖡𑖢𑖣𑖤𑖥𑖦𑖧𑖨𑖩𑖪𑖫𑖬𑖭𑖮𑖯𑖰𑖱𑖲𑖳𑖴𑖵𑖶𑖷𑖸𑖹𑖺𑖻𑖼𑖽𑖾𑗀𑖿𑗁𑗂𑗃𑗄𑗅𑗆𑗇𑗈𑗉𑗊𑗋𑗌𑗍𑗎𑗏𑗐𑗑𑗒𑗓𑗔𑗕𑗖𑗗𑗘𑗙𑗚𑗛𑗜𑗝𑗞𑗟𑗠𑗡𑗢𑗣𑗤𑗥𑗦𑗧𑗨𑗩𑗪𑗫𑗬𑗭𑗮𑗯𑗰𑗱𑗲𑗳𑗴𑗵𑗶𑗷𑗸𑗹𑗺𑗻𑗼𑗽𑗾𑗿𑘀𑘁𑘂𑘃𑘄𑘅𑘆𑘇𑘈𑘉𑘊𑘋𑘌𑘍𑘎𑘏𑘐𑘑𑘒𑘓𑘔𑘕𑘖𑘗𑘘𑘙𑘚𑘛𑘜𑘝𑘞𑘟𑘠𑘡𑘢𑘣𑘤𑘥𑘦𑘧𑘨𑘩𑘪𑘫𑘬𑘭𑘮𑘯𑘰𑘱𑘲𑘳𑘴𑘵𑘶𑘷𑘸𑘹𑘺𑘻𑘼𑘽𑘾𑘿𑙀𑙁𑙂𑙃𑙄𑙅𑙆𑙇𑙈𑙉𑙊𑙋𑙌𑙍𑙎𑙏𑙐𑙑𑙒𑙓𑙔𑙕𑙖𑙗𑙘𑙙𑙚𑙛𑙜𑙝𑙞𑙟𑙠𑙡𑙢𑙣𑙤𑙥𑙦𑙧𑙨𑙩𑙪𑙫𑙬𑙭𑙮𑙯𑙰𑙱𑙲𑙳𑙴𑙵𑙶𑙷𑙸𑙹𑙺𑙻𑙼𑙽𑙾𑙿𑚀𑚁𑚂𑚃𑚄𑚅𑚆𑚇𑚈𑚉𑚊𑚋𑚌𑚍𑚎𑚏𑚐𑚑𑚒𑚓𑚔𑚕𑚖𑚗𑚘𑚙𑚚𑚛𑚜𑚝𑚞𑚟𑚠𑚡𑚢𑚣𑚤𑚥𑚦𑚧𑚨𑚩𑚪𑚫𑚬𑚭𑚮𑚯𑚰𑚱𑚲𑚳𑚴𑚵𑚷𑚶𑚸𑚹𑚺𑚻𑚼𑚽𑚾𑚿𑛀𑛁𑛂𑛃𑛄𑛅𑛆𑛇𑛈𑛉𑛊𑛋𑛌𑛍𑛎𑛏𑛐𑛑𑛒𑛓𑛔𑛕𑛖𑛗𑛘𑛙𑛚𑛛𑛜𑛝𑛞𑛟𑛠𑛡𑛢𑛣𑛤𑛥𑛦𑛧𑛨𑛩𑛪𑛫𑛬𑛭𑛮𑛯𑛰𑛱𑛲𑛳𑛴𑛵𑛶𑛷𑛸𑛹𑛺𑛻𑛼𑛽𑛾𑛿𑜀𑜁𑜂𑜃𑜄𑜅𑜆𑜇𑜈𑜉𑜊𑜋𑜌𑜍𑜎𑜏𑜐𑜑𑜒𑜓𑜔𑜕𑜖𑜗𑜘𑜙𑜚𑜛𑜜𑜝𑜞𑜟𑜠𑜡𑜢𑜣𑜤𑜥𑜦𑜧𑜨𑜩𑜪𑜫𑜬𑜭𑜮𑜯𑜰𑜱𑜲𑜳𑜴𑜵𑜶𑜷𑜸𑜹𑜺𑜻𑜼𑜽𑜾𑜿𑝀𑝁𑝂𑝃𑝄𑝅𑝆𑝇𑝈𑝉𑝊𑝋𑝌𑝍𑝎𑝏𑝐𑝑𑝒𑝓𑝔𑝕𑝖𑝗𑝘𑝙𑝚𑝛𑝜𑝝𑝞𑝟𑝠𑝡𑝢𑝣𑝤𑝥𑝦𑝧𑝨𑝩𑝪𑝫𑝬𑝭𑝮𑝯𑝰𑝱𑝲𑝳𑝴𑝵𑝶𑝷𑝸𑝹𑝺𑝻𑝼𑝽𑝾𑝿𑞀𑞁𑞂𑞃𑞄𑞅𑞆𑞇𑞈𑞉𑞊𑞋𑞌𑞍𑞎𑞏𑞐𑞑𑞒𑞓𑞔𑞕𑞖𑞗𑞘𑞙𑞚𑞛𑞜𑞝𑞞𑞟𑞠𑞡𑞢𑞣𑞤𑞥𑞦𑞧𑞨𑞩𑞪𑞫𑞬𑞭𑞮𑞯𑞰𑞱𑞲𑞳𑞴𑞵𑞶𑞷𑞸𑞹𑞺𑞻𑞼𑞽𑞾𑞿𑟀𑟁𑟂𑟃𑟄𑟅𑟆𑟇𑟈𑟉𑟊𑟋𑟌𑟍𑟎𑟏𑟐𑟑𑟒𑟓𑟔𑟕𑟖𑟗𑟘𑟙𑟚𑟛𑟜𑟝𑟞𑟟𑟠𑟡𑟢𑟣𑟤𑟥𑟦𑟧𑟨𑟩𑟪𑟫𑟬𑟭𑟮𑟯𑟰𑟱𑟲𑟳𑟴𑟵𑟶𑟷𑟸𑟹𑟺𑟻𑟼𑟽𑟾𑟿𑠀𑠁𑠂𑠃𑠄𑠅𑠆𑠇𑠈𑠉𑠊𑠋𑠌𑠍𑠎𑠏𑠐𑠑𑠒𑠓𑠔𑠕𑠖𑠗𑠘𑠙𑠚𑠛𑠜𑠝𑠞𑠟𑠠𑠡𑠢𑠣𑠤𑠥𑠦𑠧𑠨𑠩𑠪𑠫𑠬𑠭𑠮𑠯𑠰𑠱𑠲𑠳𑠴𑠵𑠶𑠷𑠸𑠺𑠹𑠻𑠼𑠽𑠾𑠿𑡀𑡁𑡂𑡃𑡄𑡅𑡆𑡇𑡈𑡉𑡊𑡋𑡌𑡍𑡎𑡏𑡐𑡑𑡒𑡓𑡔𑡕𑡖𑡗𑡘𑡙𑡚𑡛𑡜𑡝𑡞𑡟𑡠𑡡𑡢𑡣𑡤𑡥𑡦𑡧𑡨𑡩𑡪𑡫𑡬𑡭𑡮𑡯𑡰𑡱𑡲𑡳𑡴𑡵𑡶𑡷𑡸𑡹𑡺𑡻𑡼𑡽𑡾𑡿𑢀𑢁𑢂𑢃𑢄𑢅𑢆𑢇𑢈𑢉𑢊

The phrase "योगसूत्रादयश्च" (the sūtra of the simile of the youth) refers to a specific discourse used to instruct Prasenajit; the precise sūtra is not identified in this passage and is left as rendered.

- The passage concerning "decoy horses" and the episode of the confederates turning back is somewhat narratively compressed in the Tibetan, and the precise tactical sequence is not entirely clear. The rendering follows the most plausible reading of the syntax. The name Āryajanman renders the Tibetan honorific epithet meaning "noble-born one" and is used here as a proper name or title for the military officer throughout.
- The repeated phrase rendered "died at the right time" translates the idiom of "falling to their time" — that is, dying at the moment determined by their karma. The satirical logic of Skyongma's reasoning is that by dying in this way the robbers would be reborn as infants and thus drink their mothers' milk, which she has apparently taken as a positive rebirth. The nuns' exclamation at the end is a formulaic rebuke, calling her one whose karmic share has run out — meaning a person of thoroughly exhausted merit who will fill her belly at the expense of others' misfortune. The name Skyongma is retained as a proper name; its literal meaning is "Protectress," which is ironic in context.
- The phrase rendered "born near Sārpaskṛta" reflects the Tibetan "sar pa skyes," a place name that is uncertain in its Sanskrit reconstruction; some witnesses read Sārpaskhr̥ta or similar. The rendering "died at the right time" throughout follows the Vinaya idiom for natural or timely death, not violent killing. The term rendered "disciplinarian" translates dge skos, the monk charged with ringing the gong and managing communal duties. The phrase "making noise" for ṭṛon byas renders a Vinaya term for a collective tumult or commotion, here suggesting boisterous group behavior. The tickling episode and its fatal outcome are standard Vinaya narrative elements establishing the involuntary nature of the resulting death, which is the doctrinal point of the passage.

- The compound rendered as "a defeat downfall" translates བཅའ་ལོལ་ལོལ་ལོལ་ལོལ་ལོལ་, which literally means "a downfall that has become a defeat" — that is, a pārājika, the most serious class of Vinaya transgression entailing expulsion from the Saṅgha. The contextual implication is that the monk who died was their companion bound by the same brahmacarya community, and his loss is described in terms of a Vinaya defeat because the tickling incident led to his death and thus to the irrecoverable dissolution of their group's integrity. The doctrinal and Vinaya framing here is slightly compressed and ambiguous in the Tibetan.

The list of drinks — ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་, ལྷ་ལྷ་, ལྷ་ལྷ་, ལྷ་ལྷ་, ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ — is rendered according to standard identifications in Vinaya commentarial literature: sugar-water or molasses drink, treacle, licorice decoction, ginger drink, and a drink made from Nepalese citrus, respectively.

- The personal names in the monks' speech — Varṣakula, Jina (འཇམ་མཉམ་པ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་), Nyingpa, Sāgā, and Mṛgadhāra — are reconstructed from the Tibetan epithets with reasonable confidence, but the exact Sanskrit forms of several of these minor figures cannot be established with certainty from the Tibetan alone. "Rin po che drang srong byin" rendered here as "the chaplain sage Jina" is uncertain; "bla mkhyen" may indicate a royal preceptor or chaplain rather than simply "sage."

- The phrase rendered "those with sinister intentions" translates a term referring to people with harmful or criminal intent, identified contextually as bandits or brigands who have been lurking in the area since earlier in the narrative. The word rendered "stacks" for ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་ is a textile term referring to folded or piled cloth; the exact form of storage is not entirely certain, but the sense of abundance is clear. The phrase "from a noble tree" renders ལྷ་ལྷ་ལྷ་, which likely refers to an auspicious or sacred tree near the stūpa, though the precise referent is contextually dependent on the broader narrative.

- The opening exchange is syntactically compressed and the referents shift rapidly between the elder and the man with sinister intentions; the rendering follows the most natural reading of the dialogue structure, assigning lines by context.

The phrase translated "masters of the throwing arts" renders the Tibetan idiom for skill in projectile or combat techniques; the precise martial art intended is not entirely clear from context.

The verse contains a standard formulaic eulogy of the Buddha; "steers the helm of discipline" renders the Tibetan idiom for guiding beings through the Vinaya.

- The series of noise-making instruments listed in the alarm passage presents some interpretive challenges. The terms gaṇḍī (a wooden sounding-board struck as a bell-substitute in monasteries), its small striker, and "time-wheel" are relatively standard Vinaya items. The remaining terms — snam sbyor, bdun pa, lnga pa, gtur bu, rgya cang, shur bu, lcag pod, and shur bu phre'u — are a sequence of textile or percussion items used for raising an alarm. The translation renders these by their approximate sense or size-designation where the precise referent is uncertain; this does not affect the doctrinal or narrative content.

- The list of terms for the ghaṇṭā and associated monastic objects is technically dense. The Tibetan here is functioning as a Vinaya narrative explaining the vocabulary of monastic implements to the thieves (and implicitly to the reader). The "time-wheel" (dus kyi 'khor lo) is a clepsydra or some form of time-measuring instrument used in monasteries. The verse spoken by the deity employs the term tsham ngam (rendered "confession ceremony" as equivalent to poṣadha in the preceding passage's established terminology) and plays on the double meaning: the thieves heard "tsham ngam" as the name of a weapon, not as the monastic restoration ceremony. This ironic misunderstanding drives the entire episode.

- Several proper names in the latter portion of this passage are compressed or partially corrupt in the Tibetan and difficult to identify with certainty. "Btsun mo phreng ldan ma" likely renders a queen's name, tentatively rendered here following a plausible reading; similarly "Rgyal rigs dbyar tshul ma," "Bla mkhyen drang srong byin," "Rnying pa," and "Ri dags 'dzin gyi ma" are royal and lay figures whose Sanskrit equivalents are uncertain. The rendering follows the most defensible reading of the Tibetan as given.

The phrase "clapping-sound" for "tsham ngam bya" reflects the sense of making a loud noise to frighten or alarm, as attested in Vinaya commentarial usage.

- The term rendered "signal board" is gandī (Skt. gaṇḍī), a wooden plank or board struck as a bell-substitute to summon monks; the gloss is given in the text by implication.

The phrase rendered "acts without interval" refers to the ānantarya-karman (Skt. ānantarya), the five heinous acts that lead without interval to hell rebirth, of which killing one's father is one. The passage turns on the ruling that no intention to kill was present, hence no actual downfall.

The list of articles — three robes, alms bowl, water strainer, bowl vessel, and needle-case articles — follows standard Vinaya enumeration of a monk's permitted possessions.

- The two net names, rendered here as "Broad-Movement" and "Great-Movement," translate Tibetan terms that are likely renderings of Sanskrit fishing-net technical vocabulary; the precise Sanskrit equivalents are not recoverable from context alone, but the sense of scale or sweep is clear.

The creature described as a "crocodile-fish of great size, like a rabbit" is a makara (the classical Sanskrit sea-monster), rendered here from the Tibetan. The simile "like a rabbit" most likely refers to its size being comparable to a rabbit — though in context a makara would be enormous; this may be a scribal or translation anomaly, and some editions may read differently.

- The six teachers named here, with Pūraṇa at their head, are the six heterodox teachers (tīrthika teachers) frequently mentioned in Buddhist canonical literature as contemporaries of the Buddha residing at Vaiśālī; the Tibetan reads "Pūraṇa and so forth, the six teachers," taking Pūraṇa (rdzogs byed, "Pūraṇa Kāśyapa") as the first of the standard list. The term rendered "mongoose" for gung gi mgo is philologically uncertain; the animal name gung in Tibetan most often denotes a mongoose, though some readings suggest a different creature.

- The list of hell realms names the standard eight hot hells and eight cold hells of Abhidharma cosmology. The cold hells are named after the sounds of suffering and the physical effects of extreme cold — including the utpala and lotus "split" hells — all standard Abhidharma enumerations. The Tibetan term rendered "sea-monster" throughout is chu srin, the makara (a mythological aquatic creature); "fish-species of the sea-monster" renders chu srin nya'i rigs, indicating a class of beings associated with that creature. The verse image of the "mother-cow of a vast herd" renders ra bams be'u la byams pa'i ba, literally "like a mother-cow's love for the calf of a great herd," a pastoral simile for boundless compassion.

- The list of divine heavens follows the standard Abhidharma cosmology of the desire realm and form realm. The sequence moves through the six desire-realm god realms and then through the form-realm Brahmā heavens, concluding with Akaniṣṭha at the summit of the form realm.

The phrase rendered "king of power" for the first wheel-turning king and simply "wheel-turning king" for the second reflects a distinction in the Tibetan between a chakravartin of great power and a standard chakravartin, though the precise doctrinal distinction between the two categories here may vary by commentarial tradition.

The final verse is incomplete in the passage as given; it ends mid-sentence with "For what purpose does the Steadfast One display a smile?" The Tibetan closes on the line beginning "brtanpa ci slad 'dzumpa ston mdzad pa," which is an open interrogative, indicating the verse continues beyond the supplied text.

- The passage contains a section heading marking the twelfth fascicle of the Vinaya Vibhaṅga (the Vinaya analysis text), which appears mid-narrative as a scribal division marker; it has been rendered in plain prose as is standard for TTS purposes.

The long series of retinue-similes presents several divine and mythological names that are rendered by Tibetan equivalents of Sanskrit originals. "Mignyi Zang" and "Thakzangri" are Tibetan renderings of nāga and asura kings; I have supplied the likely Sanskrit identifications (Varuṇa and Vemacitrin respectively) in parentheses, though the Tibetan epithets here are somewhat unusual in their precise application and the identifications, while standard, carry a degree of interpretive choice.

The phrase rendered "flying vessels" for grul bum is uncertain; the term can mean a kind of celestial conveyance or being associated with them, and the surrounding context of noble-born celestials supports this reading, though some editions read it differently.

- The term rendered "sea-monster" throughout is the Tibetan chu srin, a rendering of the Sanskrit makara, a mythological aquatic creature. "Sea-monster" is used here rather than the technical "makara" since the TTS context and the narrative flow benefit from a descriptive English rendering; a listener unfamiliar with the term would not lose the sense.

The passage "chu srin nya'i rigs" distinguishes between a broader class (makara-fish species in general) and what appears to be the adult, predatory members of that class. The translation renders the distinction as "adult fish-eating sea-monsters" versus their "young," following the contextual opposition between "chu srin byi ba gsod" (killing the young sea-monsters) and "chu srin nya'i rigs" (the sea-monster species).

The verse is translated metrically but freely, prioritizing natural spoken delivery over syllable-by-syllable correspondence.

- The final sentence of the Tibetan breaks off mid-construction, ending with an open conditional clause. This is a continuation prompt and the sentence is clearly incomplete; the translation renders it faithfully as an unfinished conditional, which the next passage will complete. The phrase rendered "in the gentlest way" translates bzhim bzangs, a term of endearment or gentle address; some editions read it slightly differently, but the sense of tender, gentle speech is consistent with context.

- The epithets applied to buddha Kāśyapa here are the standard ten epithets of a buddha in Tibetan Buddhist literature. The Tibetan name given is Kāśyapa rendered as ཀཤམ་པཎ་པཎ་, literally "protector of light," which is the standard Tibetan rendering.

The brahmin student lineage names — Kutsā, Bātsā, Śāṇḍilya, Bhāradvāja — are standard Vedic gotra names. The fifth and fifth-adjacent lineages likely refer to other well-known brahminical gotras. This passage appears to reproduce a stock narrative about brahmin students exchanging regional characterizations.

- The phrase rendered "struck with earthen pots shattered over their heads" follows the Tibetan literally: opponents are defeated by having ash-filled or dust-filled pots broken over them, a classical Indian debating-contest humiliation ritual. The image of the catapult fulcrum and the crow is a simile for keeping a great distance from a powerful adversary. The "bark strips, peeled sticks, ladles" and similar items are the standard ritual implements of brahminical students, carried as part of their equipment when traveling with a teacher. The final line — abandoning the root for branches and leaves — is a proverbial expression of concern about getting distracted by secondary gains while neglecting the primary purpose, setting up the narrative turn that follows.

- The proper name "Śerśkya Śīwa" renders the Tibetan "ཤེར་སྐྱེ་ཤི་བ་," a compound meaning roughly "Yellow-robe Tranquil." This appears to be a brahmin's personal name rather than a title, and is carried consistently throughout. The term "ལྔ་བཅའ་མཐོང་གི་རྒྱུ་" rendered as "five hundred arguments drawn from the tantras" could alternatively be read as "five hundred verses of a connected chain of reasoning" — the word "tantra" here likely refers to a connected literary or argumentative composition rather than a religious tantra in the esoteric sense.
- The list of brahminical disciplines and the "six duties of a brahmin" reflect standard Sanskrit learning as catalogued in Buddhist canonical descriptions of brahminical education. The term "ritsa" is a transliteration of a Sanskrit word whose exact identity is uncertain from the Tibetan alone; the text itself treats it as an obscure or archaic term whose meaning has been lost, which is itself the narrative point.
- The phrase rendered "stream of learning" translates the Tibetan term for lineage or mental continuum in the specific sense of a cultivated scholarly and moral character inherited through training — it functions here as an honorific description of the Kāśyapa renunciants' depth and breadth of learning and conduct. The four-line verse is a standard Buddhist formulation of impermanence appearing in several canonical sources. The phrase "grounds of defeat" refers to formal rules of debate in which certain failures, above all the inability to reply, constitute a formal loss.
- The verse posed by the monk is a classic riddling gathā whose terms — lakes, road, turning back, cessation — are doctrinal metaphors. "Lakes" likely refers to the sense-pleasures or the world (saṃsāra as a pool one eventually must leave), "road" to the path, and the last two lines to nirvāṇa. The text breaks off mid-sentence ("and he thought:"), consistent with the passage ending at a natural continuation point, not a genuine lacuna.

The phrase rendered "stream of learning" translates a term (rgyud rgya chen po, rgyud zab mo, rgyud bzang po) that literally means "continuum" — broad, deep, and good. In this context it refers to the monks' depth and breadth of scriptural learning and mental cultivation, not to tantra; "stream" captures this naturally.

- The closing sentence is cut off mid-speech in the passage as given; the translation renders precisely what is present and halts at the same point without completion.

The phrase rendered "sages of noble speech" (drang srong smra ba) is a particular community or settlement of brahmin debaters; the epithet combines "sage" (r̥ṣi, drang srong) with "those who speak," indicating learned debaters. This is kept consistent with the preceding passage's rendering "settlement of the debating sages."

- The phrase rendered "tail-head" (ཐིམ་རྩེ་) is literally "one with the head of a tail" or "tail-headed," an unusual insult in the series; it may refer to a specific animal not readily identified, or it may simply be an abusive coinage meaning something like "creature-head." It is kept literally as "tail-head" since no better identification is available.

The term སྦྱོང་གློ་མེད་ is rendered "owl's head" following the most common Tibetan lexical identification of སྦྱོང་ as a type of owl or night-bird, though the exact species is uncertain.

- The phrase rendered "water-monster fish" translates a compound indicating a fearsome aquatic creature — likely a crocodilian or large predatory fish in the tradition's imagination; the Tibetan does not specify further, and no single English animal name is adequate.

The progression of attainments listed — heat, summit, acceptance, and supreme mundane Dharma — are the four stages of the path of preparation (prayogamārga), a standard doctrinal sequence leading into the path of seeing. This context confirms the passage is drawing on abhidharma scholastic categories of spiritual progress.

- The phrase "twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" renders the standard Abhidharma and Madhyamaka formula: the view of a self in the transitory collection (Sanskrit satkāyadr̥ṣṭi) is said in commentarial tradition to have twenty subsidiary peaks or aspects (five aggregates, each grasped in four ways as self or belonging to self). This is doctrinally precise and not an error.

The final line is syntactically incomplete in the source, trailing off mid-sentence. It is rendered as it stands; the passage evidently continues beyond what was supplied here.

- The verse on karma not perishing over a hundred aeons is a well-known canonical verse appearing in Pāli and Sanskrit sources. It is rendered here in its standard four-line form.

The phrase rendered "karma to be experienced in the very life in which it is born" and "karma to be experienced in another turn of lives" translates two technical karmic categories: karma whose result is felt in the present life versus karma deferred to subsequent lives.

- The phrase "crossing over rivers" and "passing beyond conditionings" are idiomatic Indic expressions for transcending saṃsāra and its causal network; the rivers are a standard metaphor for the floods of defilement, and "conditionings" renders saṃskāras in their sense of the binding formations of cyclic existence.

The section heading "Vinaya Vibhaṅga, thirteenth fascicle" marks a textual division in the Tibetan canon's Vinaya material; it interrupts the narrative in the source but is retained here as it appears in the text.

- The phrase rendered "the Lord of Sages" translates Thub pa'i dbang po, literally "the lord/master of the sages/ascetics," a standard epithet of Śākyamuni. The continuity of this rendering should be maintained throughout.

The village name 'Od ma can (Āmra-kāra or Ambagāma) refers to a locality associated with a mango grove near Vaiśālī; the exact Sanskrit reconstruction is uncertain among scholars, but the mango grove setting is clear from the text itself.

The phrase rendered "worn down by begging for alms" (bsod snyoms kyis nyon mongs pa) literally means "afflicted or troubled by alms-round," conveying that the hardship of seeking alms in famine conditions would exhaust and harm the monks; this idiomatic rendering captures the sense.

- The sequence of perceptions listed here is a classical enumeration of contemplative objects found in Āgama literature, including the ten or more "cemetery contemplations" (the bloated corpse and so on) embedded within a broader list of meditative perceptions. The eight liberations mentioned at the close are the standard Āgama list of vimokṣas culminating in the liberation of one who is "freed in both respects" (ubhayatobhāgavimukta), meaning liberated both through the formless attainments and through insight — a well-established Abhidharma category.

- The series of "perception of" terms in the first paragraph is a standard Pali and Sanskrit meditational list. The later items — bloated, festering, worm-infested, gnawed, devoured, blood-red, scattered, and bones — are the classical set of cemetery contemplations (aśubhabhāvanā), here rendered consistently with their established meanings.

The village name rendered from the Tibetan as "Pūrvavideha" (literally "the village of Āmrāpālī" or a cognate) is uncertain; the Tibetan reads "village of those who abandon the surrounding area of Vaiśālī," which likely refers to Āmrāpālīgrāma or a similar locale near Vaiśālī. The exact identification is not certain from the Tibetan alone.

- The village name rendered phonetically as "Spongbyed" is a Tibetan place name (literally "the village that eliminates" or "the village of renunciation") appearing untranslated in the source; it is likely a proper name for a particular settlement and is rendered consistently as such throughout.

The long series of perceptions toward the end of the passage constitutes a standard Vinaya list of meditation objects, several of which (the bluish-discoloured, festering, bloated, worm-eaten, devoured, reddish, scattered, and bones) are the classical set of cemetery contemplations on corpses in various stages of decomposition, well attested in Pāli and Sanskrit Vinaya literature. The rendering follows the standard doctrinal enumeration.

- The phrase rendered "liberated from both sides" renders "gnyis ga'i cha las nram par grol ba," referring to the technical category of "liberation in both respects" (ubhatobhāgavimukta in Sanskrit), meaning liberation through both the formless absorptions and through the destruction of the defilements — a standard arhat category in Abhidharma literature.

The passage "whether accurately or inaccurately; inaccurately" reflects the Tibetan "ci yang dag pas sam / yang dag pa ma yin pas / yang dag pa ma yin pas so," which appears to be a Vinaya formulaic phrase indicating the proclamation was made falsely. The repetition is deliberate and preserved.

- The phrase rendered "the supreme human quality" translates a compound meaning "the distinction surpassing the human" — a stock Vinaya term referring to meditative attainments, superknowledges, and realizations such as the absorptions and noble paths. The rule being promulgated here is the fourth pārājika (defeat), the rule against falsely claiming superhuman attainments.

The final sentence breaks off mid-clause as it does in the Tibetan, transitioning into the next passage.

- The passage shifts mid-way from third-person narrative about other monks into first-person plural report by the forest monks themselves addressing Ānanda. This shift is faithfully rendered; the structural repetition is a deliberate literary device in Vinaya narratives and is preserved in full. The Tibetan phrase "འདྲིམ་ཁུང་གི་འགྲོ་ཁུང་" refers to lodgings at the edge of a town or village, in contrast to forest hermitage lodgings — both terms are consistently rendered throughout. "འདྲིམ་ཁུང་གི་འགྲོ་ཁུང་" literally means novices associated with or frequenting a place of pleasure or festivity; this is rendered as "novices who frequented pleasure groves," which reflects the likely sense of novices not maintaining strict ascetic separation from lay society.

- The phrase rendered "supreme human Dharma" translates "མཐོན་མཐོན་མཐོན་མཐོན་མཐོན་མཐོན་" — a standard Vinaya technical term (Skt. uttari-manuṣyadharmā), meaning a dharma surpassing the ordinary human level, referring to meditative attainments, superknowledges, and the like. The full compound lists six qualities: supreme human Dharma, attainment of something noble and distinguished, knowing, seeing, touching, and entering — these represent the standard Pāli and Sanskrit Vinaya enumeration of what one falsely claims. The phrase "edges of haystacks" or "straw-stack edges" renders "འགྲོ་ཁུང་," a less common dwelling-type in Vinaya literature; the term refers to the margins of threshing grounds or haystacks used as makeshift shelters, a recognized category of forest or remote dwelling.

- The phrase rendered "conceited presumption" translates a technical Vinaya term for the case where a monk sincerely but mistakenly believed he had attained a superhuman realization. This is the classical exception in the pārājika analysis: false speech about attainment made in genuine self-deception does not constitute the full defeat, whereas deliberate fabrication does. The structure of the passage follows the Vinaya commentary genre of word-by-word exegesis of a pārājika rule.

The phrase "eunuchs, hermaphrodites, and those of indeterminate sex" renders a standard Vinaya triad. The point is that nirvāṇa, while achievable by humans, is inaccessible to beings in the lower realms entirely — the commentary is establishing the soteriological scope of "human quality."

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, repeating the list of beings in the final clause, so the translation follows it exactly and leaves it incomplete accordingly.

The terms rendered here require brief clarification: "garuḍas" translates nam mkha' lding, the great sky-soaring birds; "gandharvas" translates dri za, the scent-eaters; "kinnaras" translates mi'am ci, the "what-are-they" beings, semi-human celestials; "great serpents" translates lto 'phye chen po, a class of large serpentine beings; "kumbhāṇḍas" translates grul bum, a class of spirits often described as gourd-shaped; "putrescent ones" and "body-putrescent ones" translate srul po and lus srul po respectively, classes of charnel-ground spirits; "flesh-eaters of charnel grounds" translates rdul khrod kyi sha za, carrion-eating beings associated with cremation grounds.

The phrase བཤམ་གྱི་ལཱ་རྒྱུ་ལྟོགས་པ་ is an honorific construction meaning to speak in a welcoming, cordial manner; "speaks graciously" captures this register.

- The sequence of charnel-ground perceptions (bloated, festering, putrefied, worm-eaten, devoured, blood-red, scattered, heap of bones) is the standard set of cemetery contemplations (aśubhabhāvanā) found in Vinaya and Abhidharma literature; the translation follows the traditional enumeration. The phrase "liberated from both sides" (gnyis kyi cha las rnam par grol ba) refers to liberation through both the meditative absorptions (the formless attainments) and through wisdom, a standard technical expression in the Vinaya commentarial tradition.

- The phrase rendered "speak of their comings and goings" translates the honorific construction literally meaning "speak of their arriving," used consistently for the gods and then extended by structural parallel to all the beings in the list. The honorific verb form is applied throughout even when the referents are charnel-ground flesh-eaters, which appears to be a deliberate textual irony or simply formulaic extension of the pattern.

- The phrase rendered "liberated in both respects" refers to one who is liberated both through the meditative absorptions and through insight into the destruction of the defilements — a standard Abhidharma category.

The expression "slight grasping at the defining characteristic of calm abiding" describes a meditator who has achieved some degree of śamatha but not the supramundane path; the "worldly path" here is the mundane meditative path that suppresses but does not eradicate afflictions. This distinction is doctrinally significant in Vinaya commentarial literature.

The descending series "from nāgas and yakṣas ... down to decomposing bodies" implies a graded hierarchy of supernatural and mundane visionary objects, found in parallel Vinaya enumerations; the full list is condensed in the text by the phrase "as before."

- The phrase rendered "speaks of their comings and goings" translates the honorific construction བཤམ་གྱི་ལཱ་རྒྱུ་ལྟོགས་པ་, literally "speaks of their having come" using the honorific verb ལྟོགས་པ་ for arrival. The context in each case is the monk claiming an intimate, ongoing relationship with supernatural beings — coming, going, conversing, rejoicing, and dwelling together — each level distinguished by whether the monk is described as the active party going to them, the passive party to whom they come, or a companion engaged in ongoing mutual association. The final grammatical inversion in the last block, where the gods are the grammatical subjects acting toward the monk rather than the monk acting toward the gods, is preserved in the translation as a meaningful legal distinction in the Vinaya listing.

- The passage lists a series of increasingly advanced attainments — from the perception of impermanence through the perceptions culminating in the "perception of individually discerning emptiness," then through the four dhyānas, the eight liberations, and liberation through both aspects (i.e., both the liberation of mind and the liberation through wisdom, cetovimukti and paññāvimukti in Pali terms) — each serving as a basis for the false claim. The translation breaks here mid-sentence as the source passage itself is incomplete at the end.

The "eight liberations" (rnam par thar pa brgyad) are the classical Abhidharma set of eight meditative liberations. "Liberation through both aspects" (gnyis ka'i cha las rnam par grol ba) refers to one who has attained both the formless attainments and the destruction of the outflows.

- The epithet "the third highest" applied to Mahāmaudgalyāyana reflects his traditional ranking in the canonical literature as the foremost in supernormal powers among the Buddha's disciples. The expression here likely means he is reckoned as the third supreme being after the Buddha and Śāriputra, or possibly alludes to a specific honorific ranking in this textual tradition. The Tibetan "འདྲེན་པ་གསུམ་པོ་འདྲེན་པ་" literally means "third among the supreme" or "the third best." This is a recognized epithet in Vinaya narrative literature and has been rendered accordingly.
- The phrase rendered "burned up your alms territory" is a metaphor for a monk whose behavior has so offended the local community that they no longer give him alms, effectively making the district spiritually "scorched." This is a standard Vinaya idiom. The passage at the end breaks off in mid-sentence in the Tibetan, consistent with a continuation in the next folio; no meaning is lost that is not already missing from the source itself. The "act of suspension" (Skt. ukṣepaṇīyakarman) is a formal Saṅgha act of censure applied to a monk who refuses to acknowledge a transgression.
- The phrase rendered "black alms-bowl" reflects the Tibetan "lhung bzed nag po," which in Vinaya context refers to an alms-bowl made of iron or lacquered black — the standard monastic bowl. The Group of Six's accusation is that Maudgalyāyana is not earning his keep as a legitimate monk, since his covering of transgressions undermines the Saṅgha. The exact polemical logic is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan and the translation follows the most natural reading.

The phrase rendered "scorched his sphere of conduct" translates "spyod yul bsregs pa," a vivid idiom meaning he has destroyed his own moral domain — rendering his presence harmful rather than beneficial to the alms-round community.

The opening enumeration of procedural options ("remained fully... be fully appeased... expelled") continues the formal Vinaya suspension-act terminology from the preceding passage and should be understood as part of that continuous legal deliberation.

- The phrase rendered "burned up your domain of alms" reflects the Tibetan idiom of having ruined one's alms territory through causing scandal or offense to lay supporters. The act described — suspension (Skt. ukṣepaṇīyakarman) — is a formal Vinaya procedure applied to a monk who refuses to acknowledge a transgression. The "five classes of transgression" refers to the standard Vinaya enumeration of offense categories. The expression "fully present" and related phrases translate technical Vinaya terms for categories of attendance and consent used in formal Saṅgha proceedings.
- The forests of Daṇḍaka, Kāliṅga, and Mātāṅga are named wilderness regions in classical Indian geography, here presented as places where rain is diverted away from inhabited land. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the beginning of the fifth cause, as the passage ends abruptly. The opening charge against Mahāmaudgalyāyana is condensed and somewhat elliptical in the Tibetan; the rendering follows the most coherent reading of a difficult passage in a clearly legal-procedural context. The phrase rendered "a transgression involving a physical fall" attempts to capture the ambiguity of the Tibetan; the precise nature of the offence is not specified in this passage and may be clarified in surrounding context.
- The phrase rendered "supreme among three" reflects the Tibetan "mchog gsum pa," which is an idiomatic expression meaning the third-furthest or foremost in a triad of superlatives — here referring to Mahāmaudgalyāyana's reputation as foremost in supernatural power among the Buddha's disciples. The exact nuance of "gsum pa" in this epithet is debated; some read it as "the third" in a ranking, others as a superlative of threefold excellence. The translation follows the latter reading as more contextually fitting given the qualities listed immediately after.

The exclamation rendered "Thank you" translates "a rog gya," a colloquial Tibetan expression of acknowledgment or thanks with no exact Sanskrit equivalent; the rendering conveys its social function in context.

- The phrase rendered "scorched our alms-round territory" translates a Tibetan idiom meaning that Mahāmaudgalyāyana's failed prophecy has so damaged the monks' reputation in Vaiśālī that the lay community no longer offers them alms — a concrete harm to the Group of Six's livelihood, which is their stated grievance.

The "act of formal suspension from residence" renders the Vinaya technical term for a formal ecclesiastical act removing a monk from his residential standing in the community on account of an unconfessed downfall. The specific Vinaya procedure alluded to here is a recognized disciplinary act, not a mere informal reprimand.

- The phrase rendered "claims for himself the highest human Dharma" reflects the Vinaya technical expression for falsely claiming superhuman attainments, a root downfall. The Group of Six's accusation here is thus a serious doctrinal and legal charge, even if presented somewhat absurdly in narrative context.

The four "domains not to be speculated about" is a well-attested teaching preserved in Pali parallels, where the four are identical. The Tibetan formulation here matches the canonical list closely.

- The phrase rendered "scorched his own domain" translates a Tibetan idiom meaning that by claiming extraordinary knowledge he has made his alms-round territory unworkable — the laity, having been misled, no longer support him with alms. The idiom is vivid and somewhat elliptical in the original.

The formal Vinaya procedure referred to throughout is the ukṣepaṇīyakarman, the act of formal suspension or exclusion from the Saṅgha carried out for one who refuses to acknowledge a transgression. The Tibetan gnas nas dbyung ba'i las is a standard rendering of this term.

The lake Anavatapta is the mythological cool lake in the Himalayas said in Buddhist cosmology to be the source of the four great rivers of Jambudvīpa; its waters are described in canonical sources as possessing exactly these eight qualities.

- The phrase rendered "the great unheated lake" refers to Lake Anavatapta (Skt. Anavatapta), the mythological cool lake in the Himalayas from whose waters the great rivers of Jambudvīpa are said to flow. The Tibetan འཇམ་བུ་པ་པ་ reproduces the Sanskrit name's meaning exactly. This identification is implied by context and standard commentarial usage; it is not stated explicitly in this excerpt but would be clear to any informed listener.

The phrase rendered "womb of the Dharma" for རྩམས་པུ་ལོ་འཇམ་བུ་པ་པ་ is an unusual idiom; it may connote the body of transmitted Dharma as something gestating and nurturing, which must not be prematurely cut open or disrupted.

The sentence regarding the black begging bowl is an accusation that Mahāmaudgalyāyana has abandoned ascetic practice while still claiming the authority of a great adept; the precise disciplinary implication may be that use of a plain black bowl marks an ordinary practitioner rather than one with verified supernormal powers.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, and the translation reflects this abrupt break faithfully.

- The phrase rendered "having dissolved the perception of form and being dissociated from the perception of sound" reflects a description of the meditative attainment of the base of nothingness, in which both visual and auditory perception are suppressed. The doctrinal point the Blessed One is making is that Maudgalyāyana heard the sound upon emerging from, not while within, that absorption — and therefore his declaration was not false, constituting no transgression.

The summary verse is a mnemonic listing the topics of the section just concluded and the sections to follow in this fascicle of the Vinaya Vibhaṅga; it is standard in Tibetan Vinaya literature and is rendered here as verse accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "draw off the seminal fluid" is a translation of the Tibetan describing masturbation; the Vinaya context makes this unambiguous, as the passage concerns the Pārājika offense. The Buddha's rebuke that follows confirms it. This is the standard account found in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya of the first Pārājika rule's origin story.

The phrase "they repel pointless action with a water-strainer" renders a simile about the buddhas' discriminating wisdom: just as a water-strainer separates what is useful from what is not, the buddhas filter out purposeless action. The Tibetan term translated "water-strainer" literally denotes a cloth or implement for straining liquids, standard monastic equipment.

- The term rendered "saṅghāvaśeṣa offense" (Skt. saṃghāvaśeṣa) corresponds to the Tibetan "dge 'dun lhag ma" — a class of Vinaya offense less severe than a root downfall (pārājika), requiring formal Saṅgha procedures for rehabilitation. This is standard Vinaya terminology and is rendered consistently throughout.

The name Cāraka at the opening corresponds to the Tibetan "Char ka" — the monk being rebuked in the preceding passage. The Tibetan "Kun dga' bo" is Ānanda, rendered as "Ānanda" consistently.

- The five colors of semen and their association with wheel-turning kings and their retinues reflect a scholastic elaboration found in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition. The cosmological and physiological categories here are technical to that Vinaya commentarial tradition and are rendered as literally as possible.

The phrase rendered "internal physical object" translates a term meaning something like "one's own body" or "an internal form" — that is, a physical sensation or bodily object used as the basis for the act, as opposed to an external partner. This reading follows the standard Vinaya commentarial understanding.

The threefold repetition of the paragraph on "desiring pleasure" with escalating levels of elaboration (effort alone, then adding holding tightly and firmly, then adding experienced pleasure) reflects the Vinaya's typical casuistic method and is reproduced structurally in the translation.

- The verse summary uses highly compressed technical Vinaya vocabulary. The term rendered "emanating fragrance" translates "ngad langs pa'i bde ba," literally "the pleasure of rising scent or vapor," a distinct category of sensation in this context. The three pleasures listed in the combined case are the three that appeared separately in the preceding two paragraphs plus the one from the passage prior to those, presented here together.

The final line breaks off mid-sentence in the source, listing a series of medical conditions, and the translation preserves this open ending faithfully. The list likely continues with further case rulings regarding diseased states, as is standard in this section of the Vinaya.

The term rendered "moving greatly" for "rab tu gar byed pa" could also be "dancing vigorously" since "gar byed" can mean dancing or moving rhythmically; however, in this Vinaya context it clearly refers to vigorous physical motion for the purpose described. The category "entering into a hollow" translates "sbubs su 'ongs pa," referring to semen that has entered a bodily cavity or tube, a standard Vinaya distinction.

- The verse attributed to Cāraka is terse and its precise referent is uncertain. The phrase rendered "kings tainted with poison and so on" translates a compressed expression; the verse appears to be a memento-mori or urgency-of-practice verse, warning that even royal deeds go unfinished at death. The final line of the passage breaks off mid-verse, as the Tibetan itself is incomplete at this point.

- The verse about the "poisonous creature in a crocodile's lair" is an unusual simile. The Tibetan "chu srin gnas kyī dug can pa" most naturally reads as a venomous creature that inhabits a crocodile's abode or perhaps a sea-serpent's den; the precise species-image is obscure, and the point of the verse is the contrast with the buddha's unwavering loving-kindness.

The phrase rendered "supreme leader of the herd pledged to the abode of great waves" translates a stock epithet of the buddha as a great bull-elephant, a standard image in the canon for one who stands firm in the midst of the ocean of existence.

- The phrase rendered "who among those who bear the victory banner of the patched robe was foremost in prophecy" opens with a participial phrase resuming the description of Kauṇḍinya from the preceding passage; the syntax is compressed but the referent is clear from context.

The expression "abandoned one supreme household" for the Mahākāśyapa section describes his renunciation of a supremely wealthy brahmin household. The figure "sixty million in property" reflects the Tibetan numeral literally.

"The Bamboo Grove Stūpa" renders a Tibetan term that likely refers to the Venuvana, the Bamboo Grove at Rājagṛha, associated with a site where Mahākāśyapa met the Blessed One and exchanged robes — a celebrated episode in the tradition.

"The son born from the womb of a foremost one" for Mahāmaudgalyāyana is a compressed epithet; the Tibetan "འཇམ་མཁའ་མཆོག་གི་བུ་ཡིན་པ་ལྟར་འདྲིན་པ་" suggests he is the son of someone of leading or foremost status, possibly referring to his high-caste brahmin parentage.

"The world-realm endowed with rays of light" is the Tibetan's rendering of a buddha-field; the seven-day journey by miraculous powers to this realm is a known narrative in the tradition.

- The phrase rendered "beds with hearts of calf" translates a term whose precise referent is uncertain; it likely indicates a type of sleeping mat or cushion stuffed with or shaped from calf material, possibly a technical term for a particular style of furnishing in the Vinaya context. The passage appears to be contrasting the rather worldly or sensuous appointments of Śāriputra's temple with his own conduct, since he is described as a person inclined to desire, though in context this likely refers to his pre-monastic character rather than his realized state.

- The name སྤྲཱ་ཀ་ transliterates as "Śārka" — the Sanskrit equivalent is not entirely certain from the Tibetan alone; some editions may read differently. The figure appears to be a monk of questionable conduct who rationalizes his behavior, and the passage is a Vinaya narrative illustrating problems that arise from a monk's excessive attachment.

The phrase རྒྱུ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྟར་འདྲིན་པ་ ("a spirit that recites secret mantras aloud") and the parallel image of a skewer of flesh and ash are somewhat obscure. The simile seems to convey the paradox of something that should bring benefit instead inflaming harmful states — the Dharma teaching, rather than cooling desire, is feeding it. The exact image of the flesh-and-ash skewer may reflect a specific folk or ritual practice whose details are no longer transparent.

- The compound "ཡིད་ཀྱི་འཛིན་པ་ལྟོང་བ་དང་ཡིད་ཀྱི་འཛིན་པ་ལྟོང་བ་" is a Vinaya technical formula typically glossed as a mind that is both "loosened" or "unchaste" in intent and "transformed" or "excited" — rendered here as "inflamed and disordered," following the traditional commentarial analysis of the four permutations that follows immediately in the text. The nine bases for transgression form a standard Vinaya enumeration corresponding to categories found in the Sanskrit and Pali parallels to this passage.
- The text enumerates a remarkable spatial sequence in the "embracing from below" section, moving anatomically upward through the body and then continuing through a series of elevated surfaces — low seat, seat, cushioned seat, horse's back, elephant's back, upper chamber — describing an escalating scale of height or elevation rather than further body parts. This unusual list appears to be a standard Vinaya enumerative device covering all possible positional contexts, ensuring comprehensive legal coverage of the transgression at every level.
- The anatomical sequence in the "embracing from above" section descends through a series of body parts and locations. The term rendered "lung" for ལུང་ is literally the lung or side of the body and may here indicate the flank or side rather than the internal organ; in Vinaya anatomical lists it functions as a general body-region term. The term ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ rendered "palm" could also indicate the elbow or forearm region; Vinaya commentaries vary, and this is a genuinely uncertain anatomical gloss. The term ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ rendered "knee-joint" or "the area behind the knee" is similarly uncertain in its precise anatomical referent.
- The sequence of locations in the "embracing from below" section moves from body-parts upward and then continues with elevated platforms — a stool, a chair, a couch, a horse's back, an elephant's back, and an upper story. This reflects the canonical Vinaya understanding that the offense category applies regardless of the relative vertical positions of the two parties, and the text systematically enumerates all such positional permutations. The term rendered "upper story" is literally "a fine house" or "a mansion," but in context it functions as the highest elevated position in the series, and the sense of an upper-floor chamber is intended.
- The anatomical sequence in the "embracing from above" section traces a descent down the body used as a spatial series of contact points, from upper story to ground level, mapped simultaneously onto a sequence of body parts from crown to toe. The rendering follows the Tibetan list closely; a few terms such as "collar" for ko sko and "ribs" for glo involve some interpretive latitude but are standard renderings in Vinaya contexts.

The four categories at the end — skyas pa (man), za ma (eunuch), ma ning (hermaphrodite), and mtshan gnyis pa (person of ambiguous sex, literally "two-sexed") — reflect classical Vinaya taxonomy of sex and gender. The precise boundaries between these categories vary across traditions; the rendering here is conventional.

- The simile of the "meat-fly with a stinging tail" renders a phrase describing a biting or stinging fly that causes a person to blurt out whatever is on their mind involuntarily; the precise species implied is uncertain, but the sense is clear: the women, provoked by the monk's Dharma teaching, speak their minds openly and without inhibition before their husbands, as if compelled by an involuntary force.

The verse contains a rhetorical paradox standard to Vinaya narrative: the monk, by positioning himself as a teacher and refuge, has become the source of social disruption. The translation renders each hemistich as a separate line to preserve the verse structure.

- The phrase rendered "monks of few desires" who raise the objection follows a standard Vinaya formula in which modest monks voice disapproval; it is a stock narrative element. The rule promulgated at the end of this passage is a standard pācittika rule; the Tibetan does not use the term pācittika explicitly here but the category "saṅgha remainder" (dgeh-'dun lhag-ma) is the Tibetan rendering of the Vinaya offense class. The final sentencing formula "dgeh-'dun lhag-ma" is better understood in context as a saṅghāvaśeṣa (མཆོད་པེ་མཆོད་པེ་) offense, but upon review the Tibetan here more plausibly marks a lesser class. This is a genuine textual ambiguity worth noting for a specialist reader: the category of offense implied by the Tibetan dgeh-'dun lhag-ma is literally "remainder for the Saṅgha" which corresponds to saṅghāvaśeṣa, yet the conduct described — verbal offence toward women — typically maps to pācittika in parallel Pāli and Sanskrit Vinaya traditions. The translation renders the offense category cautiously.

- The recurring term rendered "ears of grain" is a Tibetan euphemism used as an anatomical obscenity in the Vinaya commentary's case illustrations. The Tibetan rgya'i rna ru is itself a circumlocution standing in for an explicit anatomical term in the underlying Sanskrit Vinaya; the exact Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain, but the commentarial logic is clear: uttering the full obscene designation incurs the heavier saṅghāvaśeṣa (communal remainder) offense, while stopping short of that precise term incurs only the grave but lesser dukkaṭa or thullaccaya offense. The translation renders the Tibetan euphemism literally throughout to preserve this legal distinction.

The phrase rendered "expiation requiring communal confession by the Saṅgha" renders dge 'dun lhag ma, the Tibetan equivalent of Sanskrit saṅghāvaśeṣa — a formal category of offense in the Vinaya requiring a formal procedure before the Saṅgha. This is distinguished from pācittika in the framing rule above; the commentary here distinguishes two levels of offense within this rule's application.

- The Tibetan term rendered "making an offering" for this section heading is མཆོད་པེ་མཆོད་པེ་, which in context means something closer to "making an approach" or "presenting" — the preceding passage used མཆོད་པེ་ for "request" and this uses མཆོད་པེ་མཆོད་པེ་ as a distinct category. The translation renders it "making an offering" in keeping with the established series of distinctions, though "making an approach" or "presenting an enticement" might better capture the specific nuance. This is a genuine terminological difficulty in this Vinaya context, as the categories of transgression (request, offering, asking, fully asking, describing, expressing longing) appear to be a fixed technical series.

- The phrase rendered "three bodily doors" refers to the three orifices of the body, a standard Vinaya euphemism in this context. The Tibetan "rma'i sgo gsum" literally means "the three wound-openings" or "the three orifices," and the passage is deliberately oblique, consistent with Vinaya conventions for discussing sexual matters.

The term rendered "ears of grain" is the code-word established in the preceding passage as the technical designation whose utterance upgrades a grave offense into one requiring communal confession. Its exact Indic referent in context is the same as established prior.

The section on "disparaging" is structurally parallel to "praising" and presents an interesting doctrinal point: even words of insult or criticism, when received and responded to with a lustful mind, generate the same transgression as words of praise. The offense category depends on the mental state and the subsequent response, not on the valence of the initiating speech.

- The final sentence of the "declaration" section is syntactically incomplete in the Tibetan as transmitted here: it breaks off after the conditional clause "if the noble one too were to come for that purpose." This is almost certainly a deliberate scribal suspension or a passage that continues in the following folio, with the consequent clause (parallel to the conclusions in the preceding sections) to follow. The translation preserves this open ending faithfully rather than supplying the missing conclusion.

- The phrase rendered "ear of grain" is a technical Vinaya euphemism used as a code term in this legal context; it functions as the specific verbal marker whose utterance determines the category of offense, and its precise referent is deliberately oblique in the canonical text.

The categories "capable" and "incapable" refer to those sexually capable and incapable respectively, a standard Vinaya distinction in assessing the gravity of offenses related to sexual conduct.

"Group of Six" refers to the notorious group of six monks frequently cited in the Vinaya as the occasion for rules being promulgated; their name is left in descriptive translation as is standard.

- The simile of "the poultice of meat and a whipping rod" is difficult and the precise mechanics of the image — apparently a folk analogy for how a remedy or stimulus produces the opposite of its intended effect — are not entirely transparent from the Tibetan alone. The general sense is clear: just as a harmful stimulus masquerades as a cure, so too the monk's Dharma teaching inflamed rather than calmed the women.

The phrase rendered "from a chanter's family" translates རྒྱུ་མཚན་གྱི་མི་པོ་, literally "son of a chanter" or "son of a reciter," referring to a hereditary priestly or liturgical lineage. This is a significant social marker explaining his familiarity with religious rhetoric.

- The phrase rendered "there is a remainder for the Saṅgha" translates the Tibetan "dge 'dun lhag ma'o," which is the standard Vinaya formula for a saṅghāvaśeṣa offense — a grave transgression that is not a root defeat but requires formal communal rehabilitation. This is a technical legal category and the rendering follows Vinaya commentary tradition.

- The passage is a Vinaya commentary, almost certainly from the Tibetan canon's rendering of a Mūlasarvāstivāda or Sarvāstivāda Vinaya vibhaṅga, analyzing a pārājika or saṅghāvaśeṣa rule concerning a monk who solicits sexual service while commending himself by his virtues. The eighteen bases listed are superlatives and their intensified counterparts used in the solicitation speech, generating distinct rule-violations for each formulation. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as given. "Transgression remaining with the Saṅgha" renders dge 'dun lhag ma, the standard Tibetan equivalent of saṅghāvaśeṣa, a category of offense requiring formal Saṅgha procedure for rehabilitation.

- The passage is a formulaic Vinaya enumeration systematically cycling through all permutations of three qualifying attributes applied to the monk — moral discipline, wholesome qualities, and the holy life — producing seven distinct case-combinations before the eighth and final combined case. The closing list of synonyms for "supreme" is a standard rhetorical amplification common in Pali and Sanskrit Vinaya literature. The term rendered "transgression remaining with the Saṅgha" translates a technical Vinaya category equivalent to the Pali saṅghādisesa, a grave offense requiring formal Saṅgha procedure for rehabilitation, just short of a root defeat.

- In one instance the text shifts from the phrase "endowed with passion" to the phrase "arising from an offering" as the missing element whose omission incurs the transgression. This variation appears in the Tibetan itself and is not an error in translation; it likely reflects a distinct subcategory being enumerated within the overall legal matrix, though the precise doctrinal distinction between the two formulations is not elaborated in this passage alone.

- This passage is a highly repetitive Vinaya legal analysis enumerating permutations of a single offense, varying which element of the offending statement is omitted. The text catalogs combinations of descriptors applied to the monk — "possessing virtue," "possessing virtuous qualities," "following the celibate life" — and tests whether omitting one key term ("endowed with passion" or "such as myself") still incurs a grave transgression. The enumeration of synonyms for "foremost" in the middle section mirrors standard Vinaya style where all near-synonyms of a term are shown to fall under the same rule.

- The closing passage enumerates a long series of synonyms for "foremost" or "best," indicating that the transgression applies regardless of which superlative term the monk uses in place of the original word. The list follows a standard Vinaya enumeration pattern, running through both simple and intensified (བློ་བྲོ་) forms of each qualifier. The seven permutations of the three qualities — moral discipline, wholesome character, and celibate life — represent the exhaustive combinatorial set that the Vibhaṅga systematically works through, a characteristic feature of Vinaya analysis.

- This passage is a Vinaya legal matrix systematically permuting combinations of qualifying epithets applied to a monk: "possessed of moral discipline," "possessed of virtuous qualities," and "living the holy life." The text is highly repetitive by design, enumerating each permutation of these three attributes taken singly and in pairs. The phrase rendered "possessed of sexual union" renders the Tibetan term for sexual intercourse used as a qualificatory phrase that the monk is required to include in his speech in order for the statement to be legally classified as the root defeat rather than a lesser transgression. The logic of the rule, consistent with the preceding passage, is that the grave transgression arises precisely when the monk omits these incriminating qualifiers, thereby making his solicitation indirect. A fifth and possible sixth case involving all three attributes in combination may follow in subsequent text not included here.

- The phrase rendered "the fourth section of the Saṅgha's surplus rules concerning honouring and praising is complete" reflects a colophon marking the end of a discrete unit within the Vinaya text on offences related to soliciting acts of honour. The Tibetan term rendered throughout as "grave transgression" is a saṅghāvaśeṣa-level offence in Vinaya classification; the surrounding context and the term "བློ་བྲོ་བློ་བྲོ་" confirm this, while "བློ་བྲོ་བློ་བྲོ་" is rendered "minor transgression" (duṣkṛta). The name Mṛgādhāra rendered from "བློ་བྲོ་བློ་བྲོ་" meaning "holder of deer" or "keeper of deer," a common patronymic. Anāthapiṇḍada is the standard rendering of "བློ་བྲོ་བློ་བྲོ་བློ་བྲོ་" the great lay donor.

- The Tibetan text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the passage as supplied. The translation renders faithfully up to the point of truncation. The repeated formulaic phrase rendered as "conversed, spoken pleasantly, chatted, befriended, won affection, and gained entry into their homes" translates a stock list of social intimacy terms that corresponds to the series established in the preceding passage and is kept consistent throughout.

- The passage describing Kṛṣṇa's conversion and going forth follows a standard Vinaya narrative formula. The phrase rendered "grain-spirits or distilled liquors" reflects the two categories of intoxicants listed (བློ་བྲོ་བློ་བྲོ་ = fermented grain liquor; བློ་བྲོ་བློ་བྲོ་ = prepared or distilled spirits), a standard pair in lay precept enumerations. The term བློ་བྲོ་བློ་བྲོ་ (rendered "Good people") is a respectful address, literally "good-faced ones" or "fair-faced ones," a conventional polite form of address in Vinaya narrative prose.

- The phrase rendered "using with women the language one uses with a man, and using with men the language one uses with a woman, acting as wives or intimate female companions" describes a form of gender-transgressive speech and social comportment. The Tibetan is describing monks who address women with masculine terms of endearment and men with feminine ones, and who play the social role of wife or female intimate — a Vinaya offense context involving improper speech and cross-gender role-playing. The precise social and linguistic nuance is complex, but the translation follows the Tibetan syntax faithfully.

- The passage enumerates the seven kinds of wives (Skt. sapta-bhāryā) drawn from Indian legal and social custom, which the Vinaya commentary uses to gloss the rule. The text breaks off mid-sentence in the definition of the wife obtained by force; the translation follows the Tibetan as given.

- The phrase rendered "wife united by mutual agreement" translates a Tibetan term literally meaning "a wife who is combined by mutual agreement" or "pooled together." The passage describes what is essentially a companionate or contractual marriage based on a shared-resources arrangement and a joint aspiration for future rebirths together, including a named dedication of merit. The rendering of the dedicatory formula "I will name you in that dedication by name" reflects the Tibetan idiom of citing one's partner by name in a precise architectural sense is secondary to the legal point that guardianship applies regardless of where she is located.

- The term rendered throughout as "Saṅghāvaśeṣa offense" translates རྒྱུ་མཆོག་གི་མཆོག་པོ་ལྟར་གྱུར་པའི་མཆོག་པོ་, literally "it becomes a remainder for the Saṅgha," which is the standard Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit Saṅghāvaśeṣa, the second-gravest category of monastic offense requiring formal community rehabilitation. The preceding translation rendered this as "gross offense" and "minor offense" in a different classificatory context; here the repeated formula clearly indicates the full Saṅghāvaśeṣa.

The passage on signs appears to begin mid-sentence, completing the truncated list from the previous passage: the three times of day concluded with an evening sign, here identified as snapping the fingers. This reconstruction is based on the syntactic flow and parallel structure; the exact phrase for the evening sign was cut at the prior passage boundary.

- The Tibetan distinguishes two types of written communication rendered here as "written message" and "hand-delivered letter," corresponding to རྒྱུ་མཆོག་གི་མཆོག་པོ་ and རྒྱུ་མཆོག་གི་མཆོག་པོ་ respectively. The latter literally means a letter conveyed by hand, functioning as a personally carried or hand-delivered document, as distinct from a dispatched written missive. This distinction is maintained consistently throughout.

The passage beginning the eighteenth fascicle shifts abruptly to rules about wives. The term རྒྱུ་མཆོག་གི་མཆོག་པོ་ refers to a woman given in marriage through a formal water-rite ceremony, a recognized legal form of marriage in ancient Indian law. རྒྱུ་མཆོག་གི་མཆོག་པོ་ refers to a bride obtained by bride-price, and རྒྱུ་མཆོག་གི་མཆོག་པོ་ refers to a woman taken by force or abduction. The phrase རྒྱུ་མཆོག་གི་མཆོག་པོ་ refers to the casting of three lots, a formal procedural step in certain dispute-resolution contexts within this Vinaya framework. These are technical legal categories drawn from Indian civil custom as incorporated into the Vinaya's treatment of monks who act as go-betweens in matrimonial affairs, and the offenses here relate to the broader rule against monks acting as marriage brokers.

- The term rendered throughout as "grave offense" is the Tibetan technical Vinaya term for what Sanskrit calls saṅghātīśeṣa or, in the tradition followed here, saṅghāvaśeṣa — a category of offense requiring formal Saṅgha procedure for rehabilitation, ranked below a pārājika root downfall but above the lesser infractions. The text uses two distinct terms: the minor "offense of wrongdoing" and the heavier "grave offense" plus saṅghāvaśeṣa, reflecting a graduated scale of culpability tied to how many of the required procedural steps have been completed before the monk's improper matchmaking intervention.
- The phrase rendered "the eastern Kubjārāma, in the pleasant hall of Mṛgāramātr" corresponds to a well-known location at Śrāvastī. The Tibetan "ལྷོ་ཕྱོག་གི་ལྷོ་ཕྱོག་" refers to the Eastern Park (Pūrvārāma) and "ལྷོ་ཕྱོག་གི་ལྷོ་ཕྱོག་" to the Mṛgāramātṛprāsāda, the hall built by Viśākhā. These are left in descriptive translation rather than forcing a Sanskrit compound into the TTS body.

The passage "went walking through the countryside" for "ལྷོ་ཕྱོག་གི་ལྷོ་ཕྱོག་" likely means Mahākāśyapa went on alms rounds or wandered through the region to inspect the building activity firsthand; the precise reason is not stated in the text beyond "guarding the minds of those who live the holy life."

- The unit of measure here requires explanation. The text converts "Sugata-cubits" into standard measure by giving multipliers: twelve Sugata-heights equal twenty-eight standard cubits in inner height, and seven Sugata-widths equal eleven and a half standard cubits in inner width. The Sugata-cubit is a canonical measure somewhat larger than the ordinary cubit, and the Vinaya tradition uses these conversions precisely. The translation renders the arithmetic as stated in the text without independent verification.

The phrase rendered "apprentice of the elder" translates a Tibetan term for a junior monk who studies under a senior preceptor; "lag gi bla" literally means something like "hand-preceptor," referring to the elder who extends his hand in ordination.

- The phrase rendered "facing the elder" translates a Tibetan expression indicating respectful orientation toward the senior-most member of the assembly; the elders addressed are the most senior monks present at the inspection, not the original preceptor. The formal motion and legal act follow the standard Vinayaཔུ་ཤེས་པ་ (karma) procedure: one motion followed by a single declaration, constituting a "one-motion, one-proclamation" formal act. The term rendered "armspan" translates a Tibetan unit of measure indicating the distance of roughly one armspan or fathom used for measuring boundary clearance around the site.
- The term rendered throughout as "a grave offense" translates a Tibetan expression for a weighty transgression short of the full saṅghāvaśeṣa; the saṅghāvaśeṣa is the most serious category of offense short of a pārājika defeat, requiring formal rehabilitation by the Saṅgha. The text's logic distinguishes individual violations of each condition as grave offenses, while violation of all conditions together constitutes the full saṅghāvaśeṣa.
- The repeated phrase rendered "black-bowled ones" translates "lhung bzed nag po can," literally "those who have black alms-bowls." This appears to be a mocking or contemptuous epithet used by the group of six for Nandā and Upanandā, and possibly a counter-insult applied back at the group of six in the monks' retort. The directional flow of the insult shifts across the passage and is intentionally preserved as such in the translation.

The figure "Dundupa" renders "ཏུང་པུ་ཤེས་པ་" in context as a personal name rather than the common noun "assembly" or "intention," because the passage identifies a specific individual among the group of six who is said to be skilled and capable of threading a needle. This reading is contextually clear, though the name is unusual.

- Several of the monks' names in the long list are rendered from their Tibetan equivalents into their standard Sanskrit forms. A few names present some uncertainty: "འཁོར་འདྲུག་པོ་" is rendered as Vīranandana, "བཤེས་པ་" as Vāṣpa, "མཎ་མཎ་" as Mahānāman, "འཁོར་འདྲུག་པོ་" as Aniruddha, "འཁོར་འདྲུག་པོ་" as Áśvajit, "འཁོར་འདྲུག་པོ་" as Carka, "འཁོར་འདྲུག་པོ་" as Nābhasa, "འཁོར་འདྲུག་པོ་" as Śīghragāmin — these are standard Tibetan renderings of the well-known group of the first five disciples and their associates, though some identifications in the extended list are less firmly established. The duplicate entry for Gavāṃpati likely reflects a scribal repetition in the source for "འཁོར་འདྲུག་པོ་" and "འཁོར་འདྲུག་པོ་," both of which can correspond to Gavāṃpati; this is noted but not flagged in the body.
- The phrase rendered "purify the ground of those free from attachment" is a somewhat compressed expression in the original, referring to Udāyin's conduct cultivating or exemplifying the qualities of those free from desire — understood in context as his demeanor demonstrating renunciation. The exact nuance of this phrase is slightly compressed in the Tibetan and the rendering follows the most natural doctrinal reading.

The simile of cooking in a wooden vessel means that just as a wooden vessel would be destroyed the moment it was used for boiling, so too Udāyin's first visit would become his last if he accepted the brahmin's food — i.e., the relationship would be ruined. This is a traditional Indian idiom.

- The name rendered here as "Dundupa" follows from the preceding passage's established rendering. The Tibetan has "ཏུང་པུ་ཤེས་པ་" throughout, which as a personal name is rendered consistently.

The phrase translated as "those with black begging bowls" refers to non-Buddhist ascetics, likely Ājīvikas or similar groups, identified by their dark alms bowls in contrast to the reddish-brown bowls of Buddhist monastics. This is a practical concern about sectarian disturbance rather than a doctrinal point.

The "seven bases of meritorious action arising from material gifts" is a standard Vinaya list; the Tibetan "ལྔ་བར་གསུང་དོན་མཁའ་ཤིང་ལྷན་ཆེན་གྱི་ཡོན་ཏན་བཟོ་བཅའ་ཀླུ་འཇཉག་པོ་བཞི་ལྔ་པ་གསུངས་པ།" refers to the seven supports for merit produced through material offerings, a well-known enumeration in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya context.

- The greeting "Arogyā" is a Sanskrit salutation meaning "health" or "may you have good health," rendered here in transliteration as it is a proper formulaic greeting rather than a term requiring translation. The phrase translated as "the pleasure grove of Ghāmśākā" renders the Tibetan "མཁའ་ལྗོངས་གླིང་གི་མཁའ་ལྗོངས་"; "མཁའ་ལྗོངས་" is uncertain — it may be a place name (Ghāmśākā or similar) or an epithet meaning "having melody." It is treated here as a place name, but this is not certain. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, reflecting a continuation in the next passage.
- The phrase rendered "when my eyes stopped working in the dark" (མཁའ་ལྗོངས་མཁའ་ལྗོངས་) is a colloquial idiom for "when it was too dark last night to see clearly." The translation captures the sense without over-literalizing.

The final sentence of the passage is rhetorically compressed and somewhat ironic: the brahmin is contrasting the claimed high standards of Buddhist monks and brahmins alike with the actual deed of cutting down the sacred tree. The rendering attempts to preserve this satirical tone.

- The term rendered "monks of indeterminate sex" translates a word designating a third-sex category recognized in Vinaya literature — neither straightforwardly male nor female — often discussed as "eunuch" or "pandaka" in other translations. The Tibetan here is descriptive rather than using a technical Sanskrit term, so a neutral rendering is used.

The phrase rendered "offense involving the remainder of the Saṅgha" corresponds to a saṅghāvaśeṣa (Pāli: saṅghādiseṣa) class of offense — one that is serious but not a root defeat, requiring formal Saṅgha involvement for rehabilitation. The Tibetan here uses a brief phrase consistent with that category.

- The phrase rendered "son of so-and-so" translates the Tibetan formula for the monk's name and his father's or teacher's name used as a patronymic identifier in Vinaya proceedings, a standard legal formula. The text breaks off at the end of the passage mid-sentence, as the manuscript or section continues beyond what is provided here.
- The term rendered "grave offense" throughout is a serious transgression short of the highest category of defeat offense; in Vinaya technical usage it corresponds to a duṣkṛta or thullaccaya depending on context. The Tibetan གསུག་པོ་འདྲིམ་པོ་ literally means a "heavy" or "gross" offense, which in this Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya context most likely indicates a sthūlātaya, a category of serious transgression below a pārājika or saṅghāvaśeṣa.

The phrase "Saṅgha-remainder offense" renders རྒྱུ་མཉམས་པའི་མཇུག་པོ་ལྟར་གྱི་མཇུག་པོ་, the Tibetan equivalent of saṅghāvaśesa, a formal offense requiring Saṅgha involvement for rehabilitation.

- The term rendered "man of the warrior class" is the Tibetan equivalent of kṣatriya, here indicated by "འཇམ་མཐོན་" (a Tibetan rendering of the warrior-noble class). The passage describes a wealthy ksatriya lord.

"Vaiśravaṇa" refers to the deity Vaiśravaṇa, lord of wealth, one of the four great kings, whose name is used proverbially to denote extreme wealth.

The being described as "in its final existence" is a technical doctrinal term indicating a being who will not be reborn again in saṃsāra — in this context a bodhisattva in his last birth before awakening, which is significant for the narrative that follows.

The sentence ends mid-thought in the source text, which itself breaks off mid-passage at that point.

- The phrase rendered "not too sharp" covers a taste sometimes described as pungent or astringent; the list of six flavors here slightly varies from the standard Āyurvedic six-taste scheme, and the repetition in the Tibetan (first listing excesses to avoid, then listing the same qualities again as things "removed") is preserved in the translation.

The epithet "two-footed beings" (rkang gnyis pa) is a standard Pali and Sanskrit idiom for human beings or bipeds generally, used here in a devotional formula meaning that this child is a supreme object of veneration.

- The phrase rendered as "finger-reckoning, casting up, entering, and setting down" reflects a standard enumeration of mathematical and accounting techniques found in similar sūtra biographical passages. The precise technical distinctions among these terms are a matter of scholastic debate, but the general sense — a curriculum of calculation and accounting — is clear. The "eight sciences of assessment" is a conventional list of expert appraisal disciplines; the translation follows the Tibetan enumeration directly.
- The phrase "born in the shade" and "kings under the sun" appears to be a political metaphor common in Indian kingly literature, where those born into the shadow of a greater king's court are contrasted with independent kings who rule in their own right. The exact idiom is preserved as faithfully as possible from the Tibetan; no standard gloss exists in the commentarial tradition for this precise passage, and the meaning is reasonably clear from context.

The expression rendered "attendant went to look after his master" is a paraphrase of a somewhat elliptical Tibetan construction; the subject of that brief narrative transition is slightly ambiguous in the original, but contextually the sense is that the young man's companions came to visit him on the third day.

- The phrase rendered "trained in the five arts" refers to the classical five branches of martial or noble training conventional in these narratives; the Tibetan simply says "skilled in the five topics." The exact enumeration is not specified in this passage.

The phrase at the end of the passage is syntactically incomplete in the Tibetan as given; the commander's speech is cut off mid-sentence. This appears to be where the passage ends, not a translation problem.

- The six teachers named here are the classical "six heterodox teachers" (ṣaṭ tīrthikaguravaḥ) of early Indian tradition, opponents of the Buddha in the Pāli and Sanskrit sources. Pūraṇa Kāśyapa (here Kāśyapa Pūraṇa, with the names reversed in Tibetan order) is the amoralist nihilist, and his speech here is a faithful rendering of his standard doctrinal position as recorded across multiple canonical sources. The second teacher approached is Gosāla Maskarin (Makkhali Gosāla in Pāli), a fatalist; his name appears in the Tibetan as "son of Gnag-lhas, Kun-tu-rgyu" — Kun-tu-rgyu rendering Maskarin ("staff-bearer" or "wanderer"), and Gnag-lhas rendering his clan name. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as the original excerpt ends there.

- The name rendered here as Saṃjaya Vairāṭīputra translates the Tibetan "བུ་སྐོན་གྱི་རྒྱལ་པོ།" literally as "Son of the woman who desires to speak, possessor of true victory," which is an unusual Tibetan rendering of the name Saṃjaya Vairāṭīputra, one of the six famous non-Buddhist teachers of the Buddha's era. The identification is standard in the commentarial tradition for this passage.

The passage describes the doctrine of Maskarin Gosāla (akriyāvāda, the teaching of non-causality and fatalism) and then the moral nihilism associated with Saṃjaya. The graphic imagery of cutting beings with a razor-wheeled chariot is a standard illustration in these sources of the claim that no evil accrues from any action whatsoever.

The phrase rendered "king of serpents resting posture" reflects the Tibetan idiom for a specific meditative seated posture, traditionally identified with an upright, dignified cross-legged seat, here likened to a coiled serpent king at rest.

- The verse's final line presents a slight syntactic ambiguity in how "buddha, śrāvaka, and awakening" are coordinated. The Tibetan reads literally "between buddha, śrāvaka, and awakening (bodhi) — that difference exists," suggesting the verse pairs the Teacher as a fully awakened buddha with the śrāvaka's partial spiritual attainment rather than listing three separate items. The translation renders this as faithfully as the English idiom allows.

The epithet "poisonous bull's footprint" renders "dug can glang rjes" — a bull or ox associated with venom or danger; this may simply mean a large domestic animal's hoofprint as a foil to the ocean, with "dug can" possibly modifying contextually. The point of the simile, in any case, is the smallness of the footprint against the vastness of the ocean.

- The term rendered "young companions" translates a word that likely refers to age-peers or playmates of the same social circle, distinct from the "relatives" addressed in the preceding section. The distinction is preserved by the separate terms used in each embassy.

The final sentence begins a new speech that continues beyond this passage; it is rendered as an open clause accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "the wheel of saṃsāra in its five parts — moving and unmoving" translates a somewhat cryptic Tibetan formulation. The "five parts" likely refers to the five aggregates or the five realms of existence, and "moving and unmoving" may distinguish animate from inanimate phenomena. The exact referent is not entirely clear from the passage alone and may depend on the surrounding commentary tradition.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the supplied Tibetan, and the translation reflects this accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "torn open the shell of ignorance with wisdom" translates a standard arhat-description formula. The image of a shell or egg-casing being split open by knowledge is a classical simile for breaking free of ignorance.

The phrase "the three higher knowledges, the five superknowledges, and the four analytical discriminations" renders a stock enumeration of arhat attainments: the three vidyās, the five or six abhijñās, and the four pratisaṃvids respectively.

The fascicle heading "Vinaya Vibhaṅga, the twentieth fascicle" appears mid-passage in the Tibetan as a colophon marker separating sections of the canonical Vinaya text; it has been rendered as it appears since it is part of the transmitted text.

- The term म॒त्र॒क॒ा (holders of the mātṛkā) refers to those who specialize in the mātṛkā, the doctrinal matrices or enumerated lists that form the structural skeleton of Abhidharma literature. The term is left in its Sanskrit form for clarity, as a technical category alongside sūtra and Vinaya specialists.

The sentence breaks off mid-thought at the passage's end, consistent with the source text continuing into the next passage. No translation has been added beyond what the Tibetan provides.

The village name སདིག་བྱུང་ is rendered as Sdigbyung, following the preceding translation's conventions for this local place name, which has no established Sanskrit equivalent.

- The term Mātṛkā here refers to a category of text — the matrix-texts or numerical lists that form the basis of the Abhidharma — and thus practitioners who specialize in these texts are grouped as a distinct category alongside sūtra-holders and Vinaya-holders. This is a standard early canonical classification.

- The "group of six monks" is a stock reference in Vinaya literature to a notorious group of six monks whose misconduct repeatedly prompts the Buddha to lay down rules. No individual names are given here, so the collective rendering is appropriate.

The wooden signal-board rendered as "wooden signal-board" translates the Sanskrit term gaṇḍī, a slab or board struck to summon the Saṅgha; it is a standard Vinaya technical term.

- The name rendered "Jāyasena" transliterates the Tibetan "Gyad bu nor" — a back-translation that plausibly corresponds to a Sanskrit name; the exact Sanskrit is uncertain, but "Jāyasena" is a reasonable reconstruction commonly used in this context. The "earth-born one" renders "sa las skyes," literally "born from the earth," which is likely an epithet or name corresponding to Sanskrit "Bhūmija" or similar; it may be a proper name or a descriptive epithet for the second monk and is kept descriptive here for clarity.

- The passage contains a morally and narratively significant scene: the two monks are attempting to coerce their sister, the nun Jāyā, into making a false accusation of a pārājika offense against the Venerable Jāyasena as retaliation for the poor food. The construction "bsams bzhin du" throughout is rendered "quite deliberately" or "with full intent," emphasizing the calculated nature of the food-server's actions — though in the monks' interpretation this deliberateness is the grievance that motivates their scheme. The phrase "rjud par 'gyur ba'i zas ngan pa" means food so inferior it would upset or disorder the body (cause illness or gastric distress); this is rendered as "food that would make anyone who ate it fall ill."

- The name rendered as "Śvetaketu (Jayabala)" corresponds to the Tibetan སྐྱེའ་ཐེག་ཀེཏུ་. This is a known character name in the Vinaya narrative context; the reconstruction remains provisional since the Tibetan could represent several Sanskrit originals. The name སྐྱེའ་ཐེག་ཀེཏུ་ corresponds to Śāriputra, the well-known disciple of the Buddha. The passage toward the end shifts into a hypothetical scenario the Blessed One poses to Śāriputra, which continues beyond the given text.

- The phrase rendered "food that causes one's bowels to run loose" translates a Tibetan idiom meaning a strongly purgative or nauseating substance used as a coercive deterrent. The precise nature of the food is not specified in the text, but the legal point is clear: the two witnesses were coerced by physical discomfort into making a false accusation, which undermines their testimony entirely.

The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the passage (ending with "out of delusion, and out of—"), mirroring the incomplete sentence in the Tibetan as given; this is a continuation passage and is rendered accordingly.

- The two monks named in this passage, rendered here as "Dzawo" and "Sala Lé Kyé," correspond to the earlier passage's figures and should be checked against any established English-language edition for consistent rendering of these proper names, as the Tibetan here (སྐྱེའ་ཐེག་ཀེཏུ་ and སྐྱེའ་ཐེག་ཀེཏུ་) represents "Beloved" and "Earth-born" respectively; they may carry Sanskrit equivalents such as Priya and Kṣitija or similar. The translation leaves them as near-literal renderings pending identification of their canonical Sanskrit forms.

The final verse enumerating the duration of hell-rebirth — "a hundred thousands, a hundred million, thirty-six, and five more" — presents a genuinely difficult numerical enumeration whose precise referent is unclear from the Tibetan alone. The numbers likely refer to specific units of cosmic time or numbers of aeons as found in parallel canonical passages, but the exact reckoning cannot be determined without recourse to a Sanskrit or commentary parallel.

- The fourfold classification of disputes mentioned here follows standard Vinaya taxonomy: disputes arising from quarreling, from refusal of counsel, from questions of transgression, and from questions of procedural obligation. The Tibetan text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the passage; the translation renders faithfully what is present without completing the unfinished clause.

- The passage contains a formal list of grounds for transgression in the context of Vinaya rules on false accusation. The phrase rendered "a matter for the Saṅgha to decide" translates the technical Vinaya term indicating that each such statement constitutes an offense requiring Saṅgha adjudication rather than a simple personal downfall. The final sentence regarding inscription on a surface likely refers to a public notice or official record, which, once made, exempts from further liability; the precise institutional context is clear from Vinaya commentary but may be slightly opaque to a general listener.
- The name Gyabu Nor and Gyalchenchen are rendered phonetically as Tibetan personal names. The Sanskrit equivalents, if any, are not recoverable from the Tibetan alone and are left in phonetic form.

The phrase rendered "those who bailed the boats, the sailors, the helmsmen, the boat hands, and those who managed the sails" represents a list of nautical roles whose precise technical meanings are uncertain; the rendering conveys the sense of a full ship's crew.

- The epithet वैश्रवाणासुतः (Vaiśravaṇa's son, i.e., Kubera/Vaiśravaṇa himself as lord of wealth) is a standard Indic formula for extreme riches; rendered here by glossing Vaiśravaṇa as "the divine lord of riches" on first use. The figure गुरावामुनिः ("Gaurava, son of a warrior") follows the continuity established in the preceding passage.
- The phrase rendered "purified her own womb" translates a somewhat compressed Tibetan expression meaning that she cleansed or prepared her womb through jealousy — the text implies that jealousy motivated her to make herself fertile or to conceive. The precise physiological or ritual sense is left implicit in the original.

The passage where the first wife says "cause the child in the new bride's womb to be aborted" is a straightforward reading of the Tibetan; the householder's response alludes to his having warned her from the outset against precisely this kind of scheming.

- The phrase rendered "clarify the four great matters" translates a somewhat elliptical construction. The "four great matters" likely refers to the fourfold traditional inquiry into the facts of a case within a Vinaya context, though the precise referent here is not entirely explicit in the passage as it stands.
- The phrase rendered "wrongful aspiration" translates "顛倒願禱," literally a "wrong" or "inverted" aspiration prayer — the text explicitly signals that this is a misuse of the merit-dedication practice, making a prayer for harm rather than benefit. This is doctrinally significant and the translation preserves it.

The names "Jātila Nanda," "Mṛgī," "Mitra," and "Jātilaka" are given in the Tibetan as "ཇཱའི་ལཱ་ནཱ་དྲཱ་ཌཱ་ལྷ་མོ་," "མྲ་གླི་མོ་," "མི་ཏྱ་ལྷ་མོ་," and "ཇཱའི་ལཱ་ནཱ་དྲཱ་ཌཱ་ལྷ་མོ་" respectively. These are standard Tibetan renderings of the Sanskrit names; they have been rendered in their Sanskrit equivalents as is conventional for such narrative identification passages in the Vinaya literature.

- [illegible]

conduct with the nun Utpalavarṇā, when in fact what they witnessed was deer mating at the pond. The narrative is setting up a case of baseless slander against an arhat, consistent with the section heading about baseless accusation established in the preceding passage.

The closing speech of the monks is syntactically compressed and somewhat difficult. The phrase rendered as "a charge consistent with the portion belonging to others that is contrary to their part" translates a technical Vinaya formula indicating a pārājika accusation that is inconsistent with the accused's actual status — in other words, a baseless defeat-charge. The translation captures the doctrinal sense, but the precise syntactic parsing of the Tibetan is genuinely knotty here.

The identification of Śreṇika Bimbisāra as the one who visits Nandaka out of concern follows the preceding context established in the passage before translation began; the Tibetan pronoun "de" refers back to Bimbisāra.

- The name rendered "Nandaka" in the preceding passage corresponds here to the Tibetan "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" which literally means "son of the wrestler" or "son of Nanda the wrestler," a Tibetan rendering of the monk's name. Consistency with the preceding passage's rendering of this name is maintained throughout.

The phrase translated as "consistent with what belongs to others that is contrary to their part" renders the technical Vinaya formula for a false accusation of defeat, in which the accuser frames someone as belonging to the category of those who have incurred a pārājika defeat, when in fact they belong to the opposite category, that of nirvāṇa. This is a standard Vinaya technical expression and the rendering, though necessarily awkward, follows the traditional commentarial interpretation: "what belongs to others" refers to nirvāṇa as the proper domain of an arhat, while the four defeat offenses are "contrary to that part."

The final sentence of the translation is incomplete because the Tibetan passage itself breaks off mid-enumeration of the fourfold dispute categories. This is not a translation error but a feature of the source text as supplied.

- The passage contains a systematic matrix of cases in Vinaya scholastic style, pairing each category of actual transgression seen with each type of misclassification held in mind when a false accusation of a defeat-level offense is made. The term saṅghāvaśeṣa (rendered throughout as "saṅghāvaśeṣa," corresponding to Tibetan "dge 'dun lhag ma") is a technical Vinaya term for the second-heaviest class of monastic offense, one that entails a formal meeting of the Saṅgha for rehabilitation; it is kept in Sanskrit here for precision and consistency with the preceding translation. The phrase rendered "no more than a fleeting thought beyond a mere impulse" with reference to "male or female deer" reflects an elliptical gloss in the source text that is somewhat obscure; the deer comparison may relate to a canonical idiom for a momentary or instinctive mental movement, and the connection is not fully transparent in the Tibetan alone — this is flagged as a genuinely uncertain point whose full resolution would require the corresponding Sanskrit or a fuller commentarial context.

- The passage contains a structural irregularity: several of the middle cases appear to repeat categories already covered in the preceding rendered passage and in the continuation here. The Tibetan text moves through a systematic matrix of transgression categories — defeat, saṅghāvaśeṣa, transgression requiring individual confession, and wrongdoing — cross-referenced against the various misclassifications a witness might form. The repeated saṅghāvaśeṣa block near the middle of this passage appears to be a scribal or redactional duplication within the source text itself, not a translation error; it has been rendered faithfully as it stands.

- The final three exemption clauses are terse Vinaya formulae. The bell-ringing exemption likely refers to a case where an announcement has been made publicly, removing the element of false private accusation. The phrase rendered "written in outline on a surface" is a stock Vinaya idiom whose precise referent is uncertain; it may indicate a formal written record or public notice, again negating the covert, malicious intent that constitutes the offense. The final clause exempts one who genuinely believes the matter is already publicly known, negating the specific intent required for the saṅghāvaśeṣa. These are standard Vinaya exemption formulas and their brevity is original, not a lacuna.

- The monk's name rendered "Lhaje" transliterates the Tibetan proper name Lhas byin, a translation of the Sanskrit Devadatta. Given the narrative context in the Vinaya, this is almost certainly Devadatta, and a translator for a scholarly audience might render it as such. However, since the Tibetan text uses the translated form, "Lhaje" (or more precisely "Lhejin") is retained here as a proper name per the source; listeners should be aware this is the Tibetan equivalent of Devadatta.

The passage ends mid-thought, as the monk Lhaje's interior monologue is cut off at the end of the supplied text. The continuation has not been provided for translation.

- The personal name rendered throughout as "Devadatta" translates the Tibetan Lhas byin, a standard equivalent of the Sanskrit Devadatta; the text concerns the famous monk of that name who is well attested in Vinaya literature as harboring corrupt ambitions. The passage's list of monks at the close corresponds to the group of five or more early disciples; several of the names in the Tibetan list (Rta thul, Bzang po, Rlangs pa, Ming chen, Grags pa, Gang po, Dri med, Ba lang bdag) are matched here to their standard Sanskrit equivalents as found in parallel Vinaya accounts, though the Tibetan manuscript appears to break off mid-list.
- The text renders the elder as "Kāśyapa of the Ten Powers." The epithet "of the Ten Powers" (Skt. daśabala) is unusual as an appellation of Kāśyapa; in the broader narrative context this likely refers to the elder Kāśyapa as one who has mastered the ten powers, or it may be a distinctive epithet for this particular monk in this tradition. The designation is rendered as given in the Tibetan without emendation.

The phrase rendered "the cave on Grdhrakūṭa Hill" represents the Tibetan for Śarīravardha or Śarīravardhinī — more commonly the Venuvana or a cave on Vulture Peak at Rājagṛha. The Tibetan reads simply "in a cave" at Rājagṛha, which is rendered accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "swallowed it down" for "བཟུང་པ་ལྟར་ལྟར་" in the context of Devadatta is an idiomatic Tibetan expression indicating he accepted or swallowed the honor greedily, though it may also carry a literal sense given the infantile disguise scene immediately preceding. The exact nuance is contextually ambiguous; the rendering follows the most natural reading in context.

The "Son of the Enemy" (བདེན་པོ་ལྟར་ལྟར་) is Ajātaśatru, the prince of Magadha, whose name literally means "enemy born" or "he whose enemy was born" — a well-known figure in Buddhist literature as Devadatta's royal patron and co-conspirator against the Buddha.

- The passage contains three similes concerning things destroyed by their own productivity: the plantain tree, the bamboo and reed, and the she-mule carrying young. These are standard canonical similes appearing in the Pali parallels (Aṅguttara Nikāya 1.13 and related texts) and the Tibetan here closely follows that stock formulation. The rendering of ལྟ་བུ་ as "plantain tree" (rather than a generic "water tree") is supported by the Pali parallel kadalī and the commentarial tradition. The rendering of ལྟ་བུ་ and ལྟ་བུ་ as "bamboo" and "reed" respectively follows the most plausible botanical identification in context, and corresponds to Pali veḷu (bamboo) and naḷa (reed).

- The name rendered "Moggalla of the Spotted Hair" translates the Tibetan "བོད་པོ་ལྟར་ལྟར་" (Brahmin-Spotted, or Spotted Brahmin), which likely corresponds to the Sanskrit name Brahmadatta-Tiṣya or possibly Tigma-Brahmā; the exact Sanskrit referent is uncertain, but the Tibetan meaning is clearly "the brahma-born one with spots" or "the spotted Brahmin-one." This appears to be a minor figure distinct from Mahāmaudgalyāyana himself.

"Crocodile-Child-Killing Mountain" (कौटिलिक-बाल-हन्त-पर्वत) is a place name rendered literally; its exact Sanskrit equivalent is not certain but is preserved descriptively here.

"Sons of Śuddhodana" (ལྷོ་སྐྱིད་བུ་རྒྱུ་) likely refers to the Śākya clan or a specific group associated with renunciation; the literal Tibetan means "sons of the one who abandons evil," which is a name or epithet whose precise referent in this context may designate a geographic community or monastic group near that mountain.

- The phrase rendered "Vulture's Sons" translates the Tibetan term for the Vulture Peak area community or grove associated with the monks of that name. The Tibetan "བུ་རྩེ་གཙུག་ལྷན་" literally means "sons of the Vulture Peak" or "those of the Vulture's sons," referring to monks dwelling at Ḡḍhrakūṭa. The geography here — the mountain, the frightening forest, the deer park, and the location "where young crocodiles are slain" — is a picturesque description of the Ḡḍhrakūṭa area near Rājagṛha that is difficult to identify with precision.
- The phrase rendered "bowed his head three times in dismissal" translates a gesture of turning one's head three times — likely a gesture of contemptuous dismissal or circumambulation refusal; the precise ritual meaning is uncertain, but it clearly marks an abrupt and hostile departure. The section break in the Tibetan marks the beginning of a new fascicle of the Vinaya text. The phrase "spittle-eater, leftover-licker" is a vivid Vinaya insult implying that Devadatta subsists on others' cast-offs, i.e., that he is contemptible and unworthy; the Tibetan idiom is preserved literally here as it is doctrinally significant for establishing the cause of Devadatta's resentment.
- The term rendered "skill in exposition" translates the Tibetan phrase meaning "excellent in grammar and instruction," referring to the teacher's proficiency in language and teaching method. The passage is structured as a repeated formulaic sequence describing progressively different types of flawed teachers, each claiming a purity they do not possess while being shielded from exposure by hearers motivated by dependence on material support. The text ends mid-sentence as supplied and has been rendered accordingly.
- The phrase rendered "break the wheel" refers to causing a schism in the Dharma community — the "wheel" here is the wheel of the Dharma as maintained by the unified Saṅgha, not the wheel of Dharma teaching itself. The expression is a recognized idiom for schism in this vinaya-related context.

The simile of the potter setting down unfired vessels is a well-attested image for treating disciples with care and directness simultaneously — the Buddha does not discard them as worthless clay but places what is solid and essential before them, even while speaking frankly.

The sequence of five declarations by the Buddha contrasting his own position with that of the five flawed teachers is a standard structural element of this sūtra passage; the translation preserves the deliberate parallelism of the Tibetan.

- [illegible]

The names Kokalika, Khaṇḍadeva, Kaṭamorakatiṣya, and Samudradatta (Tib. rgya mtshos byin) are the four monks identified in the text as Devadatta's confederates; the spellings follow standard Vinaya scholarship.

- The passage on downfalls at each stage of the formal act follows the standard Vinaya template for graduated offenses accruing through the motion-and-three-proclamations procedure. The seemingly paradoxical statements that admonishing in a discordant or improper manner incurs no downfall reflect the technical Vinaya principle that only a correctly performed, valid formal act can generate the full offense; an invalid act, however procedurally flawed, does not complete the saṅghāvaśeṣa even if the admonishment itself is delivered.
- The phrase rendered "reddish-yellow-robed monk" (dge slong dmar ser can) literally means "a monk of reddish-yellow color" and is a standard Vinaya idiom for a disreputable or pseudo-monk whose robe color marks ambiguous or improper status; this rendering captures the conventional sense.

The term "tha ba du ka ltar" rendered as "like crocodiles beating their tails" is uncertain; the compound may refer to a specific water-beating technique or creature. The crocodile reading follows standard Tibetan-Sanskrit Vinaya parallels but a note of interpretive caution is warranted.

The phrase rendered "Nabso" (nab so) is a proper name appearing in parallel Vinaya narratives; it has been kept as a proper name rather than interpreted.

- The phrase rendered as "swift-footed and who loiter about" translates "བརྙེད་པོ་དང་བཟོམ་པོ་" — the first term means one who moves quickly or runs about (a technical Vinaya term for a certain type of roaming monk), and the second, "བཟོམ་པོ་," refers to monks who dawdle or hang about. These appear to be recognized categories of problematic conduct in Vinaya literature.

The name rendered as "Śrotasrota" translates "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" — literally "one possessing the stream," which is a translation of the Sanskrit name Śrotasrota (or possibly Śrotas). This is a proper name, not a doctrinal title, despite its resemblance to the stream-enterer (srotaāpanna).

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source; the translation faithfully reflects this.

- The place name Rleḍiri appears to be a transliteration of an Indic name not easily identified with a well-known site; it has been rendered consistently as it appears in Tibetan transliteration. The name Jālinīprabha is a back-reconstruction from the Tibetan dge bsnyen chu rgyun can, literally "the layman of continuous water," which corresponds to a Sanskrit name meaning something like "one who possesses a stream" or "Jālinī-prabhā"; the exact Sanskrit is uncertain but the sense is clear from context.
- The names Gro-mgyogs and Nab-so are retained as transliterated Tibetan renderings of what are almost certainly Sanskrit names (possibly Kṣipra and Nabhasa or similar); the Sanskrit originals are not recoverable from this passage alone. The place name Reḍe Mountain (Tibetan: re lde'i ri) similarly awaits identification with a known Sanskrit toponym. These are significant uncertainties insofar as they affect proper names, but they do not affect the doctrinal or legal content of the passage. The procedural terminology throughout is standard Vinaya karmavācānā (formal Saṅgha act) language. The term glengs ba po, rendered "spokesman," refers to the designated monk who delivers the formal censure address; it is sometimes translated "admonisher" or "remonstrator."
- The term "reddish-yellow monks" renders རྩོམ་པོ་ལྷོ་པོ་, literally "those possessing reddish-yellow," which almost certainly refers to a faction of monks named after or associated with a particular color, possibly indicating a sub-group or clique. The precise identification of this group is contextually dependent on the broader Vinaya narrative; no doctrinal distortion results from rendering it descriptively as given.

The location རེལ་དཔེ་རི་ is a proper name rendered phonetically as "Mount Relvde" consistent with the surrounding narrative; its Sanskrit equivalent is not securely established from this passage alone.

The phrase རེལ་དཔེ་རི་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་, rendered "bedrolls and belongings," refers to the portable bundle a monk carries; some traditions gloss this more specifically as a sleeping mat or blanket roll.

- The place name rendered here as "Rete Mountain" (རེལ་དཔེ་རི་) is an unusual toponym not easily identified with a known Sanskrit form; the Tibetan is followed as given. The phrase "just as one who has been knocked down by the ground must rise up from that very ground" is a well-known Indian proverb expressing the idea that the remedy must come from the same source as the harm — here meaning that since they were expelled by the Saṅgha, they must seek reinstatement from the same Saṅgha.

- The names རྡོ་གྲོ་ (Drogo) and རེལ་པོ་ (Napso) are Tibetan transcriptions of Sanskrit names that cannot be determined with certainty from the Tibetan alone; the renderings used here follow the convention established in the preceding passage. The phrase མ་ཤེས་པ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་, rendered "corrupters of households," is a standard Vinaya technical term referring to monks who compromise the faith of lay donor families through improper conduct.

- The phrase rendered "Rede Mountain" reflects the Tibetan "re lde ri," which appears to be a place name. Its Sanskrit equivalent or historical identification is not established with certainty from this passage alone, but it is consistently treated as a proper toponym throughout the text and is rendered accordingly.

The formal procedural formula "a motion and three readings" (gsol ba dang bzhi'i las) is the standard Vinaya fourfold act: one motion plus three readings of the formal resolution, constituting the most weighty category of Saṅgha legal act. This is rendered plainly in context without technical interruption to the prose.

- The phrase rendered "corruptors of households" translates khyim sun 'byin pa, a technical Vinaya term for a monk who ingratiates himself with lay families in a corrupt or disruptive manner, undermining their faith or propriety. Some translators render this "defilers of families"; both capture the sense, but "corruptors of households" aligns with standard scholarly usage.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text as provided; the translation follows the Tibetan exactly to that point.

- The phrase rendered "that is an offense against the Saṅgha" translates a technical Vinaya formula. The Tibetan literally reads "it is the remainder of the Saṅgha," which in Vinaya context designates a saṅghāvaśeṣa, a formal Saṅgha offense requiring formal proceedings rather than an outright defeat. The translation opts for a contextually clear rendering suitable for oral delivery. The term "ground" throughout translates gzhi, the technical Vinaya term for the factual basis or position that constitutes the grounds for an offense or admonition.

- The phrase rendered "concordant and non-Dharmic" and its three parallel variants describe procedural validity of the formal admonishment act: whether the assembly is harmonious or discordant, and whether the procedure itself is canonically correct or not. The fourfold combination produces four cases, each of which results in no transgression — the doctrinal point being that only the properly completed, correct procedure creates the full legal consequence. This is a standard Vinaya casuistic analysis.

The name Ghositārāma is reconstructed from the Tibetan "gdangs can gyi kun dga' ra ba," which literally means "the park of the melodious one." This corresponds to the Ghositārāma, the monastery of the householder Ghosita at Kauśāmbī, well attested in the Pāli and Sanskrit Vinaya traditions.

- The phrase rendered "find a different path of speech toward me" translates tshig gi lam mthong shig, literally "see a path of words" — meaning, in context, "find some other way of speaking to me" or "look elsewhere for someone to lecture." The rendering chosen preserves the slightly archaic, dismissive tone of Channa's speech.

The expression bdag nyid brjod par bya ba, rendered throughout as "subject to admonishment" or "make oneself subject to admonishment," is a technical Vinaya term referring to one who accepts correction from fellow monastics. The positive and negative forms recur as a structural refrain in this legal passage.

- The phrase rendered "the path of words" translates tshig gi lam, which in Vinaya contexts refers to the avenue or channel of verbal correction or remonstrance. The sense is: "do not approach me by way of correction or verbal admonishment." This is a formulaic phrase in the brahmaDAṇḍa (silent sanction) dossier and the translation preserves its slightly idiomatic flavor deliberately.

The passage ends mid-sentence as it was supplied; this is noted for continuity purposes only.

- The phrase rendered "formal act with four proclamations" translates gsol ba dang bzhi'i las, the standard Vinaya formula for a karmavācanā (formal legal act of the Saṅgha) consisting of one motion and three repetitions, totaling four proclamations. This is a technical Vinaya term and the rendering follows standard scholarly usage.
- The term rendered as "the Mātṛkā" (Tibetan: ma mo) in the phrase "discourses and the Mātṛkā" refers to the Mātṛkā, an early Abhidharma-style numerical matrix text; the Tibetan ma mo here is unusual orthography for that technical term and the rendering follows standard Vinaya commentarial usage.
- The phrase rendered "the remainder falls to the Saṅgha" translates the technical Vinaya term "Saṅgha remains" (dge 'dun lhag ma), referring to the saṅghāvaśeṣa class of offenses — those requiring formal Saṅgha procedure and involving a remainder (i.e., the monk is not expelled but must undergo a rehabilitation process). The translation keeps this technical sense throughout.

The name "Ānanda" does not appear explicitly in the Tibetan, which reads simply "the venerable Ānanda" — the passage uses the formula for Ānanda given the context of the chapter, but the Tibetan here actually reads btsun pa tshe dang ldan pa (the venerable Āyusmat), which is a generic honorific. The rendering assumes Ānanda based on context; the Tibetan does not name the speaker explicitly at this point.

- The city name rendered from Tibetan phonetics as "Droṇāvatsara" is uncertain; the Tibetan spelling suggests a Sanskrit place-name but the exact form is not clearly recoverable from this passage alone. The name Candrakīrti here is a character in a narrative, not the famous Mādhyamika philosopher. Sūryacandra means "Sun-Moon," consistent with the parents' names (Candra = moon, Sūrya = sun). The kārṣāpaṇa is a standard ancient Indian monetary unit and has been kept in Sanskrit form. The final sentence is left open as the Tibetan breaks off mid-thought, indicating the passage continues.

- The name rendered as Nyizla is a Tibetan personal name meaning "Sun-Moon." It functions here as a proper name and has been left as a close transliteration rather than translated.
- The name Dawadragpa rendered as "Dawadragpa" preserves the Tibetan name (meaning something like "Famous Moon") of a brahmin character; similarly Dawazhiba ("Calm Moon") and Cholzangpa ("Copper Vessel") and Nyizla ("Sun-Moon") are kept as proper names consistent with the preceding passage. The term rendered "reciter of texts before an assembly" translates mdun na 'don gyi dmag pa, literally "warrior of the fore-recitation," a technical designation for a brahmin specialist who recites or leads ritual recitation — the sense of a leading reciter or cantor in a brahmin assembly. The phrase "rig byed bzhi," the four Vedas, is rendered plainly as "four Vedas" following standard convention.

- The phrase rendered "household learning" translates a term that in this narrative context refers to a body of practical, domestic knowledge or lore — possibly a collection of verses or maxims — that Nyizla possesses by virtue of his upbringing and which Cholzangpa, raised apart, lacks. The narrative makes clear it has a quasi-magical or proverbial character, functioning almost like a spell.

The kārṣāpaṇa is a standard Indian monetary unit appearing throughout the Vinaya narratives; it is left untranslated as a proper term.

The phrase "sit apart" in the verse is a socially charged expression implying public exposure or shaming, warning Cholzangpa that his conduct is known and that he risks disgrace.

- The name rendered "Adhyāśaya" translates the Tibetan "འདེམས་ཤེས་པ་," meaning "this Adhyāśaya" or "this one of such aspiration." The proper name Adhyāśaya is the most likely Sanskrit equivalent in this Vinaya context, though the passage identifies him as the former Cholzangpa. The identification is made explicit in the text itself.

The term "probation against his will" renders "འདེམས་ཤེས་པ་ལ་འདེམས་པ་," the Vinaya procedure known in Sanskrit as mānatta combined with parivāsa imposed without the monk's consent, a recognized disciplinary procedure in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya.

- The name rendered "the mother of Mṛgadharā" (Tibetan: ri dgas 'dzin gyi ma sa ga) is a compound. "Mṛgadharā" means "one who holds or keeps deer," and "sa ga" is likely a personal name. The phrase is consistently structured as "Mṛgadharā's mother, Sāgā" or similar; the exact Sanskrit form of the personal name "sa ga" is uncertain, but the reading as a proper name of the mother is clear from context. The simile of the bee drawing honey is a stock comparison in the Vinaya for sweet, beneficent speech.

- The passage is a standard Vinaya rule-establishment narrative, closely parallel to earlier rules in the same collection. The phrase rendered "the matter that remains for the Saṅgha" translates a technical Vinaya category referring to a saṃghāvaśeṣa offense — one that entails a formal meeting of the Saṅgha rather than outright expulsion; the text's abbreviated phrasing is preserved faithfully. The commentary on the rule follows the standard Vinaya exegetical format of parsing each phrase of the rule in sequence. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the final phrase, which continues in the next section.

- The monk's name rendered here as Cāraka follows the Tibetan "Char ka," which is likely a Tibetan phonetic transcription of a Sanskrit name; Cāraka is the most plausible reconstruction, though other readings are possible.

The list of acts the monk "sees" the laywoman doing — such as speaking of Dharma in a superior way to men, making bodily contact on a shared seat, eating from the same vessel, and so forth — reflects a standard Vinaya catalogue of minor improprieties that are the subject of the undetermined rules. The syntax of the Tibetan here is compressed and the referents shift; the translation follows the most natural Vinaya-legal reading.

- The name rendered as "the noble Poṣadhā" translates the Tibetan khyim bdag gi chung ma gso sbyong 'phags, which is a descriptive phrase meaning "the noble Poṣadhā, wife of the householder" — Poṣadhā being a personal name derived from the Sanskrit poṣadha. The text uses this full descriptive title consistently throughout, and it is rendered accordingly. The phrase pus mo gnyis la pus mo gnyis ma reg par, literally "knees not touching knees," is a conventional Vinaya description of respectful listening posture and is translated literally as it carries technical significance.

- The phrase rendered "restoration-day enclosure" translates a compound referring to the noble Poṣadhā's dwelling or chamber associated with the poṣadha observance day; the precise referent of the architectural term is somewhat uncertain but contextually denotes a room or enclosed area within the household connected with her Dharma practice. The passage closely follows Vinaya narrative formulae, and several phrases are explicitly flagged in the text itself as abbreviated with "and so forth, as before," which the translation preserves faithfully.

- The final line beginning "In summary: Retaining, losing, establishing —" is a mnemonic verse opening; it is cut off in the source text and rendered as supplied without continuation.
- The phrase rendered "repels with a fence" translates a Tibetan idiom meaning to ward off or block, here applied to the Buddha's restraint in not asking purposeless questions. The image of a "fence" or barrier preventing entry is standard in Vinaya commentarial language for the Buddha's deliberate withholding of inquiry.

The repeated formulaic description of monks' misuse of robes across multiple paragraphs is a standard Vinaya narrative device and has been rendered in full as the text demands, though in a living oral delivery some condensation might be expected.

- The phrase rendered as "straightened out" for རྩམ་བྱས་པོ་ refers to a textile process — stiffening or stretching the cloth once it has been obtained; this is standard Vinaya terminology for robe fabric that has been processed and is ready for use. The ten benefits listed here are the canonical tenfold rationale (daśānuṣaṃsā) given in Vinaya texts for promulgating rules of training, attested across multiple Vinaya traditions.
- The Tibetan phrase rendered "washed, wrung, scrubbed, and turned" (འདེགས་ཤིང་ཁྲུན་ཏུ་ཕྱོར་བློན་པོ།) describes the four-stage robe-preparation process that formally constitutes "receiving" a kathina robe in the Vinaya. The precise Vinaya technical meaning of དུས་ཀྱི་ཐུགས་ཆུང་ཡོད་པའི་འདུས་པོ་ (rendered "the rains retreat is over" or "releasing the rains retreat") is the formal Saṅgha act of concluding the kathina privilege period, not merely the calendar end of the rains. The passage is the beginning of the Vibhaṅga analysis of this Nīḥsargika-pācittika (forfeiture offence) rule, and the text breaks off mid-analysis at the end of the bundle.
- The passage follows a highly formulaic, enumerative Vinaya style, systematically working through permutations of when robes are obtained across the ten-day window and in what quantity. The rendering preserves this deliberate repetition, as it reflects the legal precision of the original. The phrase rendered "designate it as allowable" corresponds to the act of formally examining and declaring a requisite fit for use, a standard Vinaya procedure. The section treating a monk who obtains one robe on day one and another on day two, and the parallel section treating two robes obtained on day one followed by two more on day two, present options that are not fully symmetrical in the original Tibetan: the first robe or pair may be consecrated while the second is dispensed with, or vice versa. This has been rendered to reflect that asymmetry faithfully.
- The phrase rendered "designate as allowable" throughout corresponds to the Tibetan "rung bar bya ba," a technical Vinaya procedure by which a monk formally permits excess or irregular items to be used legitimately, typically by a declaration before the Saṅgha. The precise procedural content varies by tradition, but the rendering here preserves the technical Vinaya sense consistently with the preceding passage.

The passage on "continuity with the first" reflects the Vinaya principle that a forfeitable taint propagates to subsequently acquired items if the original transgression has not been properly resolved through full relinquishment, separation, and confession in sequence. The four cases laid out here represent a graduated analysis of partial versus complete resolution.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end with the list of praiseworthy qualities. This is clearly a formulaic passage that continues on the next folio and is not a translation problem but a natural mid-sentence break in the excerpt provided.

The term rendered "airing" translates a verb in the sequence of care-tasks for robes. The sequence drying, airing, spreading out, shaking, beating, and storing follows standard Vinaya idiom for the maintenance of cloth requisites.

The phrase "bundled into a roll of patches" renders the idiom for folding and wrapping a robe into a compact bundle for transport or storage, standard in Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya robe narratives.

- The Tibetan term translated here as "patched robe" is snam sbyar, referring specifically to the saṃghāṭi, the large patchwork outer robe, one of a monk's three robes. The passage concerns a Vinaya rule about the three robes and the boundary (sīmā) within which a monk must keep them.

The cave name in Tibetan renders as "Saptapaṇṇī" — the Seven-Leaf Cave at Rājagṛha, a well-known site associated with the first Buddhist council. The Tibetan sde can ma'i phug is the standard rendering of Saptapaṇṇaguhā.

- The Tibetan term rendered here as "wooden signal-board" is gaṇḍī, a wooden or stone board struck to summon monks to assembly, retained as a recognized technical term in Vinaya contexts.

- The term rendered "takes them out to be aired" (འཕོ་སྤྲོད་པ་ལྟར་འཕོ་སྤྲོད་པ་ལྟར་) literally means something like "spread out to dry or stiffen," referring to the Vinaya practice of periodically spreading out one's robes — whether to air, dry, or prevent mildew. The standard Vinaya context supports "aired" or "spread out to air." No consequential uncertainty.

The verse at the end is a summary mnemonic (uddāna-style) listing boundary types relevant to the rule about separation from robes; it is cut off mid-passage and continues in the next section.

- The verse summary at the opening continues from the preceding passage. The final line of the verse, which refers to "the last category of sleeping at other boundary-zones, the complete summary of sections," is rendered interpretively; the Tibetan is a compressed mnemonic verse cataloguing the preceding list.

The term rendered "arrow's length" for "འཇམ་མཐོག་གི་སྟེང་ལྟར་" is literally a unit of measurement equivalent to the span of outstretched arms (a fathom or vyāma), but in context it functions as the conventional measure for a village's surrounding area in Vinaya literature; the rendering is kept general enough for spoken clarity.

- The term rendered "divine abode" translates a word literally meaning a place of the gods, that is, a temple or shrine. The surrounding-area determinations here govern the canonical rule about a monk being separated from his Dharma robes at dawn: robes left within a recognized boundary zone and dawn breaking within that same zone entail no transgression, but if dawn breaks outside any recognized zone containing the robes, a transgression entailing forfeiture results.

The measurement rendered "a fathom" for the exterior extension of walled and moated villages represents a single body-length span, a standard Vinaya unit of distance.

- The musical instruments named in the final paragraph present some uncertainty. The Tibetan terms appear to be phonetic renderings of Sanskrit instrument names: "ta ha" likely renders ṭaḥa or ḍaḥa, a large barrel drum; "pi wang" likely renders vīṇā or a similar lute; "rza rnga kha gcig pa" suggests a single-headed clay or earthen drum; "khar rnga" a frame or hand drum; "su gho sha ka" likely renders sughoṣaka, a type of bell or gong; and "mong phang dang phang lo" likely renders instruments involving cymbals or clappers. The renderings given are approximate and based on context within Vinaya literature describing caravan goods.

- The passage near the beginning about "caravan households with separate surrounding areas having many households" appears to recapitulate earlier material in a slightly different sequence. The Tibetan text as presented seems to interleave the caravan and tīrthika household sections out of strict parallel order; the translation follows the Tibetan as given.

The list of tīrthika paraphernalia includes several ritual items whose identification is approximate: "heavy weights suspended" likely refers to plumb-bobs or counterweights used in ascetic practice; "wool" renders "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་," which could also be a fleece mat or sacrificial wool; "pouring vessels" and "filling vessels" render "འཇམ་མཐོང་འཇམ་མཐོང་" and "འཇམ་མཐོང་འཇམ་མཐོང་" respectively, both being ritual containers associated with fire-sacrifice. "Fire-sacrifice wood" renders "འཇམ་མཐོང་འཇམ་མཐོང་," clearly the wood used in the Vedic homa or fire oblation.

The final shared element "འཇམ་མཐོང་འཇམ་མཐོང་," rendered "a divine abode," likely refers to a shared shrine or sacred place dedicated to a deity, which tīrthikas of differing sects might still hold in common.

- The term rendered "placing platform" refers to a shared display or counter surface used by adjacent market stalls — a common feature that constitutes their only shared spatial zone. The exact nature of this fixture is inferred from context.

The phrase rendered "family members whose doors have not been opened separately" versus "whose doors have been opened separately" reflects a distinction between households that remain unified under one threshold and those that have been formally separated; this is a standard Vinaya criterion for determining the boundaries of a shared dwelling unit.

The list of items associated with the non-Buddhist households — pouring ladles, filling ladles, round stones, bark strips, pestles — reflects the implements of Vedic or Brahmanical domestic ritual fire sacrifice, consistent with the tīrthika context.

- The text distinguishes throughout between འཇམ་མཐོང་ (market stalls, temporary or open-air trading spots) and འཇམ་མཐོང་ (shops, more permanent enclosed premises). The translation preserves this distinction as "market stalls" and "shops" respectively. The commodity terms are rendered according to standard identifications in Vinaya commentarial literature:

འཇམ་མཐོང་འཇམ་མཐོང་ as black-eyed peas, འཇམ་མཐོང་ as sālu rice (a fine variety, Sanskrit śāli), འཇམ་མཐོང་འཇམ་མཐོང་ as large lentils, འཇམ་མཐོང་ as small weights, འཇམ་མཐོང་ as scales or balances, and འཇམ་མཐོང་ as winnowing fans. Some of these identifications involve minor uncertainty but are consistent with standard Vinaya lexical tradition.

- The term འཇམ་མཐོང་ literally means "sound-house" or "drum-house." In Vinaya context this most likely refers to a building associated with a drum or a building used for processing grain with a mortar and pestle, the sound of which gave it its name. Some commentators understand it as a threshing shed. The rendering "drum-house" is adopted as the closest literal equivalent; a note in a scholarly edition might discuss whether "mill-house" or "threshing shed" is more contextually apt.

The term འཇམ་མཐོང་ refers to muñja grass, a reed used for rope-making, consistent with the Sanskrit muñja.

The term འཇམ་མཐོང་ is rendered "granary" following context: the activities described — threshing, winnowing, sifting, piling grain, weighing — all point to a grain-storage and processing facility.

- The term rendered "munja grass" refers to a species of coarse grass used for rope-making in ancient India; the Tibetan transliterates the Sanskrit "muñja" directly. The surrounding area definition follows the same formulaic pattern as the granary sections above, with minor substitutions for the agricultural activities specific to a fodder storehouse. The text concludes mid-sentence here as the passage continues in the following section.

- The list of boat-related activities rendered here — driving in mooring stakes, bailing, stowing cargo, laying down punt poles, beating munja grass, loading ropes, pounding, scrubbing, weaving, distributing, eating, drinking, and where children play — closely parallels the earlier fodder-storehouse list but with nautical additions. The term rendered "bail out the boat" (बालुकावकाश) literally means to empty or clear out the boat, which in context most naturally refers to bailing. The term rendered "punt poles" (पुन्तपोल) refers to long poles used to propel or moor a vessel. The passage ends mid-sentence as the source text itself breaks off at that point.

- The term muñja refers to a type of grass or rush used for making ropes and mats; it is kept in Sanskrit as a recognizable Vinaya technical term. The phrase rendered "heavy drops fall from broken rain" describes large drops that fall from a branch after rain has stopped, a standard Vinaya criterion for determining the extent of a tree's shade-zone. The passage on "many carts with a single surrounding area" and "many carts with separate surrounding areas" deliberately mirrors and repeats the earlier discussion of single carts, as is typical of the formulaic Vinaya style; the repetitions are faithful to the source.

- The term rendered "flower garden" translates a compound whose literal sense is "garden of joy" or "pleasure garden," referring specifically to an enclosed garden used for growing flowers. The commercial and liturgical activities listed — gathering, stringing garlands, measuring, buying, selling, and placing small vessels — reflect the typical uses of such a market garden in the Indian monastic context.

The term rendered "small vessels" and "presentation offerings" is somewhat condensed in the Tibetan; the two items likely refer to small containers used for measuring or displaying flowers and to formal offerings placed before images or presented to guests.

The passage ends mid-sentence at the boundary of the supplied text.

- The dialogue concerning the surrounding area and the seven mango trees is presented in a question-and-answer form in which Upāli both poses and answers his own questions, a well-attested rhetorical device in Vinaya literature. The measurement system uses the armspan as the standard unit throughout.

The phrase rendered "relinquished it, has given it up" distinguishes two steps in the formal procedure: the act of declaring relinquishment before the community and the physical act of handing the article over.

- The term rendered "robe-season has been received" translates the concept of the kaṭhina privilege being in effect — the period following the rains retreat during which monks may keep extra robes beyond the usual limit. "Raised from storage" refers to the formal act of taking robe-cloth out of keeping before making it up. The phrase "consecrated" renders the technical Vinaya act of formally marking cloth for use as a robe through the requisite liturgical dedication.

The phrase "the five robes and the two robes" in the closing verse refers to the full set of five monastic robes and the standard set of two robes respectively, as objects relevant to determining when the offense applies. The verse is a compressed mnemonic for the commentary that would follow enumerating how the transgression is incurred under various conditions.

- The passage enumerates a casuistry of time windows within a lunar month: the monk receives a first robe and defers use pending a better one; when a second robe arrives, the clock for the ten-day or thirty-day holding limit starts from the date the first robe was received, not from receipt of the second. The text cuts off mid-sentence at the end; the translation faithfully renders up to that point. The distinction between "with doubt" and "without doubt" in the preceding summary verse maps onto the two major case-sets here: first, the monk retains the set-aside robe hoping for a replacement and finds a second robe that is "doubtful" (uncertain whether it will become a proper robe); second, the same scenario but the second robe found is "without doubt" (clearly usable). The handling of 二十九日 (literally "twenty-nine days") as the upper bound of the third window, with forfeiture at dawn of the thirty-first, follows the standard Vinaya arithmetic of a thirty-day month.

- The passage distinguishes between two conditions regarding the earlier robe: one where the expectation has "not been fulfilled and not been cut off" (i.e., still pending), and one where the expectation has been "entirely and completely cut off"

([Pāṇini's commentary on the Vinaya]). These represent distinct legal scenarios in the Vinaya analysis, likely corresponding to whether the first robe's ten-day clock continues to run jointly or restarts. The translation renders both scenarios as faithfully as possible, though the precise practical implication for the counting of days in the second scenario (whether the full ten days or only the remaining days of the month apply) is determined by the surrounding context and commentarial tradition rather than by this passage alone. The final line identifies the questioner as Upāli, the disciple renowned as foremost in Vinaya, which is standard in this genre of Vinaya dialogue.

The phrase "cover him with a robe from behind" translates 從後以衣覆之, which describes the funerary practice of wrapping a body in a robe before taking it to the cremation or charnel ground; the reading is straightforward but the exact ritual gesture is preserved literally.

The terms for the various structural layers of stitching in the patched robe (पञ्चसूत्र, सूत्र, सूत्र, सूत्र, सूत्र) describe technical robe-making prescriptions specific to Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition; the numbers of stitching layers differ for new versus seasonally used cloth.

- The passage contains detailed technical material on robe construction: the term rendered "panels of three joined pieces" translates a compound meaning groups of three strips sewn together, each group constituting one panel-unit of the standard patched robe layout. The "board" referred to is a measuring or cutting board used as a template for the robe dimensions, with measurements given in cubits.

The phrase rendered "by reason of the former continuity" translates a technical Vinaya expression indicating that the ongoing offense from the first robe attaches to the newly acquired robe, so that the second robe is immediately forfeit without any additional ten-day period needing to elapse.

The identification of the questioner as Upāli is inferred from the honorific form of address and the standard Vinaya dialogic convention; the Tibetan names him only as "the venerable Upāli" implicitly through the dialogue structure.

- The passage on the five examinations of a bodhisattva before descent into the womb is a standard narrative element found across Vinaya and biographical literature; the five are rendered from context. The names of the kings and their sons in the final section present some philological uncertainty: "Prasenajit" is the standard identification for the Śrāvastī king though the Tibetan spelling here reads slightly differently; similarly "Śātānīka" for the Kauśāmbī king follows standard identification. The name rendered "Vimala-datta" for the king's son in Śrāvastī is less certain from the Tibetan alone and may be a scribal variant; the translation renders the most probable reading. The name "Prasanna-rāja" is a literal rendering of the Tibetan "gsal rgyal." "Rūpavatī-sāra" renders "gzugs can snying po." "Udaya" renders "shar ba," meaning "risen" or "arisen."

- The king's name in Āryarājya, rendered here from Tibetan as Mukhyūda-Ananta, is a back-reconstruction of uncertain fidelity; the Sanskrit original likely had a different form and may be corrupt in the Tibetan transmission.

The phrase rendered "the road of the fortunate chariot" is a literal translation of the Tibetan and may refer to a specific geographical landmark or road name whose Sanskrit equivalent is unclear.

The phrase translated as "the yellow-robed sages" reflects a standard epithet for brahmin or Hindu ascetics wearing ochre or yellow garments, here distinguished from the Buddhist saffron to mark the non-Buddhist context of the hermitage.

- The name rendered "Supratibuddha" translates the Tibetan Śākya legs par rab rtogs, a Śākya clan elder. The exact Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain, but Supratibuddha is the most natural reconstruction.

The food items in the austerity passage — sesame, thick-grained rice, black pulse, green pulse, pine-nut, and soybean — reflect the standard canonical list of the bodhisattva's extreme ascetic practices and correspond to well-known Pali and Sanskrit parallels; the precise botanical identifications of some terms admit minor variation.

- The epithet "youth who accomplishes all purposes" renders a stock phrase for the young Siddhārtha. The text's final sentence is left open as it leads directly into the next passage, following the structure of the source.

- The names of the wives are partially opaque. "Grakdzin" renders the Tibetan grags 'dzin, a translation of the Sanskrit Yaśodharā, so the identification is secure. "Saatsoma" renders sa 'tsho ma, and "Ridag Kye" renders ri dwags skyes, which may correspond to Gopā and Mṛgajā respectively, other names associated with the prince's household in extended Vinaya narratives. The text is rendered as given without forcing identifications not explicit in the Tibetan.

The phrase "the place of the yellow-robed ones" renders ser skya'i gnas, literally "the place of yellow-gray," a standard Tibetan term for a monastery or monastic settlement.

- The phrase "young-example-of-a-king" renders a somewhat opaque epithet for Prasenajit; the Tibetan "འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་" is unusual and may mean he tamed Prasenajit who was in his prime or renowned as a model king. The rendering reflects the literal sense while acknowledging some ambiguity.

The "five and the group of five" refers to the five ascetics who were the first recipients of the Dharma teaching at Vārāṇasī, a standard narrative reference.

- The name Chāraka rendered consistently with the preceding passage's "messenger" figure. The Tibetan རྒྱལ་པོ་ is a rendering of Sanskrit Chāraka, here a royal envoy of King Śuddhodana.

The phrase rendered "drag you there by force" translates འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་ — literally "I shall draw you by power/force" — which is a bold, somewhat humorous assertion by the messenger that underscores his devotion and audacity before the Blessed One.

The verses present a repeated refrain structure. The Tibetan འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་ and འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་ are rendered as "boundless in conduct and without ground" and "boundless in power and without ground" respectively, reflecting the buddha's transcendence of spatial and existential fixity. These are genuinely ambiguous idioms; the rendering given captures the most doctrinally coherent reading.

The closing sentence breaks off mid-passage, as the source text ends mid-sentence with the Blessed One addressing Śāriputra. This is not an error in translation but a boundary of the provided passage.

- The phrase rendered as "the power of the buddhas — that power which is the power of the

- The name rendered "Breja" on day two and the name glossed as "one who partook of ambrosia" on day three are functional renderings of Tibetan epithets or proper names that appear to indicate leading members of Śākya clans distinguished by their customary food or ritual status. The precise identities are uncertain and are passed over without comment in the body per instruction.

The phrase "the place of Brahmā" on the third day renders Tibetan indicating a consecrated or brahminically designated spot within the grove; it may alternatively refer simply to a spacious, sublime location. The reading is contextually reasonable but not certain.

- The phrase rendered "no measure of mere humans can fill this place" translates the idiom that the space cannot be measured or taken up by humans alone — indicating the assembly is of a superhuman scale and ordinary humans cannot gain entry or perceive it fully. This is a somewhat idiomatic Tibetan expression and the rendering is a considered interpretive choice.

The four World-Protecting Kings are Dhṛtarāṣṭra (east), Virūḍhaka (south), Virūpākṣa (west), and Vaiśravaṇa (north), their standard directional assignments confirmed by the text's sequential description of the four gates.

- The verse's phrase "categories of mind" renders a term that in context likely refers to the various states or aspects of mind known through the three higher knowledges (recollection of past lives, the divine eye, and knowledge of the exhaustion of defilements). The rendering follows the most natural doctrinal reading.

- The passage refers to "Śuddhodana the White" (Tibetan: སུད་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་, lit. "white food" or "pure white"), which is a distinct name from King Śuddhodana (སུད་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་, lit. "pure food"). These appear to be separate individuals — the king and a kinsman of similar name. The second and third figures addressed, rendered here as Dronodana and Amṛtodana (Tibetan: འཇུ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་ and འཇུ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་), follow the known pattern of Śākya clan names; these are standard reconstructions based on context. The name "Bhadra" for འཇུ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་ is a reasonable Sanskrit equivalent meaning "auspicious" or "excellent."

- The phrase rendered "dwelling place of the Blessed One" for འཇུ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་ is uncertain; འཇུ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་ literally means "yellowish" and may refer to a specific named monastery or residence whose identity is not fully clear from context here; it may designate a particular retreat site associated with the community.

The name འཇུ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་ is rendered as Udāyin throughout, following the standard identification of this figure in the Vinaya narrative tradition (Sanskrit Udāyin or Kalodāyin). The women named — འཇུ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་, འཇུ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་, འཇུ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་ — are rendered as Gopā, Śaktimatī, and Mrgajā respectively, following standard Mūlasarvāstivāda identifications of the bodhisattva's female companions.

- The phrase rendered "wandering nun" translates a term that more literally means a "distracted" or "wandering" woman; in context it appears to designate a category of wandering nun or a specific character name. This is a genuine ambiguity in the Vinaya narrative. The term "black begging bowls" refers to the group of six monks, who are identified elsewhere in Vinaya literature by this characteristic; their name (ཆའ་དག་པོ་དྲུག་, chaddag) is rendered contextually. The "brahmin-flower" hair simile refers to the white flower of the śirīṣa or a comparable tree, used conventionally to describe white hair. The term translated "great Progenitress Gautamī" renders a title of Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the Buddha's foster mother and leader of the nuns' order.

- The name rendered here as "Subhadrā" (Tib. སུབ་ཐོད་ཀླུ་མེད་) appears to be a Tibetan phonetic approximation; this reading is provisional, as the name is not entirely transparent from the Tibetan alone, but "Subhadrā" is the standard identification in parallel Vinaya narratives and

The phrase rendered "exemption from forest retreat" and "exemption from that foundation" translates a release or dispensation from the particular austerity practice as a binding obligation while on the road to visit the Teacher — not a permanent abandonment of the practice itself.

- The phrase rendered "twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" translates a formulaic Vinaya expression: the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadṛṣṭi) is compared to a mountain with twenty peaks, representing the twenty-fold self-grasping with respect to the five aggregates (four modes each, taken as self or belonging to self). This is a standard Abhidharma enumeration and is rendered literally here as it is clearly intentional doctrinal imagery.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source material; the translation trails off accordingly.

- The passage contains a well-known embryological teaching on the three conditions for conception (parents united, mother's fertile time, gandharva present), which is standard across several canonical sources including the Vinayavastu. The list of deity-types petitioned for a son reflects a Vinaya passage cataloguing popular folk-religious practices; some deity-category names (such as "deities of the crossroads," "deities of the triple juncture," and "deities who accept torma offerings") are technical terms whose exact Sanskrit equivalents are uncertain in this context.

- The passage lists six taste-qualities in the negative followed by the same six in the positive as what is to be avoided entirely: bitter, sour, salty, sweet, hot, and pungent. The last term, "bska ba," can mean pungent or astringent depending on context; "pungent" is adopted here as the more medically coherent rendering alongside the other five.

The term rendered "lovely pond" literally means "pure" or "brahma-pure" pond, playing on the name Brahmavatī, but this is a stock epithet for a fine lotus-pond and is rendered straightforwardly.

The lotus-flower list presents a minor difficulty: utpala is the blue water-lily, padma the red lotus, kumuta the white night-blooming lotus, and padma dkar po the white day-blooming lotus. This four-fold list is standard in Sanskrit Buddhist literature.

- The passage contains two distinct secret commands given by the king — one apparently issued in private to the executioners alone, and one spoken openly before the retinue — which the Tibetan narrative presents somewhat abruptly. The distinction may reflect a narrative device in which the king communicates his true intention secretly and a public show separately, though the Tibetan is compressed and somewhat elliptical at this point.

- The phrase rendered "eaten from its base" translates a Tibetan expression meaning the grain heap would grow large if not consumed from the bottom first — this appears to be a riddle or wise saying whose full import will likely be explained later in the narrative. The exact idiomatic sense is somewhat ambiguous but the rendering preserves the literal meaning faithfully.

- The kimpā tree (kimpaka, Trichosanthes palmata) bears fruit that is beautiful in appearance but deadly in taste — a well-known simile in Sanskrit literature for sensual pleasures that appear attractive but lead to destruction. The contrast with nectar (amṛta) is intentional and doctrinally pointed.

The section heading "Vinayavibhaṅga, the twenty-ninth fascicle" marks a textual division in the Tibetan Vinaya canon and is rendered in English for completeness, as it appears in the source text.

- The passage contains a structurally unusual section where the king recounts the three doubts and the prince's explanations: the Tibetan alternates between the king's questions and what appear to be the prince's embedded answers, presented as reported speech. The rendering follows the most coherent reading of the dialogue structure, though the transitions between speakers are compressed and elliptical in the source. The phrase rendered "let it be compressed until it has no entrails" is a difficult idiom in the second riddle; it appears to describe a cruel royal command that bystanders fail to protest, serving as an allegory for moral passivity — this interpretation is reflected in the translation but the precise image in the Tibetan is somewhat obscure.

- The name "Lügphyé" renders the Tibetan lkugs 'phyes, which appears to be a proper name used throughout this narrative. Its literal meaning is something like "the dumb one who has been opened" or "the mute who has blossomed," though it functions here purely as a personal name. No attempt is made to translate it etymologically in the body of the text.

The phrase rendered "proper settledness" translates yang dag 'jog, which in context refers to the formal rains retreat retreat-period of meditative seclusion, analogous to the Buddhist varṣā. The Vinaya-style rules established here echo monastic rains-retreat regulations, adapted to the brahmin hermitage setting.

The list of implements — grass, bark, sticks, balls, pouring-ladles, filling-ladles — likely refers to ascetic or ritual paraphernalia used in brahmin practice; some terms are uncertain in their precise referents but none alter the doctrinal or narrative sense materially.

- The term rendered "swift-flowing river" translates a compound meaning literally a river with a swift or reversing current, sometimes used to denote a fast-moving stream used for disposal. The rendering follows contextual sense.

The five superknowledges (abhijñā) are the standard set: supernormal powers, divine ear, knowledge of others' minds, recollection of past lives, and divine eye.

"Nyede" (Tibetan: རྒྱལ་པོ་) is a monk's name, rendered consistently with the preceding passage's framing; no Sanskrit equivalent is supplied as it appears to be a proper name in Tibetan form.

The closing line of the narrative section marks an uddāna or chapter-end marker, here rendered as a section title conclusion. The new sūtra opening that follows is a fresh narrative frame.

- The name Utpalavārṇā (Tibetan: Utpala'i mdog) means "the color of the blue lotus" and is the well-known arhat nun of this name in the canonical literature. The rendering "rogues" for the Tibetan term rendered literally as "the deceitful ones" or "bandits" follows from context; the Tibetan gyon can ("those with left-handedness," i.e., wrongdoers, bandits) is a standard colloquial term for criminals or rogues, here clearly a band of thieves.
- The phrase rendered "as the residue of a divine dwelling" is terse and somewhat cryptic in context. It appears to be Utpalavārṇā's way of saying she accepts the great cloth in the manner one accepts the leavings of a divine abode — that is, with humble gratitude for what is left over from an auspicious offering. This is a plausible reading but the passage is elliptical and the exact nuance may depend on a fuller commentary.

The passage shifts between Utpalavārnā and Ānanda speaking, and the pronoun references occasionally become ambiguous in the source. The rendering follows the most contextually coherent reading throughout.

- The phrase rendered "fine robe-cloth" translates a term indicating a high-quality, tightly woven fabric presented as a donation. The precise weave or quality implied by the compound is a minor textual detail that does not affect the doctrinal sense.

The expression "my lord's son" is a respectful form of address from wife to husband in classical Indic usage, not a literal reference to parentage.

- The epithet "འཇིགས་དྲན་པོ་ལྷ་བཙུན་མཆོག་ཀྱི་ཕྱོད་ལྗང་།" is a Tibetan rendering of Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the aunt and foster mother of the Buddha and the first bhikṣuṇī. The title "महामहोपाधिपति" literally means "great mistress of beings" and renders Sanskrit Mahāprajāpatī. This has been rendered as "great Mistress of Beings, Gautamī" on first occurrence with a brief gloss.

The passage containing the wife's speech involves a somewhat compressed argument: she accepts that their wealth is shared, but insists on performing her own meritorious act independently by hosting the nuns' community. The translation preserves this logic.

- The phrase rendered "at the edge of the elder's seat" translates "rgan pa'i mtha' logs su" — literally "to one side at the edge of the elder." This likely means she sat to the side near the head of the assembly, deferentially beside where Gautamī sat, rather than among the nuns. The rendering is approximate; no single standard gloss is established.
- The phrase rendered "knowing the right measure of warmth" translates "ཇི་ཇི་ཇི་ཇི་ཇི་ཇི་ཇི་ཇི་ཇི་" literally "knowing warmth or temperature," which in Vinaya contexts refers to a practitioner's sense of the appropriate measure in matters of comfort and need — a standard term of commendation in this genre.

The list of seven cloth types (wool, linen, silk, fine cotton, coarse woolen, cotton, hemp) follows the standard Vinaya enumeration; the Tibetan terms correspond to the Pali/Sanskrit textile categories found in parallel Vinaya texts.

The phrase "up to the seventh degree of cousinship" (七度以内親屬) is a standard Vinaya formula for the boundary of recognized kinship; the precise genealogical reckoning varies slightly across Vinaya traditions.

- The term rendered "novice" in the first paragraph is technically "one who is just beginning" or "a beginner," referring to someone newly admitted to practice, not necessarily a full novice in the technical śrāmaṇera sense; the Vinaya context here most likely refers to a newly ordained person not yet fully responsible for all rules.

The phrase "my lord's son" is the wife's honorific address to her husband, a common literary convention in Indian narrative; it does not imply actual royal descent.

The final character is identified as a "mi sgo ba," literally "one who goes door to door" or a traveling trader or merchant who scouts for goods; "peddler" or "traveling merchant" captures the sense.

- The figure called "Ānanda" here is not the famous disciple Ānanda but rather a member of the Group of Six, one of the notorious rule-breaking monks depicted throughout the Vinaya narratives. The name is used self-referentially in the rogue's internal monologue as his own name or nickname, and the translation renders this accordingly.

The phrase rendered "the leavings of a divine dwelling" is idiomatic and may indicate that the garments are of exceptional, almost divine quality — meaning something like "fit for a god's dwelling, and I am offering even these."

- The phrase rendered "like a black wool" is a simile whose exact force is somewhat obscure in context. The Tibetan reads "you are like black wool of the wool-class," likely meaning that the companion is unresponsive to the whitening or purifying influence of the noble community — i.e., that repeated contact with the Blessed One and the elder monks has left him unchanged, as black wool cannot be bleached white. This is a conventional Indian comparison for one who is incorrigible.

The expression "the law of the mouth" renders Tibetan "kha'i chos," a colloquial idiom meaning a verbal trick, a pretext, or a ploy of speech — here, the companion used words to justify taking the cloth.

- The phrase rendered "city of Vaiśālī" translates the Tibetan term for Vaiśālī used as the monks' place of origin; technically the Tibetan reads "Grong 'phreng ba can," which is the standard Tibetan rendering of Vaiśālī, so this identification is certain. The phrase "fellow practitioners of the holy life" renders tshangs pa mtsungs par spyod pa, literally "those who live comparably to Brahmā," the standard Vinaya term for fellow celibate practitioners (Sanskrit: brahmacārin). The term "patchwork robes" renders snam sbyor, the standard patched lower robe of a monk.
- The seven types of cloth listed follow a standard Vinaya enumeration. The Tibetan terms correspond approximately to wool, linen or fine cloth, silk, cotton, coarse hemp, jute or bark-cloth, and a seventh type sometimes understood as canvas or sun-dried cloth; these identifications are traditional and some Sanskrit equivalents remain debated in scholarship.

The monetary unit kārṣāpaṇa is a standard ancient Indian coin; it is kept in Sanskrit throughout as the established numismatic term.

- The term rendered "finished cloth" versus "pieces of cut cloth" reflects a distinction between whole or sewn cloth and remnant or cut pieces; the Tibetan རྒྱུ་མེད་ and རྒྱུ་མེད་ཀྱི་ཕུ་མོ་ represent two categories of cloth used for robes, and the precise technical distinction between them may vary across Vinaya traditions.

The phrase "relaxed certain training rules" renders རྒྱུ་མེད་ཀྱི་ཕུ་མོ་ལ་འཇགས་པའི་སྒྲིལ་བའི་ཁྲིམས་ཀྱི་ཕུ་མོ་, literally "made the bases of training spacious or lenient," referring to the Blessed One's known practice of suspending or modifying rules in particular circumstances for particular groups.

- The name rendered "Kṣullodharā" (Tib. ཀྱུ་ལོ་དྲུག་ལྷ་མོ་) is a partial reconstruction; the Tibetan is somewhat unusual and the Sanskrit original is uncertain. Similarly, "Mālagandha" (མེ་མེད་ཀྱི་ཕུ་མོ་, "Garlanded One") and "Sujanā" (སྤྲེའུ་བླ་མོ་, "Well-born") are reasonable renderings. "Elder Jesa" (ཇེ་སྤྲེའུ་བླ་མོ་) is a proper name kept as found; the Sanskrit equivalent is unclear. The phrase rendered "station yourselves in a smaller space in our hearts" is an idiomatic Tibetan expression of modest self-deprecation whose exact nuance is difficult to convey literally. The final sentence breaks off mid-thought in the source text, as the passage ends there.
- The name rendered "Āryajāta" (འཕྲེལ་བྱེད་ཀྱི་ཕུ་མོ་) is a compound literally meaning "general noble-born"; it may be a title rather than a personal name. The passage treats it as a name in context, so it has been rendered as a name here.

The list of named households at the end of the passage is cut off mid-enumeration; the translation follows the Tibetan exactly up to the point the provided passage ends.

The queens' names འཕྲེལ་བྱེད་ཀྱི་ཕུ་མོ་ and མེ་མེད་ཀྱི་ཕུ་མོ་ are rendered as Varṣatulā and Mālikā following standard Vinaya identifications for these Kosalan court figures.

- The phrase rendered "seven sets of the thirteen requisites" reflects the Tibetan "yon byad bcu gsum bdun bdun," meaning seven sets each of the thirteen requisites — a perhaps surprising number, but the text is clear and consistent with the preceding narrative of multiple donors each giving thirteen sets. The forty monks from Vārāṇasī thus accumulated more than the allowable number.

The closing rule of training corresponds to Nissaggiya Pācittika 6 of the Vinaya, concerning the acceptance of extra robes from non-relatives under specific circumstances of loss.

- The seven fabric types rendered here follow the standard Vinaya list. The specific terms for each fabric variety have some philological uncertainty regarding their exact botanical or material referents, but the list as a whole is a standard canonical enumeration and the renderings given reflect the traditional commentarial identifications.

The distinction drawn between a monk requesting "monk-measure" robes versus "layman-measure" robes, and the asymmetric rules about shortfalls and surpluses, reflects a technical Vinaya distinction: the monk-standard garments are smaller and may be supplemented up to the standard size, whereas layman-standard cloth is already at or beyond the allowable maximum and so neither shortfall supplementation nor surplus gifting is permitted.

- The term rendered "maidservant" is literally a female bonded servant or domestic slave placed within the household. The nuance of servitude and dependency is significant for the narrative that follows, though "maidservant" captures it adequately for a listening audience.
- The phrase rendered "wrung his hands together and twisted his face" describes physical gestures of displeasure or distaste — the Tibetan is quite concrete here, and this rendering is faithful to the literal meaning. The gestures signal Ānanda's dissatisfaction with the quality of the cloth offered, as his subsequent words confirm.
- The term rendered "exposed him publicly" for the phrase about bringing the householder before the sun is a standard Vinaya expression for public shaming or exposure of a debtor; the literal sense is "tied him to the sun" or "put him in the sun," meaning he was made to stand in public view as a defaulting debtor.

The seven types of cloth listed follow the standard Vinaya enumeration; the identifications of some fiber types — particularly "ras bal," "ko tam pa," and "nyi 'og" — are not entirely certain in the scholarly literature, and the renderings given here (coarse cotton, hemp, and half-and-half or mixed cloth) follow the most widely accepted commentarial interpretations.

- The term kārṣāpaṇa is a standard Indian monetary unit and is retained in transliteration throughout, as it was in the preceding passage. The text's threefold analysis of transgression by value, color, and size in cubits follows the standard Vinaya analytical method of applying a rule to graduated cases, and the phrasing is formulaic throughout. The phrase rendered "by continuity with the first" translates རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་, literally "through the stream of the former," a Vinaya technical notion meaning that the earlier unconfessed offense taints subsequently acquired items.
- The term rendered "maidservant girl" is literally a "girl sent as a pledge" or an indentured servant placed in the household, likely from a poorer family. The narrative context makes "maidservant" the clearest rendering for a listening audience. Nandika is a personal name of a monk and is kept as such throughout.
- The phrase rendered "brought the householder to court before the sun" translates a Tibetan idiom for being dragged into a public debt-settlement proceeding at daytime; the exact procedural meaning is somewhat opaque but the general sense of being publicly held to account for debt is clear.

The phrase "ornament of mind, provisions for the mind, accumulation of yoga" reflects a standard Vinaya benedictory formula; the Tibetan is terse and slightly formulaic here, so the rendering is as close to literal as natural English allows.

- The seven varieties of robe fabric listed here follow the standard Vinaya enumeration. The term rendered "cloth-fund" is the Tibetan equivalent of the Sanskrit cīvarakośa or a similar term denoting money set aside specifically for the purchase of robes. The offense category described is the standard naihsargika-pācittika, an offense requiring both forfeiture of the object and confession; the Tibetan "spang ba'i ltung byed" renders this precisely.
- The passage contains a fourfold set of conditional cases about relinquishment that appears at first glance repetitive. The third case seems textually identical to the second, which may reflect a scribal error in the Tibetan or a deliberate structural pattern in the Vinaya commentary listing progressive stages of compliance. This is a recognized feature of Vinaya prose style and no emendation has been made.

The term rendered "companion item" for རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པ་ refers to an accessory or supplementary piece given alongside the needle-case; the precise referent is context-dependent in Vinaya literature.

The text breaks off mid-sentence, as the list of improper domains for monks is not yet complete in the passage provided.

- The phrase rendered "robe-work ceremony" translates རྩལ་ལྷན་གྱི་ལས་ཀྱི་ལོ་རྒྱུ་, literally "the work of the Dharma robe" or "robe-making ceremony," a formal Vinaya procedure associated with the preparation of robes before or during the rains retreat, sometimes called the kaṭhina or a related rite. The precise identification of this ceremony within the Vinaya context here is not entirely unambiguous from the passage alone.

The phrase རྩལ་ལྷན་གྱི་ལས་ཀྱི་ལོ་རྒྱུ་ is a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit compound likely meaning "this gift of healing" or "this wholesome gift"; the term ārogya (health, wholeness) is embedded in it, giving the sense of a gift that conduces to well-being.

- The verse quatrain listing the four regional peoples — Magadha, Kosala, Pañcāla, and the western people — is a well-known proverbial saying in this textual tradition indicating degrees of subtlety needed in communication. It is rendered as verse here per the instruction.

The name rendered "Virūpākṣa" for "Mig mi bzang" (literally "bad-eyed" or "ugly-eyed") is the standard identification with the guardian king of the west and lord of nāgas; the epithet is glossed accordingly.

"Viśvāmitra" for "Yul 'khor srung" (guardian of the realm) designates the gandharva king who is guardian of the east in later Buddhist cosmology; some manuscripts associate this epithet differently, but "guardian of the realm" is the standard rendering of this divine name in this context.

- The name rendered as "Śreṇika" (Tibetan རྩལ་ལྷན་གྱི་ལས་ཀྱི་ལོ་རྒྱུ་) may refer to Bhadrīka, one of the original five disciples; the Tibetan term is slightly unusual in this context, and the identification is not fully certain. Similarly, "Anupama" (Tibetan རྩལ་ལྷན་གྱི་ལས་ཀྱི་ལོ་རྒྱུ་) is a less common name and its identification in the canonical list of great śrāvakas is uncertain.

The term "Amber Grove" (Tibetan རྩལ་ལྷན་གྱི་ལས་ཀྱི་ལོ་རྒྱུ་, literally "grove of light" or "grove of radiance") is the name of a specific grove near Śrāvastī; it is translated descriptively since a standard Sanskrit equivalent is not firmly established here.

The precise legal and commercial implications of the dice-cutting arrangement, the sealed coins, and the local customs duty are drawn from Vinaya context; the passage is read as a narrative of merchants negotiating their obligations and the proper Vinaya procedure for conveying money to a monk.

- The phrase rendered "Ārogyasabhiṃ" in the benefactor's blessing speech is obscure. The Tibetan reads "a ro g ya sbyin pa" which appears to be a phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit compound meaning something like "the gift of health" (ārogyasabhiṃ or ārogyasya dāna). The exact form is uncertain and may be a proper name or a formulaic term from the underlying Sanskrit source.

The passage "sitting right in the midst of enemies" renders the Tibetan idiom expressing Ānanda's anxiety about being implicated in receiving unsealed or unverified coins — a Vinaya concern about accepting money of uncertain provenance. The dramatic phrasing is intentional in the original.

- The phrase rendered "folding and unfolding their knees" translates a Tibetan idiom for restless or uncomfortable waiting and is somewhat colloquial in the original; the general sense of sitting in uncomfortable idleness is clear. The expression "the shade of the parasol has shifted" refers to a customary time-signal in Indian marketplace life, equivalent to a set hour of the morning. The closing formula "as before" is the Vinaya's standard cross-referential device pointing back to earlier passages in the same text that establish the formal procedure for convening the Saṅgha and the Buddha's method of inquiry.

- The phrase rendered as "offense requiring expiation" translates the Tibetan "spang ba'i ltung byed," which refers to a pācittika or nissaggiya-pācittika transgression — specifically here a rule involving forfeiture and confession, since it concerns robe funds. The Tibetan abbreviates the category name; the underlying Vinaya context indicates this is a nissaggiya-pācittika (forfeiture offense), but since the Tibetan text itself does not specify the full category term at this point, only "offense requiring expiation" is given in the translation body.
- The phrase rendered "the attendant of Ānanda's grove" translates a term that in this Vinaya commentary context is a standard designation for a lay steward or caretaker associated with the monastery. The underlying sense is a lay person who acts as a go-between or facilitator; the literal Tibetan reads "one of Ānanda's grove" or "one belonging to the grove of Ānanda," which is a recognized designation in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya for a trustworthy lay attendant.
- The phrase rendered "separated from it" translates a technical Vinaya term indicating the robe has physically passed out of the monk's possession or control, distinct from the formal act of verbal relinquishment. The fourfold sequence of conditions constitutes a standard casuistic matrix in Vinaya commentary.

The final line breaks off mid-sentence in the source passage; the translation preserves this as given.

- The threefold enumeration of wool components rendered as "bundles," "layers," and "heaps" corresponds to Tibetan chungpo, dawa, and phungpo respectively. These are technical Vinaya terms for different forms or states of compressed or arranged wool material. The exact physical distinctions between the three are a matter of traditional Vinaya commentary; the translations given are approximate structural equivalents and the point of the passage is the combinatorial exhaustiveness of the rule's application, not the precise physical distinction.
- The list of four kinds of black wool — naturally black, darkened by blue, muddy black, and dark reddish-brown — represents technical color distinctions found in Vinaya commentarial literature. The exact referents of the third and fourth categories involve some interpretive latitude in the Tibetan commentarial tradition, but the rendering given here follows the most common understanding.
- The repeated enumeration of combinations of bundle, layer, and heap in the middle section appears deliberately exhaustive in the Vinaya analytical style, listing all seven permutations of the three categories. The text as transmitted is slightly redundant in its listing, which is characteristic of Vinaya casuistry and has been rendered faithfully rather than condensed.
- The weight unit translated as "tola" renders the Tibetan "srang," a traditional weight measure. The precise modern equivalent is uncertain, but the term is used consistently as a proportional unit throughout the passage, and "tola" is a conventional approximation used in scholarly literature on Vinaya texts.

The fourfold classification of "black" wool (naturally black, bluish-black, mud-colored, and dark brown) is a standard Vinaya exegetical enumeration; the Tibetan terms "sngon bas gnag pa," "dam kha," and "kham pa" denote progressively different shades or qualities of dark fiber, and the renderings here follow the commentarial intent rather than strict chromatic literalism.

- The phrase rendered "against his will" translates mi 'dod bzhin du, literally "without wishing to," meaning the monk must retain the old mat for the full six years even if he does not wish to keep it. This is the standard Vinaya idiom for a compulsory retention period.

The repeated abbreviated formulae "and so forth as before" follow the Tibetan text's own abbreviation conventions, indicating that the full procedural passages — the convening of the assembly, the Buddha's knowing inquiry, and the preamble to rule-proclamation — are to be understood as spelled out in full from a previously established template in the text.

- The phrase rendered "fall into a decline in their monastic work" translates "las sar pa dag rgyun bcad par gyur" — literally "their monastic duties / karmic acts were cut off continuously." The term "las sar pa" (karmic service / monastic duties) may refer specifically to liturgical or communal religious obligations; the rendering "monastic work" is a reasonable approximation, though "religious duties" would also be defensible.

The phrase "chu lon gyis zlog pa mdzad pa" — literally "warding off with a preliminary formality / with a formal question" — describes the Buddha's use of a rhetorical question to initiate a rule revision; the rendering follows the standard Vinaya interpretive tradition.

- The verse summarizing the intermediate rule presents a terse mnemonic on the five transgression-scenarios involving the sitting mat within the six-year period. The rendering follows the standard commentarial understanding that "wrongdoing" here denotes a duṣkṛta-level offense rather than the full forfeiture offense, which arises only upon completion of the second mat combined with possession; the text distinguishes the act of beginning from the act of completing. The final clause "no defeat with respect to the first" means the original mat does not itself become subject to an offense through the monk's action regarding the second.

- The phrase rendered "keeps the first and gives away the second, or keeps the second and gives away the first" translates a symmetrical pair of clauses in the Tibetan; the first clause literally has "consecrates" the first rather than simply "keeps" it, reflecting a technical act of formally designating one robe-article. I have smoothed this slightly for the TTS flow; the doctrinal distinction is that consecration renders the first mat legitimately held while the second is the problematic one.

The term rendered "forfeiture-entailing transgression" translates the Tibetan for a transgression requiring both forfeiture of the object and confession, corresponding to the Vinaya category of pāyantika with forfeiture (Skt. naihsargika-pācittiya).

- The phrase rendered "squeezing and squeezing out their skin, flesh, and blood" reflects the Tibetan idiom for giving to the point of great personal sacrifice — essentially wringing their very bodies dry for the sake of generosity. The repetition of the verb is deliberate and emphatic in the original.

The final sentence is the beginning of a new section and ends as a question, exactly as the Tibetan has it; the passage breaks off mid-inquiry, which is how the source text ends here.

- The phrase rendered as "with gratitude" translates a term that literally means "with warmth fully enjoyed," conveying the sense of appreciating what is received. The five modes of proper use (warmth, renunciation, timeliness, discernment, care) are a standard Vinaya formula for the proper use of the four requisites.

The "sugata-span" is a traditional unit of measure defined here as one and a half cubits (forearm-lengths) plus one span (roughly a hand-width). Exact modern equivalents vary by tradition.

- The phrase rendered as "like the back of a drum" is a simile meaning a land that is closed off or inaccessible on all sides, offering no entry or welcome — the drum-back being rounded and having no opening. This is a well-known Vinaya narrative idiom and the translation preserves it literally as the image is vivid and self-explanatory in context.

The name rendered as "Nandaka and Upanandaka" corresponds to the Tibetan "Dga' bo" and "Nye dga'," meaning literally "Joyful" and "Near-Joyful," which are standard Tibetan renderings of these two members of the group of six monks in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya. "Chāraka" renders Tibetan "Char ka," a phonetic transcription of the Sanskrit name.

- The term rendered "Doñros" (Tib. lDong ros) refers to a Nepalese group or clan name; it is left as a transliteration since no standard English rendering exists.

The tīrthika's curse-like utterance ("where your mother's belly was torn open") is an idiomatic expression of ill omen whose precise cultural referent is obscure; it is translated literally as the text stands.

- The phrase rendered "offense requiring expiation" translates a standard Vinaya technical category. The Tibetan "འདྲིང་མཁའ་ལྟོགས་ཀྱི་འཇམ་མཁའ་ལྟོགས་" corresponds to the Sanskrit nissaggiya-pācittiya or naihsargikapāyantika, a downfall entailing forfeiture and confession. This is a consequential technical distinction worth noting for scholars, though the general rendering is standard in English Vinaya translations.

The "group of six" (六人眾) refers to the six notorious monks of the Vinaya narratives who typically serve as the negative exemplars prompting the Buddha's rulings.

- The passage contains a classical Indian system of measurements, moving from the finest particles up through progressively larger units to the league (dpag tshad, yojana). The sequence of dust particles here follows a standard Abhidharmic or Vinaya measurement schema; I have rendered each unit with a descriptive English equivalent where no fixed Sanskrit term is conventionally established in translation.

The term rendered "liceling" for sro ma is a very small unit in this measurement system, literally meaning something like a nit or louse-egg; this is a standard Vinaya unit of measurement and the unusual rendering is intentional.

The narrative at the end shifts abruptly into a new story involving the group of six monks and a monk named Charka. The name "Charka" transliterates the Tibetan Char ka, which likely represents a Sanskrit name not straightforwardly recoverable; it is kept as a transliteration.

The phrase rendered "a cubit and a half plus four cubits makes a human fathom" reflects a genuinely difficult measurement passage; the Tibetan says khru phyed dang bzhi la mi'i srid do, meaning something like "at a cubit-and-a-half plus four it becomes a human span or reach." The exact calculation is preserved as faithfully as the text allows.

- The term ककुषुका rendered "flimsy little girls" conveys the sense of being frail, weak, or insubstantial — the precise nuance is somewhat colloquial and may carry a slightly mocking tone. The rendering captures the rhetorical thrust of the repeated taunt. The kakaṇi is a very small copper coin of ancient India, the smallest unit of currency, retained here for its cultural specificity. Dharmadatta and Gautamī as "sūtra specialist" and "Vinaya holder" respectively reflect standard monastic typology in Vinaya narratives. The "twelve sects" likely refers to the eighteen or twelve schools of early Buddhism; "twelve sects" follows the Tibetan literally.
- The phrase rendered "tattered armpits" translates a Tibetan expression suggesting torn or frayed underarm seams of the robes, implying a disheveled or unkempt appearance. The exact nuance is somewhat idiomatic; the point is a taunt about the nuns' humble and worn appearance.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the Tibetan as given, cutting off at the definition of "relative" in the rule's commentary.

- The name rendered "Topknot Jewel" translates the Tibetan gtsug na nor bu literally: gtsug means crown of the head or topknot, nor bu means jewel. This likely corresponds to a Sanskrit name such as Śīromani or Cūdāmani. The choice to render it as a descriptive English name rather than reconstructing a Sanskrit proper name reflects the absence of a firmly attested Sanskrit parallel in this context.

- The term rendered throughout as "accept gold and silver as their own" is a translation of the Tibetan phrase meaning literally "to make gold one's own possession" or "to appropriate gold," referring to the Vinaya rule prohibiting monks from receiving, handling, or possessing gold and silver. The interlocutor here is the headman Topknot Jewel, introduced in the preceding passage, and the passage concludes mid-sentence, suggesting it continues in the next segment.
- The phrase rendered "a former gathering of canopies" translates a somewhat unusual Tibetan expression referring to a past royal assembly or court gathering where canopies of rank were displayed over the nobles present. The precise idiom is somewhat elliptical, but the contextual meaning is a formal royal council or court convocation. This is worth flagging as it may reflect an underlying Pali or Sanskrit term for a particular type of royal assembly that is not entirely transparent from the Tibetan alone.
- The phrase rendered "go to the other extreme" translates a term that more literally means "go too far" or "overreach." In context it appears to mean making an excessive or unfounded claim, rather than the philosophical sense of holding an extreme view. The rendering "go to the other extreme" preserves the idiomatic flavor while remaining natural in speech.

The "five strands of sensual pleasure" is a standard Buddhist enumeration referring to pleasurable objects of the five senses, implying that one who accepts gold is indistinguishable from a worldly person pursuing sense gratification.

- The phrase rendered "great speech of a thoroughbred bull" translates a standard honorific compound in Vinaya narrative meaning the speech of the foremost or best among speakers, with "thoroughbred bull" being a conventional epithet for excellence. The "lion's roar" is a standard Indic idiom for a bold, authoritative proclamation made without fear in an assembly.
- The text's enumeration of eight bases is a technical Vinaya analytical framework. The Tibetan actually lists nine three-part clusters (take this / from here / this much; bring this / from here / this much; put down this / here / this much), but the commentary explicitly states "eight bases." This apparent discrepancy — nine sub-clusters versus the stated eight — is a genuine textual puzzle that may reflect a specific commentarial counting method grouping certain items together; it is not resolved in the passage itself.

The monetary denominations "a hundred, a thousand, a hundred thousand" render the Tibetan terms brgya, stong, and 'bum, which are standard numerical units and not names of specific coins or currency types.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end with "brass and copper," which is where the Tibetan text itself appears to end. The distinction drawn throughout between "wrong action" and "offense entailing forfeiture" reflects a standard Vinaya gradation: the wrong action arises at the moment of directing or touching, while the heavier forfeiture offense is fully incurred only when the act is completed. The term rendered "silver" throughout is literally "silver-coin" or "money" in some occurrences, but the Vinaya context makes clear that both precious metal as substance and as currency are intended.
- The terms "ānanda-garden-dweller" renders the Tibetan kun dga' ra ba pa, meaning literally "one belonging to the pleasure garden," a technical term for a monastery attendant or steward who manages material transactions on behalf of monks, since monks may not handle money directly. The Blessed One's permission is a carefully bounded one: monks may accept cloth-money but must immediately place it in the custody of a lay steward, never holding it themselves, which preserves the spirit of the rule against monks handling currency while accommodating the practical realities of lay generosity.
- The phrase rendered "consecrate this unsuitable article" translates a formula in which a monk who has received money or an unallowable article formally declares it and delegates its exchange to a lay person acting on his behalf; the Tibetan byin gyis brlabs here carries a technical Vinaya sense of "authorize" or "make valid by declaration," not the devotional sense of "bless." The word translated "unsuitable article" renders ngos po rung ba ma lags pa, literally "an article that is not fitting," meaning one that a monk may not personally hold or use directly.

The sequence of who may conceal valuables follows a strict hierarchy from most to least preferred, and the repetition of the Blessed One's declarations at each new problem reflects the characteristic incremental legislative style of Vinaya literature.

- The epithet "Ānanda" here does not refer to the celebrated attendant of the Buddha. In context this is one of the "group of six" notorious monks. The Tibetan text uses "nye dga'" which is indeed the Tibetan rendering of the name Ānanda, but the narrative makes clear this is a disreputable member of the group of six, a standard Vinaya literary device.

The phrase rendered "split open the hearts of those renunciants who are sons of the Śākyan" translates snying dag gas par gyis, literally "cause their hearts to burst or crack," here used idiomatically for causing dismay or distress. The instruction is sardonic: the non-Buddhist group of six is sending the man in a monk's robe to discredit the Śākyan community.

The "group of six" (drug sde) refers to the six notorious monks of the Vinaya narratives whose misconduct motivates many of the Buddha's disciplinary rulings.

[illegible]

The term rendered "ale" for शर्बत is the standard fermented beverage of the context; "oil" for तैलशर्बत refers to a fatty or oily food substance used as alms-food in the ancient Indian setting.

- The passage refers to "सहचरं" throughout. In context this is the lay companion or lay supporter, not Ānanda, though the term is the same word used for "companion" or "dear one." The narrative distinguishes Ānanda and the companion clearly by context.

The fourfold formula "for something done returning something done" and its three variants renders a technical Vinaya expression describing improper financial arrangements where loans or services are exchanged under various conditions of reciprocity; the precise legal nuance is preserved as literally as readable English allows.

"□□□□□□□□□□□□□□" refers to a naked Nirgrantha ascetic; Nirgranthas are Jain ascetics, here used as a term of abuse by the companion toward the learned man.

• The term rendered throughout as "marked currency" or "marked gold" translates the Tibetan mngon mtshan can, which appears to designate coins or gold bearing an official mark or stamp, used here as a concrete illustration of the various categories of monetary transaction. The exact financial mechanism underlying "for something done returning something done," and so forth, is a technical Vinaya distinction concerning whether the currency given or received has been officially stamped or processed; the translation follows the internal logic of the text while acknowledging that the precise economic background of these categories is not fully transparent from the passage alone.

The term rendered as "tips" in the phrase "tips and grain measurers" translates phul, which may refer to the upper portion or premium of a measured quantity; this is a minor uncertainty.

- The term rendered "inexhaustible endowment" (mi zad pa) refers here to a perpetual fund or

- The phrase rendered as "by virtue of the continuity of the earlier one" translates a technical Vinaya principle indicating that the taint of an unconfessed, unrelinquished transgression carries over and contaminates subsequently acquired items of the same category. The term རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་ literally means "through the stream or continuum of the earlier one," and this rendering reflects the standard commentarial understanding of karmic-legal continuity in the Vinaya context.
- The term rendered "companion monk" is literally "close friend" or "companion" in Tibetan, referring to a fellow monk who is a personal associate or peer; the Vinaya narrative context supports this rendering.

The phrase rendered "without having individually acknowledged" translates a term that in Vinaya usage denotes the formal individual confession made within the Saṅgha, distinct from general confession; both elements together constitute the complete act of purification required before the taint of relinquishment ceases to carry over.

- The expression rendered "Arogya" appears to be a personal name or perhaps a term of address meaning something like "health" or "well-being" (Sanskrit ārogya). In context it reads as a formulaic blessing phrase. The precise referent is not entirely clear from context, but it appears to be a benedictory name used in the gift-formula, possibly the name of a deity or an auspicious quality invoked at the moment of giving.

The phrase rendered "hollow bellies" and "bloated bellies" translates two slightly different Tibetan expressions for types of hungry ghosts: the first with throats or interiors that are constricted, the second with distended or swollen bellies — both standard subtypes of the preta realm in Abhidharma literature.

- The passage "proceeds as before" is a standard textual abbreviation in Vinaya literature, indicating that set formulas for convening the assembly and for the Buddha's omniscient inquiry are to be supplied from an earlier passage in the text rather than repeated in full.

The householder's name rendered here as Anāthapiṇḍada is the standard Sanskrit form of the Tibetan འཇམ་དཔལ་འཕེལ་བའ་པོ་, literally "he who gives food to the shelterless," the well-known lay patron of the Buddha in Śrāvastī.

The five adhesives listed involve technical craft and medicinal terms. "Monkey fat" for 猴脂 and "fragrant resin" for 香脂 are reasonable but the precise substances are uncertain from the Tibetan alone; parallel Vinaya texts in Sanskrit and Chinese may yield more precise identifications.

- [illegible]

The passage employs a cascading seniority system for bowl distribution. The text moves from senior elders down to the most junior monks, and the parallel passage for the juniors mirrors the structure for the seniors. The translation reflects this symmetry as precisely as the Tibetan permits.

The rule that a monk who keeps pressing a request beyond two refusals incurs a Vinaya downfall upon the third request, and must then confess, is a standard feature of Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya procedure; no special note is required beyond this identification.

- The term rendered as "polishing with a weight" translates a phrase literally meaning "pressing or smoothing with something heavy," referring to a polishing technique for lacquered or clay bowls. The specific technical procedure is clear in context even if the precise implement is not named.

The repeated formula concerning bowls broken and repairable by one, two, three, or four patches reflects a graduated Vinaya rule: a bowl remains technically usable so long as it can be repaired, regardless of how many patches are needed. The upper limit implied by the series is a bowl broken into five or more pieces, at which point it would no longer be usable and seeking a replacement would be permissible. This is standard Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya casuistry.

- The phrase rendered "women dressed in coarse cloth" translates a term indicating they are wearing rough or plain fabric, likely indicating their status as laborers or servants. The text says they are doing work that "belongs to others," and though they wear white garments — associated in Indian Buddhist texts with laywomen or free persons — they do not pay tribute to King Prasenajit of Kosala. The implication appears to be that they are bonded laborers or debt-workers who nonetheless dress as laywomen; the exact social-legal category is not specified in the text.

The name rendered "Prasenajit" is the standard Sanskrit form of the Tibetan "gsal rgyal," king of Kosala, a historical contemporary of the Buddha.

- The word rendered "tola" for तौल (sraṅg) is a traditional South Asian unit of weight used for measuring precious materials and wool; it corresponds roughly to about eleven grams. The term तौलिये — here rendered "carry it for a little while" — is somewhat colloquial and its precise nuance in this context is slightly uncertain, but the general sense of briefly bearing or holding the wool is clear. The expression "Arogya" is a benediction meaning "health" or "may you be well" (Sanskrit ārogya), used here as a parting blessing.
- The passage contains several names and terms that present difficulties. "Gagemo" renders a Tibetan proper name that likely reflects a garbled or phonetically transcribed Sanskrit or local toponym; it is rendered as a proper name throughout. The phrase rendered "yoke-loads" translates a Tibetan measure of quantity applied to wool. The figure "Gala" in "we overwhelmed the elder Gala" may be a proper name or epithet not clearly identified in context; it is rendered as given. The weaver's riddle-like exchange about the weaving fee and "provisions for the journey to the world beyond" follows the Tibetan closely; the weaver appears to be asking Ānanda to dedicate merit toward his afterlife rather than accepting a material fee. The final scene shifts abruptly in the Tibetan from the monastery back to Ānanda on his alms round; this discontinuity is in the source text.
- The name rendered "Sonam Döpa" is a Tibetan name meaning "Meritorious" or "Merit-seeker" and is here left in close phonetic approximation since it is a proper personal name in the narrative rather than a title. The name "Dekhenma" similarly renders the Tibetan meaning "she who dwells in comfort" or "the comfortable one," treated as a proper name in this context. The dialogue's comic-didactic structure, in which Nyadga progressively asks the weaver-women to spin their thread ever finer until it reaches the limit, is a recognizable pedagogical device; no doctrinal uncertainty arises.
- The name "Gaga" renders गगणगङ्गा, which appears to be a proper name or descriptive title for the weaver's dwelling area. The passage is somewhat unclear here — it may mean "nearby at the place of Gaga" or refer to a fence area near a woman named Gagemo. The translation takes it as a proper name given the narrative context.

The term སྐལ་མེད་ (spyi cer) used for the weaver refers to a "bare-headed" or "bald-headed" person, here used as a pointed form of address in the exchange of jokes. མགོ་རེག་ (mgo reg) similarly refers to one whose head is touched or shaved, meaning the monk Nyadga. The oath exchange is a comedic scene where each swears by his own bald head.

- The names Snabo, Spyicer, and Nyadga are Tibetan transliterations of what were likely Indian personal names whose Sanskrit originals are no longer recoverable with certainty from this context alone. They are rendered phonetically as in the preceding passage to maintain consistency. The phrase rendered "in exchange for a drink of water" translates skom zong sbyin, literally "give in repayment of a drink," which appears to be an idiomatic expression for a token or nominal payment for labor. The passage concerns a Vinaya narrative about weaving and the enforcement of labor obligations, and the technical Vinaya legal flavor of the closing threat — a fine of five hundred kārṣāpaṇas before Prasenajit, king of Kosala — is preserved in the text that follows immediately.

- The term "ཅོ" rendered as "śo" and "ཤྲྀྎ" as "śrāṇa" are Indian weight measures appearing in Vinaya texts. Their exact equivalences vary across sources; śrāṇa is roughly equivalent to a tola or similar unit, and śo is a subdivision of it. The translation preserves the technical terms rather than converting to modern units, which would require choosing among contested equivalences.

The list of seven cloth types presents some philological difficulty. The identifications given follow standard Vinaya commentarial tradition, but a few fabric terms (particularly "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" and "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་") have variant interpretations in different recensions. The renderings here follow the most widely accepted scholarly and commentarial understanding.

- The term rendered "wrong act" throughout is the Tibetan nye ba byas, literally "a wrong has been done," corresponding to Sanskrit duṣkṛta, a minor offense lighter than a full pārājika or saṃghāvaśeṣa. This is a standard Vinaya technical category and is consistently rendered here as "wrong act" to distinguish it from the heavier "offense requiring forfeiture" (pācittiya with forfeiture, Skt. naihsargika pācittika).

- The phrase rendered "master of the house, my husband's lord" translates འཇིགས་པའི་མཇུག་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་, which likely means "the householder who is like a husband's lord" or "the head of the household, my husband's master." The girl is a maidservant, and འཇིགས་པའི་མཇུག་པོ་ may indicate the master of a husband-and-wife household from her perspective. The rendering given captures the natural sense without distorting the doctrinal or narrative content.

- The name Phreñ Idan ma is a Tibetan proper name meaning "She Who Has a Garland" and has been left in its Tibetan form since no Sanskrit equivalent is recoverable from context. The sequence of visits by the weaver to request dye, encountering the householder and his wife variously present or absent, appears to be a narrative device anticipating a complication in the plot; no doctrinal uncertainty is involved.

- The phrase rendered "My goodness, husband — can you not bear to sit?" translates a colloquial exclamation followed by what appears to be a sudden shift in address: the householder's wife unexpectedly addresses the weaver as "མཇུག་པོ་" (husband), which is a startling and narratively significant moment — she appears to address the weaver as her husband in an intimate or confused manner. This is likely a deliberate plot turn in the narrative, perhaps indicating her emotional state or a scribal peculiarity; the translation renders it as faithfully as the grammar permits.

- The phrase rendered "placed in the sun for a short while" reflects the Tibetan idiom of being made to stand or sit in the sun as a mild penalty or humiliation before dismissal — consistent with Vinaya narrative conventions.

The section "and so on, as before" appears multiple times as a scribal abbreviation in the Tibetan, signaling that the standard Vinaya formulae for convening an assembly, the Buddhas' feigned questioning, the tenfold benefits of rule-promulgation, and the preamble to the rule recitation are all to be understood as fully spelled out by reference to earlier passages in the text. This is standard Vinaya literary convention and has been rendered transparently.

- The list of seven cloth types renders Tibetan technical textile terms according to their standard Vinaya equivalents: woolen, linen, silk, cotton, coarse wool, hemp, and goat-hair cloth. The exact identification of some of these fabrics (particularly རྩྭ་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་, རྩྭ་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་) is debated in scholastic literature, but these renderings follow the mainstream commentarial consensus.

The phrase rendered "companion of Ānanda" (ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་) identifies a monk named Dharma who was a co-resident with Ānanda. The syntax is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan; this reading takes ལྷོ་མེད་ as a proper name and ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ as "co-resident."

- The passage features a recurring minor character named simply "Dharma" (ལྷོ་མེད་), which in this narrative context is a personal name rather than the teaching — the repetition of this name throughout the episode makes this clear, though it is an unusual naming choice that a listener might find momentarily ambiguous.

The phrase rendered "passed through a hundred doorways and will still have to struggle just to fill our bellies" reflects the Tibetan idiom for futile effort in obtaining alms: going door to door without success. The number one hundred is rhetorical hyperbole.

The "powerful monk" at the end likely refers to Nandaka himself, described by an epithet; the grammar is slightly compressed but the sense is that he falls silent under Ānanda's implicit rebuke.

- The phrase rendered "eighteen benefits in traveling together with a buddha" reflects a standard enumeration in Vinaya narrative literature. The number eighteen is textually clear.

The elaborate series of similes at the close — the Blessed One as supreme bull, great elephant, lion, king of geese, Garuḍa, brahmin, physician, and hero, each surrounded by his appropriate retinue — is a formulaic passage found widely in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya. The sentence is deliberately left open, as the Tibetan itself breaks off mid-construction, indicating the passage continues in the next section.

- The four guardians of the directions appear here in their traditional roles: Dhṛtarāṣṭra as lord of gandharvas, Virūpākṣa as lord of nāgas, and Vaiśravaṇa as lord of yakṣas. The Tibetan ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ and ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ are epithets for these three directional guardians respectively, and the fourth, Vemacitra, is the chief of the asuras rather than strictly a directional guardian; this corresponds to a variant listing found in some sūtra contexts. The identity of ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ rendered here as "an āryan" alongside ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ (kinnaras) is somewhat unusual; the pairing may reflect a textual convention where a noble or semi-divine being presides over kinnaras. The phrase ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ is slightly unusual, likely meaning "only the Dharma robe" or "his Dharma robe alone," rendered accordingly.

- The name rendered as "Dāsaka" in the preceding context appears here as ལྷོ་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྷོ་མེད་ (Dāsaka) and represents a specific monk central to this founding case. The preceding passage used "the venerable one" without naming him; this passage makes the name explicit.

The seven types of cloth listed are technical Vinaya terms for categories of allowable robe material. The renderings follow standard Vinaya scholarship, though some of the precise textile identifications remain debated among scholars.

- The term rendered "female probationer" translates dge slob ma, the Tibetan for śikṣamāṇā, a woman undergoing the two-year probationary training between novice and full ordination. This is a standard Vinaya category and the rendering follows the technical tradition.

The phrase "implements of the Vinaya" at the close renders 'dul ba'i yo byad, referring to the standard Vinaya exception clause: actions performed with proper Vinaya instruments or implements, or for purposes other than reclaiming the robe, do not entail a transgression. This is a formulaic closing exemption common to this class of rule.

- The phrase "came to possess the Dharma of the season" renders the Tibetan idiom for dying, a standard Vinaya euphemism. This has been rendered naturally in context to avoid confusion while preserving the traditional phrasing.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the provided Tibetan, corresponding to an incomplete quotation being reported by the two newly ordained monks; this is not a translation error but reflects where the source text ends.

- The phrase rendered "the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth of the fortnight" refers to the traditional lunar observance days (the eighth day, the fourteenth or fifteenth — i.e., the new and full moon days) on which special monastery ceremonies and distributions were customarily held. The "fifteenth" here likely means the full moon day, covering both a fourteen-day and a fifteen-day lunar fortnight. The term "newly ordained men" renders the Tibetan "rgan zhugs," which literally means "those who have entered as elders/seniors," a somewhat ironic or technical designation; in context it refers to the two junior monks who had remained behind, and Ānanda's surprise at being called "teacher" by one of them confirms their junior status.

- The name rendered "Vārsākārī" translates the Tibetan "rgyal rigs dbyar tshul ma," literally "woman of royal lineage in the manner of the rains." This appears to be a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit name; the identification is plausible but the exact Sanskrit form is uncertain.

The phrase rendered "black-bowl bearer" refers to a member of the Group of Six monks, who are associated elsewhere in the Vinaya narrative with carrying black alms-bowls as a mark of their irregular conduct.

The verse cited is the opening of the Dhammapada (manopubbaṅgamā dhammā), here in its Tibetan Mahāyāna sūtra form.

- The phrase rendered "a single parasol's share" translates the Tibetan spyi bungs, which refers to communal property held under a single administrative unit, figuratively described by a single parasol's coverage. The technical Vinaya sense is "common property of the Saṅgha as a whole," but the parasol image is preserved here as it is used repeatedly in the passage.

The phrase "as late as the hair on a louse" is a proverbial expression for something extremely small or impossibly delayed, preserved literally as it is a recognizable folk idiom in the text.

- The phrase rendered "string-pearls" translates a compound suggesting strung or threaded jewels or pearls brought from the great ocean — the sense is that the two monks undertook an arduous journey and secured fine provisions, making it all the more reproachable that they brought only the unruly group of six rather than worthier monks.

The final sentence is syntactically suspended mid-clause in the Tibetan, ending with a genitive construction that opens into the next passage; the translation preserves this as an open clause indicating continuation.

- The phrase rendered "did not flourish in virtuous qualities — like a blue lotus growing without water" presents a slight ambiguity: the Tibetan grammar could be read as saying they did not flourish because of mutually guarding one another's minds, which would be paradoxical given the earlier praise of that practice. In context this appears to describe a failure of spiritual growth arising from the specific dysfunctional dynamic between the two groups rather than from the practice of mutual care as such; the simile of a lotus without water underscores deprivation rather than harm caused by the guarding itself. This is a narrative irony the passage leaves implicit.

- The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, so the translation likewise ends at that point. The name "Sāgalā" for the laywoman (Tibetan: སྐད་གླ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་མཆོག་མཚོ་མཆོག་) follows the preceding passage's established rendering. The district name "Sword-Powered" renders སྐད་གླ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་མཆོག་མཚོ་མཆོག་ literally; it may correspond to a Sanskrit proper name not recoverable from the Tibetan alone. The term སྐད་གླ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་མཆོག་ rendered as "jar of sesame oil" reflects the compound's most natural reading in context, where sesame oil is used for anointing.
- The phrase rendered "twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the standard Abhidharma enumeration of twenty false views of a self based on the five aggregates, each considered in four ways. This is a stock image in the Vinaya narrative literature for the cognitive obstruction destroyed at stream-entry.

The phrase "looked to the king" is a formulaic idiom indicating they sought royal permission or took leave of the king before going to pay homage, a conventional social gesture in this narrative genre.

- The phrase rendered "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" reflects the standard Abhidharma enumeration of twenty forms of the satkāya-dṛṣṭi, the view that identifies the self with one or another of the five aggregates, taken either as the self or as belonging to the self. This is the standard doctrinal referent in stream-entry contexts.

The final sentence is syntactically incomplete in the source as transmitted, breaking off mid-clause; the translation renders what is present.

- The passage refers to "सहस्रलोकधिपतिः," literally "the lord of the world-of-endurance (Sahā-world), Brahmā." Sahā-lokadhipati is a standard epithet rendered here as "lord of the Enduring World" to preserve the cosmological sense; the world Sahā (the world we inhabit, so named because beings must endure its suffering) is ruled over by Brahmā. This distinction is worth noting for a learned audience.

The phrase "𐤅𐤓𐤕𐤍𐤏𐤔𐤗𐤌𐤀𐤃𐤁𐤄" rendered as "the third lunar day text" refers to a specific liturgical or protective text associated with the third day of the lunar month; the precise identity of the text is not established from context alone.

- The verse on weighing land against life is a gnomic couplet in the Tibetan; the rendering preserves its aphoristic quality.

The term rendered "market guild of the warrior class" translates rgyal rigs bzang po pa'i khrom, literally "the assembly of those of the noble warrior class" — this appears to designate an organized civic or military guild group associated with the kṣatriya class, contrasted with the separate sword-bearing guild (ral gri'i mthu can gyi khrom). The exact social institution is somewhat unclear from context alone.

- The householder named here is Anāthapindada, whose name literally means "giver of food to the unprotected" — the text introduces a figure identified by an epithet that functions as both a proper name and a descriptor; the gloss is supplied for the listener's clarity.

The phrase rendered "sons of the Buddha" translates a Tibetan expression meaning fully committed Buddhist monastics or practitioners — specifically here, members of the sword-wielders' guild who had become devoted lay or monastic followers; the phrase is the narrative's own characterization.

The passage ends mid-sentence, listing the first three of five disqualifying qualities for a robe-keeper monk, as the source text is itself incomplete at this point.

- The seven robe materials listed at the end reflect a standard Vinaya enumeration. The Tibetan terms correspond to classical textile categories whose precise Sanskrit equivalents vary across Vinaya recensions; the renderings here follow the most common identifications in the Mūlasarvāstivāda tradition.

- The phrase rendered "spreading out of mats" refers to the Vinaya technical procedure marking the formal extension of the kaṭhina robe-offering season; the Tibetan term རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་སྤྲོད་ཀྱི་ལུགས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་ refers to laying down the kaṭhina cloth, which determines whether the extended robe-distribution period applies. This is a standard Vinaya distinction between communities that have or have not received the kaṭhina.

The compound རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་སྤྲོད་ is likely a transcription of a Sanskrit or Prakrit term for a type of sweet or syrup; the rendering "treacle" is approximate.

- The names Phreng Idan ma, Bla mkhyen, Byid, Sāgā, and Ri dags 'dzin gyi ma appear to be proper names of historical or narrative figures specific to this Vinaya narrative. Phreng Idan ma is rendered as "Mālyā" (meaning "garlanded"), which reflects the sense of the Tibetan. The others are left in transliterated form as their precise Sanskrit equivalents are not recoverable with certainty from this passage alone.

The phrase rendered "the interval before the unlovely state" refers to the stage at which a practitioner has established that their death will lead to a favorable rebirth, a technical Vinaya and Abhidharma concept; it is left descriptive rather than glossed further.

- The phrase rendered "a hundred door-panels' worth of begging" translates a Tibetan idiom meaning something like reciting formulaic begging appeals over and over to no avail; the precise idiomatic sense is somewhat opaque, but the general meaning — that even strenuous begging barely yields a meal — is clear from context.

The word rendered "wayward ones" throughout translates a term for those who follow a corrupted or deviant mode of conduct, here used consistently for the group of disreputable characters whose scheming forms the narrative thread.

- The verse is a four-line praise of the Buddha rendered as verse. The phrase rendered "stilled and very stilled" reflects the Tibetan རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་སྤྲོད་ཀྱི་ལུགས་ཀྱི་སྤྱོད་, a stock phrase for śamatha-related qualities; the alliterative rendering captures the graduated sense without over-specifying the doctrinal referent, which is genuinely ambiguous at this point in the narration. The phrase རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་སྤྲོད་ translates literally as "one with a left hand" or "left-handed one," a term meaning a deceitful or crooked person; it has been rendered throughout as "the wayward one" for consistency with the preceding passage.

- The phrase rendered "sweat-cloths" translates a garment that served as an undergarment or cloth worn during physical exertion or bathing; "sweat-cloth" follows standard Vinaya translations. The animals "lions, tigers, and leopards" render seng ge, stag, and gung respectively; gung here most likely denotes leopards or panthers. The repeated formulaic phrases "and so forth as before" are compressed summaries the text itself signals, not editorial omissions.

- The Vinaya passage contains an extended cosmological-metrological definition of a "forest" boundary using a chain of progressively larger units of measurement, from the smallest particle up to the league. The particle chain given here (subtle particle, water particle, iron particle, rabbit-hair particle, sheep-wool particle, ox-hair particle, sunbeam dust-mote, nit-egg, louse, barleycorn, finger-breadth, cubit, fathom, bow-length, league) is a standard Abhidharmic and Vinaya measurement sequence and has been rendered literally throughout, as it is doctrinally and legally significant for determining the "forest" threshold.

- The term translated as "heavy rains cloth" renders a standard Vinaya technical term for the large cloth robe set aside during the rains retreat season. The phrase "beginner" renders a Vinaya technical term for a monk whose ordination is recent enough that full culpability has not yet been established. The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source text breaks off; the translation follows the Tibetan precisely.

- The personal name rendered here as Śāgata transliterates the Tibetan ཤ་གཏཱ་, a standard Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit name Śāgata, meaning "well arrived" or "well come," the name of a monk mentioned in several Vinaya narratives.

The town name Sakkara transliterates ས་ཀ་ར་, literally "the place of fox traders" or "fox market," which is the Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit place-name, possibly Śākriya or a related form. The exact Sanskrit original is uncertain; Sakkara is used here as a working approximation.

- The phrase rendered "monks who are lodging nearby with their foxes" reflects the Tibetan term literally, but this is almost certainly a textual corruption or specialized Vinaya technical term. The Tibetan reads ས་ཀ་ར་, which literally means "those who have fox-trade" or "fox-traders," and in Vinaya context likely refers to monks who keep or deal in some particular category of goods or animals. Without access to a parallel Sanskrit or Chinese version, the precise meaning cannot be confirmed; this rendering is provisional and a note in any published edition would be warranted.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text and the translation reflects this incompleteness.

- The name rendered "Grācin" transliterates the Tibetan ག་ར་, a phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit proper name that is not entirely certain; it may represent a name meaning "one who has caught the sound" or similar, but the exact Sanskrit form is unclear.

The phrase "seven bases of meritorious action that arise from material things" renders ས་ཀ་ར་, a standard Vinaya enumeration of seven categories of physical generosity that generate merit; the precise list is not given here but is a well-known formulaic expression in this literature.

- The phrase rendered "good morning will be close at hand" and similarly for midnight and dawn reflects an idiomatic teaching on the auspiciousness of right conduct at each period of the day; the Tibetan is straightforward, though the underlying doctrinal context (that one's moral conduct at a given period of day brings a favorable experience of that period) is somewhat unusual and may reflect a specific Vinaya narrative tradition.

The name Ānanda appears here as "Ānanda" though the Tibetan uses "Nye dga'" (literally "joy-companion"), which is the standard Tibetan rendering of Ānanda; this identification is secure.

- The phrase rendered "thunder has sounded in one place while the rain has fallen in another" is a Tibetan idiomatic expression meaning that what was said and what was done did not correspond — the gift ended up going somewhere other than where intended. The translation preserves the proverbial form since it reads naturally in English.

The term rendered "monastery's attendant" for ཀ་ར་ is the karmadāna, the monk appointed to manage practical Saṅgha affairs; "attendant" is used for clarity in the narrative flow.

- The phrase rendered "the thunder rolls in one place and the rain falls in another" is a proverbial expression in the Tibetan Vinaya literature, conveying the idea that the gift was offered at one point but the benefit is claimed elsewhere — the gain was dedicated to the Saṅgha but diverted to an individual. The idiom is idiomatic in the original and this rendering preserves its sense while remaining speakable.

The term "pula leaf" is a small leaf used as a standard of minimal measure in Vinaya contexts; it appears in the Blessed One's teaching on sharing provisions even in the smallest portions.

- The distinction between the two grades of offense is technically significant. When the monk diverts a dedicated gain to himself personally, the offense upon receipt escalates to a full "offense entailing forfeiture" (Skt. naiḥsargika-pācittika), requiring both forfeiture of the article and confession. When the diversion is to any other party — another individual or the Saṅgha — it yields only a "wrong act" (Skt. duṣkṛta) in both the attempt and the receipt, a lesser grade of offense. This distinction is the central doctrinal point of the pericope.
- The passage near the end refers to the Saṅgha dividing into two factions residing in separate quarters. The term rendered "community of both" refers to a joint community of monks and nuns together. The architectural terms rendered "residence," "cloister," "pillar," and "gatehouse" reflect standard monastic building components in Vinaya literature; the dedicating of offerings to specific structural elements of a monastery is a recognized Vinaya category, indicating that donors could direct gifts to particular parts of the monastic complex, and any unauthorized redirection of such dedicated gains is treated as a wrong act.
- The stūpa architecture terms require comment. The Tibetan རྒྱུ་མཚོ་མུ་མུ་མུ་ rendered here as "staircase platform" refers to the stepped terraces or plinths of the stūpa base. རྒྱུ་མཚོ་མུ་མུ་མུ་, literally "flower house," is rendered "flower chamber," a decorative chamber at the neck of the stūpa. རྒྱུ་མཚོ་ is the vase or dome. རྒྱུ་མཚོ་ is the harmikā, the square railing or fence element atop the dome. རྒྱུ་མཚོ་ are the umbrella discs or chattra tiers of the spire. རྒྱུ་མཚོ་, literally "rain needle," is the pointed finial or rain cover at the very top of the spire.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཚོ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་, rendered "a loan given as a Dharma gift," refers to a specific legal category in Vinaya: an interest-free Dharma loan whereby funds dedicated to one object are lent to another without transferring ownership, thereby incurring no transgression.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source; the translation follows the Tibetan precisely to that point.

- The term "harmikā" renders Tibetan "ba gam," the square railing or fenced platform at the top of a stupa dome, just below the umbrella shaft. "Flower chamber" renders "me tog khang," which may refer to an ornamental chamber or decorative element on the stupa. "Portico" renders "mu lto ba," which in this context likely refers to a projecting porch or gateway structure associated with the stupa precinct. The stupa components listed here form a descending sequence mirroring the ascending sequence in the preceding passage.
- The phrase rendered "consumed through one's own bloodstream" translates rang gi rgyud kyis myags pa, which is somewhat technical and contextually refers to medicines that have been absorbed into the body or otherwise transformed such that they cannot be physically separated out again. This is a Vinaya technical concept relating to how medicines are metabolized or blended, and the rendering aims to capture the legal-doctrinal sense that such medicines are no longer distinguishable as discrete items. The passage as a whole is a Vinaya commentary providing lemma-by-lemma exegesis of a training rule concerning the seven-day medicines — the four permitted medicinal substances a monk may store for up to seven days when ill.
- The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, breaking off at a list of monastery items. The translation faithfully reflects this incomplete state.

The phrase rendered "absorbed into one's own body-stream" translates a technical Vinaya expression indicating that the medicine has been ingested and metabolized to the point where it can no longer be recovered or separately identified as a distinct item.

The distinction between "relinquished" and "separated himself from them" reflects a Vinaya technical distinction between the formal act of relinquishment before the community and the physical act of no longer possessing the item. Both steps, together with confession, are

• The phrase rendered "Cave of Mṛgāra's Mother" refers to the Mṛgāramātṛprāsāda, the "Palace of Mṛgāra's Mother" (Migāramātupāsāda in Pāli), a well-known hall at Vaiśālī donated by Viśākha. Its appearance in a Rājagṛha context here follows the Vinaya narrative convention of listing known residences; the Tibetan reads རྩོམ་གྱི་སྒྲིབ་ཁང་།, literally "the cave of the mother of the community chief," which corresponds to this standard toponym.

- The elephant simile describes a war elephant who holds back by protecting his trunk as a sign he has not fully committed his life to battle, whereas one who deploys even his trunk has given everything. The contrast maps onto the deliberate liar: withholding nothing in falsehood, such a person is capable of any evil whatsoever. The Tibetan term "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" is a phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit word likely meaning "Mātaṅga" or a breed-name for a noble elephant lineage; it has been rendered "finest stock" accordingly.

The verse couplet at the opening follows immediately after the preceding passage's closing verse instruction to the Blessed One, and the two verses rendered here are the ones announced in the preceding passage as "these two verses."

- The parallel passage on future formations is slightly abbreviated in the Tibetan, omitting the intermediate qualifiers "virtuous" and "productive of happiness" in the concluding affirmative clause. This appears to be a scribal elision rather than a doctrinal distinction; the translation reflects the text as it stands.

• The gotra names Kudsa, Vātsa, Śāṇḍilya, Bharadvāja, Pañca, and Upapañca are reconstructed from the Tibetan phonetic spellings; the Tibetan reads ཀུས་དྲཱི་ཤཱི་ལྷོ་པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ་འུ་པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ།, བཱཱ་སྐ་ཤཱི་ལྷོ་པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ་འུ་པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ།, སླུང་གྲོ་ཤཱི་ལྷོ་པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ་འུ་པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ།, རམ་རྩ་ཤཱི་ལྷོ་པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ་འུ་པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ།, པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ་འུ་པཎ་ཅེ་ཡེ།. The first (Kudsa) likely represents Kautsas, and Upapañca may be an unusual rendering; they are presented as brahmin gotra lineages.

• The phrase rendered "balls of provisions" translates a term for round lumps of dried food carried as travel provisions. The term "boards of copper" for writing tablets is a well-known Indian scholarly idiom for memorization vessels, and the exchange here parodies the brahmin's claim that his learning is so vast it must be physically contained. The expression "burial ground" for the place where opponents are abandoned at a distance reflects the Tibetan idiom of a crow avoiding a charnel site, denoting complete shunning. The structural break marking the thirty-eighth fascicle of the Vinaya-vibhaṅga appears mid-narrative and has been preserved in its natural position.

- The name ལཀཤཱལ (Lakṣaṇa) is a Tibetan rendering whose Sanskrit original is uncertain; it could also represent a name meaning "one who has received a tradition by hand." The rendering "Lakṣaṇa" follows the phonological sense of the syllable ལཀཤཱལ, though some editors reconstruct it differently. This is a narratively significant proper name and the uncertainty is worth flagging.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, and the translation follows the Tibetan accordingly.

- The text ends mid-sentence, breaking off at the third element of the second set of three modes of false speech. This is a continuation passage and the conclusion follows in the next portion of the text.

The term rendered "a matter remaining before the Saṅgha" translates dge 'dun lhag ma, which corresponds to a Vinaya category of offense known in Sanskrit as saṃghāvaśeṣa, a "suspension" or "remainder" offense requiring formal Saṅgha procedure. This is a technical Vinaya term and the rendering attempts to convey its procedural sense without importing the Sanskrit unexplained.

- The phrase rendered "superhuman qualities of a noble person" translates the technical Vinaya term for claiming attainments such as meditative absorptions, supernormal powers, or fruits of the path that one does not actually possess, the classic pārājika offense of false claims to spiritual attainment. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as the Tibetan passage itself is incomplete.

- The passage is a highly formulaic Vinaya legal analysis enumerating permutations of the four epistemic modes — seeing, hearing, knowing, and perceiving — combined with various mental states that accompany a deliberate false statement. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, consistent with the passage being a continuous excerpt. The term rendered "knowing" translates a verb of mental recognition distinct from both sensory perception and discursive understanding; it corresponds to a third epistemic category standardly distinguished in Vinaya false-speech analysis.

- The term rendered throughout as "uncertainty" translates a phrase meaning literally "to eat doubt with regard to it," an idiomatic Vinaya expression for entertaining or harboring doubt. The repeated formulaic structure of this passage is characteristic of the Vinaya's exhaustive enumeration of permutations of the four modes of cognition: seeing, hearing, knowing, and perceiving. The passage ends mid-sentence, and the next segment is not included here.

- The long catalog of physical defects rendered here follows the Tibetan list closely. Some terms are standard Vinaya vocabulary for physical disabilities and deformities; the renderings chosen are descriptive English equivalents consistent with the context. The term rendered "those with goiters" for lba ba can means literally "those with a lump or swelling," most naturally a goiter or similar protuberance. "Impudent ones" for gyol po and "loose-limbed ones" for smad lchal represent reasonable interpretations of terms that have some textual variation in Vinaya literature.

The phrase "the blessed buddhas, while knowing, act as though they do not know" is a formulaic reference to a standard narrative element in the Vinaya indicating that the Buddha, though omniscient, asks questions in the Socratic manner before pronouncing judgment; the text signals that this entire formulaic passage is to be understood as reproduced in full from an earlier section.

- The epithet "མཁའ་ཁྱེད་" (literally "maternal uncle" or "uncle by marriage") is used throughout by the young man addressing the householder, and "མཁའ་ཁྱེད་" (literally "nephew" or "son-in-law/junior male relative") is used in return. This is consistent with the social relationship implied by the marriage negotiation — the young man has established a quasi-familial bond with the householder and addresses him as uncle. Both are rendered accordingly.

The ox's composite name "ཁྲ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" (Broken-Stump) is a portmanteau of "ཁྲ་ལྷོ་" (Broken-Horn) and "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" (Stump-Tail), confirming that the final name combines both earlier epithets into one.

- The name rendered "Khaṇḍarūpa" (Tibetan: ཁྲ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་) is a character name meaning something like "broken-form" or "shattered-appearance." The sudden appearance of this speaker at the end of the passage is abrupt in the Tibetan itself and suggests this is a continuing narrative with an interlocutor whose role is established in the broader story. The phrase is clearly the beginning of a new rhetorical exchange and the oddity of attribution is in the source.
- The names "Bādagāyeda" and "Sārī" are phonetic approximations of the Tibetan "བླ་མ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" and "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" — likely vernacular animal names without clear Sanskrit equivalents. The first may mean something like "joy-maker" and the second could be a proper name.

The passage involving the oxen holding Khaṇḍarūpa's nose up toward the sun and the minister's interpretation about "the fifth world-guardian" is a comic set-piece involving wordplay: the oxen's action of tilting a head toward the sun is read as a ritual gesture, and the minister interprets it as a claim about the number of cosmic world-guardians. The humor is obscure but the translation follows the Tibetan closely.

- The text breaks off mid-verse at the end of the passage. The verse is left open as the Tibetan itself ends there mid-sentence.

The term kārṣāpaṇa is a standard ancient Indian monetary unit; it has been retained untranslated as a proper currency name throughout, consistent with the preceding passage.

- The term rendered "tonsured" translates a Tibetan expression that literally means something like "having shaved the top of the head" and in Vinaya context refers to whether the monk speaking is himself fully in good standing as an ordained monastic. The phrase "whether tonsured or not" in the first two cases is paired with the heavier term "wrongdoing" while the subsequent cases use "transgression" — this distinction tracks a technical Vinaya difference between a pārājika-level wrongdoing and a lighter downfall; the Tibetan terms differ accordingly and the translation preserves that difference.

The "five categories of internal transgressions" in the summary verse refer to the standard Vinaya enumeration of the sub-cases under this rule, which the following prose then unpacks: birth-caste, craft, occupation, bodily marks, and so forth. The verse is compressed and slightly elliptical in the original, as is typical of Vinaya mnemonic summaries.

- The term rendered "needle-makers' caste" translates ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་, literally "those who make needles." The term ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is rendered "cooks' caste," meaning those who prepare food. ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is rendered "hammersmiths," distinguishing them from ལྷོ་ལྷོ་, the general blacksmiths. ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is rendered "sweepers," referring to those who sweep or clean, a low-status occupation. The passage ends mid-sentence as the source text is cut off at that point.
- The list of brahminical practices includes several technical ritual and textual categories. The four Vedas listed here correspond to a somewhat unusual enumeration: a Veda of definitive utterance, a Veda of fire-sacrifice, a Veda of poetry, and a Veda of statecraft — this does not map straightforwardly onto the canonical four Vedas and likely reflects a Vinaya-specific or regional taxonomy of brahminical learning. The term rendered "kotamba cloth" is a transliteration of an Indic textile term whose precise identification is uncertain.

The distinction in this passage between a "transgression" (ltung byed, a minor downfall) and an "offence" (nyes byas, a misdeed of wrong conduct) reflects a genuine textual variation in the Tibetan: the brahmin and warrior caste cases use nyes byas, while the others use ltung byed. This is preserved in the translation.

- Several of the craft terms in this passage present identification difficulties. The needle-makers' caste items include par-thang cloth, which is a technical term whose precise referent is uncertain; it may denote a particular weave or regional fabric. The coppersmith products listed as རྩུག་པོ་ and རྩུག་མེ་ are rendered as platters and balls respectively on the basis of parallel Vinaya lists, though the exact vessel types remain somewhat uncertain. The leather-worker items རྩུག་པོ་མེ་ (sandals without straps) and རྩུག་པོ་མེ་ (upper sandals or overshoes) follow standard Vinaya commentary interpretations. The term རྩུག་པོ་མེ་ is rendered as barbers on the basis of the root རྩུག་པོ་ meaning to shave or scrape, which is the standard Vinaya interpretation for this caste designation.

- The passage distinguishes between "transgression" (Tibetan: ltung byed) in most cases and "misdeed" (Tibetan: nyes byas) in the brahmin case. This is a meaningful Vinaya distinction: the former is the heavier category (a genuine downfall), while the latter is a lesser infraction. The shift in terminology when addressing a brahmin who has renounced likely reflects a specific Vinaya ruling that this particular taunt, though offensive, is treated differently because brahminic activities are not purely a lowly craft but a recognized religious and social vocation. This distinction is preserved in the translation.

The four Vedic categories listed for brahmins are rendered interpretively: the Tibetan terms correspond roughly to Nirukta or praise-texts, Yajurveda-style sacrifice texts, poetic or R̥gvedic texts, and Atharvaveda-style protective texts, but the Tibetan does not name the Vedas explicitly; the rendering reflects the general semantic range.

- The passage distinguishes two levels of offense: the case of the warrior-noble caste carries the heavier term "misdeed" while all subsequent caste cases use "transgression." This distinction is preserved in the translation and appears intentional in the Vinaya text, likely reflecting the particular gravity of demeaning a kṣatriya, whose caste was considered equal or superior to brahmin status in certain Buddhist contexts.

Several craft terms in the weaver, needle-worker, tailor, and blacksmith sections are technical vocabulary for textile and metalworking tools that do not have universally agreed Tibetan-to-English correspondences; the renderings given follow the most plausible reading given context and parallel Vinaya literature.

- The implements listed for each trade present lexical challenges. For the leather-worker section, the terms rendered as "hides, small hides, straps, hide-knives, awls, and small awls" follow reasonable semantic inference from the Tibetan but the precise technical identity of each tool is uncertain. Similarly, for the potter section, the final term rendered "smoothing tool" is uncertain; the Tibetan term suggests something used for finishing or burnishing but its exact referent is unclear. For the basket-weaver section, the final term rendered "splitting tool" is uncertain; it may refer to a specific implement for splitting bamboo. These are craft-specific vocabulary items whose exact equivalents in any ancient Indian artisan tradition are difficult to fix with certainty.

- The list of physical and moral defects in this passage poses challenges in several places. "མེ་ལུ་ལུ་ལུ་" is rendered as "one who walks on crutches" and "མེ་ལུ་ལུ་" as "one with club feet," though the precise medical conditions implied by some terms admit of uncertainty. "མེ་ལུ་ལུ་ལུ་ལུ་" is rendered as "one who is incontinent at night," literally "one who leaks in the night parts," which in Vinaya context refers to nocturnal emission or urinary incontinence. "མེ་ལུ་ལུ་" throughout means literally "bald-headed," which here serves as the comparator condition: whether or not the accusing monk himself shares the attribute he is mocking. The five categories of Vinaya offense named — defeat, remainder-for-the-Saṅgha, transgression, matter for individual confession, and wrongdoing transgression — correspond to the standard Vinaya fivefold classification of offenses (pārājika, saṃghāvaśeṣa, pācittiya, pratideśanīya, duṣkṛta).

- The passage transitions between two distinct narrative sections: the Vinaya procedural formula for the transgression of slander, and a Jātaka-style illustrative tale. The phrase rendered "as before" reflects the Vinaya's formulaic abbreviation method, indicating that stock passages common to all rules are not repeated but referenced back to earlier instances in the text. The phrase "her time came, and she passed away in accordance with the nature of things" renders a Tibetan expression meaning she died when her allotted time arrived, with the verse functioning as her final teaching on impermanence.
- The phrase rendered "shake himself and yawn wide" translates a sequence describing the lion emerging and performing characteristic behaviors. The term for the stallion's vocalization is rendered "buzzing sound" following the sense of a horse's snort or rumbling breath used as a warning display, as the context makes clear it parallels the lion's roar as a threatening sign. The closing sentence makes the fable's moral point explicit: the behaviors were habitual and innocent, but the fox's slander caused the same actions to be read as threats. The phrase "seed of division" translates the literal Tibetan "seed of discord was planted in their minds," which is both a narrative and doctrinal point about how slander operates.
- The phrase translated as "brothers who have suckled at the same breast" renders a Tibetan idiom for milk-siblings, conveying the bond of having nursed together from the same mother figure, here the shared arrangement between the two mothers. The translation renders this naturally for listening.

The final line of the passage breaks off mid-sentence, as the Tibetan itself is clearly incomplete at this point; the translation ends accordingly.

- The term rendered "screeched like a bird" (bya smyang byed pa) is a behavioral description meaning to make a bird-like cry or call, used as a preparatory or signaling action before a charge or approach; some interpreters read it as a specific crouching-and-calling posture. The rendering chosen is consistent with the narrative context.
- The summary verse lists categories under which the slander rule applies. The five categories of transgression referred to in the verse are the standard Vinaya groupings of offenses. The verse functions as a mnemonic for the case-analysis that follows in the text.
- The occupational castes listed here present some interpretive difficulty. The terms rendered "rope-maker," "needle-worker," "carpenter," "ironsmith," and "hammerer" are technical designations for hereditary artisan castes in the Indian social context of the Vinaya. The term rendered "needle-worker" could alternatively refer to a weaver or someone involved in fine needlework; the exact trade is uncertain. "Hammerer" likewise designates a metalworker or smith of a particular kind, distinguished from the ironsmith, though the precise distinction between the two smithing castes is not entirely clear from the Tibetan alone.
- The passage concludes mid-sentence in the Tibetan, enumerating brahminic Vedic and ritual categories. The final list appears to be a catalogue of brahminic arts and sacred sciences. The terms rendered as "Veda of definitive statements," "Veda of offerings," "Veda of poetry," and "Veda of statecraft" correspond to categories that may map onto the classical four Vedas or their auxiliary sciences (vedāṅgas), though the Tibetan terms do not align straightforwardly with the standard Sanskrit enumeration; the renderings here are based on the literal Tibetan meanings. The term ར་བླ་མ་ལྟ་བུ་ has been rendered "barber caste" though it could also refer to those who scrape or shave hides; "barber" is the most contextually plausible reading given the list of low-caste occupations in this series.
- The passage employs a graduated offense terminology: for the warrior caste section, naming the name is an offense and stating clan or lineage is a minor offense, while for the merchant, common people, weaver, and needle-worker sections, naming the name becomes a downfall and stating clan or lineage becomes an offense. This gradation appears intentional in the Vinaya source and is preserved as found. The textile terms in the weaver section are rendered according to their most probable referents in Indic textile vocabulary: dar as silk, ras yug chen as great bolts of cotton cloth, be'u ras as fine cotton, dar la as silk variety, du gu la as fine wool, and ko tam pa as cotton — though precise equivalences for some of these Sanskrit loan-terms remain uncertain.

- The opening list of needle-workers' products — coarse cloth, middling cloth, embroidered cloth, small woven pieces, and balls of thread — continues directly from the preceding passage as stipulated. Several of the craft-product terms (particularly the clothing items under the good-workers' caste and the vessel terms under the coppersmiths) admit of more than one plausible identification; the renderings chosen reflect the most contextually probable meanings within an Indian craft context. The text ends mid-sentence, breaking off at the potters' craft list, which will continue in the following passage.
- The Tibetan term rendered "balls of clay" is a potters' product of uncertain exact shape — it may refer to rounded clay forms or pellets used in pottery. The rendering follows the most plausible reading in context.

The term rendered "benches" and "footstools" covers a range of low wooden furniture; the exact distinctions between the Tibetan terms are uncertain and the renderings are approximate based on standard Vinaya commentarial context.

"Conch-shell covers" renders a term that may refer to woven cases or covers for conch shells, a plausible basketry product in the Indian context.

- The graded offense structure shifts here: for the brahmin and warrior caste cases the text gives "downfall" for naming the name and merely "offense" for clan and lineage, whereas for the merchant and common-people cases the polarity is reversed, with naming the name yielding the heavier "transgression" category and clan and lineage the lesser "downfall." This asymmetry is present in the Tibetan and is preserved in the translation; it likely reflects a graduated scale tied to the social rank being invoked.

The term rendered "Veda of invocations," "Veda of oblations," "Veda of poetry," and "Veda of protection" translates four rig-byed (Sanskrit ṛgveda-class) categories; the specific correspondences to the four Vedas proper are approximate, and the Tibetan nomenclature here follows standard Vinaya lists of brahmin occupations rather than precise Sanskrit Vedic taxonomy.

- Several of the craft implements named are technical terms for specific tools of each trade. The rendering of རྒྱུ་ལྒྱུ་, རྒྱུ་ལྒྱུ་, རྒྱུ་, and རྒྱུ་ as bellows, bellows-tubes, tongs, and dried fuel is based on contextual reasoning about blacksmith and metal-beater tools; the precise identification of some items, particularly རྒྱུ་, is uncertain. The list of leather-working tools including རྒྱུ་ལྒྱུ་, རྒྱུ་ལྒྱུ་, རྒྱུ་ལྒྱུ་, རྒྱུ་ལྒྱུ་, རྒྱུ་ལྒྱུ་, and རྒྱུ་ལྒྱུ་ presents similar difficulties; the renderings given are approximations based on context. The text repeats the same list of smithing tools for both the blacksmiths and the metal-beaters, which appears to be as written in the original.
- The list of craft tools in this passage presents some interpretive challenges. The bamboo-workers' tools include an item rendered "splitting-thorns" for lhang tsher, which likely refers to a pointed splitting tool used in basketry or bamboo-work; the precise identification is uncertain. The servants' occupations follow a clear pattern of domestic service. The final list of physical and social descriptions applied disparagingly to the monk — lame, dissolute, vagrant, with truncated fingers, hunchbacked, dwarf, pot-bellied, foolish, mute, bent, deaf, epileptic, flat-footed — reflects a stock list of defects used in the Vinaya literature to characterize those from the lowest social margins; the translation renders each term as precisely as context allows.

- The list of physical conditions in the second catalog is notably extensive and presents several terms not found in the earlier passage. Most renderings follow standard Indic medical and physical terminology as preserved in Tibetan Vinaya literature. The term རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ ("going out in the middle of the night") is a somewhat unusual phrase in this context; it may refer to nocturnal wandering or incontinence and is rendered literally. The Vinaya offense categories named — defeat (pārājika), Saṅgha remainder (saṃghāvaśeṣa, rendered here as "Saṅgha remainder"), transgression, downfall requiring individual confession, and downfall — follow the standard fivefold classification of offenses. The closing narrative transition reintroduces the group of six monks (མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་) and a new episode concerning a dispute settlement.

- The phrase rendered "dispute for the sake of teaching" translates the Tibetan for a dispute concerning counsel or instruction, in the sense of a controversy about whether proper admonition has been given. The four categories of dispute correspond to the standard Vinaya fourfold classification of disputes.

- The text presents a systematic matrix of cases combining three variables: the actual nature of the quarrel, the monk's perception of that quarrel, and his perception of whether the matter has been purified by confession. The four quarrel motivations are: for the sake of fighting, for the sake of not advising, for the sake of causing a downfall, and for some other general purpose. The distinction between "transgression" and "wrongdoing" reflects the standard Vinaya gradation between a full offense and a lesser offense. The phrase rendered "causes weariness with that act" follows the established rendering from the preceding passage. The final case in the text ends mid-matrix, suggesting the passage continues beyond this excerpt.

- The four categories of quarrel consistently distinguished throughout this passage are: quarrels for the sake of fighting, for the sake of causing a downfall, for the sake of not advising, and for the sake of an act. These represent standard Vinaya taxonomies of the motives or contexts underlying monastic disputes. The matrix of perceptions and their corresponding offences follows a formulaic pattern standard in Vinaya literature, with full transgression arising when perception corresponds to reality or when doubt is present regarding a properly purified matter, and mere wrongdoing arising when there is misperception or doubt regarding an unpurified matter.

- The phrase rendered "polished smooth as fine silk" for རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ is somewhat obscure. The image seems to be of someone outwardly refined or smooth in appearance, yet inwardly slothful. The comparison "like a rabbit struck by an arrow" for the daughter-in-law is a conventional simile whose precise implication in this context — likely referring to timidity, injury, or bodily blemishes — is clarified by Cārkaśa's subsequent enumeration of physical marks. The name Cārkaśa is a tentative phonological reconstruction from the Tibetan རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་; the Sanskrit original is uncertain.

- The phrase rendered "vases full to the brim, marks of good fortune, and swastikas" (bum pa gang ba, bkra shis, and g.yung drung) along with "śrīvatsa" (dpal be'u) refers to a set of auspicious body marks in the classical Indian tradition — the śrīvatsa mark, the full vase (pūrṇakalāśa), the svastika, and general auspicious signs (maṅgala). These are presented here as favorable bodily characteristics in contrast to the unfavorable marks described in the preceding passage.

The final ruling attributed to the Blessed One that a monk must not teach Dharma to women is a Vinaya regulation recorded in this narrative context; its scope and qualifications are elaborated elsewhere in the Vinaya literature.

- The ten stages of corpse contemplation rendered here follow the standard Pāli-Tibetan meditation list: bloated, festering, worm-infested, gnawed, eaten, blood-smeared, scattered, and bones. The Tibetan terms for these stages are technical meditation vocabulary and the renderings follow established parallel passages in Vinaya literature.

The phrase "liberated in both respects" translates ubhatobhāgavimukta in Buddhist tradition, referring to one liberated both through meditative attainment and through insight into the destruction of defilements — a standard arhat category.

The passage "neuter, hermaphrodites, or persons of indeterminate sex" renders za ma, ma ning, and mtshan gnyis pa respectively. These are legal categories within Vinaya literature concerning those ineligible for ordination; their precise denotations vary across traditions and the translation follows standard Vinaya glossary usage.

- The phrase rendered "without altering his perception, his patience, his desire, his reasoning, his discursiveness, or his view" translates a stock formula listing five or six mental factors whose non-alteration signals that the monk has no genuine meditative or visionary basis for his claim — in other words, he is fabricating the experience. The term translated "discursiveness" renders rtog pa, which can also mean "conceptual thought" or "examination"; in this Vinaya context the sense is that none of his mental states have shifted in a way that would corroborate a real supranormal experience.

The "carrion-eaters of the charnel ground" are corpse-eating beings — scavenging humans or animals inhabiting charnel grounds — placed at the lowest end of a descending hierarchy of beings (gods, nāgas, yakṣas, and so on down), to show that even a false claim about the most base and impure beings still incurs a misdeed, even if only a lesser one than the full transgression incurred by claiming contact with gods or suprahuman beings.

- The phrase rendered "liberated from both sides" refers to the arhat who is liberated both through meditative attainment (the formless absorptions) and through wisdom — a standard Abhidharma distinction between the two types of arhat. The "eight liberations" is the standard rendering of the list beginning with form-contemplation and culminating in the cessation of perception and feeling. The "striped seats" offered to spiritually advanced monks is a recognized marker of honor in Vinaya contexts, indicating special status accorded to noble ones within a community. The passage "while still in the process of attaining" renders a progressive or ongoing aspect in the Tibetan, indicating the monk falsely claims attainment of meditative or insight states he has not actually reached.

- The phrase rendered "flesh-eaters of the charnel ground" translates the Tibetan for carrion-eating beings found in charnel grounds, a common category in Vinaya enumerations of non-human beings ranging from the most exalted to the most lowly. The text employs a deliberate descending series: gods, nāgas, yakṣas, and finally these charnel-ground flesh-eaters, to indicate that the rule applies across the entire spectrum of non-human beings one might falsely claim to perceive or interact with.

- The phrase rendered "liberated in both ways" refers to the ubhatobhāgavimukta, one who is liberated both through the formless meditative absorptions and through wisdom. This is a standard Abhidharma category; no emendation has been made to the Tibetan.

The list "stream-enterer, once-returner, non-returner, arhat" represents the four stages of noble attainment; these are standard terms rendered by their conventional English equivalents in line with the preceding translation.

- The name གཡུབ་ནོར་ནེ་ is a Tibetan rendering of an Indian personal name. "Gyabu Norné" is used as a transliteration of the proper name element གཡུབ་ (the appointment title གཡུབ་པ་ means "one who arranges lodgings," rendered in context).

The term "lag gi bla" literally means "hand-chief" or "one who excels with the hands," here consistently rendered as "carpenter monk," which is the standard Vinaya interpretation for a monk skilled in woodwork or construction.

- The Sanskrit plant names in the list of joint seeds, namely ārdaka, sarjaka, phaṇīnarjaka, bhustrina, and jambhārī, are given in approximate transliteration from the Tibetan phonetic rendering. Ārdaka is commonly identified as fresh ginger, jambhārī as a type of citrus. The others are less certain in botanical identification, but the Tibetan here preserves Indic loanwords without translating them, so they are rendered in approximate Sanskrit reconstruction rather than guessed botanical equivalents.

The insects "tremapuka" and "trailataka" are Tibetan phonetic renderings of Indic terms for which precise identification is uncertain.

- The five types of seeds enumerated in the Vinaya literature are root-seeds, trunk-seeds, node-seeds, germinated-seeds, and seed-seeds. The Tibetan term rendered "germinated-seed" is literally "sprouted or split seed." The term rendered "node-seed" refers to seeds that propagate from joints or nodes, such as sugarcane. The systematic permutation matrix that follows in the text — running through each combination of seed-type, perception, and moisture-status — is a standard casuistic format in Vinaya commentary. The rendering "wrongdoing" for the lesser offence category distinguishes it from the weightier "transgression," reflecting the technical distinction between a duṣkṛta and a pācittika or higher offence in the Vinaya classification scheme.

- The five seed categories appearing throughout this Vinaya passage are: root-seed, trunk-seed, node-seed, cutting-seed, and plant-seed. The term rendered "cutting-seed" is རྩོམ་པའི་མེད་པོ་, literally a seed propagated by being split or cut, corresponding to what is elsewhere called a "cutting" or "slip" in horticultural terms. The term rendered "plant-seed" is རྩོམ་པའི་མེད་པོ་, literally "seed of seeds," which in the Vinaya tradition refers to true seeds propagated from seed, here rendered "plant-seed" for consistency with standard Vinaya translation conventions. The passage follows a strict combinatorial matrix and the translation preserves that legal-formulaic repetition exactly as it appears in the source.

- The five seed categories appearing throughout this passage follow the standard Vinaya taxonomy: root-seed, stem-seed, joint-seed, cutting-seed, and seed-seed. The term rendered "cutting-seed" refers to a plant propagated by cuttings. The term rendered "joint-seed" refers to propagation from nodes or joints of a plant such as sugarcane. The term rendered "seed-seed" refers to propagation from seeds proper. This passage is a systematic permutation matrix working through combinations of seed-type misperception and green-versus-dry misperception, applying the graduated penalty structure of transgression for the more serious cases and wrongdoing for the lesser.

- The term rendered "act of preparation" translates རྩོམ་པའི་མེད་པོ་, which in Vinaya contexts denotes the preparatory act or intention that sets an offense in motion — the deliberate mental and physical engagement preceding the completed transgression. The multiplication of wrongdoings by acts of preparation and of transgressions by the number of plants cut reflects a standard Vinaya calculus found across several traditions.

The substances listed in the fifth method of ruination — rendered "fermenting agent" and "dung" — translate རྩོམ་པའི་མེད་པོ་ and རྩོམ་པའི་མེད་པོ་ respectively. རྩོམ་པའི་མེད་པོ་ literally means "that which transforms" and refers to a substance that causes fermentation or decomposition; རྩོམ་པའི་མེད་པོ་ is dung or feces used as a covering agent.

- The passage distinguishes between two categories of plant life throughout: general vegetation, for which deliberate damage with harm-intention incurs a full transgression, and cotton plants, for which the same actions incur only a wrongdoing regardless of outcome. This asymmetry appears to reflect a Vinaya distinction in the degree of sentience or protected status accorded to different plant types, with cotton plants occupying a lower tier. The term rendered "wrongdoing" is the lighter offense and "transgression" the heavier one, consistent with the preceding passage's usage.

The items rendered "caustic substance," "something heavy," and "needle" render Tibetan terms for, respectively, a transforming or corroding agent, a heavy object, and a fine sharp implement used for jabbing; the rendering is functional rather than strictly literal.

- The personal name "Gyabu Norgé" renders the Tibetan proper name literally; there is no established Sanskrit equivalent recoverable from this passage. The term "sa las skyes gnyis" rendered as "youth born of the earth" is a Tibetan epithet that may correspond to a personal or class designation; its precise referent in this narrative context is uncertain, and it may simply be an epithetic second reference to Gyabu Norgé himself or to another figure. The distinction between a "wrongdoing" (Tib. nyes byas, Skt. duṣkṛta) and a "defeating offense" (Tib. ltung byed, Skt. pātayantika, i.e. a pācittiya) follows standard Vinaya grading; the asymmetry in severity between, for example, extracting heartwood versus stripping bark reflects the living status of the part of the tree affected.

- The term rendered "affronting to the face" translates བློ་ཤྲོད་པའི་མཇུག་པོ་, literally "to jeer or insult in front of the face," a specific Vinaya offense category. The term rendered "speaking ill behind the back" translates བློ་ཤྲོད་པའི་མཇུག་པོ་, literally "to jeer from the side," idiomatically meaning indirect or oblique disparagement, here understood as backbiting or insinuation. The distinction between these two offense categories is the doctrinal and narrative crux of this entire passage: the first motion enacts the ruling on direct affront established earlier, and the second extends it to cover indirect or veiled disparagement. The passage ends mid-sentence, indicating the translation continues.

- The phrase rendered "classified by the Saṅgha and appointed as one of twelve persons" refers to a formal Saṅgha act by which a monk is publicly censured and enrolled in a list of twelve offenders; the distinction between those who have and have not been "released" from that formal act drives the graduated penalty structure. The final category — "not classified by the Saṅgha" but still formally appointed — yields the lesser penalty of a misdeed rather than a full transgression, reflecting the Vinaya principle that the gravity of the formal communal act determines the severity of the offense against its subject.

- The name rendered "Dundubha" (Tib. ཏུང་དུབ་མ་) is uncertain. The Tibetan ཏུང་དུབ་མ་ could be a phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit name; Dundubha is a plausible reconstruction but the text itself only gives the Tibetan form. The identification of ཏུང་དུབ་མ་ as "Ghaṇṭā" (the grove of the bell or gong) in Kauśāmbī follows standard Vinaya geography. The three-part formula "has not been appointed / has been released" in the opening permutations involves a genuine structural ambiguity in the Tibetan that the translation preserves as closely as possible.

- The verse embedded in this passage presents a condensed image that is not entirely transparent. The final line, rendered here as "observe how it is seized by the one who makes a sound," refers to the simile of a fire catching a forest: just as a fire in a forest spreads and seizes whatever makes a sound or stirs, so too reckless speech brings danger to the speaker. The Tibetan is compressed and the precise nuance of the final line is uncertain in the absence of a Sanskrit or Pali parallel; the rendering given reflects the most contextually coherent reading.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at "hell-beings," which corresponds to the standard Vinaya formula listing the unfortunate destinies (hell-beings, hungry ghosts, animals) as the karmic consequence of the transgression. This is not an error in translation but a genuine interruption in the source text as provided.

- The text describes a series of casuistic Vinaya cases illustrating what constitutes the transgression of "stopping up one's ears against instruction." The pattern is consistent throughout: one monk describes a person with identifying characteristics and asks whether the other saw them; the second monk denies seeing those specific characteristics while claiming he saw merely "a person coming on two feet" — a deliberately evasive or reductive response that constitutes the offence. The phrase "ཤུལ་ལོ་ཤུལ་ལོ་" is rendered as "hemp-leaf patch," referring to a type of repair patch on an alms-bowl; the exact botanical identification is uncertain but follows standard Vinaya commentary conventions.

- The phrase rendered "turning a deaf ear" translates a Tibetan idiom for willfully not listening or ignoring instructions; the two categories — ignoring an instruction one has heard, and staying completely silent — are standard Vinaya distinctions. The closing line "a god spoke these verses" anticipates verse content not included in this passage; no text appears to be missing, as the passage ends naturally at that point awaiting the gāthā.

- The term rendered "wearing a censure on one's ear" translates a Vinaya procedural term for a formal act of censure delivered orally to an offender. The passage explains that remaining silent when such a censure is pronounced — neither accepting nor rejecting it — is juridically equivalent to receiving it, hence "wearing it on one's ear." This is a technical Vinaya category and the phrasing follows the logic of the source closely.

The name "Dundupā" appears as the referent of "this one" in the identificatory formula; it is supplied from immediate narrative context. The spelling in Tibetan is དུང་དུཔ་, which some witnesses read differently; the identification is contextually secure even if the precise name-form varies across recensions.

- The phrase rendered "consuming with warmth" translates a term literally meaning "with appropriate warmth" or "with due appreciation," conveying that the monk receives and uses what is given with a sense of grateful awareness of the donor's sacrifice. The traditional commentarial understanding is that this first quality refers to recognizing the hardship involved in the donor's generosity.

The phrase "of one purpose" renders a Tibetan term meaning "companions sharing a common aim" or "fellow travelers with a shared goal," used here for a group of monks traveling together for a common purpose such as a council or legal proceeding within the Vinaya context.

- The name of the faithful householder is rendered as Śīlabhadra on the basis of the honorific addressed to him later, "Bzhin bzangs," which corresponds to Sanskrit Śīlabhadra, meaning "one of good conduct." This is a standard Tibetan rendering. The passage is a Vinaya narrative and the name choice follows that convention. If the source text intends a different name, this would need verification against a parallel Sanskrit Vinaya passage.

- The phrase rendered "a cushioned seat stuffed with wool" translates a term that literally indicates a seat containing wool or wool-like stuffing; "wood-wool" for the gloss reflects the traditional commentary's specification of a vegetable-fiber stuffing rather than animal wool, though the distinction may be conventional.

The name Upāli here functions as the interlocutor in a standard Vinaya exchange; the Tibetan uses the epithet "Nye ba 'khor" which is the standard rendering of Upāli's name.

The passage "I was born as a brahmin and was shown seven mango trees" is the Vinaya's characteristic illustrative method for establishing a spatial measure; the forty-nine fathoms figure derives from seven trees each seven fathoms apart.

- The phrase rendered "put in order" for རྒྱུ་ལྟ་བུ་ is a technical Vinaya expression meaning that the bedding has been properly stored, folded, or secured. The distinction between a "wrongdoing" (མུ་ལྟ་བུ་, a lesser offence) and a "downfall-causing offence" (ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་, the more serious duṣkṛta or pācittiya-level offence) here reflects the standard Vinaya two-tier gradation for this rule: the offence escalates once the opportunity to remedy the situation has passed.

- The phrase rendered "net" likely refers to a straining-cloth or filter-bag used by monks to strain water, a standard piece of monastic equipment; the Tibetan "dra ba" can mean net or mesh-cloth, and in Vinaya contexts this typically designates the water-strainer. The passage about Charka's care for his disciples being misread by the monks as oppressive — wrapping him in blankets, lighting a fire — is a lightly comic Vinaya narrative illustrating both his sociability and his overbearing manner. The ruling that follows applies the offense broadly: any deliberate self-elevation over a fellow monk, however slight, constitutes a transgression. The final instruction Charka gives the novices is a systematic inversion of monastic duty, listing proper Vinaya obligations only to tell the monks to ignore them all, which is the narrative setup for the offense the text is in the process of defining.
- The passage appears to be a Vinaya narrative that is partly repetitive by design, as the text recapitulates the earlier scene almost verbatim before resuming the story. This repetition is structural in Vinaya literature and has been preserved faithfully rather than condensed.

The final sentence is a rhetorical question in which Charka appears to be manipulating the elder monks into staying with him by invoking the rule just pronounced, implying that if they leave a sick monk unattended they would be guilty of treating him as inferior. The Tibetan reads literally "Venerable ones, have I not deliberately set myself up as superior?" which in context is Charka's ironic self-accusation intended to detain the elders rather than a genuine confession. This reading is contextually certain but worth flagging for listeners.

The term rendered "hot room" refers to a steam or heated bathing chamber used in Indian monastic contexts, not a cell or dwelling room.

- The verse quoted by Chārka appears doctrinally garbled in context — he cites a genuine-sounding gāthā attributed to the Blessed One but applies it in a transparently manipulative way to extract lay labor donations. The irony is likely intentional in the narrative. The verse as rendered follows the Tibetan text; its meaning in isolation is unproblematic, but the point of the story is Chārka's cynical misuse of scripture to serve his own ends.

The term rendered "wooden sounding board" (gaṇḍī, Tibetan gaNDI) is a plank or board struck to summon the Saṅgha; it is the standard Vinaya signaling instrument.

- The passage contains a verse attributed to the Blessed One. The verse as quoted by Chārka is slightly misapplied or distorted in context, which is likely intentional in the narrative, showing Chārka's manipulative use of scripture. The verse itself is a recognisable formulation found in Pali and Sanskrit canonical literature.

The term rendered "bowl-stand" for མཛོལ་མཆོག་ is uncertain; it may refer to a small bowl or dish rather than a stand. The term "strainer" for རྩོམ་མཆོག་ refers to the traditional water-strainer used by monks.

The repetition of the narrative frame at the end of the passage is present in the Tibetan and appears to be the beginning of a new episode within the same structural formula, here cut off mid-sentence; it has been translated accordingly.

- The passage contains a deliberate structural repetition: the same exhortation speech by Chārka is given twice in the Tibetan, once in the first episode (monastery described as dangerous, filled with robbers) and again in the second episode (monastery described as without danger). This is a common Vinaya narrative device in which parallel cases are used to establish a ruling that applies across varying circumstances. The rendering preserves this repetition faithfully.

The phrase rendered "black-bowled ones" refers to monks who carry the standard black lacquered alms bowl; it is used here by Chārka as a contemptuous epithet for his fellow monks, implying they are common or low.

- The term rendered "wandering ascetic" throughout is bsod snyoms pa, literally one who lives by collecting alms — a parivrājaka or śramaṇa-type figure who is not a fully ordained Buddhist monk. The term bsod snyoms pa normally means "alms-collector" or "one who lives by begging," and in this context refers to a non-monastic renunciant who has joined Ānanda's party. This is a narratively significant character-type distinction worth noting.

The phrase 'du 'dzi'i gdam gyis 'dug means literally "sitting engaged in talk of crowds and bustle," i.e., worldly or idle conversation; rendered accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "skilled in acoustics" translates a term meaning literally "skilled in sound" or "expert in resonance." The passage implies Ānanda knew precisely how to position the chair-leg above the floor so that pressing on it would transmit force through the boards onto the person below — a detail that may strike modern listeners as unusual but reflects the narrative's characterization of Ānanda's technical knowledge.

The expression "break through the ceiling and come down" refers to the thin wooden planking between upper and lower floors of a monastic building, not a solid structural ceiling; the wandering ascetic was sleeping in the room below.

- The phrase rendered "the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, though knowing, feign ignorance" is a standard Vinaya formula indicating that the Buddha asks a question whose answer he already knows, as a pedagogical and procedural device; it recurs throughout the Vinaya and is here abbreviated with "and so forth as before."

The term rendered "transgression" throughout this passage is a standard Vinaya technical term covering offenses that, while not root defeats, generate negative karmic consequence and require confession and acknowledgment to be purified.

The name rendered "Udāyin" is the Tibetan phonetic rendering of the Sanskrit name Udāyin, a monk known in the Vinaya literature for various infractions; this is distinct from the elder Kālodāyin.

- The phrase rendered "burns him, scorches him, and causes him to fall" follows a standard Vinaya formula for "āpatti" (transgression), listing the karmic consequences in descending order of severity. The threefold description is a formulaic gloss found throughout Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya texts.

- The epithet "black-bowled ones" renders lhung bzed nag po can, literally "those who have black bowls." This is a derisive nickname used by the Group of Six for the monks Nanda and Upananda, evidently referring to the color of their alms bowls. The precise social or disciplinary connotation of this epithet within the Vinaya context is not entirely clear from the passage alone.

The phrase rendered as "capable of drawing an awl through to thread a needle" (khab gzhug par gtun bu 'jud nus pa) is an idiomatic expression. It appears to designate someone skilled, dexterous, or practically capable — here used metaphorically to identify the most able or persuasive member of the Group of Six who can be sent to do the diplomatic work of commissioning the building project. The idiom may carry a more specific technical or colloquial meaning within the Vinaya tradition that is not fully recoverable from this passage alone.

- The list of monks' names presents several challenges. Some are standard and well-attested (Ājñātakauṇḍinya, Mahākāśyapa, Śāriputra, Mahāmaudgalyāyana, Aniruddha, Ānanda, Rāhula, Nanda, Upananda); others are rendered from Tibetan phonetic equivalents that are less certain. Aśvaśāvaka (ཨ་ཤ་ཤ་ཨ་ཤ་ཨ་ཤ་) literally "horse-tamed" may correspond to a monk whose Sanskrit name is uncertain. Nābhasa (ལྷ་མཚུངས་) is a tentative back-formation. Śīghragāmin (ལྷ་མཚུངས་ལྷ་མཚུངས་) means "swift-goer." Cūḍapanthaka (ལྷ་མཚུངས་) is a tentative identification. The opening passage about going to the "one who can thread a needle" is an idiomatic expression in this Vinaya context referring to a monk with practical skill suitable for overseeing construction work; the literal phrasing has been preserved.

- The phrase rendered "what began as first will become last for me" reflects the idiom of the wooden vessel analogy suggests: just as food cooked in a wooden pot destroys the vessel, accepting the superior offering would mean discarding what was received first in the alms-round, violating the training rule about not seeking superior food after already receiving alms. The simile is compressed in the Tibetan and the doctrinal point concerns the precept against seeking to exchange inferior alms already received for superior fare.
- The epithet "Dundubhissara" is a monk's name consistent with the broader narrative context; the Tibetan renders it phonetically. The "black-bowled ones" refers to a group of wayward monks identifiable in the Vinaya context by their distinctive black bowls, associated with the Group of Six monks who cause disruptions. The "seven bases of merit-making arising from material things" is a standard Vinaya list of meritorious material endowments to the Saṅgha. "Mahāmaudgalyāyana" renders the Tibetan "skul byed chen po," literally "the great instigator," which is a known Tibetan epithet for Mahāmaudgalyāyana; "Ghositārāma" renders "gdangs can gyi kun dga' ra ba," a name of a monastery associated with Vaiśālī, here treated as a proper name in the narrative.
- The phrase rendered as "not to accumulate virtue and to confess wrongdoing" is a formulaic Vinaya expression; the more precise sense is that the Buddha had taught the monks not to store up merit through inaction while transgressions remain unconfessed, but the Tibetan here reads idiomatically as a paired injunction and is rendered accordingly.

The instruction about spending the first watch in the temple makes best sense in context as the Buddha deploying the spiritual power of monks in meditative absorption to structurally stabilize the badly built temple overnight, a standard Vinaya narrative device.

- The phrase rendered "as flat as if a she-fox had been rolling in it" translates a Tibetan idiom for utter ruination or flattening to the ground. The elder among the Group of Six who speaks this line bears a grudge and is taunting the brahmin rather than consoling him, which explains the cruel phrasing.

The expression "worldly intention" versus "supramundane intention" reflects a doctrinal distinction in the text between the Buddha deliberately lowering his awareness to an accessible level so that even animals can read his mind, versus operating at the level of transcendent gnosis, which exceeds the cognitive reach of even pratyekabuddhas.

- [illegible]

designated leader or chair of a monastic assembly.

- The list of nuns' names in the opening passage presents several difficulties. The Tibetan renders Indian names phonetically and some are partially obscured. Kulamātā, Nandā, Madavā, Paṭhācārā, Sukhā, Candā, and Utpalavaṇṇā are recognizable from parallel Pāli and Sanskrit Vinaya sources. "Drogaṇāsa" (འགྲོག་ཀླུ་མཚེན་པོ་) is uncertain; the Tibetan may be a phonetic rendering of an Indian name not clearly recoverable here. "Gautamī Śyāmā" renders ལྷོ་མཚོ་མཁའ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་, where ལྷོ་མཚོ་ likely means "thin" or "dark," possibly corresponding to Kṛṣṇā or Śyāmā. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, and the translation preserves that open ending.
- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the supplied Tibetan. The translation follows the text precisely to its end without completion.

The phrase rendered "settle into inner stillness" translates ལྷོ་མཚོ་མཁའ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་, literally "to place correctly inward," a standard idiom for post-meal meditative rest or composed sitting in solitude.

"The cool of the morning" renders ལྷོ་མཚོ་མཁའ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་, which more precisely denotes the early cool period before full day; some editions read this as a specific time marker but the general sense is clear.

- The phrase rendered "this is my self" (bdag gi bdag) is a doubled genitive construction literally meaning "self of my self," reflecting the Pāli attā in its role as both possessive and substantive. The three-part formula "this is mine / this I am / this is my self" corresponds exactly to the Pāli etaṃ mama / eso'ham asmi / eso me attā, a standard formula for the three modes of self-grasping in Nikāya literature.
- The passage repeats a structural error in the third "Excellent" section, where Ānanda's summary says "these six groups of contact are to be seen as without self" when the context has just shifted to feeling and then craving. The Tibetan itself carries this apparent inconsistency, likely a scribal repetition of the contact formula; it has been rendered faithfully as it stands rather than corrected. The term ལྷོ་མཚོ་མཁའ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་ is rendered throughout as "craving," corresponding to Sanskrit tṛṣṇā, the eighth link of dependent origination.
- The passage uses a stock formula for the arising and passing of phenomena — "when those phenomena arise, such phenomena come to arise; when they cease, such phenomena come to cease, subside, cool, and pass away" — which is a variant of the standard dependent origination arising-and-cessation formula adapted here to describe impermanence rather than causal sequence. The rendering follows the Tibetan closely rather than importing the canonical Pali wording.
- The "six outer sense sources" refers to the six external sense objects or, more precisely, the six outer āyatanas — the visible forms, sounds, smells, tastes, tactile objects, and mental objects that serve as the outer bases of sensory experience. The distinction between "outer" and "inner" sense sources is standard Abhidharma usage.

The simile of the butcher and the cow's hide is a well-known canonical image, paralleled in Pāli sources. The point of the image is that just as the cow's flesh has been wholly severed from the hide even though it is wrapped back in it, so too the mind of one who has seen through impermanence is inwardly severed from clinging even while remaining within a body — the passage breaks off here and continues in the next section.

- The term rendered "Progenitrix" for ལྷོ་མཚོ་མཁའ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་ is literally "great mistress of beings" or "great mother of beings," a standard Pali epithet for Mahāpajāpatī Gautamī, the Buddha's maternal aunt and the first ordained nun. "Great Progenitrix" conveys her role as mother-figure and founder of the nuns' order without being overly literal. The preceding section's phrase "Venerable Ānanda" refers to the monk Ānanda, whose name appeared in the passage given as context.

- The phrase rendered "conditioning factors by which they would come again to this world" translates kun du sbyor ba, which corresponds to Sanskrit saṃyojana, the "fetters" or "bonds" that bind beings to further rebirth. The doctrinal point is that Ānanda's teaching has reduced their fetters to the point where, had they died then, none of the remaining fetters capable of producing rebirth in this world would have persisted — hence the prophecy of non-return. The moon simile on the fourteenth day is a classical image for near-but-not-quite-complete attainment.

- The phrase rendered "great Progenitress Gautamī" translates skye dgu'i bdag mo chen mo Gautamī, literally "great sovereign lady of beings, Gautamī." This refers to Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the Buddha's aunt and foster mother, and the first woman to receive full ordination. The epithet skye dgu'i bdag mo ("sovereign of beings") is a honorific specific to her in this tradition.

The simile of the full-moon night is textually unusual: the Tibetan says "the fifteenth day of the waxing moon" as the occasion when people do not distinguish whether the moon is still waxing or already full, because it has clearly reached its culmination (mthar thug pa). The doctrinal point being made is that the nuns' attainment is equally complete and unambiguous. The connection to Ānanda's possible death and the phrase "culmination of suffering" (sdug bsngal gyi mthar gyur pa) is somewhat elliptical; the sense appears to be that if Ānanda were to die now it would represent the acme of tragedy — but the simile reframes it as a completion, not a loss.

The "group of six monks" (dge slong drug sde) is a standard Vinaya expression referring to a well-known group of disreputable monks who frequently serve as the occasion for the Buddha establishing new rules. Their behavior here — described as overly familiar, playful, noisy, and physically inappropriate with the nuns — is the narrative prompt for a new Vinaya ruling.

- The phrase rendered "sent the remaining monks off on errands" translates "lhag ma rnams brel bar byas," literally "made the remainder busy/occupied." This is a standard canonical evasion tactic: dispersing the quorum so that a proper formal act cannot be performed. The rendering captures the procedural intent.

The passage moves from narrative into verbatim Vinaya procedural language for a formal Saṅgha act (karmavācānā), with its standard motion-and-proclamation structure. The translation preserves the formulaic repetition characteristic of Vinaya legal texts, as this repetition is doctrinally and legally significant, not stylistic redundancy.

The closing series of four "impossibility" statements has a strong parallel in Pāli canonical literature (cf. Dhammapada verses on self-discipline as prerequisite for teaching others); the passage appears to be setting up a verse or further declaration that follows in the next section.

- The phrase rendered "language of the city" reflects an unusual qualification for an instructor of nuns. The text glosses "city" as the palace and its surroundings, which likely refers to formal or refined court speech as opposed to rustic dialect. This is a technical Vinaya qualification whose precise import is debated in the commentarial tradition.

The closing scene shifts abruptly into a new narrative episode (a brahmin story), which is the standard Vinaya storytelling mechanism for introducing the next rule. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, so the translation ends there accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "Dharma-endowed heartfelt wishes" for the Blessed One's blessing differs slightly from the earlier occurrences where the tīrthikas and monks simply say "heartfelt wishes of both parents." The Tibetan adds "chos dang ldan pa'i" — "endowed with Dharma" — to the Blessed One's version alone, a meaningful distinction preserved in the translation. The name Mahāpanthaka (Tibetan: lam chen pa) is a well-known figure in the Buddhist tradition, and the etymology given here, "great road," matches the standard Sanskrit derivation from mahā (great) and pantha (road/path).

- The passage contains two Sanskrit syllabic pairs — "sid / dhām" and "om / bhū" — that appear to be fragments of Vedic or brahminic recitation used to illustrate Cūḷapanthaka's inability to retain even the simplest formulas. The Tibetan transliterates these syllables directly; I have retained them as they appear. The second pair "om bhū" is recognizable as the opening of the Gāyatrī mantra (om bhūr bhuvaḥ svaḥ), lending doctrinal plausibility to the sequence.

The girl's laziness causes her to sit on a side path rather than at the great crossroads as instructed, which is the textual mechanism by which the second child receives the name Cūḷapanthaka (Little Road / Side Path) in contrast to Mahāpanthaka (Great Road), established in the preceding passage.

- The passage contains the phrase rendered "whatever is born a brahmin is by that very birth a god" — this reflects a standard brahminical self-conception preserved in Buddhist narrative literature, presenting the brahmin's internal reasoning rather than the author's endorsement.

The term translated "secret brahmin recitations" renders a compound meaning the esoteric or confidential syllables/formulas of brahmin learning; the Vedic context makes "secret brahmin recitations" the most natural rendering.

- The phrase "the fivefold wheel of cyclic existence, moving and unmoving" is a somewhat unusual formulation. The "five" likely refers to the five aggregates or the five-spoked wheel of existence; the "moving and unmoving" aspects may refer to conditioned and unconditioned, or to animated and inert aspects of saṃsāric existence. The exact doctrinal referent is not entirely transparent from the text alone.

The final lines of the passage break off mid-sentence; the translation renders up to the point where the text ends, as supplied.

- The name "Mahāpatha" (Tibetan lam chen pa, literally "great path") functions both as a proper name and as a significant epithet throughout this passage, paired with "lesser path" (lam chung ba) for the unnamed traveler. These are kept as rendered proper names consistent with the preceding translation.

The verse translated as four lines preserves the structure of the original gāthā. The line "do not approach whatever suffering brings harm" renders gnad ldan sdu bsngal (literally "suffering that has a vital point" or "injurious suffering"), which the commentarial tradition glosses as harmful or injurious pain — rendered here in a way that flows naturally for a listener.

- The phrase rendered "utterly wretched — the most wretched of the wretched, the most petty of the petty" translates a sequence of superlative diminutives that is idiomatic in Vinaya narrative, indicating someone of zero standing in terms of learning and attainment. The Tibetan "bul ba / mchog tu bul ba / chung ba mchog tu chung ba" is a rhetorical intensification; the rendering preserves the contemptuous register without overly literalizing the gradations.

The verse at the close is Mahāpanthaka's reassurance to Panthaka: being criticized by the wise is more valuable than being flattered by fools — an implicit endorsement of the expulsion as a form of compassionate pedagogy. The passage breaks off mid-declaration, so the Blessed One's further words are not yet given.

- The passage ends mid-sentence with "With joy, with effort, and with" — this reflects the raw cut of the supplied Tibetan, which breaks off at that point. The translation has been carried to the exact end of the source text.

The two-word formula "Dispel the dust! Remove the stain!" renders "rajas" and "mala" respectively, a famous pair from the Vinaya account of Panthaka (also found in Pāli as "rajoharaṇaṃ" and "malaharaṇaṃ"). The doctrinal point is that the Blessed One chose these words deliberately to trigger Panthaka's meditation on the inner meaning.

- The passage contains a series of named individuals — Lāmpa (lesser and greater), Lāmachenpa, and Tsojezhönnu — that appear to be Tibetan phonetic renderings of Indian names. "Lāmpa" likely renders a Sanskrit name such as Nanda or similar (the "lesser Nanda" ordination narrative is well attested), but without the Sanskrit source confirmed, the Tibetan phonetics have been preserved consistently as proper names. The phrase "lesser Lāmpa" and "greater Lāmpa" reflect the Tibetan lam pa chung ba and lam chen pa, which in context function as personal names or epithets distinguishing two individuals, not as adjectives meaning "lesser path."

The five-part wheel of saṃsāra (saṃsāra's wheel in its five parts, moving and unmoving) is an unusual formulation; the text reads as a technical reference that would require fuller commentary context to resolve with certainty.

- The phrase rendered "that despised woman's territory" translates a somewhat elliptical Tibetan expression involving a woman of low standing whose territory or domain Lāmpa failed to master even a single verse about in three months. The exact referent is slightly obscure in context; it appears to be a derogatory comparison the nuns use to diminish Lāmpa's learning. The remark about "the ninety-six wonders" likely refers to the ninety-six non-Buddhist teachers or their followers, a standard enumeration in Buddhist literature, though the syntax of that sentence is terse and the connection to "overpowering a woman's domain" is not entirely clear. The phrase "child of the womb-eater" is a Tibetan idiom of abuse or displeasure, rendered literally here. The passage ends mid-sentence in the supplied text, as it breaks off at the crossroads and junctions.
- The phrase rendered "wandering monk who follows behind" translates a figure who appears to be a male wandering ascetic acting as a secondary or attendant figure to the nuns' teacher; the Tibetan suggests a contemptuous contrast between a full established teacher and a mere attendant-follower ascetic. The crowd's disparagement — that Lāmpā could barely master one verse in three months — is a narrative device underscoring the miracle that follows, a standard hagiographic pattern in Vinaya-related narratives of the great śrāvikās.
- The phrase rendered "inspired with confident faith" translates a term meaning to cause persons to become faithfully devoted or to instill conviction — here used in a slightly ironic or cautious framing by the monks, who hedge by saying "if she has not failed to do so." The passage has a mild rhetorical texture that the translation attempts to preserve.

The reference to the wheel of Dharma turned "in twelve aspects" alludes to the three turnings of each of the Four Noble Truths — recognition, duty, and accomplishment — yielding twelve aspects total. This is the standard first turning at Vārānaśī.

- The phrase "ภายในเขตสงฆ์ภายนอกเขตสงฆ์" refers to the Vinaya technical distinction of appointment valid within the sīmā (boundary) versus outside it. The sīmā is the formally delimited boundary within which monastic acts such as the poṣadha and formal appointments are canonically valid. The translation renders this as "within the boundary" and "outside the boundary" accordingly.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text provided; the translation likewise ends at that point without completing the clause.

- The term rendered "like a senior elder acting as a deputy" translates a compound meaning a monk of standing sufficient to serve as a substitute or representative for an elder of seniority, a specific procedural qualification in the Vinaya for the appointment of a preceptor-instructor for nuns. The "eight rules entailing defeat" are the eight pārājika offenses of the nuns' code, and the "eight weighty rules" are the eight gurudharmas incumbent upon nuns. The phrase rendered "expelled by a nun through physical contact" refers to a nun having formally censured or rejected the monk on grounds of an improper physical touch, a procedural disqualification that can be remedied if the transgression is properly confessed and reversed before the Saṅgha.

- The venerable Lampā referred to here is a monk who appears in the surrounding narrative context as the figure whom the twelve groups of nuns attempted to harm but inadvertently benefited. The passage moves between Vinaya rule-formulation and a Jātaka-style tale of past-life precedent, which is a standard feature of Vinaya narrative.

The term translated as "coarse grain husks" renders a phrase indicating rough, inferior rice or husks given as food, contrasted with the fine śāli variety; "dishwater" renders a phrase for thin, valueless liquid, contrasted with rich broth. The two-compartment pot trick is the daughters-in-law's scheme to make it appear before the sons that good food miraculously degrades when offered to the brahmin, thus discrediting his complaint.

- The phrase rendered "coarse grain husks" and "boiled dregs" translates terms that contrast sharply with the fine śāli rice and whey broth given to the husbands — the comic and moral point being that the brahmin, supposedly of great accumulated merit, receives the inferior portion while the sons get the best. The verse plays on the same theme: even a two-chambered pot, which in other households would simply mean two portions, here still yields only one mouth's worth for the unfortunate father.

The snake-charmer episode turns on the folk-medical idea that the venom of an angry snake concentrates at its head and tail, making the middle of the body safe to consume and indeed medicinally beneficial — here restoring the brahmin's sight.

- The name Lampa renders the Tibetan ལམ་པ་, which appears to be a proper name; it has been retained as established in the preceding translation. The term kārṣāpaṇa (Skt. kārṣāpaṇa) is a standard ancient Indian monetary unit, retained as a recognizable technical term rather than rendered loosely as "coins." The phrase ལྷ་མཆོག་ལྷ་མཆོག་ལྷ་མཆོག་, literally "the great lord of the master of power," is rendered "the great lord of mastery," understood here as a Buddhized allusion to a high attainment (possibly an ironic or honorific reference recontextualizing the deity Maheśvara); this is a genuine point of interpretive difficulty. The sentence structure in several passages follows the Tibetan closely where narrative logic requires it, and minor ellipsis in the Tibetan has been filled only where required for readable English prose.

- The name "Byi-dbyi-pa" rendered literally as "Rat Boy the Jeweller" reflects the Tibetan formation: byi ba (rat) plus dbyi pa (jewel-trader), combined as a nickname epitomizing the whole story of his rise from a dead rat to a successful jeweller. The Tibetan keeps this as a proper epithet; in a Sanskrit context this might correspond to something like Mūṣikā-maṇivaṇik. The translation retains the Tibetan-derived name alongside the gloss for narrative fidelity.

- The list of precious substances includes a number of terms that the Tibetan renders in slightly loose equivalents of Sanskrit gemological vocabulary. The rendering "mother-of-pearl" for sa le sbram and "carnelian" for dmar po follow standard identifications in the tradition but the precise stones intended are not entirely certain. The phrase "right-whorled shells" for g.yas su 'khyil pa refers to the auspicious dextral conch shell, a well-known Buddhist symbol. The five-man ship's crew with their specific roles is a formulaic list that recurs in several Pali and Sanskrit narrative parallels.

- The term "kumbbhīra" (rendered from ལྷ་མཆོག་ལྷ་མཆོག་ལྷ་མཆོག་) is a Tibetan transcription of Sanskrit kumbhīra, a crocodilian sea-monster. The phrase "fish-swallowing great fish, the danger of fish-swallowing-fish-swallowing great fish" renders a triple escalating construction in

- The four-line verse is incomplete in the source passage as given — the text breaks off after the second line. Only two lines are translated; the remainder presumably continues in the next passage.

The name Lampā (𑀯𑀭𑀸𑀓) is kept consistent as in the prior translation convention established by context.

The phrase "given to, supremely given to, lowly and supremely lowly" reflects the Tibetan bul ba, mchog tu bul ba, chung ba, mchog tu chung ba, a formulaic descending gradation indicating extreme baseness and insignificance in karmic result. No cleaner English idiom precisely captures the fourfold formula, so it is rendered as literally as readability allows.

- The name "Lamba" appears as a monk who is conspicuously excluded from the invitation both when Jīvaka addresses the Blessed One and when Ānanda relays the invitation. The Tibetan gives "ལམ་པ་" throughout, which is the Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit proper name, almost certainly "Lamba" or a similar form. The exact identity and the reason for his exclusion are not stated in this passage; the matter presumably continues in the following section.

- The verse presents a minor structural complexity: the first three lines establish three similes of constant positive qualities, the fourth and fifth lines introduce a contrasting simile of constant fault in ordinary people, and the final two lines return to praise of noble ones and arhats. The rendering preserves this chiasmic movement.

- The passage contains a standard narrative formula describing an ideal Buddhist king's realm, with the phrase "kings of the lands under the sun" rendering a conventional expression for subordinate rulers. The phrase rendered "horse-master" for 馬師 translates literally as "one who knows horses," meaning an expert judge or inspector of horses, which in context appears to function as a royal official responsible for assessing the quality of horses across the kingdom. The final sentence draws on the Jātaka literary convention that in the earliest age of the world, animals possessed human speech; this is flagged here as the foal is about to become the story's speaking protagonist.

- The phrase rendered "a hundred thousand in gold" (འདྲེན་པ་འདྲེན་པ་) literally means "a hundred thousand of gold," a standard large sum in classical Indian narrative. The unit is left implicit in the Tibetan, as is normal.

The verse passage contains an ambiguous moment where the horse speaks of "self-healed, re-grown roots" (རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་) as a reference to the meager food he subsisted on while with the potter — the exact botanical referent is unclear but the sense is roots or plant stems that have grown back after being cut, i.e., scavenged forage. This reading is adopted as the most contextually coherent.

The phrase རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་ is literally "a parasol with a life-pole of a hundred" — understood as a ceremonial parasol with a hundred ribs or spokes, a standard royal insignia in Indo-Tibetan narrative.

- The verse quatrain appears to be a summary gāthā inserted into the prose narrative, recapping the reception arrangements. The rendering follows the grammatical structure as a verse passage accordingly.

The term "རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་" literally means "kings of the south" (beneath-the-sun direction), rendered as "kings of the southern regions," which is the standard cosmographical usage here.

"རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་རྩ་" is rendered as Brahmasaras, "the pool of Brahmā," which is the conventional identification of this lotus pool in the Vārāṇasī narrative cycle.

- The epithet rendered "he of unsurpassed qualities" translates a Tibetan phrase meaning literally "Kāśyapa of unsurpassed qualities," where the name and epithet run together in the Tibetan; the division is clear from context.

The name "Lāmpa" appears in the preceding context as the person whose past life is being narrated; the Tibetan here uses "lam pa" which is a proper name established in the preceding passage.

The phrase "the youth Jīvaka who nurtured the young" renders "Jīvaka Kumārabhṛta" — Jīvaka being the famous physician whose name is embedded in the story; "Āmba-pāli" appears to be absent here and "Jīvaka" is used as a proper name per the narrative context.

- The foreign-language exclamations rendered in transliteration — "A-ye, a-ya, ha-ḍe, a-ga, e, a-ga, ha-ḍe" — appear to be phonetic transcriptions of non-Indic cries or of a formulaic shout in some regional dialect; their precise meaning is not recoverable from the Tibetan, and so they are left as transliterated sound. The phrase rendered "noble warrior" for "phags-skyes-po" (literally "noble-born man," likely representing Skt. āryajanāḥ or a martial term) refers in context to a high-born warrior class; this is a standard narrative device in Vinaya literature for a nun conjuring a protective illusion.

- The phrase rendered "a nun of lotus-blue complexion" translates a proper name or descriptive epithet for a nun whose skin color is compared to the blue lotus (utpala); the surrounding context suggests this is a reference to the nun Utpalāvarṇā, a well-known figure in Vinaya literature famed for her supernormal powers. The term "wrong act" (Tibetan: nyes byas) is a technical Vinaya category less serious than a full offense (Ituñ byed); the distinction is preserved in the translation. The phrase "motion and a dual-act procedure" renders a standard Vinaya formula for formal Saṅgha appointments (gsol ba dang gnyis kyi las); this refers to a one-motion, two-announcement karma, the standard procedural form.

- The phrase rendered "the domain of women, on account of their flickering wisdom, cannot receive the signs" is a somewhat compressed idiom. The Tibetan literally says women's sphere, because their wisdom is unsteady, does not encounter signs and they are unable to inquire out of fear. This is a reported pedagogical observation within the narrative context, not a doctrinal statement attributed to the Buddha directly. The rendering follows the literal sense.

The closing section beginning with the five plantables and five eatables appears to be the start of a new rule-promulgation passage that breaks off mid-sentence; this is a feature of the source text's continuity across folios, not a translation lacuna.

- The Tibetan term rendered "bucket" for བུའུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་ is uncertain; the compound likely refers to a carrying vessel or container of some kind, and the translation "bucket" is approximate. The exact referent of བུའུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་ and བུའུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་མུ་ in the list of requisites (rendered as "straining cloth" and "small straining pouch") follows standard Vinaya commentarial identifications of these as filtering implements used by monastics to strain water, but the precise distinction between the two is not entirely certain from the Tibetan alone.

- The phrase rendered "like the remnant of a divine dwelling" is an idiomatic expression of strong desire or admiration. The Tibetan "lha'i gnas kyi lhag ma bzhin du" most naturally conveys something like "as if it were a leftover from a divine abode," meaning she covets it extremely. The exact nuance is somewhat oblique, but the sense of intense longing is clear from context.

The final portion of the passage ends mid-sentence, describing the Blessed One and his retinue with a series of parallel epithets; the translation preserves this open-ended structure as the passage breaks off there.

- The list of divine guardians requires attention. The Tibetan names ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ (Dhṛtarāṣṭra), ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ (Virūpākṣa), ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ (Virūḍhaka), and ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ (Vaiśravaṇa) are the Four Great Kings rendered by their Tibetan epithet-translations rather than their Sanskrit names. I have supplied the Sanskrit equivalents in the translation for clarity. The Tibetan ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ literally means "noble-born one," which is an epithet of Virūpākṣa in this context; ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ལྷུ་རྩུ་ ("attendant vessels") in this position is unusual and may refer to gandharva attendants or ceremonial vessel-bearers — the exact sense is uncertain.

The final paragraph about the monk giving robes to a non-relative nun is syntactically compressed; the rendering follows the most doctrinally coherent reading, namely that monks freely give to unrelated nuns without first assessing whether her three robes are complete, whereas with a relative such reciprocal exchange does not occur.

- The phrase "perceiving her as not his relative" and the doubting-mind cases follow standard Vinaya casuistry distinguishing full transgressions from lesser faults based on the monk's perception and certainty. The term rendered "fault" for the lighter cases is a lesser offense than a full transgression.

The name "Bhadā" is a standard rendering of the Tibetan "བཤམ་མེད་མེད་" (Skt. Bhadrā), a nun's name used elsewhere in the Vinaya.

"Cāraka" renders མེད་མེད་མེད་མེད་, a monk's name; the passage breaks off mid-sentence as given.

- The phrase rendered "just as with what is boiled in a wooden vessel, what comes first becomes last" reflects a proverbial Vinaya idiom about ordering: a wooden vessel boils what is on top last and what is on the bottom first — meaning Cāraka intends to sew in reverse order to discourage the queue of claimants. The exact proverb is somewhat elliptical in the Tibetan, but this interpretation follows the standard commentarial reading.

"The great mother of beings, Gautamī" refers to Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the Buddha's aunt and the first nun, here given her full honorific title.

- The seven types of cloth listed follow the standard Vinaya enumeration; the renderings given are conventional approximations, as the exact fiber identities of some terms (such as རྩེད་ཀྱི་ལྗང་ལྗང་ and རྩེད་ཀྱི་ལྗང་ལྗང་ལྗང་ལྗང་) remain debated in the scholarly literature but do not affect the doctrinal point.
- The phrase rendered "a yoke-pin is pressing down on your head" is an idiomatic Tibetan expression of contemptuous rebuke directed at the brahmin for his presumptuous misidentification. The image of a yoke-pin pressing down conveys something like "you are burdened by your own stupidity." The exact nuance is somewhat colloquial and the precise force of the insult is difficult to render with full equivalence in English.

The figure called "Upanandika" in the preceding passage appears here as Nandā in the feminine pairing with Nanda, and "Gupta-nandā" is a rendering of གུཔ་ནང་དྲུག་པོ་ལྷན་པོ།. The pairing structure reflects the six groups arranging themselves in couples of monk, nun, companion monk, companion nun, novice monk, novice nun.

- The phrase rendered "keeping only to the fore" translates a term meaning they proceeded at the front or head, physically separated from the monk companion — a Vinaya strategy to nominally comply with the rule while still traveling the same road. The precise nuance is that they moved ahead of the companion rather than traveling in company with him, though the text's exact meaning admits a small degree of interpretive latitude.
- The phrase rendered "the ninety-six wondrous ones" refers to the ninety-six non-Buddhist philosophical schools recognized in classical Indian Buddhist literature. The comment that none of them "fully sent forth women" is a stock doctrinal contrast praising the Buddha's institution of the nuns' order.

The passage on "holding from the foot-side" versus "the head-side" reflects a Vinaya regulation about how monks and nuns may assist an ill fellow-traveler of the opposite sex without incurring impropriety or generating attachment; the reversal of roles after attachment arose is the occasion for the corrective ruling.

- The unit "ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་" is a standard Vinaya measure of distance, conventionally rendered as "league" in English Vinaya translations; the text distinguishes between half-league increments for the lesser offense and full-league increments for the full transgression. The term "ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་" denotes the lighter offense (Skt. duṣkṛta, a wrongdoing) in contrast to "ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་" (the full transgression); this distinction is preserved in the translation as "offense" versus "transgression" respectively.
- The passage contains a doubling of the "brahmin saw them" incident — the text describes the scene once with a "brahmin" (brahmin), then repeats a near-identical exchange attributed to Upananda overhearing the wandering mendicant. This appears to be a textual anomaly in the source, likely a scribal conflation of two parallel narrative threads. The translation renders the text faithfully as it stands.

The term bsod snyoms pa is used throughout for a wandering mendicant who goes about begging; the context indicates a non-Buddhist wandering ascetic rather than a Buddhist alms-goer, hence "wandering mendicant" rather than "alms-monk."

- The phrase rendered "crossing straight across is excepted" refers to the doctrinal clarification that the rule against traveling with nuns on a single boat applies to journeys along the river (upstream or downstream), but a direct crossing straight to the opposite bank is exempted. This is a standard Vinaya qualification.

The repeated phrase "as before" throughout this passage is a formulaic Vinaya abbreviation indicating that standard boilerplate passages, known from earlier sections of the text, are to be understood as repeated in full here; this is a common scribal economy in the canonical Vinaya literature.

- The term rendered "league" throughout is the standard translation of the Tibetan distance unit "rgyang grags," a unit of distance roughly equivalent to a league or half a yojana; the precise equivalence is a matter of textual convention rather than decisive uncertainty.

The name rendered "Udāyin" translates "Tshé dang ldan pa 'char ka," where "'char ka" is a standard Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit name Udāyin. The female lay devotee's name "Bhadā" renders the Tibetan "Sbed ma," which is the standard equivalent.

- The passage is an unusually complex narrative involving several layers of reported speech and recollection, and the chronology of the almsman episode requires careful tracking. The sentence in which Udāyin says "if I were to obtain a hundred pleasures through the work of my own hands" is elliptical and somewhat obscure; it appears to be a sarcastic rhetorical remark implying that his teaching was not purely spiritual. The rendering follows the most natural reading of the syntax. The phrase rendered "let a rule of training appear to have been laid down through me" reflects the Vinaya idiom for the formal promulgation of a rule arising from an incident, which is a technical formula in this genre.

- The term rendered "female attendant" translates 女侍, a term for a female lay helper or attendant associated with a monastic community, distinct from a fully ordained nun. The term 女官, rendered "duty officer," refers to the monk or nun appointed to oversee daily duties in the monastery on a given day. The phrase 入者入之, 出者出之, "when some are entering and others are leaving," is a standard Vinaya formula indicating that the place is not truly private because of through-traffic.

- The phrase rendered "a secluded place apart from others" translates a compound meaning roughly "a solitary and secluded place where there is shelter" — a technical Vinaya description of a private location with sufficient cover or concealment to constitute an offence-condition. The rendering aims to preserve that technical sense without becoming unwieldy in speech.

The elderly nun's observation about the two "not yet having been taken as bride and groom" reflects her recognition that Cāraka and the attendant are behaving with the familiarity of former lay partners, recalling their pre-ordination relationship. The phrase is a colloquial idiom for a pre-marital or courtship relationship.

- The phrase "འགྲོ་བུ་རྒྱལ་པོ་མཆོད་སྤྱོད་ཀྱི་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཐང་ལ་འགྲོ་བུ་རྒྱལ་པོ་མཆོད་སྤྱོད་ཀྱི་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཐང་ལ་" is literally "having risen from properly setting down the grinding stone inside." This is an unusual phrase; it likely refers to Mahākāśyapa having been grinding or preparing something and setting it aside before going to the Buddha. The rendering "putting away his grinding stone" reflects the most natural reading of the Tibetan.

- The phrase rendered "the most given away, the most inferior of those given away" translates a stock formula of contempt in Vinaya literature: Sthūlanandā is disparaging Mahākāśyapa as a convert from a non-Buddhist order, implying he was unwanted and cast off. The exact force of the repeated Tibetan phrasing "bul ba mchog tu bul ba, chung ba mchog tu chung ba" is slightly uncertain in nuance, but the general meaning — that he was the lowliest of refugees from outside the Dharma — is clear from context and parallel Vinaya passages.

- The epithet translated as "the one named Nāga" renders the Tibetan klu'i ming can, literally "the one whose name is Nāga." This appears to be a personal name or nickname used disparagingly in context; it is not a reference to the serpent-deity class as such.

The phrase rendered "both his hands cut off at the wrists" more literally reads "have his two hands cut from the wrists," referring to a threatened legal punishment. The grammar is slightly elliptical in the Tibetan but the sense is clear.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, indicating the text continues beyond this excerpt.

- The passage begins mid-sentence, completing the two reasons the Blessed One gives to Kāśyapa — the second being "so that it may serve as a light for people of future generations." This continuation follows naturally from the preceding translated passage.

The phrase rendered "healing" translates the Tibetan term for medicinal or therapeutic benefit, indicating long-term spiritual and physical well-being rather than literal medicine.

Sthulanandā is a well-known nun in the Vinaya narratives, frequently associated with rule-violations; her name is kept as a standard Sanskrit rendering.

The final sentence of the translation ends mid-passage as the source text itself ends mid-sentence; no ellipsis or flag is introduced in the body per the formatting instructions.

- The passage "follows as before" is a standard Vinaya abbreviation indicating that the formulaic passages — convening the assembly, the Buddha's inquiry, the tenfold benefits declaration, and the preamble to the rule — are to be understood as fully repeated from the model episode earlier in the text. This is rendered literally to preserve the character of the canonical text.

- The phrase rendered "knew how to receive him properly" translates a Tibetan idiom meaning literally that the householder "knew how to draw him in at the right time" — that is, understood the correct protocol for inviting a wandering monk. The monk's acceptance through silence is a recognized convention: a mendicant who does not refuse is understood to have agreed. No doctrinal uncertainty here, but the social-monastic register is worth noting for listeners unfamiliar with Vinaya etiquette.

- The phrase rendered "the glow had not left his body" translates a Tibetan idiom for the physical vitality or warmth that sustains a person through a day of fasting or exertion; the exact nuance is that the monk was practicing energetic wholesome activity for as long as his bodily strength held, then rested when it was spent.

The name Sthulanandā (Tibetan Sbom dga' mo) is a well-known Vinaya character; the name literally means "Greatly Delighted" or "Plump Delight," but it is kept as the standard Sanskrit form throughout.

The exchange "if your first statement was true, then the latter is false; and if the latter is true, then the first is false" is a logical refutation: Sthulanandā first claimed she had been invited by the householder's wife Sumagadhā (implying a connection to the monk's invitation), then claimed she spoke his praises of her own accord; the monk points out these two claims are mutually contradictory.

- The five kinds of hard food and five kinds of soft food are standard Vinaya categories; the Tibetan here does not list them explicitly but refers to them by the conventional formula.

Several of the specific food terms in the final section involve culinary vocabulary that resists precise identification. "Transforming salt" likely refers to a processed or chemically altered salt; "rock salt," "sea salt," and "ocean salt" render three distinct Tibetan terms for salt varieties. "Threefold-enhanced rice" renders a term suggesting rice prepared with extra enrichment. The soup and broth terms in the final exchanges involve Tibetan vocabulary for legumes and preparations that cannot be identified with complete certainty, and the renderings given are best approximations within the culinary and Vinaya context.

- Several food and drink terms in this passage present genuine difficulty. The term རྩོམ་ཆུ་ likely refers to a fermented or distilled grain beverage; I have rendered it "fermented grain drink" and "grain-spirit" where it appears as a condiment or soup base, though the precise substance is uncertain. The term རྩོམ་ཆུ་འཇམ་ལྷ་ refers to holders of the Mātṛkā, that is, the Abhidharma or doctrinal matrices; this is a standard threefold classification of learned monks alongside sūtra and Vinaya specialists. The term མཐོན་པོ་ is uncertain; it may refer to a kind of dried or pressed pulse product; I have rendered it "dried-pulse" provisionally. The classification "triple-measure rice" for མཐོན་པོ་གྲངས་གསུམ་ལྟེང་གི་རྩི་ལྟ་བུ་ is also uncertain; it may refer to a coarse or mixed grain preparation rather than literally three measures.

- The term Mātṛkā refers to the Abhidharma collections, literally "matrices" or "enumerations" — the third basket of the canon. The rendering "holders of the Mātṛkā" is technically precise and follows the established pattern in the preceding passage.

The summary verse lists topics of the preceding section of Vinaya rules in compressed mnemonic form. The individual terms are deliberately telegraphic and do not form a grammatical sentence; they are rendered as faithfully as the genre allows.

The identification of རྩེ་ལྟ་བུ་ as "Kalandaka" (the squirrel-feeder's grove, a name for the Bamboo Forest grove at Rājagṛha) follows standard Vinaya topography.

- The text lists four continents in what the tradition regards as the five-section wheel: Videha (east), Godānīya (west), Uttarakuru (north), and Jambudvīpa (south/center). The fifth "section" of the wheel's rim in some recensions is accounted for differently; the passage here simply enumerates the four continents alongside the five destinies, the three poisons in the center, the buddha figure, and the twelve links around the circumference. This is an early description of what later tradition calls the Wheel of Life (bhavacakra).

The simile "like a continuous thread of silk" renders the Tibetan zo chun rgyud ma'i tshul, describing the manner in which spontaneously born beings die and are reborn — the image is of an unbroken, fine silken thread, indicating the uninterrupted continuity of rebirth.

- The phrase rendered "through the power of her own kinship bonds and the strength of her hands" translates a somewhat elliptical Tibetan expression; the reference is to the mother raising the child through family support and her own physical labor. The grove name "Nalendra" renders Tibetan རྩེ་ལྟ་བུ་, a known site near Rājagṛha associated with Nālandā; the identification is conventional in the tradition.

- The "five-section wheel" painted in the Añodā Grove depicting the five destinies appears to be an early reference to a cosmological diagram, possibly an antecedent of the later Wheel of Life. The grove name rendered here as Añodā follows the probable Sanskrit; the Tibetan reads རྩེ་ལྟ་བུ་, "the grove of light," which may correspond to Añodā or a similarly named grove — the identification is not certain but is not doctrinally consequential.

- The term rendered "bonus" is literally "a gift of joy" or "gratuity given out of pleasure," which is a recognized category of additional payment in ancient Indian mercantile and legal literature. The translation "bonus" conveys this adequately for an audio audience.

The kārṣāpaṇa is a standard ancient Indian monetary unit; it is left in Sanskrit as a proper term since no English equivalent exists.

The phrase rendered "slowly" for ལེ་ལོ་ལོ་ (lit. "leisurely/easy work") contrasts with the boy's swift pace; the contextual meaning is working at a relaxed, unhurried pace rather than industriously.

- The phrase rendered "take food there on loan" translates a somewhat elliptical construction implying that the six monks intended to eat at intervening houses under some pretext, effectively freeloading. The phrasing is deliberately disparaging toward the boy and reflects the group of six monks' characteristic bad behavior as a narrative foil in Vinaya literature.

- The phrase rendered "when their turn came, he saw that they were not eating" involves a slightly compressed passage in the Tibetan where the group of six monks had already eaten along the way and so could not eat again at the formal meal. The Tibetan reads literally that the householder's son, going about serving, looked at the group of six with reverence and saw they were not eating. The group of six then go before the Blessed One with a transparently self-serving concern about rebirth among the gods, implying they fear losing merit by not eating — the irony being that they had disqualified themselves by eating on loan along the way. The Blessed One's response about the merit of lodging is a gentle and somewhat understated rebuke.

- The phrase rendered as "unglazed clay vessel" translates 土器未焼物, literally a clay pot that has not been fired or finished — an unfired or rough earthenware vessel. The precise ritual significance of this detail is not entirely clear from context, but the rendering is philologically sound.

The expression ἡ τετραπλοῦς σημεῖα ("non-human beings have declared it by a fourfold sign") is somewhat elliptical; the text implies a supernatural confirmation of the result, though the exact nature of the "fourfold great sign" is not spelled out here. This is noted as a point where the full narrative context likely clarifies the reference.

- The phrase rendered "twenty-peaked mountain of the view of the transitory collection" renders a standard Abhidharma formula: the view of a self in the five aggregates gives rise to twenty sub-views (five aggregates times four modes of grasping), here metaphorized as twenty mountain-peaks. This is a stock image in Sanskrit Buddhist narrative literature.
- The phrase rendered "those who sustained themselves on dairy produce" translates a Tibetan term for a class of people defined by a particular diet or livelihood involving dairy or fresh foods; this is a standard Vinaya narrative device introducing a subplot. The exact social identity of this group in context may be clarified by subsequent passages.
- The phrase rendered "store-room" translates a term referring to a space or chamber associated with stored provisions — contextually, a place within or near the dwelling where the Blessed One was stationed prior to the meal. The five reasons given for buddhas abiding there and engaging in the alms-practice are a standard canonical list; the translation follows the list as given.

The names "Gavāmpati and Nandita" are supplied from context for 喜樂安樂 — literally "Joyful-Contented" — which in this Vinaya narrative context are standard epithets for two members of the group of six monks; the text uses these as names rather than common epithets here.

- The passage contains a formulaic Vinaya narrative structure, with several phrases explicitly marked as "as before" in the Tibetan, indicating that standard stock passages are to be understood as repeated rather than spelled out in full. These have been rendered as "and so forth, as before" to preserve the formulaic character. The closing paragraph is somewhat compressed and elliptical in the source, juxtaposing two scenes; the transition reflects the Tibetan's own abrupt structure, which appears to interweave the earlier physician episode with a new scene involving faithful laypeople visiting the Saṅgha — a common Vinaya narrative technique establishing the grounds for a rule's expansion or qualification.
- The phrase rendered "great length of cloth" translates ras yug chen, literally "a great bolt of cloth," which in the Vinaya context likely refers to a robe-length of fabric — a standard and significant offering to monastics.

The servant's phrase "the meal is ready" is a contextual rendering of gdugstshod gsol, literally "the time of the midday meal" or "the meal at the sun's height." The house glossary does not cover this term, but the meaning in context is clearly an invitation to come for the noon meal while it is still the proper time.

- The phrase rendered "sweeping the floor" translates a compound that literally means something like "spreading or leveling the mandala area," referring here to sweeping or preparing the ritual ground within a monastic or stūpa precinct, not a tantric maṇḍala in the technical sense. The translation "sweeping the floor" captures the practical meaning in context.

The fourfold matrix of cloth-invitation cases is a standard Vinaya permutation grid. The logic turns on whether the second invitation carries cloth or its monetary equivalent, which elevates it to the same status as a cloth-giving occasion and thus qualifies as a permitted time for the extra meal.

- The phrase rendered "without cloth only" in the eighth case distinguishes an invitation that includes cloth but not the price of cloth from one that includes neither; the Tibetan contrasts རྒྱུ་ལྡན་པ་ (with cloth) against རྒྱུ་ལྡན་པ་ (without cloth), with རྒྱུ་ལྡན་པ་ (price of cloth) as an additional variable. The combinatorial matrix here is systematic Vinaya casuistry enumerating all permissible and impermissible pairings. The closing formula རྒྱུ་ལྡན་པ་ལྟར་ལྟར་ལྟར་ལྟར་ marks this as the conclusion of the thirty-first pācittiya rule in this Vinaya recension.

- The phrase rendered "like the moon that has been hidden away" is a conventional expression of long-absent and now welcome arrival; the Tibetan literally says "you have come from afar, like the moon, after a very long time," comparing the householder's return to the reappearance of the moon after a long absence.

The epithet "Nandaka" for the venerable Nandaka (Tibetan: རྒྱུ་ལྡན་པ་) is consistent with the standard identification of this monk in the Vinaya narrative; the name means "joyous" or "delightful."

The phrase translated "as barren as a salt plain" renders a Tibetan expression (རྒྱུ་ལྡན་པ་) that describes land that is desolate, saline, and infertile — a standard metaphor for recipients in whom good deeds bear no fruit.

- The "black-bowl-bearer" refers to a monk who carries a black alms-bowl, here used as a designation for a strictly observant monk (as contrasted with the lax group of six). The implication is that Nandaka, aware of his own misconduct, does not want virtuous monks to learn of the situation. This is a subtle social detail in the Vinaya narrative.

The phrase rendered "cut off your major limbs" translates a Vinaya idiom for a severe physical threat; "major limbs" refers to arms, legs, and the like.

- The phrase rendered "domain-talk is stinging" translates a formulaic expression used each time the group of six react to the householder's provocations. The Tibetan reads literally something like "the domain-word stings" or "the word of the domain burns." This appears to be an idiomatic protest — the group of six are complaining that the householder's reduction of hospitality is an affront or a breach of the understood terms. The precise idiomatic force is somewhat opaque; the rendering given conveys the sense as best as can be reconstructed from context.

- The term rendered "scruff-napes" (Tibetan: sgre byi) is a derogatory epithet for the naked ascetics, likely referring to their matted or unkempt hair. The exact nuance is uncertain but clearly contemptuous; "scruff-napes" conveys the tone adequately. The phrase "it will cause a downpour of rain" reflects a folk belief that monks fighting disrupts cosmic order and brings unseasonable rain; this is a standard Vinaya narrative trope. The name "Acara" (Tibetan: 'char ka) is tentatively reconstructed; the Sanskrit original is uncertain.

- The list of monks' names in the opening presents some uncertainty. The Tibetan renders names that correspond to well-known disciples: Rāṣṭhapāla (རྒྱུ་ལྡན་པ་), Bhadra (བྱུ་ལྡན་པ་), Revatī (རེ་བའི་), Mahānāman (མཁན་པོ་), Yaśas (ཡེ་ཤེ་), Pūrṇa (པུ་རྒྱ་), Vimala (བེ་ལེ་), Gavāṃpati (གའ་ལྟམ་པའི་), and Subāhu (སུ་བའུ་). The identifications are reasonable but some Tibetan renderings are paraphrastic epithets rather than strict transliterations, so the Sanskrit equivalents are approximate.

The phrase rendered "burst through the shell of the egg of ignorance" translates a standard arhat-praise formula describing the breakthrough of knowledge (rig pa — vidyā) through the eggshell of ignorance (sgo nga'i sbubs — aṇḍakośa). This is a recognized canonical image.

- The phrase rendered "school of the world-hurlers" translates the Tibetan term for the Lokāyata materialist tradition; "world-hurler" renders the term literally, and Carakā is a wandering brahmin associated with this school.

The passage about the six groups defeating sixty naked ascetics is deliberately ironic and self-aggrandizing on the part of the six groups, contrasted unfavorably with Śāriputra's genuine victory; the monks of few desires rebuke the six groups for boasting about physical combat or coercive means rather than true Dharma teaching.

The closing narrative frame shifts scene abruptly from the regulatory episode back to an earlier story thread involving a householder and a cliff-side shop; this is characteristic of Vinaya narrative compilation, where multiple story strands are interwoven.

- The names Nāgasamudra and Apratihata render the Tibetan "Nam gru" and "Ma 'gags pa" respectively. "Nam gru" is unusual; it may represent a different disciple's name, but Nāgasamudra is a plausible Sanskrit reconstruction. This is a genuinely uncertain point but not doctrinally consequential.

- The proclamation passage contains a slight structural ambiguity: the householder's reported speech to Śāriputra and the actual public proclamation he issues overlap in phrasing, suggesting either indirect quotation or a telescoping of two moments. The translation renders both their natural meanings as the narrative flow demands.

- The four fruits enumerated follow the standard śrāvaka path: stream-entry, once-returning, non-returning, and arhatship. The arousing of mind directed toward three different vehicles in the same assembly reflects a classic literary device of mahāyāna sūtras.

The phrase rendered "carrying someone on his back" translates a term for carrying by means of the arms or clasped hands, likely referring to being carried piggyback or supported; the context suggests Śāriputra was carried while ill, and the rule permitting this is now formally established.

The closing exegetical section is standard Vinaya commentary style, glossing each term of the rule in sequence. The phrase rendered "states of misfortune" and "lower realms" represents overlapping terms for bad rebirths, and the list appears slightly redundant in the Tibetan itself, suggesting a formulaic enumeration.

- The phrase rendered "Friends, Nandaka" reflects the Tibetan "འགྲོགས་པ་ལྔ་ལྔ་" which are the names Nanda and Upananda, two of the chief members of the Six-Group monks. Here they are being addressed or identified by name in the framing of the speech. The rendering "Friends, Nandaka" is a simplification; more precisely the Six-Group monks are speaking among themselves, with Nanda and Upananda as the leading pair.

The verses at the end present a genuine interpretive challenge: "One who dwells first on a mountain is like refined gold being polished; but when one begins plotting harm to people, that mountain becomes just what it is." The metaphor may carry the sense that what begins as something refined and promising becomes harsh and unforgiving once ill-intent enters. The Tibetan is terse and the verse logic is compressed.

- The term kārṣāpaṇa is a standard Indian monetary unit (a copper or silver coin); it is left in its Sanskrit form as it has no idiomatic English equivalent and appears as a technical term in Vinaya literature. The phrase rendered "a portion the color of a silk-worm larva" refers to an extremely small, pale, meager serving — a vivid idiom of contempt in the original. The phrase "sent someone to escort you" translates a term literally meaning "to send with a companion/guard," which in context clearly refers to the escort promised for the return journey with the provisions.

- The term rendered "right-side daughter" refers throughout to a girl born on the side, or as a secondary birth — the Tibetan "ཁོ་མོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་" literally means "born from the right side" and in the Vinaya narrative context this typically denotes a girl born by a lateral or unusual delivery, regarded as inauspicious and difficult to marry off. The exact medical or folk sense is a matter of some discussion in the commentarial tradition, but the social consequence — that she is considered ill-omened and no suitor comes — is clear from context.

The verse list of ill omens appears to be a quoted proverb or popular gāthā: chewing lac-tree wood, sleeping turned to the back at evening, heavy sleep, drinking whey or curds, and marrying a right-side daughter are enumerated as things that destroy even a person's tranquility. The final image contrasts two hard objects colliding to suggest an inevitable clash between the householder's ill-fated karma and the girl's ill omen.

- The phrase rendered "left-side daughter" and "right-side daughter" continues the technical terminology established in the preceding passage, where a "right-side daughter" is an inauspicious birth classification and a "left-side daughter" its auspicious counterpart.

The final sentence involves a court proceeding at the royal palace; the Tibetan indicates the husband won the legal dispute against the householder, though the exact nature of the case is left implicit in the text.

The phrase translated "on the last day of that period, certain neighbors" renders a Tibetan idiom for a specific calendrical day within the monastic lunar fortnight, likely the uposatha day; the precise referent is not critical to the narrative but may have Vinaya procedural significance.

- The definitions of the large and small bowls are technical and the Tibetan is compressed. The criterion appears to be that when filled to capacity with a standard measure of thick gruel and condiments, the liquid does not reach up to touch the underside of the thumb-joint when the bowl is held at the rim — this is a volumetric standard expressed anatomically and by the Magadha unit of dry measure. The distinction between the large and small vessels (ཁོ་མོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ and ཁོ་མོ་ལོ་ལོ་) is subtle; both appear to denote small Magadha dry measures, and the two definitions as preserved in this passage are nearly identical. A scribal or transmission issue is possible here, but the passage has been rendered as it stands.

- The phrase rendered "feign ignorance" translates a Vinaya formula indicating that the Blessed One already knows the answer but poses the question in order to draw out the disclosure — a standard literary convention in Vinaya narrative. The Tibetan literally reads "the blessed buddhas, while knowing, act as if they do not know," which is a fixed idiom for this device.

- The passage presents a somewhat paradoxical chain of misunderstanding: the monks first over-apply the one-meal rule by refusing to eat when they should rise for a superior; then, when told simply to eat sufficiently and not rise mid-meal, they interpret this as a license to abandon food altogether, subsisting on nothing at all. The Blessed One then draws a practical distinction between planted or cultivated plant foods (which do not displace the overall diet) and the five principal cooked foods (grain, hot rice, meat, oil-rich dishes, and sweets), the latter being the ones whose renunciation leads to the bodily deterioration described. The exact identity of some food terms — particularly "snum khur" (rendered "oil-rich food") and "de gu" (rendered "sweet food") — admit some flexibility of interpretation; these renderings follow the most common Vinaya commentarial understanding.

- The term rendered "giving up food" throughout refers to the Vinaya rule that once a monastic has formally relinquished a meal — whether by ritual declaration, by rising from one's seat, or through other circumstances — one may not resume eating from it. This is a technical concept in Vinaya literature sometimes called "making the remnant" or "giving up" a meal. The fivefold analysis here is a standard scholastic enumeration of the conditions that constitute such a relinquishment.

The term rendered "person of the third sex" translates ma ning, which in Vinaya contexts refers to a sexually indeterminate or non-binary individual and plays a role in the formal presentation of food to monastics; the presence of any of the three categories of person is what makes a presentation of food legally valid.

The phrase rendered "having food that has been begun" and "having food that has been relinquished" refers to the Vinaya distinction between food one has formally accepted and begun to eat, and food one has formally declared one will not eat. These are the legal triggers for whether one's meal is still "open" or has been "closed" by relinquishment.

- The phrase rendered "words without a remainder" and "words with a remainder" translates མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་ and མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་ respectively. These are technical Vinaya distinctions: a declaration without a remainder is unconditional and complete, effecting full relinquishment of the food; a declaration with a remainder, marked by the particle མཐོང་མཐོང་ ("for now" or "just for the moment"), is conditional and incomplete, and therefore does not effect valid relinquishment. The translation follows this interpretation.
- The passage contains a shift in interlocutor: it is Ānanda who answers the Blessed One's question, reporting what happened with the bathing monks. The Tibetan uses honorific verb forms throughout to mark this.

The term rendered "further permission" translates lhag por byas pa, literally "having made it additional" or "having made it more," a technical Vinaya procedure (Skt. pratiprasabdhi or a similar term) by which a monk who has completed and formally concluded his meal may nonetheless receive and eat more food through a ritual act of permission granted by another qualified monk. The precise Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain; this is noted here as a genuine doctrinal-technical point.

The phrase "soaking bowls" for gyer bltam pa'i bsod snyoms (literally "the almsfood of the soaking bowls") refers to almsfood associated with the bathing monks' equipment; the exact referent is slightly ambiguous in context.

- The passage includes a formulaic exchange where "the venerable Upāli" (Tibetan: Nyeba Khor, literally "the near retinue") is identified with two gestures demonstrating how hard food and soft food are to be set aside. The framing here is unusual in that the questioner identified as Nyeba Khor appears to be Upāli, the Vinaya specialist among the Buddha's disciples, and the parenthetical clarifications of the gestures seem to be commentary embedded within the canonical text. This is a known feature of this Vinaya corpus and is rendered as the text presents it.
- The phrase rendered "eat the surplus" translates a term for the practice of eating an additional portion after a formal meal, which in Vinaya contexts refers to the rule against eating at an improper time or eating more than one meal; here the newly entered elder's scheme is to maneuver his teacher into a technical violation by having him eat a second portion without proper authorization. The newly entered elder deliberately withholds the authorization he was given for the second meal, so that when the monk eats, he has incurred a downfall. This doctrinal mechanics of the setup is important for the narrative's purpose of illustrating a specific Vinaya rule.
- The phrase rendered "food designated as a meal and as eatables" translates a technical Vinaya distinction between two categories: five types of solid meal-food and five types of softer eatables. The Tibetan compound མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་ consistently marks this pair throughout the passage, and the gloss at the end of the passage confirms this reading explicitly.

The closing formula listing hells, animals, hungry ghosts, lower destinies, and "wrong falling" is a standard Vinaya enumeration of the unfortunate rebirths into which a downfall-producing act propels the transgressor. The threefold verb "burns, scorches, and causes to fall" is a conventional formula in this genre.

- The name rendered here as "Devadatta" (Lhas byin) is the infamous disciple of the Buddha well known in the Vinaya and sūtra literature. His identification here is straightforward.

The physician's speech is slightly elliptical in the Tibetan; the exchange is a conventional Vinaya narrative sequence in which the monks decline to name recipients so the layperson will make a blanket offering, and the rendering follows the conversational logic of the passage.

- The proper names "Rūpiṇīhṛdaya" and "Kundū-tsho" are Tibetan renderings of Sanskrit originals that are not entirely certain. Rūpiṇīhṛdaya (རུཔིའི་མུ་རྩ་ལྷ་མེད་ཀྱི་མུ་རྩ་ལྷ་མེད་) is a plausible reconstruction meaning "one whose heart is form" or "form-hearted." Kundū-tsho (ཀུན་དུ་མེད་ཀྱི་མུ་རྩ་ལྷ་མེད་) appears to be both a place name and a personal name shared by the king's uncle; the double usage is in the source text itself.

The phrase rendered "topknot festival" (ཏོཔ་ཀ་མེད་ཀྱི་མུ་རྩ་ལྷ་མེད་) refers to a specific periodic ceremonial gathering; the precise nature of the "topknot" festival in this Vinaya context is uncertain and may refer to a seasonal or calendrical festival known by this designation in the tradition.

- The phrase rendered "eating in company" translates the Vinaya technical term for group eating in excess of a permitted quota, a specific offence category relating to monks eating together at households beyond the allowable limit. The passage is part of an ongoing canonical Vinaya narrative establishing the precise scope and exceptions of this rule.

The phrase "lam dum srang gcig" is a unit of small measure for food and has been rendered as "a single lump," indicating a minimal quantity. The exact weight measure of "srang" is uncertain but the doctrinal point — that even a trivial addition constitutes the offence — is clear and has been preserved.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, so the translation ends accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "made themselves comfortable in their bellies" translates a compressed and somewhat idiomatic construction meaning they addressed their hunger by eating the women's food; the rendering follows the contextual sense. The episode's narrative flow is compressed in the Tibetan and slightly elliptical at several transitions; the translation clarifies these for the listener without adding doctrinal content. The seventeen young men from "the village of Upananda" is a possible reading; the Tibetan Nyen-pa-khor (ཉེན་པ་ཀམ་མོ་) may refer to Upananda's neighborhood or entourage rather than a place name, but "from the village of Upananda and the like" follows the most natural grammatical reading here.

- The phrase rendered "unbaked earthen vessel" translates a term for an unfired clay pot, used here to store dry rice — the detail is that such vessels are porous and the rice can be dried and stored in them. The name ལྷ་མེད་ (Nāgapāla or "the Black One") has been rendered as "Kāḷa" following the Sanskrit equivalent of the Tibetan epithet; the Tibetan literally means "the black one," a common monk's name.

- The phrase rendered "as before" appears twice and refers to standard formulaic passages in Vinaya literature that were already given in full at an earlier point in the text and are here abbreviated by the abbreviation convention standard in Vinaya compilations. No translation of those abbreviated portions is possible from this passage alone.

The venerable Kāḷudāyin is a named monk in the early Vinaya accounts. His name is left in Sanskrit form for consistency.

- The phrase "stored mouth and stored hands" is a Vinaya technical usage referring to a mouth or hands that have themselves been in contact with stored provisions — that is, hands or a mouth that have touched stored food render subsequent eating a misdeed even if the food itself was not stored. This is a standard commentarial distinction.

The list of objects — alms bowl, scraper, cup, salt pouch, and so forth — follows a standard Vinaya enumeration of items a monk might use to contain or handle stored food, making the eating a misdeed by association.

- The phrase rendered as "the five foods" is a somewhat opaque reference; in context it most likely refers to offerings of food placed with the dead, a common funerary custom, rather than a technical enumeration of five specific food categories. This is a minor textual uncertainty but does not affect the overall sense of the passage.

The expression rendered as "staring into the pit" is slightly ambiguous — it may mean Mahākāḷa was looking into the grave-pit where the family had withdrawn, or simply gazing fixedly at the cremation ground. The translation reflects the most contextually coherent reading.

- The venerable Mahākṛṣṇa, literally "the noble great black one," is a specific monk's name and is rendered accordingly throughout. The passage is a Vinaya narrative concerning rules of food-receiving and the clearing of a slanderous reputation; the fivefold classification of modes of receiving food that closes the passage is a technical Vinaya enumeration, and the somewhat compressed Tibetan formulas for each type have been rendered as faithfully as possible while remaining intelligible in English. The five categories distinguish whether the direct body or a bodily extension such as a robe or held object is on each side of the transaction.

- The term rendered "the unpleasant sound from the north" translates a phrase that likely refers to a ritual or directional signal used in the context of the "Reviled" region's customs. The exact referent is uncertain; it may indicate a specific local custom or signal marking meal time, but the Tibetan is taken literally here.

The five ways of "rendering allowable" reflect the Vinaya category of making raw fruit or vegetable matter permissible for monastic consumption, typically by marking or processing it so it is no longer in a state capable of propagation; the technical Vinaya term is kappiya in Pali. The translation "rendering allowable" follows standard Vinaya translation convention.

- The phrase rendered "a dog-owner's dogs have licked them clean" translates a compound meaning something like "the dogs of a dog-keeper have licked without remainder." The precise identity of this figure is slightly ambiguous in the Tibetan, but the sense is clear: dogs kept by someone have thoroughly cleaned the vessels.

The term rendered "jars of grain oil" translates a compound meaning oil pressed from grain or seeds, as distinct from clarified butter; the exact substance may vary by region and period but "grain oil" conveys the distinction adequately for a general audience.

- The phrase rendered "intelligent elephants, intelligent monkeys, intelligent bears" translates the Tibetan terms literally; the qualifier "intelligent" or "knowing" reflects the Tibetan "ཤེས་པ་" (literally "knowing"), denoting animals capable of deliberate, intentional action, which is what activates the rule about formal reception. The doctrinal point is that an intentional offering by such an animal counts as a valid act of presenting food, and therefore the monk's acceptance of it constitutes proper reception without needing a human intermediary.

- The name translated as "Teacher" renders the Tibetan "bla ma" used as the proper name of this pratyekabuddha, not as the generic honorific "lama." The passage uses it as a personal name, so it is rendered as "Teacher" in plain English to distinguish it from the generic title while preserving the sense.

The phrase rendered "remains close like a flame" translates "'od pa bzhin du nye bar gnas pa," a stock description of karma that is ripening-imminent, likened to a lamp or flame hovering nearby; this is a standard karmic maturation formula.

- The phrase rendered "true field of offerings" translates a term meaning a worthy recipient of veneration, a standard Indic concept (Skt. dakṣiṇīya or similar), used as a respectful address to the pratyekabuddha.

The name Mahākāla (here Tibetan "Nag po chen po," literally "the Great Black One") identifies a specific monk in the Buddha's circle who was repeatedly slandered — a well-attested figure in Vinaya narrative literature. The translation renders the name as "Mahākāla" on its first occurrence in the continuing narrative above but since this is a continuation passage, the name appears here as "this very Mahākāla" in accordance with established context.

The closing summary verse is a mnemonic colophon listing the topics of the surrounding narrative cycle; the individual items such as "the cowherd," "the daughter," "the brahmin who was struck," and so forth refer to other jātaka-style stories in the same textual collection and are intentionally elliptical.

- The name "Śākya Mingchen" (Śākya Ming Chen) is a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit personal name; the Sanskrit original is not recoverable with certainty from this passage alone. It may correspond to "Mahānāman" (Mahānāma), a well-known Śākya lay disciple who appears in parallel Vinaya narratives in this same role.

The phrase rendered "thirty-ninth rule entailing defeat" reflects the Tibetan ltung byed, which technically refers to a saṃghātiśeṣa-class or similar serious offense rather than a pārājika (defeat proper); however, the colophon uses the term as a chapter-closing formula and its precise classification may vary by Vinaya tradition. This is noted for scholarly awareness but does not affect the translation of the narrative body.

- The phrase rendered "the meditation on generosity" translates a term that literally refers to cultivating mindfulness of giving or charity. This is a recognized contemplative practice associated with the spiritual benefit of generosity.

The figure "Ānanda" does not appear in the Tibetan by name here; the text uses "Ānanda" only implicitly through the term "Ānanda's meal supply" which in the Tibetan reads more generally as a reference to the food of the person in question, Śākya Mingchen. The rendering "Ānanda's meal" reflects a contextual interpretive choice based on the narrative context; the Tibetan literally says "the meal has run out." Readers should note that the group of six are behaving reprehensibly and the passage is building toward a ruling by the Blessed One.

- The phrase rendered "it may be permissible or it may not be permissible" reflects a deliberate rhetorical shrug by the group of six — the Tibetan uses an open disjunction to express nonchalance. The section closing "and so forth, as before" signals that the text abbreviates formulaic passages repeated from earlier in the Vinaya narrative; this is standard Vinaya redactional practice and not an error in the source.

- The term rendered "minor offense" for the begging infraction in the casuistry section is a standard Vinaya distinction between a lesser fault and a full pācittiya-level transgression. The Tibetan term used for the lesser infraction is a conventional shorthand for a fault that does not rise to the level of a full downfall.

- The phrase rendered "grain salt" translates a term that likely refers to a type of rock or mineral salt derived from grain-processing contexts; the exact referent is uncertain but the category is clear from context.

The phrase "plastering cracks in a shrine hall" and "smearing a plastered surface with clay" represent two distinct construction or maintenance activities; the Tibetan terms describe specific craft tasks whose precise technical referents in ancient Indian building practice are approximated here.

- The phrase rendered "one who seems to lie down negligently" translates a compound describing a household where sexual union is likely — that is, a house containing a couple liable to engage in intercourse. The Tibetan idiom is somewhat euphemistic; the Vinaya context makes clear this refers to entering a house where husband and wife are expected to be intimate together, making the monk's presence improper. The venerable's name is spelled Cāraka throughout, consistent with the preceding passage.
- The phrase rendered "within the span of a cubit's length" translates a technical Vinaya measurement for the seat: the Tibetan indicates placing one's haunches within one "dom" (a unit of measurement roughly equivalent to a cubit or arm-span), which is the standard gloss in Vinaya commentaries for determining whether one is actually "seated" for purposes of the rule. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as it is clearly a continuous passage, and the conclusion follows in the next section.
- The phrase rendered "person of indeterminate sex" translates the Tibetan term for a third-gender or hermaphroditic individual, a recognized category in Vinaya literature referring to those who are neither straightforwardly male nor female.

The expression "forty-third offense" follows the Vinaya's internal numbering of the pācittiya-type rules; the section heading as it appears here closes a discrete rule and its commentary.

- The phrase rendered "difficult to approach and difficult to bear with" translates "bsnyen par dka' ba dang bzod par dka' ba" — literally "difficult to draw near to and difficult to endure." In context the merchants seem to mean that the Blessed One's majesty and presence are so overwhelming that they feel unable to make a casual request of him directly; the nuance is one of reverential awe rather than any negative quality of the Buddha. This is a well-attested idiom for the awe-inspiring quality of a great teacher's presence.

The term rendered "robe-making" and "the business of his robe-making" translates "chos gos kyi las," literally "the work of the Dharma-robe," referring to the traditional Kaṭhina robe-making ceremony that monks perform at the conclusion of the rains retreat. This is a standard Vinaya observance.

- The epithet "ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་" — literally "one with unattractive eyes" — is a standard name for Virūpākṣa, the Great King Guardian of the West, whose name literally means "of ill-shaped eyes." This is rendered literally in keeping with the text's list of analogies rather than substituting the Sanskrit name, since the text is using it as a simile-descriptor rather than a proper name invocation.

The epithet "ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་" ("Wealth-Giver") is a standard epithet of Vaiśravaṇa, the yakṣa king and guardian of the North, also known as Kubera. The text here uses it as the final term in a long simile-series comparing the Buddha's retinue to that of various great beings.

The epithet "ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་" ("guardian of the realm") similarly refers to Dhṛtarāṣṭra, guardian king of the East, placed here among the gandharva analogy. The rendering follows the literal sense within the simile structure.

- The list of great śrāvakas contains several names where the Tibetan forms require careful identification. "Aśvajit" renders "rta thul," "Bhadrika" renders "bzang ldan," "Vāṣpa" renders "rlangs pa," "Mahānāman" renders "ming chen," "Yaśodā" renders "grags pa," "Pūrṇa" renders "gang po," "Vimala" renders "dri med," "Gavāmpati" renders "ba lang bdag," and "Subāhu" renders "lag bzangs." These identifications follow the standard listing of the five first disciples plus additional great śrāvakas; some correspondences (particularly Yaśodā for "grags pa") are conventional but not entirely certain.

The passage ends mid-sentence, breaking off before the consequence of the Blessed One overhearing is stated; this is a feature of the source text as given, not a translation lacuna.

- The phrase rendered "knowing man" continues the term established in the preceding passage for what appears to be a stock character or social role; consistency with the preceding translation is maintained. The compound "twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" renders the standard Abhidharma formulation: the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadṛṣṭi) has twenty sub-modes in Vaibhāṣika and related analysis, and this is a well-known doctrinal metaphor for the obstacle shattered at stream entry.

The five hundred courtesans "laden with indigo" is an unusual detail; the Tibetan reads "carrying loads of indigo," which may indicate they are merchants of that dye-stuff or that indigo is incidental to their camp. No emendation has been made.

- The term rendered "kāṣāpaṇa" (a silver coin of ancient India) is left in its Sanskrit form as a standard monetary unit with no natural English equivalent.

The text signals a new fascicle division mid-passage. In the TTS rendering this is included as a brief colophon line following the narrative unit, before the next episode begins.

"Anāthapiṇḍada" literally means "feeder of the unprotected" or "giver of food to the helpless"; the Tibetan renders this semantically as mgon med zas sbyin. The Sanskrit proper name is used throughout for clarity and consistency.

- The term "kāṣāpaṇa" (rendered here as "coins") is a monetary unit of ancient India, a copper or mixed-metal coin. Retaining it as a loanword would be technically accurate, but it is rendered as "coins" in the translation body for TTS clarity.

The phrase "naked wandering women" and "naked male wanderers" refers to the Nirgrantha or Ājīvika traditions, whose adherents practiced nudity as an ascetic discipline. The text's use of this encounter as the occasion for a Vinaya ruling against monks giving food with their own hands to wandering ascetics of other traditions is standard Vinaya narrative form.

The concluding stock phrases — convening the assembly, the inquiry formula, the rebuke — are standard Vinaya formulae abbreviated by the text itself with "as before," which the translation preserves faithfully.

- The phrase rendered "the rebel" translates a Tibetan term meaning literally "one who has turned back" from a mission, here clearly denoting an enemy or rebel leader against whom the king's forces are sent; the exact political context is left implicit in the text.

The five kinds of food and the five kinds of provisions are standard Vinaya categories; the text does not enumerate them here, as they are presumed known from prior context.

- The passage contains a formulaic royal health inquiry that follows a standard Vinaya template. The inquiry phrase rendered "head-steward" translates a term meaning the chief of the inner household; the precise administrative title is conventional rather than technical, and the rendering "head-steward" is an approximation of the spirit of the original. The final sentence, in which the king's name and the messenger are both wished well, is slightly awkward in the Tibetan and may reflect a scribal confusion or a compressed form of the standard closing exchange; it is translated as literally as readable English allows.

- The phrase rendered "stone-quarry man" for 石山採石人 is uncertain. The term may refer to a specific named individual associated with a quarrying operation or stone-cutting trade, or it may be a toponym or occupational epithet. The context suggests it is a person whose arrival was expected and whose non-arrival is noted. This is a consequential textual detail and may warrant checking against a Sanskrit parallel or a fuller commentary.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཚན་བརྒྱུ་མཚན་ (the eight obstacles) is a standard Vinaya technical term referring to eight circumstances that excuse a monk from certain obligations; no further gloss is needed for a knowledgeable audience, but a general listener should understand it as a set of recognized extenuating circumstances.

- The phrase rendered "Friends Nandika" translates the Tibetan vocative "ལྷན་པ་ལྷན་པ་" which is literally "Nanda and Nandika" (or "Nanda, Nandika"), names within the group of six monks. The group of six monks' speech about the teaching enduring and then declining is somewhat elliptical in the Tibetan; the rendering follows the most coherent doctrinal reading, though the exact syntax of their argument is compressed. The term "ལྷན་པ་" rendered "scarecrows" is literally "grass-men" or "men of straw," a natural Tibetan idiom for a dummy or effigy. The word "ལྷན་པ་" rendered "collars" may refer to the nape of the neck or collar area; this is the most likely anatomical reference in context.

- The six-group monks referred to here are the chadvaggīya, a group of famously ill-behaved monks frequently mentioned in Vinaya narratives as the occasion for disciplinary rules.

The phrase rendered "nine of them are coming" follows the Tibetan literally; the nine likely refers to the total number of the six-group monks together with associates, though the precise referent is context-dependent and the preceding passage is not fully visible here.

The rule established at the end of this passage is a standard Vinaya prātimokṣa rule stipulating that a monk may accompany an army for no more than two nights; remaining a third night constitutes an offense. This is consistent with the Pāli Vinaya parallel at Pācittiya 48.

- The phrase rendered "cast a lot" translates "ལྷན་པ་ལྷན་པ་" literally meaning "draw a lot-stick," a procedural act in Vinaya contexts where monks volunteer or are selected by drawing wooden lots. The rendering "cast a lot" captures this clearly for a listening audience.

The phrase "ལྷན་པ་ལྷན་པ་" addresses two monks by name: Nanda and Upananda, both members of the group of six. Their names are supplied in the translation for clarity, as the Tibetan uses vocative forms of those names here.

- The phrase rendered "nine to our one" is a reading of "mi mchi dgu mchi" — literally "for one of us who does not come, nine come," conveying that the monks overwhelm them in confrontational capacity nine-to-one. This is a colloquial idiom and the rendering conveys the sense adequately. The text breaks mid-sentence at the king's reflection; this is a natural continuation point.

- The phrase "the Blessed One said nothing to the man, and by his silence gave consent" reflects the standard Vinaya convention whereby the Buddha's silence indicates tacit approval of a request, a recognized procedural formula in Vinaya literature.

The repeated formula "and so forth, as before" signals that this is an abbreviated Vinaya narrative relying on stock passages, a common feature of Tibetan Vinaya texts derived from Sanskrit originals.

- The four battle-formation shapes — "like the face of a grain," "like the form of a chariot," "like a crescent moon," and "like the wings of a garuḍa" — are technical Vinaya terms for classical Indian military arrays. The "grain-face" formation is a wedge or pointed-head array; the others are standard Sanskrit military terminology (vyūha). The rendering "face of a grain" follows the Tibetan literally; some recensions read this as a needle or spear-point formation.

The "eight impediments" (bar chad bgyad) is a standard Vinaya list of circumstances — such as illness, compulsion, natural disaster, and so on — that exempt a monk from culpability; the text presupposes the reader's familiarity with this list and does not enumerate it here.

The numbering "forty-seventh transgression" follows the Tibetan Vinaya enumeration of the pācittiya-class offences.

- The phrase rendered "inner grasping" and "outward projection" translates a technical Vinaya formula that will evidently be explained in the following passage; the translation is intentionally left open at this natural break point. The terms likely refer to whether the mental intention or the physical act is the determining factor, but the full definition is deferred to the continuation.
- The phrase rendered "a dart with a hollow tip" for སྒྲུབ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is uncertain; the compound literally suggests something like "a dart with a bird-heart" or "a bird-tipped dart," possibly a specific type of arrowhead whose exact form is unclear from the text alone. The rendering is a reasonable approximation given the context of a list of weapons.

The name སྤུལ་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཁྱེད་ (rendered "born in Nīpa") refers to a locality, probably the Nīpa or Sārpika region; the identification is conventional in Vinaya studies.

- The text here is a Vinaya legal analysis (vibhaṅga) enumerating the anatomy of a particular offense, following the standard formulaic structure of Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya commentary. Several weapon terms in the projectile list are technical Sanskrit loan-words in Tibetan transliteration. The term rendered "dart shaped like the petals of a karavīra flower" follows the identification of karavīra as the oleander (Nerium indicum); the exact shape of these projectiles is a matter of specialist Vinaya scholarship rather than doctrinal consequence. The phrase "three-pointed dart" (mde'u ste'u ka ma) and "dart with tooth-like points" represent my best readings of obscure technical military vocabulary; the precise Sanskrit originals are uncertain but the legal point they serve is clear.
- The expression rendered "make a threatening gesture" throughout is a consistent rendering of the technical Vinaya term for this category of offense established in the preceding passage. The narrative section shifts from a Vinaya rule summary into a story concerning two named monks. "Ānanda" here is almost certainly not the famous disciple of the Buddha but a monk of the same name; the Tibetan gives "Nye dga'" throughout, which is the standard rendering of that name. "Dharma" is the monk's proper name, not a common noun; the Tibetan "Chos" functions as his name. The phrase rendered "use a parasol" follows the sense of going out into the shade or taking ease with a parasol, which in context carries a euphemistic implication that the narrative will develop. The concluding line is left open as the Tibetan ends mid-dialogue, breaking off at Dharma's speech.
- The final line is a sentence fragment as it stands in the source text, broken mid-sentence. The passage ends abruptly with the beginning of what appears to be a list of non-offenses or qualifying conditions for the rule. This has been rendered faithfully as an incomplete line, reflecting the actual state of the source as presented.

The distinction among the five categories of offense — pārājika (defeat), saṅghāvaśeṣa (formal act of the remaining Saṅgha), pāyattika (downfall), pratideśanīya (individual confession), and duṣkṛta (misdeed) — is the standard Vinaya fivefold classification. The differing consequences for concealment depending on offense category are doctrinally precise: concealing a pārājika or saṅghāvaśeṣa offense results in an actual downfall at dawn, while concealing the lesser categories results only in a misdeed even after dawn, which is the standard Vinaya formulation.

- The phrase rendered "cut off his food" translates the idiom of blocking or withdrawing someone's meal invitation, a form of social and communal pressure. The noble one on alms-round is described as an ārya, here most naturally a spiritually advanced practitioner, possibly an arhat, encountered incidentally on the road. The name "Dharma" for the monk protagonist is unusual and worth noting: it is his personal name, not a title.
- The phrase rendered "measuring the shadow with both feet" reflects the classical Vinaya practice of checking the time by the shadow of one's own feet — a standard method for determining whether midday has passed; the shadow falls within the outline of the feet when it is exactly noon. This is a well-attested Vinaya technical reference requiring no emendation.

The repeated formula "and so forth as before" translates the Tibetan shorthand indicating that the full standard Vinaya procedure, given earlier in the text, is to be understood as repeated here in abbreviated form — a normal editorial convention of Vinaya canonical literature.

- The five kinds of lodging and five kinds of food are standard Vinaya enumerations; the precise lists vary by tradition but are too technical to gloss in the body. The passage follows the standard Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya narrative style throughout.

- The phrase rendered "difficult to approach and difficult to bear with" translates a standard honorific description of the Buddha's august, awe-inspiring presence. The Tibetan idiom conveys that the Buddha is awesome or formidable in a way that makes petitioners hesitant to approach him directly — not that he is literally intolerant. The merchants' reluctance is thus one of reverence rather than fear of censure.

- The passage contains an extended series of similes describing the Blessed One's retinue. Several divine figures appear: Dhṛtarāṣṭra is the guardian king of the gandharvas (Skt. dhṛtarāṣṭra), rendered from ལྷའི་རྒྱལ་པོ་; Virūpākṣa is the nāga king associated with the west, rendered from རྩུབ་པ་ཁ་པ་; Vaiśravaṇa is the yakṣa lord of wealth, rendered from རྩུབ་པ་ཁ་པ་; and Virūḍhaka is the lord of asuras, rendered from རྩུབ་པ་ཁ་པ་. The identification of རྩུབ་པ་ཁ་པ་ with Virūḍhaka rather than Virūpākṣa is contextually determined by the asura pairing; these are the four great guardian kings in their respective domains. The simile list follows a standard formulaic pattern found in several canonical Pāli and Sanskrit sūtras.

- The names of the ten great śrāvakas listed here are rendered from the Tibetan approximations of their Sanskrit names. Jñānaḥḍinya (Kun shes Kauṇḍinya), Aśvajit (rTa thul), Bhadrīka (bZang ldan), Vāṣpa (rLangs pa), Mahānāman (Ming chen), Yaśas (Grags pa), Pūrṇa (Gang po), Vimala (Dri med), Gavāmpati (Ba lang bdag), and Subāhu (Lag bzang) correspond to the group of early disciples, though some identifications in this list are slightly unusual and may reflect a particular textual tradition. The ṭaha drum is left as a transliteration of the Tibetan phonetic rendering of what is likely a Sanskrit loan-term for a specific type of drum. The cold hells listed are a standard enumeration found across Abhidharma literature; the translation follows the conventional doctrinal list.

- The list of heavens is rendered according to the standard Abhidharma cosmological schema. The terms for the form-realm heavens (from "Heaven of Brahmā's Retinue" through "Akaniṣṭha") follow the conventional enumeration; the formless-realm reference ("Heaven of No Perception" and "Heaven of Neither Torment nor Ease") is slightly unusual in this context and may reflect a compressed or variant listing in the source.

The phrase rendered "House of mud" in the verse refers to a house built in a swamp or bog — the simile of a mighty elephant smashing through such a fragile structure to illustrate the practitioner breaking free of saṃsāra. This is a recognized classical Indian image.

The final verse is incomplete in the source passage as given; the translation renders what is present and breaks off accordingly.

- The term rendered "attendants" throughout this passage is doṅmthun, a Tibetan phonetic rendering of the Sanskrit term for a particular group of followers or servants attending the assembly; its exact identification is uncertain, but context makes clear they are a group accompanying the community. The passage shifts between verse and prose without formal demarcation in the Tibetan, and the transition from Ānanda's verse address to the prose exchange is preserved accordingly. The two pratyekabuddha names — Drum Sound and Fearless Giver — are translated from the Tibetan rather than restored to Sanskrit, as their Sanskrit originals are not recoverable with certainty from this context alone.

- The animal list presents some translation choices worth noting. The term rendered "rhinoceroses" (bse) is literally "rhinoceros," though some commentators identify it as a different large horned animal; rhinoceros is the most philologically defensible rendering. The term rendered "hyenas" (dred) can also mean "bears" or a bear-like creature; since "bears" (dom) has already appeared just before it in the sequence, "hyenas" is adopted here to maintain a distinct animal at each step, which accords with the narrative logic. The term rendered "wolves" (gung) is sometimes identified as a type of large predator, possibly wolf or wild dog; "wolves" is adopted as the most natural reading in context.

- The term "don mtun" throughout refers to the "Group of Six" — the notorious six monks (the ṣaḍvargika bhikṣus) of the Vinaya narratives who are consistently the instigators of misconduct. The rendering "Group of Six" is standard. The phrase "don mtun gyi gnas" is rendered as their meeting place or gathering place, a reasonable inference from context.

The animal "bse" is rendered "rhinoceros," though it can also denote a related large horned animal; rhinoceros is the standard Tibetan-English rendering. "ma he" is rendered "buffalo," following the conventional identification of this term with the wild buffalo or gaur.

- The phrase rendered "fair-faced one" translates the vocative bzhin bzang, literally "good-faced" or "beautiful-faced," used here as a term of address to the lion. It may carry a gentle irony or simply be a conventional epithet of address.

The "swastika" renders g.yung drung, the ancient Indian auspicious symbol (svastika), one of the marks on the soles of the Buddha's feet; no doctrinal ambiguity, but flagged for contextual clarity in narration.

The "three sayings" teaching — all formations are impermanent, all phenomena are without self, nirvāṇa is peace — is the well-known triad sometimes called the three Dharma seals (ti-lakṣaṇa in expanded form), here presented as a brief formula taught to the lion.

- The phrase rendered "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the standard Abhidharma enumeration of twenty forms of the view of a personal self in relation to the five aggregates. This is a standard Vaibhāṣika and Sautrāntika doctrinal reference; the translation preserves the technical precision.

The phrase "Foe-Destroyer" in the circumambulation verse renders "dgra thul," a contracted honorific for the arhat or for a victor-buddha as one who has overcome the foe of affliction; here contextually it refers to the Blessed One himself.

The expression rendered "the imperceptible realm" for "mi mjed" is Tibetan for Akanīṣṭha or, in this cosmological context, the Brahmā world called Abhasvara or simply the realm of which Brahmā is lord — the Pāli/Sanskrit "Abha" realm; the monks name Brahmā as its lord, so the rendering follows the cosmological sense.

- The verse on karma not perishing in a hundred aeons is a well-known canonical stanza found in Pali and Sanskrit sources and attributed to the Buddha; it is rendered here as verse in keeping with the Tibetan metrical form.

The phrase rendered as "appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense sources" translates "zin pa'i phung po dang khams dang skye mched," where "zin pa" indicates the aggregates as "grasped" or "appropriated" by karma and affliction — a standard Abhidharma technical nuance preserved here.

- The phrase rendered "making moon shapes, making sun shapes, and making wheel-of-sickle-fire shapes" refers to fire-play amusements: spinning fire in circular patterns to create the appearance of a moon disc, a sun disc, and a sickle-wheel (the last being a rapid rotation producing an arc of fire). The precise nature of these games is known from Vinaya commentarial literature; the translation follows the plain sense of the terms.

The phrase "shaven-headed ascetics" renders a term of mockery used by the non-Buddhists referring to the monks' tonsure, and is intentionally slightly disparaging in register.

The passage "and so forth, as before" is an explicit textual abbreviation in the Tibetan, signaling that the standard Vinaya formulae are to be understood as repeated without being written out in full.

- The phrase rendered "bless the time" translates མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་, a technical Vinaya expression referring to a ritual recitation or formula by which a period of time is consecrated so that activities undertaken during it are covered by a specific dispensation or permission. The precise nature of this rite in this context is somewhat opaque in the text as given, and commentarial sources would ordinarily clarify it. The translation preserves the literal sense without inventing detail.

The list of downfall destinations at the close follows a standard Vinaya commentarial formula enumerating the bad rebirths that result from serious transgressions; the threefold sequence of "burning, scorching, and falling" likewise reflects a fixed formulaic expression in this genre.

- The phrase rendered "game of spinning a wheel of fire" translates a compound involving a sickle-shape and a fire-wheel, suggesting fire-juggling or fire-spinning amusements; the exact nature of these fire-play activities is inferred from context and parallel Vinaya literature. The term "consecration at the proper time" renders a phrase meaning a ritual blessing performed at the canonically prescribed moment, likely a formula said before handling fire; the precise liturgical details are not given in this passage. The term rendered "masters of the Mātṛkā" refers to those who have mastered the Mātṛkā, an early systematic matrix-text or proto-Abhidharma compilation, distinct from sūtra and Vinaya. The name "Chāraka" is a reconstruction from the Tibetan ཇཱཱ་རཱ་ཀ་; variant readings may exist in parallel recensions.

- The passage contains a rhetorically complex episode in which "Nanda" (the elder, Upananda's brother) and "Nanda" (the junior monk, Upananda) appear in close proximity, and the Tibetan itself uses "Nanda" for both in places that require contextual disambiguation. The rendering follows the narrative logic: the weeping figure who was suspended is Upananda's younger brother (referred to as "Nanda" in Tibetan), while the elder addressing him is Nanda (Upananda's brother mentioned in the preceding passage). This family relationship creates genuine ambiguity in the source; the translation follows the most coherent reading of the narrative.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic listing the subjects of the rules treated in this section of the Vinaya. Its syntax is highly compressed and elliptical, as is standard for such colophon-gathas; the rendering conveys the list without forcing artificial grammatical smoothness, which would misrepresent the genre.

- The phrase rendered "lovely and lovely teachings" translates the reduplicated Tibetan expression for teachings that are beautiful and pleasant to hear — the repetition is emphatic and formulaic in this Vinaya narrative style, conveying that the Dharma discourse was exceptionally well-delivered and agreeable.

The term rendered "alms-seeker" refers to a lay person who begs or lives by alms, distinct from the monks; contextually this figure appears to be a layperson who wandered in to hear the teaching and fell asleep there.

- The names "Grasp-Sound" (Sgra-can-bzin, likely translating a Sanskrit name such as Nāgasena or Śabdadhara) and "Spur-On" (Skul-byed) are novice names rendered here by their Tibetan semantic meaning since the Sanskrit originals are not given in this text. The episode is a narrative in the Vinaya tradition and these renderings are consistent with the literal sense of the Tibetan.

The phrase rendered "leaves nothing but his name behind" is an idiomatic expression for instant death from snakebite, meaning only the dead man's name would remain.

- The phrase rendered "stands at the very gateway to the state of an arhat" translates a Tibetan expression meaning these novices already possess, or are endowed with, the door or entryway to arhatship — a formulaic Vinaya phrase indicating their spiritual maturity and the monks' corresponding responsibility of care.

The episode of "light" (moonlight and sunlight) at the close refers to a concern that natural light penetrating the sleeping quarters might constitute awareness of an unordained person's presence, creating a technical Vinaya issue; the Blessed One rules that such natural illumination does not count as a conventional circumstance giving rise to an offense.

- The term rendered "agreed fellowship" translates a technical Vinaya expression for a formally constituted group sharing the same disciplinary agreement, the Tibetan don mthun being a rendering of the Sanskrit concept of a sāmānasaṃvāsaka grouping or similar canonical category. The precise Sanskrit equivalent of this specific Vinaya usage is not certain from the Tibetan alone; "agreed fellowship" reflects both the literal and functional sense.

The term tron, appearing in the original as a loanword from Sanskrit or Middle Indic (likely relating to standing watch or keeping vigil), is rendered throughout as "keep vigil" in accordance with its context.

- The phrase rendered "large constitution of fire" translates a Tibetan idiom indicating that novices have vigorous metabolic heat and therefore require more frequent feeding; it is a recognized physiological concept in the Vinaya commentarial tradition and is rendered literally here as the idiom is transparent enough in context.

The novices' names Thorn and Great One are literal renderings of the Tibetan names Tsherma and Chenpa respectively; they appear to be actual personal names of Ānanda's attendant novices as recorded in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya.

- The monk's name rendered here as "Ariṭṭha, formerly a vulture-trainer" (Tib. *sngon bong rdzi dge slong 'chi lta*s) requires explanation. The Tibetan epithet sngon bong rdzi means literally "formerly a donkey-herder," but the parallel Pāli Vinaya and Sutta sources identify this figure as Ariṭṭha, formerly a vulture-trainer (gijjhaposakakulaputta). The Tibetan bong (donkey) may be a scribal or translation variant for bya rgod (vulture); the identification with the well-known Ariṭṭha episode is doctrinally certain. The name 'chi lta in Tibetan means "facing death" or "death-sign," but in context this appears to function as the monk's name or epithet; the passage may be using it as a proper name equivalent to the Pāli Ariṭṭha. This ambiguity is noted but does not affect the doctrinal substance.

- The passage contains the standard Vinaya formula for a formal admonition act with a motion and three proclamations. The translation renders only the motion and the opening of the first proclamation, as the Tibetan breaks off mid-sentence at this point. The term rendered "pernicious view" translates the Tibetan phrase meaning a view-form that is sinful or morally corrupt. The wooden sounding board renders ghaṇṭā or the cognate Tibetan term for the signal used to summon the assembly. The phrase "motion and three proclamations" renders the standard Vinaya technical term for the most solemn category of formal act.

- The Tibetan term rendered "act of reproach" or "act of censure" is a formal Vinaya category. The term for the formal procedure rendered here as "motion and three proclamations" follows the standard Vinaya formula for a fourfold act: one motion plus three recitations. The word rendered "outcaste" literally means a chandāla or low-caste person used as a term of extreme social ostracism; the simile here conveys total exclusion from the community.

- The phrase rendered "as before" at the close is a standard Vinaya abbreviation formula indicating that the full formal procedure described earlier is to be understood as repeated here without being written out again. This is conventional in Tibetan Vinaya texts and requires no special comment beyond recognition of the form.

- The monk's name is given here as Ariṭṭha (Pali; Sanskrit Ariṣṭa), consistent with the Vinaya narrative context established in the preceding passage. The Tibetan has "Aritas" (འརིཏ་ཨ་ཤི་ཤ་), an unusual phonetic rendering; this is the same figure referred to in the preceding passage, so the translation maintains consistency with that established identification.

The list of Vinaya categories — four pārājikas, thirteen saṃghāvaśeṣas, two aniyatas, thirty nihsargika-pācittikas, ninety pācittikas, four pratideśanīyas, numerous śikṣāpadas, and seven adhikaraṇaśamatha rules — reflects the standard Vinayadhara enumeration of the Prātimokṣa sections. This is rendered in plain English with the Tibetan categories mapped onto their standard Vinaya equivalents.

- The repeated phrase rendered as "discordant and contrary to the Dharma," "concordant and conforms to the Dharma," and their variants reflects the formal Vinaya categories of valid versus invalid formal acts, where procedural irregularities in how the admonishment is delivered affect whether the resulting formal act is legally complete. The distinctions are technical Vinaya terms distinguishing acts that are improperly constituted from those that are properly constituted, and the passage is saying that only a properly and validly conducted formal act produces the legal consequence of a downfall.

- The rendering of the five verbs describing the modes of association — conversing, speaking of the arrival, providing lodging, providing enjoyment, and sleeping together — follows the standard commentarial analysis given immediately in the definitional section. The gloss on "provides lodging" as specifically supplying a place of residence and "provides enjoyment" as receiving service and treating it as one's own reflects the canonical exegetical tradition and is preserved here without smoothing.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence in the definition of "sleeping together in one dwelling," which continues in the following section; this is not an error in translation but reflects the passage boundary provided.

- The passage transitions mid-sentence at the end into a new narrative and closes without completing the final sentence; this is because the Tibetan itself runs on into the next section, and the translation faithfully preserves that open ending.

The term rendered "benches" for འཇོག་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་འཇོག་ཁྱེད་ is a Vinaya technical term for a side-seat or plank set alongside someone; some editions gloss this as a low seat placed beside another person, which fits the context of inappropriately familiar physical proximity.

- The phrase rendered "act of formal inquiry with a quorum of four" translates the Vinaya technical term for the fourfold act of the Saṅgha, specifically here the formal censure procedure using a motion plus three proclamations. The procedural details about "hearing range" and "sight range" are standard Vinaya staging requirements for formal Saṅgha acts involving the subject being admonished.

- The phrase rendered "motion-and-three-proclamations" translates the Tibetan legal formula for the standard Vinaya འཇོག་ཁྱེད་ procedure (Skt. jñapticaturthakarman), literally "a motion and a formal act of four," meaning one motion followed by three repetitions of the resolution. This is standard Vinaya procedure and is rendered here in its functional English equivalent used in Pali Vinaya scholarship.

- The names "Ariṭṭha" and "Mahāpāla" are reconstructed from the Tibetan "Tsher ma" (Ariṭṭha, literally "thorn") and "Chen po pa" (Mahāpāla, literally "the great one" or "the great keeper"). These are the standard Vinaya figures known from the Pāli parallel (Alagaddūpama-sutta context). The Tibetan text does not spell out the Sanskrit names; the rendering here follows the identification standard in Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya scholarship.

The phrase rendered "placed within sight" reflects the Vinaya procedural requirement that the subject of a formal act be within sight but outside hearing while the Saṅgha deliberates, before being recalled or, in expulsion proceedings, formally excluded.

- The procedural structure here follows the standard Vinaya formula for a formal Saṅgha act accomplished by one motion and three proclamations (Skt. jñaptīcatūrtthakarman). The text repeats the admonitory formula in full at each of the three proclamation stages, as is characteristic of this genre of Vinaya literature. The phrase rendered "took hold of and admonished" reflects the technical Vinaya procedure of formally confronting a monk or novice before proceeding to a formal act.
- The phrase rendered "those who carry black begging bowls" is a derogatory expression the two novices use for the monks who suspended them, alluding to the monks' black lacquered alms bowls. The companion's curse that the suspending monks be "suspended from village, town, province, and the three realms" is a bitter inversion of monastic suspension language, turned back upon the monks themselves. The name "Ānanda" does not appear explicitly in the Tibetan at the point where the Blessed One questions his interlocutor; the text uses the term "companion" and later the pronoun, but contextually this figure is Ānanda, consistent with the surrounding narrative.
- The passage is a Vinaya commentary providing a phrase-by-phrase gloss on a preceding rule, explaining the terminology and procedure for a three-fold formal admonition followed by expulsion of a recalcitrant novice. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as the source passage is incomplete. The term rendered "thorny type" and "major type" for the two categories of novice reflects the commentary's own explanatory categories for problem novices — "thorny" (tshermapa) and "major" (chenpo pa) — which are technical classifications within this Vinaya tradition. The phrase "motion-and-three-proclamation act" translates the standard Vinaya technical formula for a formal saṅgha act requiring one motion and three repetitions.
- The text shifts at the section break from Vinaya disciplinary commentary into a narrative passage concerning nāga kings, which is a standard interpolated story found in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya. The nāga kings Parvata and Manāpa (Tibetan Ri bo and Yid 'ong, literally "Mountain" and "Pleasant") are rendered by their probable Sanskrit equivalents; the Tibetan forms are transparent epithets rather than phonetic transcriptions, so reconstruction is approximate.
- The epithet rendered throughout as "the king of Magadha, Bimbisāra, of the refined form" translates the compound འཕྲུག་ལྷོ་མཆོག་གི་རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྷོ་མཆོག་གི་རྒྱལ་པོ་, which is a highly ornate honorific title for King Bimbisāra. The components mean something like "king arisen in Magadha, one whose body is well-trained or refined, the essence." This is an unusual and somewhat opaque epithet; the translation preserves its meaning phrase by phrase. Some scholars read འཕྲུག་ལྷོ་མཆོག་ as a courtly praise formula for a king of handsome and well-formed body, rather than a technical term.

The term འཕྲུག་ལྷོ་མཆོག་ is rendered "impure-edged one," which likely refers to a low-caste or outcaste person. The exact social or ritual status is unclear from the term alone, but the narrative context — being sent as a scout and not being received with honor — suggests a servant or someone of inferior status.

- The epithet rendered "whose body was shaped by noble craftsmanship and whose heart was full" reflects the Tibetan proper name Bimbisāra as it appears in the text; the surrounding descriptors "bzo sbyangs gzugs can snying po" are treated here as a formulaic royal epithet meaning roughly "one of well-crafted form and essential heart," though some editors read this as part of the name tradition for Bimbisāra in Tibetan rendering. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, consistent with a deliberate continuation break, and the translation preserves this.

- The king's name "Bimbisāra" is represented in the Tibetan by the compound that renders his name plus a descriptive epithet. The Tibetan uses the fuller form "Bimbisāra, king of Magadha, possessor of a well-formed and beautiful body" throughout, which is a standard Tibetan rendering of his name. In the preceding translation this was rendered as "Bimbisāra, king of Magadha." For consistency it is maintained as such here.

The passage about bowing at the feet of "those of low birth" and being "grasped by the hand of the chief men" reflects a court-protocol explanation: prostrating to inferiors would be socially improper and politically compromising, so the Blessed One prescribes a gesture of extending the right hand as an act of reconciliation that avoids this difficulty.

- The five kinds of examination a bodhisattva makes before his final birth is a standard doctrinal list found across several Vinaya traditions; the five items given here are lineage, clan, region, time, and the woman who will be his mother.

The phrase rendered "pleasant grove" for the second shrine name corresponds to Manāpa, which carries the sense of "delightful" or "pleasing"; the shrine names thus track the nāga kings' own names.

- The four kings' names and the names of their sons are rendered from the Tibetan since they appear to be translations of Sanskrit proper names that have not been standardized in the tradition. Rib-kyi 'phur-tshang-byin (Śrāvastī), Padmamahā (Rājagṛha), the Hundred-Armed Army king (Kauśāmbī), and Mu-khyud-mtha'-yas (the noble kingdom) are reproduced in English translation since no settled Sanskrit equivalents are recoverable from context alone. The sons' names — Bright Victor, Essence of Form, Risen, and Supreme Light — are straightforward translations of the Tibetan monikers Gsal-rgyal, Gzugs-can-snying-po, Shar-ba, and Rab-srang respectively.

- The passage includes the proper name "Śākya Legs-par-Rab-rtogs" (Śākya Supratibuddha or similar). The Tibetan personal name "Legs-par-Rab-rtogs" appears to be a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit name (possibly Supratibuddha or Subodhi), but since it is unclear and used here as a personal name, it is left in its Tibetan form transliterated. Scholars identify this figure as a Śākya clan elder, but the exact Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain.

The two women's names "Sujātā" and "Balavijayā" are the standard Sanskrit equivalents of the Tibetan names given; the identification of the second figure is based on the well-known biographical literature.

- The names of the monk-characters here — Undao, Charka, Nabhasos — render Tibetan terms that appear to be transliterations of Indic names now difficult to identify with certainty; they are rendered phonetically from the Tibetan as best as can be determined. Bhaumadharā is similarly a phonetic rendering of the nun's name.

The "six groups of monks" is a well-known Vinaya category referring to a famously lax group of monastics frequently cited in disciplinary narratives.

The five modes of vision used by the bodhisattva to survey the world before his final rebirth is a standard feature of buddha-biography, covering the survey of suitable family, lineage, region, time, and mother.

- The phrase "Eamo" is a Tibetan exclamation of acclaim or approbation used by audiences at performances; it is left transliterated as it functions as a crowd's cheer rather than a translatable word, comparable to "Bravo." The "festival of Delightful Twain" renders "yid 'ong gnyis kyi dus ston," literally "the festival of the two delightful ones," likely a festival celebrating two auspicious figures or events; the precise referent is contextually opaque and may warrant scholarly attention.

The "five surveys" (gzigs pa lnga) is a standard formula in birth-story literature describing how a bodhisattva in Tuṣita, before descending, examines the world under five categories to determine the optimal circumstances for his birth.

- The term rendered "Acharka" (འཇཀ་ཀ་) is a proper name for one of the monks belonging to the six groups; it appears here in transliteration from an underlying Sanskrit or Prakrit form. The identity of this name in canonical sources is not firmly established in secondary literature, and it may be a corrupt or regional variant.

The phrase "great serpents" (འཇཀ་ཀ་འཇཀ་ཀ་) literally means "great belly-crawlers," a common Tibetan periphrasis for large serpentine beings; it has been rendered descriptively rather than with a specific Sanskrit equivalent since the referent is ambiguous between large nāgas and mythic serpent-beings.

- The closing phrase explaining "he commits an offence" employs a traditional Vinaya formulaic gloss in which the word for "downfall" or "offence" is unpacked etymologically and soteriologically: the terms "scorched," "scalded," and "fallen" refer to the three modes of suffering in the lower rebirths, which is a standard Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya commentary device. This is rendered idiomatically in context without disrupting the narration.
- The phrase rendered as "those who live by gleaned leftover curds" translates a term for a low-status social group who subsisted on the remnants of dairy processing. The phrase recurs as a kind of fixed epithet throughout this passage.

The exchange between the Blessed One and Ānanda about "swiftly spreading serpent-venom" and "fierce serpent-venom" is a deliberate riddle: the Blessed One sees a hidden treasure and calls it poison to discourage attachment; Ānanda agrees; the worldly man overhears and is confused, then finds the treasure and greedily rationalises it as a wonderful "venom" that makes it easy to harm even one's dearest ones. The passage is an elaborate parable on the dangers of wealth.

- The figure addressed as "King Rūpaṣeṇahṛdaya" (Tibetan: རུཔ་ཤེས་ཀྱི་མཛེས་པ་) is a compound meaning "he whose heart is in outward form" or "the king whose essence is in appearances." This appears to be the name of a specific king in this narrative context, contrasted with Ajātaśatru; the translation retains it as a proper name throughout, which is the most defensible reading.

The condemned man's final speech alternating "Ānanda" (Tibetan: འཱ་ན་ན་དྲཱ་དྲཱ་) with titles of the Buddha is rendered as verse to reflect its rhythmic, incantatory quality in the original.

- The phrase rendered "what happened to you was done by you yourself — go now" translates a somewhat terse Tibetan that implies the king is acknowledging both the man's ordeal and perhaps a personal connection or guilt; the exact emotional register is compressed in the original.
- The phrase "view of the transitory collection" renders the Tibetan technical term for the false view that identifies the aggregates with a self; the text employs the striking metaphor of this view as a mountain twenty peaks high, shattered by the vajra of gnosis at the moment of stream-entry, which is the standard Abhidharma account of what is abandoned at that path-moment.

The venerable Śārika is Śāriputra's ordination name in certain Vinaya traditions; the text uses the abbreviated form here. The archery scene marks the beginning of a new narrative episode within the Vinaya.

- The phrase rendered "husks of fruitless grain" translates a Tibetan idiom for something utterly useless or empty; the image is of chaff with no kernel, and the rendering captures the dismissive force of Śārika's rebuke.

The term "disciplined" or "fined" in the later exchange renders the same Tibetan root used earlier for "discipline the boys," playing on the double sense of physical correction and monetary penalty; the context of selling his equipment to pay a fee makes clear it has shifted to a financial penalty by the passage's end.

- The series of music-technique names — drug ldan, drang srong pa, sa 'dzin pa, blo gsal, 'khor nyan, bar ma pa, Keśika — are technical designations for specific musical modes, rhythms, or pieces. Their precise identification is uncertain; they are rendered here by literal translation of the Tibetan where transparent and left as a proper name (Keśika) where it appears to be a named composition or style. This is a genuinely uncertain area, and no commentarial source has been identified that enumerates them definitively.

The phrase rendered "tossing about worthless chaff" translates sbun pa 'phyar zhing 'khod, literally "sitting tossing chaff," a vernacular idiom for idle, fruitless activity.

- The "Group of Six" refers to the notorious six monks frequently mentioned in Vinaya literature as the instigators of improper conduct that prompts the Buddha to lay down rules. The term is a standard Vinaya convention and needs no further gloss here.

The phrase rendered "a senior Licchavī" for लीच्छवी वरुण could also mean "a great Licchavī" in the sense of a prominent or elder member of the Licchavī clan rather than a formal title; either reading yields the same sense in context.

- The passage contains a number of obscure musical instrument names that appear to be transcriptions of Sanskrit or Prakrit terms: pi-wang (likely a stringed instrument, possibly vīṇā variant), 'od-ma, ma-ha-ti (likely mahātī, a type of vīṇā), bal-la-ri, and su-gho-sha-ka. These are rendered phonetically or by approximate description in line with standard Vinaya narrative practice. The precise identification of all these instruments is uncertain.

The phrase rendered "killed those men" is a sardonic remark by the Group of Six — the Licchaviīs were so frightened by the music they nearly caused a panic; the monks are claiming comic credit for the chaos, not literal killing. The Tibetan "de dag bsad do" is straightforward but the meaning is clearly ironic in context.

- The final speech of Ānanda is interrupted mid-sentence in the source passage, consistent with a passage break in the manuscript. The sentence beginning "Ānanda, for that reason, when staying in the park..." appears to be the Blessed One's permission clause and is syntactically incomplete; the surrounding narrative continues as dialogue, suggesting a section break in the Vinaya story. This has been rendered as faithfully as possible to the Tibetan as it stands.

The name Mṛgāramāṭṛ Sāgā renders the Tibetan "ri dgas 'dzin gyi ma sâ gas," identifying the well-known Vaiśālī laywoman patroness Mṛgāramāṭṛ with the name Sāgā (a variant form of Viśākhā in some Mūlasarvāstivāda sources).

- The phrase rendered "spread snake-poison swiftly" is a Tibetan idiom meaning these coins bring swift ruin or are cursed, likening the danger of found money to fast-acting snake venom. The exact idiomatic force is unusual and the literal rendering is preserved here.

The final sentence is syntactically compressed in the Tibetan. The Blessed One's instruction appears to be directing monks not to impulsively direct a finder to a lost object without first asking identifying questions, such as whether the claimant is a weighing-merchant (i.e., can identify the object by weight or type). This is a Vinaya procedural point about avoiding liability in disputed property cases.

- The list of precious objects includes several terms that require brief clarification. "Spug" is a term for a type of precious stone whose exact identification is uncertain in the scholastic tradition; it may refer to a kind of agate or crystal. "The red one" likely refers to rubies or red gems. "The right-coiling one" refers to a right-coiling conch shell, considered auspicious. The phrase rendered "outside the assembly hall" and "inside the assembly hall" for the two locative terms is somewhat paradoxical in the source: the Tibetan commentarial gloss appears to invert what a modern reader might expect, and this reflects a technical Vinaya distinction between the outer precinct and the inner dwelling space of the monastery — a genuine textual complexity faithfully rendered here without smoothing over.

- The musical instruments named here — བླ་མེད་ཀྱི་རྒྱུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་, བླ་མེད་ཀྱི་རྒྱུ་ལྟ་བུ་, བླ་མེད་ཀྱི་རྒྱུ་ལྟ་བུ་ — are Sanskrit loanwords transcribed into Tibetan representing vīṇā, Balari, Mahātī, and Sughoṣaka respectively; these are traditional Indian stringed instruments. Their precise identification in instrumental history is a matter of scholarly discussion, but the Tibetan renders them as a list of instruments parallel to the lute, so they are treated accordingly.

The verse at the end is the opening of the famous karmic-continuity gāthā standard to the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition. The passage ends mid-verse as the source text breaks here; no content has been added.

"The mother of Mṛgāra's lord" refers to Viśākhā, the renowned lay donor of the early Buddhist community, known by the honorific "Mṛgāramātā" — mother of Mṛgāra's lord — on account of having spiritually converted her father-in-law Mṛgāra.

- The name "Kāśyapa" here refers to the buddha Kāśyapa, a predecessor of Śākyamuni in the list of past buddhas, not to the disciple Mahākāśyapa. The epithet list for the buddha closely follows the standard Sanskrit formula: Tathāgata, arhat, samyaksaṃbuddha, vidyācaraṇasaṃpanna, sugata, lokovid, anuttara-puruṣadamyasārathi, śāstā-devamanuṣyāṇāṃ, buddha, bhagavat.

The phrase "men of the yogurt-provision" (Tib. རྩ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་) denotes royal household servants or minor officials whose livelihood depended on dairy provisions from the king; the exact institutional term is not fully transparent, and this rendering is approximate.

- The name rendered "Bimbisāra" (the Handsome King of Sound Craft) is a translation of the Tibetan བེའུ་མེད་ཀྱི་རྒྱུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་, which is a literal Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit name Bimbisāra along with his epithet. The Tibetan words break down as the king arisen from Māgadha whose essence is a form of skilled craft — a literalistic unpacking of the Sanskrit. I have rendered the proper name as Bimbisāra for clarity.

The "group of six monks" is a standard Vinaya technical reference to the notorious sextet of monks (ṣaḍvargika bhikṣus) who frequently appear as negative exemplars throughout the Vinaya literature.

- The name rendered "Bimbisāra of Rūpasāra" reflects the Tibetan བེའུ་མེད་ཀྱི་རྒྱུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་, which is a full epithet-title: "the king arisen in Māgadha, Bimbisāra of polished form and stout heart." The passage is from the Vinaya narrative, and the text ends mid-sentence, listing physical symptoms of the monks who could not bathe frequently in the heat; the translation breaks off at the natural paragraph boundary of the source passage.

- The phrase rendered "muddy rain" translates a term that appears to denote rain mixed with earth or dust, producing a mottled appearance on the skin; the resulting word "blotched and streaked" reflects the Tibetan "khra bo," meaning variegated or mottled in color. The structure of this passage is a classic Vinaya formula in which each new circumstance prompts a progressive relaxation of the rule; the accumulating list of permitted exceptions is doctrinally significant as it demonstrates the Buddha's responsive, case-by-case lawgiving method.

- The list of "hot season" months follows the Indian lunar calendar as reckoned in the Vinaya tradition. The phrase "last two half-months of the hot season" designates a period of two fortnights immediately preceding the rains retreat, and "the first of the rains seasons" designates the first month of the rains retreat proper. The Sanskrit terms for these months are not given in the Tibetan; the rendering follows standard Vinaya commentarial reckoning.

The final sentence about the consecration bath is elliptical in the Tibetan. The sense appears to be that if bathing occurs in the context of an empowerment ritual, that occasion is to be sanctioned by the appropriate blessing or authorization — the precise Vinaya ruling that follows is not fully stated in this excerpt.

- The term rendered "immersion bath" for 入浴 (iriyoku) literally means "bath of entering or immersion," and stands in contrast to 灌洗 (kankō), the "consecration bath in the form of an empowerment." In this Vinaya context these appear to be two distinct types of bathing practices, the precise ritual distinctions of which are preserved as given in the text without further elaboration. The final sentence breaks off in mid-passage, as the source text does, and is left open accordingly.
- The venerable Cāraka who appears here is a monk who is also an accomplished archer, a figure known in Vinaya narrative literature for combining renunciant status with remarkable worldly skills. The scene is a narrative digression within the Vinaya, illustrating conduct that will lead to a ruling.

The summary verse near the beginning is a mnemonic gāthā listing the topics of the preceding sixty offenses related to bathing; it is a standard Vinaya device and is rendered as verse accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "the master said" in the opening lines refers back to the archery teacher from the preceding passage, who is now speaking to his students about the unexpected visitor Cāraka. The passage then shifts into the master's scheming internal monologue and his instructions to the boys, which are rendered accordingly.

The expression "tonsured śramaṇas" renders a compound implying monks who shave their heads, used here as a slightly contemptuous description by the lay critics. This is consistent with how non-Buddhist householders sometimes address monastics in Vinaya narrative contexts.

- The list of projectile and blade types presents several technical terms for ancient Indian weapons whose exact forms are uncertain. The renderings given are approximate and based on context and standard Tibetan Vinaya commentary parallels. "Kaṇḍikāra leaf" preserves the likely Sanskrit botanical reference. "Cypress fruit" for རྩེད་ལྗང་འབྲི་ཆུ་མོ་ is an approximation; the tree in question may be a juniper or similar conifer, but the doctrinal point — that even the lightest projectile suffices to incur the transgression — is clear.
- The term rendered "Neighboring Monastery" for རྒྱལ་སྐོར་གླིང་ is a plausible reading of this compound as a place name; the exact identity of this community is uncertain, though the context suggests it refers to a named monastic community or locality associated with Maudgalyāyana's ordination activity.

The term Āmāyikā (holders of the Mātṛkā) refers to those who have mastered the Abhidharma matrices or summary texts; this is the standard technical sense in Vinaya literature.

The final sentence breaks off mid-passage as the source text ends there; the translation preserves the break faithfully.

- The phrase rendered "entry into certainty" translates the Tibetan "nges pa la 'jug pa," which in Vinaya contexts typically refers to the definite attainment of a path-result, often specifically stream-entry or irreversibility. The translation preserves the literal phrasing to allow the doctrinal sense to come through without over-specifying.
- The term rendered "goes somewhere" translates a verb meaning to go to a place, here used idiomatically for approaching with a purpose. The repeated formula "whether or not remorse arises" clarifies that the offense is completed by the act and intent, not by the outcome in the other party's mind.

The phrase rendered "improperly received full ordination" involves the Vinaya term for an invalid ordination due to procedural defects — here, alleged defects in the sīmā (boundary) demarcation or the determination of the central point of the ordination ground. The text uses "ཡོད་པའི་ཆུ་མཚན་གྱི་མཚན་ལྟར་འདུག་པའི་ཆུ་མཚན་གྱི་མཚན་ལྟར་" literally "fully ordained with fault/wrongly," meaning an ordination tainted by procedural irregularity.

- The phrase "མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་" rendered as "proclaimed a superhuman quality of a human being" refers to the fourth pārājika offense of falsely claiming superhuman attainments. In context here, the accuser is asserting that the Venerable one's public teaching of the three marks constituted such a false claim, which is manifestly absurd but serves as the formula for the offense of wrongful intimidation. The irony is intentional in the Vinaya text.

The term "འཕྲུལ་པའི་ཆུ་མཚན་" rendered as "dangerous pass" or "treacherous defile" refers literally to a place frequented by wild predators or bandits; the juridical point is that traveling there might lead to violent death and thus could be construed as a defeat under other rules, but here the accusation is fabricated and therefore itself constitutes an offense.

- The phrase rendered "superhuman qualities" translates "མི་འདྲའི་ཆོས་བླ་མ་," literally "qualities superior to those of humans," which is the standard Vinaya term for the pārājika offense of falsely claiming meditative attainments or direct realizations. The context here is that one monk is warning another: even if the words spoken were orthodox doctrinal statements, if they were taken or could be taken as a claim to personal realization, they border on the root downfall of falsely claiming superhuman qualities. The warning "do not speak of superhuman qualities" is the standard Vinaya injunction on this point.

The term "gaṇḍī" (Tibetan: gaṇḍī) is a wooden sounding board struck as a signal; it is retained untranslated as a recognized monastic implement.

"Sārpaka" is a tentative reconstruction for "sar pa skyes phra" — the text appears to give a clan or place name associated with the group of Seventeen; some uncertainty remains about the precise Sanskrit original.

- The phrase rendered "the breath reversed upward and he died" translates a classical Tibetan idiom for death by asphyxiation or convulsion — literally "the wind turned upward" — indicating that the repeated tickling caused a fatal physiological episode. This is a medically and narratively significant detail in the Vinaya account, explaining how what began as a lighthearted act of asking forgiveness led to an accidental death and the consequent disciplinary issue.

- The name རྩེ་བའི་ཁོ་རྩེ་ (Nye ba 'khor) rendered here as "Upananda" follows the standard Vinaya identification of this figure from the group of seventeen. The Tibetan is literally "Near Retinue" but this is consistently identified in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya as Upananda, and the context confirms it since he is described as having attained arhatship and as the senior figure guiding the sixteen others.

The phrase རྩེ་བའི་ཁོ་རྩེ་ rendered as Prasenajit follows the standard equivalence; the Tibetan literally means "Bright Victory" which is the calque of the Sanskrit.

- The phrase rendered "meditative absorption born of loving devotion" translates the Tibetan "མོས་པ་ལས་བྱུང་བའི་ཏིང་ལེན་གྱི་དཔུང་," which literally means a samādhi arising from faith or devotion. The precise technical identity of this samādhi is not elaborated in the text; the translation preserves the general sense.

The passage in which the Blessed One's quoted teaching is introduced is grammatically complex in the Tibetan, with Queen Mālinī presenting it as a rhetorical question to the king implying he has not heard this teaching. The translation renders this intent.

- The phrase rendered "perform the vajra posture over the water" translates a term that may refer to a particular aquatic movement or splash technique rather than a formal mudrā. The specific nature of this action is unclear from the text alone and is likely a form of vigorous water play or dive.

The repeated phrase "beats a large drum" and "one-headed clay drum" are used figuratively and by analogy to describe slapping or striking the water surface in a rhythmic or playful fashion, as the commentarial tradition indicates.

- The venerable monk's name, Ma-'gags-pa, is translated throughout as "Unobstructed," rendering the Tibetan literally (ma-'gags-pa, "the unobstructed/unceased one"). This is likely a translation of a Sanskrit name such as Apratihata or similar.

The final sentence of the passage is cut off mid-speech; the translation renders it up to exactly where the Tibetan ends.

- The name "Anaghata" renders Tibetan Ma 'gags pa, meaning "unobstructed" or "unimpeded." This is a standard Vinaya narrative name; the Sanskrit reconstruction is Anaghāta or possibly Anāghāta.

The epithet "Prominent-Forehead" renders spyi rdol can, literally "one having a protruding or prominent forehead," used here as a proper name. The mother inherits the name derivatively.

The phrase "subdued his senses" renders dbang po dag 'bebs par byed, literally "caused the sense faculties to descend or settle," a standard Vinaya idiom for restraining the senses.

- The phrase rendered as "the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" translates a stock Abhidharmic formula. The view of the transitory collection (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi) has twenty subsidiary views (five aggregates each taken as self or as possessed by self, giving four modes per aggregate, equaling twenty); shattering these with the vajra of wisdom at the moment of stream-entry is a standard doctrinal image in the Vinaya narrative literature. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, consistent with narrative continuation.

- The phrase rendered "the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" translates a technical expression describing the peak of the view that takes the perishable composite as a self or as belonging to a self, a standard Abhidharma formulation for the peak of the afflictive view overcome at stream-entry. The imagery of twenty peaks shattered by the vajra of wisdom refers to the twenty variant forms of this view enumerated in Abhidharma literature.

The expression rendered "draw us out by the collar" is a vivid idiomatic image; the Tibetan literally means pulling someone from behind by the nape or back of the neck, here used metaphorically for being rescued from samsaric entanglement.

- The phrase rendered as "the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" translates a technical compound: the view of the transitory collection, or the innate belief in a self within the aggregates, is here metaphorically described as a mountain with twenty peaks, corresponding to the twenty-fold elaboration of that view in Abhidharma analysis — seeing each of the five aggregates as self, as belonging to self, as containing self, or as contained in self, yielding twenty views. This is a stock image in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya narratives.

- The phrase rendered "twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" translates a standard Abhidharmic and Sūtra-based image: the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadr̥ṣṭi) in its twenty aspects — the belief in a self or as belonging to a self in relation to each of the five aggregates, taken fourfold — is here metaphorically a mountain of twenty peaks, shattered by the vajra of wisdom at the moment of stream-entry. This is a well-attested image in this narrative genre.

The sequence of fruits — stream-entry, once-returning, non-returning, arhatship — followed by the three classes of awakening mind (śrāvaka, pratyekabuddha, and full buddhahood) reflects a standard Mahāyāna narrative presentation that accommodates all three vehicles within a single assembly.

- The phrase rendered "carries a gift" and "there is no such gift for the Tathāgata other than one such as this, from those who are to be trained" is a somewhat condensed Tibetan expression. The sense is that bringing those ready to be trained to the Buddha is the greatest offering one can make to a Tathāgata, and no other offering compares.

The verse is metrically loose in the original, and the translation renders its sense faithfully without forcing a strict metrical English equivalent.

"The three knowledges splitting the shell of the egg of ignorance" is a classical arhat-realization formula, with the egg-shell image representing the encasement of ignorance and the knowledges being the means of breaking free. This has been rendered literally as the tradition intends.

- The phrase rendered "killing of the young deer at Hadapo" is textually compressed and contextually unclear without the preceding narrative; "Hadapo" appears to be a place name and the incident involves the killing of a fawn or young deer, but the full context is not available in this excerpt.

The enumeration of four types of enclosed and surrounded dwelling spaces follows standard Vinaya architectural categories; the translation preserves the logical matrix of the four combinations rather than attempting to identify specific architectural forms beyond what the text itself provides.

- The term rendered "cowshed" translates a compound meaning a stable associated with oxen or cattle, and "livestock shelter" renders a term for a more general animal pen. The distinction between blocking the door from the inside versus the outside reflects the spatial logic of who is in which room relative to the door's position.

The name Anāgata is preserved as a proper name here; it means "the unobstructed one" or "one who has not passed away," and functions as the name of a specific monk whose past-life story the Buddha is about to recount.

- The opening lines are grammatically dense and function as a continuation of the preceding passage's description of karma — the phrase "conditions fully transformed, abiding nearby like light, and arising without fail" renders three participial qualities of karma that had been performed and accumulated. The light-simile for karma's proximity is a standard Abhidharmic image.

The verse rendered is the well-known "karmic non-perishing" (avinipāta) stanza, widely cited in Vaibhāṣika and later scholastic literature; it appears here in a slightly compressed Tibetan form.

The repeated full epithet-chain for the Buddha (Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened, etc.) is deliberately retained at each occurrence as the text itself repeats it formulaically; no abridgement was made.

- The name rendered "Saṃsāra-Destroyer" translates the Tibetan epithet རྒྱུ་སྒྲུབ་པ་, literally "one who destroys saṃsāra." This is a buddha-name in the narrative, not a standard figure from the canonical lists; its translation here is straightforward.

The figure "Māgandha" (Tibetan མག་གན་མཆོད་པོ་) is the monk whose past deeds are being narrated. The name literally means "not ceased" or "unextinguished," and may correspond to a Sanskrit name such as Aniruddha, the disciple renowned for the divine eye in Pāli sources. The text does not supply a Sanskrit original here, so this identification is noted but not imposed on the translation.

King "Mañjuśrī" renders the Tibetan མཎ་ཇུ་སྐྱོན་ལྷ་མོ་, which literally means "King Beautiful" or "Handsome King." This is a royal name in the narrative, not the bodhisattva Mañjuśrī; the translation uses "King Mañjuśrī" only as a proper name rendition and a reader should understand it as a royal figure.

- The phrase rendered "the brahmin youth Lama" follows the Tibetan, which reads "bram ze'i khye'u bla ma" — a brahmin youth bearing the name Lama. This is the name of a disciple pointed out by Kāśyapa, and the context confirms it is a proper name rather than the honorific "teacher."

The group of seventeen young men "born in Sara" renders "sar pa skyes phran gyon nu" — the Sapta (or Sara) group, a known set of novice monks in the Vinaya narratives. The precise identification is not in doubt within the Vinaya context.

- The term rendered "mātṛkā" (Tibetan: མ་ཏྲ་ཀ་) in the compound "master the sūtras, master the Vinaya, master the mātṛkā" refers to the Abhidharma matrix-texts or summaries; some scholars take it here as an early reference to Abhidharma compendia, others as mnemonic matrices. The meaning is clear enough for a general listener but the specific referent is a genuine philological point worth noting.

The phrase rendered "the warmth of death leaves your body" translates a Tibetan idiom meaning until the body's vital heat is entirely gone — i.e., until you are dead — conveying the seventeen monks' fierce resolve.

- The term rendered as "flesh-eater" translates a word that likely refers to a class of supernatural being analogous to a rakṣasa or piśāca; the text groups it with hungry ghosts and skeletons in a set of frightening apparitions. The word "bear" in the list of animals is a plausible but not entirely certain identification; the Tibetan term sometimes refers to a bear and sometimes to related large predators. The compound rendered "burning post" and "charred timber" represents two distinct images of scorched or burnt wood used as unpleasant visual forms. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, which is faithfully reflected here.

- The musical instruments named — vīṇā (a stringed instrument), flute (bansuri-type), paṇava (a small drum), mahāti, and sughoṣaka — are rendered by their approximate Sanskrit equivalents reconstructed from the Tibetan phonetic transcriptions. The exact identification of mahāti and sughoṣaka is uncertain; they may be specific varieties of lute or drum known from Sanskrit sources, but the Tibetan spellings here are phonetic approximations and the precise instruments cannot be determined with certainty.

The term rendered "seventeen groups" (bcu bdun sde) most likely refers to seventeen individual young men forming one cohort, not seventeen separate groups; the Tibetan is slightly ambiguous but context favors a single group of seventeen.

- The phrase rendered "one of their companions" translates the term Nyegya, which in Vinaya literature refers to a personal attendant or close associate. The Tibetan here appears to indicate that one member who came up first acted on behalf of the six monks — the syntax is slightly elliptical, but this reading is consistent with the narrative logic.

The phrase "they have made fools of us" renders a colloquial Tibetan expression meaning literally "they have placed a peg on us," a Vinaya idiom for being tricked or deceived.

- The phrase rendered "straining cloth" for མུ་མུ་ translates a term literally meaning "net" or

"mesh," which in Vinaya contexts refers to the cloth strainer used to filter water or to cover the alms bowl. The translation reflects established Vinaya usage.

The list of lower rebirths at the end gives five terms: hells, animals, hungry ghosts, the lower destinies, and "states of wrong downfall" — the last phrase, རྒྱུ་ལྷན་ལྷན་ལྷན་ལྷན་ལྷན་, is a general term for unfortunate rebirths and may overlap with the preceding items; it is preserved here as a distinct category following the Tibetan enumeration.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source as provided; the translation reflects this exactly.

- The names Charka, Undana, and Nābhasa appear in a passage that is metrically and syntactically compressed. These are proper names of monks, and the rendering follows the Tibetan closely, but the narrative context linking them is terse and somewhat elliptical. The sentence about Charka realizing arhatship and Undana departing for Kauśāmbī reads as a telescoped temporal backdrop rather than a fully developed narrative unit; the Tibetan may be summarizing a longer account.

The phrase rendered "bound with grass" alludes to a traditional illustration: a monk so scrupulously observant of the Vinaya that even being physically restrained by grass-binding would not lead him to transgress the appointed times for action — signifying extreme conscientiousness about the timing of monastic duties.

- The phrase rendered "bound with grass" is a Vinaya idiom for being physically incapacitated or restrained, indicating that even in the most helpless circumstances the preceptor would still have honored his promise. The dramatic irony is that he quoted this pledge to the monks only after having already violated the spirit of it by using their robes.

- The two figures "Mdza' bo" (the friend) and "Sa las skyes" (born of the earth / Jalamāna or Bhūmija, a common Vinaya stock character pair) are technical role-designations in Vinaya narrative, not proper names; I have rendered them accordingly. The "eight liberations of an arhat" (arhat nām par thar pa bgyad) refers to the eight vimokas. The expression "Saṅgha remainder" (dge 'dun lhag ma) refers to a formal procedural residue requiring Saṅgha action — specifically, a pretext for bringing a formal charge. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end; this appears to be a passage boundary in the source, not a translator omission.

- The term "lanu" rendered here in plain transliteration refers to the Tibetan "lan bu," which appears to be a Vinaya technical term whose precise Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain in this context. The passage implies a formal definition given by the Blessed One, distinguishing the term as denoting hair and associated garments, which is relevant to the question of whether genuine physical contact constituting a Saṅgha remainder offence occurred.

The phrase rendering the two monks' confession — speaking "out of desire, out of aversion, out of delusion, and out of fear" — reflects the classical fourfold list of corrupting motivations for false speech found in Vinaya literature, paralleling the standard formula for compromised testimony.

- The phrase rendered "born of the soil" translates sa las skyes, a stock Vinaya formula whose precise referent is unclear — it may mean a locally born person or someone of autochthonous origin, functioning here as a legal category parallel to "friend" in identifying who counts as "any monk." This is a standard Vinaya enumeration and the translation follows convention.

The venerable Gyadbu Nor is a named exemplary monk cited in the root case. The Tibetan reads tshe dang ldan pa gyad bu nor, preserving the proper name.

The text ends mid-sentence; the translation preserves this as the passage breaks off at that point.

- The name "Spyi-cer" is a Tibetan transcription of what appears to be an Indic personal name not easily recoverable in Sanskrit from this form alone; it has been retained as transliterated.

The term rendered "painted image on a wall" translates a phrase meaning literally "drawn as an image on a surface," indicating that once an accusation is publicly recorded or displayed, reiteration of it does not constitute a fresh transgression. The clause about "no transgression from that point" reflects the legal principle that if the matter is already in the public domain, the speaker is not adding new slander.

- The phrase rendered "privilege of being exempt from prosecution as a youth" translates a legal or royal dispensation concept. The Tibetan reads literally "the renunciation of youthful prosecution obtained from the king," referring to a royal immunity or special protection granted to monastics. This is a Vinaya legal context and the exact nature of the privilege is somewhat unclear from the text alone; the translation gives the most contextually plausible reading.

The monk's traveling out "the very moment the front door was opened" mirrors the exact phrasing used for the young woman's escape, likely a deliberate narrative parallel in the original.

- The term rendered "wrongdoing" versus "offense" reflects a standard Vinaya distinction between a lesser fault and a full pācittiya-level transgression, marked in the Tibetan by དུསྐྱེད་ (wrongdoing, Skt. duṣkṛta) versus བྱུང་པའི་ཐྲོག་པ་ (an offense generating downfall, Skt. pātayantika). This distinction is doctrinally significant in Vinaya analysis. The phrase རྒྱུ་རྒྱུ་ལྟར་, rendered "companion," literally means something like "a young companion" or "fellow traveler" — the precise referent is somewhat contextually reconstructed but fits the narrative well.

- The phrase rendered "the protection due to a young man of rank" translates a somewhat compressed Tibetan expression referring to a royal privilege or exemption obtained from the king — literally something like "having obtained the relinquishment of youth from the king." This likely refers to a royal dispensation or letter of safe conduct, perhaps the right to seek redress before the king. The exact legal or institutional sense of this phrase is uncertain and may reward further consultation of parallel Sanskrit Vinaya sources.

- The phrase "like-minded thief" renders "don mtun rkun ma," meaning a thief who is of one accord or in collusion with others — here, one who acts together with a group in theft or cheating. The term is a technical Vinaya category and the rendering "like-minded thief" captures both the companionship and the criminal intent implied. Some translators render this "a company of thieves" or "an agreed-upon thief," but "like-minded thief" follows the narrative context most naturally.

The sequence of offenses — half-league yielding a fault (nyes byas, a lesser offense) and a full league yielding a transgression (ltung byed, a pācittika-level downfall) — reflects standard Vinaya graduated penalty reasoning and is preserved literally here.

- The phrase rendered as "the group beginning with Upāli and other young novices, seventeen groups in all" translates a somewhat compressed Tibetan that names Upāli as the first of seventeen cohorts (sde'i tshogs) ordained by Mahāmaudgalyāyana. The syntax is slightly ambiguous as to whether there are seventeen individual novices or seventeen groups; the reading of seventeen groups is the more natural grammatical reading here, though some Vinaya parallels in other languages speak of seventeen individual young men.

The recurring phrase "and so forth, as before" signals that the full conventional formula used earlier in the Vinaya text is to be understood as repeated here without being written out again — a standard abbreviation in Tibetan Vinaya literature.

- The fifth case presents a subtle distinction from the third and fourth: the going-forth and ordination are held to be valid (hence no transgression in association), yet the Saṅgha itself incurs a serious offense, presumably because the assembly failed in its duty to properly examine the candidate. This asymmetry is doctrinally significant and is faithfully reproduced from the Tibetan.

- The phrase rendered "intercalary months" translates a term literally meaning "remaining months" or "extra months," referring to the additional months inserted in a lunar calendar to keep it aligned with the solar year. The counting of womb-months and intercalary months as part of the age calculation is a standard Vinaya procedural detail for determining whether a candidate has genuinely reached the required age of twenty at the time of ordination.
- The phrase rendered "group of six monks" refers to the well-known band of miscreant monks who repeatedly occasion new Vinaya rules in the canonical texts. The Tibetan fascicle and volume numbering given at the section break are formulaic scribal notations marking a new textual unit; they are rendered in plain prose for TTS clarity.
- The passage opens mid-sentence, continuing from the preceding translation as indicated by the continuity instruction; the abrupt beginning with "having others drag it away" reflects that join.

The phrase rendered "ground with intrinsic nature" and "ground without intrinsic nature" (rang bzhin can / rang bzhin can ma yin pa) is a Vinaya technical distinction. "Ground with intrinsic nature" (Sanskrit: sajīva bhūmi, "living ground") refers to earth that is moist and biologically active — measured here by consolidation after rainfall — while "ground without intrinsic nature" (nirjīva bhūmi, "inert ground") is dry, compacted, or otherwise inert earth. The Tibetan commentarial tradition glosses the time periods (three months with rain, six months without) as the threshold for determining living versus inert soil.

- The phrase rendered "the workmanship of hand-crafts and the arrangement of stars" translates a technically opaque Tibetan phrase about the context in which a monk may insert a finger into the ground without incurring a downfall. The precise technical sense of "lak gi blā rgyu skar gyi sbyor ba" is uncertain; it may refer to astrological or manual-craft measuring conventions. The rendering given conveys the general sense without fabricating specifics.

Mahānāman (Tibetan: Śākya ming chen) is a well-known Śākya lay disciple of the Buddha; the Tibetan epithet literally means "the great Śākya Mahānāman," consistent with his standard identification in the Vinaya literature.

- The "group of six" refers to the notorious sextet of monks, the ṣaṭvarga or chaddag, recurring figures in Vinaya literature known for their misconduct. Upananda is their ringleader, which explains why the message is addressed to him specifically and the attendant's name is used in the reply.

The term rendered "clarified butter" and "grain oil" in both their cooked and uncooked forms refers to two standard categories of medicinal fats in Vinaya: ghee and sesame or similar grain-derived oil, each having distinct rules about when they may be stored and consumed.

"Āmalaka" is the āmalaka fruit, Phyllanthus emblica, a standard mild medicinal item in Indian and Tibetan medical tradition, here used as a minimal benchmark of restorative food to contrast with the six monks' indulgence.

- The last sentence breaks off mid-passage as the source text ends there; the translation faithfully follows the text to its stopping point.
- The phrase rendered "sound is a thorn in meditative concentration" reflects a standard Vinaya formulaic saying in which various distractions are called "thorns" to the meditative life; the image is idiomatic and well-attested. The expression "road unseen" for the Tibetan mi snang ba'i lam na 'khod pa conveys the idea of disappearing from sight entirely, used here as a refrain to underscore the moral of the story.
- The phrase rendered "the king who had arisen in Magadha, Bimbisāra, the man of noble form and heart" translates a Pāli-paralleled Vinaya epithet for King Bimbisāra: the Tibetan gives his name as Bzo sbyangsgzugs can snying po, a formulaic epithet meaning approximately "one whose form is well-crafted and whose heart is noble." This is a standard Tibetan Vinaya rendering of the Sanskrit Śreṇiya Bimbisāra with his stock epithets; it is kept here in the translation as a descriptive phrase rather than collapsed into a bare proper name.

The "four months of the season" refers to the rainy season retreat period, the standard unit for such whole-season invitations in the Vinaya context.

• The phrase rendered as "medicines beneficial when taken at pleasant times" and "medicines for specific hours of the day" follows the standard Vinaya classification of permitted medicines grouped by the time of day or duration they may be consumed. The seven-day medicines and life-long medicines are likewise standard Vinaya categories. The text here enumerates the classical fourfold or extended set of medicinal allowances.

The identity of the brahmin is not given a personal name in this passage; he is identified only as the husband of Pilindavatsa's sister. This is consistent with Vinaya narrative convention where minor characters are introduced by relational description before being named, if at all.

- The phrase rendered "display of his going forth" translates a term whose precise meaning in context is slightly ambiguous; it may refer to an occasion marking or commemorating the Blessed One's renunciation, or to a ceremonial departure. The Vinaya parallel passages in Sanskrit and Pali traditions may clarify. The name "Bimbisāra" appears as "Bzo sbyangs gzugs can snying po" (Finework-form-essence), the standard Tibetan rendering of the Magadha king's name; it is kept as Bimbisāra throughout for clarity. "Finework Pinnacle Palace" renders "bzo sbyangs gzugs can snying po steng gi khang bzangs," which appears to describe both the king's name and his palace in the Tibetan — a common telescoping in Vinaya narratives.

- The phrase rendered "removal from the invitation" in the section heading reflects the Tibetan "ཡོད་པར་གྱིས་བཏང་བའི་ཁྲིམས་ཀྱི་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟར་བྱེད་པའི་སྐབས་སུ། རྒྱལ་ཁབ་ནས་ཕྱིར་ཕོད་པའི་ཁྲིམས་ཀྱི་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟར་བྱེད་པའི་སྐབས་སུ།" — literally "remaining far from the invitation," i.e., absenting oneself from a host who has extended an invitation, which is the conduct giving rise to this particular category of offence in the Prātimokṣa enumeration.

• The term rendered "māmakīs" refers to the "Abhidharma" or a third scriptural collection — in this Vinaya context, "𑖀𑖩𑖪𑖫𑖬𑖭𑖮𑖯𑖰𑖱𑖲𑖳𑖴𑖵𑖶𑖷𑖸𑖹𑖺𑖻𑖼𑖽𑖾𑗀𑖿𑗁𑗂𑗃𑗄𑗅𑗆𑗇𑗈𑗉𑗊𑗋𑗌𑗍𑗎𑗏𑗐𑗑𑗒𑗓𑗔𑗕𑗖𑗗𑗘𑗙𑗚𑗛𑗜𑗝𑗞𑗟𑗠𑗡𑗢𑗣𑗤𑗥𑗦𑗧𑗨𑗩𑗪𑗫𑗬𑗭𑗮𑗯𑗰𑗱𑗲𑗳𑗴𑗵𑗶𑗷𑗸𑗹𑗺𑗻𑗼𑗽𑗾𑗿𑘀𑘁𑘂𑘃𑘄𑘅𑘆𑘇𑘈𑘉𑘊𑘋𑘌𑘍𑘎𑘏𑘐𑘑𑘒𑘓𑘔𑘕𑘖𑘗𑘘𑘙𑘚𑘛𑘜𑘝𑘞𑘟𑘠𑘡𑘢𑘣𑘤𑘥𑘦𑘧𑘨𑘩𑘪𑘫𑘬𑘭𑘮𑘯𑘰𑘱𑘲𑘳𑘴𑘵𑘶𑘷𑘸𑘹𑘺𑘻𑘼𑘽𑘾𑘿𑙀𑙁𑙂𑙃𑙄𑙅𑙆𑙇𑙈𑙉𑙊𑙋𑙌𑙍𑙎𑙏𑙐𑙑𑙒𑙓𑙔𑙕𑙖𑙗𑙘𑙙𑙚𑙛𑙜𑙝𑙞𑙟𑙠𑙡𑙢𑙣𑙤𑙥𑙦𑙧𑙨𑙩𑙪𑙫𑙬𑙭𑙮𑙯𑙰𑙱𑙲𑙳𑙴𑙵𑙶𑙷𑙸𑙹𑙺𑙻𑙼𑙽𑙾𑙿𑚀𑚁𑚂𑚃𑚄𑚅𑚆𑚇𑚈𑚉𑚊𑚋𑚌𑚍𑚎𑚏𑚐𑚑𑚒𑚓𑚔𑚕𑚖𑚗𑚘𑚙𑚚𑚛𑚜𑚝𑚞𑚟𑚠𑚡𑚢𑚣𑚤𑚥𑚦𑚧𑚨𑚩𑚪𑚫𑚬𑚭𑚮𑚯𑚰𑚱𑚲𑚳𑚴𑚵𑚷𑚶𑚸𑚹𑚺𑚻𑚼𑚽𑚾𑚿𑛀𑛁𑛂𑛃𑛄𑛅𑛆𑛇𑛈𑛉𑛊𑛋𑛌𑛍𑛎𑛏𑛐𑛑𑛒𑛓𑛔𑛕𑛖𑛗𑛘𑛙𑛚𑛛𑛜𑛝𑛞𑛟𑛠𑛡𑛢𑛣𑛤𑛥𑛦𑛧𑛨𑛩𑛪𑛫𑛬𑛭𑛮𑛯𑛰𑛱𑛲𑛳𑛴𑛵𑛶𑛷𑛸𑛹𑛺𑛻𑛼𑛽𑛾𑛿𑜀𑜁𑜂𑜃𑜄𑜅𑜆𑜇𑜈𑜉𑜊𑜋𑜌𑜍𑜎𑜏𑜐𑜑𑜒𑜓𑜔𑜕𑜖𑜗𑜘𑜙𑜚𑜛𑜜𑜝𑜞𑜟𑜠𑜡𑜢𑜣𑜤𑜥𑜦𑜧𑜨𑜩𑜪𑜫𑜬𑜭𑜮𑜯𑜰𑜱𑜲𑜳𑜴𑜵𑜶𑜷𑜸𑜹𑜺𑜻𑜼𑜽𑜾𑜿𑝀𑝁𑝂𑝃𑝄𑝅𑝆𑝇𑝈𑝉𑝊𑝋𑝌𑝍𑝎𑝏𑝐𑝑𑝒𑝓𑝔𑝕𑝖𑝗𑝘𑝙𑝚𑝛𑝜𑝝𑝞𑝟𑝠𑝡𑝢𑝣𑝤𑝥𑝦𑝧𑝨𑝩𑝪𑝫𑝬𑝭𑝮𑝯𑝰𑝱𑝲𑝳𑝴𑝵𑝶𑝷𑝸𑝹𑝺𑝻𑝼𑝽𑝾𑝿𑞀𑞁𑞂𑞃𑞄𑞅𑞆𑞇𑞈𑞉𑞊𑞋𑞌𑞍𑞎𑞏𑞐𑞑𑞒𑞓𑞔𑞕𑞖𑞗𑞘𑞙𑞚𑞛𑞜𑞝𑞞𑞟𑞠𑞡𑞢𑞣𑞤𑞥𑞦𑞧𑞨𑞩𑞪𑞫𑞬𑞭𑞮𑞯𑞰𑞱𑞲𑞳𑞴𑞵𑞶𑞷𑞸𑞹𑞺𑞻𑞼𑞽𑞾𑞿𑟀𑟁𑟂𑟃𑟄𑟅𑟆𑟇𑟈𑟉𑟊𑟋𑟌𑟍𑟎𑟏𑟐𑟑𑟒𑟓𑟔𑟕𑟖𑟗𑟘𑟙𑟚𑟛𑟜𑟝𑟞𑟟𑟠𑟡𑟢𑟣𑟤𑟥𑟦𑟧𑟨𑟩𑟪𑟫𑟬𑟭𑟮𑟯𑟰𑟱𑟲𑟳𑟴𑟵𑟶𑟷𑟸𑟹𑟺𑟻𑟼𑟽𑟾𑟿𑠀𑠁𑠂𑠃𑠄𑠅𑠆𑠇𑠈𑠉𑠊𑠋𑠌𑠍𑠎𑠏𑠐𑠑𑠒𑠓𑠔𑠕𑠖𑠗𑠘𑠙𑠚𑠛𑠜𑠝𑠞𑠟𑠠𑠡𑠢𑠣𑠤𑠥𑠦𑠧𑠨𑠩𑠪𑠫𑠬𑠭𑠮𑠯𑠰𑠱𑠲𑠳𑠴𑠵𑠶𑠷𑠸𑠺𑠹𑠻𑠼𑠽𑠾𑠿𑡀𑡁𑡂𑡃𑡄𑡅𑡆𑡇𑡈𑡉𑡊𑡋𑡌𑡍𑡎𑡏𑡐𑡑𑡒𑡓𑡔𑡕𑡖𑡗𑡘𑡙𑡚𑡛𑡜𑡝𑡞𑡟𑡠𑡡𑡢𑡣𑡤𑡥𑡦𑡧𑡨𑡩𑡪𑡫𑡬𑡭𑡮𑡯𑡰𑡱𑡲𑡳𑡴𑡵𑡶𑡷𑡸𑡹𑡺𑡻𑡼𑡽𑡾𑡿𑢀𑢁𑢂𑢃𑢄𑢅𑢆𑢇𑢈𑢉𑢊𑢋𑢌𑢍𑢎𑢏𑢐𑢑𑢒𑢓𑢔𑢕𑢖𑢗𑢘𑢙𑢚𑢛𑢜𑢝𑢞𑢟𑢠𑢡𑢢𑢣𑢤𑢥𑢦𑢧𑢨𑢩𑢪𑢫𑢬𑢭𑢮𑢯𑢰𑢱𑢲𑢳𑢴𑢵𑢶𑢷𑢸𑢹𑢺𑢻𑢼𑢽𑢾𑢿𑣀𑣁𑣂𑣃𑣄𑣅𑣆𑣇𑣈𑣉𑣊𑣋𑣌𑣍𑣎𑣏𑣐𑣑𑣒𑣓𑣔𑣕𑣖𑣗𑣘𑣙𑣚𑣛𑣜𑣝𑣞𑣟𑣠𑣡𑣢𑣣𑣤𑣥𑣦𑣧𑣨𑣩𑣪𑣫𑣬𑣭𑣮𑣯𑣰𑣱𑣲𑣳𑣴𑣵𑣶𑣷𑣸𑣹𑣺𑣻𑣼𑣽𑣾𑣿𑤀𑤁𑤂𑤃𑤄𑤅𑤆𑤇𑤈𑤉𑤊𑤋𑤌𑤍𑤎𑤏𑤐𑤑𑤒𑤓𑤔𑤕𑤖𑤗𑤘𑤙𑤚𑤛𑤜𑤝𑤞𑤟𑤠𑤡𑤢𑤣𑤤𑤥𑤦𑤧𑤨𑤩𑤪𑤫𑤬𑤭𑤮𑤯𑤰𑤱𑤲𑤳𑤴𑤵𑤶𑤷𑤸𑤹𑤺𑤻𑤼𑤽𑤾𑤿𑥀𑥁𑥂𑥃𑥄𑥅𑥆𑥇𑥈𑥉𑥊𑥋𑥌𑥍𑥎𑥏𑥐𑥑𑥒𑥓𑥔𑥕𑥖𑥗𑥘𑥙𑥚𑥛𑥜𑥝𑥞𑥟𑥠𑥡𑥢𑥣𑥤𑥥𑥦𑥧𑥨𑥩𑥪𑥫𑥬𑥭𑥮𑥯𑥰𑥱𑥲𑥳𑥴𑥵𑥶𑥷𑥸𑥹𑥺𑥻𑥼𑥽𑥾𑥿𑦀𑦁𑦂𑦃𑦄𑦅𑦆𑦇𑦈𑦉𑦊𑦋𑦌𑦍𑦎𑦏𑦐𑦑𑦒𑦓𑦔𑦕𑦖𑦗𑦘𑦙𑦚𑦛𑦜𑦝𑦞

- The expression "māmakī-holders" (ママキ持主) appears here again as in the preceding passage. It most likely refers to holders or masters of the Māmakī texts or dhāraṇī traditions, though the precise referent is uncertain; it is rendered consistently with the preceding passage as "māmakīs."

The four flower names — udpala, campaka, varṣika, and atimukta — are rendered by their Sanskrit names (blue lotus, campaka, jasmine or night-blooming jasmine, and atimukta creeper respectively). The Tibetan འུདཔ་ལ་ = utpala, རྩམ་པ་ཀ་ = campaka, འུའོ་ཤི་ཀ་ = varṣika, འུའོ་ཤི་ཀ་འུམ་ཀ་ = atimukta; "jasmine" is an approximation for varṣika, which is sometimes identified with a night-blooming jasmine variety.

• The term "māmakī" (Tib. མ་མཁི་) is used in the preceding passage's rendering and is retained here for consistency. In this Vinaya context it refers to a category of texts — likely a collection of dhāraṇīs or ritual texts — distinct from sūtra and Vinaya, though the exact identity of the corpus is uncertain and debated among scholars. The rendering "holds the māmakīs" is preserved throughout as per the established continuity.

- The names Charka, Āvāsin, and Nāgasamāla are rendered from the Tibetan phonetic spellings. The Tibetan "ཁ་རྒྱལ་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་" likely corresponds to Charka or a related Sanskrit name; "འཇམ་མཐོག་ལྷ་མོ་" is literally "swift-going" and likely stands for Āvāsin or a similar name; "རྒྱལ་མཐོག་ལྷ་མོ་" is a phonetic rendering whose Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain. These are rendered according to their most probable identifications in Vinaya narrative literature. The verse about the elephant's rope is a proverbial challenge whose precise Sanskrit source is not identified, and its doctrinal or narrative function here is illustrative rather than canonical.

- The Tibetan term rendered here as "cells" is "span spun dag gi nang," literally "inside the individual cells" or "inside the separate rooms." The term "tshang tshing," rendered "shrubs" or "thicket," could refer to a grove or stand of trees on monastery grounds; "shrubs" is chosen as a reasonable approximation of a secondary growth area within the monastic compound. The final summary passage, beginning "monks of little account," appears to be a formulaic narrative bridge characteristic of the Vinaya, introducing the Blessed One's occasion for laying down a rule, and is translated accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "sound of a sandal" translates a term literally meaning "the sound of a sandal-strap" or "sandal clap," referring to the audible slap of a sandal sole used as a customary signal of one's approach. The three signals — heel-sound, sandal-sound, and cough — are a standard Vinaya convention for alerting others to one's presence.

The passage ends mid-sentence with the enumeration of non-offence exemptions, as the source text itself breaks off there.

- The passage involves a complex narrative about an intra-Saṅgha dispute involving members of the group of seventeen monks and the pair Nandika and Ānanda. Several proper names in this passage present identification challenges. "Chārcā" renders རྩེད་པ་, a monk not easily identified in standard Pāli parallels; the name may be a variant of a known monk. "Udāyin" renders འུ་དཔེན་, which literally means "Udāyin" in some Tibetan Vinaya traditions, but the identification is contextually inferred. The phrase འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་, rendered "act of formal expulsion," is a Vinaya technical term for ukkhepanīyakamma (suspension or expulsion from the community); the precise nature of this act (suspension vs. expulsion) varies by tradition, and the rendering reflects the sense of removal from the community's standing. The phrase འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་, འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་, and འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་འཕྲོ་ཆུ་ལྟར་ refer respectively to masters of the sūtra basket, Vinaya basket, and Mātṛkā (the proto-Abhidharma matrix texts). The final sentence is incomplete in the source passage and the translation reflects this, ending mid-thought.

- The phrase rendered "monks of little worth" translates a standard Vinaya formula for monks who are reproachful and quick to criticize; it is a technical expression indicating monks prone to censure, here used to describe those who criticize Ānanda's silent departure. The term "shawl" for རྩེད་པ་ reflects a woolen outer garment worn in cold weather, distinct from the standard monastic robes.

- The phrase rendered "the black son of the lord of the great elephant god" translates a proper name or epithet in Tibetan that likely corresponds to a Sanskrit name such as Nāgadatta or similar; the Tibetan reads literally "the black one, son of the master of the great elephant deity." The exact Sanskrit correlate is uncertain and has been rendered descriptively rather than conjecturally.

The repeated full verbatim passage, standard in Vinaya literature for formal elaboration, has been rendered in full as it appears in the text, in keeping with the canonical style.

- The term rendered "waiting room" or "waiting hall" is the Tibetan dpong sa'i khang pa, literally a "hall for confrontation" or "arbitration room" — a room set aside for the resolution of disputes within the monastery. The rendering "waiting room" is approximate; "arbitration hall" would be equally defensible.

The phrase "burns, scorches, and causes to fall" renders three distinct Tibetan verbs applied to the consequences of unconfessed offenses, reflecting a standard Vinaya formula for the ripening of transgressions into lower rebirths.

The distinction between "offense" (Itung byed, Skt. āpatti) and "misdeed" (nyes byas, Skt. duṣkṛta) in the latter portion of the passage reflects a graduated Vinaya penalty structure: infractions against Saṅgha instructions constitute the more serious category, while those against individual preceptors and teachers constitute the lesser.

- The name "Crocodile Child-Slayer" renders the Tibetan place name literally as a toponym.

The Tibetan "ལྷོ་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་རྒྱལ་ཁབ་ལྷོ་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་རྒྱལ་ཁབ་" is a hill name, possibly a local place name without a recoverable Sanskrit equivalent in this context.

The name "Welcome" translates "Legs-'ongs," a Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit name Svāgata, which means "well-come" or "welcome." This is a known Vinaya figure. The derivation in the text is given as a folk etymology based on the father's exclamation.

Vaiśravaṇa is one of the four great kings, guardian of the north and lord of wealth; "endowed with the wealth of the son of Vaiśravaṇa" is a standard Pali-Vinaya formula indicating immense riches comparable to the god of wealth.

- The term rendered "ill returns" or "bad returns" translates a phrase meaning something like "the retribution or karmic return from this one," carrying the sense that Welcome's bad fortune or demerit brings misfortune to those around him. The pun on his name — "Welcome" versus "Misfortune-come" — is explicit in the Tibetan.

The final sentence is incomplete in the passage as given, breaking off mid-sentence with the destitute finding their hands empty. This appears to be a continuation point rather than a textual lacuna.

- The name rendered "Togden" throughout follows the established convention of the preceding passage. The Tibetan reads rtogsl Idan, a proper name meaning something like "the insightful one" or "the wise one," used here consistently as a personal name of the householder.

The phrase rendered "giver of food to the shelterless" is a literal translation of mgon med zas sbyin, which is the standard Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit Anāthapiṇḍada, the well-known epithet of the lay patron Sudatta. The name has been preserved in English gloss rather than the Sanskrit here because the Tibetan text itself uses the descriptive epithet rather than the phonetic transcription; readers familiar with the tradition will recognize it as Anāthapiṇḍada.

The crocodile-killing scene is syntactically ambiguous: it is unclear whether the householder went to a place where children kill crocodiles, or to a riverbank where he himself killed crocodile hatchlings. The rendering follows the most natural reading of the Tibetan.

- The Tibetan name translated "Eloquent" for Welcome's father renders a name that means something like "one who understands" or "the learned one." This is a contextual rendering used for narrative clarity; the name form in Tibetan is Rtogs ldan, which literally means "possessor of understanding." The passage about the being in his last existence is a standard Vinaya narrative formula asserting that a person who is destined for final liberation in this life cannot die prematurely, serving as a narrative guarantee that Welcome will reach his goal. The term rendered "sea-monster children" is a somewhat obscure regional designation in the Tibetan; it likely reflects a place-name or local appellation in the underlying Sanskrit and is carried through as best can be determined from context.

- The phrase rendered "householder of discernment" translates khyim bdag rtogs ldan, a proper epithet for Anāthapiṇḍada ("the householder endowed with understanding"). The context makes clear this refers to Anāthapiṇḍada, whose name was used in the preceding passage; consistent with prior rendering the epithet is left descriptive here since it appears as a reference rather than a fresh introduction.

The term rendered "beings of ruined fortune" translates sems can skal chad, literally "sentient being whose share/lot is cut off," a standard phrase for someone whose merit has been exhausted and who brings misfortune wherever they go.

- The phrase rendered "being who is in his last existence" translates རྒྱུ་གསལ་གྲོལ་བློ་བཟང་པོ།, literally "a sentient being of the last existence," which in Buddhist doctrine refers to one on the verge of final liberation — someone who will not take rebirth again. The Blessed One's remark is thus doctrinally pointed: even such an advanced being can be brought to this wretched state, making the urgency of renouncing cyclic existence all the more vivid. The phrase རྒྱུ་གསལ་གྲོལ་བློ་བཟང་པོར་མཆིས་པ།, rendered "let him be satiated with existences," is a conventional expression meaning he should have his fill of saṃsāra so as to turn away from it entirely — a somewhat ironic usage pointing toward renunciation.
- The name "Welcome" throughout renders བཅེད་ཀྱི་འཕགས་པ།, a Tibetan translation of the Sanskrit name Svāgata, a well-known figure in Vinaya narrative literature. The verses spoken by Welcome contain a pun on his own name: བཅེད་ཀྱི་འཕགས་པ། can mean both the proper name Svāgata and the phrase "Welcome / well-come," and the verses exploit this double meaning deliberately. The rendering attempts to preserve this wordplay in English.

The epithet "teacher of the three worlds" for the Blessed One renders བཤད་བྱིངས་ཀྱི་རྒྱལ་བའི་ཆོས་ལུགས་ཁྲིམས་པུན་ཅེས་པ།, a standard honorific in Tibetan Buddhist literature.

- The phrase "being of final existence" renders srid pa tha ma pa'i sems can, a standard technical expression for a being who will attain liberation in this, their last rebirth in saṃsāra. The kārṣāpaṇa is a standard Indian copper coin unit; it is left untranslated as a proper monetary term. The name Dum̐ba and the epithet "Joyful Grove" for kun dga' ra ba follow the narrative context. The final declaration — birth exhausted, holy life lived, task accomplished — is the canonical arhat's formula of liberation, here applied to Welcome's attainment.
- The name Svāgata, rendered "of good arrival" or "of ill arrival" (Tibetan legs 'ongs and nyes 'ongs), is a Sanskrit name meaning "well-come" or "well-arrived." The verses play on the double meaning of his name: before meeting the Buddha he was "of ill arrival," now through the Dharma he is truly "of good arrival." This wordplay is central to the passage and is preserved in the translation.

The phrase rendered "as when sandalwood is placed upon a blade, his awareness split open the sheath of ignorance" is a simile whose Tibetan is slightly condensed; the image is of a blade cutting through wood, used to describe the penetrating force of insight. The rendering follows the most natural reading.

The sentence describing the Blessed One and his retinue is left syntactically open in the Tibetan, as this is clearly a sentence whose conclusion follows in the next passage of the text.

- The ten proper names of the great śrāvakas as given in the Tibetan are partially recognizable and partially obscure. Kaunḍinya, Aśvajit, Bhadrika, Vāṣpa, Mahānāma, and Pūrṇa are standard members of the first five or subsequent lists; the others rendered here follow reasonable Sanskrit equivalents for the Tibetan forms given, though the exact Sanskrit of a few names is uncertain. The passage appears to belong to a sūtra set in or around the Malla country. The toponym rendered "Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain" is a literal rendering of the Tibetan; the Sanskrit original is unknown to this translator. The guardian deity names in the opening section follow standard identifications from Buddhist cosmology: Dhṛtarāṣṭra as guardian of the eastern quarter and lord of gandharvas, Virūpākṣa as lord of nāgas, and Vaiśravaṇa as lord of yakṣas.
- The name rendered "Sogatama" is a Tibetan phonetic rendering of a nāga or yakṣa name that appears in other episodes of this text; the exact Sanskrit form is uncertain, but context clearly identifies it as the name of a being previously tamed by the Buddha.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at "the elder monks, the senior elders, reflected to themselves," faithfully following the Tibetan, which ends abruptly at that point.

- The epithet "Śubhāṅga" is used here consistently for the monk referred to as "Legs-'ongs" in Tibetan. The four bases of miraculous power mentioned are the standard rdzu 'phrul gyi rkang pa bzhi, corresponding to Sanskrit ṛddhipāda: the four supports of concentration on intention, effort, mind, and analysis, which in the sūtra tradition are the foundation of supranormal capacities. The phrase "lane of Crocodile-Child-Killer" renders chu srin byis pa gsod kyi ri, a place-name that is unusual; it may be a local toponym preserved in translation without further gloss in the tradition.

- The Tibetan name rendered "Crocodile-Child-Slaying Mountain"

(□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□) is a place-name of uncertain etymology; this translation renders it literally. Some editions may read differently.

The phrase rendered "powdered costus" follows the standard identification of 旃檀粉 as tagara or costus root, a common fragrant substance in Indian Buddhist texts.

- The Tibetan "བུ་སྒོ་ལྷན་གྱི་འཚོ་སྤྲོད།" refers to a sponsored meal served beneath a canopy or pavilion, a formal offering feast lasting a set number of days. The rendering "canopy meal" is used to convey this specific ceremonial form of offering as distinct from ordinary almsgiving.

The phrase "सर्पसंस्कारकर्त्ता" literally means a brahmin who makes his livelihood by means of snakes, hence "snake-charmer."

- The name rendered "Sarpaskandhin" (སར་པ་སྐྱོད་པོ་མཁན་པོ་) is a somewhat unusual Tibetan rendering; the Sanskrit name underlying it may have been something like Sarpaskandha or similar — the Tibetan literally means "the brahmin who despises or challenges snakes," but this is treated here as a proper name throughout the passage. The rendering "Anāthapiṇḍaka" (འཇམ་པའི་པོ་) is the standard name of the famous lay patron of the Buddha, literally "feeder of the destitute," and is kept in Sanskrit as is conventional. The phrase rendered "may I be lent out" reflects a somewhat technical Vinaya idiom concerning a monk being "released" or "lent" to fulfill a prior commitment to another patron; the Tibetan construction འཇམ་པའི་པོ་ལ་འཇམ་པའི་པོ་ is idiomatic for this.

- The phrase rendered "a clump of leaves that were not real leaves" translates a Tibetan expression meaning, literally, "a clump of what were not leaves," indicating an illusory emanation of leaf-like matter used to cover Subhāṅga's fallen body from public view — a miraculous act of compassion and discretion by the Buddha.

The phrase "did not think" spoken twice by Subhāṅga reflects the doctrinal point stated just above: arhats do not engage their supernormal perception and restraint without deliberate intention. Subhāṅga's answer acknowledges that he failed to apply mindful awareness and thus drank without recognizing the liquor for what it was. This is a significant Vinaya doctrinal point explaining why an arhat can commit an unwitting transgression.

- The passage enumerates four sensory qualities of an intoxicant in decreasing combination — color, smell, taste, and sensation — as the basis for determining the degree of culpability. The descending series is a standard Vinaya analytical technique; each step removes one quality while the offense threshold remains drinking-plus-intoxication. This is rendered faithfully without smoothing.

The term rendered "grain husks" and "grain stalks" translates sbang ma and tshigs ma respectively; these refer to the spent grain residue and the fibrous stalks or nodes left from fermentation, both of which retain enough fermentable matter to be regulated.

The final question-and-answer about Subhāṅga's past karma sets up a jātaka-style narrative explaining his paradoxical situation: wealthy yet with a name meaning merely "good-looking" or "auspicious" while living in poverty and hunger. The irony is intentional.

- The verse on karmic indestructibility is a standard formulation found across Vinaya and sūtra literature and is here rendered in a metrically natural English equivalent suitable for oral delivery.

The phrase rendered "those among his household who lived by their share of dairy food" translates a compound referring to household servants or dependents whose livelihood or portion consisted of dairy produce; the exact social referent is slightly opaque in the Tibetan, but the general sense is clear.

- The name rendered "Nyeong" (ཡེལ་མོ་གྲོ་མོ་) is a Tibetan personal name meaning something like "fault-come" or "misfortune-arrived." It functions as a narrative pun: the word the householder uttered as an insult in a past life becomes his name in subsequent existences as a hungry ghost. The translation preserves the name as a proper noun in both instances while the narrative context makes the pun self-explanatory.

The passage ends mid-sentence with the aspiration prayer incomplete, apparently continuing in the next passage. No text appears to be missing; the cut is a continuity break.

The epithet translated "brahmin youth Lama" renders བླ་མ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་, a proper name meaning "brahmin youth who is a preceptor/lama." It refers to the monk's preceptor at ordination under Kāśyapa, here being addressed in the aspiration prayer.

- The summary verse is a mnemonic colophon listing the narrative subjects of the rules in the preceding section, a standard feature of Vinaya texts. The terms rendered "entirely dark," "entirely bright," and "mixed" for karma follow the standard fourfold karmic typology of the Vinaya tradition. The phrase rendered "on the verge of attaining the highest good" is a brahminic idiom referring to the girl's imminent marriage, which would be dishonored by public contact.

- The phrase rendered "the alms of the one who was burned" translates "tshig pa'i bsod snyoms," which is somewhat cryptic here and likely refers to a specific narrative context — perhaps alms from a patron who had suffered injury or whose house had burned — that would be clear from the surrounding story. The translation renders it literally; its precise referent depends on narrative material not present in this passage.

The verse about the king afflicted by poison is a gāthā cited by Charka; it has a somewhat gnomic, proverbial character and is rendered accordingly.

- The verse passage contains a simile rendered "like a sea-monster's lair" from the Tibetan "chu srin gnas kyi dug can pa," which literally reads "one who is poisonous like the dwelling-place of a makara." The sense is that even the most venomous being, as dangerous as a makara's den, may eventually pass the moment of opportunity, whereas the Tathāgata's loving-kindness never misses its moment. This is a striking and somewhat unusual image; the rendering follows the Tibetan closely.

The phrase "snam sbyor gyi rgyal mtshan thogs pa," rendered "those who bear aloft the victory banner of the patched robe," refers to those wearing the sewn patchwork robe as a mark of the renunciant life, a standard monastic image.

- The phrase rendered "the Manadons" for མ་ན་དོན་མཁའ་ལྷ་མོ་ is uncertain. The term likely refers to a specific clan or people among whom Maudgalyāyana was born as a prince, but the identification is not entirely clear from the Tibetan alone. Some editions read this differently. The meaning conveyed — that he renounced a royal inheritance before going forth — is doctrinally secure.

The name "Bumangs" renders བུ་མང་སྐོར་, which appears to be a place-name or possibly a proper noun for a stūpa site; its exact identification is uncertain and is left transliterated.

"Nandana" is the rendering of རྒྱལ་ལྡན་འདོད་ཀྱི་སྐྱོད་ which literally means "pleasing joy"; the intended figure is almost certainly the Blessed One's half-brother Nanda, and the name "Śru" for རྒྱལ་ likely refers to the Śākya prince Śuddhodana's son by another wife, i.e., this is Nanda's lineage. This identification follows traditional commentarial understanding.

- The names Śrākāvin, Nandaka, Aniruddha, Chanda, Lāghava, Nabasa, and Cāraka are rendered from their Tibetan forms; Śrākāvin renders རྒྱལ་ལྡན་འདོད་ཀྱི་སྐྱོད་ and Cāraka renders རྒྱལ་ལྡན་. Lāghava renders རྒྱལ་ལྡན་འདོད་ཀྱི་སྐྱོད་ and Nabasa renders རྒྱལ་ལྡན་; these identifications are based on standard Vinaya lists but the Sanskrit equivalents of the lesser-known names in this sequence carry some uncertainty.

The phrase rendered "violated my person" translates རྒྱལ་ལྡན་འདོད་ཀྱི་སྐྱོད་ཀྱི་སྐྱོད་, literally "he caused separation from my youth" or "he caused me to be parted from my maidenhood," a conventional Tibetan Vinaya expression for sexual assault or molestation.

The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the fascicle boundary, which is consistent with the manuscript structure.

- The phrase rendered as "this arrow reversed" translates a metaphor that likely means the accusation or attack brought against him will be turned back; the image of the arrow being deflected or reversed is idiomatic in the narrative context.

The expression translated as "night attendants" renders a term for palace servants or chamberlains who attend through the night; the more literal sense is something like "those who sustain themselves on cream" or "dairy-provisioned ones," an idiom possibly denoting a particular class of royal household staff. This is a minor textual puzzle but does not affect the narrative.

- The queen's name, rendered here as "Phrenldanma," is a transliteration of the Tibetan Phreñ ldan ma, meaning "Garland-bearer" or "She Who Wears a Garland" — likely a rendering of a Sanskrit name such as Mālikā. The name is kept consistent in transliteration here as it appears throughout.

The phrase rendered "insolence of what kind" reflects a somewhat compressed Tibetan construction meaning "what sort of outrageous conduct" or "such extraordinary behavior." The king's tone is ironic or admiring rather than purely condemnatory.

The name "Utpala-colored" renders Tib. ut pal a'i mdog, literally "of the complexion of a blue lotus," which is a common nun's epithet or name. The names that follow are cut off in the source passage and so the translation likewise breaks off at the same point.

- The phrase rendered "cutting through the filth at the gateway of consciousness like sandalwood applied there" translates a somewhat unusual idiom involving rig pa (here in the sense of a knowing faculty or cognitive clarity), sgo nga'i sbubs (literally "the hollow of an eggshell" — here most likely a metaphor for the encrusted shell or obscuring husk of the sense-faculty gateway), and tsan dan bzhag pa lta bu (like placing or applying sandalwood). The precise image is idiomatic rather than a standard canonical formula; the translation renders the likely sense but the exact simile may be uncertain.

The list of attainments following arhatship, including the equanimity toward clay and gold and sky and the palm of the hand, is a well-known stock description found across Vinaya narrative literature.

- The deity referred to throughout as "Śiva" is rendered from the Tibetan term for the divine name "Śiva" appearing as the object of the brahmin's devotion. The Tibetan here uses "Śi ba" phonetically, clearly representing the Hindu deity Śiva. The dialogue in which "Śiva speaks" is a remarkable narrative device — Śāraka apparently ventriloquizes or supernaturally channels

Śiva's voice to confirm his own status, which is what prompts the brahmin's recognition of Śāraka's miraculous power.

The phrase "twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty sub-types of the identity view (satkāyadrṣṭi) enumerated in Abhidharma literature — the view that the self and the aggregates stand in various relations of identity or possession. Shattering this view is precisely what stream-entry accomplishes.

The passage ends mid-sentence and the translation preserves that break faithfully.

- The phrase "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the perishable collection" renders a standard Abhidharma formulation: the view of the perishable collection (satkāyadrṣṭi) has twenty subsidiary peaks corresponding to the twenty ways of misconceiving a self in relation to each of the five aggregates (either as identical with, contained in, containing, or as belonging to each). This is a standard scholastic elaboration and is rendered literally as the tradition intends it.

The reference to Śiva here and in the preceding passage is slightly unusual in that the Tibetan uses the epithet "Śiva" (zhi ba, literally "the Peaceful One") rather than the more common lha chen ("the Great God"). This is a recognized epithet of Śiva in Buddhist literature and is rendered accordingly.

- The phrase rendered as "the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty subdivisions of the view of a personal self within the perishable aggregates, a standard Abhidharma enumeration. Stream-entry is the first of the four noble fruits, at which this view is permanently abandoned. This doctrinal point is central to the passage and justifies the otherwise unusual image.

- The phrase "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty subsidiary views of self arising from the five aggregates taken in four ways each, a standard Abhidharma enumeration. The image of their being "shattered by the vajra of wisdom" at stream-entry is a classical formulation for the abandonment of the self-view at the path of seeing. This is consistent throughout both occurrences in the passage.

The brahmin's declaration of the good a spiritual friend has done — drying the ocean of blood and tears, freeing from mountains of bones — echoes classical formulations found in Pāli and Sanskrit sources comparing the suffering of saṃsāra to oceans of blood and heaps of bones, and is a standard rhetorical expression of gratitude for guidance to stream-entry.

- The title "འཇམ་དཔལ་འབྲུག་པའི་ཆེན་པོ་" is the standard Tibetan rendering of Anāthapiṇḍada, the famous lay patron of the Buddha, whose name means "feeder of the unprotected." It is left as a compound epithet-name in translation; a listener familiar with Buddhist narrative will recognize the referent.

The phrase rendered "all the household folk together" renders a deliberate ambiguity in Śāraka's speech: the brahmin understood it to mean his own household dependents, while the monk meant the entire monastic Saṅgha as guests, which the brahmin boy then unpacks. This double meaning is intrinsic to the plot.

- The name rendered "Mallikā" for མཚོ་མོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ is a standard equivalence used in this narrative cycle: མཚོ་མོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ལོ་ literally means "garlanded lady," which corresponds to the Sanskrit Mallikā (from mālā, garland). The identification is secure within this context.

- The passage describing Śāraka's miraculous interventions — sustaining the brahmin's stream of urine and making the wife's internal organs visible from outside — is rendered literally as the Tibetan states it. The latter miracle functions as a classical meditation-on-the-foul device to break the brahmin's attachment; "whatever was on her belly within appeared visible from the outside" renders the Tibetan directly. The phrase "twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty modes of the satkāyadṛṣṭi (the belief in a real self among the five aggregates), a standard enumeration in Abhidharma literature.

- The "twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" is a stock image in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya literature: the view of a substantially existing personal self (satkāyadṛṣṭi) is said to have twenty peaks corresponding to the twenty ways of grasping at the five aggregates as self or as belonging to self. The "vajra of wisdom" that shatters it is the wisdom arising at stream-entry on the path of seeing. The passage thus describes the brahmin couple attaining the first of the four fruits of the noble path.

- The phrase "the seventh brahmin's household" refers to the seventh in a sequence of households counted across the narrative. The Tibetan reads "bram ze'i khyim bdun pa gnyis ga," meaning "both of the brahmin's household, the seventh," indicating this is the seventh brahmin converted and that both husband and wife were brought to the Dharma together.

The final verse is a riddle or cryptic teaching directed at the brahmin woman: the "old rope" refers to her exhausted virtuous karma from past lives, which is running out, while the "new rope" she is neglecting to make refers to the failure to generate fresh merit or virtue in this life. The imagery is of a household implement to make the doctrinal point vivid.

- The phrase rendered as "leafless thicket" translates a term literally meaning "a thicket of what is not leaves" — that is, bare or thorny brush rather than foliage. This is a standard miraculous concealment device in the narrative literature and the rendering chosen reflects that.

The "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" is a standard Abhidharma image: the view of the transitory collection (Sanskrit satkāyadṛṣṭi) has twenty sub-forms (five aggregates each grasped in four ways as self or belonging to self), conventionally described as peaks that are destroyed upon stream-entry. This image recurs twice in the brahmin's confession speech, as in the Tibetan.

- The verse repeated twice in the Tibetan reads literally: "Wearing out the old, not producing even a little of the new, seeing one adorned with heedlessness, one weeps with a face flooded with tears." The "old" refers to the exhausted merit from the past offering, the "new" refers to fresh merit not being generated, and the "careless ease" or "heedlessness" refers to those adorned with ornaments and pleasure, oblivious to impermanence — this is the standard commentarial gloss embedded in the narrative explanation that follows.

The phrase rendered "inferior pratyekabuddhas" translates a compound meaning pratyekabuddhas of the lesser or humble type, distinguishing them from buddhas proper; the doctrinal point is that they arise in ages without a fully awakened buddha.

- The phrase rendered as "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty-fold view of a personal self in connection with the five aggregates, a standard Abhidharma enumeration. The "stream-entry" here is the first noble attainment, in which this view is permanently severed. The image of the vajra of gnosis shattering these peaks is a stock literary expression in this genre of narrative.

The passage translated as "wholehearted and sincere devotion" renders a Tibetan idiom meaning literally "from the depths of the throat," a classical expression for deep, heartfelt sincerity.

- The name "Anāthapiṇḍada" (literally "feeder of the unprotected," often spelled Anāthapiṇḍika) appears here as "khyim bdag mgon med zas sbyin," which is a Tibetan calque of the Sanskrit name; it has been rendered as the Sanskrit proper name for clarity. This figure is the well-known lay patron of the Buddha famous for his donation of the Jetavana grove in Śrāvastī. The text renders his name as a descriptive title rather than a proper name, but in context it clearly refers to this individual.

- The phrase rendered as "the twenty-peaked mountain of the view of the transitory collection" translates the technical expression for satkāyadṛṣṭi, the view that identifies a self with the five aggregates, enumerated as twenty in Abhidharma analysis (four modes of identification multiplied by five aggregates). The image of shattering this mountain-peak with the vajra of primordial wisdom is a standard Vinaya literary description of stream-entry.

The brahmin's acceptance of refuge and request for lay-practitioner status follows a stock formula for the triple-refuge and upāsaka declaration found throughout the Vinaya narratives.

- The name "Tummo Tummo" (ཏུམ་ཏུམ་) is a reduplicated form used as a proper epithet meaning "the fierce one" or "the wrathful one." The text is playing on her temperament becoming her name.

The phrase translated as "hovering in the sky spinning about like a bell swinging in a hawk" renders a somewhat compressed image; the Tibetan likely means the bell-shaped pendulum swinging of a hawk-bell or a bell suspended from a hawk, used in falconry. The exact image is a little unusual but the sense is of spinning freely in midair.

"Queen Mallika" (མའུ་ལཀི་མཚོ་) literally means "the queen who possesses a garland" and is the standard Tibetan rendering of Mallikā, the well-known queen of Prasenajit. "The younger brother of King Prasenajit" here refers to a figure otherwise identified in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya literature; the exact identity may warrant checking against parallel recensions.

- The phrase rendered as "the peak of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection — twenty peaks high — was shattered by the vajra of primordial wisdom" renders a standard Abhidharma-derived metaphor for the destruction of satkāyadṛṣṭi (the view of the transitory collection as a self). The "twenty peaks" refers to the twenty sub-views comprising satkāyadṛṣṭi in Vaibhāṣika enumeration — five aggregates each viewed as self, as belonging to self, as within self, and as containing self.

- The name ཁའི་མོན་ (Khrimön) appears embedded in the compound ཁའི་མོན་པུ་ "he said to his son," asking him to check on "your mother Khrimön." The name is transliterated as best as the Tibetan allows; it may be a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit or Prakrit proper name now uncertain.

The phrase སྐད་ཀྱི་འོད་ཀྱི་འོད་ "sat to one side" is the standard formula for respectful seating in an audience with a teacher, rendered accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "twenty mountain peaks of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty modes of self-grasping based on the five aggregates enumerated in Abhidharma literature — the standard scholastic referent here. The image of the "vajra of gnosis" shattering these peaks is a common Vinaya narrative idiom for breakthrough to stream-entry during a teaching session.

The brahmin's declaration "I have entered the stream" followed immediately by a second repetition is not an error; the doubling or tripling of such a proclamation is a recognized literary feature in these canonical narratives.

- The phrase rendered "eaters of anything and everything" translates the brahmin slur that śramaṇas are indiscriminate in what they eat, violating brahminical purity rules. Cārika's miracle turns the brahmins' own festive food and garlands into the very impure substances they accuse the śramaṇas of consuming, thus inverting the charge.

The "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" is a standard Abhidharma image: the view of a self inherent in the five aggregates generates twenty sub-views (five aggregates each considered as self, as possessing self, as within self, and as within self's possession), and realizing stream-entry uproots all of them.

- The phrase rendered "spike of secret spells" translates gsang sngags kyi phur bu, literally a "peg" or "spike" of mantra — a ritual implement used to bind and release spirit beings. The same object earlier appears in the context of the non-human being being controlled; its sudden withdrawal causes the spirit to flee. This is a tantric narrative motif and the rendering aims to preserve both the concrete and the ritual dimensions.

The verse on giving the "science" (rig pa) reflects a traditional brahminic teaching that esoteric knowledge should be transmitted only to a worthy recipient — here turned by Cāraka into an occasion to draw the brahmin toward renunciation.

- The phrase rendered "split open the hollow of the doorpost like a wedge of sandalwood" is a classical Indian simile for the penetrating quality of insight wisdom; the sandalwood wedge driven into a hollow post is a stock image in Sanskrit literary tradition for the force with which wisdom cleaves through ignorance.

The repeated formula "My births are exhausted, the holy life has been lived, the task is done, there is no knowing of another existence beyond this one" is the standard arhat's declaration of liberation, found throughout the Pāli and Sanskrit canonical literature.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, corresponding to the end of the supplied Tibetan; the translation reflects this incompleteness faithfully.

- The name rendered here as "Carka" follows the preceding passage's established convention. The Tibetan "འཇམ་མཉམ་པ་ལྷ་མོ་" is an honorific form meaning "the venerable Carka." The queen's name "Mālikā" is reconstructed from "མཚན་ལྷ་མོ་," meaning "she who wears a garland," which is the standard Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit Mālikā. The reference to a "house of lac" alludes to a well-known ancient Indian method of execution by arson, familiar from sources including the Mahābhārata.

- The queen's name rendered here as Mālyavatī follows the Tibetan Phreñ Idan ma, "she who has a garland," which corresponds to Sanskrit Mālyavatī. The text's description of the Blessed One emitting golden light and departing through the city gate before returning is a conventional narrative marker in Vinaya literature signaling an impending significant teaching. The phrase rendered "heedless of the world to come" is a standard Tibetan idiom for a person who has no concern for karmic consequences in future lives.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as it appears to be an incomplete passage. The final portion beginning with "incurs a transgression means" lists the lower realms of rebirth as the consequences of the offense, following the standard Vinaya formulaic pattern for elaborating transgressions; the passage is cut short here in the source as provided.

- The phrase rendered "the god has granted" uses the Tibetan honorific "lha" in direct address to the king as a form of royal address, not a reference to a deity; it has been rendered as "the god" following the Tibetan convention of addressing royalty with divine titles, though the context makes clear this is the queen addressing the king with a royal epithet.

The term rendered "house of lac" refers to a structure built of lacquer or resinous material, highly flammable — a reference to a well-known narrative motif in Indian literature.

- The opening phrase, rendered "deeds that are inevitably altered by conditions and arise like light shining in proximity to something," translates a compressed and somewhat difficult passage about karma. The image of light near an object is a classical simile for how karma, while not residing in any external element, nonetheless produces its effect when the appropriate conditions converge. The exact syntactic structure of the Tibetan here is slightly elliptical, and the sense has been smoothed for the listener without distortion of the doctrinal meaning.

- The Tibetan "འདྲེན་པ་ལྷ་མོ་" literally means "those with the left" but in this narrative context clearly refers to those with withered or amputated hands, consistent with the preceding passage's reference to having hands and feet cut off. The rendering "men with withered hands" captures the narrative sense.

The phrase "འཇོག་ཆས་ལྟ་བུ་" refers to hunting traps and nets; "snares and nets" is a standard rendering. The compound "འཇོག་ཆས་ལྟ་བུ་" refers to hunting gear and practices generally.

The verse is a well-known formulation also found in Pāli sources and other Āgama texts, rendered here to preserve its doctrinal force about karma's indestructibility until conditions ripen.

- The phrase rendered "king of serpents coiled in repose" translates a standard literary comparison for the cross-legged posture; the "serpent king" here likely refers to a great nāga coiled at rest, a classical simile for the seated meditation posture in Pali and Sanskrit narrative literature.

The phrase "pulling out by the collar" is a somewhat colloquial rendering of "sug pa nas drang ba," which literally means pulling or drawing someone out by the scruff or collar — an idiomatic expression for rescue from a dire situation.

The final sentence is deliberately left open, as it continues into the next passage with the remainder of the aspiration prayer.

- The name rendered as "Śārka" throughout follows the continuity of the preceding passage. The Tibetan "ཤར་ཀ་" is the consistent name used here, likely a transliteration of a Sanskrit name; "Śārka" is adopted in keeping with what has been established.

The phrase "abided like a flame" renders the Tibetan metaphor of karma persisting like a fire — meaning it continues until it exhausts its fuel at the moment of ripening; this is a standard canonical image for the inexorability of karma.

- The name rendered as "Cārka" (Tibetan: ཇར་ཀ་) is an unusual monk's name; it may represent a variant Sanskrit form. The identification is clear from context as the same monk spoken of throughout the passage.

The phrase translated as "pleased me and not caused me distress" renders a stock Tibetan formula for the Buddha's emotional response; "not caused me distress" in Tibetan literally means "not caused the mind to arise" in an adverse sense, i.e., not troubled or saddened the Teacher's mind.

- The summary verse at the beginning of the new section is a mnemonic verse listing the topics of the Vinaya rules covered in the sixty-eighth bundle. The items listed — food, dawn, needle-case, bed-leg, spreading out, cotton quilting, wool, great cloth, and the Sugata's Dharma robe — are standard rule headings and are rendered as compressed list-items in verse form as they appear in the Tibetan.

The phrase rendered "bases for accumulating merit through material things" translates a technical Vinaya term referring to the seven traditional meritorious deeds involving material offerings such as building parks, rest-houses, and the like; this is a stock list in Vinaya literature.

- The passage involves a somewhat awkward narrative detail: Ānanda has already been sent ahead to the householder's dwelling before the main group arrives, yet the householder repeatedly asks whether "noble Ānanda" has come, and Ānanda himself keeps relaying this back to the Blessed One. The most natural reading is that Ānanda went ahead, then returned to accompany the Blessed One and the monks, and the householder is awaiting Ānanda specifically as the mediating friend who had arranged the whole affair. This reading is followed in the translation.

- The phrase rendered "when the shadow had fallen to the edge of the sundial's measure" and "when the shadow had passed beyond the sundial's mark" translates a Tibetan idiom using a shadow-clock or gnomon. The first phrase indicates a particular hour had arrived; the second that it had passed. The rendering conveys the temporal sense without being overly technical.

The restoration ceremony referred to is the poṣadha, the fortnightly confessional recitation of the monastic code.

- The summary verse at the close is a mnemonic colophon listing the opening words or names of the training rules covered in this section. Such verses are standard Vinaya redactional devices and their individual terms are formulaic shorthand rather than translatable sentences; the rendering above preserves the list form as best as possible while remaining readable. "Poka" (Tibetan བོཀ་མ་) likely represents a proper name or a place-name within one of the case narratives; its precise referent is uncertain.
- The summary verse at the opening of this passage is a mnemonic enumeration of the training rules covered in the preceding section of the Vinaya, listing them by brief identifying tags. Several of these tags refer to named individuals or situations whose full narrative context has not been provided here. The rendering follows the Tibetan closely; where a tag is opaque without its full narrative, it is rendered literally. "Noruzang" renders འཕེལ་རྩེ་གྲོ་མོ་, a personal name. "Siṃhala" renders སིམ་མལ་, referring to the island of Śrī Laṅkā or its legendary figure. "The easterner" renders འབྲུག་པ་, a descriptive epithet.

The cosmological passage describing Mount Meru follows the standard Abhidharma account. The figure of one hundred and sixty thousand leagues total extent is derived by adding the eighty thousand submerged to the eighty thousand above water; the Tibetan text gives this figure as "six hundred thousand" in one reading (འབྲུག་པ་འབྲུག་པ་འབྲུག་པ་འབྲུག་པ་འབྲུག་པ་), which would be six times one hundred thousand plus twenty thousand, a figure not consistent with the simple arithmetic of the passage. The more likely intended reading is one hundred and sixty thousand leagues, consistent with standard cosmological sources; the discrepancy in the numeral is noted here as a genuine textual uncertainty.

- The two nāga kings Nanda and Upananda appear here as they do elsewhere in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya cycle; their names mean Joy and Near-Joy respectively, though the text uses them as proper names and no gloss is needed in context.

The epithet Suparṇa for Garuḍa literally means "fine-feathered" and is here rendered by its descriptive equivalent "king of the winged ones" since the Sanskrit proper name is more recognizable to listeners than the Tibetan rendering; a note is included for transparency.

- The epithet "rig pa dang zabs su ldan pa" rendered as "endowed with knowledge and conduct" follows the standard Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit vidyācaraṇasaṃpanna, one of the ten epithets of a buddha: "accomplished in knowledge and conduct." The passage breaks off mid-sentence as the Tibetan provided ends there.

The term "sa 'dzin pa" ("lord/holder of the earth") in the context of nāgas refers to their domain as earth-dwelling or earth-holding sovereigns, a recognized nāga epithet; rendered accordingly.

"Nandaka and Upanandaka" (dga' bo and nye dga') are the standard Tibetan equivalents; the Sanskrit forms are used here for consistency with the tradition.

- The phrase rendered "the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" translates a stock Abhidharma image: the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadṛṣṭi) comprises twenty sub-views regarding the five aggregates (each aggregate taken as self, as possessing self, as within self, or as self within it), and stream-entry destroys them entirely. This is standard across the Pāli and Sanskritic scholastic traditions.

The phrase "the trace of nirvāṇa" renders "mya ngan 'das pa'i shul," literally "the trail or path of nirvāṇa," meaning the initial approach to or foretaste of nirvāṇa attained at stream-entry — a conventional expression for the fruit of the first path.

- The names "Priya" and "Apriya" (Tibetan: dga' bo and nye dga') present a slight irregularity: dga' bo is straightforwardly "Priya" (beloved/happy), but nye dga' would more literally be "Apriya" only if taken as a compound meaning something like "the close-happy-one" or "Upananda." In the later sentence the text identifies them with two nāga kings; the second name may correspond to Nanda and Upananda or similar pairs known from other sources. This is noted here as contextually significant but the names are rendered by their functional Tibetan meaning pending the continuation of the text, which will clarify the nāga identifications.

The phrase rendered "renounced goods of the young prince's household" and "renounced goods of the queen's retinue" translates yongs su spang ba — literally "the complete relinquishments" or "the surrendered possessions" — referring to the property given up upon going forth; this is a technical Vinaya usage.

- The term rendered "attendant of impure rank" translates a phrase indicating someone of low or impure social status sent ahead as a scout — the precise social category is contextually clear though the exact term is conventional. The epithet "Suparṇa, king of birds with wings adorned with fine feathers" renders the name Suparṇa (a class of mythical golden-winged birds, equivalent to Garuḍa) along with the meaning embedded in the Tibetan form of the name. The phrase about being "unable to be dislodged" reflects the karmic merit of the nāga kings' donation conferring secure tenure for a full cosmic aeon.

- The phrase rendered "retinues who sustained themselves on dairy provisions" translates a term referring literally to beings who live on curds or dairy products — likely a category of nāga attendants or minor beings classified by their mode of sustenance. The exact nature of this class is not further specified in the text.

- The passage contains a small but notable doctrinal point: the Blessed One explicitly attributes the miracle entirely to Mahāmaudgalyāyana rather than to himself, which is a recurrent sūtra motif affirming the genuine attainments of chief disciples. The sentence at the end is deliberately left open as it continues into the next passage.

- The nāga king's name rendered throughout as Nandaka and his companion as Upanandaka, consistent with the Tibetan dga' bo and nye dga' respectively. These are standard Indic names meaning "Joyful" and "Near-Joyful," and the rendering keeps the Sanskrit forms for consistency with the rest of the text's conventions.

[illegible]

- The phrase rendered as "the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty sub-views comprising the satkāya-dr̥ṣṭi, the view of the self in relation to the five aggregates taken four ways each. This is a standard Abhidharma enumeration, and the image of the vajra of wisdom shattering these twenty peaks is a classical description of stream-entry. The "fruit of stream-entry" renders the standard term for the first of the four fruits of the śrāvaka path.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the passage; the translation follows the Tibetan as given. The name Rdzu-'phrul-len is rendered in meaning as "Miracle-Taker" throughout, following the text's own explanation of why the name was chosen. The eight-nurse scheme is a conventional Indian royal birth narrative found elsewhere in Buddhist canonical literature. Kāravāra is a flowering tree whose garlands in this context are a mark of condemnation, signaling that the condemned is being led to execution.

- The name rendered "Bad Supriya" translates the Tibetan རྒྱུ་སྤྲུལ་གྱི་སྤྲུལ་སྤྲུལ་, literally "Wretched Supriya" or "Bad Supriya" — a play on his name Supriya (Tibetan སྤྲུལ་སྤྲུལ་, meaning "Good-Gift" or "Supriya"), now prefixed with རྒྱུ་ ("bad/wretched") because of the poor quality of his gifts. The irony is intentional and the translation preserves it.

The name Kālaprabha is reconstructed from the Tibetan ཀལ་པ་ཤལ་པ་, where ཀལ་ corresponds to kāla (time) and པ་ཤལ་ to prabha or possibly mānin; slight uncertainty remains on the Sanskrit form, but Kālaprabha is the most natural reconstruction.

- The list of throne furnishings is rendered interpretively in several places where the Tibetan terms describe specific textile and cushion types whose exact technical meanings are uncertain. The renderings given reflect reasonable contextual sense. The term rendered "Kautamba cloth" is a tentative identification of the Tibetan transliteration. The phrase "came to the Jambu Grove" renders a reference to Jambudvīpa; here it appears to refer to a specific grove or meeting-place rather than the continent as a whole, which is a genuinely uncertain reading. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source and the translation follows accordingly.
- The passage is a cumulative, ascending series comparing the merit of giving to progressively more advanced recipients on the noble path: those entering for stream-entry, stream-enterers, those entering for once-returning, once-returners, those entering for non-returning, non-returners, and those entering for arhatship. Each step outweighs the entire accumulated list of previous steps. The final sentence of the passage breaks off mid-series, consistent with the supplied excerpt ending before its conclusion. The four pairs of path-enterers and fruit-attainers correspond to the standard Theravāda and Abhidharma taxonomy of the eight noble persons (āryapudgala).
- The phrase rendered "ascetics who are non-Buddhists seeking sensual pleasure yet free from attachment" translates the Tibetan for tīrthika ṛṣis who desire sensual pleasure but are without attachment — a recognized category in the text's graduated hierarchy of merit fields, denoting non-Buddhist contemplatives who, while nominally dwelling among sense pleasures, have achieved a degree of dispassion. The "pleasure garden" is the standard rendering of the Tibetan term for a park or garden donated for the use of the Saṅgha, equivalent to Sanskrit ārāma.
- The passage is a cumulative enumeration characteristic of Āgama-style sūtra literature, in which each new act of giving is shown to surpass the preceding list in merit, with the list growing longer at each step. The furnishings listed — thrones, chairs, cushioned seats with inner padding, bolsters, coverlets, and blankets — represent standard items of monastic requisite offering found in corresponding Pāli parallels. The "permanent endowment of offerings appropriate to the occasion" renders རྒྱུ་རྐྱེད་སྤྲོད་པའི་སྨོན་ལམ་གྱི་བློ་བཟང་ཆོས་ཀྱི་སྦྲེག་པའི་སྨོན་ལམ་། indicating a standing or perpetual provision of seasonal or occasion-specific requisites for the temple. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, consistent with the passage having been supplied as a continuation excerpt.
- The name rendered here as "Citta (Supriya)" translates the Tibetan "ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ཕྱི་མོ་" (Ngan pa bzang byin), a Tibetan rendering that likely corresponds to the Sanskrit name Citta or a related householder figure. The second element "bzang byin" suggests "well-given" or "Supriya/Subhadra" type. The identification is uncertain; the passage may refer to a different named householder than the famous Citta of Macchikāsaṇḍa. This should be verified against the Sanskrit or Pali parallel if available.

The term "འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་" rendered as "irons" or "being clapped in irons" is a form of punishment or restraint; the precise nature is somewhat uncertain but clearly a form of punitive confinement or physical restraint akin to stocks or shackles.

- The passage contains a conspicuous inversion in the court-tier description: wicked persons are said to be placed "at the bottom" and yet the sentence concludes with them placed "on the upper tier." The Tibetan is internally contradictory here, most likely due to a scribal error in which the logic of the three-tiered court system has been scrambled in transmission; the preceding passage established that the lowest tier held persons of bad character, so the final clause placing them on the upper tier appears to be a corruption.

The term rendered "grain-pension retainers" translates a compound meaning those whose livelihood consists in the king's salary or grain allotment — essentially royal officers or soldiers paid in kind.

"Kauśika" is a standard Vedic epithet of Indra, used here in the householder's address to Śakra.

"Mī-mje" rendered as "the Brahma world" follows the standard identification of this term with the Pure Abode or Brahmā's realm; "its lord Brahmā" is standard.

- The passage ends mid-sentence, breaking off at the final repetition of the fire simile. This is a continuation into the next passage and the abrupt ending reflects the source text as supplied.

The phrase rendered "palace courtyard" translates the Tibetan term for the inner royal compound or forecourt; the precise architectural referent is a conventional royal setting in the sūtra narrative.

- The Tibetan "བླ་མ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་" literally means "Brahmā, lord of Akaṇiṣṭha," which is an unusual collocation; in some Pāli and Sanskrit parallels Brahmā is lord of the Brahma-world, but the Tibetan text here specifies the Akaṇiṣṭha realm. This is rendered as given without emendation.

The term "འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་" is a vocative epithet for Śakra derived from Sanskrit Kauśika, a name of Indra; it is rendered accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "man of impure standing" translates a term meaning someone of low or unclean status, likely a low-caste or outcast individual. The social dynamic here contrasts the proud kṣatriya king who will not enter until he knows the scene with the ritually impure go-between he employs.

The passage contains a slight grammatical awkwardness in the Tibetan where the narrative shifts from first-person recollection back into third-person narration after the king grants the boon. This is a common feature of sūtra narrative embedding and has been rendered accordingly without marking the shift explicitly.

- The creature names "tremabukas" and "trailatākas" are transliterations of the Tibetan phonetic renderings "འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་" and "འཇམ་མཐོན་པོ་" and likely correspond to Sanskrit animal or supernatural creature names that are difficult to identify with certainty. They appear to be some kind of threatening creatures sent by the deity. The transliteration is preserved as the most honest rendering given the uncertainty.

The passage about the nāga kings Nanda and Upananda appears as a question from the king, though the Tibetan syntax is slightly ambiguous — it may be the narrator's framing rather than a direct quotation. The rendering as part of the king's confused inquiry is the most natural reading in context.

- The phrase rendered "open the four great seals" translates "che bzhi 'byed pa," a legal or forensic idiom meaning to break open sealed documents or official records, i.e., to tamper with or falsify legal evidence. The context makes clear these thieves want Śīlavaṇij to bear false witness or to forge records in order to implicate Saṃdhaka. This technical term has no single transparent English equivalent, so it is rendered literally throughout to preserve consistency.

The name "Kṛṣṇa" for the prince is the literal translation of "rGyal bu nag po" (Black Prince), but in this Vinaya narrative context it functions as a proper name and is rendered as Kṛṣṇa accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "left-handed men of the last month of autumn" translates a somewhat opaque Tibetan idiom for criminals or bandits associated with that season; the exact socio-legal term is uncertain, but the context makes clear these are threatening brigands. Some editions may read this differently.

The "four seals" in this commercial-legal context likely refers to sealed documents or formal arbitration records used in trade disputes, not the philosophical "four seals" of Buddhist doctrine. The exact legal procedure is unclear but the narrative sense is plain.

- The verse contains three named exemplars but is said to list "four things" that are exceedingly difficult. The fourth item is not explicitly named in the verse as transmitted, which may reflect a textual lacuna or an implicit fourth quality (perhaps patience, named first). This is a genuine structural anomaly worth noting for editorial attention.

The name rendered "Śārka" is a provisional reading of རྩ་རྩ་ (Charka/Śārka); this is an unusual name and the Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain.

- The Tibetan text here alternates between two monks: Śāriputra (Śāradvatīputra is a separate person, also rendered as Śāradvatiputra in the preceding passage provided; however, in this passage the Tibetan uses Śāriputra's name first and then introduces the distinct character referred to as རྩ་རྩ་འཇུག་པོ་, rendered Śāradvatiputra in the preceding translation). Strictly speaking, རྩ་རྩ་འཇུག་པོ་ is not Śāradvatiputra but rather a different monk whose name, rendered from the Tibetan phonetic form རྩ་རྩ་, likely corresponds to Sanskrit Carka or a similar name not identical to Śāradvatiputra. Because the preceding translation supplied renders him as "Śāradvatiputra," consistency has been maintained here, but this identification should be verified against the Sanskrit or Pali parallel texts.

The term རྩ་རྩ་ in Śāradvatiputra's angry speech literally means "beggar" or "pauper" and refers insultingly to the king; it has been rendered as "fat beggar" following the fuller Tibetan phrase རྩ་རྩ་ཆུང་ཆུང་ ("big-bellied"), conveying the contemptuous tone.

- The "group of six" refers to the notorious group of six monks (ṣaṭvargika bhikṣus) who appear throughout the Vinaya as exemplars of misconduct. This identity is implied by the Tibetan "drug sde" and would be recognized by any traditional listener.

The phrase rendered "those counted as jewels" translates "rin po cher smos pa," meaning things designated or reckoned as precious — a standard Vinaya category covering items of high value that are not strictly gemstones.

The passage shifts between the ongoing narrative and a direct quotation of the Blessed One's teaching on the ten dangers of visiting a royal palace; the text breaks off mid-enumeration at the fifth danger, which is where the supplied Tibetan ends.

- The phrase rendered "before valuables or things reckoned as valuables have been collected" follows Vinaya technical usage for the pre-dawn period in which a royal palace's gates are officially secured; the precise referent of the valuables clause is a matter of Vinaya commentarial discussion, but the translation follows the plain sense of the Tibetan. The city name རྩ་པ་ (Campā) is a Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit Campā, a well-known city of ancient Aṅga; the identification is standard.

- The name rendered "Moonlight" translates the Tibetan Zla 'od. "Elevated Body" translates Lus 'phags ma. "Tsongphudchen" is a Tibetan name meaning "one with a crest-tuft," likely standing for a Sanskrit name now uncertain. The king "Bimbasāra" is the standard identification for the Magadha ruler described here as Gzugs can snying po, a Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit name Bimbisāra; "Bimbasāra" is used here to maintain consistency with the standard historical identification. "Varṣatūla" is a tentative reconstruction of the Brahmin's name Dbyar tshul; the exact Sanskrit original is uncertain. "Śraghoṣa" renders Sgra sgrogs, a city-name that appears in several Vinaya narrative contexts.

- The epithet "resounding city" renders the Tibetan term for Śrāvastī here used as a descriptive phrase meaning "city of proclamation" or "city whose fame resounds," consistent with one standard etymology given for the name Śrāvastī in Indo-Tibetan commentarial tradition. The five qualities of the jewel armor are listed in standard formulaic fashion; "difficult to pierce" and "difficult to cut" are the most natural renderings of the pair, though some versions distinguish "sword-resistant" and "arrow-resistant" more specifically.
- The brahmin's name renders the Tibetan dbyar tshul gyis, which appears to be a translation of the Sanskrit name Varṣatula or Varṣatulya. This reading is consistent with parallel versions of this narrative known from other sources, though the Tibetan here is grammatically ambiguous between a name and a descriptive phrase.
- The two verses present some interpretive choices. The phrase rendered "a house of mud" translates a Tibetan term for a muddy or boggy dwelling, likely corresponding to a standard Sanskrit simile of an elephant stuck in mud straining to escape — emblematic of vigorous effort to break free from saṃsāra. The verse ending "make an end of suffering at last" renders the sense that this will be the practitioner's final birth.

The opening of this section names the king as Bimbisāra (Tibetan: Gzugs can snying po), consistent with the preceding passage's reference to "the king."

- The phrase rendered "the fortunate charioteer" translates "skal ldan shing rta pa," which may refer to a specific geographical or narrative detail — possibly indicating a place name or a figure associated with the story's locale near the Śākya homeland. The exact referent is uncertain, but the literal rendering is retained since no clearer identification is available from the text alone.
- The phrase rendered "twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty subsidiary views of self derived from the five aggregates taken in four ways each, a standard Abhidharma enumeration. This is a fixed doctrinal technical expression and is rendered literally as the text presents it.
- The phrase rendered "fine-cushioned seats" translates a term for seats with pure or refined inner filling; the exact furnishing terminology is somewhat opaque but the general sense of comfortable, well-appointed seating is clear. The list of furnishings — thrones, smaller thrones, cushioned seats, footrests, footstools, and round cushions — follows what appears to be a standard formulaic inventory in Vinaya literature.
- The names Rgyal and Karrgyal render Tibetan རྒྱལ་ཁོང་ལྷོ་ཁོང་།. The city name རྒྱལ་ཁོང་ལྷོ་ཁོང་། is likely a translation of a Sanskrit toponym meaning "resounding" or "loud-cried" — possibly Śroṇā or a similar name. This is uncertain and may warrant further philological investigation.

The phrase རྒྱལ་ཁོང་ལྷོ་ཁོང་། ("the fivefold wheel of cyclic existence") is a somewhat unusual formulation. It likely refers to the five-spoked wheel of existence corresponding to the five classes of beings, or possibly the five aggregates as the basis of cyclic existence. The exact referent is not entirely certain from context alone.

- The city referred to as Śrāvastī in the phrase "women dwelling in the city of Śrāvastī" is the same city rendered as "Śrāvastī" throughout, but it is paired here with Uttarayana's city as the destination of Rimā's teaching mission. The Tibetan "ལྷོ་ཁོང་ལྷོ་ཁོང་།" literally means "in the place called Śrāvastī" or "in the city of the sound," which is a phonetic rendering of Śrāvastī.

The pairing of "King Uttarayana's retinue" and "women dwelling in Śrāvastī" is preserved as in the Tibetan.

The term "ཁོ་ལོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" (rendered "pillows") may refer to a round cushion or bolster; the exact furniture item is uncertain, but the general sense of bedding furnishings is clear.

- The phrase rendered "former dwelling" translates a term meaning something like "one's customary or full physical state or appearance." The divine daughter's thought seems to be that she should not present herself in the divine form she now has while going to see the Blessed One, rather than appearing before him in her transformation — though the syntax is compressed and the exact sense is genuinely debated. The translation follows the more standard reading that she resolved to go without any pretense or formal ceremonial arrangement, approaching the Blessed One simply and directly.
- The phrase rendered "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the standard Abhidharma enumeration of twenty varieties of the view of a self grounded in the five aggregates taken as "mine" or "I," which constitute the summit of afflicted view that stream-entry definitively uproots. The vajra of wisdom shattering these peaks is a conventional metaphor for the irreversible insight of the path of seeing.

The closing line "King Udayana reflected:" represents the passage breaking off mid-sentence in the source text as given; the reflection itself presumably continues in the next passage.

- The bird name rendered "śaṅgaśateka" (Tibetan: shang shang te'u) is a semi-mythical Indian bird, sometimes identified with a type of partridge or a legendary singing bird; its precise species is uncertain in the sources, and it is kept here in a transliterated form rather than guessed at. The two minister names Heruka and Bhiruka are kept as they appear in the Tibetan, as they function here as personal names rather than the tantric deity Heruka.
- The phrase rendered as "birth ripe for taming" (gdulbai skyes Ita bu gzhan med) is a slightly compressed expression; it means there is no birth quite like that of one who is ready to be tamed or disciplined by the Tathāgata. The sense is that the Tathāgata's "birth" — or, in context, his arising in the world — finds its fullest expression in meeting those who are ripe for guidance.
- The phrase rendered "covering over his bodily form" in the fourth line of the first verse translates a Tibetan expression meaning the Buddha's intention or will clothed or concealed Udayana's royal form, replacing it with monastic appearance. This is a well-attested motif of the "Come, monk" ordination (ehi-bhikṣu) in which the ordinand is transformed instantaneously by the Tathāgata's blessing.

The epithet "Bimbisāra" (བིམ་བིས་ཤཱ་ར་) is the Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit name and means literally "essence of form"; it is used consistently for the king of Magadha throughout this narrative.

The line rendered "tamed by something not yet attained, as a yoke-post tames an ox" is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan. The sense is that an untamed person living off others' food is brought to taming through what he has not yet realized or achieved — the implication being that alms-seeking and monastic poverty are the instrument of taming, just as a tethering post brings an ox under control.

- The line "these ten tens of a king" renders a metrically compact expression about the tenfold powers or qualities of a king. The precise referent is a formulaic enumeration that likely catalogues royal virtues in tens; the Tibetan as it stands is somewhat elliptical, and this rendering preserves the sense without over-specifying.

The deity described as "Śiva the Destroyer" renders a compound: the Tibetan "mun byed" (Darkness-Maker or Destroyer) is paired with "sgra ngan" (Ill-Omen or Evil Sound) and "skya seng bu" (the Grey Lion-Cub, a kenning for Śiva). This cluster of epithets in the context of Viṣṇu (Kṣitigarbha, here "Khyab 'jug," meaning Viṣṇu) points clearly to Śiva as the second deity named. The rendering consolidates these epithets into a readable epithet cluster.

The name "King Tufthead" renders "rgyal po gtsug pud can," which means literally "the king who has a topknot" or "tufted-head king." This is Udrayana's own adversarial king or successor figure within the narrative.

- The verse "the one who does not kill such a man will be killed instead" is a deliberately ironic formulation placed in the mouths of the corrupt ministers to justify removing the righteous ones; the Tibetan phrasing is terse and slightly ambiguous but this reading is consistent with the narrative context.

The final sentence is left as an em-dash because the Tibetan breaks off mid-utterance, indicating the passage continues; this is not a translation uncertainty but a genuine textual break at the passage boundary.

- The verse "let him be used to increase one's store of earth" renders a Tibetan idiom meaning effectively "bury him" or "let him become earth" — that is, let him be killed and his body returned to the ground. The phrase sa phung 'phel ba nyid du bya is somewhat idiomatic, and the rendering chosen conveys the sense without distorting the political-violence context.
- The phrase rendered "Gora having been killed" reflects a proper name that appears in the preceding narrative context; the Tibetan here reads simply "he" but the referent is the individual whose execution was under discussion.

The verse about karma is a standard gāthā formula found across several Vinaya narrative cycles; the rendering follows the parallelism of the Tibetan closely.

The final four-line exchange between Uttarayana and the executioners is metrically and syntactically compressed; the phrase rendered "supreme and evident thing" translates a term meaning something like "the noble actual matter that is clearly examined," and the rendering follows the most natural doctrinal reading. The last couplet spoken by the executioners appears to be a riddling hint that the king's demise — or some decisive event — is imminent.

- The phrase "the fivefold wheel of saṃsāra, both its stirring and its stillness" renders a somewhat compressed Tibetan construction. The "fivefold wheel" likely refers to the five aggregates as the basis of cyclic existence; the commentarial tradition identifies this as insight into the five groups of existence as the mechanism of saṃsāra.

The verse spoken by Utraya upon attaining arhatship contains a deliberate irony: he has achieved inner liberation from all bondage yet remains subject to the external law of the king — a pointed contrast between spiritual freedom and worldly constraint that the text clearly intends.

The string of three knowledges, superknowledges, and discriminating awarenesses is a standard arhat attainment formula; the rendering follows the doctrinal sequence without elaboration, as the terms are transparent within their context.

- The long list of hells names follows a recognizable Abhidharmic schema of the eight hot hells and the series of cold hells (the "cracked" hells named after lotus flowers). Some of the individual names in the cold-hell sequence are rendered by standard Tibetan equivalents; the mapping is conventional and unambiguous.

The two verses at the close are attributed in the tradition to the standard formulation that the Blessed One's smile-rays carry Dharma proclamations to the heavens; the second verse is a well-known gāthā also found in the Dhammapada (verse 327), here rendered in that spirit.

- The royal epithet translated as "King Kṣudrapada" renders རྒྱུ་ལྔ་པ་པད་པ་, literally "one with a topknot." This appears to be a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit royal name; the exact Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain, and "Kṣudrapada" is a provisional reconstruction based on context within the broader narrative tradition of this sūtra.

The phrase rendered "fingers white as conch shells" describes the Buddha's not displaying a smile by revealing teeth or fingers — the image is of the characteristic whiteness of his hands, a traditional mark of a great being.

The city name rendered here as Rājagraha represents རྡ་གྲམ་གྲམ་ཁ་, which literally means "the city where sound resounds" — a Tibetan gloss-rendering of Rājagṛha rather than the standard transliteration used elsewhere in the canon. The translation normalizes this to Rājagraha for consistency.

- The names Rgyal and Skar-rgyal appear to be Tibetan names of two individuals (possibly monks or religious figures whose stūpas stand in the narrative location). They are left transliterated as no Sanskrit equivalents are apparent from context. The names Heruka and Bhiruka here are used as personal names of ministers, not as tantric deity names; they are rendered as given.

The phrase rendered "eat the meat" more literally reads "take the piece of meat"; the sense is that the trained cats are being made to perform a circuit of the stūpa and then retreat to their holes as a staged deception, likely to discredit the stūpas or their associated figures. This is a genuine narrative crux but does not affect doctrinal content.

- The epithet རྩ་ཏོག་གྲོག་པོ་, rendered throughout as "Crest-Topknot," literally means "one who has a top-knot at the crown," a royal or divine mark; this is the king's name in the narrative.

The two arhats named རྡ་ཏུ་ལྷ་ and རྡ་ཏུ་ལྷ་པོ་ are rendered as Jaya ("Victory") and Kārtikeyajaya ("Victory of Kārttikeya"), following the most natural Sanskrit reconstruction of these Tibetan names in this narrative context; the exact Sanskrit equivalents are not entirely certain from the Tibetan alone.

The phrase རྡ་ཏུ་ལྷ་པོ་ལྷ་པོ་ refers to the cats residing at the stūpas built in honor of the two arhats, a detail that makes sense in context: shrines had apparently been erected for them after their nirvāṇa.

- The epithet "Śikhin" for the king is here consistently rendered as "King Śikhin" following the preceding passage's rendering. The name appears in Tibetan as རྩ་ཏོག་གྲོག་པོ་, meaning literally "one with a topknot" or "crested one," which is indeed Śikhin.

The phrase rendered "Śakra's goddess Gaśed and Gegtsen" translates རྡ་ཏུ་ལྷ་པོ་ལྷ་པོ་. The names Gaśed and Gegtsen appear to be divine consorts or female deities visited by the king; these are transliterated as they appear without clear Sanskrit equivalents in context.

The final phrase, rendered "this parricide," translates རྡ་ཏུ་ལྷ་པོ་ — literally "this one who killed his father" — a serious accusation the corrupt ministers level obliquely at the king himself, which adds dramatic irony to the passage.

- The phrase rendered "the Crest-Knot" translates a Tibetan term that appears to be a nickname or epithet for King Śikhin referring to his topknot or crest of hair. The passage is from the Vinayavibhaṅga, fascicle seventy-two, as indicated by the chapter marker in the source. The name Bhiruka is an unusual form; it may be a Tibetan phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit name and is kept as found. The words "a rain of earth" on the seventh day are doctrinally significant: earth burying the city is the karmic consequence specifically tied to the crime of burying the ascetic under earth, making the sequence a carefully structured teaching on karma matching deed to fruit.

- The corrupt ministers' speech about "seven heights of hailstones falling north" is somewhat obscure; the Tibetan reads literally "north of me, seven sky-heights of hail-rain fell," which appears to be a rhetorical dismissal designed to trivialize Kātyāyana's prophecy — implying the violent weather was somewhere else — while simultaneously hyping the miraculous rains. The translation renders the sense as best as can be determined from context.

The names Heruka and Bhiruka here are personal names of ministers, not the tantric deity Heruka; the text treats them as such throughout.

- The phrase rendered "threshing ground" translates a term that in context clearly denotes a field or granary-floor where grain is stored or processed. The repeated "Bhiruka's Fort, Bhiruka's Fort" in the opening mirrors the Tibetan's doubled name, which appears to be a textual peculiarity preserving an emphatic formula or scribal convention.

The bowl-and-window episode is a divination-like omen: Mahā-Kātyāyana uses the alms bowl to gauge whether any meritorious domain remains in the city before deciding to depart. The half-filled bowl signals partial remaining merit; the instantly brim-full bowl signals complete exhaustion of merit, hence the city's imminent destruction.

The final sentence is somewhat compressed and syntactically difficult in the Tibetan; the translation renders the most coherent reading, namely that the man petitions the village assembly to enthrone his eldest son, pledging his own life as surety or collateral.

- The phrase rendered "unleashed a fear-terror" translates a verb meaning to expel or drive out with force together with an implied sense of mass panic and destruction; the construction indicates the goddess caused a sudden terrifying event that resulted in mass death, which the context confirms.

The "tent-like canopy" rendering reflects the Tibetan term for an umbrella-shaped or tent-like covering, here used to describe how the bowl was enshrined. The commentarial tradition associates this with the origin of a particular festival name tied to the begging bowl.

- The phrase rendered "the mountain of the view of the perishable collection twenty peaks high" refers to the twenty varieties of the satkāyadṛṣṭi (the view of the transitory collection as a self or as belonging to a self), a standard Abhidharma enumeration: five aggregates each viewed in four ways as self or self's possession, yielding twenty sub-views. The image of the vajra of gnosis shattering this peak at stream-entry is a classical doctrinal illustration.

The place name "Bogkā" is a transliteration of the Tibetan བོག་ཀ་; the location has not been securely identified in the Indic sources.

- The name "Topknot King" renders རྒྱལ་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་མ་པོ་ literally; the Tibetan is a descriptive epithet. The land name སུམ་ཁུ་ is rendered as Sindhu, corresponding to the Sindh region. The two ministers' names Heruka and Bhiruka are transliterations of the Tibetan phonetics and may represent Indic names not yet precisely identified in the parallel Sanskrit sources. The phrase རྒྱལ་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷོ་མ་པོ་, rendered "abiding like a flame," is a standard karmic doctrine metaphor indicating that karma persists without being depleted until its conditions ripen, like a lamp flame that burns steadily.

- The verse at the opening is a well-known canonical stanza on karma's inevitability, appearing in several Āgama and Vinaya contexts. The rendering follows its standard doctrinal sense.

The phrase rendered "fields of merit for the world" translates a term meaning those in whom the world should plant merit through offerings, a standard Buddhist technical concept.

The expression rendered "granting a straight departure by hand" is an idiom whose precise nuance is uncertain: it likely means the solitary buddha intended to receive him, guide him, or offer him a graceful way out of his situation, rather than any physical act. This is noted as a genuinely difficult phrase.

- The phrase rendered "overpowered by the poison of jealousy" translates "dog sas non par gyur" — literally "overcome or oppressed by the poison of jealousy/envy." The term "dog pa" (jealousy/envy, Skt. īrṣyā) is standard; the "poison" metaphor is in the text.

The final sentence is an incomplete clause in the Tibetan as transmitted here, ending mid-thought with "remained close by, like light itself." This is clearly the opening of a new narrative section that continues beyond the passage given; no content has been supplied or invented.

- The verse embedded in the prose is a well-known canonical stanza on the inexorability of karma, widely cited across Pali and Sanskrit sources. The rendering preserves its doctrinal force without technical intrusion.
- The name rendered "Suvarṇaśreṣṭhin" is a reconstruction: the Tibetan reads "Nor bzang" (literally "Good Wealth" or "Fine Wealth"), but the subsequent narrative — where the king detects gold by sonic resonance and the man acquires the epithet "Ghoṣavān" (Tibetan gdangs can, "resonant one") — makes clear that the underlying Sanskrit name must relate to gold (suvarṇa) and a merchant title (śreṣṭhin). The epithet Ghoṣavān is explicitly explained in the text itself.

The name "King Śarpa" transliterates the Tibetan rgyal po shar pa; the underlying Sanskrit is uncertain. It may represent a proper name or a title meaning something like "the Eastern King." This is noted because it is not a standard attested name in parallel Sanskrit sources readily to hand.

- The phrase rendered "terrорize him" or "threaten him with fear" translates a term meaning to intimidate or frighten, without actually carrying out the execution — which sets up the narrative turn that follows. The instruction is covert, contrasting with the public death sentence just pronounced, and the distinction is doctrinally significant for the story's moral about a ruler who, despite court pressure, cannot bring himself to destroy a virtuous man.
- The passage mentions "blue-green direction" in connection with a tree: the Tibetan gling ma sngon po refers to a direction marked by a blue or green color, likely indicating the eastern or northern quarter in traditional Indian cosmological color-direction symbolism. The precise directional correspondence is not entirely certain from context alone, though the detail appears to be simply a vivid landmark description rather than a technical cosmological reference.
- The name Anāthapiṇḍada, meaning "giver of food to the destitute," is a well-known epithet of the great lay patron Sudatta of Śrāvastī. The text uses it consistently as the householder's name or title, and it has been rendered as such throughout.
- The term rendered "restoration ceremony with its eight limbs" is the eightfold poṣadha (uposatha) observance, a lay precept ceremony held on lunar observance days, here specifically the aṣṭāṅgaśīla form. The phrase "gave poor food" translates "ngam pa byin," meaning food of inferior quality, in contrast to the "excellent food" (zas bsod pa) given to others. The name Anāthapiṇḍada means "giver of food to the protectorless" and is here rendered literally consistent with its Tibetan translation mgon med zas sbyin throughout.
- The phrase rendered "lord of the eastern region, Bhadra the king of fragrant earth" is a translation of "འཕགས་པའི་ལྷོ་ཁོང་གི་རྒྱལ་པོ།," literally "king of Bhadra-earth, the eastern one." This is a reference to a regional ruler in the Kauśāmbī area, and the exact identification of "འཕགས་པོ།" (Bhadra-soil or fragrant earth) as a place-name is uncertain; it may be a rendering of a Sanskrit toponym not easily recoverable here.

The phrase "spend the rains retreat here this very night" renders "雨夜の静寂をここに一夜を過ごす," which literally means something like "pass the night of the rains retreat." The expression is slightly compressed in the Tibetan, but the sense is that Gāndika is inviting the sages to observe the full rains retreat at his home before continuing to Śrāvastī.

- The phrase rendered "comes accompanied by a birth" translates a grammatically compressed passage indicating that Anāthapiṇḍada arrives with a particular auspicious birth-quality or rebirth-connection relevant to the Tathāgata's dispensation. The doctrinal sense is that his capacity for being tamed and his karmic connection to the Buddha is a uniquely fitting one, like that of a principal disciple. The phrasing in the source is elliptical and the precise nuance is slightly uncertain, but the general meaning is clear within the narrative context.

The passage ends mid-sentence, describing the miraculous transformation of the five hundred seers into monks at the moment of ordination by the Blessed One's utterance — a standard literary motif in Vinaya narratives.

- The name rendered as Dāṅgcan is a transliteration of the Tibetan དང་མཚན་པོ་; the Sanskrit equivalent is not given in the text. It likely corresponds to a Sanskrit name meaning something like "one endowed with melody" or a similar quality, but the specific Sanskrit is not recoverable from the Tibetan alone.

The phrase rendered as "the gods of the faculties and of the lesser faculties" translates རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྷ་མོ་དང་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་, referring to classes of deities associated with the sense faculties; the precise mythological identification varies across sources.

- The name rendered as "Mahākudraka" corresponds to Tibetan "skul byed chen po" — literally "the Great Encourager" or "the Great Exhorter." This appears to be a monk otherwise known in some sources as Mahākudraka or a similar figure; the precise Sanskrit reconstruction is not entirely secure from this text alone, and the name has been retained in its Tibetan semantic rendering in the translation rather than invented in Sanskrit.

- The phrase rendered "resting stages" translates a term for overnight or waystation stops along a royal progress; the text uses the analogy of a wheel-turning king's travel protocol to set the physical scale of the journey, with resting places every ten leagues.

The epithets of the four great kings — Dhṛtarāṣṭra, Virūpākṣa, and Vaiśravaṇa — appear here as lords of their respective supernatural retinues. Virūpākṣa, literally "ill-eyed" or "of deformed eyes," is the guardian king of the nāgas in the classical Buddhist cosmological scheme; the gloss is supplied for listener clarity.

Vemacitrin is the traditional name of the lord of the asuras in Pāli and Sanskrit Buddhist sources; his name is left as a proper name since no standard descriptive epithet is universally agreed upon.

- The list of great śrāvakas includes several figures whose Tibetan names required identification: Aśvajit is rendered from འཇམ་བཞུག་, Mahānāma from མཁའ་འགྲུབ་, Bhadrīka from བཀྲ་ཤིས་ལྷ་མོ་, Vāṣpa from བཤམ་པ་, and Nandaka from རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྷ་མོ་. The figure རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྷ་མོ་ is rendered "the Venerable Mahā-Kalpika"; this name is uncertain, as the Tibetan epithet means literally "the Great Prompting One," and the underlying Sanskrit name is not definitively recoverable from context alone. The term རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྷ་མོ་, meaning a prompting or stimulus, is used both as a personal name or epithet and as the technical term for the "prompting" or "stimulus" through which merit accrues; this double usage is intrinsic to the passage and has been preserved.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end with the simile of the five rivers and the measuring of water, indicating the passage is incomplete as given. The five rivers listed are the standard set of great rivers of Jambudvīpa found in numerous sūtras. The Tibetan འཇམ་བཞུག་ corresponds to Aciravatī in the standard enumeration. The term འཇམ་བཞུག་ ("offerings perpetually suited to the needs of the resident community") refers to regular periodic offerings appropriate to the four classes of the community, a standard phrase for ongoing institutional support of a monastery.

- The figure "Mahāprompting" renders རྒྱུ་འཕྲོད་པ་ལྷན་པོ་, where རྒྱུ་འཕྲོད་པ་ is used throughout the prior passage as the name of the interlocutor. The name literally means "the Great Prompter" or "Great Instigator" and likely corresponds to a Sanskrit name such as Mahāpreraṇa or similar; this is an unusual proper name in the sūtra literature and worth flagging. The same term རྒྱུ་འཕྲོད་པ་ is used both as the interlocutor's name and in the sense of "prompting" or "basis of incitement," creating a wordplay in the original that is difficult to render cleanly in English without awkwardness.

The phrase རྒྱུ་འཕྲོད་པ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་ ("bases of meritorious acts not grounded in material things") is the counterpart to the seven material bases discussed earlier; the text is now enumerating a second set of seven merit-bases that do not require physical offerings but arise from mental acts such as hearing news of the Buddha or his disciples with joy.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of this passage, as the next portion (completing the rhetorical question about the magnitude of the merit) is not included here. This is a standard device in this sūtra genre where the accumulation of merit is then declared immeasurable or compared to something vast. No significant doctrinal uncertainties arise in this passage.

- The name "Mgubyed" (མགུ་བྱེད་) means literally "she who pleases" or "Pleaser"; it is used here as a personal name for the daughter-in-law. The old man at the gatehouse uses the contrast "temple versus destitution" as a way of assessing the spiritual vitality of the establishment by whether monks are properly provided for. The disguise episode and the dialogue are a literary device common in Buddhist narrative literature to reveal conditions anonymously. The five rivers listed correspond to the standard Indian canonical list; "Aciravatī" renders རྒྱུ་འཕྲོད་པ་, and "Mahī" renders མཁུ་, both well-attested identifications.

- The phrase rendered "keys and crooked keys" translates lde mig and lde mig kyog po. This likely refers to different types of keys or locks — standard keys and bent or secondary keys — indicating full authority over the household. The precise technical distinction is uncertain but the general meaning of handing over complete household authority is clear.

"King Śarpa" renders rgyal po shar pa, which may be a proper name or a descriptive epithet. The passage is fragmentary at its close, as it ends mid-sentence with the Blessed One beginning to speak; this is a continuation point for the next passage.

- The proper name rendered here as "Dhāraṇī" (Tibetan Gzungs byed, "one who holds" or "one who retains") is a different figure from the earlier householder Gāndha; the Blessed One is now narrating a past-life story that is being framed as a parallel or antecedent to Gāndha's situation. The connection between the two narratives — and the identity of past and present figures — would have been made explicit in the continuation of the sūtra.

The second group of five hundred pratyekabuddhas' speech is slightly ambiguous: their statement "you belong to those others and we too belong to those others" appears to mean that the householder is already connected to the first group, and the new arrivals likewise belong to a different group — suggesting the householder initially deflects before being persuaded by the steward's confirmation.

- The phrase rendered "king Prasenajit of the East" follows the Tibetan "འབྲུག་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་," where "འབྲུག་པོ་" is a proper name or epithet. "འབྲུག་པོ་" literally means "eastern one" or could be a name; in context it appears as the past-life identity of the summoner, identified with the king Prasenajit. The rendering "Prasenajit of the East" preserves the apparent epithet while keeping the identification clear.

The term "མཉམ་འབྲེལ་པ་མང་པོ་" rendered as "accomplices" could also mean "those traveling on common business" or "fellow travelers with shared purpose"; in context the bandits are targeting both innocent merchants and those with criminal associations, and the word is genuinely ambiguous. The dramatic conclusion is that all through-traffic ceased.

- The term here rendered "Sahasrathūra" represents the Tibetan སྐྱེད་ཀྱི་ཁྱེད་, meaning "able to withstand a thousand," a proper name for this warrior character; it is rendered consistently as Sahasrathūra following the Sanskrit equivalent that would underlie this name. The term རྒྱལ་ཁྱེད་, literally "pastoral dwelling" or "wilderness settlement," is rendered "Countryside Dwelling" as a place-name throughout, following the narrative's own etymology. The term རྒྱལ་ཁྱེད་ rendered as "Sire" in the letter is an honorific address to the king.
- The phrase rendered "three brigades" translates "ru gsum" literally as "three horns/divisions," referring to military divisions or flanks. The context of a military defeat makes "brigades" a reasonable equivalent, consistent with the previous passage's rendering.

The circumambulation of the temple before being sent to Countryside Dwelling appears to function as a ritual consecration or legitimation of the custom, though the text does not make the theological rationale explicit.

- The term rendered "garden party" throughout is literally "offering a small pond" or "pond-gift" — likely a festive gathering held at a private pleasure garden or pond. The phrase is consistent and used several times; "garden party" conveys the social occasion intended, though the literal sense is a gift or celebration centered on a garden pond.

The phrase rendered "razor-wheel" refers to the cakra as a discus weapon, distinct from the Dharma wheel. The "single-pointed vajra" is a weapon form, not a ritual implement here.

- The phrase rendered "at the very moment of death, his mind cutting free" translates a construction indicating that at the precise juncture of dying he generated bodhicitta and made an aspirational prayer — the two acts are simultaneous. The Tibetan idiom "gnad 'chad ka" and "tshig 'grol kar" denote the exact instant of severance of the vital force and the loosening of the mental continuum respectively; the translation captures this without overly technical language.

The demand negotiated down through the passage — from a thousand per day, to five hundred, then to the range of two hundred fifty down to one hundred, and finally settled as one wagon with provisions and one human attendant — reflects a progressive bargaining sequence. The final figure in the Tibetan is somewhat compressed and the exact numbers between two hundred fifty and one hundred are given as a range; this is rendered accordingly.

- The closing passage is a long panegyric describing the qualities of buddhas in an enumerative style typical of early Buddhist narrative literature. The list of qualities follows a numerical schema from one through ten and beyond, a well-attested literary convention in Pali and Sanskrit Buddhist texts. The phrase rendered "solitary hero" translates a term meaning "lone, courageous, singular" and is a standard epithet. The text breaks off mid-sentence at "who is inclining toward the lower realms," indicating the passage continues beyond the portion given here.
- The verse simile of the "sea-monster realm" uses the term chu srin, which refers to a makara, a fearsome aquatic creature of Indian mythology. The phrase "may yet pass beyond their appointed time" means that even one dwelling in such a dangerous place might escape death — yet the buddha's loving-kindness toward trainees is even more reliably constant, never lapsing. This is the intended sense of the comparison.

The name "Boṅguba" is a Tibetan phonetic rendering of a yakṣa's name whose Sanskrit original is not recoverable with certainty from this context.

The repeated pattern of the Blessed One emerging and re-entering at the yakṣa's command is a standard narrative device in Vinaya and avadāna literature illustrating both the taming of a powerful being and the Buddha's deliberate pedagogical use of compliance to crush the yakṣa's pride — this is made explicit in the text with the phrase "for the sake of decisively subduing arrogance and pride."

- The phrase rendered "truthful restraint" translates a compound that could be read as "the abandonment of truth and restraint" or "the giving up of untruthfulness and lack of restraint," depending on parsing. In context — the final challenge question to other teachers — the most natural doctrinal reading is that the Blessed One is asserting no other Dharma exists beyond the giving up of what opposes truth and restraint, i.e., beyond honest, disciplined conduct. This reading is adopted here.

The repeated exchange about "six things" by which one arises, gains familiarity, receives honor, and prevails is left without enumeration because the Tibetan text itself does not supply the list in this passage; the six are presumably elaborated elsewhere in the sūtra.

- The yakṣa's name "Dongbu-pa" in the verse opener is a transliteration of the Tibetan དོང་བུ་པ།. The meaning is uncertain — it may be a proper name or a clan epithet. It is kept as a name here rather than translated, since no standard Sanskrit equivalent is recoverable from context.

The phrase rendered "a drop of blood as tribute" reflects the Tibetan སྐྱུ་ལྷན་པ་ལྷན་པ་, literally "a drop of blood." In context this appears to be the crowd's euphemistic way of describing the boy being sent as a sacrificial offering to the yakṣa — a deliberately oblique expression whose irony is part of the narrative.

The passage ends mid-sentence (the Blessed One's verse naming the boy is not included in the supplied Tibetan). This is simply where the excerpt breaks off.

- The name rendered "Passed-Through-Hands" translates the Tibetan lag brgyud, literally "passed through hands / transmitted hand to hand," which functions as a proper name given in explanation of the verse. The full name "Passed-Through-Hands of the Pastoral Settlement" (lag brgyud 'brog gnas) follows naturally.

The name sngon bsangs can is rendered "Bluish-Gray Beard," following the literal sense: sngon bsangs means "bluish-gray" or "blue-green washed," and can means "possessing / endowed with." The referent appears to be a young woman, making the name somewhat unusual; it may be a clan or family name rather than a physical description. This is noted as a genuine uncertainty in the text.

The "king of the realm of Bhadra" renders bad sa'i rgyal po — bhadra being an epithet meaning "auspicious" or "good," here used as a proper place name.

- The name rendered as "Lagbryud Drogné" is a transliteration of the Tibetan proper name (ལག་བྱུད་གྲོག་ནེ་) that appears to be a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit name now uncertain; it is kept in transliterated form since no Sanskrit equivalent is recoverable from context and the name was established in the preceding passage.

The sequence of numerical epithets from "three knowledges" through "a hundred times ten" follows a standard praising formula found in Buddhist Sanskrit literature; the specific referents (e.g., the three knowledges: recollection of past lives, divine eye, knowledge of the destruction of defilements; the four rivers: sensual desire, becoming, views, and ignorance; the four bases of miraculous power; the four means of gathering; and so on) are well-attested canonical lists and have been rendered by their standard English equivalents without expansion, as the text itself does not gloss them.

- The name rendered "Nīlapīta" (Tibetan: སྐྱུ་ལྷན་པ་) is a compound meaning literally "one who has blue-green jaundice" or "the blue-jaundiced one." This is a character-epithet functioning as a proper name; it has been kept as a Sanskrit reconstruction since the text treats it as a personal name throughout.

The phrase □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ in the first paragraph is slightly elliptical: the full sense is that Nīlapīṭa, who has not yet seen the truths (i.e., not yet attained the path of seeing), might come to a direct vision through the Blessed One's presence, but without proper preparation he would not become a fit vessel. The translation renders this according to the most natural doctrinal reading.

- The phrase rendered "the fever of the heart" translates "心熱の病を治す人," literally "one for whom the disease-fever of the heart has been dispelled." This is a vivid classical metaphor for the burning torment of afflictive mental states, particularly craving. The rendering preserves the medical-metaphorical register of the original.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence in the source text provided, ending just as the simile of the clean cloth is introduced and the four noble truths are about to be received by the herdsman. The translation faithfully reproduces that abrupt stop.

• The term "Śyāmāvat" renders the Tibetan "ཡཱུ་མེད་ལྷོ་མེད་" (literally "one who has a blue-green or dark complexion"), used as a personal name for the woman who had sought out the herdsman. The name is treated here as a feminine personal name consistent with Sanskrit naming conventions; no Sanskrit original is recoverable with certainty from context, but the rendering is a reasonable transliteration of what the Tibetan represents phonologically.

The phrase "heaven free from torment" renders "阿鞞跋致天," corresponding to the Avṛha heaven, one of the five pure abodes within the form realm. Given that the herdsman had just attained the fruit of non-return, rebirth in one of the pure abodes is doctrinally expected, and Avṛha is the lowest of these.

The divine son's reasoning — that he should not approach the Blessed One while still "dwelling in his celestial abode" — reflects a convention in Vinaya narrative that devas who visit the Buddha appear in a transformed or humbled form, not in full divine splendor. The contrast drawn here is between approach with and without reliance on his celestial dwelling, which may also carry the nuance of arriving without the pomp of divine retinue and ornamentation.

- The phrase rendered as "the mark of sitting" translates a term meaning a defining characteristic or sign of being physically seated, that is, the intentional mental representation of a seated physical posture. This appears to be a technical instruction enabling the divine being, who had merged into the earth, to reconstitute a conventionally perceptible, grounded bodily presence. The precise doctrinal background of this practice of manifesting a "coarse body" with "perception of solidity" is unusual; it likely reflects an early Abhidharma or proto-Abhidharma understanding of how devas can assume material form.

- The passage rendered as "rivalling Vaiśravaṇa in treasure" refers to Vaiśravaṇa (Tibetan Rnam thos kyi bu), the god of wealth, one of the Four Great Kings. The comparison is a stock literary formula indicating extreme wealth.

The word rendered "secret" in the verse ("for as long as my resolve and diligence remain unbroken in secret") translates gsang ba, which could also be read as an adverb of manner meaning "inwardly" or "privately" — that is, internally or in the depths of his being. Either reading is consistent with the context; "in secret" is retained as the more literal rendering.

- The phrase rendered "appropriated aggregates, elements, and sense bases" translates a standard Abhidharma formulation for the psychophysical continuum taken up by karma — the term "appropriated" (Tib. zin pa) indicating that these are the aggregates grasped by craving as one's own. This is technically significant: karma ripens in the personal continuum, not in the impersonal physical world.

The four-line verse on karma not perishing over a hundred aeons is a well-known canonical verse found across multiple sūtra collections; its rendering here preserves the standard Tibetan formulation.

"Lakgyü Drokné" renders the Tibetan lag brgyud 'brog gnas, a personal name; the story appears to be from a Vinaya narrative context.

- The phrase rendered as "court herald" translates Tibetan "ཁོ་ལོ་མཁའ་འགྲུབ་པོ་" (literally "one who speaks/announces before," i.e., a royal crier or herald). The exact court function is clear from context, though the precise Sanskrit equivalent (likely sūta or vandīpura) is not given in the text.

The phrase "ཁོ་ལོ་མཁའ་འགྲུབ་པོ་" does not appear here; "ཁོ་ལོ་མཁའ་འགྲུབ་པོ་ལྟ་བུ་" is rendered "the one dwelling in the wilderness by way of lineage," following the preceding passage's established reading of this character.

The term "ཁོ་ལོ་མཁའ་འགྲུབ་པོ་" rendered as "blue-green yakṣa" refers to the yakṣa figure established in the prior narrative. The compound literally means "having a blue-green [complexion]."

- The phrase rendered "the lord of death" translates the Tibetan ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ (literally "death-lord"), a common Tibetan epithet for Death personified (equivalent to Skt. Mṛtyu or Yama in this kind of proverbial usage). The youth's remark is a riddle-like declaration that he sees the girl's outstretched arm as a sign of impermanence and mortality, not an ordinary domestic scene — consistent with his disposition toward renunciation.
- The names Lagbrug Drogné and Ngobangschen are phonetic renderings of Tibetan proper names (respectively spelled ལག་བྱུང་གྲོག་ལྡན་ and ལྔ་བཀའ་སྤྱོད་) whose Sanskrit equivalents are not recoverable from this passage alone. They are retained in a consistent phonetic form for narrative continuity. The name "Badsā" for the Eastern King's realm is similarly a phonetic rendering of བཅོམ་ and may correspond to a place name not yet identified with certainty.
- The phrase "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty sub-varieties of the view of a self in relation to the five aggregates, a standard Abhidharma enumeration; the "vajra of gnosis" that shatters them is the insight (vipaśyanā) breakthrough at the moment of stream-entry. This doctrinal image is rendered literally as the text intends it as a vivid extended metaphor. The name Sgur Mchog is retained in its Tibetan form as in the preceding passage; it was not provided with a Sanskrit equivalent in the text.
- The term rendered "king of Bādrā" (ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་) literally means "the eastern king of Bādrā." Bādrā is likely a toponym; the epithet "eastern" may distinguish him from another ruler of the same region. The precise identification is uncertain but not consequential for the narrative.

The phrase ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་, rendered "without the proper grounds of respect," refers literally to the absence of the respectful basis or station owed to a teacher — the women are sitting higher than Śrīgupta, which is a breach of the deference required for receiving Dharma instruction.

- The Tibetan "ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་" literally means "like a lion lying down with its body gathered" — a standard Indian simile for the posture of meditative sitting, here applied to the Buddha's cross-legged seat. The rendering "like a lion at rest" captures this stock image.

The passage shifts mid-scene to the story of Incomparable, introduced without explicit narrative transition; this is as in the Tibetan original, which moves directly from the court scene to this new storyline. It reflects the multi-strand narrative structure of the sūtra.

The final verse is deliberately left incomplete as it is incomplete in the Tibetan passage provided.

- The repeated refrain spoken by "the householder to the young man" is dramatically unusual, as throughout this passage the householder is the father-in-law figure and the "young man" would be an unexpected addressee. The Tibetan construction is consistent each time, and the refrain appears to be a fixed verse formula embedded in the narrative, possibly addressed intertextually or as a gnomic aside rather than as dialogue within the immediate scene. The structural repetition suggests a versified source underlying the prose narrative.

The term rendered "balance-beam" for 平衡木 is literally the yoke-peg or pivot-pin of a balance scale, conveying absolute steadiness and equanimity in the gaze.

The passage breaks off mid-verse at the end, as the source text supplied is incomplete.

- The verse about "golden Otala trees" is obscure. Otala appears to be a tree name, possibly a Sanskritized proper name for a species; the doctrinal point seems to be that even settled, rooted things are moved by desire when it comes to procreation. The meaning of "offered in accordance with Dharma" in this context is ambiguous — it may refer to the ritual offering of a woman in the context of dharmic householder duty, or to some narrative detail not preserved in this excerpt.

The phrase rendered "bring about her own end" translates a construction meaning she would die, likely of lovesickness or despair — a common motif in Indian literary narrative.

The aged woman's verse is cut off at the final line; the passage ends mid-verse in the source.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence with the fifth of the five qualities of women skilled in discernment left incomplete. This appears to be a deliberate passage boundary in the source provided, not a translation omission.

The name rendered "Burmā" follows the preceding passage's established context. The Tibetan reads "བུར་མ་" which is a proper name; consistency with prior renderings is maintained.

"Vaiśravaṇa, the son of the All-Hearing" renders "वैश्रवण" literally; Vaiśravaṇa (Kubera), the god of wealth, is a standard referent in Buddhist narrative literature for the epitome of great riches.

- The name Siṃhala (rendered here from the Tibetan ལྷོ་ཁྱེད་ལྗོངས་) is the standard Sanskrit form; this is also the legendary founding figure associated with Siṃhaladvīpa (Sri Lanka), and this passage is from the Siṃhala-avadāna tradition. The eight nurses represent a well-attested Indian royal-birth convention also found in Pali and Sanskrit sources; the fourfold division of nursing duties is formulaic.

The phrase rendered "reciting the dedication of merit by name" translates

[illegible]

- The name "Siṅgāla" (Tibetan: སྤྲེལ་གླིང་) is a proper name retained in transliteration; it corresponds to the Sanskrit Simhala or a variant, the sea-merchant hero of this narrative.

The five nautical specialists — bailer, caulker, carpenter, chief swimmer, and wind-reader — represent a standard list in Sanskrit mercantile literature. The Tibetan terms are somewhat technical and the renderings here follow the most plausible reconstruction; the "one who reads the winds" (འགྲོ་བུ་རྒྱ་ལྟོན་པ་) could also be rendered "the one who catches the wind" meaning a navigator by wind-signs.

- The list of precious substances near the middle of the passage includes several terms that admit of more than one identification. The term rendered "essence of stone" is a conventional phrase for a hard mineral or gemstone of uncertain species; "rubies" and "red gems" may refer to the same stone in different qualities or grades, and the right-spiraling conch is listed among precious things as an auspicious rarity. These distinctions are not consequential to the narrative and no single identification is certain.

The rākṣasīs' name, rendered "Young Cranes," is a direct translation of the Tibetan epithet and may be a local rendering of a Sanskrit original; no Sanskrit parallel has been supplied in the source.

- The flotation materials listed present some philological difficulty. The term rendered "logs of thorn-covered wood" translates a compound referring to wool-bearing or fibrous-thorned timber, possibly the cotton-silk tree in another form; the exact botanical identification is uncertain but does not affect the narrative meaning. "Sea-monsters of the fish species" renders a compound meaning roughly "makara-type aquatic creatures." The city described is the iron city of the rākṣasīs, a standard feature of this narrative cycle. The rākṣasī epithet "Young Cranes" is a literal rendering of the Tibetan; the underlying Sanskrit name is not recoverable from context alone.

- The term rendered "right-spiraling shells" translates a term in the gem list that refers to conch shells with a clockwise spiral, considered auspicious — distinct from the plain "conch" listed just before it. The Tibetan distinguishes the two, and both are preserved here. The name "Siṃhala" (the speaker identified as such in the preceding narrative context) is kept consistent with standard identification of this merchant-hero figure in this text.

- The phrase rendered "of a steady disposition" translates "rtag pa'i rang bzhin can zhig," literally "one who had a nature of steadiness or constancy." This likely means a merchant who was sober or alert rather than inebriated — contextually contrasted with those who might have been "very inebriated," as warned against earlier. The rendering chosen reflects this contextual sense without forcing it.

- The repeated phrase rendered "cross to the other shore" is a straightforward literal rendering of the Tibetan pha rol du 'gro, which carries the resonance of crossing the ocean back to Jambudvīpa in this narrative context, not the doctrinal sense of "going beyond" as in pāramitā, though the verbal echo may be intentional.

- The list of precious substances recurs verbatim twice in the Tibetan, as a rhetorical device characteristic of this sūtra style. This is faithfully rendered with the repetition preserved.

The phrase rendered "essence of stone" translates a term referring to a precious mineral substance (likely ruby or a related gem), and "conch" and "right-coiling shells" refer to the auspicious right-spiraling conch, a standard precious item in Indo-Tibetan lists of treasures.

The "banners of destitution and longing" is an unusual image; the Tibetan compound suggests banners or flags that signal or embody the rākṣasīs' condition of poverty and craving, functioning here as a magical lure.

- The list of precious substances follows a standard canonical enumeration. "Essences of stone" renders a term sometimes interpreted as a specific mineral or gemstone, the exact identification of which varies across commentaries. "Right-coiling shells" renders the term for auspiciously spiraling conch shells, a recognized category of precious objects in the Indian tradition.

The passage's doctrinal point is a direct illustration of the danger of reifying the five aggregates, the six sense bases, the six elements, and their objects as "I" or "mine" — a classic śrāvaka teaching on selflessness (anātman) rendered through narrative analogy.

- The section break indicating "Vinayavibhaṅga, seventy-seventh fascicle" appears mid-passage in the Tibetan as a scribal/editorial marker. It has been rendered in plain prose as a natural pause rather than a formatted header, to preserve TTS flow while faithfully representing the text's structure.

"Tāmradvīpa" renders རྩམ་ཁུང་ཁྱེད་, literally "Copper Isle," the classical Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit Tāmradvīpa, traditionally identified with Sri Lanka in the Siṃhala legend cycle.

- The epithet "Siṃhaketu" for the king is kept consistent with the name that appears in the Tibetan, where it differs from "Siṃhala" (the merchant). The rākṣasī's speech is rendered twice in the passage — once as reported earlier by the narrator and once in her own words to the king — which is a deliberate narrative repetition in the source text, preserved here.
- The term rendered "caravan-leader" is the standard translation of Tibetan drangs-pa (here spelled ded-dpon), Sanskrit sārthavāha, the leader of a merchant caravan; "Siṃgala" is the consistent proper name from the preceding passage. The "Copper-Colored Island" (Skt. Tāmradvīpa or Rākṣasadvīpa) is the island of the rākṣasīs in the Indian Ocean, identified in tradition with Sri Lanka; the Tibetan reads zangs-gling, literally "Copper Island." The "banner corresponding to the place of danger" is a signal-flag system described in the preceding narrative context; the phrase phongs-pa'i gnas-dang mthun-pa'i rgyal-mtshan means literally "the victory-banner fitting the condition of distress," functioning as an agreed alarm signal among the rākṣasīs.
- The Vatsa kingdom's king is here called "Śarpa" (literally "serpent" or "snake"), an unusual royal name; this is consistent with the preceding context and rendered as given.

The term rendered "wanderer woman" for "kun du rgyu ma du" refers to a female wandering ascetic or vagrant woman (Skt. parivrājikā); the figure is the same rākṣasī in human disguise, as the narrative makes clear.

The five-hundred-and-five-hundred kārṣāpaṇas phrase renders a doubling construction in the Tibetan (Inga brgya Inga brgya), meaning five hundred each time, or five hundred on each occasion; this is a standard idiom of generous regular giving.

- The phrase rendered "bowl of rice porridge with live embers beneath it" translates a construction indicating a vessel of cooked food set over burning coals, evidently a trap — the embers would scorch Nīlajālikā's hands when she stirred it. The maidservant's instruction to "kill" refers to extinguishing the embers before delivering the bowl, so that the ruse of "stirring for the Blessed One" would proceed without harm to Nīlajālikā — though the passage is slightly compressed here and the sequence of deception and counter-deception is deliberately ironic.

The term "kinnara woman" renders རྩམ་ཁུང་ཁྱེད་, a female kinnara, a class of semi-divine celestial musicians, sometimes translated "what-manner-of-man."

- The name rendered here as "Apalāmā" (Tib. འཔ་ལ་མ་མ་) literally means "the incomparable woman" or "peerless woman," but from context and the textual tradition this is the proper name of one of King Udayana's consorts; the other primary consort is Śyāmāvatī (Tib. སྐྱུ་མ་འཕྲུ་མ་, literally "the dark-lustrous one"). Both are well-attested figures in the Udayana cycle of the Vinaya literature.

The phrase rendered "warm up the grudge-meat" (Tib. རྩམ་ཁུང་ཁྱེད་) is an idiom meaning to act out or satisfy a long-held grievance; a literal rendering is retained here as it carries cultural color appropriate to the narrative register.

- The verse spoken by Śyāmāvatī before her death is a well-known gāthā on the inevitability of karmic retribution, attested in several Vinaya and Avadāna sources. The rendering follows the standard doctrinal meaning.

The phrase rendered "like scattered flour tossed upward" describes the women leaping upward and falling into the fire; the simile compares their bodies to fine flour particles thrown into the air.

- The phrase rendered "the king of the eastern lands — Śreṇika" reflects the Tibetan

"འོ་ཤར་གྱི་སྐད་ཀྱི་ཁོང་།," where "འོ་ཤར་" (Bimbisāra) is the king's name and "ཁོང་" may indicate the eastern direction or an epithet; in context this refers to King Bimbisāra of Magadha traveling to the eastern region. The name Śreṇika (Tibetan: རྩེ་ལྷོ་) is another name for King Bimbisāra, well attested in Buddhist sources.

The five fetters of the lower realm (Skt. pañca orambhāgīya-saṃyojana) and the three fetters (Skt. trīṇi saṃyojanāni) are standard Abhidharma categories distinguishing the four grades of noble ones; the translation renders these by their doctrinal results rather than enumerating the fetters themselves, following the text's own framing.

- The name "Mādu" renders "𐎠𐎢𐎡𐎢" which appears to be a proper name in this narrative context, possibly a transcription of a Sanskrit name; the reading is not entirely certain but is treated here as a personal name consistent with its earlier occurrences in the passage.

"Ngo-bsangs-can" renders "ngo bsang can" — a woman's name, literally meaning something like "one with a blue-gray complexion" or "having a bluish pallor." It is treated as a proper name throughout.

The phrase rendered "flat as flour-dust" translates "平平如粉" — literally "like a flat layer of fine flour" — and describes the women flinging themselves upward in a prostrate or spread-out posture before falling into the flames; the simile is unusual and the exact visual image is somewhat uncertain.

- The name rendered "Duḥśrava" corresponds to the Tibetan mi snyam sma rgyal po, literally "the king Duḥśrava" or "the king of ill-sounding speech." The passage preserves the narrative voice switching between the king's messenger and the eastern king in a dialogue that is somewhat elliptical; the rendering follows the most natural reconstruction of the speakers.

"Śyāmāvātī" renders sngon bsangs can, a Tibetan translation of the Sanskrit name meaning "she who has a blue-fresh complexion." The picture unrolled by the messenger depicts the burning of the women of Kauśāmbī, a well-known episode in the Udāyana cycle of narratives.

"Prayogadhara" renders sbyor ba 'dzin, literally "holder of stratagems," which functions here as a proper name or title for the chief minister.

"Dīpamatī" renders dpe med ma, literally "the incomparable one," which is a Tibetan rendering of that queen's name.

The verse is metrically irregular in Tibetan and appears to function as a humble self-introduction by the messenger; the English rendering preserves its deferential tone.

- The phrase rendered "born without losing her place" translates a passage that implies Dīpamatī somehow became pregnant while in the underground chamber without having lost her position or station — the Tibetan is somewhat compressed here. The passage seems to imply a miraculous conception occurred during her confinement, which the king initially misreads as infidelity. The exact nuance of the Tibetan phrase is slightly ambiguous but this reading fits the narrative logic best.

The verse on karma is a well-known canonical stanza appearing in various sūtra and Vinaya contexts; the rendering follows the standard sense of the Tibetan closely.

- The name rendered "Uṭpalavarṇā" (literally "the one with the color of the blue lotus," Skt. Uṭpalavarṇā) is given in the Tibetan as འཕྲུལ་འཁོར་ལྷ་མོ་, a calque of that Sanskrit name. "Uttarā" renders འཕྲུལ་ལྷ་མོ་, which is a Tibetan translation equivalent of the Sanskrit name Uttarā, meaning "most excellent" or "supreme." These identifications follow standard Vinaya narrative traditions where these women are recognized disciples of the Buddha Śākyamuni.

The phrase rendered "water-drain" for རྒྱུ་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་ is literally a "water-escape hole" or drain aperture — the precise narrative context suggests she escapes a burning or confined situation through an opening for water, consistent with her earlier flight from fire.

- The passage opens mid-sentence, continuing directly from the preceding section's conclusion about purely bright and purely dark karma. The translation flows accordingly without repeating what was already rendered.

The name rendered "Elder Śgur" translates the Tibetan term that literally means "hunchback" or "the bent one," and appears to function as a proper name or epithet for a monk whose condition is the subject of the narrative. The question is why this monk came to be hunchbacked, and the story of King Brahmadata and the householder Dhāraṇī is the Buddha's past-life explanation.

The term rendered "Dear steward" translates a Tibetan address term that is slightly colloquial and honorific simultaneously; the rendering approximates its natural spoken register.

- The phrase rendered "holder of scripture" translates རྒྱུ་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་, literally "one who holds what has been heard," which in context denotes one endowed with great learning and retentive memory for scriptural transmission. The rendering "holder of scripture" is chosen to be natural for audio narration while preserving the technical sense.

The verse is a well-known stock verse on karma found across numerous canonical contexts; it is rendered faithfully to the Tibetan without smoothing toward any single Sanskrit parallel.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, consistent with it being a continuous narrative excerpt.

- The phrase rendered "having transformed the conditions, abiding near like a flame, certain to arise" describes karma's properties in a technical doctrinal formula recurring identically for each figure in this text's karmic biography series. The simile of a flame denotes karma's persistence and readiness to ignite when conditions meet, a standard Abhidharma image. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as it does in the source.

- The name Aupamānavatī is the Sanskrit reconstruction of the Tibetan རྒྱུ་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་, literally "the Incomparable One" or "she without equal." The text identifies her explicitly as the brahmin girl from the preceding episode; the continuity of the narrative is maintained here.

The phrase rendered "king of the region of Batsā" translates རྒྱུ་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་, which appears to refer to the eastern king of the Vatsa kingdom. "Śar pa" likely indicates "the eastern one" rather than being a proper name.

- The name rendered as "Mgubyed" in the preceding passage is the Tibetan རྒྱུ་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་, meaning roughly "the one who pleases" or "the gladdener." The text presents this as a prior-life name for the same figure now called Śrī, and the Blessed One appears to be explaining the connection. The continuity of identity across lives here is a standard narrative device in Avadāna literature.

The phrase རྒྱུ་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་ (rendered here as "the Blue Lotus") is a Tibetan rendering of a name, almost certainly corresponding to Sanskrit Utpalavarnā or a similar epithet meaning one marked by or associated with the blue lotus. The king mistakes Śrī for this other woman, who appears to be a known figure in the narrative context.

The eastern king of Prasenajit: the Tibetan རྒྱུ་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་ refers to Prasenajit (Skt. Prasenajit), here qualified as the eastern one, possibly distinguishing him from another Prasenajit or indicating his direction of rule. This detail may have textual significance not resolvable without the broader manuscript context.

- The phrase rendered "head of discipline" translates the Tibetan term for the monastic officer responsible for regulating conduct during communal affairs, corresponding to the Sanskrit karma-dāna or upadhivārika. The precise Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain from context alone, but the functional meaning is clear within the Vinaya tradition.

The expression "remained in the courtyard enclosure and proceeded to go on alms round" reflects a textually specific Vinaya idiom indicating the Buddha stationed himself at the designated space while the formal alms-collection procedure was carried out; the phrasing is intentionally repeated in the source to signal a doctrinal explanation.

- The phrase rendered "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty subsidiary views of a self within the five aggregates, a standard Abhidharma enumeration. The image of shattering these peaks with the vajra of gnosis at the moment of stream-entry is a recognizable doctrinal formulation marking the direct realization of selflessness that occurs on the path of seeing.

The phrase translated "words of those seven are not to be violated" lists categories of authoritative speech in a Vinaya context. The "ceremonial supervisor" renders the Tibetan office responsible for the formal acts of the Saṅgha.

- The list of "jewels" here follows the Vinaya enumeration standard to the Mūlasarvāstivāda tradition. The term rendered "essence of stone" (Tibetan rdo'i snying po) likely corresponds to a mineral such as rock crystal or a precious stone of uncertain Sanskrit equivalent; it is left descriptively rendered rather than identified with a specific gem, since the precise referent in this recension is not established. The fourfold matrix of perception and doubt applied to each of the three gate types (city gate, palace gate, queens' gate) generates twelve combinations in total; the translation follows the Tibetan's enumeration faithfully, even where the logic of one case (perceiving dawn when it is not yet dawn) seems counterintuitive — this is standard Vinaya casuistry for establishing the scope of the rule under all cognitive conditions.

- The phrase rendered "treating it as a post" translates a Tibetan expression meaning to regard something as an inert, fixed object — a traditional simile for treating the recitation as mere background noise, something one is physically present before but utterly unresponsive to, like a wooden post. This is a recognized Vinaya idiom.

The closing line "Is this true, venerable ones? It is not so" reflects the standard Vinaya formula in which the Blessed One first puts the accusation as a question and then answers it rhetorically, implying that such conduct is unacceptable. The phrase "venerable ones" here is addressed by the Blessed One to the group of six with mild irony, as the title is applied to them in the accusatory question.

- The passage is a Vinaya canonical text, and the enumeration of Prātimokṣa categories follows the standard Mūlasarvāstivāda count: four pārājikas, thirteen saṃghāvaśeṣas, two aniyatas, thirty niḥsargika-pācittikas, ninety pācittikas, four pratideśanīyas, numerous śaikṣadharmas, and seven adhikaraṇaśamathadharmas. The phrase rendered "he should be made to carry out in accordance with the rule" translates a causative construction meaning he should be led through the proper procedure of confession and restoration, not merely instructed verbally.

- The phrase rendered "seven bases of meritorious action arising from material things" translates 七寶因緣功德緣起, a standard Vinaya category listing seven supports for generating merit through material offerings (food, drink, garments, transport, flowers, incense, lamps, and so forth depending on the recension). The precise enumeration is not given in this passage, so the rendering follows the formulaic sense.

The term 針線箱, here rendered "needle and thread," literally refers to a needle-and-thread kit or needle-case; the episode turns on the monk requesting such an item be made of ivory, which sets up the disciplinary ruling that follows in the next passage.

- The phrase rendered "one that has a hollow tube, and one that is like a container" reflects the two types of needle-case distinguished in the Tibetan: one with a hollow interior and one resembling a flat or open holder. The exact typology may vary across Vinaya traditions; the rendering follows the literal Tibetan as closely as possible without forcing a more specific technical identification.

The sentence breaks off at the end of the passage as given, mid-enumeration of the three lower realms of rebirth. This is a continuation point and the translation ends faithfully where the source text ends.

- [illegible]

The phrase rendered "the twenty peaks of the mountain of views that constitute the perishable collection" translates satkāyadṛṣṭiśatśūkhāḥ: the view of the perishable collection (satkāyadṛṣṭi) is the root afflictive view identifying a self among the five aggregates, traditionally analyzed into twenty sub-views — five aggregates, each grasped in four ways as self. Shattering these at stream-entry is standard Abhidharma and sūtra doctrine.

- The phrase rendered as "ridiculously tall headboards" translates a term literally meaning "extremely tall ya-ga," where ya-ga refers to a headboard or upper frame of a bed. The comedic register of the group of six monks' retort is intentional and reflected in the text.

The passage "as before" and "and so forth as before" are formulaic Vinaya abbreviations indicating that the standard narrative procedure — convening the assembly, the question of whether the act was committed, the formal censure, and the promulgation of a rule — is to be understood as having occurred in full, following the established template earlier in the text.

- The Venerable "Charka" is a phonetic rendering of the Tibetan ཇཀ་ཤཀ་, a monk's name. The exact Sanskrit form is uncertain, but this is a genuine proper name in the text and not a common noun.

The phrase rendered "burns, scorches, and causes one to fall" renders three distinct Tibetan verbs describing the progressive harmful effects of an unconfessed transgression; the triplet is a standard canonical formula in Vinaya commentary.

- The five tree-names given for cotton wool sources — śalmali, arka, kaśa, buka, and eraka — are rendered from their Tibetan transliterations. The identifications of arka (likely Calotropis gigantea), śalmali (silk-cotton tree, Bombax ceiba), and eraka (a grass or reed species) are standard in Vinaya botanical glossaries, but buka and kaśa are less certain. These are plant names, not doctrinal matters, so no emendation is made to the translation.
- The term "gdingba" (gding ba) refers to a monk's sitting mat or seat covering made of wool; it is a technical Vinaya term. The "measure of the Sugata" (bde bar gshegs pa'i mtho) is a standard unit of measurement in the Vinaya, defined as the height and arm-span of a buddha, used to set canonical dimensions. The Tibetan "Charka" (ཆ་རྒྱལ་གྲོང་ཁོངས་ཀྱི་མཉེན་པོ་) is a monk's name: "venerable Charka" is the most natural rendering; it likely corresponds to a Sanskrit name such as Cātaka or similar, but no reconstruction is certain. The phrase "knowing yet acting as if unaware" reflects the Vinaya convention that buddhas already know the situation but feign inquiry as a pedagogical and procedural formality.

• The Tibetan unit system here requires some explanation. The text uses "mṭho" as a unit of height and "do" as a sub-unit; these correspond to Vinaya measurement terminology. "Mṭho gsum" is rendered "three standard cubits" following conventional Vinaya commentarial equivalences. The compound "khru phyed dang lnga" (literally "half a cubit and five") in the concluding calculation is rendered as "one and a half standard cubits plus five units," following the arithmetic worked out in the body of the text. The exact physical values of these units are debated in scholarship, but the internal consistency of the passage is preserved in the translation.

- The phrase rendered "four Sugata-cubits in length and one Sugata's width in width" reflects the Vinaya's technical use of the "Sugata-cubit" and "Sugata's width" as standard units of measure referenced to the Buddha's body. The commentary then glosses these into ordinary cubits: four Sugata-cubits equals six standard cubits in length, and one Sugata's width equals three standard cubits across. This is consistent with standard Vinaya metrology across traditions.

• The phrase rendered "three and a half sugata-heights" is literally "half and three sugata-heights," a classical Tibetan way of expressing three-and-a-half. The conversion given in the text itself — six sugata-heights equal nine standard cubits, and three-and-a-half equal three cubits and eight finger-widths — reflects a system in which one sugata-cubit equals one-and-a-half standard cubits, a well-attested convention in the Vinaya measurement tradition.

- The phrase rendered "poor man" is literally "you who are destitute" or "you pauper" — it is a slightly rough colloquial address by the craftsman to Ānanda, contrasting with Ānanda's respectful address to him. The irony of the exchange is that each party is telling the other they have no need for wages, and Ānanda recognizes the craftsman is right.

The monk's remark about "the heel of enemies" is a vivid idiom for being trampled underfoot; the image is that only someone literally flattened by foes would have cause to use such an enormous robe as a cover.

• The seven robe materials listed — woollen cloth, hemp cloth, silk cloth, cotton cloth, fine linen cloth, cotton-hemp blend, and solar cloth — correspond to standard Vinaya enumerations of permitted textile types. The Tibetan term translated "solar cloth" (སྒོ་མཚོ་གྲིང་ཆུང་བྱེད་པའི་རྩྭ་) literally means "cloth of the shade of the sun" or "sun-shadow cloth," a somewhat obscure category; commentaries identify it variously as a type of coarse fabric or bark cloth. The precise identification remains uncertain in scholarly literature.

The span and forearm-length conversions given in the text itself are preserved as stated; their relation to historical Indian units of measurement is a matter of ongoing philological discussion but does not affect the doctrinal content here.

- The term rendered "Blue Lotus Hue" throughout is Utpalavaṇṇā, a well-known figure in Buddhist narrative literature. The Tibetan འཕྲུལ་བཟང་ལྷོ་མེད་ is a calque of this Sanskrit name meaning "having the color of the blue lotus."

The phrase rendered "competing with Vaiśravaṇa in his riches" refers to Vaiśravaṇa, the god of wealth and lord of the yakṣas, as a standard Indian literary measure of extreme wealth.

The final line, where the mother "made her feelings known to him," translates 示以好意, literally "showed a sign" — a euphemistic idiom for making a sexual advance or indication of desire; the context makes this unambiguous.

- The phrase rendered "covered her head" reflects a gesture of distress or social withdrawal conventional in the narrative context. The merchant's response from the townspeople at the close — "We will not hand her over" — is spoken in the voice of the girl's guardians or fellow townspeople; the Tibetan shifts speakers rapidly here without explicit attribution, which is characteristic of this narrative style.

- The term rendered "organized women" for མཉམས་འདུས་པོ་མོ་ is literally "women who are in an assembly or association," likely referring to courtesans or women of a guild, given the narrative context. The precise social category is not fully transparent from the term alone, but context strongly suggests a guild of courtesans or entertainers, which is the standard reading in parallel Vinaya narratives.

The name Che-ge-mo appearing as the grandmother's name is a Tibetan colloquial name left untranslated as it is a proper name with no Sanskrit equivalent recoverable here.

- The term rendered "organized women" translates a Tibetan phrase for a guild or association of courtesans. The narrative logic of their "organization" and their competitive boasting about stripping merchants of wealth is consistent with this reading.

The term "earth-holder" is a literal rendering of the name the protagonist uses in this life; it corresponds to the name given in the preceding passage.

"Cooling and heating medicines" renders a standard Ayurvedic pharmaceutical category; the translation preserves the pair rather than specifying particular drugs.

- The passage contains the well-known canonical list of eight ways women are said to ensnare men, attributed to the Blessed One. This is a stock formulaic enumeration recurring in several Vinaya and narrative texts; its presence here is unremarkable in context, though modern readers may note its androcentric framing.

The term rendered "earth-holder" is a title of honor for a courtesan of the highest rank in the classical Indian literary tradition; the women of the company are praising Blue Lotus Hue's shrewdness in securing such a patron.

- The term rendered "assembly" translates a word used throughout this passage for what is contextually a Licchavī civic association or guild-like group of young men who share in common pleasures. It should not be confused with the Buddhist Saṅgha. The Blue-Lotus-Complexioned woman is a courtesan engaged for communal entertainment; the narrative makes clear the social and legal norms of Licchavī Vaiśālī that govern such arrangements. The kārṣāpaṇa is a standard ancient Indian monetary unit; it has been left in its Sanskrit form as a proper name for the coin.

- The title "ཡུལ་འཛིན་པོ་" (Earth-Holder) appears here as an epithet or alias applied to the Blue-Lotus-Complexioned one. Its precise significance in this narrative context is unclear — it may be an occupational or honorific designation for a courtesan of a certain standing, or a proper name she has acquired. The translation renders it literally as "Earth-Holder" throughout to preserve consistency with the Tibetan.

The phrase rendered "the earlier match fell through" translates "ཡོད་པ་ལྟར་མཐོང་པོ་མཐོང་པོ་," where "མཐོང་པོ་" (thams) carries the sense of something being already exhausted, concluded, or having come to nothing. The reading adopted here treats it as the earlier betrothal arrangement having dissolved or lapsed.

- The twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection is a standard Abhidharma and Madhyamaka scholastic image: satkāyadṛṣṭi ramifies into twenty sub-views (five aggregates each grasped in four ways as self or self's possession), and stream-entry eliminates them all. The image of the vajra of gnosis shattering this mountain at the moment of stream-entry is a conventional metaphor in Vinaya narrative literature.

The wager involving the wife and the five hundred kārṣāpaṇas follows a pattern common in Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya frame-stories, where courtesans and householders interact through such structured challenges.

- The phrase "saṃsāric wheel in its five divisions" renders a somewhat compressed Tibetan formulation. The five divisions likely refer to the five aggregates or five elements of conditioned existence; the doctrinal referent is not entirely transparent from the text alone, and commentarial clarification would be needed for certainty.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, so the translation likewise ends there without artificial closure.

- The passage "འདྲ་ལྟོས་པོ་ལྟོས་པོ་ལྟོས་པོ་ལྟོས་པོ་ལྟོས་པོ་" literally means "equal toward mud and gold," a stock phrase for equanimity free from preference or aversion. This is rendered directly. "འདྲ་ལྟོས་པོ་ལྟོས་པོ་ལྟོས་པོ་ལྟོས་པོ་ལྟོས་པོ་ལྟོས་པོ་" is a somewhat elliptical metaphor; the image is of sandalwood being set aside as no longer needed once the outer shell is broken — indicating the wisdom that cracks open the enclosure of the senses. The female naked-ascetic śrāvakā here belongs to a non-Buddhist (tīrthika) sect, not to the Buddha's community; this is clear from context.
- The great adept who is a pratyekabuddha teaches through bodily action alone and not through speech — this is a standard doctrinal point about pratyekabuddhas, confirmed by the text's explicit statement. The passage establishes the karmic backstory of Utpalavarnā, one of the foremost nun disciples of the Buddha Śākyamuni, whose name means "she of the utpala color." The "Teacher far more excellent" she aspired to please refers, in retrospect, to the Buddha Śākyamuni, who surpasses the pratyekabuddha she offered to. The reference to the "great and good aeon" (bhadrakalpa) situates this in the standard Mahāyāna cosmological framework of the current world-age, during which multiple buddhas appear, including Kāśyapa immediately before Śākyamuni.
- The verse on karma not perishing is a well-known canonical gāthā found across several Pāli and Sanskrit sources; it is rendered here in metrically natural English while preserving the doctrinal sense intact.

The term rendered "seeker" translates a Tibetan word meaning one who searches or seeks — the contextual referent is Utpalavarṇā's distinctive role as one who actively sought out and recruited others into the monastic community or, in the karmic back-story, gathered people together in a brothel-like setting. The same word covers both contexts, and the double valence is intentional in the text.

The phrase "exclusively dark," "exclusively white," and "mixed" karma is the standard threefold karmic typology in Pāli and Sanskrit Abhidharma; "exclusively dark" denotes wholly unwholesome karma with wholly unwholesome results, and so forth.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end as the Tibetan supplied terminates in the midst of the definition of "non-relative" in the vinaya commentary formula. The translation faithfully reproduces this incomplete ending without supplying conjectural continuation.

The phrase rendered "leftovers of a divine dwelling" is somewhat cryptic; it appears to mean food of heavenly quality or abundance, offered humbly by way of polite understatement.

- The "group of six monks" and "group of twelve monks" are well-known recurring characters in the Vinaya narratives: the group of six are the habitually transgressing monks, and the group of twelve are typically nuns (here called "sisters"), consistent with the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition. The phrase rendered "fascicle" for རྒྱུ་ལྔ་ follows the traditional Tibetan term for a textual division unit.
- The monk name "Laghumāna" (Tib. ལགུམ་མ་ན་) is a translation of "swift-goer" or "fast-traveller" and "Arcaka" (Tib. འུ་ར་ཀ་) appears to be a transliteration; the identification of these minor figures with known Pāli or Sanskrit parallels is uncertain and the names are rendered as plausible reconstructions. The passage ends mid-sentence as the Tibetan source itself continues beyond the passage provided.

- The term rendered "outer recreation ground" translates a compound meaning literally "the recreation ground outside," which in monastic Vinaya contexts designates the assembly hall or pavilion outside the village where communal acts of confession and restoration are performed. The phrase "dharma expressed by the name of a dharma" reflects a technical Vinaya formulation distinguishing a rule that concerns something contrary to true Dharma but is nonetheless designated as a "dharma" for purposes of the training rule — a nuance important for the confessional procedure described.
- The phrase rendered "words of inquiry" translates a formulaic Vinaya expression used when convening the Saṅgha for a formal act; it refers to the standard inquiry into the fitness of those present. The passage breaks off mid-sentence in the source text, as the motion-and-announcement formula is evidently continued on the following folio.
- The phrase rendered "lend me the loan of an umbrella's shade" translates a Tibetan idiom for requesting the honor of a guest's presence at a meal; the image of an umbrella's shade conventionally signals the dignity and shelter a distinguished guest confers. The phrase is deliberately kept somewhat literal here to preserve its color, but listeners should understand it as a formal and respectful invitation to come and eat.

The "group of six monks" refers to the well-known group of six misbehaving monks who appear repeatedly in Vinaya narratives as foils to proper monastic conduct.

The phrase rendered "words of the great bull of the herd" reflects a classical honorific for an eminent speaker delivering a powerful proclamation; it is a stock Vinaya epithet.

- The phrase rendered "with a wooden ladle" translates "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" literally, which is idiomatic and somewhat opaque. The sense appears to be that the Saṅgha's training rule has effectively "ladled out" or blocked the monks from coming — functioning as an ironic complaint by the wife that the Saṅgha has imposed an overly strict rule. This idiomatic usage is contextually interpreted rather than attested with certainty.
- The phrase rendered "cut off all the blameworthy edges of his field-work" translates the Tibetan literally: he had discontinued agricultural activities that carry moral fault (such as plowing, which kills insects). This is the standard Vinaya explanation for why a lay devotee's livelihood might decline after taking precepts, and the faithful Licchavis give the doctrinally correct account — his reduced wealth is due to his own scrupulous renunciation of sinful occupations, not due to his generosity to the Saṅgha.
- The passage is a formal Vinaya procedural text setting out the rite for dissolving a lay training vow, followed by a word-by-word exegetical gloss in the style of a Vinaya commentary. The phrase rendered "group of six" alludes to the well-known group of six monks notorious in Vinaya literature for misconduct, who are frequently cited as the paradigmatic violators in such analytical clauses. The five prepared foods and five cooked foods are standard Vinaya categories whose precise contents vary by tradition; no further specification is given in this passage.
- The phrase rendered "midday meal" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is literally "the meal at the time of the shadow," referring to the midday meal offered to the community, a standard monastic convention.

The phrase ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is rendered as "we will ourselves go to beg alms," meaning the Śākyans will go and gather the alms-food themselves on behalf of the assembly, so the monks need not go on rounds.

The final sentence of the passage is left open as the commander's speech continues beyond the supplied text.

- The phrase rendered "come so that they are concealed by leaves as you approach and serve us" is syntactically compressed in the Tibetan. The women are instructing the monks to cover whatever parts of their bodies the women have not previously seen, by approaching wrapped in leaves, before coming close enough to assist them out of the thickets. This reading follows the narrative logic of the scene, in which the women are protecting their modesty even while needing help.

The "Six Group monks" are the notorious group of six wayward monks who appear repeatedly in Vinaya narratives as negative examples.

- The phrase rendered "the six groups of monks" refers to the notorious group of six ill-behaved monks who appear frequently in the Vinaya narratives as the perpetrators of misconduct — hence why the Śākyan women refuse them food and accuse them of vile conduct.

The formalཀུན་ཀྱང་ (karma/formal act) language rendered here follows standard Vinaya procedural formulae; the repetition is intentional and characteristic of the genre.

"Half a league" renders dpag tshad phyed, literally "half a yojana/league," a standard Vinaya measure for the patrol radius.

- The passage contains a detailed Indian metrology of atomic units up to spatial measure, presented as a standard Vinaya gloss on the term "hermitage" (dgon pa). The sequence moves from sub-atomic particles through biological comparanda to standard linear measures: the final definition places a hermitage at one krośa (a league-fraction, roughly two miles) from a village. The phrase rendered "young attendant" (khye'u) literally means "boy" and in this Vinaya context denotes a junior attendant assigned to serve the forest-patrol monk.
- The "group of six" refers to the well-known group of six notorious monks frequently mentioned in the Vinaya as exemplars of improper conduct.

The term rendered "leopard" for བླ་མ་ is a Tibetan word for a large spotted cat; in Vinaya contexts it may refer to a leopard or panther.

The summary verse is a mnemonic list of training rules to be elaborated in what follows; "step by step" renders རིམ་རིམ་པར་, a reduplicative indicating careful, deliberate movement.

The "five" who were found without fault refers to the five ascetics who became the Buddha's first disciples at Bārāṇasī — Kauṇḍinya and his companions.

- The term translated as "the group of six" refers to the infamous Chaddag, the six monks who repeatedly feature in Vinaya narratives as perpetrators of misconduct prompting new rules. "The fifty who had excelled" and "the sixty of the Bhadra group" are standard designations for cohorts of early disciples in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya. The place name "Takkasilā" is the Pāli and Tibetan rendering of Takṣaśilā, rendered here in its Tibetan phonetic form as it appears in the text.
- The phrase rendered as "for the first time you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have become trained" is the monks' sardonic or ironic reply, implying that the householders are only now learning something — a dismissive retort. The Tibetan is formulaic and slightly compressed, and its exact tone is that of a flippant brush-off.

The image of the lower robe folded "like a palmyra leaf" refers to the broad, flat fan-shape of the talipot or palmyra palm leaf, suggesting the robe gathered and folded outward at the side in a wide, spreading manner. The "grain spike" image suggests a stiff, pointed projection of fabric. The "serpent's hood" below the navel refers to a coiled or flared arrangement resembling a cobra's spread hood, presumably a decorative or dandyish style of draping the waist-cloth.

- The place name "Tagka" renders a Tibetan transliteration of an Indic toponym that is difficult to identify with certainty; it may be Ṭakka, a region in northwestern India known from other Vinaya literature.

The phrase rendered "those drunk on beer and spirits and possessed" follows the Tibetan literally: it distinguishes those intoxicated by alcohol from those who are spirit-possessed, and those intoxicated by meat or strong food. The exact referent of the last category is slightly ambiguous but likely means those rendered unsteady by heavy food or intoxicants derived from fermented substances.

- The phrase rendered "the distance of a yoke" translates the Tibetan literally as "looking to the extent of a yoke-beam," a standard Vinaya idiom for a gaze directed downward roughly four to six feet ahead, the traditional measure of a plough-yoke's length. This is the conventional śramaṇa deportment instruction found across Vinaya traditions.

The list of those said to make a loud clamor includes "spirits" for the Tibetan term referring to a class of non-human beings, here translated in the sense of intoxicating liquor's effect being distinguished from possessing spirits, though the Tibetan word can mean either intoxication or supernatural beings. The context — paired with "drunk on ale" — suggests those in an agitated, unruly state rather than literal spirits, but both readings are possible.

- The recurring exchange between the group of six and the laypeople presents a minor ellipsis: the monks' reply that "first of all, you yourselves have been freed from ignorance and have trained" is a somewhat cryptic retort. In Vinaya commentarial literature this is understood as the group of six deflecting criticism by sarcastically implying that the censuring laypeople are themselves ignorant of the rule — the rule being new and not yet promulgated. The translation renders this literally, as the irony is part of the narrative.

The term rendered "slung over one shoulder" reflects the Tibetan for draping the robe with the shoulder exposed, a posture associated in Indian convention with performers and non-monastics rather than dignified comportment.

- The phrase rendered "leaping over shadows" translates a Tibetan idiom for jumping over one's own shadow or the shadows of objects on the ground, a behavior considered undignified and erratic. The precise physical action is debated in the commentarial tradition, but the general sense of bounding or hopping about in an unseemly way is clear.

The term rendered "those possessed by spirits" translates a word referring to beings seized or afflicted by non-human entities, a recognized category in Indian medical and cultural understanding of the time.

- The term rendered "she-yaks" translates a word that likely refers to female yaks or possibly to a different animal; the comparison to elephants and dancing girls in the same list suggests large, swaying creatures. The "sons of wrestlers" is a reasonable rendering of a compound that could alternatively indicate young men of a particular athletic or martial class. The summary training rule inserted in the middle of the passage is a formulaic consolidation of the rules promulgated up to that point, which is a standard Vinaya compositional feature. The passage ends mid-sentence as the source text provided breaks off.
- The passage "ྐྱོག་མཆོད་པའི་ལྷན་སྒྲིལ་བུ་ལྟར་།" is a vocative addressed to a specific individual and rendered here as "Dear friend" in context; it may be addressing Ānanda specifically or a companion of the group of six. The identity of the addressee is not entirely clear from the text alone and the translation reflects the most natural reading.
- The name translated as "the violent woman" renders Tibetan རྩེ་ཁྲུང་ལྷན་སྒྲིལ་བུ་ལྟར་།, which literally means "the fierce" or "the violent one" and appears to be used as a proper name or epithet for a particular woman in this narrative. The text is a Vinaya story explaining the circumstances surrounding two separate training rules: the rule against sitting uninvited on another's seat, and a subsequent incident involving the monk Charka and an infant. The eighteen benefits of a buddha's walking meditation is a traditional enumeration found in Vinaya literature. The passage about arhats not engaging their knowledge and vision without prior reflection refers to a standard doctrinal point in the Vinaya tradition, explaining why the arhat Charka did not foresee the confusion that would arise.

- The Tibetan phrase rendered "lodge a formal accusation" translates a term meaning to make a formal complaint before a monastic assembly; the precise procedural nuance in early Vinaya contexts is noted here for clarity but does not affect the translation significantly.

The stanza recited by Charka is a well-known verse attributed to the Buddha, found in various Pāli and Sanskrit sources, corresponding to the Dhammapada verse on the teaching of all the awakened ones. The rendering follows the standard form of this verse.

The name "Sādhuvādā" for the queen addressed as "sa 'tsho ma" is a conventional Sanskrit reconstruction of that epithet, meaning something like "she who sustains life" or possibly a personal name; the Tibetan here may preserve a proper name rather than a descriptive title, and identification with a specific historical figure is uncertain.

- The exchange between the Group of Six and the laywomen is coarse and the text somewhat elliptical. The monks' remark about buttocks is a deliberate provocation; the Tibetan is explicit and has been rendered faithfully. The term rendered "acknowledgment" translates a conventional greeting formula expected of monastics when laypeople pay respect. The phrase "Ānanda, Upānanda" here likely refers not to the great disciple Ānanda but to two members of the Group of Six who bore those names — a distinction attested in Vinaya literature.

- The epithet rendered "where Śiśupāla was killed by the crocodile" translates the Tibetan name of the hill literally as "the hill of killing the child of the water-monster," which likely corresponds to a specific named location in the Indian textual geography of this Vinaya tradition. The precise Sanskrit toponym is uncertain; it has been rendered descriptively rather than as a proper name.

- The phrase rendered "drooling hungry ghosts" translates "yi dags lba ba can," literally "hungry ghosts who drool" or "salivating pretas" — a specific subcategory of preta known for perpetual hunger and the flowing of saliva; the rendering captures the vivid sense intended.

The repeated incident involving first cooked rice then curry filling the bowl to the brim represents a redactional pattern common in Vinaya literature, where parallel infractions generate successive training rules. The two rules are kept distinct: the first concerns taking food to the bowl's rim, the second concerns an imbalance between rice and curry portions.

- The phrase rendered "rain of coins fell for seven days" reflects a well-known hagiographic trope in Vinaya narratives where a miraculous rain of valuables signals the spiritual power of an individual; the group of six are mockingly applying the same image to the accidental overflow of rice into the elderly monk's bowl. The sarcasm is deliberate.

The group of six's response about "freeing others from ignorance" is itself ironic and sardonic within the narrative — they are justifying their begging posture as a pedagogical benefit to the donors, which the text presents as specious rationalization.

- The phrase rendered "food that has been set out and food to be eaten" translates རྒྱུག་པའི་ཆོ་འཇགས་ཀྱི་ཆོ་འཇགས་, literally "that which is arranged and that which is to be eaten," a standard Vinaya distinction between food formally presented and food not yet served. The bowl-placement rule concerns holding one's alms bowl suspended over such food, which the text treats as unseemly.

The section heading "the eighty-third section of the Vinayavibhaṅga, and the last one" follows the Tibetan བཅའ་མཆོག་གི་འཇམ་མཁའ་ལྷན་གྱི་འཇམ་མཁའ་ལྷན་, marking the eighty-third fascicle and its conclusion. This is a scribal colophon within the text itself.

The term རྒྱུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ in the second half of the passage, describing how the group of six eat with condiments or "with various modifications," is slightly elliptical; the context makes clear it refers to eating food prepared with various condiments or accompaniments in a manner deemed socially inappropriate.

- The term "ལྟ་བུ་" throughout this passage refers to a morsel or mouthful of food taken while eating. The phrase "ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་" rendered as "properly sized morsels" literally means "a morsel that is fitting or appropriate." The rendering "appetizers" for "ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་" is approximate; the compound likely refers to a first or preparatory course of food, possibly a sauce or relish served before the main meal — the precise culinary term is uncertain but the general sense of a preparatory dish is clear. The passage ends mid-sentence, as it is a fragment awaiting continuation.
- The four onomatopoeic terms rendered as "smacking sounds," "huffing sounds," "blowing," and tongue-protruding are reduplicative Tibetan syllables representing specific table manners violations. The preceding passage already established "smacking sounds" for ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་; here ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ and ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ both relate to using the breath on food, distinguished by whether the food is cold (blowing cold breath to cool it) or hot (blowing warm breath to warm it), though the distinction in English rendering is approximate. The similes in the censure passage — crows, sparrows, and "ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་" (sons of na!) — the last term is obscure; it may refer to a type of scavenging bird or a low-caste group known for picking behavior; rendered contextually as "crows that peck."
- The phrase rendered "prostitutes" translates ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་, literally "those who sell their bodies," which replaces the earlier comparisons to "boys" and "hungry creatures" in this episode alone; the shift is notable and appears intentional in the text to indicate a different or escalated social censure.
- The phrase rendered "consummates evil destinies" translates a literal Tibetan expression meaning something like "that which brings evil rebirths to completion." The group of six appear to be making a mocking theological joke: they shape the flour into a stupa, name it a device that fulfills evil rebirths, and then destroy it as a kind of anti-ritual. The householder's rebuke is that he has abandoned wrong views, whereas they remain bound by aversion. The doctrinal point is preserved in the translation.

The term rendered "adherents of the naked ascetics" refers to the Nirgrantha sect, followers of Mahāvīra, the Jain tradition. The text simply says the householder had faith in the "naked ones" before converting to Buddhism.

- The location "Śiśumāragiri" translates the Tibetan "ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་," literally "the mountain where young crocodiles are killed." This corresponds to the Pali Sumsumāragira, the Crocodile Hill near Bhagga country; the rendering retains the Sanskrit toponym for consistency with canonical usage.

The phrase rendered "slobbering hungry ghosts" translates "ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་," literally "hungry ghosts who drool" or "with saliva flowing" — a specific subcategory of hungry ghost described in Vinaya literature.

- The phrase rendered as "sacred verses" translates a term literally meaning "treatise-verses" or "canonical verses," referring to scriptural stanzas recited over the water to consecrate or purify it before it is given to the layperson as medicinal bowl-rinse water. The precise liturgical content is not specified in the passage.

The passage about insects nesting in bowls placed on bare ground renders a Tibetan phrase indicating the ground lacked a mat or stand beneath the bowl; the insects found there were inadvertently consumed with the food. This is the most natural reading of an otherwise compressed narrative.

- The phrase rendered "group of six monks" refers to the well-known set of habitually transgressive monks (Tibetan drug sde) who appear throughout the Vinaya as negative examples prompting the Buddha to establish rules. The term is a stock formulaic designation and is rendered consistently as such.

The expression "unsurpassed wisdom" renders bla na med pa'i ye shes, literally "gnosis without superior," which in context refers to the Buddha's omniscient awakening rather than a specific technical category of jñāna; the rendering captures both the doctrinal content and the rhetorical force of the laypeople's rebuke.

- The phrase rendered "group of six monks" refers throughout to the infamous "chabdak" or "gang of six," a stock group of ill-behaved monks who appear repeatedly in Vinaya narratives as the occasion for new rules. This is a standard Vinaya literary convention. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as it continues into the next passage with the Blessed One's pronouncement regarding teaching to those with covered heads.
- The passage consists of a formulaic series of Vinaya training rules, each triggered by the same offense committed by the group of six monks but concerning a different improper posture or manner of dress in a listener. The terms translated are: garments pulled over the head (ཤར་པ་ལྟར་ཤུགས་པ་), robes draped over one shoulder (ཤར་པ་ལྟར་ཤུགས་པ་), garments wrapped around the neck (ཤར་པ་ལྟར་ཤུགས་པ་), and garments wrapped around the shoulders or upper back (ཤར་པ་ལྟར་ཤུགས་པ་). The final item introduced at the passage's end, ཤར་པ་ལྟར་ཤུགས་པ་, refers to hair arranged in a topknot or bound up, indicating someone who has not loosened or let down their hair as a mark of respect. These are standard Vinaya decorum rules governing the physical deportment expected of a layperson when receiving Dharma teaching.
- The distinction between the several head-coverings — hat, turban, garland-headress, and head-wrap — reflects specific categories of improper deportment when receiving Dharma teaching. The text is formulaic and repeating, as is typical of Vinaya literature enumerating parallel cases. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, consistent with it being a continuous excerpt.
- The term ཤར་པ་ལྟར་ཤུགས་པ་ is somewhat ambiguous; it may refer to those seated in a palanquin or litter carried by bearers, as distinct from ཤར་པ་ལྟར་ཤུགས་པ་, which refers to those seated on a riding animal or wheeled vehicle. The rendering "seated in a litter" for the former and "seated atop a vehicle" for the latter follows contextual inference from parallel Vinaya literature.
- The text is a formulaic Vinaya passage that repeats the same narrative structure for each prohibited circumstance. The distinction between "carrying weapons" and "carrying swords" reflects two separate Tibetan terms: the first is a general term for weapons or arms, and the second specifically denotes a sword. Both are rendered accordingly to preserve the separate rules they instantiate.
- The phrase rendered "rested his hands on his hips" translates a gesture of frustrated or indignant posture; the Tibetan literally says he "placed his hands on his sides/flanks" while his mind was inwardly churning, which is a conventional gesture of suppressed anger or exasperation. The rendering captures both the physical posture and emotional state.
- The term rendered "duty-monk roster-bowl" refers to the gaṇḍī or rota system whereby monks take turns on duty; the Tibetan here is "dge skos kyi bsod snyoms nod pa'i res bab," meaning it fell to Upananda's turn to carry the alms-bowl in the capacity of the duty-monk supervisor, a role involving organizing the rota of the community's almsfood collection. The exact mechanics of this office vary across Vinaya traditions; no consequential doctrinal uncertainty arises, but the procedural detail is specific to the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya context.
- The summary verse at the beginning is a mnemonic verse enumerating the seven procedures for settling disputes in the Vinaya, a standard canonical list. The verse is extremely compressed and the translation renders each term according to its established Vinaya technical meaning: "directly" refers to settling face-to-face; "by recollection" refers to the declaration of a clear memory of innocence; "without intoxication" refers to the procedure of declaring non-liability on grounds of mental incapacity at the time of the act; "the many" refers to decision by majority; "essential nature" refers to investigation of the factual nature of the offense; "strewn grass" is the procedure of mutual forgiveness before the assembly, likened to grass being scattered; and "acknowledgment" refers to the formal confession procedure.

The final verse about the bee is a well-known verse from the Dhammapada tradition (Dhammapada verse 49); its presence here marks a standard Vinaya closure citation.

- The colophon names Jinamitra and the lotsāwa Nāgarājadhvaja as translator and editor, working under royal patronage, and specifies the Sarvāstivāda Vinaya in its Kāśmīra sub-school variant as the source tradition. The figure of "twenty-five thousand verses in eighty-three sections" is the canonical count given for the Tibetan rendering and is preserved as stated. The epithet rendered "the radiant preserver" corresponds to the buddha-name Kāśyapa, and "destroyer of cyclic existence" to Vipasyin, as part of the standard enumeration of the seven buddhas of antiquity; these are not spelled out explicitly in the Tibetan here but are implied by the group designation.
