

This short text, known in Tibetan as the Dhāraṇī Mantra for Dispelling Disorders

Toh 801 · Derge Kangyur

This short text, known in Tibetan as the Dhāraṇī Mantra for Dispelling Disorders of Phlegm, is a brief protective spell text preserved as Toh 801 in the Kangyur, belonging to the broad class of dhāraṇī literature concerned with healing and the pacification of illness. Opening with homage to the noble bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, it presents a short mantra formula—oṃ śānti śānti bhiti śānti sarva biti mula myagasa svāhā—said to counteract phlegm-related ailments and their attendant symptoms, including indigestion, bloating, tumorous growths, and wasting conditions. As is typical of such dhāraṇī texts, it combines an invocation of a compassionate buddha or bodhisattva with a sequence of sacred syllables believed to carry therapeutic power when recited or applied ritually. Its inclusion in the Kangyur reflects the traditional Buddhist view that certain mantras, backed by the blessing of enlightened beings, can serve as effective remedies for physical as well as spiritual afflictions.

The dhāraṇī mantra for dispelling disorders of phlegm.

Homage to the noble Avalokiteśvara.

Oṃ śānti śānti bhiti śānti sarva biti mula myagasa svāhā.

For indigestion of food, for bloating, for tumorous growths, and for wasting—

Translator's Notes

- The source text breaks off mid-list (after "□□□□□□," wasting/depletion), evidently continuing with further ailments in the original manuscript that are not included in this excerpt. The mantra syllables are given as a phonetic transliteration of the Tibetan transcription of the Sanskrit dhāraṇī and are preserved as such rather than translated, per convention for mantra material. The epithet "dbang phyug" (Skt. īśvara) is already incorporated into the name Avalokiteśvara and so is not rendered separately.
