

The Supreme Text of Monastic Discipline

Vinaya Uttaragrantha · Toh 7 · Derge Kangyur

འདུལ་བ་གཞུང་དམ་པ།

The Supreme Text of Monastic Discipline, known in Sanskrit as the Vinaya Uttaragrantha and in Tibetan as Dulwa Zhung Dampa, is a canonical Vinaya text belonging to the Mūlasarvāstivāda monastic code. It forms part of the extensive Vinaya collection within the Kangyur and is catalogued as Toh 7. The text takes the form of a detailed legal and disciplinary analysis, structured around questions posed by the Elder Upāli to the Buddha, and concerns itself with fine points of monastic law — particularly the rules governing the root offense of unchaste conduct, exploring edge cases and hypothetical scenarios with considerable technical precision. As a supplementary or "upper" treatise to the core Vinaya, it extends and refines the foundational rules of the Mūlasarvāstivāda tradition, occupying an important place in the broader body of texts regulating the conduct and communal life of Buddhist monastics.

In the Indian language: Vinaya Uttaragrantha. In the Tibetan language: The Supreme Text of Monastic Discipline. Homage to the All-Knowing, the Auspicious One.

The First Section.

In brief:

Three of animal kind, and three pathways,
What is entered and what is re-entered, two modes,
What is taken hold of, and what is thrust in again,
The teeth, what is not touched, and like a sow.

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, if a monk, by means of a drug or a mantra, transforms a human woman so that she is born in an animal existence, and then engages in unchaste conduct with her, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "Venerable One, if a monk, by means of a mantra or a drug, transforms himself so that he is born in an animal existence, and then engages in unchaste conduct together with a human woman, what becomes of that?" "If he retains the perception of himself as a monk, since it constitutes engagement in sexual intercourse, it becomes a defeat. If he does not retain the perception of himself as a monk, it becomes a grave offense." "Venerable One, if a monk, by means of a mantra or a drug, transforms both himself and a human woman so that both are born in an animal existence, and they engage in unchaste conduct with each other, what becomes of that?" "If he retains the perception of himself as a monk, since it constitutes engagement in sexual intercourse, it becomes a defeat. If he does not retain the perception of himself as a monk, it becomes a grave offense."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, when you said 'it becomes a defeat immediately upon insertion,' how much constitutes insertion into the mouth?" "Upāli, when the tip passes beyond the teeth." "How much constitutes insertion into the pathway of defecation?" "When the tip passes beyond the opening of the rectum." "How much constitutes insertion into the pathway of urination?" "When the tip passes beyond the labia."

"Venerable One, if a woman has been split in two and all three openings have also been damaged, and a monk joins half to half and engages in unchaste conduct, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "Venerable One, if a monk engages in unchaste conduct with a woman who has been cut at the waist, using any one of the three openings that remains undamaged, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "Venerable One, if a monk engages in unchaste conduct with a woman whose head has been severed, what becomes of that?" If it is done through the pathway of defecation or the pathway of urination, it becomes a defeat. But if it is done through the mouth, through a wound, or through a hollow in a bone, it becomes a grave offense.

The Blessed One has declared that engaging in sexual intercourse — unchaste conduct — with a non-human woman becomes a defeat. What sort of being is a non-human? One possessed of all limbs. The same should be understood to apply to those who have taken on animal form.

"Venerable One, if something is thrust in with repetition, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "Venerable One, if a monk engages in unchaste conduct by inserting beyond the outer teeth into the inside of the mouth, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "Venerable One, if a monk inserts into the pathway of defecation, the pathway of urination, or the mouth without touching, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "Venerable One, if a monk engages in unchaste conduct with the hairless, burned corpse of a sow, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. And the same should be stated for all animal existences.

In brief:

Another's limb, and one who is born with two sex organs — likewise so.

Two who are damaged, one who is bound,
The fourth with two, and the seventh.

"Venerable One, if a monk inserts a male organ into another's female organ, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "Venerable One, if a single monk enters into union for the purpose of unchaste conduct alone, is there a defeat?"

"Upāli, what does it mean for something to be elongated?" It is like a bolster or cushion.

"Venerable One, if a monk enters into the crouch of a bee-keeper's hive and the woman is sitting outside, and while she remains there in that position he wraps around and engages in unchaste conduct, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat.

"Venerable One, the Blessed One has spoken of 'violation while alive.' How much violation counts as 'while alive'?" "As much as a wound has appeared, or it has decayed, or decomposed, or been eaten by creatures — to that extent it is said to be 'while alive.'" "How much violation counts as 'not while alive'?" "As when both ends of it have become equal — that is 'not while alive.' For a corpse the same should be stated likewise." The same should be stated in the same way also for non-humans, those born in animal existences, males, hermaphrodites, and male hermaphrodites.

"If wrapped around and inserted, it does not become a defeat." The Blessed One having declared this, the monks asked: "If monks wrap around with thick felt or coarse cloth and insert, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "If wrapped around with cotton, silk, or thin cloth and inserted, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat.

"Venerable One, if a monk inserts perceiving a passage as a passage, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "If he inserts perceiving a passage as not a passage, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "If he inserts perceiving what is not a passage as not a passage, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "If he inserts perceiving what is not a passage as a passage, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

"If a monk inserts perceiving a wrapped one as wrapped, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "If he inserts perceiving a wrapped one as unwrapped, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "If he inserts perceiving an unwrapped one as wrapped, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "If he inserts perceiving an unwrapped one as unwrapped, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat.

"Venerable One, if one who has not yet received full ordination prepares for unchaste conduct and is inserted into by one who has not yet received full ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If one who has not yet received full ordination prepares and is inserted into by one in the act of receiving full ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If one who has not yet received full ordination prepares and is inserted into by one who has fully received ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "If one in the act of receiving full ordination prepares and is inserted into by one in the act of receiving full ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If one who has fully received ordination prepares and is inserted into by one who has fully received ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "If one who has fully received ordination prepares and, having received full ordination, inserts, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "If one who has fully received ordination prepares and is inserted into by one who has not fully received ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

Just as a monk who, through the conditions of unchaste conduct, incurs a defeat, and likewise one who has given up the training — so also for a fully ordained nun it becomes a defeat. For a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a novice nun, and a male novice it becomes a wrongdoing.

In brief:

The group of eighty, the mark, the unequal value yet the mark;
the seventh who has received full ordination performs the act — the eleven dice pieces are likewise so.

"Venerable One, if a monk counts himself as belonging to both assemblies of the group of eighty, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "What is the fortunate portion belonging to the Dharma in that case?" It is the first. "If having taken it he conceals it, it becomes a transgression through knowingly speaking a falsehood." When it has been completed, the value is to be assessed.

"Venerable One, among the marks set and established by people, if a monk moves a more valuable mark to a less valuable location, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "If he moves a less valuable mark to a more valuable location, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat.

"Venerable One, if a monk steals an object of no value, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat.

"What is meant by an object of no value?" It is something that, though it has become precious, cannot have a price assessed upon it. "If a monk steals an object that has no assessable value, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "What is meant by an object of no value?" It is something so small that a price cannot be set upon it. "Venerable One, if a monk steals an object that cannot be assessed, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "If he steals an object that can be assessed, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk who has set out to steal changes his ordination status and, having become a nun, then steals, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "If a nun who has set out to steal changes her ordination status and becomes a monk, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat.

"Venerable One, if one who has not yet received full ordination sets out to steal and steals before receiving full ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If one who has not yet received full ordination sets out to steal and steals in the very act of receiving full ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If one who has not yet received full ordination sets out to steal and then steals after having received full ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "If one in the very act of receiving full ordination sets out to steal and steals in that same act of receiving full ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If one sets out to steal during the very act of receiving full ordination and steals after full ordination has been completed, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "Venerable One, if a monk who has received full ordination sets out to steal after receiving full ordination and then steals after receiving full ordination, what becomes of that?" It becomes a defeat. "If one who has received full ordination sets out to steal and steals before full ordination has been completed, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk throws dice in the open sky, what becomes of that?" It is the same as the matter in itself. However, if he does so by supernatural power, there is no offense. "Venerable One, if a monk throws dice by a route that is not the proper one, what becomes of that?" If by doing so he exceeds the boundary of that place, it becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk says to merchants, 'They are going,' what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, in a case where merchants say to a monk, 'Noble One, please carry goods that are subject to a toll-station past the toll-station without having reached the toll-station point' — if a monk then carries them, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, in a case where merchants say to a monk, 'Noble One, please carry goods that are subject to a toll-station past the toll-station without having reached the toll-station point, and take for yourself half of whatever toll is assessed there' — if the monk then carries them, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, in a case where merchants say to a monk, 'Noble One, please carry goods that are subject to a toll-station past the toll-station without having reached the toll-station point, and take for yourself all of whatever toll is assessed there' — if the monk then carries them, what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if goods that merchants have made subject to a toll-station have not reached the toll-station point and a monk shows them a different route, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, in a case where merchants say to a monk, 'Noble One, please carry goods that are subject to a toll-station past the toll-station without having reached the toll-station point' — if the monk then carries them, what becomes of that?" It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, in a case where merchants have made goods subject to a toll-station, and those goods have reached the toll-station point, and the merchants say to the monk, 'Noble One, please release us from this toll-station place and carry the goods past, and take for yourself half of whatever toll is assessed here' — if the monk then carries them out of that statement, what becomes of that?" The value of the toll is to be assessed.

"Venerable One, in a case where merchants have made goods subject to a toll-station, and those goods have reached the toll-station point, and the merchants say to the monk, 'Noble One, please release us from this toll-station place and carry the goods past, and take for yourself all of whatever toll is assessed here' — if the monk then carries them out of that statement, what becomes of that?" The value of the toll is to be assessed.

In summary:

The robe-rack, the fourth of the fabric goods,
And theft, the third of the root downfalls,
Three kinds of engagement, and doubt,
And other continents — these do not apply to non-humans.

"Venerable One, if a monk, first with a mind to steal, cuts the initial plank of a robe-rack and then, at a later time, appropriates the rest with a sense of ownership — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk, when first cutting a plank of a robe-rack, does so with a sense of ownership but later comes to regard it as theft — what becomes of that?" The value is to be assessed.

"Venerable One, if a monk steals a plank of a robe-rack with a mind to steal, and at the time of stealing, robes happen to be draped over that robe-rack, and he takes the rack together with the robes — what becomes of that?" The value of the robe-rack plank is to be assessed.

"Venerable One, if a robe-rack with robes draped upon it and set in place is stolen by four monks or more — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. However, if what is divided among them individually amounts to five māṣas each, it comes to a defeat.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, into how many types does theft fall?" "Upāli, there are six: theft by deception, theft by force, theft by snatching from one who is asleep, theft by snatching from one who is carrying something, theft while feigning to protect, and Dharma-theft."

"Venerable One, the Blessed One has taught that theft falls into six types — which of them incurs a defeat?" All of them except Dharma-theft incur a defeat.

"Venerable One, the Blessed One has taught that stealing five māṣas incurs a defeat — can a monk incur a defeat by stealing three māṣas?" Upāli, yes, there is such a case: when three māṣas constitute one quarter of something.

"Venerable One, can a monk steal five māṣas and yet not incur a defeat?" Yes, there is such a case: when what exceeds five māṣas constitutes one quarter of something.

"Venerable One, the Blessed One has taught that stealing five māṣas does not incur a defeat — what kind of five māṣas, when stolen, would incur a defeat?" A nāṇaka of twenty māṣas. "What is a māṣaka?" Four kākinīs. "What is a kārṣāpaṇa?" One made with all ornamental markings.

"Venerable One, the Blessed One has taught that stealing five māṣas does not incur a defeat — can a monk steal a thousand kārṣāpaṇas and still not incur a defeat?" Yes, there is such a case: when he takes it perceiving it as something abandoned.

"Venerable One, the Blessed One has taught that stealing five māṣas incurs a defeat — can a monk steal five māṣas and yet not incur a defeat?" Yes, there is such a case: namely, if he steals one at a time, or two at a time, or three at a time, or four at a time, and the total never reaches five.

"Venerable One, if a monk takes a large implement perceiving it as his own, and then hides it with a mind to steal — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if, in that case, a monk takes something with a mind to steal and then hides it with a sense of ownership — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk steals something with doubt and a divided mind — thinking 'Is this that one, or is this it, or is this not it?' — what becomes of that?" It is in accordance with the actual thing.

"Venerable One, if a monk steals without permission from the western continent of Aparagodānīya — what becomes of that?" If, reckoned by the measure of that continent, five māṣas are stolen, it results in a defeat.

"Venerable One, if one steals without permission from the eastern continent of Pūrvavideha — what becomes of that?" If, reckoned by the measure of that continent, five māṣas are stolen, it results in a defeat.

"Venerable One, if one steals without permission from the northern continent of Uttarakuru — what becomes of that?" Upāli, in that continent there is no taking what is not given, for everything there is held in common. However, if a mind to steal arises, it becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk steals without permission on behalf of another — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. But if he thinks, "This belongs to that person," there is no offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk perceives a non-human being as a non-human being and steals from it without permission — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. If one perceives a non-human being as a human, it becomes a grave offense. If one perceives a human as a non-human, it becomes a grave offense. If one perceives a human as a human, it results in a defeat.

In brief:

A stūpa, relics, and a scripture volume, what is dedicated to the Saṅgha, one from one,
two perceptions, and dwelling accordingly — the last is a household not yet found.

"Venerable One, if a monk steals the ornaments of a stūpa or the ornaments surrounding a stūpa — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "If a monk steals relics — what becomes of that?" It results in a defeat. "Venerable One, if a monk steals a scripture volume — what becomes of that?" The value of the scripture volume is to be assessed.

"Venerable One, if a monk steals without permission from the Saṅgha of the four quarters — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "Venerable One, if a monk steals without permission from many persons — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense; but if from that the individual share of each amounts to five māṣas, and he steals that, it results in a defeat.

"Venerable One, if a monk steals without permission from what has been dedicated — what becomes of that?" It results in a defeat.

"Venerable One, if many monks steal without permission by passing something from one to another — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. However, each one's individual appropriation is to be assessed according to the value of however much each made his own.

"Venerable One, if a monk perceives something as belonging to another and steals it without permission — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk perceives what is fully appropriated as fully appropriated and steals it without permission — what becomes of that?" It results in a defeat. "If one perceives what is not fully appropriated as fully appropriated and steals it without permission — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "If one perceives what is fully appropriated as not fully appropriated and takes it without permission — what becomes of that?" It becomes a grave offense. "If one perceives what is not fully appropriated as not fully appropriated" — there is no offense.

"Venerable One, the Blessed One has said that stealing a large implement without permission results in a defeat. Is there then a case where a monk steals a large implement without permission and yet it does not result in a defeat?" Yes, there is: namely, if it is stolen from the very place where it was deposited and stored.

"Venerable One, if a monk, regarding a find that does not fall under his authority, declares 'I have authority over this' — what becomes of that?" Since he knowingly speaks a falsehood, it constitutes a transgression. But if the intention was merely approximate, it becomes a grave offense. If the claim is fully established, the value is to be assessed.

"Venerable One, is there a case where a single monk, having entered a house and taken something without permission, incurs a defeat?"

"Upāli, there is such a case. How does it come about? If a monk, with the intention of taking without permission — that is, with the intention of theft — prepares himself and then enters, or enters and then prepares himself, and death results, it entails a defeat. Likewise, if the training has been surrendered, the same applies to a nun: it results in a defeat. In the case of a female trainee, a novice nun, or male novices, it constitutes a grave offense.

In brief:

Three animal rebirths, and existence through karma,
The existence of the mother, and the fourth,
Two wombs, and sustaining life,
Perception, and the fourth.

Venerable One, if a monk, by means of mantra or medicine, transforms a human being into an animal rebirth and thereby separates that being from life — what becomes of that? It results in a defeat.

Venerable One, if a monk, by means of mantra or medicine, transforms himself into an animal rebirth and thereby separates himself from human life — what becomes of that? If he retains the perception of being a monk and thereby acts in a manner that a monk ought not to act, it results in a defeat. If he does not retain the perception of being a monk, it constitutes a grave offense.

Venerable One, is there a case in which a monk separates his father and mother from life, and yet incurs neither a defeat nor an uninterrupted offense (ānantarika)? There is: when one's parents have taken rebirth in the animal realm.

Venerable One, is there a case in which a monk kills his father and yet incurs neither a defeat nor an uninterrupted offense? Upāli, because what is called 'father' is that which generates the karmic existence of beings — if it is the defiled karmic existence that has been killed, then it is in that sense a defeat, but an uninterrupted offense, no.

Is there a case in which a monk does not kill his mother and yet incurs neither a defeat nor an uninterrupted offense? Upāli, because what is called 'mother' is that which generates craving — if it is craving that has been killed, it is in that sense a defeat, but an uninterrupted offense, no.

Venerable One, if a monk intends to kill his mother but instead kills another woman — what becomes of that? It constitutes a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk intends to kill another woman but does not kill her — what becomes of that? It constitutes a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk, having prepared to kill his mother but without having killed her, causes another woman to be separated from life — what becomes of that? It constitutes a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk, having prepared to kill another woman, causes his mother to be separated from life — what becomes of that? It constitutes a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk kills an animal rebirth that is within the womb of a human woman — what becomes of that? It constitutes a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk does not kill a human being that is within the womb of a female animal — what becomes of that? If the one in the womb is perceived as a human, it results in a defeat. If not perceived as such, it is a transgression.

Venerable One, the mother is the one who generates, while the other is the one who nurtures. If one is separated from life, which of the two results in a defeat and which in an uninterrupted offense? It is the one who generated.

Venerable One, if a monk perceives a human as a human and kills that person — what becomes of that? It results in a defeat. If the monk perceives a human as other than a human and kills that person — what becomes of that? It constitutes a grave offense. If the monk perceives what is not a human as a human and kills it — what becomes of that? It constitutes a grave offense. If the monk perceives what is not a human as not a human and kills it — what becomes of that? It constitutes a grave offense.

In brief:

Doubt of the second kind,
Self and arhat equally,
Two thieves and mistaken perception of another,
The seventh, and the last as well.

Venerable One, if a monk, while wavering in doubt and uncertainty — thinking 'Is this that person, or is this not that person?' — thereby causes that one to be separated from life, what becomes of that? It results in a defeat.

Venerable One, if a monk causes himself to be separated from life — what becomes of that? It constitutes a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk, having prepared to kill his father and mother, kills himself instead — what becomes of that? If the father and mother had died previously, it results in a defeat and also in an uninterrupted offense."

But if he himself had done so at an earlier time, it results in a grave offense and does not constitute an uninterrupted offense.

Venerable One, if a monk intends to kill an arhat but instead kills an ordinary person — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk intends to kill an ordinary person but instead kills an arhat — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk has prepared to kill an arhat and instead kills an ordinary person — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk, having prepared to kill an ordinary person, instead separates an arhat from life — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, a thief being led away for execution makes his escape, and whether it be a village constable or a royal constable who then pursues him from behind, a monk comes along just ahead of them and is asked by them, "Did you see a thief who fled past?" and that monk, while harboring an intent to kill that thief, points him out to them — what becomes of that? It results in a defeat.

Venerable One, a thief being led away for execution makes his escape, and whether it be a village constable or a royal constable who then pursues him from behind, a monk also comes along just ahead of them and is asked, "Did you see a thief who fled past?" and that monk likewise harbors an intent to kill that thief, yet does not point him out to them, and they then separate him from life — what becomes of that? It constitutes an offense.

Venerable One, if two are traveling together, one intending to kill the other and the other is indeed killed — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

If one who has not yet received full ordination prepared to kill someone and kills that person before receiving full ordination — what becomes of that? It constitutes an offense.

If one who has not yet received full ordination prepared to kill someone and then kills that person in the very moment of receiving full ordination — what becomes of that? It constitutes an offense.

If one who has not yet received full ordination prepared to kill someone, and then, having received full ordination, kills that person — what becomes of that? It results in a defeat.

If one, during the very moment of receiving full ordination, having prepared to kill someone kills that person during that same moment — what becomes of that? It constitutes an offense.

If one, during the very moment of receiving full ordination, having prepared to kill someone, kills that person after having received full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a defeat.

If one who has already received full ordination, having prepared to kill someone, kills that person after full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a defeat.

If one who has already received full ordination, having prepared to kill someone, kills that person before receiving full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, is there such a thing as a single monk incurring defeat by entering a household for the purpose of being separated from life himself? Upāli, there is — it is as when a monk has prepared to kill and then enters within. Just as a monk incurs defeat through the condition of being separated from life, so too is it for one who returns his training, and for a nun it equally results in a defeat. For a probationer nun, a male novice, and a female novice, it constitutes an offense.

In brief:

Pure, and the Teacher is seen clearly — the one who has more to learn, the teacher, affliction, and lapse, release, fear, birth, gain — these are such cases.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I am pure" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I am the Teacher" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I am a hearer of Vipāśyin, Śikhin, Viśvabhū, Krakucchanda, Kanakamuni, and Kāśyapa" — what becomes of that? If he announces a prophetic declaration regarding the former abodes, it results in a defeat.

But if he says, "From the time I took refuge in Śākyamuni onward, I have taken refuge in all perfectly and fully awakened buddhas," that results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I am one who has nothing more to learn" — what becomes of that? If he announces a prophetic declaration regarding the abandonment of afflictions, it results in the final offense. But if he says, "I am learning no craft whatsoever," that results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I am one who has something to learn" — what becomes of that? If he announces a prophetic declaration regarding conduct appropriate to one who still has to learn, it results in the final offense. But if he says, "I am training in the holy life," that results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I have no afflictions" — what becomes of that? If he announces a prophetic declaration regarding the abandonment of afflictions, it results in the final offense. But if he says, "I have no alms-bowl, or robe, or any of the requisites for a monk's livelihood," that results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I have lapsed" — what becomes of that? If he says, "I have lapsed from the fruits of the ascetic life," it results in the final offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I am released" — what becomes of that? If he says, "I am released from entanglement, bondage, underlying tendencies, secondary afflictions, and what has passed while being thoroughly enmeshed," it results in the final offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I have no fear" — what becomes of that? If he announces a prophetic declaration regarding the abandonment of fear, it results in the final offense. But if he says, "By fear, I am not frightened in the least," what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "This is my last birth" — what becomes of that? If he announces a prophetic declaration regarding the exhaustion of birth, it results in the final offense. But if he says, "Birth is exhausted, stopped, separated, thoroughly separated — in this way, this is the last birth," that results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I have fully attained" — what becomes of that? If he says, "I have attained the fruits of monkhood," it results in the final offense. But if he announces a prophetic declaration regarding a worldly thing, that results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "How wonderful! How remarkable that you have become like what I am!" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

In brief:

Unripened, patience, self-comparison, abandonment, the second fruit,
the four perceptions, what is to be attained, and lastly the worldly — these are such cases.

Venerable One, suppose a venerable monk is asked, "Venerable one, have you the fruit of exhausted defilements?" and that monk, while carrying carefully an unripened fruit from a tree, replies, "It is unripened" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I have attained the fruit of stream-entry, the fruit of once-returning, the fruit of non-returning, and the supreme fruit" — what becomes of that? It results in the final offense.

Venerable One, if a monk has himself written and says, "Who wrote this? — I am an arhat" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, suppose a householder asks a monk, "Have you attained the fruit?" and that monk, carrying flowers and ripened fruits, replies, "It is unripened" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I have declined" — what becomes of that? If he declares that he has declined from an attainment he actually possesses, it results in the final offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "I am not one who has entered the stream, not one who returns once, not one who never returns, not an arhat" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "At the mountain called Gro-ba I attained the fruit of stream-entry; on the slope of the mountain called Ri-dgu-pa, the fruit of once-returning; at Vulture Peak, the fruit of non-returning; and in the grove called Öma, the supreme fruit" — what becomes of that? It results in the final offense.

Venerable One, if a monk perceives a human being as something other than human and then declares a teaching surpassing the human — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If he perceives a non-human as human, it results in a grave offense. If he perceives a non-human as a non-human, it results in a grave offense. If he perceives a human as human, it results in the final offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "Whatever is to be attained by a śrāvaka — that I have attained" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "Today I did not enter meditative absorption into a worldly dhyāna — not in the evening, not at any time since then" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk says, "Come here by prophetic declaration" — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

In brief:

Through messenger, written letter, sign language,
through another's words, or passed from one to another,
through one who is mad, or whose mind is disturbed, through one who is ill, mute, or foolish — these are the last category.

Venerable One, if a monk declares a teaching surpassing the human through a messenger — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Likewise, through a written letter, through a sign, through instructing another, or passing it from person to person — in every such case it results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk declares a teaching surpassing the human to one who is mad — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Likewise, to one whose mind is disturbed, to one tormented by illness, to one who is mute, and to one who is foolish — in every such case it results in a grave offense.

In brief:

To one who is asleep, to one who is delirious, to one who is intoxicated, to one who has gone into meditative absorption, and likewise by voice, by bodily gesture, in a secluded place, or by mantra — from one person to another, these are the last category.

Venerable One, if a monk who is a noble one speaks a teaching surpassing the human to another monk in the noble language, and that monk does not understand the noble language — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If a noble one speaks in a border dialect and that monk does not understand the border dialect — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If one who speaks a border dialect speaks in a border dialect and that monk does not understand the border dialect — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If one who speaks a border dialect declares a teaching surpassing the human to a monk in the noble language, and that monk does not understand the noble language — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk teaches a teaching surpassing the human through a bodily gesture — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk perceives a secluded place as non-secluded and declares a teaching surpassing the human — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk makes himself invisible through a mantra or medicine and then declares a teaching surpassing the human — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk declares a teaching surpassing the human while learning it from another — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk declares a teaching surpassing the human on behalf of another — what becomes of that? It results in an offense.

Just as the consequences arising from a monk's speech apply in the ways described, the same applies to one who has given back the training, and the same outcomes apply to nuns. For female probationers, novice nuns, and male novices it results in an offense.

This concludes the section on defeat offenses from the questions of the Venerable Upāli.

In summary:

Not asleep, as when asleep, likewise stirring;
those without striving, and their counterparts;
the seventh likewise, and others — these are gathered together with their classes.

The Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable One, if one strives while not asleep and then lies down and emits semen — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if one strives while asleep and, upon waking, semen is emitted — what becomes of that? If one strove, it results in a grave offense. If one did not strive, there is no offense.

Venerable One, you have said that emitting semen that has already gathered into a blister results in a grave offense — how much swelling constitutes a blister? It is blocked from the place as soon as it has blistered. Venerable One, you have said that the Blessed One has prohibited stirring — how much stirring is prohibited? It is prohibited from the place as soon as there is stirring.

Venerable One, if semen is emitted without any striving — what becomes of that? If there is no experience of pleasure, there is no offense.

Venerable One, if a monk, through the emission of semen, undergoes a change of sex and becomes a nun — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense arising from a Saṅgha remainder offense. Venerable One, if a nun, through the emission of semen, undergoes a change of sex and becomes a monk — what becomes of that? It results in an offense arising from a downfall.

Venerable One, if a monk extracts semen from another's male organ — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if one who has not received full ordination strives and emits semen while not fully ordained — what becomes of that? It results in an offense. If one who has not received full ordination strives and emits semen in the very act of receiving full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in an offense. If one who has not received full ordination strives and emits semen after having received full ordination — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If one strives in the very act of receiving full ordination and emits semen in the very act of receiving full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in an offense. If one strives in the very act of receiving full ordination and emits semen after full ordination is complete — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If one strives after full ordination is complete and emits semen after full ordination is complete — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If one begins to strive after receiving full ordination and emits semen while not yet fully ordained — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Just as when a monk incurs a Saṅgha remainder offense through the emission of semen, so too with one who has given back the training it is likewise a Saṅgha remainder offense. For a nun it is according to the actual act. For female probationers, novice nuns, and male novices it results in an offense.

In summary:

The body, doubt, the tooth, and likewise wound, hair, and nail — the fourth, the second, and the seventh — are also gathered into their classes.

Venerable One, if a monk makes full bodily contact with a woman whose faculties are impaired — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk whose own bodily faculty is impaired makes full bodily contact with a woman — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if both parties have impaired bodily faculties and the two make full bodily contact with one another — what becomes of that? It results in an offense.

Venerable One, if a monk, while doubt, uncertainty, and suspicion arise in him that this woman may not be a woman, makes full bodily contact with her — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if contact is made through a wound — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if contact is made with a tooth — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if contact is made with a wound — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if contact is made through hair — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if contact is made with hair — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if contact is made with a nail — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if contact is made by means of a nail — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk makes contact with a human woman while perceiving her as human — what becomes of that? It is a remainder for the Saṅgha. If he makes contact with a human being while perceiving that being as non-human — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If he makes contact with a non-human while perceiving her as human — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If he makes contact with a non-human while perceiving her as non-human — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk makes contact with a clothed woman while perceiving her as clothed — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If he makes contact with a clothed woman while perceiving her as unclothed — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If he makes contact with an unclothed woman while perceiving her as clothed — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If he makes contact with an unclothed woman while perceiving her as unclothed — what becomes of that? It is a remainder for the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, if one who has not received full ordination prepares to make full bodily contact and then makes contact while not yet fully ordained — what becomes of that? It results in an offense. If one who has not received full ordination prepares to make contact and then makes contact at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in an offense. If one who has not received full ordination prepares to make contact and then makes contact after full ordination has been received — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If one who is at the moment of receiving full ordination prepares to make contact and then makes contact at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in an offense. If one who is at the moment of receiving full ordination prepares to make contact and then makes contact once fully ordained — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If one who has already received full ordination prepares to make contact and then makes contact while fully ordained — what becomes of that? It is a remainder for the Saṅgha. If one who has already received full ordination prepares to make contact and then makes contact before full ordination has been received — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

In summary:

Perceiving otherwise, a corpse, bones, sexual characteristics, a male, a soft one,
a hermaphrodite, a father, a mother's brother's wife, in meditative absorption, lying down, and going about.

Venerable One, if a monk, out of desire for one woman, makes full bodily contact together with another — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if contact is made together with a woman's corpse — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk makes contact with a woman's fleshless skeleton — what becomes of that? It results in an offense.

Venerable One, if a monk makes full bodily contact with a woman and, in the course of that act, his sexual characteristics transform and he becomes a nun — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a nun makes full bodily contact with a man and, in the course of that act, her sexual characteristics transform and she becomes a monk — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk makes full bodily contact with a man — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk makes contact thinking it to be something soft or pleasant — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Thinking it to be soft or warm — that too results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk makes full bodily contact with a paṇḍaka together with a man — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If he makes full bodily contact with a paṇḍaka together with a woman — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk makes full bodily contact with a woman who is in meditative absorption — what becomes of that? It results in a Saṅgha remainder offense. Venerable One, if a monk makes full bodily contact with a woman who is asleep — what becomes of that? It results in a Saṅgha remainder offense. Venerable One, if a monk makes full bodily contact with a woman who is dwelling in another state of existence — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Just as a monk incurs a Saṅgha remainder offense through full bodily contact, so too does one who has given back the training incur a Saṅgha remainder offense. For fully ordained nuns it results in a root downfall. For female probationers, novice nuns, and male novices it results in a misdeed.

In summary, by means of voice, body, a secluded spell, conjuring one thing from another, sending a message, a written letter, a hand-sign, saying it through another — these are the seven. The divisions concern paṇḍakas: male paṇḍakas, and paṇḍakas who are good and those who are wicked.

Venerable One, if a noble monk speaks licentious words to a woman in the noble language, and that woman does not understand the noble language — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If a noble one speaks in a border dialect, and that woman does not understand the border dialect either — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If a border person speaks in a border dialect, and that woman does not understand the border dialect — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. If a border person speaks licentious words to a woman in the noble language, and that woman does not understand the noble language either — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if a monk directs his body as a visual gesture and speaks licentious words to a woman — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk perceives a secluded place as secluded and speaks licentious words to a woman — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk renders himself invisible by means of a spell or a drug and speaks licentious words to a woman — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk causes another to speak licentious words to a woman — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk speaks licentious words to a woman on behalf of another — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk speaks licentious words to an emanated woman — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Venerable One, if a monk causes a message to be conveyed to a woman — what becomes of that? It results in a grave offense. Likewise, a written letter, a hand-sign, saying it through another, and passing it from one to another — all of these result in a grave offense.

Venerable One, if one who has not received full ordination frames licentious words and speaks them as one who has not received full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed. If one who has not received full ordination frames them and speaks them as one who is on the verge of full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed. If one who has not received full ordination frames them and speaks them having fully ordained — what becomes of that? It results in a Saṅgha remainder offense. If one who is on the verge of full ordination frames them and speaks them as one on the verge of full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed. If one on the verge of full ordination frames them and speaks them as one fully ordained — what becomes of that? It results in a Saṅgha remainder offense. If one who is fully ordained frames them and speaks them as one fully ordained — what becomes of that? It results in a Saṅgha remainder offense.

If one who is fully ordained frames them and speaks them as one not fully ordained — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable ones, if a monk says to a woman, "Share equally with me in a great matter" — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk says this to a hermaphrodite — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he says it to a man — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he says it to a female hermaphrodite — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable ones, if a monk says to a woman, "How splendid" — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Venerable ones, if a monk says to a woman, "You are a sinful one" — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

In brief:

A madwoman, one mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one delirious, one simple-minded, one asleep, one intoxicated with alcohol, one drunk — and a nun, and one in meditative absorption.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of base conduct to a mad woman — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. The same applies likewise to one who is mentally disturbed, one tormented by illness, one delirious, one simple-minded, one asleep, one intoxicated with alcohol, and one who is drunk.

If, when a monk has spoken words of base conduct to a woman, the gender changes and she becomes a nun — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a nun has spoken words of base conduct to a man, and the gender changes and he becomes a monk — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that when a monk speaks words of base conduct to a woman it is a Saṅgha remainder offense. Is there any case in which a monk speaking words of base conduct to a woman does not become a Saṅgha remainder offense? There is: namely, when it is for the sake of another. Venerable one, if a monk says it to a man — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he says it to female probationers and female novices — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If a monk says it to a male novice — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a nun says it to a man — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a female probationer says it to a man, a monk, or a male novice — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed. If a female novice says it to a man, a monk, or a male novice — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed. If a male novice says it to a woman, a nun, a female probationer, a female novice, a monk, or a male novice — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of base conduct to a woman who is in meditative absorption — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

In brief:

The fourth, combined with two, and different perceptions — these are spoken of as base conduct.

The same applies to conduct throughout — this is to be proclaimed in full.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a non-human woman as non-human and speaks — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he perceives a non-human as human — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he perceives a human as non-human — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he perceives a human as human — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder offense.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human woman as a woman and speaks — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If he perceives a woman as a man — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he perceives a man as a woman — what becomes of that? It likewise results in a serious offense. If he perceives a man as a man and speaks — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk, while perceiving someone as another, speaks words of corrupt conduct to a certain woman — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

The third and fourth Saṅgha remainder rules are complete. Just as the conduct in question applies to corrupt speech, so too it applies to all related conduct.

The Noble Vinaya. The second fascicle.

In summary:

Two dharmas with a fourth making six aspects,
Two faculties to be procured,
The seventh, and those below it,
Two of the fourth, and one from one.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, what is the dharma that is neither past, nor future, nor present, yet is the culmination of the completion of all karma?" The Blessed One replied: "Upāli, it is nirvāṇa." "Venerable one, what is that which comes and goes, and is yet the culmination of the completion of all karma?" "Upāli, it is the act of conveying a message." "What becomes of conveying such a message?" "It is a Saṅgha remainder offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes a message from a madman, delivers it to the madman, and then gives back a reply to the madman — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from a madman, delivers it to the madman, and gives back the reply to someone in their natural state of mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from a madman, delivers it to someone in their natural state of mind, and gives back the reply to the madman — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from a madman, delivers it to someone in their natural state of mind, and gives back the reply to that person in their natural state of mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk takes a message from someone in their natural state of mind, delivers it to someone in their natural state of mind, and gives back the reply to that person in their natural state of mind — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If a monk takes a message from someone in their natural state of mind, delivers it to someone in their natural state of mind, and gives back the reply to a madman — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from someone in their natural state of mind, delivers it to a madman, and gives back the reply to someone in their natural state of mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from someone in their natural state of mind, delivers it to a madman, and gives back the reply to the madman — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense."

Just as for a madman the four permutations yield two outcomes, so likewise for one whose mind is disturbed the four permutations yield two outcomes; and the same four permutations yielding two outcomes apply equally to those who are of sound mind and those who are not of sound mind.

"Venerable one, if a monk takes a message from one of sound mind, delivers it to one of sound mind, and gives back the reply to one of sound mind — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If a monk takes a message from one of sound mind, delivers it to one of sound mind, and gives back the reply to one not of sound mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from one of sound mind, delivers it to one not of sound mind, and gives back the reply to one of sound mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from one of sound mind, delivers it to one not of sound mind, and gives back the reply to one not of sound mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk takes a message from one not of sound mind, delivers it to one not of sound mind, and gives back the reply to one not of sound mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from one not of sound mind, delivers it to one not of sound mind, and gives back the reply to one of sound mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from one not of sound mind, delivers it to one of sound mind, and that reply is then delivered back to one of sound mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk takes a message from one not of sound mind, delivers it to one of sound mind, and gives back the reply to one not of sound mind — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk says to a householder, 'Go and obtain a woman,' — what becomes of that? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable one, if a monk says to a householder, 'Obtain this particular woman,' — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense."

If a message is taken from one not fully ordained, delivered to one not fully ordained, and the reply is then delivered back to one fully ordained — what becomes of that? It is a wrongdoing. If a message is taken from one not fully ordained, delivered to one not fully ordained, and the reply is delivered back to one not fully ordained — what becomes of that? It is a wrongdoing. If a message is taken from one not fully ordained, delivered to one not fully ordained, and the reply is delivered back to one who is fully ordained — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If a message is taken from one not fully ordained, delivered to one fully ordained, and the reply is delivered back to one who is fully ordained — what becomes of that? It is a wrongdoing. If a message is taken from one not fully ordained, delivered to one fully ordained, and the reply is delivered back to one who is fully ordained — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If a message is taken by one not fully ordained, delivered to one fully ordained, and the reply is delivered back to one who is fully ordained — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If a message is taken by one fully ordained, delivered by one fully ordained, and the reply is delivered back to one not fully ordained — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable one, if the very same person who has been given a penalty has himself also completed that penalty, and is himself also engaged in the act of satisfaction — can it come about that he himself has also performed the act of satisfaction? It can. This is how it comes about: a person who has already performed the act of satisfaction incurs a Saṅgha remainder offense, and without having been put under restraint he goes before the Saṅgha and requests the act of satisfaction. The Saṅgha grants him the act of satisfaction and he performs it. Then two Saṅgha remainder offenses arise: one offense is put under restraint for one day, and the other offense is put under restraint for two days. He then requests the penalty from the Saṅgha, and the Saṅgha likewise imposes the penalty. Having carried out one day of penalty, he is released from the penalty for one offense. The second penalty he is carrying out. The third is the act of satisfaction in progress. The fourth is the act of satisfaction already completed.

Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between for a human woman and a human man — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If a monk acts as go-between for a human woman and a non-human male — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk acts as go-between for a non-human female and a human man — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk acts as go-between for a non-human female and a non-human male — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human as a human and acts as go-between — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If a monk perceives a human as a non-human and acts as go-between — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk perceives a non-human as a human and acts as go-between — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between by relaying from one to another — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder.

In brief:

A young woman, a wife, a pregnant woman,
A eunuch, a hermaphrodite, a female eunuch —
The entire Saṅgha by its vows
Is comparable to two of these marks.

Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between for a young unmarried woman — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between in the absence of the householder's son — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between for one dwelling in the womb — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Venerable one, if a monk acts as go-between for a woman in her prime — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a monk acts as go-between for a eunuch or female eunuch — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Venerable one, when the entire Saṅgha is assembled, and — — a householder arrives and says: "With my words, please tell this householder such-and-such to give a sister, a daughter-in-law, or a granddaughter" — and if the entire Saṅgha accepts that message and conveys the reply, what becomes of the entire Saṅgha? It results in a remainder offense for the Saṅgha. If the entire Saṅgha deliberates and a single monk conveys the message and delivers the reply, what becomes of the entire Saṅgha? It results in a remainder offense for the Saṅgha. But if a single monk, acting on his own judgment, conveys the message and delivers the reply, it still results in a remainder offense for the Saṅgha.

If a monk acts as go-between for a nun or for one dwelling in chastity observing the religious life of another, what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Venerable one, if a monk accepts such a message, and immediately upon accepting it his gender changes and he becomes a nun, and then he conveys and delivers the reply — what becomes of that? It results in a remainder offense for the Saṅgha. Venerable one, if a nun accepts the message, conveys it and delivers the reply, and then her gender changes so that she becomes a monk — what becomes of that? It results in a remainder offense for the Saṅgha. Venerable one, if a monk accepts the message, conveys it, and while the gender-change is actually occurring he delivers the reply — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Venerable one, if a monk accepts the message, and then the man's gender changes, and while the gender-change is occurring he conveys the message and delivers the reply — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Venerable one, if a monk accepts the message, and in the case of a woman who has acquired male characteristics delivers the message while she is in the process of acquiring male characteristics, and then delivers the reply — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, a man has made an appointment together with a woman, and arising from that appointment the man says to a monk, "Noble one, have you seen such-and-such a woman?" and the monk, while searching, reports back saying, "She is sitting by that wall over there" — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If the man then says, "Noble one, please go and tell that woman to come here," and the monk goes and says that to her — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

Just as acting as go-between results in a remainder offense for the Saṅgha, so too does surrendering one's training — it likewise results in a remainder offense for the Saṅgha. For those in training, for male novices and female novices, it results in a misdeed.

In brief:

Without permission and the proper measure, oneself, another, and uncovered above — fallen back after having begun, likewise so, and finally, the matter of the changed characteristic.

Venerable one, if a monk builds a dwelling without having obtained permission for the materials — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he obtains permission for the materials but does not build the dwelling — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed. If permission is granted to build the dwelling but he makes it exceed the proper measure — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he himself begins it and then abandons it without completing it — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Venerable one, if another person makes something improper into something proper — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If he makes it without covering the top — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If, having begun, he falls back — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Likewise, abandoning one's own livelihood, and all instances of claiming novice status — these result in a serious offense. Likewise, the detailed account concerning eunuchs and the rest is as given in the presentation of surrendering one's training. If one who has not received full ordination begins, and it remains without full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed.

If one begins without full ordination and it remains without full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed. If one begins without full ordination and then full ordination is completed — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If one begins when full ordination is being completed and it remains in the process of being completed — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed. If one begins upon full ordination and it remains upon full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a Saṅgha remainder. If one begins upon full ordination and it is not upon full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense.

If a venerable monk begins to build a dwelling and, his status having changed so that he has become a nun, it is completed — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a venerable nun begins to build a dwelling and, her status having changed so that she has become a monk, it is completed — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed. If one who has been given the training does it — what becomes of that? It results in a Saṅgha remainder. If a nun does it — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. For a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a male novice, and a female novice, it results in a misdeed. The same applies likewise to a great monastery.

In brief:

Through messenger, letter, gesture,

through another's words, or passed from one to another,
one who is mad, mentally disturbed, or ill,
one who is mute, foolish, or asleep, one who is in agony or intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, or an outsider —
these are the exemptions.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that if a monk, out of resentment and without releasing that resentment, falsely accuses a pure and blameless monk who has committed no offense with a defeat, it results in a Saṅgha remainder. Is there a case where a monk who falsely accuses another with a defeat, even though that monk has committed no offense, does not incur a Saṅgha remainder?" "Yes, there is. If a monk accuses through a messenger, it results in a serious offense. Likewise, if the accusation is conveyed through a letter, a gesture, another's words, or passed on from one to another — all of these result in a serious offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk falsely accuses a mad monk — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. Likewise, if the accusation is directed at one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is foolish, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is in agony, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, or one dwelling elsewhere — in all such cases it results in a serious offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk falsely accuses those outside this tradition — non-Buddhist wanderers (tīrthikas), brahmins, those who practice universally, and wandering mendicants — what becomes of that? It results in a misdeed."

In brief:

By speech, by body, by solitude,
by mantra, and by another toward another — seven ways.
Toward laypeople and so forth, and the status too is transmitted in four modes.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk accuses a monk in the noble language and that monk does not know the noble language — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If a noble monk makes the accusation in a border dialect, and that monk likewise does not know the border dialect — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If one from the borderlands accuses in the border dialect, and that monk does not know the border dialect — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If one from the borderlands accuses in the noble language, and that monk does not know the noble language — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk accuses a monk when no body is in view — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a secluded place as secluded and makes the accusation there — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk renders himself invisible through mantra or medicine and then accuses a monk — what becomes of that?"

It results in a serious offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk has another person make the accusation against a monk — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk accuses a monk on behalf of another — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense."

"Venerable one, if one has prepared to make an accusation against someone not yet fully ordained, and it is concluded before full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a wrongdoing. If one has prepared to make the accusation before full ordination and it concludes at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a wrongdoing. If one has prepared to make the accusation before full ordination and it concludes after full ordination — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If one has prepared to make the accusation at the moment of full ordination and it concludes at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a wrongdoing. If one has prepared to make the accusation at the moment of full ordination and it concludes after full ordination — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If one has prepared the accusation once full ordination is complete and it concludes once full ordination is complete — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If one begins after full ordination and carries it out before full ordination — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk accuses a layman — what becomes of that? It results in a wrongdoing."

"Likewise, if one accuses a paṇḍaka, or accuses and expels a nun, or accuses one's father, or one's mother, or one who has slain an arhat, or one who has shed the blood of a Tathāgata with malicious intent, or a tīrthika, or one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, or a thief in residence, or one who was previously involved in a dispute, or one against whom an offense was previously established — in all such cases it results in a serious offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk accuses a monk — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. Likewise, if one accuses those monks who have divided the Saṅgha, or those who are residing in a different location, or those who side with them, or those who have handed back their training — in all cases it becomes a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a fully ordained person as fully ordained, makes the accusation — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes the accusation against a monk, and then the ordination status shifts and that person has become a nun — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable one, if a nun makes the accusation against a nun, and the ordination status shifts and that person has become a monk — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a fully ordained person as fully ordained, makes the accusation — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If a monk, perceiving a fully ordained person as not fully ordained, makes the accusation — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If one perceives someone not fully ordained as fully ordained and makes the accusation — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If one perceives someone not fully ordained as not fully ordained and makes the accusation — what becomes of that? It results in a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a human being as a human being, makes the accusation — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder. If one perceives a human being as a non-human and makes the accusation — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If one perceives a non-human as a human being and makes the accusation — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense. If one perceives a non-human as a non-human and makes the accusation — what becomes of that? It results in a serious offense."

In brief:

The extreme, and likewise the without-interval,

One must not kill — the one against the other.
Accusation by letter and by proper grounds — likewise so,
The one who elaborates, and the same applies.

"Venerable one, if a monk accuses a monk who himself has come forward and declared, 'I have engaged in unchaste conduct, the act of sexual intercourse' — accusing him groundlessly with theft, with killing, or with lying — what becomes of that? It becomes a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable one, if a monk accuses a monk who himself has come forward and declared, 'I have stolen a great valuable item' — accusing him groundlessly with killing, with lying, or with unchaste conduct — what becomes of that? It is a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable one, if a monk himself has come forward and declared, 'I have taken a person's life' — and a monk accuses that monk groundlessly with lying, with unchaste conduct, or with theft — what becomes of that? It becomes a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable one, if a monk himself has come forward and declared, 'I have proclaimed to a person a Dharma that is supreme over the human' — and a monk accuses that monk groundlessly with unchaste conduct, with theft, or with killing — what becomes of that? It becomes a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk accuses a monk groundlessly with a matter entailing defeat, it becomes a Saṅgha remainder. If that is so, what becomes of a monk who accuses a monk groundlessly with an action without interval? If the accusation concerns killing one's father, killing one's mother, or killing an arhat, it becomes a Saṅgha remainder. If the accusation concerns causing a schism in the Saṅgha or, with malicious intent, drawing blood from the Tathāgata, it becomes a grave offense."

"Why is that? Upāli, accusing someone of killing father, mother, or an arhat — that accusation is one made with reference to a matter entailing defeat. Accusing someone of causing a schism in the Saṅgha or, with malicious intent, drawing blood from the Tathāgata — that accusation is one made with reference to a grave offense. A grave offense does not render one no longer a monk; it is something to be confessed. If a monk accuses a monk groundlessly with a matter entailing defeat, it becomes a Saṅgha remainder. If the accusation made groundlessly is a Saṅgha remainder, it becomes a downfall. If the accusation made groundlessly is a downfall, a matter of individual confession, or a grave offense, it becomes a wrongdoing. Likewise, if the accusation made groundlessly is a grave offense, it also becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk accuses a nun, what becomes of that? It becomes a Saṅgha remainder."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk accuses a monk, it becomes a Saṅgha remainder. If that is so, what becomes of a monk who accuses a female probationer, a male novice, or a female novice? It becomes a grave offense."

"If a nun accuses a nun, what becomes of that? It becomes a Saṅgha remainder."

"If a nun accuses a monk, what becomes of that? It becomes a Saṅgha remainder."

"If a male novice accuses a female probationer or a female novice, it becomes a wrongdoing."

"If a female probationer accuses a nun, a female probationer, a male novice, or a female novice, it becomes a wrongdoing."

"If a male novice accuses a monk, a nun, a female probationer, or a female novice, it becomes a wrongdoing."

"If a female novice accuses a monk, a nun, a female probationer, or a male novice, it becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk himself has written something and says, 'This letter states: you have incurred a defeat through unchaste conduct' — what becomes of that? It becomes a grave offense. Just as with a groundless accusation, the same applies when the charge is leveled by such a written letter — it is to be stated in full."

In brief:

The motion to unite, equanimity,
The recollection of the dispute,
The fourth with the ongoing and the permanent,
Faith and the solitary, space and Carrying it further — treat all the same.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, if a monk is instructed with a motion and the act by quorum of four without first being instructed to gather — is this to be called 'instructed' or 'not instructed'? Does the instruction take effect or not?"

"Upāli, it does not take effect, and moreover the Saṅgha incurs a transgression along with the past."

"Venerable one, if a monk is instructed to unite by a motion and an act by quorum of four — is this to be called 'instructed' or 'not instructed'? Does the instruction take effect or not?"

"Upāli, it takes effect, and the Saṅgha does not incur a transgression along with the past."

"Venerable one, if a monk is instructed to unite without the act of expulsion having first been performed — is this to be called 'instructed' or 'not instructed'? Does the instruction take effect or not?"

"Upāli, it does not take effect, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression along with the past."

"Venerable one, if the act of expulsion has been performed and he is then instructed to unite — is this to be called 'instructed' or 'not instructed'? Does the instruction take effect or not?"

"Upāli, it takes effect, and the Saṅgha does not incur a transgression along with the past."

"Venerable one, if the act of expulsion has not been performed and he is instructed by a motion and an act by quorum of four — is this to be called 'instructed' or 'not instructed'? Does the instruction take effect or not?"

"Upāli, it does not take effect, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression along with the past."

"Venerable one, if the act of expulsion has been performed and he is then instructed by a motion and an act by quorum of four — is this to be called 'instructed' or 'not instructed'? Does the instruction take effect or not?"

"Upāli, it takes effect, and the Saṅgha does not incur a transgression along with the past."

"Venerable one, if a monk has not raised the matter and has not taken note of it, yet remains in a state of personal verbal discomfort — should he be instructed or not?"

"Upāli, he should not."

"Does the instruction take effect or not?"

"Upāli, it does not take effect."

"Venerable one, if a monk has raised the matter and has taken note of it, yet remains in a state of personal verbal discomfort — what is the outcome? He has committed an offense. Should he be instructed or not?"

"Upāli, he should be instructed."

"Does the instruction take effect?"

"Upāli, it takes effect."

"Venerable one, if a monk has raised the matter and has taken note of it, yet remains in a state of personal verbal discomfort — what is the outcome? He has committed an offense. Should he be instructed or not?"

"Upāli, he should be instructed."

"Does the instruction take effect?"

"Upāli, it takes effect."

"Venerable one, if one who is within the boundary instructs those who are beyond the boundary — is this to be called 'instructed'?"

"Upāli, it is not."

"If one who is beyond the boundary instructs those who are within the boundary — is this to be called 'instructed'?"

"Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, if the presiding monk who performs the act is within the boundary and instructs those who are beyond the boundary — is this to be called 'instructed'?"

"Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, if the presiding monk who performs the act is beyond the boundary and instructs those who are within the boundary — is this to be called 'instructed'?"

"Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, if one who has performed the act presses against the boundary, grasps the boundary, or stands or sits at the boundary and gives instruction — is this to be called 'instructed'? Does the instruction take effect?"

"Upāli, it is to be called 'instructed,' and the instruction takes effect."

"Venerable one, if the presiding monk who performs the act has not given instruction, and four persons are dismissed from within the boundary — is this to be called 'dismissed'?"

"Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, if the presiding monk appointed to perform the act dismisses four persons from within the boundary — is this to be called 'dismissed'? Or is it so only if they are dismissed one by one, two by two, or three by three?"

"It is to be called 'dismissed' only when dismissed one by one, two by two, or three by three."

"Venerable one, if monks residing in the four quarters of a single boundary give instruction to four monks — is this to be called 'instructed,' and furthermore, can it be the case that no offense at all is incurred and the Saṅgha is not thereby divided?"

"Upāli, there is such a case: when each gives consent to the other and instruction is given one to one, two to two, or three to three — provided the number falls short of four. And why? Because a large group may not perform an act upon a large group."

"Venerable one, may a presiding monk who is present in one direction perform all acts pertaining to the four stations of abiding?"

"Upāli, he may. In such a case, the presiding monk who performs the act should be at the edge of the boundary of all four stations of abiding — whether at a throne, a low seat, a bamboo —" — leaning against a door-bolt and sitting — then acts of that kind may arise in those stations: whether an act requiring four, an act requiring five, an act requiring ten, or an act requiring twenty — such acts may duly come to be performed there. And why? Because the presiding monk performs the act on their behalf, and it is he who completes the count for them.

"If one who is present on the ground gives instruction to those who are present in the sky, is that considered a valid instruction?"

"Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, if the one performing the act is present in the sky and gives instruction to those who are present on the ground, is that considered a valid instruction?"

"Upāli, it is not."

The same is to be said regarding the remaining four categories of the Saṅgha. Just as the precepts are administered to monks, so too for nuns it becomes a matter of the remaining members of the Saṅgha. For probationer nuns, novice monks, and novice nuns, it is an offence.

Here ends the section on the remaining members of the Saṅgha from among the questions of Upāli.

In brief: the last offence, the royal caste, and the remaining aggregates — likewise the mouth, vegetables, sugar, fermented drink, molasses, butter, and what is not manifest.

"Venerable one, if a female lay devotee (upāsikā) who lacks faith comes to a monk and says, 'Venerable one, I saw a certain monk commit the first and last offence' — should one proceed in accordance with the words of that faithless lay devotee or not? One should not. Nor should one have her search for that person. Instead, one should ask her: 'Is there a witness?' If she says there is, then both should be questioned, and if they agree, proceed in accordance with the words of the faithless lay devotee, and let her search for that person as well. But if she then says, 'The first and last offence has not occurred — what I saw was the second, third, or fourth offence' — then let the monk be confronted. Just as for the first, so too for the second, third, and fourth last offences, the same procedure applies."

"Venerable one, if a faithless female lay devotee comes before monks and says, 'Venerable ones, I saw a certain monk behave improperly at the mouth aperture' — should one proceed in accordance with the words of that faithless lay devotee or not? One should not, nor should one have her search for him. Ask her: 'Is there a witness?' If she says there is, question both of them. If they agree, proceed in accordance with the words of the faithless lay devotee and let her search for the person as well. But if she then says, 'It was not the mouth aperture that was used improperly — it was the anal aperture' — then let that monk be confronted. As for the mouth aperture, so too for the urinary aperture and the anal aperture."

"Venerable one, if a faithless female lay devotee comes before monks and says, 'Venerable ones, I saw a certain monk behave improperly with a woman of the royal caste (kṣatriyā)' — should one proceed in accordance with the words of that faithless lay devotee or not? One should not, nor should one have her search for him. Ask her: 'Is there a witness?' If she says there is, question both of them. If they agree, proceed in accordance with the words of the faithless lay devotee and let her search for the person as well. But if she then says, 'It was not with a woman of the royal caste that he behaved improperly — it was with a brahmin woman' — then let that monk be confronted. As for a woman of the royal caste, so too for a brahmin woman, a merchant-caste woman, a white-complexioned woman, a dark-complexioned woman, a tawny-complexioned woman, a tall woman, a short woman, a very beautiful woman, an ugly woman, a colored woman, a woman of medium build, a woman who walks, a woman who is seated, a woman who stands upright, a woman who is lying down — for all of these as well, the procedure is to be set forth in full.

Reverend ones, if a faithless laywoman comes before the monks and says, "Reverend ones, I have seen a monk commit an accumulation of transgressions and an offense" — should one act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman, or not? One should not. Should one let her search for that person, or not? One should not. Ask her, "Is there a witness in this matter?" If she says there is, question both of them, and if they agree, then act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman and let her search for that person as well. But if she then says, "The first accumulation of transgressions did not occur, but the second, third, fourth, and fifth accumulations did occur" — then proceed in the same way up through the fifth.

Reverend ones, if a faithless laywoman comes before the monks and says, "Reverend ones, I have seen a monk commit the first Saṅgha-remainder offense" — should one act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman, or not? One should not. Should one let her search for that person, or not? One should not. Ask her, "Is there a witness in this matter?" If she says there is, question both of them, and if they agree, then act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman and let her search for that person as well. But if she then says, "The first Saṅgha-remainder offense did not occur, but from the second, third, and fourth up through the thirteenth Saṅgha-remainder offense did occur" — then let the monk be confronted. Just as with the first, so too with the second, and from the third up through the thirteenth Saṅgha-remainder offense — it is the same.

If a faithless laywoman comes before the monks and says, "Reverend ones, I have seen a monk expel semen into a mouth" — should one act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman, or not? One should not. Should one let her search for that person, or not? One should not. Ask her, "Is there a witness in this matter?" If she says there is, question both of them, and if they agree, then act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman and let her search for that person as well. But if she then says, "It was not into the mouth that an offense was committed, but rather semen was expelled outside the teeth, at the lips" — then let the monk be confronted.

Reverend ones, if a faithless laywoman comes before the monks and says, "I have seen a monk expel semen into the urinary passage" — should one act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman, or not? One should not. Should one let her search for that person, or not? One should not. Ask her, "Is there a witness in this matter?" If she says there is, question both of them, and if they agree, then act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman and let her search for that person as well. But if she says, "It was not that an offense was committed by way of the urinary passage — rather, semen was poured into the thigh" — then let the monk be confronted.

Reverend ones, if a faithless laywoman comes before the monks and says, "I have seen a monk expel semen into the fecal passage" — should one act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman, or not? One should not. Should one let her search for that person, or not? One should not. Ask her, "Is there a witness in this matter?" If she says there is, question both of them, and if they agree, then act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman and let her search for that person as well. But if she then says, "It was not that an offense was committed by way of the fecal passage — rather, this one expelled semen into the nose" — then let the monk be confronted.

Venerable ones, if a faithless laywoman comes before the monks and says, "Venerable ones, I saw a monk drinking fermented grain-mash at an improper time," should one act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman, or not? One should not. Should one let her search for that person, or not? One should not. Ask her, "Is there a witness in this matter?" If she says there is, question both of them, and if they agree, then act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman and let her search for that person as well. But if she then says, "He did not drink fermented grain-mash at an improper time — rather, this one drank some medicinal water made from meat-broth" — then let the monk be confronted.

Venerable ones, if a faithless laywoman comes before the monks and says, "Venerable ones, I saw a monk drink sugarcane wine," should one act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman, or not? One should not. Should one let her search for that person, or not? One should not. Ask her, "Is there a witness in this matter?" If she says there is, question both of them, and if they agree, then act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman and let her search for that person as well. But if she then says, "He did not drink sugarcane wine — rather, this one drank some medicinal water from boiled herbs" — then let the monk be confronted.

Venerable ones, if a faithless laywoman comes before the monks and says, "Venerable ones, I saw someone eating meat at an improper time," should one act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman, or not? One should not. Should one let her search for that person, or not? One should not. Ask her, "Is there a witness in this matter?" If she says there is, question both of them, and if they agree, then act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman and let her search for that person as well. But if she then says, "He did not eat meat at an improper time — rather, this one ate some molasses" — then let the monk be confronted.

Venerable ones, if a faithless laywoman comes before the monks and says, "Venerable ones, I saw a monk eating food at an improper time," should one act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman, or not? One should not. Should one let her search for that person, or not? One should not. Ask her, "Is there a witness in this matter?" If she says there is, question both of them, and if they agree, then act in accordance with the words of the faithless laywoman and let her search for that person as well. But if she then says, "He did not eat food at an improper time — rather, this one ate some butter" — then let the monk be confronted.

Whatever a faithless laywoman says, having seen some truth yet speaking of something unverified — let the monk be confronted. The section on unverified matters is complete.

The noble Vinaya text, the third fascicle.

In summary:

Loss of the very thing itself, burning, mental agitation, not consecrated, improper, and past the time —

these are the marks, the fourth, and the transmission of three.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, is it the case that a robe that has passed beyond ten years is the very same robe, yet loses one year?" The Blessed One said: "Upāli, yes. If, however, the monk, without interruption in his robe-holding, finds a robe on the very last day of the ten days and consecrates it, but then dawn breaks beyond the boundary without that robe being present — then that robe has passed ten days and lost one night."

"Venerable one, if a monk loses a robe that he had set aside as relinquished, should he confess a transgression?" "Upāli, he should confess." "Having confessed the transgression, should he relinquish what has been received?" "Upāli, he should not."

"Venerable one, if a robe that a monk had set aside as relinquished is burned or eaten, should that remnant also be relinquished?" "Upāli, it should not. One should confess the transgression alone. However, if a piece of one cubit square or more remains, it should be relinquished."

"Venerable one, if a monk's mind becomes disturbed immediately upon finding a robe, from what point should the ten days be counted?" "From the day his own mind returns to its normal state, the counting begins."

"Venerable one, could there be a case where a monk holds eight or nine robes without consecrating or dedicating them for his entire lifetime without incurring a transgression?" "Upāli, there could be. This is when, day by day, the monk takes the robe out of his keeping and consecrates it for another."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that when ten nights have passed a robe must be relinquished — could there be a case where a monk holds a robe beyond ten nights without incurring a transgression?" "Upāli, there could be. This is when the material is fit for a robe but the stitching is not fit, or when the stitching is fit but the material is not fit, or when neither is fit. What is unfit material? Wool of a female yak, wool of an ox, wool of a goat, wool of a wild animal, mixed wool, and wool not yet woven into cloth — a robe of such material, even if kept beyond ten days, constitutes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk may keep an extra robe for up to ten days — could there be a case where a monk keeps an extra robe for his entire lifetime without incurring a transgression?" "Upāli, there could be. This is when the period has elapsed within ten days."

"Venerable one, can it be that the very same robe is one that may be kept without transgression and yet is also one that incurs transgression by being kept?" "Upāli, it can be. For example, a monk keeps a precious robe, then the sun sets and he becomes a nun — if she then keeps it, a transgression arises."

"Venerable one, if a monk finds a robe and ten nights pass, and then the sun sets and he becomes a nun, and then ten more nights pass — what becomes of that?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

"Venerable one, if a nun finds a robe and ten nights pass, and then the sun sets and she becomes a monk, and then ten more nights pass — what becomes of that?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives ten nights as ten nights and dawn breaks — what becomes of that?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

"Venerable one, if he perceives it as not ten nights — what becomes of that?" "There is no transgression."

"If it is not ten nights and he perceives it as ten nights — what becomes of that?" "That is a wrongdoing."

"If ten days have not been completed and he perceives them as not completed — there is no transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk finds a robe in a place that has been put under suspension by the Saṅgha, can that robe become one that must be relinquished?" "Upāli, it can. It is when that monk's robe has become one to be relinquished, yet that monk has neither relinquished the robe nor been separated from it nor confessed the transgression — and in the meantime the Saṅgha has lifted the suspension. If that monk then finds a robe, it must be relinquished."

"Venerable one, if those who have been given a training keep an extra robe beyond ten nights — what becomes of that?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

"Venerable one, if a nun keeps an extra robe beyond ten nights — what becomes of that?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

"If female probationers, male novices, and female novices keep an extra robe beyond ten days, it becomes a wrongdoing."

In brief:

The Saṅgha's first day and boundary, being pressed and encircled without that being done, the boundary not cut and not covered — likewise the robe that passes through four nights.

Then the venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, is it permitted to consecrate a Dharma-robe belonging to the Saṅgha?" "Upāli, it is not permitted." "Venerable one, if such a circumstance arises, is it permitted?" "Upāli, it is permitted."

"Venerable one, if a monk has consecrated a Dharma-robe belonging to the Saṅgha and then, without a Dharma-robe of his own, passes beyond the boundary — is he said to be separated from his Dharma-robe or not?" "He is said to be separated." "Should that Dharma-robe be relinquished?" "Upāli, it should not." "Should the wrongdoing be confessed?" "It should be confessed."

"Venerable one, if a monk places his Dharma-robe on the ground and dawn breaks in the sky, or places it in the sky and dawn breaks on the ground — is he said to be separated from his Dharma-robe or not?" "He is said to be separated."

"Venerable one, if a monk places his Dharma-robe inside the boundary and dawn breaks beyond the boundary, or places his Dharma-robe beyond the boundary and dawn breaks inside the boundary — is he said to be separated from his Dharma-robe or not?" "He is said to be separated."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while pressing upon a boundary, standing at a boundary, or sitting at a boundary — taking it as the boundary — places his Dharma-robe between the boundaries and dawn breaks — is he said to be separated from his Dharma-robe or not?" "He is said to be separated."

"Venerable one, can it occur that a monk is inside the boundary and his Dharma-robe is also placed inside the boundary, yet he becomes separated from that Dharma-robe?" "Upāli, it can. It is when the vow of the Dharma-robe has not been properly declared."

"Venerable one, in a place where no boundary has been demarcated, from what distance is a monk said to be separated from his Dharma-robe?" "Upāli, one should understand it as extending as far as the surrounding area of the monastery, or a building, or a covered walkway, or a surrounding structure, or a park used in common by the monks, or an outer enclosure, or a grove, or a pond."

"Venerable one, if a monk dwells in a single dwelling under a single roof and also places his Dharma-robe there, can it occur that he becomes separated from his Dharma-robe?" "Upāli, it can — when various non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), wandering ascetics, brahmins, practitioners, and those who wander about dwell there, and where lodging has been divided among them separately."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives what is beyond the boundary as beyond the boundary, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." "If he perceives what is inside the boundary as beyond the boundary, what results?" "It becomes a wrongdoing." "If he perceives what is beyond the boundary as inside the boundary, what results?" "There is no offense." "If he perceives what is inside the boundary as inside the boundary, what results?" "There is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk places his Dharma-robe inside the boundary and dawn breaks beyond the boundary, and then the night shifts and he becomes a nun — what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." "Venerable one, if a nun places her Dharma-robe inside the boundary and dawn breaks beyond the boundary, and then the night shifts and she becomes a monk — what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

"Venerable one, before whom should a monk consecrate a Dharma-robe?" "Upāli, a monk may consecrate a Dharma-robe before a monk or before a male novice. A male novice may consecrate a Dharma-robe before a monk or before a male novice. A nun may consecrate a Dharma-robe before a female probationer or before a female novice. A female probationer may consecrate a Dharma-robe before a nun, a female probationer, or a female novice. A female novice may consecrate a Dharma-robe before a nun, a female probationer, or a female novice. The withdrawal and the reassignment are to be done in the same way."

"Venerable one, when the training has been given and dawn breaks beyond the boundary without a Dharma-robe, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." Likewise, for a nun it is also fully described as a transgression entailing relinquishment. For female probationers, male novices, and female novices, it is a wrongdoing.

In brief:

A disturbed mind and the time having passed, and likewise the permissible cases — likewise the impermissible and the established, likewise the complete four and the night.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, when the Blessed One has declared that a monk may store a robe for one month even at a distance, and the monk's mind becomes disturbed as soon as he obtains the robe, from what point shall that month be counted?" "From the time when he recovers his own mind."

"Venerable one, when the Blessed One has declared that a monk may hold a robe in expectation for one month even at a distance, is there a case in which a monk may store it for his entire lifetime without incurring a transgression?"

"Upāli, there is — provided he keeps to the time-limit of one month."

"Venerable one, when the Blessed One has declared that a monk may store a robe for one month even at a distance, what kind of robe is meant?" "Any one of the seven permissible kinds — those which the Blessed One has not prohibited and has allowed."

"Venerable one, when the Blessed One has declared that a monk may store a robe for one month even at a distance, is there a case in which a monk stores a robe for more than one month without incurring a transgression?" "Upāli, there is — when the cloth of that robe has become fit for use as fabric but the thread is not fit, or when the thread is fit but the cloth is not, or when both are unfit. The impermissible cases are: wool from a female sheep, wool from cattle, wool from goats, wool from deer, mixed wool, and cloth that has not been woven. A robe of such kinds, even if stored for more than one month, results only in a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, when the Blessed One has declared that a monk may store a robe for one month even at a distance, is there a case in which a monk stores a robe for six months without incurring a transgression?" "Upāli, there is — when thirty days have passed since the robe was obtained and the Saṅgha has rendered a formal decision establishing it as stored."

"Venerable one, when the Blessed One has declared that one who has not received the three Dharma-robcs may store a robe for one month, suppose a monk has himself received the three Dharma-robcs and he obtains a robe for someone who has not yet received the three Dharma-robcs — may he also store it for one month at a distance?" "No. And why? When one has the complete three Dharma-robcs, whatever other robes he obtains — whether he has taken them up or not — all of these, even at a distance, are to be stored for ten days only. For one who has not yet received the three Dharma-robcs, if he obtains a robe that counts as a Dharma-robe, that too is to be stored at a distance for ten days only. But if he obtains one that does not count as a Dharma-robe, even at a distance it may be stored for one month. If it is stored beyond that, it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

"Venerable one, if a monk who is storing a robe for one month perceives a full month as having elapsed and dawn breaks, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." "If he perceives that a full month has not elapsed, what results?" "There is no fault." "If it is not a full month yet he perceives it as a full month, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "If a full month has not elapsed and he perceives it as not having elapsed, what results?" "There is no fault."

"Venerable one, if a monk has obtained a robe and is storing it for one month, and during that time there is a change of status and he becomes a nun, and the month passes, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." "Venerable one, if a nun has obtained a Dharma-robe and is storing it for one month, and there is a change of status and she becomes a monk, and the month passes, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

"Venerable one, if a training has been given and the permitted period of one month of storing the robe at a distance is exceeded, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." "Venerable one, if a nun exceeds the permitted period of one month of storing a robe at a distance, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." For female probationers, male novices, and female novices, if they hold a robe beyond the permitted month at a distance, it is a wrongdoing.

In brief:

Messenger, written letter, hand signal, through an intermediary, one to another, having become mad, and mentally disturbed, sick, mute, and foolish — for laypeople and so forth:
this is the last of the trainings given.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, if a monk were to give an old robe to an unrelated nun, the Blessed One has declared this becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. Venerable one, if a monk gives an old robe to an unrelated nun through a messenger, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "Likewise, if it is conveyed through a written letter, a hand signal, through an intermediary, or passed along from one to another, all of these become wrongdoings." "Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a mad nun, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "Likewise, if it is given to one who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, foolish, mute, or deaf-mute, all of these likewise become wrongdoings." "Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a pandaka, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "Likewise, if it is given to an expelled nun, one's own father or mother, one who has slain an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one in a place of thieves, one dwelling separately, one not residing in the community, one who has previously caused a schism, and one who has previously committed an offence — if a robe is conveyed to any of these, all become wrongdoings." "Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who sides with that faction, or one who has been given a training rule — what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment."

In brief:

Shared, washed, and of the Saṅgha, two marks, and unsuitable, relinquished, another's, and worn — the seventh and the fourth likewise — and last, a nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a shared robe, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "If he gives one that has been washed, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe belonging to the Saṅgha, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "And if it is something that would be fully used by a person, and it has been fully used and is soiled, that too becomes a wrongdoing. However, if bedding articles are given, there is no offence." "Venerable one, if a monk has given an old robe to an unrelated nun and then undergoes a change of gender and becomes a nun — what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "Venerable one, if an unrelated monk has given a robe to a nun and then undergoes a change of gender and becomes a monk — what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "Venerable one, if a monk gives an old robe to an unrelated nun, and the nun then undergoes a change of gender and becomes a monk, and then washes it — what results?" "It is a wrongdoing. Likewise it should be applied to a monk as well."

"Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk giving an old robe to an unrelated nun does not become a transgression entailing relinquishment?" "Upāli, there are. For example, if the robe is of acceptable material but the exchange is not permissible, or if the exchange is permissible but the material is not acceptable, or if both are not acceptable — and what is not acceptable is this: wool of a she-goat, wool of a sheep, wool of cattle, wool of deer, mixed wool, or wool not woven into cloth. Giving a robe of such material becomes a wrongdoing." "Venerable one, if a monk gives away a robe that has been relinquished, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "But if what is given is something that has not been relinquished, it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. However, if what is given is one that has already been relinquished, it is a wrongdoing." "Venerable one, if a monk gives another's robe, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk, while in possession of a suitable robe that has entered into a village, can relinquish that robe while it has not yet left his body?" "Upāli, there are."

How so? If that monk has entered inside a house, and the robe has been soiled with excrement, urine, or some other impurity, and he then has it washed by a nun who is not a relative, it becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment. "If one has it washed by someone who has not received full ordination, and she remains one who has not received full ordination, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "If one has it washed by someone who has not received full ordination, and she is in the process of receiving full ordination, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "If one has it washed by someone who has not received full ordination, and she has since received full ordination, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "If one has it washed by someone who has not received full ordination, and she is in the process of receiving full ordination, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "If one has it washed by someone who has received full ordination, and she is in the process of receiving full ordination, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." "If one has it washed by someone who has received full ordination, and she has since received full ordination, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." "If one has it washed by someone who has received full ordination, and she has not received full ordination, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a fully ordained nun as fully ordained and has an old robe washed by her, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." "If he perceives a fully ordained nun as one who has not received full ordination, it is a wrongdoing." "If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as fully ordained, it is a wrongdoing." "If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, it is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a nun who is not a relative as one who is not a relative, and has an old robe washed by her, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." "If he perceives one who is not a relative as a relative, there is no offense." "If he perceives a relative as one who is not a relative, it is a wrongdoing." "If he perceives a relative as a relative, there is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk has an old robe washed by a nun who is not a relative, what results?" "It becomes a transgression entailing relinquishment." And if it is washed by a female novice in training, a novice nun, a laywoman, a tīrthika female wanderer, a brahmin woman, a female wanderer, or a female mendicant, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." Likewise, if one has it washed by someone abiding in another destiny, it is also a wrongdoing.

If a nun has a robe washed by a monk, a novice monk, a tīrthika male wanderer, a brahmin, a male wanderer, a male mendicant, or by someone abiding in some other destiny, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If she has it washed by a layman or a laywoman, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If by a female novice in training or a novice nun, it is a wrongdoing. The same applies in detail to washing and beating.

In brief:

One who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
One who is ill, one who has recovered, and one who is dull, Hermaphrodites and the like,
And one who has surrendered the training — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that whichever monk has a robe washed by a nun who is not a relative incurs a transgression entailing relinquishment. Venerable one, if a monk has a robe washed by a nun who is mad, what results?" "It is a wrongdoing." Likewise, if the robe is washed by one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is mute, one who is dull-witted, one who has recovered from illness, a hermaphrodite nun, a nun who has been expelled from the Saṅgha, one who has killed her father, one who has killed her mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who has taken to theft, one who has previously committed an offense, or one who was previously in a state of disturbance — if a robe is washed by any of these, what results? In every case it is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk has a robe washed by a nun who is causing a schism in the Saṅgha, or one who is living separately, one who is siding with the schism, or one who has been given a training — if a robe is obtained from any of these, what results? It is a transgression entailing relinquishment.

In brief:

By messenger, letter, gesture and sign, through a third party, or from one to another,
one who has gone mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, one who is mute, one who is dull-witted, one who is asleep, one who is drunk, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, a traveler, a paṇḍaka.

Venerable one, if a monk obtains a robe from a nun who is not a relative, by way of a messenger, what results? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, by letter, by gesture, or through an intermediary — in every case it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk has a robe washed by a mad nun and thereby obtains the robe, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If a monk has a robe washed by a mad nun and others of that kind and thereby obtains the robe, what results? In every case it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk obtains a robe from a nun who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who is living separately, one who is siding with the schism, or one who has been given a training — what results? It is a transgression entailing relinquishment.

In brief:

The unsuitable, and the fourth and second of the kinds, the seventh, and likewise those of the same designation — monk and nun in each such case — this is the summary of what falls into the category.

Venerable one, is it possible that a monk who obtains a robe from a nun who is not a relative does not incur a transgression entailing relinquishment? Upāli, yes, there is such a case. It is as follows: when the robe is acceptable as a cause but the relationship as kin is not acceptable; or when the relationship as kin is acceptable but the robe is not acceptable as a cause; or when neither is acceptable. As for unacceptability: wool of a bull, wool of a female camel, wool of a goat, wool of a deer, or wool mixed from these, or cloth of a kind that has not been woven — if a robe of such a kind is obtained, it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk takes a robe from a nun who is not a relative while perceiving her as not a relative, what results? It is a transgression entailing relinquishment. If one perceives a non-relative as a non-relative and is wrong in that perception, there is no offense. If one perceives a relative as a non-relative, it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives a relative as a relative, there is no offense.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a fully ordained nun as not fully ordained and then obtains a robe from her, what results? It is a transgression entailing relinquishment. If one perceives a fully ordained one as not fully ordained, it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives one who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained, it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if one who is not fully ordained obtains a robe from a nun who is not a relative, and hands it to one who is not fully ordained, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one who is not fully ordained obtains a robe and hands it to one who is fully ordained, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one hands it over while not fully ordained and then becomes fully ordained and hands it on, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one who is fully ordained in training hands it to one who is fully ordained in training, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one who is fully ordained in training hands it to one who is fully ordained, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one who is fully ordained hands it to one who is fully ordained, what results? It is a transgression entailing relinquishment. If one who is fully ordained hands it to one who is not fully ordained, what results? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk is in the process of receiving a robe from a nun who is not a relative and in the meantime changes status and becomes a nun, what results? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable one, if a nun is in the process of receiving a robe from a monk who is not a relative and in the meantime he changes status and becomes a monk and hands it over, what results? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable one, if a nun is in the process of receiving a robe from a monk who is not a relative and that nun herself changes status and becomes a monk, and then receives it from the monk who is not a relative, what results? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a nun is in the process of receiving a robe from a monk who is not a relative, and that monk also changes status and becomes a nun, and she then receives it from that nun, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If she receives it from a probationer or a novice nun, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If a nun receives a robe from a monk or a novice monk, what results? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if she receives it from a probationer or a novice nun, it is also a wrongdoing. If a novice monk receives a robe from a nun, a novice nun, or a probationer, it is also a wrongdoing.

In brief:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
through another's word, passed one to another,
one who has become mad, one mentally disturbed, one ill, one mute, one dull-witted,
one asleep, one delirious, one intoxicated, one gone elsewhere, one who is a non-Buddhist —

Venerable one, the Blessed One declared that whatever monk receives a robe from a householder who is not a relative, or from a householder's retinue, it shall be relinquished. Is there then any case in which a monk receives a robe from a householder or a householder's retinue and yet it does not become a relinquishment downfall? Upāli: Yes, there is. If in any case it was received through a messenger, it becomes a wrongdoing; even if one obtains the robe, it is only a wrongdoing. Likewise, through a letter, through a gesture, through another's word, or through anything passed from one to another — all of these become wrongdoings. Venerable one, if a monk receives a robe from a mad householder and thereby obtains the robe, what results? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one obtains a robe having received it from one who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, mute, dull-witted, dumb, asleep, delirious, intoxicated, or residing elsewhere, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one obtains a robe having received it from non-Buddhist outsiders — other ascetics (śramaṇas), brahmins, wanderers, or mendicants — what results? It is a wrongdoing.

In brief:

The fourth of the improper ones, and the second, the seventh — the marks are just the same; likewise the eunuch and the hermaphrodite, and the monk who is such — the same applies.

Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk receives a robe from a householder's retinue, the householder not being a relative, and yet it does not become a relinquishment? Upāli: Yes, there is. In any case in which the material of the robe is proper but the kin-relationship is improper, or the kin-relationship is proper but the material is improper, or both are improper — the improper material being: wool from a female sheep, goat's wool, cattle wool, deer wool, or any such mixed or unwoven material — if one receives such a robe and obtains it, it is a wrongdoing. Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who is not a relative as not a relative and receives a robe from them and thereby obtains it, what results? It becomes a relinquishment downfall. If one perceives a non-relative as a relative, there is no offense. If one perceives a relative as a non-relative, it becomes a wrongdoing. If one perceives a relative as a relative, there is no offense. Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human as a human and receives a robe from them and thereby obtains it, what results? It becomes a relinquishment. If one perceives a human as a non-human, it becomes a wrongdoing. If one perceives a non-human as a human, it is also a wrongdoing. If one perceives a non-human as a non-human, it is also a wrongdoing. If one who has not received full ordination requests a robe and an unordained person obtains it, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one who has not received full ordination requests a robe and a fully ordained person obtains it, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one without full ordination makes the request, and having since received full ordination then obtains it, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one who is fully ordained makes the request and a fully ordained person obtains it at that point, what results? It is a wrongdoing. If one who is fully ordained makes the request and then, having received full ordination in the meantime, obtains it, what results?

It is a wrongdoing. If one who is fully ordained makes the request and a fully ordained person obtains it, what results? It is to be relinquished. If one who is fully ordained makes the request and one who has not received full ordination obtains it, what results? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable ones, if a monk requests a robe from a layman or a layman's attendant who is not a relative, and then, his sex having changed so that he has become a nun, she obtains it, what results? It is to be relinquished. Venerable ones, if a nun requests a robe from a layman or a layman's attendant who is not a relative, and then, her sex having changed so that he has become a monk, he obtains it, what results? It is to be relinquished. Venerable ones, if a monk requests a robe from a layman and that layman's sex likewise changes so that he obtains it from a woman, what results? It is to be relinquished. Venerable ones, if a monk requests from a layman's attendant and that attendant's sex likewise changes so that he obtains it from a man, what results? It is to be relinquished. The same should be stated likewise in the case of a nun.

Venerable ones, if a monk requests a robe from a hermaphrodite and obtains the robe, what results? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, in all cases involving hermaphrodites of either kind, it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable ones, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk requests a robe from a layman or a layman's attendant who is not a relative, it becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment. Given that, if a monk makes the request to a nun and obtains the robe, what results? It is to be relinquished. If he makes the request to a female probationer, a novice nun, a fully ordained monk, or novice monks and obtains the robe, what results? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable ones, if a nun makes the request to a layman or a layman's attendant and obtains the robe, what results? It is to be relinquished. If a nun makes the request to a nun, a female probationer, a novice nun, or novice monks and obtains the robe, what results? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, for female probationers and novice monks as well, it is a wrongdoing, and this should be explained in full.

Now, with regard to making requests, just as has been set out above, what distinctions exist in relation to the upper robe and the lower robe? There are two kinds each of upper and lower robes: the upper robe of a monk and the lower robe of a monk, and the upper robe of a layman and the lower robe of a layman. If a monk has received a layman's upper robe and lower robe, and then makes a request from a layman's upper robe and lower robe — if what is obtained proves to be superior, he should not keep it; and if there is a surplus, he should not give it away. If a monk obtains a layman's upper robe and lower robe that is either insufficient or with a surplus, that is a wrongdoing; and if obtained, it is a transgression requiring relinquishment.

If a monk has received a monk's upper robe and lower robe, and then makes a request from an upper robe and lower robe — if what is obtained proves insufficient, he may request it; but if there is a surplus, he must return it. If a monk does not return the surplus upper robe and lower robe, or requests more than is needed, that act of requesting is a wrongdoing; and if obtained, it is a transgression requiring relinquishment. In all such cases — whether a layman's upper robe and lower robe were obtained as superior or with surplus, or whether a monk's upper robe and lower robe were surplus and not returned, or obtained in excess — it is to be relinquished. As for the remaining matters, just as was done in the order of preceding rules of training, so too shall this rule of training be applied.

In summary:

Sending a message, a letter, a physical gesture, having another speak on one's behalf, one by one — the insane, the mentally disturbed, the sick, the sleeping, delirious, intoxicated, those in meditative absorption, travelers, and non-Buddhists — this was asked of the buddha, the Blessed One, by the venerable Upāli.

The venerable one then asked: the Blessed One declared that if a householder or a householder's attendant who is not a kinsman has set aside a sum of money for robes for a monk, and that monk, without having been invited beforehand, arouses even a slight degree of conceptual thought for the purpose of procuring robes and thereby successfully obtains them, it becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment. Venerable one, if a monk arouses conceptual thought and obtains robes by means of a message, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, through a letter, through a physical gesture, through having another speak on one's behalf, or through passing the request from one to another — all of these are wrongdoings.

Venerable one, if a monk arouses conceptual thought toward an insane person and obtains robes, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if he does so toward one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is asleep, one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, or one who has entered meditative absorption — and likewise toward those outside this teaching, namely tīrthika non-Buddhists, whether wandering ascetics, brahmins, practitioners, or wanderers — if conceptual thought arises and robes are obtained from them, it is a wrongdoing.

In summary:

The non-kinsman rule, and the fourth rule, and the second;
the seventh rule, and those characteristic cases just the same;
those concerning the hermaphrodite (pandaka), and the case of the same;
and what applies to the hermaphrodite monk applies just so.

Venerable one, is there any case in which conceptual thought arises toward a householder or a householder's attendant and yet relinquishment does not follow? Upāli replied: Yes, there is. Namely, when the material basis for the robe is suitable but the kinship relation is not; when the material basis is not suitable but the kinship relation is; and when neither is suitable. As for what is not suitable as material: wool from a female sheep, wool from a goat, wool from a cow, wool from a wild animal, or a mixture of these, or materials that have not been woven — if conceptual thought arises for the sake of a robe of such material and one obtains it, it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who is not a kinsman as not a kinsman, arouses conceptual thought, and obtains robes, what is the result? It becomes an offense requiring relinquishment. If he perceives one who is not a kinsman as a kinsman, what is the result? There is no offense. If he perceives a kinsman as not a kinsman, it is a wrongdoing. If he perceives a kinsman as a kinsman, there is no offense.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human being as a human being, arouses conceptual thought, and obtains robes, what is the result? It becomes an offense requiring relinquishment. If he perceives a human being as not a human being, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If he perceives a non-human being as a human being, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If he perceives a non-human being as a non-human being, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination arouses conceptual thought and obtains robes before receiving full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If one who has not received full ordination arouses conceptual thought and obtains robes at the moment of receiving full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If one who has not received full ordination arouses conceptual thought and obtains robes after having received full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If one arouses conceptual thought at the very moment of receiving full ordination and obtains robes at that same moment, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing. If one arouses conceptual thought after having received full ordination and obtains robes after having received full ordination, what is the result? It becomes an offense requiring relinquishment. If one arouses conceptual thought after having received full ordination and obtains robes before full ordination, what is the result? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk has aroused conceptual thought toward a householder or a householder's attendant who is not a kinsman, and in the interval his status changes and he becomes a nun, and she then obtains robes, what is the result? It becomes an offense requiring relinquishment. Venerable one, if a nun has aroused conceptual thought toward a householder or a householder's attendant, and in the interval her status changes and she becomes a monk, and he then obtains robes, what is the result? It becomes an offense requiring relinquishment. Venerable one, if a monk has aroused conceptual thought toward a householder who is not a kinsman, and in the interval that householder's status changes and he becomes a woman, and the monk accepts robes from her, what is the result? It becomes an offense requiring relinquishment.

Venerable one, if a monk has aroused conceptual thought toward a householder's attendant who is not a kinsman, and in the interval that attendant's status changes and he becomes a man, and the monk accepts robes from him, what is the result? It becomes an offense requiring relinquishment. The same is to be applied in the case of a nun as well.

Venerable one, if a monk has aroused conceptual thought toward a hermaphrodite and then obtains robes, what is the result? It is an offense of wrong conduct. Similarly, with regard to a neuter person and a female neuter, it is likewise an offense of wrong conduct. Venerable one, if a monk arouses conceptual thought for the sake of some requisite other than robes and then obtains it, what is the result? It is an offense of wrong conduct. Venerable one, if a monk arouses conceptual thought for the sake of a monk, a nun, a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices, what is the result? It is an offense of wrong conduct.

Just as a monk who arouses conceptual thought incurs an offense requiring relinquishment, so too does one who has returned the training, and a nun likewise incurs an offense requiring relinquishment. For male novices, female probationers, and female novices it is to be elaborated as an offense of wrong conduct. Just as this text on the rule of training applies, so too is the second rule of training to be elaborated in full.

In brief:

By messenger, letter, gesture,
Through another, or passed from one to the next,
The mad, the mentally disturbed, the sick,
The mute, the dull-witted, the asleep,
Those intoxicated, the stupefied,
Those in meditative absorption, and outsiders.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that after being solicited four, five, or six times one should remain silent and not speak. If that monk then actually obtains the robes, that is well and good. But if they are not actually obtained, then one may offer more beyond that in order to bring the robes to actual completion — and if, having offered more beyond that, the robes are actually obtained, it becomes an offense requiring relinquishment. Venerable one, is it then possible that a monk who, beyond four, five, or six solicitations, gives more in order to obtain robes, and yet those robes are actually obtained, does not incur an offense requiring relinquishment?

Upāli, that is indeed possible. In any case, when by a messenger one has gone beyond four, five, or six solicitations and accepted more in order to obtain robes, and the robes are actually obtained, it becomes an offense of wrong conduct. Likewise, whether done by letter, by gesture, through another's words, or passed from one to the next — all of these become offenses of wrong conduct.

Venerable one, if a monk has gone beyond four, five, or six solicitations of a madman and accepted more in order to obtain robes, and the robes are actually obtained, what is the result? It is an offense of wrong conduct. Similarly, with regard to one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, and one who is deaf — in all such cases it is an offense of wrong conduct. Venerable one, if a monk has gone beyond four, five, or six solicitations of a sleeping person and accepted more in order to obtain robes, and the robes are actually obtained, what is the result? It is an offense of wrong conduct. Similarly, with regard to one who is intoxicated from drink, one who is stupefied, one who has entered meditative absorption, one dwelling elsewhere, and those outside this tradition — other non-Buddhist renunciants (tīrthikas), brahmins, ascetics, and wanderers — if a monk has gone beyond four, five, or six solicitations and accepted more in order to obtain robes, and the robes are actually obtained, what is the result? It is an offense of wrong conduct.

In brief:

The unsuitable, the fourth, and the seventh —

The same applies to gender as well;

The hermaphrodite and the female neuter,

With the neuter last of all.

Venerable one, is it possible that a monk who has gone beyond four, five, or six solicitations in order to obtain Dharma robes does not incur an offense requiring relinquishment? Upāli, that is indeed possible. In any case, if the material for the robes is suitable but the thread is unsuitable, or the thread is suitable but the material is unsuitable, or both are unsuitable — the unsuitable being: wool from a female sheep, wool from cattle, wool from goats, wool from wild animals, or a mixture of these —

If, however, the cloth has not yet been woven, and a monk solicits beyond four, five, or six times on account of such robes, every instance constitutes an offense requiring confession.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a human being as a human being, solicits from that person beyond the limit — what is the result? It incurs relinquishment. If he perceives a human being as a non-human, it is an offense requiring confession. If he perceives a non-human as a human being, it is an offense requiring confession. If he perceives a non-human as a non-human, it is an offense requiring confession.

Venerable one, if a monk solicits from one who has not yet received full ordination and obtains from one who has not yet received full ordination — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession. If he solicits from one who has not yet received full ordination and obtains at the very moment that person receives full ordination — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession. If he solicits from one who has not yet received full ordination and obtains after that person has received full ordination — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession. If he solicits at the very moment of full ordination and obtains at the very moment of full ordination — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession. If he solicits at the very moment of full ordination and obtains after full ordination has been completed — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession. If he solicits when full ordination has been received and obtains when full ordination has been received — what is the result? It is a transgression requiring relinquishment. If he solicits when full ordination has been received and obtains before full ordination has been received — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession.

Venerable one, if a monk solicits beyond four, five, or six times, and in the course of that solicitation the person's status changes so that the person becomes a nun and then the monk obtains the robe — what is the result? It incurs relinquishment. Venerable one, if a nun solicits and then the person's status changes so that the person becomes a monk, and the nun then obtains the robe — what is the result? It incurs relinquishment. Venerable one, if a monk solicits from a male householder and that householder then changes gender and becomes a woman, and the monk obtains from her — what is the result? It incurs relinquishment. Venerable one, if a monk solicits from a male householder's attendant and that attendant then changes gender and becomes a man, and the monk obtains from him — what is the result? It incurs relinquishment. The same is to be applied in the corresponding manner for nuns as well.

Venerable one, if a monk who has already solicited from a close relative four, five, or six times for the sake of obtaining robes goes beyond that limit and solicits again for the sake of robes, and robes are thereby directly obtained — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession. In the same way, the same applies to hermaphrodites and to all female neuters: it is an offense requiring confession.

Venerable one, if a monk solicits on behalf of other monks, probationary nuns, male novices, or female novices — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession. Venerable one, if a monk solicits on behalf of other requisites — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession. Venerable one, if one who bestows the training solicits beyond six times — what is the result? It incurs relinquishment. If a nun solicits in the same way — what is the result? It incurs relinquishment. For probationary nuns, female novices, and male novices, it is an offense requiring confession.

In brief:

By messenger, by written letter, by hand signal,
Through an intermediary, from one to the next,
While in a state of madness, with a disturbed mind,
While sick, while mute, while simpleminded.

Venerable one, if a monk arranges by message for wool to be spun — what is the result? It is an offense requiring confession. In the same way, by written letter, by hand signal, through an intermediary, passed from one to the next, while insane, with a disturbed mind, afflicted by illness, while mute, while dumb, while blind, and while simpleminded — all of these equally constitute an offense requiring confession. Just as a monk who causes another to spin wool from raw wool incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment, in the same way one who bestows the training incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment. For nuns, probationary nuns, female novices, and male novices it is an offense requiring confession.

Just as in this chapter on the training rule it is explained in full with respect to wool that is naturally black, so too it is to be applied in the same way to naturally black wool. As for any distinctions to be made in that context, there are four: those who perceive what is naturally black as naturally black are to be treated as four.

In the same way, everything is to be stated for the second of the two training rules as well. As for the distinctions to be made in that context: when a monk perceives white wool as inferior and mixes them, this is to be treated as four cases.

In summary:

Another's not-yet-received, and received,
and those gone to non-Buddhists, and other destinies, the improper mark, and the fourth, and the seventh of the Sugata.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk has wool carded within the limit of six years it is to be relinquished. Venerable one, if a monk has another do the carding, what results?" "It is an offense." "If he has it done for the sake of another, what results?" "It is an offense." "Venerable one, if a monk causes what belongs to another to be made as though it were his own, what results?"

"It is an offense." "If he has a layman do it, what results?" "It is an offense."

Likewise, if he has it done by a male novice, or one who has given back the training, or one who previously quarreled, or one who previously committed an offense, or one who is in hiding, or one who dwells separately, or one who does not dwell in the community — in all these cases it becomes an offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk has it done by non-Buddhist ascetics outside this community, by brahmins, by wanderers, or by mendicants, what results?" "It is an offense." "Venerable one, if a monk has those dwelling in other destinies do it, what results?" "It is an offense."

"Venerable one, is there a case where a monk has wool carded within the limit of six years and yet it does not incur relinquishment?" "Upāli, there is. It is when the material is suitable for the purpose but the mixing partner is not suitable, or when the mixing partner is suitable but the material is not, or when neither is suitable. The unsuitable cases are: when it has been mixed with the wool of a female animal, the wool of a cow, the wool of a goat, or the wool of a deer, and has not been woven — these incur an offense of confession."

"Venerable one, if a monk is engaged in having wool carded within the limit of six years, and in the meantime his sex changes so that he becomes a nun, what results?" "It is an offense." "Venerable one, if a nun is engaged in having wool carded within the limit of six years, and in the meantime her sex changes so that she becomes a monk, what results?" "It incurs relinquishment."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving that six years have passed when in fact they have passed, authorizes the carding, what results?" "There is no offense." "If he perceives that they have not passed when in fact they have passed, what results?" "It is an offense." "If he perceives that they have passed when in fact they have not, there is no offense." "If he perceives that they have not passed when in fact they have not, and causes it to be done, it incurs relinquishment."

"Venerable one, if a monk has wool carded within the limit of six years to the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe, what results?" "It is an offense." "Venerable one, if one not fully ordained begins within the limit of six years and has not yet received full ordination, what results?" "It is an offense." This is also to be elaborated through seven transmission chains.

In summary:

By messenger, written letter, hand-signal, having another say it, and from one to the next,
one who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is mute, one who is dull.

"Venerable one, if a monk authorizes the carding by means of a messenger within the limit of six years, what results?" "It is an offense." Likewise, through a written letter, through a hand-signal, through having another convey it, through passing it from one to another — in all these cases, and also for one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull, one who is mute, and one who is deaf — in all these cases it also becomes an offense.

Just as it incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment when a monk causes wool to be carded within the limit of six years, so too one who bestows the training incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment. For nuns it is an offense requiring confession. For probationary nuns, female novices, and male novices it also becomes an offense requiring confession.

In summary:

Another's not-yet-received, and received,

Laypeople, tīrthikas, beings of other destinies, and those who are unsuitable — likewise the marks. The fourth and seventh are to be understood accordingly.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that if a monk makes a sitting mat from an old blanket — without mixing in a full cubit of the Sugata's measure from an old blanket, so as to discolor it — it becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment. Venerable One, if a monk cuts off one finger or half a finger less than the Sugata's measure and makes a sitting mat from it, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "Venerable One, if a monk has another do it, what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If he has it done for the sake of another, what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If another makes what was not proper become proper, what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If he has a layperson do it, what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." If one who has received the training does it, one who was previously in dispute does it, one who had previously committed an offense does it, or if those in hidden positions are made to do it — in all these cases it becomes an offense.

"Venerable One, if a monk has other tīrthikas — other ascetics, brahmins, wanderers, or itinerants — do it, what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If he has one who dwells in another of the destinies do it, what does it become?" "It becomes an offense."

"Venerable One, are there cases in which a monk cuts one finger or half a finger less than the Sugata's measure and makes a sitting mat from it, yet it does not become a transgression requiring relinquishment?" "Upāli, there are. In any case where the material of that sitting mat is suitable but the edge-trimming is unsuitable, or where the edge-trimming is suitable but the material is not, or where both are unsuitable — as for what is unsuitable: if a sitting mat is made from she-camel's wool, cattle wool, goat wool, deer wool, mixed wool, or unwoven material of such kinds, it becomes an offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk cuts one finger or half a finger less than the Sugata's measure and is in the act of making a sitting mat when a change of marks occurs and one becomes a nun — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "Venerable One, if a nun cuts one finger or half a finger less than the Sugata's measure and is in the act of making a sitting mat when a change of marks occurs and one becomes a monk — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment."

"Venerable One, if a monk perceives as smaller what is smaller than the Sugata's measure, mixes it in, and has a sitting mat made from it — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "If one perceives as larger what is smaller, and has it done — what does it become?" "There is no offense." "If one perceives as smaller what is larger, mixes it in, and has it done — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one perceives as larger what is larger, mixes it in, and has it done — what does it become?" "There is no offense."

"Venerable One, if one who has not received full ordination cuts one finger or half a finger less than the Sugata's measure and begins making a different sitting mat, and while still without full ordination — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one begins without full ordination and it is still during the ceremony of full ordination — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one begins without full ordination and one has received full ordination afterward — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one begins during the ceremony of full ordination and it is still during that ceremony — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one begins during the ceremony of full ordination and afterward has received full ordination — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one begins after having received full ordination and afterward one has received full ordination — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "If one begins at the time of having received full ordination and afterward one has not received full ordination — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense."

In summary:

Message, letter, gesture,

Having another say it, and one to one,

One who has gone mad, one whose mind is disturbed,

One who is ill, one who is mute, one who is dull.

"Venerable One, if a monk cuts one finger or half a finger less than the Sugata's measure —"

— if one has had it done through a messenger with half a finger less, what does it become? It becomes an offense. Likewise, if one has had it done through a letter, a gesture, having another say it, passing it from one to another, through one who has gone mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull, one who is mute, or one who is deaf — all of these become offenses. Just as a monk who has had a covering mat made incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment, so too if one who has relinquished the training has had it made, it also becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment. For a nun, a female trainee, a male novice, and a female novice, it is an offense.

In summary:

Sky, miraculous power, and conjured form,

Mantra and the other three — so likewise.

The improper, the second characteristic,

The fourth, the seventh relay — so too.

Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk shears sheep's wool beyond three leagues it becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment. Venerable One, if a monk shears sheep's wool from the sky beyond three leagues — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If he shears it by miraculous power — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If a conjured form acting as an enabler shears it — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk renders himself invisible by means of mantra or medicine and shears it — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If he shears it for the benefit of another — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If he sends it to another — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense."

"Venerable One, are there cases in which a monk may shear sheep's wool beyond three leagues without it becoming a transgression requiring relinquishment?" "Upāli, there are. If a monk who has set out on a road finds a piece of sheep's wool and carries it himself up to the limit of three leagues, and then finds another piece of sheep's wool and discards the first and takes the second and goes on — in that case there is no offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk shears wool that is improper — wool other than sheep's wool, such as the wool of a female yak, the wool of an ox, the wool of a goat, or the wool of a deer, mixed with what is improper — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk shears sheep's wool beyond three leagues, and then his characteristic changes and he becomes a nun, and he transgresses the boundary — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "Venerable One, if a nun shears sheep's wool beyond three leagues, and then her characteristic changes and she becomes a monk, and he transgresses the boundary — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment."

"Venerable One, if a monk shears sheep's wool beyond three leagues, perceiving a league as a league — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "If he perceives a league as not a league — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If he perceives what is not a league as a league — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If he perceives what is not a league as not a league — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense."

"Venerable One, if one who has not received full ordination shears a piece of sheep's wool, and while not yet having received full ordination transgresses the boundary — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one shears it without having received full ordination and transgresses the boundary at the very moment of receiving full ordination — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one shears it without having received full ordination and then, having received full ordination, transgresses the boundary — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one shears it at the very moment of receiving full ordination and transgresses the boundary at the very moment of receiving full ordination — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one shears it at the very moment of receiving full ordination and then, having received full ordination, transgresses the boundary — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If one has received full ordination, then shears it, and afterward, having received full ordination, transgresses the boundary — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "If one has received full ordination and shears it, and then transgresses the boundary without having received full ordination — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense."

In summary:

In summary:

A messenger, a written letter, a hand-signal,
Having another convey it, passing it from one to another,
Having become mad, being disturbed in mind,
Being ill, being mute, being simple-minded.

The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "If a monk, venerable sir, sends more than three leagues' worth of sheep's wool as a messenger-gift — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "Likewise, if it is sent by written letter, by hand-signal, by having another convey it, by passing it from one to another, by a madman, by one disturbed in mind, by one tormented by illness, by a simpleton, by a mute, by a deaf-mute, by a blind person — in all such cases it becomes an offense." "Just as a monk who exceeds three leagues' worth of sheep's wool incurs a transgression requiring relinquishment, so too does giving the training to one who is not a relative incur a transgression requiring relinquishment. For a nun, a female probationer, a male novice, and a female novice, it becomes an offense."

The Noble Vinaya, the fourth section. In summary:

A messenger, a written letter, a hand-signal,
Having another convey it, passing it from one to another,
Having become mad, being disturbed in mind,
Being ill, and beings of various kinds,
Householders and the like —
The giving of the training is the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable sir, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk shears the wool of a nun who is not a relative, it becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment. If a monk causes the wool to be sheared by sending a messenger — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "Likewise, if it is done by written letter, by hand-signal, by having another convey it, by passing it from one to another and having it sheared — in all such cases it becomes an offense." "If a monk causes the wool of a mad nun to be sheared — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "Likewise, if it is caused to be sheared in the case of one disturbed in mind, one tormented by illness, a mute, and a deaf-mute — in all such cases it becomes an offense." "If a monk causes a laywoman to have it sheared — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "Likewise, if it is caused to be sheared by an eunuch, by an expelled nun, by one's father, by one's mother, by one who has killed an arhat, by one who with malicious intent has shed the blood of a Tathāgata, by those who have gone over to non-Buddhists, by those in a place of thieves, and by those who were previously in schism — in all such cases it becomes an offense." "If a monk causes a nun who is creating a schism in the Saṅgha, or who has taken sides, or who has been given the training, to have it sheared — what does it become?" "It becomes a relinquishment." "If one who has been given the training causes a nun who is not a relative likewise to have her wool sheared — what does it become?" "It becomes a relinquishment."

In summary:

What is shared, what has been washed,
Likewise the Saṅgha's two marks,
What is improper, what entails relinquishment,
And what is unknown — likewise so.
The seventh and the fourth,
And the nun is the last.

"If a monk causes a shared piece of sheep's wool to be sheared — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If he causes a washed piece to be sheared — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If a monk causes a piece of the Saṅgha's sheep's wool to be sheared — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If it is something that has been fully used by a person and upon being fully used has become soiled — it becomes an offense. But if it is a bedding article that is caused to be sheared, there is no offense." "If a monk causes a monk who is not a relative to have a piece of sheep's wool sheared, and that monk then changes status and becomes a nun — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "If a nun causes a nun who is not a relative to have a piece of sheep's wool sheared, and that nun then changes status and becomes a nun — what does it become?" "It becomes an offense." "Venerable sir, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk causes a nun who is not a relative to have her wool sheared, it also becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment —"

"Venerable sir, are there cases where a monk causes a nun who is not a relative to have a piece of sheep's wool sheared, and yet it does not become a transgression requiring relinquishment?" "Upāli, there are. If wool that is mixed with unsuitable kinds is caused to be sheared — unsuitable wool being the wool of a female donkey, the wool of a cow, the wool of a goat, or the wool of a deer — if what is caused to be sheared is mixed with any of these, it becomes a minor offense."

"Venerable sir, if a monk causes relinquished sheep's wool to be sheared, what does it become?" "If it has not yet been relinquished, it becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment. If it has been relinquished, it becomes a minor offense."

"Venerable sir, if a monk causes another's sheep's wool to be sheared, what does it become?" "A minor offense."

"Venerable sir, if someone not yet fully ordained causes a piece of sheep's wool to be sheared, and that person remains not fully ordained — what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If the wool was caused to be sheared while not yet fully ordained, and that person is in the process of receiving full ordination — what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If it was caused to be sheared while not yet fully ordained, and full ordination has since been completed — what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If it was caused to be sheared while in the process of receiving full ordination, and that person remains in that process — what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If it was caused to be sheared while in the process of receiving full ordination, and full ordination has since been completed — what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If it was caused to be sheared after full ordination has been completed, and that person is fully ordained — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "If it was caused to be sheared after full ordination, and that person is not fully ordained — what does it become?" "A minor offense."

"Venerable sir, if a monk perceives one who is not a relative as not a relative and causes her to shear sheep's wool, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "If he perceives one who is not a relative as a relative, there is no offense." "If he perceives a relative as not a relative, it is a minor offense." "If he perceives a relative as a relative, there is no offense."

"Venerable sir, if a monk perceives a fully ordained nun as fully ordained and causes her to shear sheep's wool, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "If he perceives a fully ordained nun as not fully ordained, it becomes a minor offense." "If he perceives one not fully ordained as fully ordained, it becomes a minor offense."

"If a monk causes a nun who is not a relative to shear sheep's wool, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment." "If he causes a female probationer, a female novice, a laywoman, a non-Buddhist female ascetic of another order, a female wanderer, or any other being dwelling elsewhere to do so — all of these become minor offenses."

"If a nun causes a monk, a male novice, a non-Buddhist male ascetic of another order — whether a brahmin, a follower of a practice, a wanderer, or any other being dwelling elsewhere — to shear wool, what does it become?" "A minor offense. Also toward a male householder or a female householder, a minor offense. Toward a female probationer, a male novice, and a female novice, likewise a minor offense. And washing and combing should be understood in the same way."

In brief:

By messenger, letter, gesture, and through another's word, and from one to another — through one who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, a deaf-mute, and one who is dumb —

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed Buddha: "Venerable sir, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk takes gold or silver with his own hand, or causes it to be accepted, it becomes a transgression requiring relinquishment. Venerable sir, if a monk causes a messenger to accept gold and silver, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "Likewise, through a letter, a gesture, through another's word, and through a chain of intermediaries — if acceptance is caused in all these ways, do all become minor offenses?" "All become minor offenses."

"Venerable sir, if a monk causes a madman to accept gold or silver, what does it become?" "A minor offense. Likewise, if acceptance is caused through one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, a deaf person, a mute, or a dumb person — all become minor offenses."

"Venerable sir, if a monk takes gold or silver from a madman, what does it become?" "A minor offense. Likewise, if one takes gold or silver, or causes acceptance of it, from one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, a mute, a deaf person, one with a speech impediment, one who is intoxicated, or one who has gone to dwell elsewhere — all become minor offenses."

In brief:

A close relative, a maternal kinsman, the fourth and the seventh,
the eighth, and householders and so forth, other householders, and a nun —

"Venerable sir, is there any case in which a monk taking gold and silver, or causing acceptance thereof, from these does not become a transgression entailing forfeiture?" "Upāli, there is: when it has been taken from a non-intimate and one perceives it as a different kind of requisite."

"Venerable sir, if while a monk is taking gold and silver his ordination status changes and he becomes a nun, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "Venerable sir, if while a nun is taking gold and silver her ordination status changes and she becomes a monk, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture."

"Venerable sir, if a monk takes a fraction of gold or a fraction of silver, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "But if he takes a fraction of iron or a fraction of copper, or causes acceptance of such, it becomes a minor offense."

"Venerable sir, if a monk, perceiving gold as gold, takes it, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "If he perceives gold as not being gold, there is no offense." "If he perceives what is not gold as gold, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If he perceives what is not gold as not gold, there is no offense."

"Venerable sir, if someone who has not yet received full ordination takes gold or silver and receives it before receiving full ordination, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If one who has not yet received full ordination takes it and receives it at the moment of receiving full ordination, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If one who has not yet received full ordination takes it and receives it after having received full ordination, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If one who is at the moment of receiving full ordination takes it and receives it at the moment of receiving full ordination, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If one who is at the moment of receiving full ordination takes it and receives it after having received full ordination, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If one who has received full ordination takes it and receives it after having received full ordination, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "If one who has received full ordination takes it and receives it before full ordination, what does it become?" "A minor offense."

"Venerable sir, if a monk directly causes a layperson to accept gold and silver, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture. Likewise, the following, if they directly take or cause acceptance: a hermaphrodite, a eunuch, an expelled nun, a father, a mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has caused the Tathāgata to bleed, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, a thief, one who dwells separately, one who does not dwell in the community, one who has approached the wrong side, one who was formerly involved in a dispute, one from whom an offense has previously arisen, and one who has surrendered the training — if any of these directly take or cause acceptance, all become transgressions entailing forfeiture."

"Venerable sir, are there cases in which a monk takes gold and silver with his own hand, or causes acceptance, without committing an offense?" "Upāli, there are. In such cases, the monk, though taking gold and silver, has not aroused the thought of making it his own — and therefore, thinking that since what is improper cannot serve as a proper article, he takes something else instead."

"Venerable sir, if a monk takes gold and silver on behalf of another, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "Venerable sir, if one who has been given the training takes or causes acceptance of gold and silver, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "Venerable sir, if a nun takes gold and silver with her own hand, or causes acceptance, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "Venerable sir, if a female probationer, a male novice, or a female novice takes gold and silver with their own hand or causes acceptance, what does it become?" "A minor offense."

In brief:

Through messenger, written letter, gesture, saying on another's behalf, relaying from one to another, being insane, being mentally disturbed, being ill, being mute, and traveling to another place.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable sir, when the Blessed One declared that whatever monk engages in barter with various kinds of goods, it becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture — venerable sir, if a monk engages in barter with various kinds of goods through a messenger, what does it become?" "A minor offense. Likewise through a written letter, through gesture, on another's behalf, saying on another's behalf, or relaying from one to another." "Venerable sir, if a monk engages in barter with various kinds of goods together with a madman, what does it become?" "A minor offense. Likewise if done together with one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, a simpleton, a mute, a deaf person — and likewise if done with various kinds of goods together with one who has taken up residence in another destiny — in all these cases it becomes a minor offense."

In brief:

The marks, the fourth, the seventh — thus it is.

Likewise one who has received the training, one who is similar, one who is a relative,
and a nun — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable sir, if a monk engages in barter with various kinds of goods and in the midst of doing so changes his status and becomes a nun, and then the acquisition is completed — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "Venerable sir, if a nun engages in barter with various kinds of goods and in the midst of doing so changes her status and becomes a monk, and then the acquisition is completed — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "Venerable sir, if a monk, perceiving a human being as a human being, engages in barter with various kinds of goods — what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "If he perceives a human being as not being a human being, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If he perceives one who is not a human being as a human being, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If he perceives one who is not a human being as not a human being, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "Venerable sir, if one who has not received full ordination engages in barter with various kinds of goods while not yet fully ordained, and the acquisition is completed while still not fully ordained — what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If set out while not fully ordained but the acquisition is completed when nearly fully ordained, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If set out while not fully ordained but completed after full ordination, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If set out when nearly fully ordained and completed when nearly fully ordained, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If set out when nearly fully ordained and completed after full ordination, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "If set out after full ordination and completed after full ordination, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "If set out after full ordination but completed while not fully ordained, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "Venerable sir, if one who has been given the training engages in barter with various kinds of goods, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." "Venerable sir, if barter is done with various kinds of goods together with a relative, what does it become?" "A minor offense." "Venerable sir, is there any case in which a monk engages in barter with various kinds of goods and yet it does not become a transgression entailing forfeiture?" "Upāli, there is: when like exchanges with like — coming afterward there is no offense." "Venerable sir, if a nun engages in barter with various kinds of goods, what does it become?" "It becomes a transgression entailing forfeiture." For a female probationer, a male novice, and a female novice — it becomes a minor offense. In this training rule, buying and selling are likewise to be elaborated at length accordingly.

In brief:

The same item, loss,
another region, non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), what has not been burned, what is white,
the insane, the marks, a messenger, existence, livelihood, and the nun.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable sir, are there cases where keeping hold of the same almsbowl results in an offense, and cases where keeping hold of the same almsbowl does not result in an offense?"

Upāli replied: "There are such cases. For instance, if a monk keeps hold of a large almsbowl and then undergoes a change of marks and becomes a nun, and in that state continues to keep it, it becomes a minor offense."

"Venerable sir, if a monk loses the almsbowl he has set aside, should he confess the transgression?" The Blessed One replied: "Upāli, he should confess it." "After confessing the offense, if he finds the bowl again, must he set it aside?" "Upāli, no, he need not."

"Venerable sir, the Blessed One has declared that a monk should not keep an extra almsbowl beyond ten days. Are there cases where a monk may keep an extra almsbowl beyond ten days without incurring an offense?" "Upāli, there are. For instance, if a monk sends an almsbowl to another monk in a different region, that monk may keep it for a very long time without any offense."

"Venerable sir, what becomes of a monk who keeps an almsbowl belonging to a non-Buddhist? It becomes a minor offense." "Venerable sir, what becomes of a monk who keeps an unburned almsbowl, a small almsbowl, or a large almsbowl? It becomes a minor offense." "Venerable sir, what becomes of a monk who keeps a white almsbowl? It becomes a minor offense."

"If a monk obtains an almsbowl and then immediately goes insane, from what point does the count of ten days begin?" "It begins from the moment he recovers his own mind." "Venerable sir, are there cases where a monk may keep an extra almsbowl beyond ten days without incurring a forfeiture?" "Upāli, there are. For instance, if a monk acquires an almsbowl and then, after ten days have passed, undergoes a change of marks and becomes a nun, there is no offense. Also, if a monk acquires an almsbowl and immediately upon acquiring it undergoes a change of marks and becomes a monk again, there is no offense."

"Venerable sir, are there cases where a nun may keep an extra almsbowl beyond ten days without incurring an offense?" "Upāli, there are. For instance, if that nun, immediately upon acquiring the almsbowl, undergoes a change of marks and becomes a monk, there is no offense."

"Venerable sir, are there cases where a monk may keep an extra almsbowl for a very long time without incurring an offense?" "Upāli, there are. For instance, if a monk sends a messenger to another monk on account of an almsbowl, and that monk takes possession of the almsbowl and keeps it for a very long time, there is no offense."

"Venerable sir, are there cases where, although a monk has one almsbowl and that one almsbowl is still present, it becomes subject to forfeiture?" "Upāli, there are — if it is kept without having been consecrated." "Venerable sir, are there cases where a monk may keep an extra almsbowl for as long as he lives without incurring a forfeiture?" "Upāli, there are — if that monk passes away before ten days have elapsed."

"Venerable sir, if one keeps an extra almsbowl beyond ten days after having received the training, what results?" "It becomes subject to forfeiture. If a nun keeps an extra almsbowl beyond ten days, it becomes a forfeiture offense. For a female probationer, a female novice, and male novices, it becomes a minor offense."

In brief:

A messenger, a letter, a hand signal, saying through another, one to one,
having gone insane, mental disturbance, illness, being deaf and mute, a migrating being.

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable sir, the Blessed One has further declared that if a monk who has fewer than five almsbowls available for use nevertheless seeks another almsbowl, it becomes subject to forfeiture. Venerable sir, if a monk seeks a second almsbowl through a messenger and obtains one, what results?" "It becomes a minor offense." "Just as with the messenger, so too with a letter, a hand signal, saying through another, and all cases of passing the request along from one to another — all become minor offenses."

"Venerable sir, if a monk seeks a second almsbowl from an insane person, what results? If he obtains the almsbowl, it becomes a minor offense." "Likewise, in the cases of one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is deaf, one who is mute, one who is dumb, and those dwelling in other places — if a monk seeks a second almsbowl from them and obtains one, in all such cases it becomes a minor offense.

In summary:

From tīrthikas and hermaphrodites,
The seven kinds are likewise so;
Those in common, and the fourth,
Implements, and nuns.

Venerable sir, if a monk solicits a second almsbowl from an external non-Buddhist — another ascetic, a brahmin, a wanderer, or a mendicant — and obtains an almsbowl, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Venerable sir, if a monk seeks a single vessel belonging to a tīrthika and obtains it, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Venerable sir, if a monk seeks a second almsbowl from a hermaphrodite and obtains one, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Likewise, if he seeks one from a neuter male or from a neuter female, or from a person of double characteristics, and obtains an almsbowl, it becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk takes another almsbowl while already possessing an almsbowl, and the status of that bowl then changes so that it comes to belong to a nun, and he then obtains it, what results? It must be relinquished. Venerable sir, if a nun, while already possessing an almsbowl, seeks a second one, and her status then changes so that she becomes a monk, and he then obtains it, what results? It must be relinquished.

Venerable sir, if a monk, while already possessing an almsbowl, seeks a second one from a householder or from a householder's attendant, and both parties then undergo a change of status, and after that change the bowl is obtained, what results? It must be relinquished. Venerable sir, if a nun seeks a second almsbowl from a householder or a householder's attendant, and both parties then undergo a change of status, and after that change the bowl is obtained, what results? It must be relinquished.

If one solicits while not yet fully ordained and obtains it while not yet fully ordained, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one solicits while not yet fully ordained and obtains it at the very moment of receiving full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one solicits while not yet fully ordained and obtains it after full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one solicits at the very moment of full ordination and obtains it at the very moment of full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one solicits at the very moment of full ordination and obtains it after full ordination is complete, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one solicits after full ordination is already complete and obtains it from someone fully ordained, what results? It must be relinquished. If one solicits after full ordination is already complete and obtains it from someone not yet fully ordained, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

If two monks jointly solicit a single almsbowl, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Venerable sir, if a monk, perceiving a human being as a human being, solicits an almsbowl and obtains one, what results? It must be relinquished. If he solicits while perceiving a human being as a non-human, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If he solicits while perceiving a non-human as a human being, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If he solicits while perceiving a non-human as a non-human, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk seeks a second almsbowl by means of his own goods or by payment, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Venerable sir, if one who has abandoned the training seeks a second almsbowl while already possessing one and obtains it, what results? It must be relinquished. Venerable sir, if a nun seeks a second almsbowl while already possessing one and obtains it, what results? It must be relinquished. If probationary nuns, female novices, or male novices seek a second almsbowl while already possessing one and obtain it, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

In summary:

Through messenger, letter, hand signal,
Speaking through another, and one-to-one relay,
One gone mad, one mentally disturbed,
One ill, one deaf, and those who journey elsewhere.

Thus did the venerable Upāli put these questions to the Blessed One, the Buddha.

Venerable sir, the Blessed One declared that if a monk has a non-relative weaver weave a robe for him, it must be relinquished. If a monk has it woven through a messenger, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Likewise, through a letter, a hand signal, speaking through another, one-to-one relay, or having it woven on behalf of another — in all such cases it becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk has a mad weaver weave a robe for him, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Likewise, if the weaver is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, simpleminded, mute, deaf, or a being who is a non-human dwelling in such a state — in all such cases it becomes a minor offense.

In summary:

The neuter, the hermaphrodite, and one of common sex marks —
Likewise that category of the impermissible seven,
The fourth order, trainees, and fully ordained nuns.

Venerable sir, if a monk has a neuter weaver weave a robe for him, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Likewise, a hermaphrodite, a female neuter, and one with both sex characteristics — in all such cases it becomes a minor offense. Venerable sir, if a monk has a robe of common ownership woven, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Venerable sir, if a monk has a non-relative weaver weave a robe, and that weaver's status changes and she becomes a fully ordained nun, and the monk then receives it, what results? It must be relinquished. Venerable sir, if a monk or a fully ordained nun has a non-relative weaver weave a robe, and the weaver's status changes — and after that change the robe is received — what results? It must be relinquished.

Venerable sir, is there a case in which a monk has a non-relative weaver weave a robe yet it need not be relinquished? Upāli, yes there is. If the material for the robe is allowable but the relationship is not allowable, or the relationship is allowable but the material is not allowable, or neither is allowable — in such cases the material is not allowable. Having a robe woven from the wool of a she-camel, the wool of a cow, the wool of a goat, the wool of a deer, or mixtures of these — all such cases become minor offenses.

Venerable sir, if one who has not received full ordination has it woven and one who has not received full ordination receives it, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who has not received full ordination has it woven and one who is in the process of receiving full ordination receives it, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who has not received full ordination has it woven and one who has fully received full ordination receives it, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who is in the process of receiving full ordination has it woven and one in the process of receiving full ordination receives it, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who is in the process of receiving full ordination has it woven and one who has fully received full ordination receives it, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who has fully received full ordination has it woven and one who has fully received full ordination receives it, what results? It must be relinquished. If one who has fully received full ordination has it woven and one who has not fully received full ordination receives it, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk perceives a non-human as a non-human and has a robe woven for that being, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one perceives a human as a non-human, it becomes a minor offense. If one perceives a non-human as a human, it becomes a minor offense. If one perceives a human as a human and has a robe woven, what results? It must be relinquished.

Venerable sir, if a monk perceives a non-relative as a non-relative and has a robe woven for that person, what results? It must be relinquished. If one perceives a relative as not a relative, there is no offense. If one perceives a non-relative as a relative and has a robe woven, it becomes a minor offense. If one perceives a relative as a relative and has a robe woven, there is no offense.

Venerable sir, if a trainee who has relinquished a precept has a robe woven by a non-relative weaver and obtains the robe, what results? It must be relinquished. The same applies to a fully ordained nun as it does to a monk, exactly as before. And just as the preceding cases apply from the training downward — if the robe is obtained while in the process of receiving full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

If one who has not yet received full ordination gives rise to the intention and obtains the robe before receiving full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who has not yet received full ordination gives rise to the intention and obtains the robe in the very process of receiving full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who has not yet received full ordination gives rise to the intention and obtains the robe after having received full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who is in the very process of receiving full ordination gives rise to the intention and obtains the robe in the very process of receiving full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who is in the very process of receiving full ordination gives rise to the intention and obtains the robe after full ordination has been completed, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one who has completed full ordination gives rise to the intention and, as a fully ordained monk, obtains the robe, what results? It must be relinquished. If one who has completed full ordination gives rise to the intention and obtains the robe before full ordination has been completed, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk perceives a human weaver as human, gives rise to the intention, and has the robe completed before him, what results? It must be relinquished. If one perceives a human as non-human, it becomes a minor offense. If one perceives a non-human as human, it becomes a minor offense. If one perceives a non-human as non-human, it becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk perceives a non-relative weaver as a non-relative, gives rise to the intention, and has the robe completed before him, what results? It must be relinquished. If one perceives a non-relative as a relative, what results? There is no offense. If one perceives a relative as a non-relative, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one perceives a relative as a relative, there is no offense.

If one who has been given a precept gives rise to the intention and has the robe completed before him, what results? It must be relinquished. Venerable sir, if a fully ordained nun gives rise to the intention and has the robe completed before her, what results? It must be relinquished. If male novices and female novices give rise to the intention and have the robe completed before them, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

In brief:

By messenger, by letter, by hand-signal,
by having another say it, by passing it from one to another, for one who has gone mad, for one whose mind is disturbed, for one who is sick, for one who is deaf-mute — these are the cases.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable sir, the Blessed One has said that if a monk, having given a robe to a monk, seizes it back or causes it to be seized back, it must be relinquished. If a monk seizes it back by messenger, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Likewise, if one does so by letter, by hand-signal, by having another say it, by relaying it from one to another, or by seizing it on behalf of another — all of these become minor offenses.

Venerable sir, if a monk gives a robe to a mad monk and then seizes it back, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Likewise, if one seizes back a robe given to one whose mind is disturbed, to one tormented by illness, to one who is dull-witted, to one who is mute, or to one who is deaf-mute — all of these become minor offenses.

Venerable sir, if a monk gives a robe to ascetics of other traditions who are tīrthikas (non-Buddhists) — whether wandering renunciants, brahmin ascetics, wandering practitioners, or peripatetics — and then seizes it back, what results? All become minor offenses. Venerable sir, if one seizes back a robe given to someone dwelling in another destination, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

In brief:

The same applies to laypeople and the rest, and likewise to the common mark;
what is not supreme and not permissible is the same,
and the fourth and the seventh are likewise so.

Venerable sir, if a monk gives a robe to a layperson and then seizes it back, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Likewise, if one seizes back robes given to a eunuch, to an expelled nun, to one's father, to one's mother, to one who has killed an arhat, to one who has shed the blood of a Tathāgata with malicious intent, to one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), to one who is a habitual thief, to one who previously caused a schism, or to one against whom a prior offense has arisen — if one seizes back a robe given to any of these, it becomes a minor offense in every case.

Venerable sir, if a monk gives a robe to a probationer, to one who is not resident, to one who dwells separately, or to a monk who previously caused a schism, and then seizes it back, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

If one causes a layperson to seize back a robe given to one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, to one who has sided with that person, or to one who has surrendered their training, it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture in every case.

Venerable sir, if a monk gives a robe to a nun, to a female trainee, to a female novice, or to a male novice, and then seizes it back, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk gives a robe to another monk and then causes a layperson to seize it back, what results? It becomes an offense requiring forfeiture.

Likewise, if one causes a layperson to seize back a robe given to a probationer, to a eunuch, to an expelled nun, to one's father, to one's mother, to one who has killed an arhat, to one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, to one who has shed the blood of a Tathāgata with malicious intent, to a non-Buddhist, to one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, to a habitual thief, to one who dwells separately, to one who is not resident, to one who previously caused a schism, to one against whom a prior offense has arisen, to one who has sided with a schismatic, to one who has surrendered their training, to a monk, to a nun, to a female trainee, to a male novice, or to a female novice — in every case it becomes an offense requiring forfeiture.

Venerable sir, if two monks share a robe in common and afterwards one of them seizes it back, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk gives a robe to another monk and seizes it back, and in the interim that monk has changed status and become a nun and received full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a nun gives a robe to another nun and seizes it back, and in the interim that nun has changed status and become a monk and received full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk gives a robe of less than one cubit to another monk and then seizes it back, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, is there any case in which a monk gives a robe to another monk, seizes it back, and yet it does not become an offense requiring forfeiture? Upāli, yes, there is. How so? When the material of the robe is permissible but the weaving is not permissible; when the weaving is permissible but the material is not permissible; or when both are not permissible. That which is not permissible is as follows: wool from a female sheep, wool from cattle, wool from a goat, wool from a wild deer, or a mixture of these, or a fabric woven in a manner like these — if such a robe is given and then seized back, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if a monk perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained, gives him a robe, and then seizes it back, what results? It becomes an offense requiring forfeiture. If he perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained, gives him a robe, and then seizes it back, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If he perceives a person who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, gives him a robe, and then seizes it back, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If he perceives a person who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained, gives him a robe, and then seizes it back, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable sir, if one intends to seize from a person who is not fully ordained and does seize from a person who is not fully ordained, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one intends to seize from a person who is not fully ordained and the seizure is accomplished with respect to a fully ordained person, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one intends to seize from a person who is not fully ordained and the seizure is accomplished with respect to a fully ordained person who has been so fully ordained, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one intends to seize from a fully ordained person and the seizure is accomplished with respect to a fully ordained person, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If one intends to seize from a fully ordained person and the seizure is accomplished with respect to a person who is fully ordained, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

If one intends to seize from a fully ordained person and the seizure is accomplished with respect to a fully ordained person who has been so fully ordained, what results? It becomes a defeat. If one who is fully ordained intends to seize and the seizure is accomplished with respect to one who is not fully ordained, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable One, if one who has undertaken the training gives a robe to a monk and then takes it back, what results? It becomes a defeat. Venerable One, if a monk takes a robe that a nun has given, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Venerable One, if a nun takes a robe that a monk has given, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Venerable One, if a nun takes back a robe that she herself gave to another nun, what results? It becomes a defeat. If a nun takes back a robe she gave to a monk, a female probationer, a male novice, or a female novice, what results? It becomes a minor offense. For female probationers, female novices, and male novices, the detailed treatment of minor offenses applies.

In brief:

A troubled mind, and when the time has passed, shared in common — likewise these apply;
as the fourth type of unfit case has it, the seventh concerns the time and the nun.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable One, the Blessed One has declared that a monk should keep an examined robe until the time of the robe-offering ceremony, and that if he keeps it beyond that time it becomes a defeat. Venerable One, is there a case where, even though the time has passed, it does not become a defeat? Upāli, yes there is — when the monk's mind became agitated at the very moment he obtained the robe.

Venerable One, is there a case where a monk may keep an examined robe for his entire lifetime without it becoming a defeat? Upāli, yes there is — when the period up to the time of robe-offering has been made a fixed term.

Venerable One, if a monk keeps an examined robe past the time of the robe-offering and, the ordination status having changed, he becomes a nun, what results? It becomes a defeat. Venerable One, if a nun keeps an examined robe past the time of the robe-offering and, the ordination status having changed, she becomes a monk, what results? It becomes a defeat.

Venerable One, if a monk keeps an examined robe that is held in common past the time of the robe-offering, what results? It becomes a minor offense. Venerable One, is there a case where a monk keeps an examined robe past the time of robe-offering and it does not become a defeat? Upāli, yes there is — when the material of that robe has become suitable but the thread is not suitable, or the thread has become suitable but the material is not suitable, or both are not suitable. What is not suitable? Wool of a female deer, wool of cattle, wool of goats, wool of wild animals, or a mixture of these. A robe of such materials, when it has not yet been woven into cloth, if kept past the time of robe-offering, becomes a minor offense.

Venerable One, if a monk perceives the time of robe-offering as having passed when it has in fact passed, and keeps a robe, what results? It becomes a defeat. If he perceives the time as not having passed when it has in fact passed, and keeps a robe, what results? There is no offense. If he perceives the time as having passed when it has not in fact passed, and keeps a robe, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If he perceives the time as not having passed when it has not in fact passed, and keeps a robe, what results? There is no offense.

Venerable One, if a robe is kept for one who is not yet fully ordained, and the time passes while he is still not yet fully ordained, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If a robe is kept for one who is not yet fully ordained, and the time passes when he is in the act of receiving full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If a robe is kept for one who is not yet fully ordained, and the time passes after he has received full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If a robe is kept for one who is in the act of receiving full ordination, and the time passes while he is in that act, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If a robe is kept for one who is in the act of receiving full ordination, and the time passes after he has received full ordination, what results? It becomes a minor offense. If a robe is kept for one who has already received full ordination, and the time passes after full ordination has been received, what results? It becomes a defeat. If a robe is kept by one who has received full ordination and the time passes when he is no longer fully ordained, what results? It becomes a minor offense.

Venerable one, if the proper time has not yet come and the king has dismissed the assembly, how should a monk proceed with a robe that has been kept? Exactly as if one had entered into the proper procedure. Should a robe that has been kept be called "past ten days" or "not past ten days"? It should be called "past ten days."

Venerable one, may a robe that has been kept be made into an out-of-season robe? Upāli: It may not.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "Keep the robe until the time of the robe-offering ceremony," venerable one, when is the time of the robe-offering ceremony? Upāli: It is when the proper time has come. Until the proper time has come, it is at all times out of season.

Venerable one, if a robe is kept past the time for making the robe offering, as set forth in the training, what results? It becomes a defeat.

Venerable one, if a nun keeps a robe past the time for making the robe offering, what results? It becomes a defeat. For probationers, novice monks, and novice nuns, it is a minor offense; that is to be stated in full.

In brief:

The improper, the fourth, and likewise the seventh, which is the obstruction;
the vow, the Saṅgha,
the sky-mark, and the nun.

The venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that even at great distance, if a monk is separated from his robe for six days, then if he is separated for longer than that it becomes a defeat. Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk, even though separated from his robe for more than six days, does not incur a defeat? Upāli: There is. In whatever way the material for that robe has become permissible but the thread is not permissible, or the thread has become permissible but the material is not permissible, or both are not permissible — what is not permissible is: the wool of a female yak, the wool of cattle, the wool of goats, the wool of deer, and mixtures of these. Similarly, if one is separated from a robe that has not been woven for more than six days, it becomes a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives as elapsed what has elapsed and is separated from his robe, what results? It becomes a defeat. If he perceives as not elapsed what has elapsed and is separated from it, there is no offense. If he perceives as elapsed what has not elapsed and is separated from it, it becomes a minor offense. If he perceives as not elapsed what has not elapsed and is separated from it, there is no offense.

Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk, even though separated from his robe for more than six days, does not incur a defeat? Upāli: There is. In whatever case, when that monk was coming, one of any of the eight obstructions arose for him.

Venerable one, if a robe is kept for one who has not received full ordination and is separated from him while he has not received full ordination, what results? It is a minor offense. If it is kept for one who has not received full ordination and is separated from him in the act of receiving full ordination, what results? It is a minor offense. If it is kept for one who has not received full ordination and is separated from him after full ordination has been received, what results? It is a minor offense. If it is kept for one in the act of receiving full ordination and is separated from him in the act of receiving full ordination, what results? It is a minor offense. If it is kept for one in the act of receiving full ordination and is separated from him after full ordination has been received, what results? It is a minor offense. If it is kept by one who has received full ordination and is separated from him after full ordination has been received, what results? It becomes a defeat. If it is kept after full ordination has been received and is separated from him when he is no longer fully ordained, what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk, even though separated from his robe for more than six days, does not incur a defeat? Upāli: There is. In whatever case, that monk has obtained the vow of non-separation from his robe.

Venerable one, if a monk has consecrated a robe belonging to the Saṅgha, kept it, and is then separated from it after more than six days — should that be called "separated" or "not separated"? Upāli: It should be called "separated." Does it become a defeat? Upāli: It does not.

It is a transgression alone that must be confessed.

Venerable one, if a monk has left a robe inside a household and then departed into the sky, and more than six days have passed — what results? It becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk has left a robe inside a household and is separated from that robe for more than six days, and in the meantime his status changes and he becomes a nun — what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a nun has left a robe inside a household and is separated from that robe for more than six days, and in the meantime her status changes and she becomes a monk — what results? It becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

Venerable one, if one who has been granted a training rule is separated from a robe for more than six days — what results? It becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If a nun is separated from it, it is a minor offense. For a trainee nun and a novice nun as well, it is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a male novice is separated from a robe for more than six days — what results? It is a minor offense.

The Vinaya, the excellent teaching. Fifth fascicle.

In brief:

By messenger, letter, hand-sign, through another's word, and one by one —
one who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is sick, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who stutters, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, and one gone to non-Buddhists.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk seeks his rains-retreat cloth very hastily or keeps it for an exceedingly long time, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. Venerable one, if a monk has sought the rains-retreat cloth through a messenger very hastily and finds the cloth — what results? It is a minor offense. If he has kept it for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

Just as with a messenger, so too with a letter, a hand-sign, another's word, and through transmission one by one from person to person.

Venerable one, if a monk has sought the rains-retreat cloth from a madman very hastily and finds the cloth — what results? It is a minor offense. If he has kept it for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

Just as with a madman, so too with one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who stutters, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, and likewise with non-Buddhist ascetics outside this teaching — other wanderers, brahmins, practitioners, and wandering mendicants — if he has sought from them very hastily and finds it, it is a minor offense. If he has kept it for an exceedingly long time, it is also a minor offense.

In brief:

What is improper and likewise its characteristics, the seventh that is common and the same — the superior, the cotton cloth, the fourth, and also the nun.

Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk has sought the rains-retreat cloth very hastily and kept it for an exceedingly long time yet does not incur an offense entailing forfeiture? Upāli: There is. When the material of that cloth is improper, or when the thread is improper though the material is proper, or when both are improper. What is improper is: mare's wool, cow's wool, goat's wool, deer's wool, and the like when blended — if from such material a rains-retreat cloth has not been woven on a loom, and one seeks it very hastily or keeps it for an exceedingly long time, it is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a monk seeks the rains-retreat cloth very hastily or keeps it for an exceedingly long time and in the meantime his status changes and he becomes a nun — what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a nun seeks the rains-retreat cloth very hastily or keeps it for an exceedingly long time and in the meantime her status changes and she becomes a monk — what results? It becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a monk seeks a rains-retreat cloth that is held in common very hastily or keeps it for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a rains-retreat cloth is sought before full ordination, obtained before full ordination, and kept for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

If it is sought before full ordination and obtained at the moment of full ordination and kept for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

If it is sought before full ordination and obtained after full ordination and kept for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

If it is sought at the moment of full ordination and obtained at the moment of full ordination and kept for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

If it is sought at the moment of full ordination and obtained after full ordination and kept for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

If it is sought after full ordination and obtained after full ordination and kept for an exceedingly long time — what results? It becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

If it is sought at the time of full ordination and obtained before full ordination and kept for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a monk seeks a rains-retreat cloth that was not requested very hastily or keeps it for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a monk seeks a rains-retreat cloth made of cotton very hastily or keeps it for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human being as a human being and seeks a rains-retreat cloth from that person very hastily and obtains the cloth — what results? It becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he keeps it for a long time, it is likewise. If he perceives a human being as a non-human being and obtains it from that person, it is a minor offense. If he perceives a non-human being as a human being and obtains it from that person, it is a minor offense. If he perceives a non-human being as a non-human being and obtains it from that person, it is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a monk, after the rains-retreat cloth has properly arisen, perceives that half a month has passed when it has indeed passed and keeps it — what results? It becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If he perceives that it has not passed when in fact it has passed, there is no offense. If he perceives that it has passed when it has not passed, it is a minor offense. If he perceives that it has not passed when in fact it has not passed, there is no offense.

Venerable one, if monks who have entered the rains retreat are expelled by the king — how should those monks, having entered the rains retreat in the proper manner, conclude it? Just as they properly entered it, so too should they conclude it. And how should they keep the rains-retreat cloth? Just as it properly arose, so should they keep it.

Venerable one, if one who has been given the training seeks a rains-retreat cloth very hastily or keeps it for an exceedingly long time — what results? It becomes an offense entailing forfeiture.

Venerable one, if a novice seeks a rains-retreat cloth very hastily or keeps it for an exceedingly long time — what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a nun seeks a rains-retreat cloth — what results? It is a minor offense. If she keeps it beyond ten days, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. If a nun or a female novice seeks a rains-retreat cloth or keeps it beyond ten days, it is a minor offense.

In brief:

Through a messenger, a letter, a hand-signal,
Having another speak, or passing word from one to the next —
Through one who has become mad, or whose mind is disturbed,
Or one who is ill, newly recovered, or simple-minded.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk, while intending to dedicate his gain to the Saṅgha, dedicates it to himself instead, it becomes an offense entailing forfeiture. Venerable one, if a monk, while intending to dedicate his gain to the Saṅgha, has it dedicated to himself through a messenger, and the gain is thereby actually obtained — what results? It is a minor offense. The same applies when done through a letter, a hand-signal, having another speak, or passing word from one to the next.

Venerable one, if a mad monk, while intending to dedicate his gain to the Saṅgha, dedicates it to himself and the gain is thereby actually obtained — what results? It is a minor offense. The same applies in the case of one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is stupefied, one who is mute, and one who is deaf — all of these result in a minor offense.

In brief:

Those whose reception is impermissible or whose kind is unsuitable,

The seventh category and those characterized as the fourth,
Laypeople and the like,
Wanderers, trainees, and nuns.

Venerable one, if a monk, intending to dedicate a robe of less than one cubit to the Saṅgha, dedicates it to himself and the robe is thereby actually obtained — what results? It is a minor offense. However, if it is a robe of a full square cubit or larger, it entails a defeat.

Venerable one, is there a case where a monk, intending to dedicate a gain to the Saṅgha yet dedicating it to himself, does not incur a defeat? Upāli: Yes, there is. Namely, when the material of the robe is suitable but the seam is not; when the seam is suitable but the material is not; or when both are unsuitable. As for both being unsuitable — wool from a she-goat, wool from a cow, wool from a goat, wool from a wild animal, mixed wool, or wool that has not been woven: if one dedicates such a robe to oneself and it is actually obtained, it is a minor offense.

Venerable one, does it entail a defeat if a monk receives a robe from his father and mother? Upāli: Yes, it does — specifically, if the father and mother knowingly dedicated it to the Saṅgha and the monk then dedicates it to himself, that entails a defeat.

Venerable one, if a robe is solicited before full ordination and obtained before full ordination — what results? It is a minor offense. If solicited before full ordination and obtained in the course of receiving full ordination — what results? It is a minor offense. If solicited before full ordination and obtained after full ordination — what results? It is a minor offense. If solicited in the course of receiving full ordination and obtained in the course of receiving full ordination — what results? It is a minor offense. If solicited in the course of receiving full ordination and obtained after full ordination — what results? It is a minor offense. If solicited after full ordination and obtained after full ordination — what results? It entails a defeat. If solicited after full ordination and obtained before full ordination — what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a monk, intending to dedicate a gain to the Saṅgha, perceives it as dedicated and yet dedicates it to himself — what results? It entails a defeat. If he perceives something dedicated as not dedicated, there is no offense. If he perceives something not dedicated as dedicated, it is a minor offense. If he perceives something not dedicated as not dedicated and then obtains it, there is no offense.

Venerable one, if a monk, intending to dedicate a gain to the Saṅgha, dedicates it to himself, and then changes his ordination status and becomes a nun, and only then obtains it — what results? It entails a defeat. Venerable one, if a nun, intending to dedicate a gain to the Saṅgha, dedicates it to herself, and then changes her ordination status and becomes a monk, and only then obtains it — what results? It entails a defeat.

Venerable one, if a monk dedicates a gain to a layman for himself, and that gain is thereby actually obtained — what results? It is a minor offense. Likewise, the same applies in the following cases: a eunuch, an androgyne, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, a thief, one dwelling separately, one not residing in the community, one who has drawn near to departure, one who has previously committed an offense, one who has previously caused conflict, and one to whom the precepts have been administered — if a monk dedicates a gain to any of these for himself and that gain is actually obtained, it is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a monk dedicates a gain belonging to beings residing elsewhere to himself, and that gain is thereby actually obtained — what results? It is a minor offense.

Venerable one, if a monk dedicates a gain belonging to the Saṅgha to himself — intending to dedicate it to the Saṅgha yet dedicating it to himself — and that gain is actually obtained, what results? It is to be relinquished.

Venerable one, if a monk dedicates to himself a gain that was dedicated to two monks or to many monks, and that gain is actually obtained, what results? It is a minor offense.

If a monk dedicates to himself a gain that was dedicated to the community of monks, or to the community of nuns, or to both communities, and that gain is actually obtained, what results? It is to be relinquished.

Venerable one, if a monk dedicates to himself a gain that was dedicated to a nun, or to a nun in probationary training, or to a female novice, or to male novices, and that gain is actually obtained, what results? It is a minor offense.

Likewise, if a nun in probationary training dedicates to herself a gain that was dedicated to a monk, or to a nun, or to a nun in probationary training, or to a female novice, or to male novices, and that gain is actually obtained, what results? It is a minor offense.

In the same way, for a nun in probationary training, a male novice, and a female novice, the minor offense should also be set forth in full.

In summary, as with the improper and the fourth — seeking what is lost, in just that same way — that itself and the seventh arise:
unconsecrated and consecrated.

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if medicine kept beyond seven days is to be relinquished. But, venerable one, is there a case in which medicine kept beyond seven days is not to be relinquished?"

Upāli, there is. It is medicine that has become improper — that is, medicine mixed with what is improper, or medicine that monks are not permitted to use.

"Venerable one, if a monk obtains medicine, and once seven days have passed he perceives that seven days have passed, and then dawn breaks, what results?" It is to be relinquished.

"If seven days have passed and he perceives them as not yet passed, there is no offense. If seven days have not yet passed and he perceives them as seven days, it is a minor offense. If seven days have not yet passed and he perceives them as not yet passed, and dawn breaks, there is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk loses medicine that is to be relinquished, should he confess the transgression or not?"

Upāli, he should confess it.

"If after confessing the transgression he again obtains it, should it be relinquished?"

Upāli, it should not.

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may keep medicine for as long as he lives without it needing to be relinquished?"

Upāli, there is — when it has been timed before the seven days are complete.

"Venerable one, if a monk obtains medicine and seven days pass, or more than seven days pass, and in that interval he changes status and becomes a nun, what results?" It is to be relinquished.

"Venerable one, if a nun obtains medicine and seven days pass, or more than seven days pass, and in that interval she changes status and becomes a monk, what results?" It is to be relinquished.

"Venerable one, is there a case in which that same medicine is to be relinquished and yet that same medicine is also actually relinquished?"

Upāli, there is — as when a monk's medicine has exceeded seven days and the time too has elapsed.

"Venerable one, if medicine is obtained before full ordination and seven days pass before full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If obtained before full ordination and seven days pass at the moment of full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If obtained before full ordination and seven days pass after full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If obtained at the moment of full ordination and seven days pass at the moment of full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If obtained at the moment of full ordination and seven days pass after full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If obtained after full ordination and seven days pass after full ordination, what results?" It is to be relinquished.

"If obtained at the moment of full ordination and seven days pass before full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk obtains medicine and seven days have passed and he then becomes mentally disturbed, from what point should the seven days be counted?" From the moment when his mind returns to normal.

"Venerable one, is it permitted for a monk to take medicine that has not been received and blessed — whether it is medicine for the morning period, medicine for the afternoon period, medicine for seven days, or medicine for as long as life lasts — and, claiming it as his own, to use it freely?" Upāli answered: "It is not permitted."

"In any case, if a monk has received that medicine at the time of the morning period, he may use it during the morning period. If he has received it at the time of the afternoon period, he may use it during the afternoon period. If the allotted time has passed, he may not use it."

"If it goes past the time, what results?" It is to be relinquished.

"Venerable one, if a monk seeks out or blesses medicine that has already been relinquished, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk has received and blessed medicine that is for the morning period, the afternoon period, for seven days, or for as long as life lasts — is he permitted to use it?" Upāli answered: "He is permitted. Morning medicine is to be used in the morning; if the morning period has passed, it may not be used. Afternoon medicine is to be used in the afternoon; if the afternoon period has passed, it may not be used. Seven-day medicine is to be used within seven days; if seven days have passed, it may not be used. Medicine for as long as life lasts may be used for as long as life lasts."

"If he uses it beyond those limits, what results?" Using what has been relinquished incurs a downfall.

"Venerable one, if he blesses it anew after that, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if, having been given a training rule, a monk lets medicine pass the seven-day limit, what results?" It is to be relinquished.

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun lets medicine pass the seven-day limit, what results?" It is to be relinquished.

"For female probationers, female novices, and male novices, it should be stated that they incur a minor offense."

The offenses entailing relinquishment are complete.

In summary: conveying a message by messenger, letter, hand gesture, by having another say it, from one to the next, becoming insane, mental disturbance, affliction by illness, being deaf, being mentally impaired, fallen asleep, struck dumb, intoxicated, in meditative absorption — those in transit are the last.

The venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that lying knowingly incurs a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk lies through a messenger, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise through a letter, through a hand gesture, by having another say it, and by passing it from one to the next — what results in each case?" The same applies to all of these.

"Venerable one, if a monk lies to a madman, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise, if he lies to one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is mentally impaired, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is struck dumb, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, or one who is residing elsewhere — in all such cases it is a minor offense."

In summary: solitude, language, the fourth case, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who does not speak, nighttime, the seventh case — likewise: the body, a student, and a nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk lies to a person in solitude, taking them for someone not in solitude, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk lies to a border-dweller in the noble language, and that border-dweller does not understand the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"If a noble monk lies to another noble person in the language of the border-dwellers, and that noble person does not understand the language of the border-dwellers, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"If a border-dweller lies to a noble person in the language of the border-dwellers, and that noble person does not understand the language of the border-dwellers, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"If a border-dweller lies to another border-dweller in the noble language, and that border-dweller does not understand the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human being as a human being and lies to them, what results?" It is a downfall. "If he perceives a human being as a non-human, it becomes a minor offense. If he perceives a non-human as a human being, it becomes a minor offense. If he perceives a non-human as a non-human and lies, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk asks another monk, 'Who are you?' and that monk replies, 'I am a non-Buddhist adherent' — is this to be counted as relinquishing the training?" "No, Upāli. Because he knowingly spoke a lie, it becomes a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk asks another monk, 'Are you a non-Buddhist adherent?' and the other, by not speaking, acknowledges it by silence — what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk, while lying, undergoes a change of sex and becomes a nun, what results?" It becomes a downfall. "Venerable one, if a nun, while lying, undergoes a change of sex and becomes a monk, what results?" It is a downfall.

"Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination intends to lie and speaks to one who has not received full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one who has not received full ordination intends to lie and speaks to one who is in the process of receiving full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one who has not received full ordination intends to lie, and then, upon becoming fully ordained, speaks, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one who is in the process of receiving full ordination intends to lie and speaks to one in the process of receiving full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one who is in the process of receiving full ordination intends to lie and speaks to one who is fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one who is fully ordained intends to lie and speaks while fully ordained, what results?" It is a downfall. "If one who is fully ordained intends to lie and speaks before full ordination is complete, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk asks another monk, 'Did you see such-and-such a thing?' and that monk, though not having seen it, says, 'I saw it by means of a bodily sign' — what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if one who has given up the training lies, what results?" It becomes a downfall. "Venerable one, if a nun lies, what results?" It is a downfall. For female trainees (śikṣamāṇā), novice nuns, and male novices, it is a minor offense.

In brief:

By messenger, letter, gesture, by quoting another, by relay from one to the next,
one who has become insane, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, one who is mute, one who is simple-minded, one who is asleep, one who is hiccupping, one who is intoxicated, one who is in meditative absorption — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that speaking a human's fault incurs a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of a human's fault by messenger, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Just as it is through a messenger, so too through a written letter, a hand-gesture, quoting another, and transmission from one to the next — all of these become minor offenses."

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of a human's fault to a madman, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise, speaking words of a human's fault to one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is simple-minded, one who is mute, one who is dumb, one who is asleep, one who is hiccupping, one who is intoxicated, and one who is in meditative absorption — what results in all these cases?" In all cases it is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of a human's fault to someone dwelling in another destiny, what results?" It is a minor offense.

In brief:

Speech, body, and similarly solitude, characteristics, the fourth and the seventh, laypeople and the rest — giving up the training, and the nun.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk speaks words of a human's fault to a border-dweller in the noble language, and that border-dweller does not understand the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk speaks words of a human's fault to a noble one in the border-dweller's language, and that noble one does not understand the border-dweller's language, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"If a border-dweller speaks words of a human's fault to a noble one in the border-dweller's language, and that noble one also does not understand the border-dweller's language, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"If a border-dweller speaks words of a human's fault to another border-dweller in the noble language, and that border-dweller also does not understand the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of a human's fault while directing his attention through the body, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a secluded place as unsecluded and speaks words of a human's fault, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of a human's fault to another monk, and in the midst of speaking undergoes a change of gender and becomes a nun, what results?" It is a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a nun speaks words of a human's fault to another nun, and in the midst of speaking undergoes a change of gender and becomes a monk, what results?" It is a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained and speaks words of a human's fault, what results?" It is a downfall. "If he perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he perceives a not fully ordained person as fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he perceives a not fully ordained person as not fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human as a human and speaks words of a human's fault, what results?" It is a downfall. "If he perceives a human as a non-human, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he perceives a non-human as a human, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he perceives a non-human as a non-human, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk intends to speak words of a human's fault to someone not fully ordained and speaks to someone not fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he intends to speak to someone not fully ordained and speaks to someone in the process of receiving full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he intends to speak to someone not fully ordained and speaks to someone who has just completed full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he intends to speak to someone in the process of receiving full ordination and speaks to someone in the process of receiving full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he intends to speak to someone in the process of receiving full ordination and speaks to someone who has just completed full ordination, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he intends to speak to a fully ordained person and speaks to one who has just completed full ordination, what results?" It is a downfall. "If he intends to speak to a fully ordained person and speaks to someone not fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of a human's fault to a layperson, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of a human's fault to a paṇḍaka, what results?" It is a minor offense.

Likewise, if words of a human's fault are spoken to any of the following — a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed her father, one who has killed her mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one who dwells as a thief, one who is unsettled in conduct, one who does not abide, one who dwells separately, one who was previously in dispute, or one against whom an offense was previously brought — in all such cases it is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of a human's fault to monks who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, who have taken their side, or to monks who have been given a formal ruling, what results?" It is a downfall. "Venerable one, if one who has been given a formal ruling speaks words of a human's fault, what results?" It is a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks words of a human's fault to a nun, a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices, what results?"

In all such cases it is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if a nun speaks words of a human's fault to another nun, what results?" It is a downfall. "If a nun speaks words of a human's fault to a monk, a female probationer, a male novice, or a female novice, in all such cases it is a minor offense."

The minor offenses pertaining to a female probationer, a female novice, and male novices should be stated in full in the same way. Just as the full treatment was given for speaking words of a human's fault, so too should the full treatment be given for slander.

In brief:

By voice, by body, by isolation, by the marks, by the fourth, and by the seventh, and in relation to laypeople and others —
the last of the trainings given is this.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk who has sought to settle a dispute in the Saṅgha in accordance with the rule is subsequently subjected to a formal act, it is a downfall. Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk who has properly settled a dispute in accordance with the rule and is then subjected to a formal act does not incur a downfall?" Upāli, there is. In any case where those who previously committed an offense, or who were previously parties to a dispute, or who are not in good standing, settle a dispute in accordance with the rule and are subsequently subjected to a formal act — that is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, when a dispute has been properly settled in accordance with the rule, and a noble monk subsequently subjects the one who settled it to a formal act using the language of a noble one, and that monk who subjected him to the act did not seek to use the language of a noble one, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"When a dispute has been properly settled in accordance with the rule, and a noble monk subjects the one who settled it to a formal act using the language of a border monk, and that noble monk likewise did not seek to use the language of a border monk, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"When a dispute has been properly settled in accordance with the rule, and a border monk subjects the noble one who settled it to a formal act using the language of a border monk, and that noble monk likewise did not seek to use the language of a border monk, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"When a dispute has been properly settled in accordance with the rule, and a border monk is subsequently subjected to a formal act by another border monk using the language of a noble one, and that border monk likewise did not seek to use the language of a noble one, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, when a monk has properly settled a dispute in accordance with the rule and is subsequently subjected to a formal act based on a charge, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, when a monk who has sought to settle a dispute in the Saṅgha in accordance with the rule is subjected to a formal act, perceiving what is settled as unsettled, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, when a monk is in the process of enacting a formal act against one who has properly settled a dispute in accordance with the rule, and in the meanwhile that monk changes his status and becomes a nun, what results?" It is a downfall.

"Venerable one, when a nun is in the process of enacting a formal act against one who is in the process of properly settling a dispute in accordance with the rule, and in the meanwhile that nun changes her status and becomes a monk, what results?" It is a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a properly settled dispute as properly settled, and the one who settled it is subsequently subjected to a formal act, what results?" It is a downfall. "If what was properly settled is perceived as not properly settled, and the one who settled it is subsequently subjected to a formal act, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If what was not properly settled is perceived as properly settled, and the one who settled it is subsequently subjected to a formal act, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If what was not properly settled is perceived as not properly settled, and the one who settled it is subsequently subjected to a formal act, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who has received full ordination as fully ordained, and that monk is subsequently subjected to a formal act for settling a dispute in accordance with the rule, what results?" It is a downfall. "If one who has received full ordination is perceived as not fully ordained, and that monk is subsequently subjected to a formal act for settling a dispute in accordance with the rule, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"If one who has not received full ordination is perceived as fully ordained, and a dispute settled in accordance with the rule is subsequently subjected to a formal act, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one who has not received full ordination is perceived as not fully ordained, and a dispute settled in accordance with the rule is subsequently subjected to a formal act, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if a monk prepares to subject to a formal act one who has not received full ordination and who has settled a dispute in accordance with the rule, and then makes that person out to be not fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one is prepared as not fully ordained but turns out to be fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one is prepared as not fully ordained and one is indeed not fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one is prepared as fully ordained and turns out to be fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one is prepared as fully ordained and one is indeed fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one who is fully ordained is prepared as such and is indeed fully ordained, what results?" It is a downfall. "If one who is fully ordained is prepared as such but turns out not to be fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk subjects to a formal act the properly settled dispute of a layperson, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if a monk subjects to a formal act the properly settled dispute of one who is any of the following: a hermaphrodite, a person of indeterminate sex, a person of dual sex, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent drew blood from a Tathāgata, one who is a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one who dwells in a forbidden place, one who is not a resident, one who was previously the cause of a dispute, or one who previously committed an offense — if the dispute of any such person has been properly settled in accordance with the rule and is then subjected to a formal act, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk subjects to a formal act a dispute that has been properly settled in accordance with the rule involving those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, those who have sided with schismatics, or those who have relinquished their training, what results?" It is a downfall.

In brief:

By message, by letter, by gesture,
by having another speak, or from one to another,
by one disturbed in mind, by the sick, by the deaf-mute, and by travelers.

"Venerable one, if a monk subjects to a formal act a monk's dispute that has been properly settled in accordance with the rule, doing so through a message, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise, by letter, by gesture, by having another speak, or by relaying from one to another — all of these are minor offenses."

"Venerable one, if a monk subjects to a formal act a dispute that has been properly settled in accordance with the rule and that involved a mad person, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise, if settled disputes involving one disturbed in mind, one afflicted by illness, one who is stupid, one who is mute, one who is deaf-mute, or one who dwells elsewhere — if any of these are subsequently subjected to a formal act, all constitute minor offenses."

"Venerable one, if a monk subjects to a formal act a dispute among nuns that has been properly settled in accordance with the rule, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If it is done by a probationer nun, a novice nun, or male novices, all constitute minor offenses. If a nun subjects another nun to a formal act of the nuns' assembly, it is a downfall. If a nun subjects to such an act male novices, probationer nuns, or novice nuns, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if one who has relinquished the training subjects to a formal act a dispute that has been properly settled in accordance with the rule, what results?" It is a downfall. "As for probationer nuns, novice nuns, and male novices, each case should be explained in full as a minor offense."

In brief:

By message, by letter, by gesture,
by having another speak, or from one to another,
by one who has become mad, by one disturbed in mind,
by the sick, the deaf-mute, the stupid,
by one asleep, by one stupefied, by one intoxicated, by one in meditative absorption, by a traveler — these are the last.

Thus did the venerable Upāli ask the Blessed One, the Buddha.

"Venerable one, the Blessed One declared that if a monk teaches Dharma to a woman without a knowledgeable man present, speaking more than five or six words, it becomes a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk teaches Dharma to a woman by message, without a knowledgeable man present, speaking more than five or six words, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise for letter, for gesture, for having another speak, and for one to another in relay."

"Venerable one, if a monk teaches Dharma to a mad woman without a knowledgeable man present, speaking more than five or six words, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise for one disturbed in mind, one afflicted by illness, a foolish woman, a mute woman, a deaf woman, one lying asleep, one stupefied, one intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, and one dwelling in a distant place — in all such cases it becomes a minor offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk teaches Dharma to a woman with a knowledgeable man who is mad present, speaking more than five or six words, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise for a man disturbed in mind, one afflicted by illness, a foolish man, a mute man, a deaf man, one lying asleep, one intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, a blind man, a border-dweller, and one dwelling in a distant place — in all such cases, with such a knowledgeable man present, teaching Dharma to a woman becomes a minor offense in every case."

In brief:

By speech, by body, by seclusion, and likewise with a eunuch or an intersex attendant, the third point and the fourth in the same way — these apply to the probationer nun and to the fully ordained nun.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk teaches Dharma to a woman in the noble language, speaking more than five or six words without a knowledgeable man present, and that woman too does not know the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If a noble monk teaches Dharma to a woman in a border language without a knowledgeable man present, speaking more than five or six words, and that woman too does not know the border language, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If a border-dweller teaches Dharma to a woman in a border language without a knowledgeable man present, speaking more than five or six words, and that woman too does not know the border language, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If a border-dweller teaches Dharma to a woman in the noble language without a knowledgeable man present, speaking more than five or six words, and that woman too does not know the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk, together with an attendant who is a border-dweller, teaches Dharma to a woman in the noble language, speaking more than five or six words, and that attendant too does not know the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise, if a noble monk teaches Dharma in the noble language with a border-dwelling attendant present, it becomes a minor offense. If a border-dweller teaches Dharma in a border language together with a noble attendant, it becomes a minor offense. If a border-dweller teaches Dharma to a woman in the noble language with a border-dwelling attendant present, speaking more than five or six words, and that attendant too does not know the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk teaches Dharma to a woman, speaking more than five or six words, with only a bodily gesture as the means of indication, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as secluded, teaches Dharma to a woman, speaking more than five or six words, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if a monk teaches Dharma to a woman together with an attendant who is an intersex person, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise, if he teaches Dharma to a woman together with a eunuch attendant or a two-gendered attendant, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if a monk teaches Dharma to an intersex person without a knowledgeable man present, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk is teaching Dharma to a woman, speaking more than five or six words, and his sex changes so that he becomes a nun, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if a nun is teaching Dharma to a man, speaking more than five or six words, and her sex changes so that she becomes a monk, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a woman as a woman and teaches her Dharma speaking more than five or six words, what results?" It is a transgression (āpatti). "If he perceives a woman as not a woman, there is no offense." "If he perceives a non-woman as a woman, it is a minor offense." "If he perceives a non-woman as a non-woman and teaches Dharma speaking more than five or six words, there is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human woman as a human woman and teaches her Dharma speaking more than five or six words, what results?" It is a transgression. "If he perceives a human as a non-human, it is a minor offense." "If he perceives a non-human as a human, it is a minor offense." "If he perceives a non-human as a non-human, it is a minor offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives the attendant man as a man and teaches Dharma to the woman, what results?" There is no offense. "If he perceives the man as not a man and teaches Dharma, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If he perceives a non-man as a man and teaches Dharma, what results?" There is no offense. "If he perceives a non-man as a non-man and teaches Dharma, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if one who has been given a training rule teaches Dharma to a woman speaking more than five or six words, what results?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a nun teaches Dharma to a man speaking more than five or six words, what results?" It is a transgression. For female probationers (śikṣamāṇā), novice nuns, and novice monks, the offense is to be explained as a minor offense in each case.

In summary, as verse:

One who has gone mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, one who is deaf and mute, and one journeying away — likewise a layman in the matter of words, and the same applies to a nun.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk reads Dharma in unison, word for word, with a person not fully ordained, it becomes a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk reads Dharma in unison, word for word, with a mad person, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise, with one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is simple-minded, one who is mute, one who is deaf, and in the same way with one residing elsewhere" — reading Dharma in unison with all of these is a minor offense in each case.

"Venerable one, if a monk reads Dharma in unison, word for word, with a layman, what results?" It is a transgression. "If he reads Dharma in unison with an intersex person or a eunuch, what results?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk reads Dharma in unison, word for word, with a nun who has been expelled, or with one who has killed her father or mother, or has killed an arhat, or with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, or with a tīrthika or with one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, or with one suspended from the community or formally separated, or with one who has previously committed offenses, or with those who had previously caused a dispute — what results?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk reads Dharma in unison, word for word, with one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or with one who has sided with such a person, or with one who has been given a training rule, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"If a noble one reads Dharma in the noble language in unison with a monk, and that monk has not mastered the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If a noble one reads Dharma in a border language in unison with a monk, and that monk has not mastered the border language, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If a border person reads Dharma in a border language in unison with a monk, and —" that monk too has not mastered the border language, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If a border person reads Dharma in the noble language in unison with a monk, and that monk too has not mastered the noble language, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk reads Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination, and during that recitation that person's name changes and they become a nun, what results?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a nun reads Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination, and during that recitation that person's name changes and they become a monk, what results?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk or a nun reads Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination, and that unordained person also changes their name during the recitation, what results?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives an unordained person as unordained and reads Dharma in unison with them, what results?" It is a transgression. "If one perceives an unordained person as fully ordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one perceives a fully ordained person as unordained, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained and reads with them, what results?" There is no offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human as a human and reads with them, what results?" It is a transgression. "If one perceives a human as a non-human and reads with them, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one perceives a non-human as a human, what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one perceives a non-human as a non-human, what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if one reads Dharma in unison with a nun, what results?" It is a minor offense. If one reads Dharma in unison with a female trainee or a female novice, in every case it is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a nun reads Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination, what results?" It is a transgression. If a nun and a monk read Dharma in unison, it is a minor offense. If she reads in unison with a female trainee, a female novice, male novices, a female trainee, or female novices, it is a transgression. If she reads with a female trainee, a female novice, or male novices, it is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if one who has been given a training rule reads Dharma in unison with a person who has not received full ordination, what results?" It is a transgression.

The sacred Vinaya text, the sixth fascicle. In brief:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
by having another say it, by relay from one to the next —
one who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is deaf or dull-witted, one who is asleep,
one who is in a swoon, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered absorption, one who is traveling — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a monk who, apart from one who has been granted a vow by the Saṅgha, communicates a serious transgression to a person who has not received full ordination incurs a transgression. If a monk communicates a serious transgression to an unordained person by means of a messenger, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise, if it is communicated by letter, by gesture, by having another convey it, or by relay from one to the next — in every case it is a minor offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk communicates a serious transgression to a madperson, what results?" It is a minor offense. "Likewise, if it is communicated to one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is deaf, one who is in a swoon, one who is asleep, one who is in a stupor, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered absorption, or one who resides in another abode — in every case it is a minor offense."

In brief:

By word, by body, and by solitude, in just that way;
the fourth — the name — likewise;
the appointed one and the seventh — oneself;
laypeople and nuns.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha:

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained monk speaks of a transgression involving a defeat to a borderer in the noble language, and that borderer does not understand the noble language — what results?" It is a minor offense. "If a noble one speaks to a noble one in the language of the borderer, and that noble one does not understand the language of the borderers — what results?" It is a minor offense. "If a borderer speaks to a noble one in the language of the borderers, and that noble one does not understand the language of the borderers — what results?" It is a minor offense. "If a borderer speaks to a borderer in the noble language, and that borderer does not understand the noble language — what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk communicates a transgression involving a defeat through a bodily gesture — what results?" It is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if one who is in solitude is perceived as not being in solitude, and a transgression involving a defeat is communicated — what results?" It is a minor offense. "Venerable one, if a monk speaks of a transgression involving a defeat to one who is not fully ordained, perceiving that person as not fully ordained — what results?" It is a downfall. "If one speaks perceiving one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained — what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one speaks perceiving one who is fully ordained as fully ordained — there is no offense." "If one speaks perceiving one who is fully ordained as not fully ordained — what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk speaks of a transgression involving a defeat to a human being, perceiving that person as a human being — what results?" It will be a downfall. "If one speaks perceiving a human being as not a human being — what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one speaks perceiving a non-human being as a human being — what results?" It is a minor offense. "If one speaks perceiving a non-human being as a non-human being — what results?" It is a minor offense.

"Venerable one, if a monk is in the midst of communicating a transgression involving a defeat to one who is not fully ordained, and in the interval that person becomes a fully ordained nun — what results?" It will be a downfall. "Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun is in the midst of communicating a transgression involving a defeat to a person who is not fully ordained, and in the interval that person becomes a fully ordained monk — what results?" It will be a downfall.

"Venerable one, since the Blessed One has declared that if a monk speaks of a transgression involving a defeat to one who is not fully ordained, except when authorized by the Saṅgha, it becomes a downfall — venerable one, is it possible that a monk not appointed by the Saṅgha might speak of a transgression involving a defeat to one who is not fully ordained without incurring an offense?" Upāli replied: "Yes, there is such a case. There are four such persons. They are as follows.

"There is a person with respect to whom giving that reaches the end of transgression and also reaches the end of what is fitting is appropriate. There is a person with respect to whom giving that reaches the end of transgression but does not reach the end of what is fitting is appropriate. There is a person with respect to whom giving that reaches the end of what is fitting but does not reach the end of transgression is appropriate. And there is a person with respect to whom giving that reaches neither the end of transgression nor the end of what is fitting is appropriate.

"What is the giving that reaches the end of transgression and reaches the end of what is fitting? It is the case of one who, by means of a minor offense, has defiled many of the family line. What is the giving that reaches the end of transgression but does not reach the end of what is fitting? It is the case of one who, by means of a minor offense, has defiled the family line in numerous ways. What is the giving that reaches the end of what is fitting but does not reach the end of transgression? It is the case of one who, by means of a grave offense, has defiled only a few of the family line. And what is the giving that reaches neither the end of transgression nor the end of what is fitting? It is the case of one who, by means of a grave offense, has defiled many of the family line.

"With regard to a person for whom giving that reaches the end of transgression and the end of what is fitting is appropriate, one should inform that person individually of each transgression as many as there are and of each line of the family as many as there are. To inform beyond that will be a downfall. With regard to a person for whom giving reaches the end of transgression but does not reach the end of what is fitting, one should inform that person of the transgressions as many as there are, and one should inform that person individually of each line of the family as many as there are. To inform beyond that will be a downfall. With regard to a person for whom giving reaches the end of what is fitting in the family line but does not reach the end of transgression, one should not inform that person of all the transgressions one by one according to each line of the family as many as there are. To inform beyond that will be a downfall. With regard to a person for whom giving reaches neither the end of transgression nor the end of what is fitting in the family line, one should inform that person of all the transgressions and of each line of the family as many as there are individually, and in so doing there is no downfall.

Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination prepares to speak of a matter involving a base offense to a person who has not received full ordination, and it is accomplished without full ordination, what results? A wrongdoing. If one prepares to speak to one who has not received full ordination and it is accomplished just as full ordination is being conferred, what results? A wrongdoing. If one prepares to speak to one who has not received full ordination and it is accomplished after full ordination has been received, what results? A wrongdoing. If one prepares to speak just as full ordination is being conferred and it is accomplished just as full ordination is being conferred, what results? A wrongdoing. If one prepares to speak just as full ordination is being conferred and it is accomplished after full ordination has been received, what results? A wrongdoing. If one prepares to speak after full ordination has been received and it is accomplished after full ordination has been received, what results? A downfall. If one prepares to speak after full ordination has been received and it is accomplished before full ordination is complete, what results? A wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk speaks of his own matter involving a base offense to one who has not received full ordination, what results? A wrongdoing. If a monk speaks of a monk's matter involving a base offense to a nun, what results? A wrongdoing. Likewise, if one speaks to a paṇḍaka, a female paṇḍaka, or a hermaphrodite, all of these are wrongdoings. If a monk speaks of a monk's matter involving a base offense to a nun who has been expelled, what results? A downfall. Likewise, if one speaks to one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has shed blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhist adherents, one who is abiding as a thief, one who has no standing in the community, one who is abiding separately, one who has previously caused a schism, or one who has previously committed an offense, all of these are downfalls. If a monk speaks of a monk's matter involving a base offense to a monk or nun who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, who has sided with the schism, or who has relinquished the training, all of these are wrongdoings. If one speaks to a probationer nun, a novice nun, or a male novice, all of these are downfalls.

If a fully ordained nun speaks of a nun's matter involving a base offense to one who has not received full ordination, what results? A downfall. If a monk speaks of it to a fully ordained nun, what results? A wrongdoing. If one speaks to a probationer nun, a novice nun, or a male novice, all of these are downfalls.

Venerable one, if one who has given the training speaks of a matter involving a base offense to one who has not received full ordination, what results? A downfall. Likewise, with regard to a probationer nun, a novice nun, and male novices, all should be stated extensively as wrongdoings.

If one states rightly the Dharma of one who has become a teacher surpassing human beings, excepting only the declaration "The Buddha is the Teacher," this is to be distinguished progressively from the statement of a root defeat.

In summary:

By message, letter, gesture, and through another, or from one to the next,
one who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one who is ill, one who is possessed, one who is confused, one who is asleep, one who is rambling, one who is intoxicated, one who is entering absorption, one who is in the final destiny —

This was asked of the Blessed One, the Buddha, by the venerable Upāli.

The Blessed One declared: if a monk who had previously given his consent later says, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," that constitutes a transgression.

The venerable Upāli asked: if a monk conveys by messenger the words "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if done by letter, by gesture, through another's words, or passed along from one to the next — all of these are wrongdoings.

If a monk says to one who is mad, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if said to one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is bewildered, one who is possessed, one who is dull, one who is asleep, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered absorption, or one who abides in another destiny — if to any of these one says, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," all of these are wrongdoings.

In summary:

By voice and body, by solitude, by mark and the fourth and the seventh,
a householder who is unfit, one of minor status, and a nun — these are the last as regards gain.

If a noble monk speaks to another monk in the noble language, saying, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," and that monk does not understand the noble language, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If a noble monk speaks to another monk in a border language, saying the same, and that monk does not understand the border language, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If one who speaks a border language speaks to another monk in a border language, and that noble monk does not understand the border language, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If one who speaks a border language speaks to another monk in the noble language, saying the same, and that monk does not understand the noble language, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing.

If a monk makes the words "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person" understood through a bodily indication, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If a monk, perceiving what is not secluded as secluded, says, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing.

If a monk says, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," and in the course of his speaking his status changes and he becomes a nun, what is the outcome? It is a transgression. If a nun says the same, and in the course of her speaking her status changes and she becomes a monk, what is the outcome? It is a transgression.

If a monk, perceiving a fully ordained person as fully ordained, says, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," what is the outcome? It is a transgression. If he perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained and says the same, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If he perceives a person who is not fully ordained as fully ordained and says the same, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If he perceives a person who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained and says the same, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing.

If a person who is not fully ordained perceives another who is not fully ordained as such, and says, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If a person who is not fully ordained perceives a fully ordained person as such and says the same, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If a person who is not fully ordained perceives a fully ordained person as such and then says the same after full ordination, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If one who perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained says the same while not yet fully ordained, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If one who perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained says the same after becoming fully ordained, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing. If a fully ordained person perceives a fully ordained person as such and says those words, what is the outcome? It is a transgression. If a fully ordained person perceives a fully ordained person as such but the words are spoken by one not fully ordained, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing.

If a monk says to a layperson, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing.

Likewise, if such words are said with regard to a woman, a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, one who has killed a father, one who has killed a mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism among nuns, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to non-Buddhist adherents, one who remains in a state of theft, one who does not remain in good standing, one who resides separately, one who has previously committed an offense, or one who has previously caused a dispute — in all such cases, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing.

If a monk says to those who are drawing near to the training and to those who have been given the precepts, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," what is the outcome? It is a transgression.

Is there any case in which a monk may say, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," and yet it does not become a transgression? Upāli, there is. In any case in which the material for a robe is suitable but the distribution is not suitable, or the distribution is suitable but the material is not suitable, or both are not suitable — and unsuitability means cloth made from the wool of a female sheep, wool of a cow, wool of a goat, wool of a deer, mixed wool, unspun fiber, or similar materials not fit to be robe material — if those words are spoken on account of such goods, it becomes a wrongdoing.

If the Saṅgha obtains a robe of unmeasured length that has not yet been requested, and then a monk, having first obtained consent, subsequently says, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing.

If a monk speaks those words with regard to gains other than gains of robes, what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing.

If the Saṅgha has given a robe to a certain monk without his being present, and he subsequently comes forward and says, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," what is the outcome? It is a wrongdoing.

If one who has been given the precepts speaks those words, what is the outcome? It is a transgression. If a nun speaks those words, it is likewise a transgression. If a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice says, "Venerable one, the Saṅgha's gain has been dedicated to such and such a dear person," it becomes a wrongdoing.

In brief:

By messenger, letter, or sign,
through another's voice, or one by one,
one who has gone mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one who is ill or incapacitated, one who is dull-witted, one who is asleep, one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption — these are the exceptions at the end.

Thus did the venerable Upāli present his questions to the Buddha, the Blessed One.

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that to mock a training rule is a downfall. If a monk mocks a training rule through a messenger, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. Likewise, through a letter, through a sign, through another's voice, or through transmission from one to another — all of these become wrongdoings.

"Venerable one, if a monk mocks a training rule in the presence of one who is mad, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. Likewise, in the presence of one whose mind is disturbed, one who is tormented by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is deaf, one who is mute, one who is asleep, one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one who is dwelling elsewhere — if one mocks a training rule in the presence of any of these, it becomes a wrongdoing in every case.

In brief:

By voice, by body, in private,
likewise by sign, and the fourth case, before a layperson and so forth, before an emanation, before a training rule, and before a nun.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk (ārya) mocks a training rule before another monk in the noble language, and that monk does not understand the noble language, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. If a noble monk mocks a training rule before a monk in a border language, and that monk does not understand the border language, what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing. If a border-region person mocks a training rule before a monk in a border language, and that monk does not understand the border language, what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing. If a border-region person mocks a training rule before a monk in the noble language, and that monk does not understand the noble language, what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk mocks a training rule by means of a bodily gesture, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk mocks a training rule by perceiving what is private as not private, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk, while mocking a training rule, changes his status and becomes a nun, what does that become?" It becomes a downfall. "Venerable one, if a nun, while mocking a training rule, changes her status and becomes a monk, what does that become?" It becomes a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained and mocks a training rule in that person's presence, what does that become?" It becomes a downfall. If he perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained and mocks a training rule in that person's presence, what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing. If he perceives a not-fully-ordained person as fully ordained and mocks a training rule in that person's presence, what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing. If he perceives a not-fully-ordained person as not fully ordained and mocks a training rule in that person's presence, what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk mocks a training rule in the presence of a layperson, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. In the presence of a pandaka, a person of indeterminate sex, a suspended nun, one who has killed his father or mother or an arhat, one who has shed the Tathāgata's blood with malicious intent, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who has gone over to non-Buddhist adherents, a thief in hiding, one who is not dwelling in the community, one who is dwelling separately, one against whom a prior offence has arisen, or one with whom there was prior conflict — if one mocks a training rule in the presence of any of these, it becomes a wrongdoing in every case.

"Venerable one, if a monk mocks a training rule in the presence of one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has sided with such a person, or one who has had training rules promulgated against him, what does that become?" All of these become wrongdoings.

"Venerable one, if a monk mocks a training rule in the presence of an emanation, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk mocks a training rule in the presence of a nun, a female trainee, a female novice, or a male novice, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. If a nun mocks a training rule in the presence of another nun, what does that become? It becomes a downfall. If a nun mocks a training rule in the presence of a monk, a female trainee, a female novice, or a male novice, what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a female trainee mocks a training rule, what does that become?" It becomes a downfall. "In the presence of a male novice, a female novice, and a novice nun" — these become wrongdoings.

In brief:

An emanation body, stone dust, roots, flowers, fish scales, dwellings, mushrooms, old things, flowers, fruits, bark, signs, the fourth, the seventh, and lastly, the fruit.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, you have taught that if one causes the destruction of a village of seeds or a village of living creatures, it is a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk fells a tree by means of supernormal power, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk fells a tree through bodily intention alone, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk chips away stone, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk pulls out a seed-substance that has not yet taken root, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk washes something mossy or something with mold on it, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk pulls fish scales from the mud and tosses them onto dry ground, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk destroys the dwelling of a living creature, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If he burns it or renders it unfit, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk tears open, removes, or destroys a bird's nest, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk breaks off a mushroom or pulls up a mushroom, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk peels the bark from an old tree, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk plucks flowers, fruits, or old leaves, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk is cutting down a tree and it changes sex in the process and becomes a nun, what does that become?" It becomes a downfall. "Venerable one, if a nun is cutting down a tree and it changes sex in the process and becomes a monk, what does that become?" It becomes a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a seed as a seed and makes it unfit by destroying it, what does that become?" It becomes a downfall. "If one perceives a seed as not a seed and makes it unfit, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If one perceives what is not a seed as a seed, it becomes a wrongdoing. If one perceives what is not a seed as not a seed and destroys it, there is no transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who is not yet fully ordained prepares something intending to cut it, and cuts it while not yet fully ordained, what does that become?" There is no transgression. "If one who is not yet fully ordained prepares it, and cuts it just as full ordination occurs, what does that become?" There is no transgression. "If one who is not yet fully ordained prepares it, and cuts it after becoming fully ordained, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If the preparation was done just at the time of full ordination, and the cutting is done just at the time of full ordination, what does that become?" There is no transgression. "If the preparation is done just at full ordination and the cutting is done after full ordination, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing. "If the preparation is done after full ordination and the cutting is done after full ordination, what does that become?" It becomes a downfall. "If the preparation is done at the time of full ordination and the cutting is done before full ordination, what does that become?" It becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, is it possible for a monk to eat fruit that has not been made allowable and yet incur no transgression?" Upāli, yes — it is possible: if one thinks that an unripened seed is not a seed-substance and eats it.

"Venerable one, is it possible for a monk to make the five kinds of seeds allowable by fire and yet still incur a downfall?" Upāli, yes — it is possible: if one has made the five kinds of seeds allowable, but then places them in soil, or places them in a vessel, or lays them on a germinating board, and they sprout. If one then eats them, what does that become? It becomes a cause of downfall.

In brief:

A message, a letter, a hand-sign,

Relayed by another, passed from one to the next —

the mad, the mentally disturbed, the sick,

the mute, those who are absent, and laypeople and the like:

those who have given up the training, and nuns.

Venerable one, if a monk orders a tree to be felled by means of a message, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Likewise, ordering it by a letter, a hand-sign, relay through another, or passing word from one to the next — all of these become offenses. Venerable one, if a monk orders a madman to fell a tree, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Likewise, causing one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is foolish, one who is mute, one who is deaf-mute, one who is absent, or one staying elsewhere to cut a tree — all of these become offenses. Venerable one, if a monk directly orders a layperson to fell a tree, what does that become? It becomes a downfall. Likewise, causing a woman of ambiguous gender, a hermaphrodite, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, a thief, one who does not belong to the community, one who belongs to a different community, one against whom an offense has previously arisen, one who was previously in dispute, one who has taken sides, or one who has given up the training — if any of these, directly and in person, is caused to fell a tree, all become offenses.

Venerable one, if one who has given up the training causes a green shoot to be destroyed or orders it to be destroyed, what does that become? It becomes a downfall. Venerable one, if a nun destroys a green shoot or orders it to be destroyed, what does that become? It becomes a downfall. Venerable one, if a nun causes a green shoot to be destroyed or orders it to be destroyed, what does that become? It becomes an offense. For novice monks and novice nuns there is no offense.

In brief:

By voice, by body, by private communication, by sign, the fourth, and the seventh,
laypeople and the like — those who are appointed and those who are not.

Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if one confesses an offense and imposes a penalty, one thereby incurs a downfall. Then is it possible for a monk to confess an offense and impose a penalty and yet not incur a downfall? Upāli, yes — it is possible: if one has gone forth from and received full ordination among non-humans and one confesses an offense, it becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a noble monk confesses an offense to a monk in the noble language and imposes a penalty, and that monk does not know the noble language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a noble monk confesses an offense to a monk in a border-region language and imposes a penalty, and that monk does not know the border-region language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a border-region monk confesses an offense to a monk in a border-region language and imposes a penalty, and that monk does not know the border-region language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a border-region monk confesses an offense to a monk in the noble language and imposes a penalty, and that monk does not know the noble language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk confesses an offense and imposes a penalty by means of a bodily gesture, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk perceives a non-secluded place as secluded and then confesses an offense and imposes a penalty, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk is in the midst of confessing an offense and imposing a penalty, and in the interim his status changes and he becomes a nun, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a nun is in the midst of confessing an offense and imposing a penalty, and in the interim her status changes and she becomes a monk, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who has received full ordination as fully ordained, and confesses an offense and imposes a penalty in that person's presence, what does that become? It becomes a transgression. If he perceives one who has received full ordination as not fully ordained, it becomes an offense. If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as fully ordained, it becomes an offense. If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as not fully ordained, it becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination is counted by the Saṅgha as one before whom an offense may be confessed and a penalty imposed, and then an offense is confessed and a penalty imposed before that unordained person, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one counted as not fully ordained is treated as fully ordained when the offense is confessed and the penalty imposed, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one counted as not fully ordained is actually fully ordained when the offense is confessed and the penalty imposed, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one counted as almost fully ordained is treated as almost fully ordained when the offense is confessed and the penalty imposed, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one counted as almost fully ordained is actually fully ordained when the offense is confessed and the penalty imposed, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one who is fully ordained is counted as such, and is actually fully ordained when the offense is confessed and the penalty imposed, what does that become? It becomes a transgression. If one counted as fully ordained is not yet fully ordained when the offense is confessed and the penalty imposed, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk confesses an offense and imposes a penalty before a layperson, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk confesses an offense and imposes a penalty before one who has committed any of the following: a monk who has caused a nun to disrobe, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one who is living as a thief, one who is not in good standing, one who is in a separate standing, one before whom an offense has already occurred, or one before whom there has already been conflict — in all such cases it becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk confesses an offense and imposes a penalty before one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has sided with such a schismatic, or one who has been given a formal training measure — in all such cases it becomes a transgression.

Venerable one, whether a monk has been appointed or not, if apart from one who is attending to the Saṅgha's affairs he confesses an offense and imposes a penalty before someone other than such a person, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

In brief:

Through messenger, written message, gesture, through the word of another, or passed from one to the next,
before the mad, the mentally disturbed, the ailing, the mute, the deaf, the sleeping, the intoxicated from alcohol, the drunk, or those in meditative absorption — these are the last cases.

Venerable one, if a monk confesses an offense and imposes a penalty through a messenger, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Likewise, through a written message, through a gesture, through the word of another, or passed from one to the next — all of these become offenses.

Venerable one, if a monk confesses an offense and imposes a penalty before a mad person, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Likewise, before one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is dumb, one who is asleep, one who is intoxicated from fermented drink, one who is drunk, one who is in meditative absorption, or one who has gone to dwell elsewhere — confessing an offense before any such person becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk confesses an offense and imposes a penalty before a nun, a female probationer (śikṣamāṇā), a female novice, or male novices, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a nun confesses an offense and imposes a penalty before a monk, a male novice, a female novice, or a female probationer, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if one who has been given a formal training measure confesses an offense and imposes a penalty, what does that become? It becomes a transgression. If the offense is confessed and the penalty imposed before a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

In brief:

Offenses arise likewise in all these ways — through body, speech, and silence's mark, with laypeople and the rest among them, the fourth being last in the sequence.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that failing to act in accordance with an instruction is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk fails to act in accordance with instructions other than those concerning a monk's own offense, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk fails to act in accordance with an instruction given through a physical indication, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a noble monk gives an instruction in the noble language and the monk receiving it fails to carry it out, and that monk has not sought to learn the noble language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a noble monk gives an instruction in the border language, the monk fails to carry it out, and that monk has not sought to learn the border language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a border monk gives an instruction to a monk in the border language, the monk fails to carry it out, and that monk has not sought to learn the border language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a border monk gives an instruction to a monk in the noble language, the monk fails to carry it out, and that monk has not sought to learn the noble language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk fails to act in accordance with an instruction given through a monk's silence, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk fails to act in accordance with a monk's instruction, and then that monk's status changes and he becomes a nun, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a nun fails to act in accordance with a nun's instruction, and then that nun's status changes and she becomes a monk, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk fails to act in accordance with an instruction given by a layman, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Similarly, if a monk fails to act in accordance with instructions given by a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father or mother or an arhat, one who with malicious intent has shed the blood of a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, a thief in hiding, one dwelling separately, one who is not a resident, one who has previously caused a schism, or one who has previously committed an offense — in all such cases it becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk fails to act in accordance with instructions given by one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides in a schism, or one who has been given a formal training measure, what does that become? In all cases it becomes a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who has received full ordination as having received full ordination and then fails to act in accordance with that person's instruction, what does that become? It becomes a transgression. If a monk perceives one who has received full ordination as not having received full ordination and fails to act in accordance with that person's instruction, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a monk perceives one who has not received full ordination as having received full ordination and fails to act in accordance with that person's instruction, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a monk perceives one who has not received full ordination as not having received full ordination and fails to act in accordance with that person's instruction, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

In brief:

Through messenger, written letter, gesture, through a third party, and from one to another — through one gone mad, through disturbed mind, through illness, through being mute, deaf, or dull.

Venerable one, if a monk fails to act in accordance with an instruction conveyed by a messenger, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Similarly, if a monk fails to act in accordance with instructions conveyed by written letter, by gesture, through a third party, or passed along from one to another, in all such cases it becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk fails to act in accordance with an instruction given by a mad monk, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Similarly, if a monk fails to act in accordance with instructions given by one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is deaf, or one dwelling in another place — in all such cases it becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk fails to act in accordance with instructions given by a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if one who has been given a formal training measure fails to act in accordance with an instruction, what does that become?

It becomes a transgression. Venerable one, if one fails to act in accordance with instructions given by female trainees, female novices, or male novices, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

In brief:

The unsuitable, the person, the excess beyond the permitted, the seventh,

The sign, the fourth likewise,

Body, speech, and seclusion the same —

Laypeople and others are the last of the interruptions.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable Blessed One, you have said that if a monk lays down a Saṅgha bed or sets one down, or is in the act of setting one down, and then departs without entrusting it to another monk, a transgression arises. Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk who has laid down a Saṅgha bed and departs without entrusting it to another does not incur a transgression?

Upāli, there are. It depends on whether the bed is fit in material but unfit in construction, fit in construction but unfit in material, or unfit in both respects. As for being unfit in material: if a bed has been laid down or set down that is made with a mixture of she-ass wool, ox wool, goat wool, or deer-hair wool, or that has not been woven — if one departs from such a bed without entrusting it, it becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk has laid down or set down a personal bed and departs without entrusting it to another, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk who has spread out a Saṅgha chair or stool and departs without entrusting it to another does not incur a transgression? Upāli, there are. If the leg-height exceeds eight finger-widths of the Sugata, it becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination lays down a bed, and then one who has not received full ordination goes beyond the boundary of the vicinity, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one who has not received full ordination lays it down, and then one who is about to receive full ordination goes beyond the boundary of the vicinity, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one who has not received full ordination lays it down, and then one who is in the act of receiving full ordination goes beyond the boundary of the vicinity, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one who is about to receive full ordination lays it down, and then one who is about to receive full ordination goes beyond the boundary of the vicinity, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one who is about to receive full ordination lays it down, and then one who has fully received ordination goes beyond the boundary of the vicinity, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If one who is in the act of receiving full ordination lays it down, and then one who has fully received ordination goes beyond the boundary of the vicinity, what does that become? It becomes a transgression. If one who is in the act of receiving full ordination lays it down, and then one who has not received full ordination goes beyond the boundary of the vicinity, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk has laid down a Saṅgha bed and, without entrusting it and without any other monk being present, departs elsewhere — and during that journey his sex changes and he becomes a nun — what does that become? It becomes a transgression.

Venerable one, if a nun has laid down a Saṅgha bed and, without entrusting it and without any other nun being present, departs elsewhere — and during that journey her sex changes and she becomes a monk — what does that become? It becomes a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk has laid down a Saṅgha bed and, without entrusting it and without any other monk being present, perceives himself to be on the far side of the boundary when in fact he is on the far side of the boundary and departs, what does that become? It becomes a transgression. If he is on the far side of the boundary but perceives himself to be on the near side, there is no offense. If he is on the near side of the boundary but perceives himself to be on the far side, it becomes an offense. If he is on the near side of the boundary and perceives himself to be on the near side, there is no offense.

Venerable one, if a noble monk entrusts a Saṅgha bed to another monk using the noble language and then departs, but that other monk does not seek the noble language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a noble monk entrusts a Saṅgha bed to another monk using a regional language and then departs — and that monk also does not seek the regional language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a monk of the border regions entrusts a Saṅgha bed to another monk using the regional language and then departs, and that monk also does not seek the regional language, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If a monk of the border regions entrusts a Saṅgha bed to another monk using the noble language and then departs, and that monk also does not seek the noble language, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk sets out a Saṅgha bed and entrusts it to a present monk by a physical sign and then departs elsewhere, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk sets out a Saṅgha bed and, perceiving a secluded place to be non-secluded, entrusts it and then departs elsewhere, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk sets out a Saṅgha bed and, without entrusting it to a present monk, entrusts it to a layman and then departs elsewhere, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Likewise, if it is entrusted to a female novice; to one who has expelled a nun; to a parricide or matricide; to one who has slain an arhat; to one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata; to a tīrthika or one who has gone over to the tīrthikas; to one who dwells as a thief; to one who does not reside in the community; to one who resides separately; to one who has previously committed an offense; or to one who has previously caused a dispute — if it is entrusted to any of these and one then departs elsewhere, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a monk sets out a Saṅgha bed and entrusts it to one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, to one who has sided with such a schismatic, or to one who has been given a training rule — and then departs elsewhere, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, are there circumstances in which a monk who has set out a Saṅgha bed may pass beyond the boundary without entrusting it, even though a monk is present, without incurring an offense? Upāli, yes there are. This is the case when that monk departs without abandoning the bed and one of the eight kinds of obstruction arises at that assembly hall.

In brief:

One who is mad, mentally disturbed, or ill,
one who is deaf, simple-minded, or asleep,

one who is stammering, or intoxicated,
and one departing into meditative absorption — these are the last.

Venerable one, if a monk sets out a Saṅgha bed without entrusting it to a mad monk and then departs elsewhere, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Likewise, if it is entrusted — without proper entrustment — to one who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, simple-minded, mute, deaf, asleep, stammering, intoxicated, or abiding elsewhere in another capacity, and one then departs, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a monk entrusts a Saṅgha bed to a nun and then departs elsewhere, what does that become? It becomes an offense. If it is entrusted to a female trainee, a female novice, or a male novice and one then departs, what does that become? It becomes an offense. Venerable one, if a nun entrusts a bed to a female trainee, a female novice, or a male novice and then departs elsewhere, what does that become? It becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if one who has been given a training rule departs elsewhere without entrusting a Saṅgha bed even though a monk is present, what does that become? It is a downfall. With respect to a female trainee, a female novice, and a male novice, it becomes an offense.

What has been said here concerning the bed applies in full equally to the sitting mat. However, mats that are smaller or larger than eight finger-breadths of the Sugata are excepted, as they are not suitable.

In brief:

Sending a message, a letter, a hand-sign, speaking through another, or from one to another;
one who is mad, mentally disturbed, or ill,
one who is deaf, simple-minded, or asleep,
one who is stammering, or intoxicated,
and one departing into meditative absorption — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that whichever monk expels or causes to be expelled another monk from a Saṅgha assembly hall while that monk is seeking it — that monk incurs a downfall. Now —

Venerable one, if a monk expels or causes to be expelled another monk from a Saṅgha assembly hall by means of a message, what does that incur? It is a downfall. Likewise, by a letter, a hand-sign, speaking through another, or passing word from one to another — all of these incur a downfall.

Venerable one, if a monk expels or causes to be expelled a mad monk, what does that incur? It is a downfall. Likewise, if he expels or causes to be expelled one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is simple-minded, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is stammering, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one who has departed and is residing elsewhere — all of these incur a downfall.

The Noble Vinaya, the seventh fascicle. In brief:

The fourth with characteristics, the seventh, and likewise laymen and the rest —
these are the last of the Saṅgha.

Venerable one, if a monk expels or causes to be expelled a monk from a Saṅgha assembly hall and, during the act, that monk's status has shifted and he has become a nun, what does that incur? It is a downfall. Venerable one, if a nun expels or causes to be expelled a nun from a Saṅgha assembly hall and, during the act, her status has shifted and she has become a monk, what does that incur? It is a downfall.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who is fully ordained as fully ordained and expels or causes to be expelled that person, what does that incur? It is a transgression. If he perceives one who is fully ordained as not fully ordained, it incurs a downfall. If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, it incurs a downfall. If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained, it incurs a downfall.

Venerable one, if a monk prepares to expel someone during the ceremony of full ordination and the act is completed while the ceremony is still in progress, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If he prepared the expulsion before full ordination and carries it out just as full ordination is being completed, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If he prepared the expulsion before full ordination and carries it out after full ordination is complete, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If he prepared the expulsion just as full ordination was being completed and carries it out just as full ordination is being completed, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If he prepared the expulsion just as full ordination was being completed and carries it out after full ordination is complete, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If he prepared the expulsion after full ordination was complete and carries it out while the ordination is still in progress, what does that incur? It is a transgression. If he prepared the expulsion after full ordination was complete and carries it out before full ordination is complete, what does that incur? It is a downfall.

Venerable one, if a monk expels or causes to be expelled a layman, what does that incur? It is a downfall.

Venerable one, if a monk expels or causes to be expelled a hermaphrodite, an androgyne, one who has expelled a nun, one who has killed his father or mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to non-Buddhist adherents, one who is a spy, one who has previously committed an offense, or one who has previously caused a schism — all of these incur a downfall.

Venerable one, if a monk expels or causes to be expelled one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides in a schism, or one who has been given a training rule — what does that incur? All of these incur a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk directly and openly causes a layman to be expelled, what does that incur? It is a transgression. Likewise, directly and openly causing to be expelled a hermaphrodite, an androgyne, one who has expelled a nun, one who has killed his father or mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to non-Buddhist adherents, a spy, one who is residing separately, one who is not residing there, one who has previously caused a schism, one who has previously committed an offense, one who has taken sides in a schism, one who has been given a training rule, a nun, a female trainee novice, a female novice, or a male novice whom one has expelled — all of these incur a transgression.

Venerable one, if a nun expels or causes to be expelled another nun, what does that incur? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a nun expels or causes to be expelled a female trainee novice, a female novice, or male novices, what does that incur? It is a transgression.

Venerable one, if one who has been given a training rule expels or causes to be expelled a nun, what does that incur? It is a downfall. With respect to a female trainee novice, a female novice, or male novices, it is a transgression.

In summary:

One who is mad, mentally disturbed,
one who is deaf, dull-witted, or asleep,
one who is delirious, intoxicated, and one who has entered meditative absorption — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk, approaching a monk who was there first and then coming afterward, causes him great harm by lying down or sleeping there — that is a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk causes great harm to a mad monk by lying down or sleeping there, what does that incur? It is a transgression. Likewise, if he does so toward one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one who is residing elsewhere — causing him great harm by lying down or sleeping there — what does that incur? It is a transgression.

In summary:

Whether it concerns an individual or the Saṅgha, likewise the third case and the fourth,
laypeople and the like — the improper ones come last.

Venerable one, if a monk causes great harm by lying down or sleeping before monks who were already present in a temple belonging to a private individual, what does that incur? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk causes great harm by lying down or sleeping before monks who were already present in a place other than a Saṅgha temple, what does that incur? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if while causing great harm by lying down or sleeping before monks in this way, one's sex changes and one becomes a nun, what does that incur? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving one who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, lies down or sleeps there, what does that incur? It is a transgression. If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as one who has received full ordination, it is a transgression. If he perceives one who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, it is a transgression. If he perceives one who has received full ordination as one who has received full ordination, and causes him great harm by lying down or sleeping there, what does that incur? It is a downfall.

Venerable one, if a monk causes great harm to a layman by lying down or sleeping there, what does that incur? It is a transgression. Likewise, if he does so toward a hermaphrodite, a pandaka, or those who have previously committed an offense — in all cases it is a transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk causes great harm by lying down or sleeping there in relation to one who has previously caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides in a schism, or one who has been given a training rule, what does that incur? In all cases it is a downfall.

Venerable one, is there a case where a monk causes great harm by lying down or sleeping before monks already present in a Saṅgha temple and yet does not incur a downfall? Upāli, yes there is — it is an improper sleeping place, one that monks are not permitted to use.

Venerable one, if a monk causes great harm by lying down or sleeping in relation to a nun, a female trainee novice, a female novice, or male novices, what does that incur? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if a nun causes great harm by lying down or sleeping in relation to a monk, a female trainee novice, a female novice, or male novices, what does that incur? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if one who has been given a training rule causes great harm by lying down or sleeping before monks who were already present, what does that incur? It is a downfall. With respect to a female trainee novice, a female novice, and male novices, it is a misdeed.

In brief:

Those of an individual and those of the Saṅgha,
Likewise the night and the fourth,
The unsuitable and likewise the seventh,
And the canopy of sky — these are the last.

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has also declared that if a monk, without a leg-rest, sits down or lies down heavily upon a seat or chair — whether large or small — within a multi-storied building erected over a temple of the Saṅgha, it is a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk sits down or lies down without a leg-rest upon a seat or chair — large or small — within a multi-storied building erected over a temple belonging to an individual, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk — in a place other than a temple of the Saṅgha — sits down or lies down without a leg-rest upon a seat or chair lacking a leg-rest within a multi-storied building at some other location, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk causes great harm and sits down or lies down in the uppermost room of an upper story, and in the course of doing so changes sex and becomes a nun, what does that incur? It is a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving the uppermost room of an upper story as an upper story, lowers himself heavily onto a seat or chair without a leg-rest and sits down or lies down, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If one perceives an upper story as not an upper story, there is no offence. If one perceives what is not an upper story as an upper story, it becomes a misdeed. If one perceives what is not an upper story as not being an upper story, there is no offence. Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk may lower himself heavily onto a seat or chair without a leg-rest within the uppermost room of an upper story — sitting or lying down — and yet not incur a downfall?" Upāli, there are. When the surface of the temple has been covered with flat stone slabs, or wherever there is solid ground — sitting or lying down upon it, there is no offence. "Venerable one, if one who has been given a training rule lowers himself heavily onto a seat or chair without a leg-rest within the uppermost room of an upper story and sits down or lies down, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If a nun lowers herself heavily and sits down or lies down, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If a female trainee novice, a female novice, or male novices lower themselves heavily and sit down or lie down, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. The Blessed One has also declared that pouring water containing living creatures onto grass, earth, or cattle dung is a downfall — this too should be stated in full as it has been taught."

In brief:

Messages, letters, hand signals,

Relayed by another, passed from one to the next,

By one who is mad, mentally disturbed,

By one who is mute, or by one residing elsewhere —

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk builds a great monastery, he should spread mud and plaster and build up to two or three stories; if he builds beyond that, it is a downfall. If a monk, through a messenger, builds beyond two or three stories, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Likewise, all cases conveyed through a letter, a hand signal, relaying through another, or passing the instruction from one person to the next — all are misdeeds. If a monk who is mad builds beyond two or three stories, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Likewise, one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is mute, or one who is residing in another place — if such a person is commissioned to build, what does that incur? All of these are misdeeds."

In brief:

A great building, one made of stone,
One begun by another — it is the same;
The fourth category with its mark is likewise so;
One under training, and the nun as well.

"If a monk builds something other than a great monastery — some other property of the Saṅgha — and builds it beyond two or three stories, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. If a monk builds a monastery for an individual and builds beyond the limit, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Is there a case where a monk who builds a Saṅgha monastery beyond two or three stories does not incur a downfall? Upāli, yes, there is. It is as follows: if the monastery is built of stone alone, or if the donor has said 'I have already given what is needed — do as you see fit,' then there is no offense. If a monk completes work that another had begun at two or three stories, or completes work that another had built, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. If a monk spreads mud and plaster and builds beyond two or three stories but another does not complete it, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. One who has become mentally disturbed, or one who has died — it is the same. If a monk spreads mud and plaster and builds beyond two or three stories, and then changes status and becomes a nun, and then completes it, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If a nun spreads mud and plaster and builds beyond two or three stories, and then changes status and becomes a monk, and then completes it, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If a monk spreads mud and plaster and builds beyond two or three stories — perceiving it as beyond the limit and then building it — what does that incur? It is a downfall. If one perceives something that is beyond the limit as not beyond the limit, there is no offense. If one perceives something that is not beyond the limit as beyond the limit, it is a misdeed. If one perceives something that is not beyond the limit as not beyond the limit, there is no offense. If one under training builds beyond two or three stories, what does that incur? It is a downfall. If a nun builds beyond two or three stories, what does that incur? It is a downfall. For a female trainee, a female novice, and male novices, it is a misdeed."

In brief:

Messages, letters, hand signals,
Relayed by another, passed from one to the next,
By one who is mad, mentally disturbed,
By one who is mute, dull-witted, or fallen asleep,
By one who is in agony, intoxicated,
Or in meditative absorption — the last is residing elsewhere.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has also declared that if a monk teaches a nun without being appointed by the Saṅgha, it is a downfall. If a monk, without being appointed by the Saṅgha, teaches a nun through a messenger, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Likewise, through a letter, a hand signal, — relayed by another, passed from one to the next — all of these are misdeeds.

Venerable one, if a monk, without being appointed by the Saṅgha, teaches an insane nun, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Likewise, teaching one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is deaf, one who is mute, one who is asleep, one who is in agony, one who is intoxicated, one who is in meditative absorption, or one residing elsewhere — all of these are misdeeds.

In brief:

Through word, through body, through privacy,
Through signals, the fourth and fifth,
Through a sent messenger, through one who approaches —
Appointed to teach another, appointed twice.

Venerable one, if a monk who is a noble one teaches a nun in the noble language, and that nun does not understand the noble language, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. If a noble one teaches a nun in a border language, and that nun does not understand the border language, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. If one from the borderlands teaches a nun in the noble language, and that nun does not understand the noble language, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. If one from the borderlands teaches a nun in a border language, and that nun does not understand the border language, what does that incur? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk teaches a nun through a bodily gesture, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk teaches in a secluded place while perceiving it as not secluded, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk is in the middle of teaching a nun and during that teaching her status changes and she becomes a nun of the other sex, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk is in the middle of teaching a nun and during that teaching her status changes and she becomes a monk, what does that incur? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who has not received full ordination as not having received full ordination, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as having received full ordination, it is a misdeed. If he perceives one who has received full ordination as not having received full ordination, it is a misdeed. If he perceives one who has received full ordination as having received full ordination and teaches her, what does that incur? It is a downfall.

Venerable one, if a monk teaches a nun who is a hermaphrodite, one who has remained by stealth, one who lives separately, one who has previously committed an offense, or one who has previously caused a dispute — what does that incur for all of these? They are all misdeeds.

Venerable one, if a monk teaches a nun who is one who causes schism in the Saṅgha, one who is a partisan, or one who has been given training precepts, what does that incur? All of these are downfalls. If he teaches a female trainee or female novices, all of these are misdeeds.

Venerable one, if one who has been appointed to teach nuns has lapsed in that appointment — is he to be appointed a second time? Upāli, that is not necessary. Let him teach by virtue of the original authorization itself.

Venerable one, if a monk who is not a partisan teaches a nun who is a partisan, what does that incur? It is a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk who is a partisan teaches a nun who is not a partisan, what does that incur? It is a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk who has been given training precepts was previously appointed to teach nuns and that appointment has lapsed — is he to be appointed a second time? Upāli, that is not necessary. Let him teach by virtue of the original authorization itself.

Venerable one, a monk appointed to teach nuns has been appointed to a different residence; he goes to that other residence and teaches — should he teach nuns by virtue of that same original authorization, or should he not? Upāli, he should teach.

Venerable one, if while teaching nuns a monk becomes mentally disturbed, and then recovers his own mind — is he to be appointed a second time? Upāli, that is not necessary.

If a monk endowed with five qualities is appointed to teach nuns, is that called an appointment or is it called not an appointment?

Upāli, that is called an appointment, and the Saṅgha does not thereby incur a transgression.

Venerable one, can it happen that a monk appointed by the Saṅgha to teach nuns nonetheless incurs a transgression? Upāli, it can — namely, when he has ceased to be endowed with the five qualities.

Venerable one, can it happen that a monk teaches nuns without having been appointed by the Saṅgha and yet incurs no transgression? Upāli, it can — namely, when it is an arhat who teaches.

Venerable one, if one who has been granted the training teaches nuns without having been appointed by the Saṅgha, what does that become? A transgression.

Venerable one, if a novice monk teaches nuns, what does that become? A misdeed.

In brief:

By message, by letter, by sign, through another's words, from one to the next,
when mad, when mentally disturbed, when ill,
when mute, when simple-minded, when asleep, when hiccupping, when intoxicated, when in meditative absorption — the last of all.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a monk is appointed to teach nuns for the duration of one umbrella's worth of shade, and that if he teaches beyond that, it becomes a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk teaches beyond the duration of one messenger's errand, what does that become? A misdeed. Likewise, by letter, by sign, through another's words, or transmitted from one to the next — all of these become misdeeds.

Venerable one, if a monk teaches a mad nun beyond the appointed duration of shade, what does that become? A misdeed. Likewise, if he teaches one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is simple-minded, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is blind, one who is asleep, one who is hiccupping, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one who is residing elsewhere — all of these become misdeeds.

In brief:

By voice, by body, in seclusion, by night — the fourth is the same;
the neuter sex, and obstruction, and the rains retreat — the last of all.

Venerable one, if a noble monk teaches a nun beyond the appointed duration of shade in the noble language, and that nun does not request it in the noble language, what does that become? A misdeed. If a noble one teaches a nun in a regional language, and that nun does not request it in a regional language, what does that become? A misdeed. If one from the borderlands teaches a nun in a regional language, and that nun does not request it in a regional language, what does that become? A misdeed. If one from the borderlands teaches a nun beyond the appointed duration of shade in the noble language, and that nun does not request it in the noble language, what does that become? A misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk teaches a nun beyond the appointed duration of shade while directing attention through the body, what does that become? A misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives a secluded place as non-secluded and teaches a nun beyond the appointed duration of shade, what does that become? A misdeed.

Venerable one, if while a monk is teaching a nun beyond the appointed duration of shade her status changes and she becomes a fully ordained nun, what does that become? A misdeed.

Venerable one, if while a monk is teaching a nun beyond the appointed duration of shade that nun's status also changes and she becomes a fully ordained monk, what does that become? A misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who has not received full ordination as not having received full ordination and teaches her beyond the appointed duration of shade, what does that become? A misdeed. If he perceives one who has not received full ordination as having received full ordination, what does that become? A misdeed. If he perceives one who has received full ordination as not having received full ordination, what does that become? A misdeed.

If he perceives one who has received full ordination as having received full ordination and teaches her beyond the appointed duration of shade, what does that become? A misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk perceives the shade as being within the appointed duration and teaches a nun, what does that become? A misdeed. If the sun has set and he perceives it as having set and teaches, there is no offense. If the sun has not set and he perceives it as having set and teaches, that is a misdeed. If the sun has not set and he perceives it as not having set and teaches, there is no offense. Venerable one, if a monk teaches a nun who is a hermaphrodite, who is in a stolen place, who is not in a proper place, who is dwelling apart, who has previously committed an offense, or who was previously involved in a dispute, what does that become? In every case, a misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk teaches beyond the appointed duration of shade to nuns who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, who have taken sides, or who have been given training precepts, what does that become? A misdeed.

Venerable one, is there a case where a monk teaches a nun beyond the appointed duration of shade and yet it does not become a transgression? Upāli, there is. If any one of eight interrupting obstacles arises while the nuns are on their way, there is no offense. Venerable one, is there another case where a monk teaches a nun beyond the appointed duration of shade and yet it does not become a transgression? Upāli, there is. If he goes to the nuns' residence and teaches there, there is no offense.

In brief:

Voice, body, solitude, the night, and the fourth likewise — the seventh, the hermaphrodite, likewise too — the one given training precepts, and the nun.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk says to another monk, "The venerable monk teaches a fully ordained nun for the sake of even a little food," that monk incurs a transgression. Venerable one, if a noble monk says to a monk in the noble tongue, "Venerable one, you teach a nun for the sake of even a little food," and that monk does not respond in the noble tongue, what does that become? A misdeed. If a noble one says this to a monk in the tongue of a border region, and that monk does not respond in the tongue of that border region, what does that become? A misdeed. If a person of a border region says this to a monk in the tongue of a border region, and that monk does not respond in the tongue of that border region, what does that become? A misdeed. If a person of a border region says this to a monk in the noble tongue — "Venerable one, you teach a nun for the sake of even a little food" — and that monk does not respond in the noble tongue, what does that become? A misdeed.

Venerable one, if a monk conveys to another monk — by means of a bodily gesture — "The venerable one teaches a nun for the sake of even a little food," what does that become? A misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving what is a solitary place as not being a solitary place, says, "Venerable one, you teach a nun for the sake of even a little food," what does that become? A misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk says to another monk, "Venerable one, you teach Dharma to a nun for the sake of even a little food," and in the meantime the status of the monk spoken to changes and he becomes a nun, what does that become? A misdeed. Venerable one, if a nun says to a monk, "Noble one, you teach a nun for the sake of even a little food," and that very nun's status then changes and she becomes a monk, what does that become? A transgression.

Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a fully ordained person as fully ordained, says to that person, "Venerable one, you teach a nun for the sake of even a little food," what does that become? A transgression. If he perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained, it becomes a misdeed. If he perceives a not-fully-ordained person as fully ordained, it becomes a misdeed. If he perceives a not-fully-ordained person as not fully ordained, it becomes a misdeed.

Venerable one, if a not-fully-ordained person, upon seeing another not-fully-ordained person, says to that person, "Venerable one, you teach a nun for the sake of even a little food," what does that become? A misdeed. If one sees a not-fully-ordained person but speaks thus to someone fully ordained, what does that become? A misdeed. If one sees a not-fully-ordained person but the person spoken to is in fact fully ordained, what does that become? A misdeed. If one sees a fully-ordained person but speaks thus to someone not fully ordained, what does that become? A misdeed. If one sees a fully-ordained person and the person is in the process of becoming fully ordained, what does that become? A misdeed. If one sees a fully-ordained person and the person spoken to is fully ordained, what does that become? A transgression. If one sees a fully-ordained person but the person spoken to is not fully ordained, what does that become? A misdeed.

If a monk says thus to those ranging from a novice nun up through a nun who has been expelled, all the way up to one who has previously caused a dispute, what does that become? A misdeed. Venerable one, if a monk says thus to one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, to a partisan, or to one who has been given training, what does that become? All become transgressions. If one who has been given training says, "Venerable one, you teach a nun for the sake of even a little food," what does that become? A transgression.

Venerable one, if a nun says thus to a female probationer, or to a female novice, or to male novices, "Venerable one, you teach a nun for the sake of even a little food," what does that become? A misdeed.

In brief:

By message, by letter, by hand-sign,
through the words of another, from one to another, when one is mad, mentally disturbed, deaf, dull-witted, or asleep, in a state of excitement, drunk, or in meditative absorption — these are the last.

Venerable one, if a monk conveys by message to a monk the words, "Venerable one, you teach a nun for the sake of even a little food," what does that become? A misdeed. Likewise, whether by letter, by hand-sign, through the words of another, relayed from one to another, whether the speaker is mad, mentally disturbed, dull-witted, mute, deaf, asleep, excited, drunk, in meditative absorption, or residing elsewhere — in all cases it becomes a misdeed.

In brief:

The improper, and the seventh,
likewise the nocturnal and the fourth, begun by another, not completed, the greater not permitted — likewise so.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that a monk who makes robes for a nun who is not a relative incurs a transgression. Is there any case, venerable one, in which a monk makes robes for a nun who is not a relative and yet does not incur a transgression?" Upāli, there is. It is as follows: where the material is suitable but the kinship-relation is unsuitable; where the kinship-relation is suitable but the material is unsuitable; and where both are unsuitable. Now, unsuitable material refers to that which is mixed with the wool of a female deer, the wool of cattle, the wool of a wild animal, or the wool of a goat, or that which has not been woven on a loom, if one makes a robe of that sort, it is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk begins making a robe for a nun who is not a relative and she has not yet received full ordination, and she remains without full ordination throughout, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "If he begins while she has not received full ordination and she receives full ordination in the course of the work, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "If he begins while she has not yet received full ordination and she has received full ordination by the time it is completed, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "If he begins while she has just received full ordination and she remains one who has just received full ordination, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "If he begins while she has just received full ordination and she has received full ordination, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "If he begins when she is fully ordained and she is fully ordained, what does that entail?" It is a downfall. "If he begins when she is fully ordained and she is not fully ordained, what does that entail?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk is making a robe for a nun who is not a relative and in the course of the work a change of sex occurs and she becomes a fully ordained monk, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a nun is making a robe for a monk who is not a relative and in the course of the work a change of sex occurs and he becomes a fully ordained nun, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk is making a robe for a nun who is not a relative and in the course of the work a change of sex occurs and she becomes a fully ordained nun, what does that entail?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk makes a robe for a nun who is not a relative, perceiving her as one who is not a relative, what does that entail?" It is a downfall. "If he perceives one who is not a relative as a relative, what does that entail?" There is no offence. "Venerable one, if a monk perceives a relative as one who is not a relative, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "If he perceives a relative as a relative and makes the robe, what does that entail?" There is no offence.

"Venerable one, if a monk makes a robe for a nun who is not a relative, perceiving a fully ordained nun as fully ordained, what does that entail?" It is a downfall. "If he perceives one who is fully ordained as not fully ordained, it becomes a transgression. If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, what does that entail?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk has another make a robe for a nun who is not a relative, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk completes a robe for a nun who is not a relative that was begun by another, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk abandons in an unsuitable way a robe he was making for a nun who is not a relative, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk makes a robe for a nun who is not a relative that is smaller than the prescribed measure and it is not fit for consecration, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk makes a robe for a nun who is not a relative that is larger than the prescribed measure and it is not fit for consecration, what does that entail?" It is a transgression.

The Vinaya, the Sacred Fundamental Text. The eighth fascicle.

In brief:

The mad woman, the mentally disturbed, the sick, the mute, the foolish, the neuter — likewise these — those who have received the precepts, and the fully ordained nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk makes a robe for a mad nun, what does that entail?" It is a transgression. Likewise, making a robe for a nun who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is foolish, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is blind, one who is a neuter, one who has taken refuge in theft, one who has no fixed abode, one who lives apart, one who has previously caused a dispute, one who has previously incurred an offence, and one who has gone to live elsewhere — all of these entail a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk makes a robe for nuns who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, those who have sided with them, or those who have renounced the training, what does that entail?" All of these entail a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a monk makes a robe for a female novice in training or for a novice nun, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a nun makes a robe for monks or male novices who are not her relatives, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, if one who gives the training makes a robe for a fully ordained nun who is not her relative, what does that entail?" That is a downfall.

In brief, the exceptions are as follows:

By messenger, written letter, hand gesture, through another's words, from one to another,
one who is mad, one mentally disturbed, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is a neuter, one who is intoxicated, and one who has entered meditative absorption — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli addressed the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a monk who gives a robe to a fully ordained nun who is not his relative incurs a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a fully ordained nun who is not his relative by means of a messenger, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. Likewise, sending it by written letter, by hand gesture, through another's words, relayed from one person to another — and similarly, giving a robe to a nun who is mad, or one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is a neuter, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, and likewise one who has gone to live elsewhere — all of these entail a transgression.

In brief:

The unsuitable, the fourth category, likewise the measure, not more than that excess, thus the seventh, the precious, the shared, and the neuter.

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk gives a robe to a fully ordained nun who is not his relative and yet does not incur a downfall?" Upāli, there is. Such is the case when the material of the robe is suitable but the relative connection is not suitable; or when the relative connection is suitable but the material is not suitable; or when both are not suitable. What is meant by unsuitable material? It is material mixed with the wool of a female camel, the wool of cattle, the wool of goats, or the wool of wild animals, or material that has not been woven on a loom. If one gives a robe of such a kind, what does that entail? That entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a fully ordained nun as fully ordained and gives her a robe, what does that entail?" That is a downfall. "If he perceives a fully ordained nun as not fully ordained, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a fully ordained nun who is not his relative as not being his relative, and gives her a robe, what does that entail?" That is a downfall. "If he perceives one who is not his relative as his relative, what does that entail?" There is no offence. "If he perceives one who is his relative as not his relative, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If he perceives a relative as his relative, what does that entail?" There is no offence.

"Venerable one, if a monk is in the process of giving a robe to a fully ordained nun who is not his relative, and in the interim she changes status and becomes a fully ordained nun — that is to say, she was not yet fully ordained when he began — what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a nun is in the process of giving a robe to a monk who is not her relative, and in the interim he changes status and becomes a fully ordained monk, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk gives a robe to a fully ordained nun who is not his relative and yet does not incur an offence?" Upāli, there is: a robe that is smaller than a cubit in measure, and one that has reached the measure of the Sugata's Dharma robe.

"Venerable one, if a robe is dedicated while the recipient is not yet fully ordained, and then given while she is still not fully ordained, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If it is dedicated before full ordination and given at the time of full ordination, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If it is dedicated before full ordination and then given after full ordination has been conferred, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If it is stored at the time of full ordination and given at the time of full ordination, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If it is dedicated at the time of full ordination and then given after full ordination has been conferred, what does that entail?"

That entails a transgression. "If it is dedicated at the time of full ordination and given at the time of full ordination, what does that entail?" That entails a downfall. "If it is dedicated at the time of full ordination and given before full ordination has been conferred, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a valuable robe to a nun who is not a relative, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk gives a robe to a nun who is not a relative and yet incurs no fault?" Upāli, there is: if it is sold and then bought back with the proceeds. "Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe held in common to a nun who is not a relative, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a layman, what does that entail?" If he gives a monastic robe, it entails a transgression. If he gives a lay robe, there is no fault. "Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a female probationer or a novice nun, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. Likewise, if he gives a robe to a paṇḍaka, a woman who has stolen entry into the order, one who has no valid standing, one who dwells separately, one who has previously committed a fault, or one who was previously involved in a dispute — in all such cases it entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a nun who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or to one who has taken sides in a schism, or to one who has been given a formal training rule, what does that entail?" In all such cases it entails a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a nun gives a robe to a layman, what does that entail?" If she gives a monastic robe, it entails a downfall. If she gives a lay robe, there is no fault. "Venerable one, if a nun gives a robe to a fully ordained monk or to a novice monk, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if one who has been given a formal training rule gives a robe to a nun who is not a relative, what does that entail?" That entails a downfall. To a female probationer or a novice nun, it entails a transgression.

In brief:

Mantras and the fourth, supernatural powers, marks and time, and the seventh, wrong paths, households, and so forth — sound and body and solitude likewise.

Venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk joins himself to a large escort of nuns and then falls in behind them, it entails a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk joins himself to such an escort and then renders himself invisible by means of a mantra or medicine and travels on, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving an unordained woman as fully ordained, joins himself to her escort and travels on, what does that entail?" That entails a downfall. If he perceives an unordained woman as not fully ordained, it entails a transgression. If he perceives a fully ordained woman as not fully ordained, it entails a transgression. If he perceives a fully ordained woman as fully ordained, it entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk joins himself to a nun's escort and travels on together with her by means of supernatural powers, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk joins himself to a large escort of nuns and travels along together with them, and in the course of the journey his sex changes so that he becomes a nun, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a nun joins herself to a large escort of monks and falls in behind them, and in the course of the journey her sex changes so that she becomes a monk, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk joins himself to a nun's escort and falls in behind her and yet incurs no fault?" Upāli, there is: that is the case where, among the eight obstructions on the path, any one obstruction has arisen. "Venerable one, if one who is not fully ordained joins an escort of those not fully ordained and travels on, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If one who is not fully ordained joins an escort of those not fully ordained and travels on as a fully ordained person, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If one who is not fully ordained joins an escort of those not fully ordained and travels on at the time of full ordination, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

"If one who is at the point of full ordination joins an escort of those at the point of full ordination and travels on, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If one who is at the point of full ordination joins an escort of those who are fully ordained and travels on, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If one who is fully ordained joins an escort of those who are fully ordained and travels on, what does that entail?" That entails a downfall. "If one who is fully ordained joins an escort of those who are not fully ordained and travels on, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk joins an escort and travels on ahead, leaving the rear unguarded, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk joins a laywoman in escort and travels on together with her up to the point of a prior quarrel, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk joins in escort and travels together with a woman who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha and with a woman who has been given the training precepts, what does that entail?" That entails a downfall. "Venerable one, if a noble monk joins a nun in escort using the noble language, and that nun does not seek out the noble language, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If one using the border language joins in escort, and that nun does not seek out the border language, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If one of the borderlands using the border language joins in escort, and that nun does not seek out the border language, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If one of the borderlands using the noble language joins in escort, and that nun does not seek out the noble language, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk joins a nun in escort with a bodily gesture as the signal and then falls in behind, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk perceives a solitary place as not solitary and joins in escort, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

In brief:

By message, by letter, by hand-sign,
by another's word, from one to the next,
one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one who is deaf, one who is dull, one who is asleep,
one who stammers, one who is intoxicated,
and one who has entered absorption — these are the last.

"Venerable one, if a monk sends a message to join a nun in escort and then falls in behind, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. Likewise, by letter, by hand-sign, by another's word, and all cases of transmission from one to the next — all entail a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk joins a mad nun in escort, travels along together with her, and falls in behind, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. Likewise, one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is blind, one who is asleep, one who stammers, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, and similarly nuns residing elsewhere — if a monk joins any of these in escort, travels the road together with them, and goes on, all of these entail a transgression. "Venerable one, if one who has been given the training precepts joins a nun in escort and falls in behind, what does that entail?" That entails a downfall. "Venerable one, if a monk joins a female trainee or a novice nun in escort and travels on together, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a nun joins in escort and travels on together with monks, male novices, or laymen, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "If she travels on together with female trainees, novice nuns, or male novices, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

Whatever has been understood with regard to travelling on the road should be understood in the same way with regard to crossing a river — excepting only those with supernatural powers and those who travel by a route other than the road; all remaining cases are to be expounded in the same way in full.

In brief:

One who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one who is ill, one who is deaf, one who is dull,
one who is asleep, one who stammers, one who is intoxicated,
and one who has entered absorption — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk approaches a secluded place alone together with a woman, that entails a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk approaches a secluded place alone together with a mad woman, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Likewise, one whose mind is disturbed" —

"What of approaching a secluded place alone together with an ill woman, a dull woman, a mute woman, a deaf woman, a blind woman, one who is asleep, one who stammers, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered absorption, and likewise one who is abiding elsewhere going about her own way?" That entails a transgression.

In brief:

A young woman, the sky, mantra and marks — the fourth — and a hermaphrodite in seclusion likewise:
these are the trainings given to nuns.

"Venerable one, if a monk approaches a secluded place alone together with a young woman, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a woman is on the ground and the monk is in the sky, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk renders himself invisible by mantra or medicine and approaches her, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk approaches a secluded place alone together with a woman and then undergoes a change of marks and becomes a nun, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a nun approaches a secluded place alone together with a man, and then undergoes a change of marks and becomes a monk, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human woman as human and the two of them approach a secluded place alone, what does that entail?" That is a downfall. "If one perceives a human as a non-human, that entails a transgression. If one perceives a non-human as a human, that entails a transgression. If one perceives a non-human as a non-human, that entails a transgression." "Venerable one, if a nun approaches a secluded place alone together with a hermaphrodite, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. The second category of marks is likewise the same. "Venerable one, if a monk approaches a secluded place alone together with a hermaphrodite, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk approaches a secluded place alone together with a nun who has been expelled, what does that entail?" That is a downfall. Likewise, if he approaches a secluded place alone together with a woman who has killed her father, a woman who has killed her mother, a woman who has killed an arhat, a woman who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a tīrthika woman, or a woman who has gone over to the tīrthikas — all of those entail a downfall. "Venerable one, if a monk approaches a secluded place alone together with a nun, what does that entail?" That is a downfall.

Likewise, if he approaches together with a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a female novice, a female thief who has taken refuge in the Saṅgha, a woman who has been suspended, a woman who has been expelled from the community, a woman who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, a woman against whom an offense has previously arisen, or a woman who has been given the training — if any of those sit together with him alone in a secluded place, all of those entail a downfall. "Venerable one, if a nun approaches a secluded place alone together with a man, what does that entail?" That is a downfall. "If she approaches a secluded place alone together with a monk, what does that entail?" That is a downfall. "If a male novice approaches a secluded place alone together with him, what does that entail?" That is a downfall. "Venerable one, if a woman who has been given the training approaches a secluded place alone together with a woman, what does that entail?" That is a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a monk approaches together with a woman, the two of them alone, perceiving a non-secluded place as secluded, what does that entail?" That entails a transgression. For a female trainee, a female novice, and male novices, it likewise entails a transgression. Just as the full explanation is given for sitting together with a woman, so too it should be set forth in full for sitting together with a nun.

In brief:

Sending a messenger, a written message, a hand-signal, having another convey it, and from one to another — one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, one who is deaf, one who is dull, one who is asleep, one who stammers, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered absorption, and one going elsewhere — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha:

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk eats food that has been arranged by nuns, he incurs a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk solicits and eats food that has been arranged through a messenger by a nun, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Likewise, if it is arranged by means of a written message, a hand-signal, by having another convey it, or by passing it from one to another — all of these are wrongdoings."

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits food that has been arranged by a mad nun, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Likewise, if food is arranged by a nun whose mind is disturbed, by one afflicted by illness, by one who is dull, by one who is mute, by one who is deaf, or by one who is staying elsewhere, and he eats it — all of these are wrongdoings."

"Venerable one, if a householder or a householder's wife who is mad has arranged food, and a monk solicits and eats it while doing so knowingly, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Likewise, if such food is arranged by one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who stammers, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one who is staying elsewhere — if the monk eats it knowingly, all of these are wrongdoings."

In brief:

For another's sake, and likewise for the body, for the third case and for the fourth and seventh,
for one of other discipline, for a monk, for a layman, and for a trainee — these are the last.

"Venerable one, if a nun has arranged food for the sake of another with that very intention and gives it to another, and the monk solicits and eats it knowingly, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a nun arranges food by means of a bodily indication and the monk solicits and eats it, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if while a monk is soliciting food arranged by a nun his status changes and he becomes a nun, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if while a nun is soliciting food arranged by a monk her status changes and she becomes a monk, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives food arranged by a nun as food that has been arranged and solicits it, what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one perceives food that has been arranged as not arranged and eats it, there is no offence."

"If one perceives food that has not been arranged as having been arranged and eats it, it is a wrongdoing."

"If one perceives food that has not been arranged as not having been arranged and eats it, there is no offence."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a fully ordained nun as fully ordained and solicits food she has arranged, what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one perceives a fully ordained nun as not fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one perceives one who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If food was arranged when she was not yet fully ordained, and one solicits it when she is not yet fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If food was arranged when she was not yet fully ordained, and one solicits it just as she is becoming fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If food was arranged when she was not yet fully ordained, and one solicits it after she is fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If food was arranged just as she was becoming fully ordained, and one solicits it just as she is becoming fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If food was arranged when she was fully ordained, and one solicits it after she is fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If food was arranged when she was fully ordained, and one solicits it when she is fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"If food was arranged when she was fully ordained, and one solicits it when she is not fully ordained, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, aside from what is arranged for the sake of one endowed with moral discipline and learning, solicits food arranged for the sake of some other quality, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits roots, fruits, and the like — things other than food — that have been arranged, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits food arranged for another monk, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, if one eats food arranged by a novice monk, a male probationer, a hermaphrodite monastic, a nun who has been expelled, or one who has received the training precepts — in all such cases it is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a nun solicits food arranged for a śikṣamāṇā, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, if one eats food arranged by a novice nun, a hermaphrodite female monastic, an expelled nun, one who has killed a father, one who has killed a mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), one dwelling as a thief, one not properly dwelling, one dwelling separately, one in whom a prior offense has arisen, one previously in a state of conflict, or laywomen — in all such cases it is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits food arranged by one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides in a schism, or one who has received training precepts — what is that?"

"In all cases it is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun solicits food arranged for her by a monk, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, if one eats food arranged by a novice nun, a śikṣamāṇā, a novice monk, a laywoman, a hermaphrodite laywoman, or those who have received training precepts — in all such cases it is a wrongdoing. This should be applied in full.

"Venerable one, if one who has received training precepts solicits food arranged by a nun, what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one solicits food arranged by a śikṣamāṇā, a novice nun, or novice monks, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

In brief:

Food and other provisions are the same in this regard:
the two matching cases, the improper ones,
those soliciting the remainder due to kin, the fourth, seventh, and second.

The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that repeatedly soliciting outside the proper time is a downfall. Is it possible for a monk to invite guests on two occasions and yet incur no downfall?"

"Upāli, it is possible. That is the case where a monk first invited someone for solid food, prepared food, drink, soft food, and things to lick and so forth, and then afterward invited them again for a meal."

"Venerable one, if a monk intends harm toward another monk, invites him, and after that monk has accepted the later invitation and solicited on that basis — what is that?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable one, is it possible for a monk who invites a second or third time and solicits to incur no transgression?"

"Upāli, it is possible. That is the case where a monk was invited without a robe, and then after eating, was invited again with a robe included, making it a double invitation."

"Venerable one, is it possible for a monk to solicit twice with a robe included and yet incur no transgression?"

"Upāli, it is possible — when the robe is an improper one."

"And if the monk knows this and solicits, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk is invited for improper food, and afterward seeks and solicits proper food — what is that?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk is invited for a meal in the morning, and afterward solicits again from a further invitation — what is that?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a nun who had not yet solicited food for the sake of a robe undergoes sex-change and becomes a monk, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk who had not yet solicited food for the sake of a robe undergoes sex-change and becomes a nun, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives that there is no robe when in fact there is no robe, accepts an invitation on that basis, and afterward does not solicit — what is that?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives that there is no robe when in fact there is no robe, and eats — there is no offense."

"If one perceives that there is a robe when in fact there is no robe, and eats — it is a wrongdoing."

"If one perceives that there is a robe when in fact there is a robe, and eats — there is no offense."

"Venerable one, if before full ordination one accepts an invitation on the grounds that there is no robe, and solicits while still not fully ordained — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If before full ordination one accepts and solicits at the point of full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If before full ordination one accepts and solicits after having become fully ordained — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If at the point of full ordination one accepts and solicits at the point of full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If at the point of full ordination one accepts and solicits while still at the point of full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If after full ordination one accepts and solicits after full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a transgression."

"If after full ordination one accepts and solicits while not yet fully ordained — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk may solicit in a single place without committing an offense?"

"Upāli, there is. It is as follows: when both a monk and a householder have been invited together to a meal."

"Venerable one, if one who has received a training rule solicits food again and again — what is that?"

"It is a transgression."

In summary:

One who has gone mad, and one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, one who is mute, one who is dumb, one who is a paṇḍaka — and likewise a fully ordained nun — these are the last cases.

"Venerable one, if a monk accepts an invitation for a robe-less meal from a madman and solicits — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

One whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is dumb, a paṇḍaka, a female paṇḍaka — and likewise, non-Buddhist wanderers outside this tradition, other ascetics, brahmins, the virtuous, and those who roam about — these cases are the same.

Likewise, if a monk, a nun, a probationer nun (śikṣamāṇā), a male novice, a female novice, or those who have gone to another destination — if any of these solicit and eat a subsequent invitation for which there is no robe, all of them commit a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a nun solicits food again and again — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If a probationer nun or female novices solicit — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

In summary:

Mantra and the fourth — and sky, mark and food likewise — the seventh, the second, and the others, and the changed — these are the last cases.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, when the Blessed One, intending the case of a non-Buddhist establishment, declared that a monk who has not requested a meal should eat one serving and that eating beyond that is a transgression — venerable one, if a monk renders himself imperceptible by mantra or medicine and solicits a second serving, what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a non-Buddhist establishment as a non-Buddhist establishment and solicits a second serving — what is that?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a non-Buddhist establishment as not a non-Buddhist establishment — there is no offense."

"If one perceives what is not a non-Buddhist establishment as a non-Buddhist establishment — it is a wrongdoing."

"If one perceives what is not a non-Buddhist establishment as not a non-Buddhist establishment — there is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits a second serving while situated in the sky — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits a second serving of food at a non-Buddhist establishment and, in the midst of doing so, changes sex and becomes a nun — what is that?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun solicits a second serving of food at a non-Buddhist establishment and, in the midst of doing so, changes sex and becomes a monk — what is that?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits, apart from cooked food, other things to eat — solid food, beverages, or items to lick — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if one who has not yet received full ordination, intending a non-Buddhist establishment, solicits as one who has not yet received full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one who has not yet received full ordination solicits at an establishment, treating it as if full ordination had been received — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one who has not yet received full ordination solicits at an establishment after having received full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one in the process of receiving full ordination solicits at an establishment while in the process of receiving full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one in the process of receiving full ordination solicits at an establishment after full ordination has been completed — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one who has received full ordination solicits at an establishment while having received full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one who has received full ordination solicits at an establishment as one who has not received full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes food from elsewhere, then goes to a non-Buddhist establishment and solicits there — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes food from a non-Buddhist establishment and then goes elsewhere and solicits — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, apart from a non-Buddhist establishment, solicits at a different establishment of ascetics or brahmins — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

In summary:

One gone mad, or with a disturbed mind,
One who is sick, one who has gone elsewhere,
A woman, a hermaphrodite — the same applies.
One under training, and a female novice.

"Venerable one, if a monk solicits a second serving of food at the dwelling of one who has gone mad — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, at the dwelling of one with a disturbed mind, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who has gone elsewhere, a woman, a hermaphrodite — and similarly at the dwelling of others who reside in a different place — if one eats a second serving, all of these are wrongdoings.

"Venerable one, if one who has taken the training precepts, intending a non-Buddhist establishment, solicits a second serving of food — what is that?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a female probationer, a male novice, or a female novice solicits — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

The Noble Vinaya. The Ninth Fascicle.

In summary:

By messenger, by letter, by hand-signal,
By having another say it, and passing it from one to another,
One gone mad, one with a disturbed mind,
One who is sick, one who has gone elsewhere.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that when monks go to a village in a group and brahmins and householders give them large quantities of food and clarified butter, those monks, if they wish, may take two or three full almsbowls, but if they take more than that it is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk, by sending a messenger, takes more than three full almsbowls — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Likewise, by letter, by hand-signal, by having another convey the request, or by passing it from one to another — if one takes more, all of these are wrongdoings."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes more than three full almsbowls from a person who has gone mad — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, from one with a disturbed mind, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who has gone elsewhere — if one takes more than three full almsbowls from any of these, all are wrongdoings.

In summary:

From another to another, and beyond this:

Food, improper things,

By night, the fourth, the seventh,

And hermaphrodites — the same applies.

"Venerable one, if a monk gives more than three full almsbowls to another to take — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes on behalf of another — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes more than three full almsbowls from other non-Buddhist wanderers (tīrthikas) outside this community — from other ascetics, brahmins, wanderers, or mendicants — what is that?"

"All are wrongdoings."

"Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk takes more than three full almsbowls and yet incurs no transgression?"

"Upāli, there are. If one takes improper food, it is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes more than three full almsbowls of things other than food — such as things to be eaten as a snack, things to be prepared, things to be drunk, or things to be tasted — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if, while a monk is taking more than three full almsbowls, his status changes and he becomes a nun — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if, while a nun is taking more than three full almsbowls, her status changes and she becomes a monk — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human as a human and takes more than three full almsbowls — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

If he perceives a human as a non-human, it is a wrongdoing. If he perceives a non-human as a human, it is a wrongdoing. If he perceives a non-human as a non-human, it is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives that what exceeds six and a half measures is in excess and then takes it — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

If he perceives what is in excess as not in excess, there is no offence. If he perceives what is not in excess as being in excess, it is a wrongdoing. If he perceives what is not in excess as not in excess, there is no offence.

"Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination obtains something and takes it in the state of not having received full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one who has not received full ordination obtains something and takes it at the moment of receiving full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one who has not received full ordination obtains something and takes it after having received full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one who is in the act of receiving full ordination obtains something and takes it at that moment — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one who is in the act of receiving full ordination obtains something and takes it after having received full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one who has received full ordination obtains something and takes it after having received full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one who has received full ordination obtains something and takes it without having received full ordination — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk takes more than three full almsbowls and yet incurs no transgression?"

"Upāli, there are. When one remains in that very household and eats there."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes more than three full almsbowls from a hermaphrodite — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, taking from a female intermediary and from hermaphrodites — all are wrongdoings.

"Venerable one, if one who has been given a training takes more than three full almsbowls — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun takes more than three full almsbowls — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

If a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a novice nun, or novice monks take them — it is a wrongdoing.

In summary:

Time and night — the same applies;
Things to be eaten and things to be tasted,
The improper seventh — likewise;
All ordinations: not done and done.

Then the venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said: 'Any monk who, without having made it a remainder, seeks or takes food or prepared foods that have not been left over, will incur a downfall.' Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk seeks or takes prepared or raw foods that have not been made into a remainder and yet incurs no transgression?"

"Upāli, there are. When one is ill and it is blessed and then eaten."

"Venerable one, if, after setting aside what has been sought and not sought, he seeks something prepared or raw that has not been made into a remainder, and in the meantime his status changes and he becomes a nun — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a nun, having set aside what was sought and what was not sought, seeks prepared or raw food that has not been made into a remainder, and in the meantime her status changes and she becomes a monk — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, when a monk is making something into a remainder and his status changes, is it said to be 'made into a remainder' or 'not made into a remainder'?"

"It is said to be 'not made into a remainder.'"

"Venerable one, if a monk seeks, without first making it a remainder, other edible things apart from cooked food — namely prepared foods, beverages, things to be licked, things to be tasted, and so forth — which count as foodstuffs but are not medicines — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk sets aside other edible things apart from cooked food — prepared foods, beverages, things to be licked, things to be tasted, and so forth — is that said to be 'setting aside'?"

"Upāli, it is not."

"Why is that?"

"Upāli, there is no such thing as setting aside in relation to prepared foods, beverages, things to be licked, things to be tasted, and so forth."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives what has been set aside as having been set aside, and then seeks food and drink that has not been made into a remainder — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives what has been set aside as not having been set aside, and seeks it — what is that?"

"There is no transgression."

"If he perceives what has not been set aside as having been set aside, and eats it — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If he perceives what has not been set aside as not having been set aside, and eats it — what is that?"

"There is no transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives what has not been made into a remainder as not having been made into a remainder, and seeks prepared or raw food — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives what has not been made into a remainder as having been made into a remainder, and eats prepared or raw food — what is that?"

"There is no transgression."

"If he perceives what has been made into a remainder as not having been made into a remainder, and eats it — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If he perceives what has been made into a remainder as having been made into a remainder, and eats it — what is that?"

"There is no transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk seeks food that is improper and sets it aside — is that said to be 'setting aside' or 'not setting aside'?"

"Upāli, it is said to be 'setting aside.'"

"Venerable one, if before full ordination one sets something aside, and before full ordination one seeks something that has not been made into a remainder — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If before full ordination one sets something aside, and at the moment of full ordination one seeks it — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If before full ordination one sets something aside, and after full ordination one seeks it — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If at the moment of full ordination one sets something aside, and at the moment of full ordination one seeks it — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If at the moment of full ordination one sets something aside, and after full ordination one seeks it — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If after full ordination one sets something aside, and after full ordination one seeks it — what is that?"

"It is a downfall."

"If after full ordination one sets something aside, and before full ordination one seeks it — what is that?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk sets aside something that has not been properly distributed in full — is that said to be 'setting aside' or 'not setting aside'?"

"Upāli, it is said to be 'not setting aside.'"

"Why is that?"

"Upāli, there is no setting aside in relation to what has not been properly distributed in full."

"Venerable one, in how many cases is something said to be 'not made into a remainder'?"

"Upāli, there are five: when it has not been received from another; when prepared or raw food has not been presented before one; when the act of receiving it has not been performed; when one has not yet received full ordination; and when what has been made a remainder was not established in its natural condition — in these cases what was made a remainder is nonetheless said to be 'not made into a remainder.'"

"Upāli, there are five cases in which something is said to be 'made into a remainder': when it has been received from another; when prepared or raw food has been presented before one; when the act of receiving it has been performed; when one has received full ordination; and when what was made a remainder was established in its natural condition — in these cases it is said to be 'made into a remainder.'"

"Venerable one, before whom does one make something into a remainder?"

"Upāli, a monk makes it into a remainder before a monk, not before a nun. A nun makes it before a nun. A male novice makes it before a monk. A female trainee (śikṣamāṇā) makes it before a nun, a female trainee, or a female novice."

"Venerable one, may one make it into a remainder before a nun —"

"Upāli, no."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes something into a remainder before a nun, is it said to be 'made into a remainder,' or may one also confess before her?"

"Upāli, no."

In brief:

By messenger, letter, gesture,

Through another, or from one to another —

A madman, one mentally disturbed, one who is ill,

A deaf-mute, one who is dull-witted, one who is asleep,

One who is delirious, one who is intoxicated,

One in meditative absorption, a wanderer, a eunuch —

"Venerable one, if a monk makes something into a remainder through a messenger, is it said to be 'made into a remainder'?"

"Upāli, no. Likewise, if it is made through a letter, a gesture, through another person, or passed from one to another, it is said to be 'not made into a remainder.'"

"Venerable one, if a monk makes something into a remainder before a madman, is it said to be 'made into a remainder' or 'not made into a remainder'?"

"It is said to be 'not made into a remainder.' Likewise, before a mentally disturbed monk, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, a mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one who is residing elsewhere — if something is made into a remainder before any of these, is it said to be 'made into a remainder'?"

"Upāli, no."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes something into a remainder before a eunuch, is it said to be 'made into a remainder'?"

"Upāli, no. Likewise, before a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed her father, one who has killed her mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one dwelling as a thief, one who is not residing in the community, one who is living apart, one who has previously committed an offense, or one who has previously caused a disruption — if something is made into a remainder before any of these, is it said to be 'made into a remainder'?"

"Upāli, that is not so."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes something into a remainder before a monk who is a glutton, is it said to be 'made into a remainder'?"

"It is not to be called 'made into a remainder' — it is 'made into a remainder' with an extreme transgression accompanying it."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes something into a remainder before one who has split the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides, or one who has given training — is it said to be 'made into a remainder' or 'not made into a remainder'?"

"Upāli, if it is called 'made into a remainder,' the act of making it into a remainder entails an extreme transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who has given training requests food and provisions without having made the remainder, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun requests food and then, after having renounced it, requests food and provisions again, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a female trainee, a female novice, or a male novice requests food and provisions without having made the remainder, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

In brief:

By voice, body, and seclusion likewise,
Food, improper matters,
The sign, and the fourth in the same way —
Schism of the Saṅgha, and a nun.

Then the venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a monk incurs a transgression if, while seeking to renounce something that another monk has or has not requested, he offers food at a wrong time before making the remainder. Venerable one, if a noble monk offers a monk food and provisions without the remainder being made, speaking in the noble language, and that receiving monk does not respond in the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"If a noble monk offers it speaking in a border language, and that monk does not respond in the border language, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"If a border person offers it in a border language, and that monk does not respond in the border language, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"If a border person offers it in the noble language, and that monk does not respond in the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives food and provisions that have not been formally offered to the Saṅgha to another monk by means of a physical gesture, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as non-secluded, gives food and provisions that have not been formally offered to the Saṅgha, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, apart from food, gives other eatables, provisions, beverages, lickables, and tastables and so forth at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression (āpatti)."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking food in the proper manner of seeking, gives food and provisions set aside as not allowable at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking food in the proper manner of seeking, gives food and provisions that have not been formally offered to the Saṅgha at an improper time, and in the meantime a change of status occurs and that person has become a nun, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a nun, while seeking food in the proper manner of seeking, gives another nun food and provisions that have not been formally offered to the Saṅgha at an improper time, and in the meantime a change of status occurs and that person has become a monk, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who is fully ordained as fully ordained and gives food and provisions at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"If one perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained and gives, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"If one perceives a person who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained and gives, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"If one perceives a person who is not fully ordained as fully ordained and gives, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while a monk is seeking food in the proper manner of seeking, perceives one who has been suspended as suspended and gives food and provisions to that person directly, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"If one perceives a suspended person as not suspended and gives, what is the consequence?"

"No offence."

"If one perceives an unsuspended person as suspended, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"If one perceives an unsuspended person as unsuspended and gives, there is no offence."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives food and provisions directly to a hermaphrodite or a person of indeterminate sex who has been suspended, while that person is seeking food in the proper manner, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"Likewise, giving directly to a suspended nun, to one who has killed father or mother, to one who has killed an arhat, to one who has maliciously drawn blood from a Tathāgata, to a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), to one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, to one who is staying as a thief in the community, to one who is not remaining in the community, to one who is living apart, and to those who have previously committed offences — if one gives to all such persons at an improper time, all become wrongdoings."

"Venerable one, if those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, those who have sided with the schismatics, and those who have relinquished the trainings seek food and receive it, and one gives directly to them who have been suspended at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"All become transgressions."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while nuns, female trainees, and male novices seek food in the proper manner and wish to be suspended, gives to them at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a nun gives directly to female trainees, female novices, and male novices — those who have not been formally offered to the Saṅgha — at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A wrongdoing."

"For female trainees, female novices, and male novices as well it is a wrongdoing; and these cases are to be applied to one another in their full elaboration."

"Venerable one, if one who has relinquished the trainings, while a monk is seeking food in the proper manner and having been suspended, gives food and provisions that have not been formally offered to the Saṅgha at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun, while seeking food in the proper manner and wishing to be suspended, gives the five types of eatables and provisions at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"For female trainees, female novices, and male novices, it is a wrongdoing."

In brief:

By messenger, letter, sign,
through an intermediary, or from one to another;
when insane, of disturbed mind, or afflicted;
when mute, simple-minded, asleep;
when babbling, or intoxicated — one in meditative absorption, and one dwelling elsewhere — these are the final cases.

"Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking food and wishing to be suspended, has not made the five types of eatables and provisions into a formal offer to the Saṅgha, and these are then delivered by a messenger at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Likewise, whether by letter, by sign, by word of another, passed from one to another, when insane, of disturbed mind, afflicted by illness, simple-minded, mute, deaf, asleep, babbling, intoxicated, in meditative absorption, or dwelling elsewhere — in all such cases, if the five types of eatables and provisions that have not been formally offered to the Saṅgha are delivered to a monk at an improper time, it is a transgression in every instance."

In brief:

By spell or boundary-space,
at an improper time, or with food, in the same place or in another, in great number, by night, and the fourth.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has taught that if a monk gathers in a large group and eats at a time other than the permitted occasion, it is a downfall. If a monk uses spells or medicine to render himself invisible and then seeks to gather in a large group, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk goes up into the sky and seeks food where the food-container is on the ground, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk is on the ground and seeks food where the food-container is in the sky, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk is outside the boundary and seeks food that is inside the boundary, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk is inside the boundary and seeks food that is outside the boundary, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gathers a large amount of improper food and seeks to receive it, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk gathers in a large group and seeks food without incurring a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is: when any one of the six permitted occasions has arisen."

"Venerable one, if a monk gathers in a large group and seeks things other than food — namely eatables, drinks, soft foods, and things to taste — what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if another person takes food from outside the boundary and brings it inside the boundary, and a monk then gathers in a large group and seeks it, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if food is taken from inside the boundary and brought elsewhere, and a monk then gathers in a large group and seeks it, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which several monks from different boundaries, each gathering separately, may eat without incurring a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is: if they gather in groups of three within three separate locations and eat, provided they do not complete a group of four."

"Venerable one, if while a monk is gathering in a large group and seeking food the night passes and he becomes a monk again, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, if while several nuns are gathering in a large group and seeking food the night passes and they become monks, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives what is inside the boundary as inside the boundary, gathers a large group, and eats, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"If one perceives what is inside the boundary as outside the boundary and eats, there is no fault."

"If one perceives what is outside the boundary as inside the boundary and eats, it is a transgression."

"If one perceives what is outside the boundary as outside the boundary and eats, there is no fault."

In brief:

One who has become insane, of disturbed mind, one who is ill, deaf, or simple-minded — and likewise a paṇḍaka and one who has gone away:

these are the nuns censured for gathering in large groups.

"Venerable one, if a monk is counted among the large group by an insane person, and then together with them gathers inside the boundary in a large group and seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"One of disturbed mind, one tormented by illness, one who is deaf, and one who is simple-minded — likewise in all those cases."

"Venerable one, if a monk, with food —"

"Venerable one, if a paṇḍaka counts among the large group and together with them gathers inside the boundary in a large group and seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Likewise in the case of a nun who has been expelled, one who has slain father or mother, one who has slain an arhat, one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who is staying as a thief, one who is not staying, one who is staying separately, one in whom a transgression has previously arisen, and one who was previously in schism — if any of these count among the large group and together gather inside the boundary in a large group and seek food, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk who has schismed the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides, or one who has relinquished the training count among the large group and together gather in a large group and seek food, what is the consequence?"

"In all those cases there is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk dwelling in another district counts among the large group and together with them gathers inside the boundary in a large group and seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk counts nuns, female trainees, female novices, and male novices among the large group and together with them gathers inside the boundary in a large group and seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk gathers in a large group and seeks food yet incurs no fault?"

"Upāli, there is. It is as follows: when food has become utterly finished in that very place, or when food has been sent back and forth between them."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a solitary place as crowded and then seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who has relinquished the training gathers in a large group and seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun gathers in a large group and seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, if female trainees, female novices, and male novices gather in a large group and seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

In brief:

The fourth topic, divine food, follows likewise — the continents, the gods, and the marks, food that is not food and its transgressions, the wicked ones, and nuns.

The venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that any monk who prepares and eats food at an improper time incurs a downfall. Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk seeks food at an improper time yet incurs no fault?"

"Upāli, there is. It is when one has consumed divine food."

"Venerable one, what is the nature of divine food?"

"Upāli, it is like the nature of butter."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving an improper time as an improper time, seeks food at that time, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"If one perceives an improper time as a proper time and seeks food at that time, what is the consequence?"

"No fault."

"If one perceives a proper time as an improper time and seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"If one perceives a proper time as a proper time and seeks food, what is the consequence?"

"No fault."

"If one perceives food as food and seeks to eat it, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"If one perceives food as not food and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"No fault."

"If one perceives what is not food as food and seeks to eat it, what is the consequence?"

"A transgression."

"If one perceives what is not food as not food and seeks to eat it, what is the consequence?"

"No fault."

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk prepares and eats food at an improper time yet incurs no fault?"

"Upāli, there is. It is when one eats in the three other continents or in the realm of the gods according to the proper time of Jambudvīpa."

"Venerable one, if a monk is seeking to prepare and eat food at an improper time and his sex changes so that he becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun is seeking to prepare and eat food at an improper time and her sex changes so that she becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk prepares and eats food at an improper time yet incurs no fault?"

"Upāli, there is."

Except for those edible preparations that are made along with food, all other eatables apart from these may be taken for medicinal purposes — not as food.

"Venerable one, can a monk incur a single moment's transgression that amounts to four downfalls?"

"Upāli, there is such a case: not giving, being improper, being set aside, and eating at an improper time."

"Venerable one, what the Blessed One taught as 'give bad food to the sick' — what are those? Ash, earth, bran, and urine."

"Venerable one, is it permissible for all of these to be taken at an improper time?"

"Except for bran, all the others are permissible at an improper time."

"Venerable one, if one who has been given a training seeks to prepare and eat food at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun seeks to prepare and eat food at an improper time, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"If a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a novice nun, or male novices seek to prepare and eat such food, what is the consequence?"

"A misdeed."

In brief:

One who has become mad, and one whose mind is disturbed, one who is sick, a hermaphrodite, a traveler, one eating at night, and a fourth time of eating, divine food, the other continents, and a nun.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that any monk who eats food that has been set aside incurs a downfall. If a monk who has gone mad eats food that was set aside, what is the consequence?"

"A misdeed."

"Likewise, one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one afflicted by a demon, a hermaphrodite, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to tīrthikas, one dwelling in a thieves' encampment, one dwelling in a separate residence, one for whom a prior offense has arisen, one involved in a prior dispute — and likewise monks dwelling in another district who eat what has been set aside: all these cases result in a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or who has taken sides in a dispute, or who has been given a training rule, seeks to eat food that has been set aside, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk who is seeking to eat food set aside undergoes a sex change and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun who is seeking to eat food set aside undergoes a sex change and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives food that has been set aside as having been set aside and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"A downfall."

"If he perceives food that has been set aside as not having been set aside and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"No offense."

"If he perceives food that has not been set aside as having been set aside and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"A misdeed."

"If he perceives food that has not been set aside as not having been set aside and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"No offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes medicines other than food and drink — such as things to be licked, things to be swallowed, ash, salt, lac, and the like — that have been set aside, what is the consequence?"

"A misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk eats bad food that has been set aside, what is the consequence?"

"A misdeed."

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk eats food that has been set aside without incurring an offense?"

"Upāli, there is: if he eats divine food, it becomes a misdeed."

"Venerable one, if a monk eats food set aside in the Eastern Continent of Videha, the Western Continent of Godānīya, or the Northern Continent of Uttarakuru, what is the consequence?"

"Upāli, if he makes use of and eats food that has exceeded its proper time according to the time of Jambudvīpa, it becomes a downfall. However, if he eats it at what counts as an improper time according to the time of those continents themselves, there is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk eats food set aside by a nun, what is the consequence?"

"No offense."

"Venerable one, if a nun eats food set aside by a monk, what is the consequence?"

"No offense."

"If a monk and a nun have both set aside food and a trainee nun eats it, there is no offense."

"Venerable one, if one who has received the training rules requests prepared food and edibles that have been set aside, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk requests food that has been set aside by a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk requests food that has been set aside by a trainee nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If male novices and female novices have set aside food and one eats it, there is no offense."

The Vinaya Text Proper, the Tenth Fascicle.

In summary:

From one who is mad, one receives; from drunk, two kinds and purposeless; By night and the fourth with the continents — conjured, not manifest, one goes.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that whatever food a monk takes into his mouth without it having been given to him — water and tooth-cleaning sticks excepted — constitutes a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk receives food from a madman, is it said to have been received?"

"Upāli, if he has the perception that it is being given away, it is said to have been received. If he does not have the perception that it is being given away, it is said not to have been received."

"One whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is delirious, and one who is drunk — the same is to be said of all these."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk who requests food or edibles without having received them commits no downfall?"

"Upāli, there is. When many people who are filled with contempt have completely abandoned their intent and rendered the food fit to be discarded, and one eats it — that is such a case."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk who requests food or edibles that have been received commits a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is. When he receives it with the perception that it belongs to someone else, and then eats it — that is such a case."

"Venerable one, if a monk, apart from food and edibles, requests other things that have not been received — medicine set aside, drinks, what is ground fine, what is smeared on, ash, salt, honey, buttermilk, and the like — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk requests inferior food without having received it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a drunk person pours food and edibles into a monk's alms-bowl, is it said to have been received?"

"Upāli, it has not been received properly. Have it received again afterwards."

"Venerable one, whether it is two monks or many, if one deputized person receives on their behalf, is it said to have been received?"

"Upāli, it is said to have been received."

"Venerable one, if a monk receives food without intending to want it, is it said to have been received?"

"Upāli, it is not. Why is that? Because there is no receiving on the part of a monk who does not wish it. Have him receive it again afterward."

"Venerable one, if a monk who has not received food and edibles requests them, and in the meantime his gender changes so that he becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun who has not received food and edibles requests them, and in the meantime her gender changes so that she becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk eats food he has not received, with the perception that he has not received it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he eats food he has not received, with the perception that he has received it, what is the consequence?"

"No offense."

"If he eats food he has received, with the perception that he has not received it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If he eats food he has received, with the perception that he has received it, what is the consequence?"

"No offense."

"Venerable one, may one eat without having received food in the Northern Continent of Uttarakuru, or may one not?"

"Upāli, one may eat."

"Venerable one, may one eat without having received food in the other continents?"

"Upāli, no."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes an emanation — one that does not count as a sentient being — to receive food on his behalf, is it considered received?"

"Upāli, no. He must receive it again afterwards."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while no one suitable is present, is nonetheless permitted to receive food and does so, is it considered received?"

"It is considered received, but it becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said, 'Receive food from those dwelling in other destinies,' from what sort of beings dwelling in other destinies should one receive food?"

"Upāli, from those in whom there is the appearance of offering and who also have the perception of giving completely — from such beings one should receive food and eat it."

"Venerable one, if one who has been given a training precept eats without having received food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun eats without having received food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a female novice in training eats without having received food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a female novice or a male novice eats without having received food, what is the consequence?"

"No offense."

In brief:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
by having another say it, by transmission from one to another, by the mad, the mentally disturbed, the sick,
the deaf, the dull-witted, one who is asleep,
one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, and one dwelling in another destiny — these are the last.

Then the venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has further said, 'If a monk, for his own sake, takes alms-food obtained from another clan without having begged it properly for himself, and then eats it, it becomes a downfall.' Venerable one, if a monk takes alms-food by sending a messenger to have it brought and then eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Likewise, if it is brought through a letter, through a gesture, through having another say it, or through being passed along from one to another and then eaten — in all such cases it becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes alms-food from a mad person and then eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Likewise, from one whose mind is disturbed, from one tormented by illness, from one who is dull-witted, from one who is mute, from one who is deaf, from one who is asleep, from one who is delirious, from one who is intoxicated, from one who is in meditative absorption, and from one dwelling in another destiny — if one takes alms-food from any of these and eats it, it becomes a wrongdoing."

In brief:

By voice, by body, by solitude,
for another's sake, when improper, at night, as the fourth for attendance, and alms-food — seven — it is the same.
From householders and the like,
from those given the training precept, and from nuns.

"Venerable one, if a monk who is a noble one requests alms-food in the noble language, and the householder does not respond in the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If a noble one requests alms-food in a frontier language, and the householder does not respond in the frontier language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If a frontier person requests alms-food in a frontier language, and the householder does not respond in the frontier language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If a frontier person requests alms-food in the noble language, and the householder does not respond in the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk receives alms-food using a gesture of the body and then eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a secluded place as not secluded, takes alms-food there, and then eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes alms-food on another's behalf and then eats it himself, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes and eats meat or milk that is not permissible, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk receives alms-food and eats it, and in the meantime undergoes a change of sex and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is to be confessed individually."

"Venerable one, if a nun receives alms-food and eats it, and in the meantime undergoes a change of sex and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human being as a human being, receives alms-food from that person, and then eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a human being as not a human being and receives food from that person, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one perceives a non-human as a human being and receives food from that being and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one perceives a non-human as a non-human and receives food from that being and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives an almsgiver as an almsgiver, receives alms-food from that person, and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives an almsgiver as not an almsgiver, receives food, and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one perceives one who is not an almsgiver as an almsgiver, receives food, and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If one perceives one who is not an almsgiver as not an almsgiver, receives food, and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if food is received when it is offered with the hand and eaten when it is offered with the hand, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If food is received when it is offered with the hand and eaten when offered without the hand, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If food is received when offered without the hand and eaten when offered with the hand, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If food is received when offered without the hand and eaten when offered without the hand, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk receives alms-food from a relative and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk receives and eats not alms-food but other things such as prepared food, beverages, soft foods, or things to be licked, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if alms-food is received before full ordination and eaten before full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If it is received before full ordination and eaten at the moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If it is received before full ordination and eaten after full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If it is received at the moment of full ordination and eaten at the moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If it is received at the moment of full ordination and eaten after full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If it is received after full ordination and eaten after full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If it is received after full ordination and eaten before full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk directs a layperson to seek alms-food and then eats it himself, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, all of the following cases are wrongdoings: eating food received from a hermaphrodite; from one who has disrobed a nun by force; from one who has killed his father; from one who has killed his mother; from one who has killed an arhat; from one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata; from one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists; from one who lives as a thief; from one who is dwelling alone; from one who is not a resident; from one in whom a prior offense has arisen; from one who was previously involved in a dispute; from one who has taken a side in a dispute; from one who has surrendered the training; and from food received from a fully ordained nun, a probationer nun, a novice nun, or male novices — all such cases are wrongdoings.

"Venerable one, if one who has surrendered the training receives alms-food and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun receives alms-food and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is to be confessed."

"Venerable one, if a probationer nun, a novice nun, or a male novice receives alms-food and eats it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

The detailed explanation of the transgression of drinking water containing living creatures should be set forth in full.

In brief:

Secluded places, and spells of the sky,
The night, the fourth case, hermaphrodites,
Female hermaphrodites, attendants,
Young women, and wandering ascetics.

This was asked of the Blessed One, the Buddha, by the Venerable Upāli.

"Venerable one, if the Blessed One has declared that a monk who forcibly enters a village containing a dangerous woman while seeking alms commits a transgression, then if a monk, while seeking alms, perceives a deserted village containing a dangerous woman as deserted and forcibly enters it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking alms, forcibly enters a village containing a dangerous woman through the sky, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking alms, renders himself invisible by means of a mantra or a medicine and enters a village containing a dangerous woman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while forcibly entering a village containing a dangerous woman, undergoes a change of sex and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun, while forcibly entering a village containing a dangerous woman, undergoes a change of sex and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk forcibly enters a village perceiving a human being as a human being, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a human being as not a human being and forcibly enters, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If he perceives a non-human being as a human being and forcibly enters, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If he perceives a non-human being as a non-human being and forcibly enters, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a dangerous woman as a dangerous woman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a dangerous woman as not a dangerous woman, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offence."

"If he perceives one who is not a dangerous woman as a dangerous woman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If he perceives one who is not a dangerous woman as not a dangerous woman, there is no offence."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking alms, forcibly enters a hermaphrodite's village that contains a dangerous woman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk forcibly enters together with a hermaphrodite, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk forcibly enters a village containing a dangerous woman seeking refuge, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if monks forcibly approach a young bride, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while seeking alms, enters and forcibly stays in the vicinity of a village containing a dangerous woman to the extent of merely hearing distance, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

In brief:

The mad, the mentally disturbed,
The deaf, the dull-witted, the drowsy,
Those in pain, the intoxicated,
Those in absorption, and travelers to other places — these are the final cases.

"Venerable one, if a monk forcibly enters a village of the mad, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, forcibly sitting together with the mentally disturbed, those afflicted by illness, the dull-witted, the mute, the deaf, the drowsy, those in pain, the intoxicated, those in meditative absorption, and those dwelling elsewhere — all of these are wrongdoings.

"Venerable one, if one who has been given the training, while seeking alms, forcibly enters a village containing a dangerous woman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun, while seeking alms, forcibly enters a village containing a dangerous woman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

As set forth in the chapter on a probationer nun, a novice nun, or a male novice sitting in concealment in a place containing a dangerous woman, the case of sitting concealed in a place containing a dangerous woman is also to be stated.

In brief:

Messages, letters, hand-signals, and —

"— another's word, and passing from one to another, a madman, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is afflicted, a fool, one who is asleep, one who is intoxicated with alcohol, one who is inebriated, one who has entered meditative absorption, one who has gone elsewhere — these are the final cases."

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk gives food and drink with his own hand to one who is naked — whether a naked man or naked woman, a male wanderer or female wanderer — it is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk, through a messenger, gives food and drink with his own hand to one who is naked — whether a naked man or naked woman, a male wanderer or female wanderer — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he gives it likewise through a written message, a hand-signal, another's word, or passing it from one to another, what is the consequence in each case?"

"All of these are transgressions."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives food and drink with his own hand to a madman who is naked — whether a naked man or naked woman, a male wanderer or female wanderer — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, a fool, a mute, one who is afflicted, one who is asleep, one who is intoxicated with alcohol, one who is inebriated, one who has entered meditative absorption, and one who dwells elsewhere — if a monk gives food and drink, whether to a naked man or naked woman, a male wanderer or female wanderer, among all such persons, what is the consequence in each case?"

"All of these are transgressions."

In brief:

Improper food and the naked, vessels and characteristics, the seventh,
the fourth, mantras (Skt. mantra), and through another — another's non-Buddhist renunciant.

"Venerable one, if a monk gives food and drink to one who is naked or to a wanderer, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives to such a person, apart from food, other things to eat or drink, to taste, or to lick and so forth, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives food and drink with his own hand to ascetics (Skt. śramaṇa) and brahmins other than the naked and the wanderers, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk gives food and drink to one who is naked or a wanderer and yet incurs no fault?"

"Upāli, there are. These are: placing the vessel on the ground and pouring into it before giving; wishing to be free from an evil view held by that person; and giving to a relative."

"Venerable one, if a monk is in the act of giving food and drink with his own hand to one who is naked or a wanderer, and in the course of that act his status changes and he becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun is in the act of giving food and drink with her own hand to one who is naked or a wanderer, and in the course of that act her status changes and she becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who has not yet received full ordination dedicates food and drink with her own hand to one who is naked or a wanderer, and then gives it before receiving full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one dedicates it before full ordination and gives it at the very moment of receiving full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one dedicates it before full ordination and gives it after having received full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one dedicates it at the very moment of receiving full ordination and gives it at that same moment, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one dedicates it at the very moment of receiving full ordination and gives it after having received full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one who has fully received ordination dedicates it and gives it after having fully received ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one who has fully received ordination dedicates it and gives it before full ordination has been received, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a human as human, gives food and drink to one who is naked or a wanderer, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives that human as not human, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a non-human as human, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a non-human as non-human, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes himself invisible by means of a mantra or medicine, and then gives food and drink to one who is naked or a wanderer, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives food and drink to one who is naked or a wanderer, receiving it from another, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives food and drink to one who is naked or a wanderer on behalf of another, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives food and drink to one who is naked or a wanderer who is a hermaphrodite, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives food and drink to one who is naked or a wanderer who is a female hermaphrodite, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who has given the precepts gives food and drink to one who is naked or a wanderer, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun gives food and drink from her own hand to one who is naked or a wanderer, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a female probationer, a novice nun, or a male novice gives food and drink from their own hand to one who is naked or a wanderer, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

In brief:

The mad one and the mentally disturbed, the deaf, the wanderers, and their kinds,
the king who holds the seventh view, the fourth ones, and the hermaphrodites.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that whatever monk goes to watch a battle array incurs a downfall. If a monk goes to watch a battle array where there are mad combatants, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if those who are mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, dull-witted, mute, or deaf go to watch a battle array in the same way, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk goes to watch a battle array that is stationed in another region, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if, while a monk is going to watch a battle array, he undergoes a change of marks and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if, while a nun is going to watch a battle array, she undergoes a change of marks and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk, when looking at a battle array, goes only as far as the surrounding area, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may go to watch a battle array without incurring an offense?"

"Upāli, there is: namely, when a monk has been summoned by a royal messenger."

"Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination goes there in body, and while not yet fully ordained looks on, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one who has not received full ordination goes there and looks on at the time of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one who has not received full ordination goes there and looks on after full ordination has been received, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one who is at the time of receiving full ordination goes there and looks on at the time of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one who is at the time of receiving full ordination goes there and looks on after full ordination has been received, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one who has fully received ordination goes there and looks on while fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one who has fully received ordination goes there and looks on before full ordination has been received, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human battle array as a human battle array and goes to watch it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one perceives a human battle array as a non-human battle array, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a non-human battle array as a human battle array, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a non-human battle array as a non-human battle array, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk goes to watch a battle array of neither-male-nor-female beings, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who has been given a training rule goes to watch a battle array, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun goes to watch a battle array, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if female probationers, female novices, and male novices go to watch a battle array, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

As for watching a battle array — in the same way as the chapter on the training rules, all the cases of staying no more than two nights should be stated in full.

In brief:

By message, by letter, by gesture, by having another say it, or relayed from one to the next;
one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, one who is deaf, one who is foolish, one who is asleep,
one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated,
one who has entered meditative absorption — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that whatever monk strikes a monk incurs a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk sends a strike to a monk by message, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if one causes a strike to be delivered by letter, by gesture, by having another say it, or relayed from one to the next — all of these are transgressions."

"Venerable one, if a monk strikes a monk who is insane, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if one strikes a monk whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or — in the same manner — a monk who abides elsewhere in another destiny: all of these are transgressions."

In brief:

By mantra, by medicine, by another's means,
the fourth and seventh done by another, householders and those like them, by night likewise, and a fully ordained nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk renders himself invisible by means of a mantra or medicine and then strikes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, is there a case where one strikes a monk and yet the fault does not become a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is: if one strikes thinking it to be play, or if one strikes thinking it to be accidental."

"Venerable one, if a monk strikes a monk on behalf of another, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes another to be struck, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human as a human and strikes, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one perceives a human as a non-human, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a non-human as a human, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a non-human as a non-human, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who is fully ordained as fully ordained and strikes, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one perceives one who is fully ordained as not fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives one who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one prepares to strike before full ordination has been received and then strikes before full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one prepares to strike before full ordination and then strikes at the moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one prepares to strike before full ordination and then strikes after full ordination has been received, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one prepares to strike at the moment of full ordination and then strikes at the moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one prepares to strike at the moment of full ordination and then strikes after full ordination has been received, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one prepares to strike after full ordination has been received and then strikes after full ordination has been received, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one prepares to strike after full ordination has been received and then strikes before full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk strikes a layman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Similarly, if one strikes a woman, a eunuch, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has maliciously shed the blood of a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who dwells as a thief, one who does not dwell in the community, one who dwells separately, one against whom an earlier offense has arisen, or one with whom there has been an earlier dispute — in all such cases it is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk strikes one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has sided with the schism, or one who has been given a formal act of instruction — what is the consequence in all such cases?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable ones, if a monk is striking another monk and that other's sex changes so that he becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a nun is striking another nun and that other's sex changes so that she becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk strikes a nun, a probationer, a female novice, or a male novice, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a nun strikes a monk, a probationer, a female novice, or a male novice, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if one who has been given a formal act of instruction strikes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable ones, if a nun strikes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If she strikes a probationer, a female novice, or a male novice, it is a transgression."

Just as the chapter on striking has been set forth, so too the chapter on threatening to strike is to be stated in the same way.

In brief:

By message, letter, or gesture, by having another say it, or by passing word from one to another — if one is mad, mentally disturbed, or afflicted by illness, or is mute, deaf, or asleep, or is in delirium, drunk, in meditative absorption, or gone elsewhere — these are the last cases.

The venerable Upāli asked the buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that whichever monk confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense is guilty of a downfall. If a monk confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense by means of a messenger, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if such a charge is conveyed by letter, by gesture, by having another say it, or by passing it from one to another — in all such cases it is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense by conveying it through a madman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if conveyed through one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is simple-minded, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one in delirium, one who is drunk, one in meditative absorption, or one who has gone to dwell elsewhere — in all such cases it is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk confronts a monk who is mad with a charge of a grave offense, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, monks who are mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, simple-minded, mute, deaf, asleep, delirious, drunk, in meditative absorption, or dwelling elsewhere — if a monk confronts such monks with a charge of a grave offense, in all such cases it is a transgression."

In brief:

By voice, by body, by solitude,
by the fourth and seventh offense categories, against laymen and the rest — such is the confronting with charges, and so too for nuns.

"Venerable ones, if a monk, having been questioned, confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense in the noble language, and that monk does not acknowledge it in the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If someone from the borderlands confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense in the borderlands language, and that monk does not acknowledge it in the borderlands language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If someone from the borderlands confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense in the borderlands language—"

"—and that monk does not acknowledge it in the borderlands language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If someone from the borderlands confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense in the noble language, and that monk does not acknowledge it in the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk, having been questioned, confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense by means of a physical gesture, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, is there a case in which a monk confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense, and yet it does not constitute an offense?"

"Upāli, there is. It is when, on account of that charge, a monk's livelihood is disrupted, his life as a renunciant is disrupted, or his practice of the holy life is disrupted."

"Venerable ones, is there a case in which a monk confronts a monk with a charge, and yet it does not constitute a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is. It is when he confronts him with a charge of an offense other than a grave offense."

"Venerable ones, if a monk confronts a monk with a charge of a grave offense, and then a change of status occurs so that the monk becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a nun confronts a nun with a charge of a grave offense, and then a change of status occurs so that the nun becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk perceives a grave offense as a grave offense and confronts the monk with a charge accordingly, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives a grave offense as not a grave offense and confronts him with a charge, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives something that is not a grave offense as not a grave offense and confronts him with a charge, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"If he perceives something that is not a grave offense as a grave offense and confronts him with a charge, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained and confronts him with a charge of a grave offense, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained and confronts the monk with a charge of a grave offense, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a person who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained and confronts him with a charge, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a person who is not fully ordained as fully ordained and confronts him with a charge, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if, at the time of full ordination, one sees a grave offense by a monk and then confronts him with a charge when he is not yet fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sees it at a time when he is not yet fully ordained and confronts him with a charge when the ordination is in progress, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sees it at a time when he is not yet fully ordained and confronts him with a charge when he is fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sees it when the ordination is in progress and confronts him with a charge while the ordination is in progress, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sees it when the ordination is in progress and confronts him with a charge after ordination is complete, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sees it at the time of full ordination and confronts him with a charge at the time of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one sees it at the time of full ordination and confronts him with a charge when he is not yet fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk confronts a layman with a charge of a grave offense, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

Likewise, if one confronts any of the following with a charge of a grave offense — a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, a suspended nun, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a robber who has remained in the order, one who has not remained in the order, one who dwells apart, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to non-Buddhist adherents, one who previously caused a schism, or one against whom a prior offense has arisen — in all such cases it constitutes a transgression.

"Venerable ones, if a monk confronts with a charge of a grave offense those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, those who have sided with them, or those to whom a rule of training has been administered, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable ones, if a monk confronts a layperson with a charge of a grave monastic offense, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if he confronts any of them — from a female trainee down to one against whom a prior offense has arisen — in all such cases it is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk confronts those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, those who have sided with them, or those to whom a rule of training has been administered with a charge of a grave monastic offense, what is the consequence?"

"In every case it is a downfall."

"Venerable ones, if a monk speaks of a grave monastic offense to a layperson, does that count as having formally confronted him with it?"

"Upāli, it does not."

"Likewise, if he speaks of it to any of them — from a female trainee down to one to whom a rule of training has been administered — does that count as having formally confronted them?"

"Upāli, it does not."

"Venerable ones, if a monk confronts a fully ordained nun, a female trainee, a female novice, or a male novice with a charge of a grave monastic offense, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a fully ordained nun confronts a monk, a female trainee, a female novice, or a male novice with a charge of a grave monastic offense, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if one to whom a rule of training has been administered confronts another with a charge of a grave monastic offense, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable ones, if a fully ordained nun confronts another fully ordained nun with a charge of a grave monastic offense, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"And if she confronts a female trainee, a female novice, or a male novice with such a charge, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

This is the noble Vinaya, the eleventh fascicle.

In summary:

By message, by letter, by gesture,
through another's words, or relayed from one to the next,
through madness, mental disturbance, illness, deafness, dullness, sleep,
incoherence, intoxication, and one in meditative absorption going elsewhere — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that if a monk says to another monk, intending to have him separated from his food, 'Venerable, whether you speak with me or keep my company, things will not go well for you — you should leave,' and thereby causes that monk to be separated from his food even for a single moment, it becomes a downfall. Now, venerable one, if a monk causes another monk to be separated from his food by a personal message, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if it is done by a written letter, by a gesture, through another's words, or relayed from one to the next and he is thereby separated from his food, in all such cases it is a transgression."

"Venerable ones, if a monk causes a mad monk to be separated from his food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if he causes any of the following to be separated from their food — one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is dull-witted, one who is asleep, one who is incoherent, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or a monk who is residing elsewhere — in all such cases it is a transgression."

In summary:

By voice, by body, in private,
by one using another's name, laypersons and so forth — the fourth and seventh concern food.

"Venerable ones, if a noble monk separates another monk from food using the noble language, and that monk does not understand the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk separates another from food using a regional border language, and that monk does not understand the regional border language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one from the border regions separates another from food using a border language, and that monk does not understand the border language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one from the border regions separates another from food using the noble language, and that monk does not understand the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk separates another monk from food using a physical gesture as the indicator, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk perceives a secluded place as not secluded and separates another from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk instructs another to separate someone else from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk separates another from food on behalf of a third party, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk is in the process of separating another monk from food, and in the course of that act the monk changes gender and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble nun is in the process of separating another nun from food, and in the course of that act the nun changes gender and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk separates a layman from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

Likewise, in all the following cases — separating a laywoman from food, separating an intersex person from food, separating one who has been expelled from the nuns' order, separating one who has killed a father, one who has killed a mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one who has taken up a life of theft, one who is not residing in the community, one who is residing separately, one against whom an offence was previously committed, and one with whom a dispute previously arose — in all such cases the consequence is a transgression.

"If a noble monk separates from food one who has schismed the Saṅgha, one who has sided with a schism, or one who has given training rules, what is the consequence?"

"In every case it is a downfall."

"If a noble monk perceives a human being as a human being and separates that person from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a monk perceives a human being as not a human being and separates that person from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk perceives a non-human being as not a human being and separates that being from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk perceives a non-human being as a human being and separates that being from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk perceives one who is fully ordained as fully ordained and separates that person from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a monk perceives one who is fully ordained as not fully ordained and separates that person from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained and separates that person from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk perceives one who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained and separates that person from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Noble one, if a monk who is not yet fully ordained invites a guest, and that guest is also not yet fully ordained at the time of being separated from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk who is not yet fully ordained invites a guest, and that guest has since received full ordination at the time of being separated from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk who is not yet fully ordained invites a guest, and that guest is in the very act of receiving full ordination at the time of being separated from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk who is in the very act of receiving full ordination invites a guest, and that guest is also in the very act of receiving full ordination at the time of being separated from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk who is in the very act of receiving full ordination invites a guest, and that guest has already received full ordination at the time of being separated from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk who is fully ordained invites a guest, and that guest is also fully ordained at the time of being separated from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a monk who is fully ordained invites a guest, and that guest is not yet fully ordained at the time of being separated from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Noble one, are there cases in which a monk separates another monk from food and yet incurs no offence or downfall?"

"Upāli, there are. It is the case of one who is separated from food on the prescription of a physician."

"Noble one, are there cases in which a monk is separated from food and yet it does not constitute a downfall?"

"Upāli, there are. If, apart from food proper, one is separated from other kinds of provisions — namely things to be eaten, things to be drunk, things to be tasted, things to be licked, and the like — the consequence is a transgression, not a downfall."

"If a noble monk separates a nun, a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble nun separates a monk, a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk, applying a precept, separates a fully ordained monk from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a noble nun separates a fully ordained nun from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices separate a fully ordained monk, a fully ordained nun, a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices from food, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

In summary:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
by having another convey it, from one to another, whether one has become mad, is mentally disturbed, is ill, is disabled, or is traveling.

Venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, if the Blessed One has declared that whichever monk, without having requested permission, causes another to enter or exit a fire on his own behalf, incurs a downfall — if a monk causes another to enter or exit by means of a messenger, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if he causes another to enter or exit a fire by means of a letter, by gesture, by having another convey it, or by passing it from one to another, all such cases are transgressions."

"If a noble monk causes a madman to enter or exit a fire, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if he causes someone mentally disturbed, someone tormented by illness, a simpleton, a mute, a disabled person, or one who has gone to dwell in another place to enter or exit — all such cases are transgressions."

In summary:

By voice, by body, by a secluded place, and in the same manner one reveals another's marks to others — whether to householders and the like:
the fourth and seventh rules are the same.

"If a noble monk causes someone to enter or exit using the noble language, and that monk does not know the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble one causes someone to enter or exit using a border language, and that monk does not know the border language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a border person causes someone to enter or exit using a border language, and that monk does not know the border language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a border person causes someone to enter or exit using the noble language, and that monk does not know the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk causes someone to enter or exit by means of a physical gesture, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk, perceiving a place of solitude as not being solitary, causes someone to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk causes another person to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a noble monk causes someone to enter or exit on behalf of another person, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If, while a noble monk is causing someone to enter or exit, that person's gender changes and he becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If, while a noble nun is causing someone to enter or exit, that person's gender changes and she becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a noble monk causes a householder who is visibly present to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Likewise, if he causes a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one who has remained among thieves, one who has previously caused strife, or one against whom a previous offense has arisen, to enter or exit — in all such cases it is a downfall."

"If a noble monk causes those who have schismatized the Saṅgha, those who have sided with schismatics, or those upon whom a disciplinary measure has been imposed to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"In all such cases it is a downfall."

"If a noble monk, perceiving a human being as a human being, causes that person to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives a human being as not a human being and causes that person to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a non-human being as a human being and causes that person to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a non-human being as a non-human being and causes that person to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk, when a person has not yet received full ordination, arranges for a candidate who has not yet received full ordination, and causes that person to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he arranges for a candidate who has not yet received full ordination, and causes someone who is in the process of receiving full ordination to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he arranges for a candidate who has not yet received full ordination, and causes someone who has fully received ordination to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he arranges for someone who is in the process of receiving full ordination, and causes someone who is in the process of receiving full ordination to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he arranges for someone who is in the process of receiving full ordination, and causes someone who has fully received ordination to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he arranges for someone who has fully received ordination, and causes someone who has fully received ordination to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he arranges for someone who has fully received ordination, and causes someone who has not yet received full ordination to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble monk causes someone to enter or exit by means of giving a training precept, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a noble monk causes this through a fully ordained nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If probationary nuns, novice nuns, or male novices cause someone to enter or exit, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

In brief:

By message, by letter, by gesture, through another's words, or passed along from one to the next,
through a madman, one mentally disturbed, one who is ill, one who is mute, one who is an idiot, one who is asleep, one who is about to sneeze, one who is intoxicated, and one who has entered meditative absorption — these are the last cases.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One taught that if a monk, having received a gift of faith for a deed in conformity with the Dharma of the Saṅgha, thereafter performs a deed of entanglement with respect to that same matter, and then says, 'Monk, I will not give you the gift of faith — relinquish it!' — he incurs a downfall." The venerable one then asked: "If a monk, having received a gift of faith for a deed in conformity with the Dharma of the Saṅgha, thereafter performs a deed of entanglement through a message, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if he performs a deed of entanglement through a letter, through a gesture, through another's words, or by passing it along from one to the next, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk, having received a gift of faith for a deed in conformity with the Dharma of the Saṅgha, thereafter performs a deed of entanglement with respect to a madman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if the deed of entanglement is performed with respect to one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is mute, one who is an idiot, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one about to sneeze, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one who is dwelling elsewhere — in all such cases it is a transgression."

In brief:

By voice, by body, by solitude, likewise, by one person indicating another's mark, with respect to householders and others of that kind — the fourth and seventh cases are likewise so.

"If a noble monk performs a deed of entanglement with a monk using the refined language of the noble ones, and that monk does not understand the refined language of the noble ones, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a noble one performs a deed of entanglement with a monk using the language of the borderlands, and that monk does not understand the language of the borderlands, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a borderlander performs a deed of entanglement with a monk using the language of the borderlands, and that monk does not understand the language of the borderlands, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a borderlander performs a deed of entanglement with a monk using the refined language of the noble ones, and that monk does not understand the refined language of the noble ones, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk performs a deed of entanglement by means of a bodily sign, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk performs a deed of entanglement perceiving a secluded place as non-secluded, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk instructs another to perform a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk performs a deed of entanglement on behalf of another, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk, while performing a deed of entanglement, changes his status and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a nun, while performing a deed of entanglement, changes her status and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk performs a deed of entanglement with a layman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

Likewise, if a deed of entanglement is performed with a hermaphrodite, with a paṇḍaka, with an expelled nun, with one who has killed his father, with one who has killed his mother, with one who has killed an arhat, with one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, with a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), with one who has gone over to the non-Buddhist adherents, with one who is dwelling as a thief, with one who is not dwelling in proper standing, with one who is dwelling apart, with one against whom a prior offence has arisen, or with one involved in a prior dispute — in all such cases it becomes a transgression.

"If a monk performs a deed of entanglement with one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, with one who has sided with that schism, or with one who has been given a training — what is the consequence?"

"In every case it becomes a downfall."

"If a monk perceives a Dharma-conformant act as a Dharma-conformant act and, granting consent, performs a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a monk perceives a Dharma-conformant act as one that is not Dharma-conformant and performs a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk perceives a non-Dharma-conformant act as a Dharma-conformant act and performs a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk perceives a non-Dharma-conformant act as a non-Dharma-conformant act and performs a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk perceives one who has received full ordination as one who has received full ordination and performs a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a monk perceives one who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination and performs a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk perceives one who has not received full ordination as one who has received full ordination and performs a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk perceives one who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination and performs a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If consent is given during the period before full ordination and a deed of entanglement is performed during that same pre-ordination period, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If consent is given during the period before full ordination and a deed of entanglement is performed at the very moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If consent is given during the period before full ordination and a deed of entanglement is performed after full ordination has been received, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If consent is given at the very moment of full ordination and a deed of entanglement is performed at that same moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If consent is given at the very moment of full ordination and a deed of entanglement is performed after full ordination has been completed, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If consent is given after full ordination has been completed and a deed of entanglement is performed by one who has completed full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If consent is given at the time of full ordination and a deed of entanglement is performed in the pre-ordination period, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a monk grants consent to a Dharma-conformant act of the Saṅgha and then performs a deed of entanglement with a nun, a probationer nun (śikṣamāṇā), a female novice, or male novices, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a nun performs a deed of entanglement with a monk, a probationer nun, a female novice, or male novices, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one who has been given a training grants consent to a Dharma-conformant act of the Saṅgha and performs a deed of entanglement, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a monk performs a deed of entanglement apart from having granted consent to a Dharma-conformant act of the Saṅgha, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"For a nun, a probationer nun, a female novice, and male novices, it becomes a transgression."

In brief:

One who has become mad, or whose mind is disturbed, one who is sick, or one who walks while casting a spell, at the middle watch of the night and at the fourth watch, likewise an emanation, a paṇḍaka, one who is veiled, one who is surrounded, and a nun —

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that if a monk sleeps in the same dwelling together with an unordained person for more than two nights, it becomes a downfall. Venerable One, if a monk sleeps together with a mad person in a dwelling for two nights, and then on the third night sleeps together with one who is in their natural state of mind, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable One, if a monk sleeps for two nights with one who is in their natural state of mind, and then on the third night sleeps together with a mad person, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if he sleeps together with one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, a deaf person, a mute, or one who dwells in another place of existence — all of these become transgressions."

"Venerable One, if a monk, having made himself invisible through a spell or medicine, sleeps in the same dwelling together with an unordained person for more than two nights, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable One, if a monk sleeps in the open sky together with an unordained person for more than two nights, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable One, if a monk sleeps with an unordained person for two nights in the same dwelling, and then on the third night sleeps together with a woman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a monk perceives an unordained person as unordained and sleeps with that person for more than two nights, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives an unordained person as fully ordained and sleeps with that person, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"If he perceives a fully ordained person as unordained and sleeps with that person, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained and sleeps with that person, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk perceives a human as human and sleeps for more than two nights with that person, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives a human as a non-human and sleeps with that being, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a non-human as human and sleeps with that being, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a non-human as a non-human and sleeps with that being, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable One, if a monk is sleeping with an unordained person for more than two nights and during that time changes status by receiving full ordination as a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a nun is sleeping with an unordained person for more than two nights and during that time changes status by receiving full ordination as a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a monk sleeps together with an emanation for more than two nights in the same dwelling, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable One, if a monk sleeps with an unordained person for two nights, and then on the third night sleeps together with a paṇḍaka, what is the consequence?"

"It becomes both a downfall and a transgression."

"Venerable One, is there any case in which a monk might sleep in the same dwelling together with an unordained person without incurring an offense?"

"Upāli, there is. If it is a place where every side is uncovered, or surrounded by a fence, or half-surrounded, or not surrounded at all, or unenclosed, or half-unenclosed — if one sleeps in such a place, there is no offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk sleeps with an unordained person for more than two nights in a mountain cave, a hollow tree, or a dense thicket, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable One, if one who has been given a training rule sleeps together with an unordained person for more than two nights, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a fully ordained nun sleeps together with an unordained person in the same dwelling for more than two nights, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression. For a female probationer, a novice nun, or male novices, it is a wrongdoing. The case of the monk Ariṣṭa, who was silenced three times and then declared to be in the remainder of the Saṅgha's judgment, applies here as well."

In brief:

By message, letter, gesture,

Or through another, from one to the next —

One who has become mad or mentally disturbed,

One who is ill or deaf — these are the categories.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, if the Blessed One has declared that a monk who, while seeking to speak with a person who speaks in such a way and has not been followed in the Dharma, who has not abandoned the view of that wrongdoing, speaks with him, speaks with him repeatedly, seeks food from him, or sleeps together with him in the same dwelling — it becomes a transgression. Venerable One, if a monk who is seeking to speak with such a person as one who speaks in that way speaks by sending a message, or speaks repeatedly, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, sending a letter, using a gesture, having another convey the message, or passing it along from one to the next — all of these become wrongdoings."

"Venerable One, if a monk speaks with, speaks repeatedly with, seeks food from, or sleeps together in the same dwelling with a monk who is mad and has not been followed in the Dharma, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is simple-minded, or a monk who resides elsewhere and has not been followed in the Dharma — if one speaks with such a person, speaks repeatedly, eats with them, or sleeps together in the same dwelling, all of it becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk, while seeking to speak with a person who speaks in that way and has not been followed in the Dharma, renders himself invisible by means of a mantra or a medicine, and then speaks with that person, speaks repeatedly, seeks food, or sleeps together with that person in the same dwelling, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

In brief:

Mantra, utterances of the sky,

Body, seclusion, and eating —

The seventh and the fourth are likewise —

And so too with the female and the neuter.

"Venerable One, if a monk, while seeking to speak with a person who speaks in that way and has not been followed in the Dharma, renders himself invisible by means of a mantra or a medicine, and then speaks with that person, speaks repeatedly, seeks food, and sleeps together with that person in the same dwelling, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk, while seeking to speak with such a person, they both go up into the sky and sleep there, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a noble one who is a monk addresses such a person who speaks in that way using the noble language, and that person does not respond in the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a noble one addresses that person who speaks in that way and has not been followed in the Dharma using a border language, and that person does not respond in a border language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if one who speaks a border language addresses such a person who speaks in that way using a border language, and that person does not respond in a border language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if one who speaks a border language addresses such a person who speaks in that way using the noble language, and that person does not respond in the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk, while seeking to speak with such a person, makes himself understood through bodily signs, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as not secluded, speaks with or sleeps near such a person who speaks in that way, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk, while seeking to speak with a person who speaks in that way, shares a meal together with that person, and beyond that meal also shares other provisions —" drinks, lickables, and tastables, and the like — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk, seeking to speak with a person who speaks in that way while still not yet fully ordained, speaks to that person while both are not yet fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If the monk seeks that person out while not yet fully ordained, and speaks to them at the moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If the monk seeks that person out while not yet fully ordained, and speaks to them after full ordination has been completed, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If the monk seeks that person out at the moment of full ordination and speaks to them at the moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If the monk seeks that person out at the moment of full ordination and speaks to them after full ordination has been completed, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If the monk seeks that person out after full ordination has been completed and speaks to them after full ordination has been completed, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If the monk seeks that person out after full ordination has been completed and speaks to them while not yet fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk speaks to a person who speaks in that way, perceiving a fully ordained person as fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If the monk speaks to a fully ordained person, perceiving that person as not fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If the monk speaks to a person who is not fully ordained, perceiving that person as fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If the monk speaks to a person who is not fully ordained, perceiving that person as not fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk, while seeking to speak with a person who speaks in that way, speaks to one who has not been consented to, perceiving that person as not consented to, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If the monk speaks to one who has not been consented to, perceiving that person as consented to, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"If the monk speaks to one who has been consented to, perceiving that person as not consented to, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"If the monk speaks to one who has been consented to, perceiving that person as consented to, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk speaks with a person who speaks in that way and in the course of speaking that person changes sex and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a nun, while seeking to speak with a nun who speaks in that way, speaks with that nun and in the course of speaking that person changes sex and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk, while seeking to speak with a person who speaks in that way, speaks with a pandaka, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Likewise, if the monk speaks with a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who abides as a thief, one who does not abide in good standing, one who abides in a separate station, one who has previously caused a schism, or persons against whom a prior offense has arisen — in all such cases it is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk, while seeking to speak in that way with such a person, speaks with one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides, or one to whom a training has been administered, what is the consequence?"

"In all cases it is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a monk speaks with a person who speaks in that way while that person is asleep, delirious, or intoxicated, and has not conformed to the Dharma, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a monk speaks with a nun who speaks in that way, a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if one to whom a training has been administered, while seeking to speak with a person who speaks in that way and has not conformed to the Dharma, speaks with that person, speaks constantly with that person, seeks food together with that person, or sleeps near that person, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a nun, while seeking to speak with a nun who speaks in that way, speaks with that nun, speaks constantly with her, or sleeps together with her in the same dwelling, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, a nun and —"

"Venerable One, if one speaks with a novice monk who speaks in that way and has not conformed to the Dharma, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"With a probationer nun, a novice nun, and novice monks — it is a downfall. Just as with a person who speaks in that way, one must also declare that such a person has been shown to be unfit as a renunciant. When asked what the difference is, one must also explain the matter of service and veneration apart from work and provisions."

In brief:

The unfit, the marks, and so forth — the fourth and the seventh are as stated — all prohibitions, their nature, the dyes, the training, and the nuns.

The venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has declared that when a monk obtains a robe, he must discolor it by one of three means of discoloring; if he distributes a robe without having discolored it by any one of those three means, it becomes a downfall. Venerable One, is there a case where a monk distributes a robe without having discolored it by any one of the three means of discoloring, yet it does not become a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is: the use of a prohibited robe. A prohibited robe is one made of she-camel's wool, ox wool, goat's wool, wild animal's wool, a mixture of these, or cloth that has not been woven. If such a robe is used, it becomes an offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk uses a robe without having discolored it by any one of the three means of discoloring, and in the meantime his status changes and he becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a nun uses a robe without having discolored it by any one of the three means of discoloring, and in the meantime her status changes and she becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a monk perceives a robe that has been properly discolored as not having been discolored, and uses it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one perceives a robe that has not been discolored as having been discolored, and uses it, there is no offense."

"If one perceives a robe that has been discolored as not having been discolored, and uses it, what is the consequence?"

"It is an offense."

"If one perceives a robe that has been discolored as having been discolored, and uses it, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable One, if a robe was obtained before full ordination and one of the three means of discoloring was applicable to it, and one uses it without having discolored it after full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is an offense."

"If a robe was obtained before full ordination and one uses it as if still before full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is an offense."

"If a robe was obtained before full ordination and one uses it after having received full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a robe was obtained at the time of full ordination and one uses it at the time of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is an offense."

"If a robe was obtained at the time of full ordination and one uses it after full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a robe was obtained after full ordination and one uses it after full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a robe was obtained after full ordination and one uses it without full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is an offense."

"Venerable One, if a monk uses a robe smaller than one cubit, or a piece of cloth the size of the Sugata's Dharma robe, without having discolored it by any one of the three means, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, is there a case where a monk uses a robe that has been discolored by one of the three means of discoloring, yet it nonetheless constitutes an offense?"

"Upāli, there is: when a monk uses a robe that is entirely blue, entirely yellow, or entirely red."

"Venerable One, is there a case where a monk uses a robe without having discolored it by any one of the three means of discoloring, and yet it does not constitute an offense?"

"Upāli, there is: namely, when that monk has divided up the cloth that is the nature of a robe."

"Venerable One, is there a case where a monk uses a robe that has been discolored by one of the three means of discoloring, and yet it nonetheless constitutes an offense?"

"Upāli, there is: when it has been dyed with a major dye. The major dyes are saffron, yellow orpiment, lac, madder, heartwood of the ra tree, and similar substances. If one uses a robe dyed with such dyes, it becomes a transgression."

"Venerable One, if one who has received the training uses a robe not discolored by any one of the three means of discoloring, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a nun uses a robe not discolored by any one of the three means of discoloring, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if female probationers, novice nuns, and male novices use a robe not discolored by any one of the three means of discoloring, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

In summary:

The rule on women and precious things is likewise so.

The fourth, on touching, is the same.

The rule for others, and the seventh, illustrates this.

Musical instruments and magical creations — bear this in mind.

The venerable Upāli then questioned the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has said that if a monk takes up with his own hand, or causes another to take up, a precious thing or something counted as precious, it becomes a downfall — except when he is within a boundary enclosure or within a residence. Venerable One, is there a case where a monk takes up with his own hand a precious thing or something counted as precious, and yet the offense does not become a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is: if one takes up one of the five precious things such as a precious woman and so forth, it is an offense proportionate to the actual act. However, if one takes up a precious jewel or a precious wheel, it is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a monk takes up a precious thing or something counted as precious, and then undergoes a change of sex and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a nun takes up a precious thing or something counted as precious, and then undergoes a change of sex and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a monk takes up a precious thing perceiving it as precious, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one takes up a precious thing perceiving it as not precious, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"If one takes up something that is not precious perceiving it as precious, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one takes up something that is not precious perceiving it as not precious, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"Likewise, perceiving something as being counted as precious is also to be applied in these four ways."

"Venerable One, if a monk hands over a precious thing or something counted as precious to another, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if a monk causes another to take up a precious thing or something counted as precious, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable One, if, before full ordination, one sets out a precious thing or something counted as precious intending to take it, and takes it before full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets it out before full ordination and takes it at the moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets it out before full ordination and takes it after full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets it out at the moment of full ordination and takes it at the moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets it out at the moment of full ordination and takes it after full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets it out at the moment of full ordination and takes it at the moment of full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets it out at the moment of full ordination and takes it before full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may take a precious object or something equivalent to a precious object and yet not incur a transgression through a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is. If one takes a divine precious object or something equivalent to a precious object, it becomes a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may take something equivalent to a precious object and yet not incur a transgression through a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is. It is a case of taking something that is damaged."

"Venerable one, if a monk takes an emanated precious object or something equivalent to a precious object, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may use a precious object or something equivalent to a precious object and yet not incur a transgression through a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is: in a dwelling place of gods, or a dwelling place of nāgas, or a dwelling place of yakṣas, or in a royal palace, or in the residence of a great minister of the king, where no seat or other receptacle is available."

"Venerable one, if one to whom a training has been given takes a precious object or something equivalent to a precious object, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun takes a precious object or something equivalent to a precious object, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a female trainee takes a precious object or something equivalent to a precious object, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a female novice or a male novice takes a precious object or something equivalent to a precious object, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

The Sacred Vinaya Text, the Twelfth Fascicle.

In brief, the four factors of time are thus explained, along with preparation and likewise the night,
as well as water and rain,
the giving of training, and the nun.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that bathing twice a month is a transgression except when the occasion for it has arisen. Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may bathe constantly without incurring an offense?"

"Upāli, there is: bathing when any one of seven legitimate occasions has arisen."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives that the half-month has not yet elapsed when it actually has not elapsed, and bathes, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives that the half-month has elapsed when it actually has not elapsed, and bathes, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"If one perceives that the half-month has not elapsed when it actually has elapsed, and bathes, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one perceives that the half-month has elapsed when it actually has elapsed, and bathes, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives water as water and bathes in it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives water as something that is not water and bathes in it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one perceives something that is not water as water and bathes in it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one perceives something that is not water as not water and bathes in it, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk bathes at the proper time, with the blessing conferred, and yet incurs an offense?"

"Upāli, there is: one who, having sent away the bather, creeps in like a small bird."

"Venerable one, if a monk who has bathed within the half-month without having received the blessing has his sex changed and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun who has bathed without having received the blessing has her sex changed and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk bathes using something other than water, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may bathe constantly and yet not incur an offense?"

"Upāli, there is."

"Swimming across water, or bathing when rain falls."

"Venerable one, if one who has received the precept bathes within the half-month without having received the blessing, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun bathes within the half-month without having received the blessing, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if female probationers (śikṣamāṇā), female novices, and male novices bathe within the half-month without having received the blessing, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

The case of knowingly depriving a living animal that has fallen into the animal realm of its life is to be distinguished as explained in the section on root defeats.

In brief:

A message, a letter, a gesture,
through an intermediary, from one to another,
a madman, one mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is deaf, one who is dull-witted, one who is asleep, one who has a speech impediment, one who is intoxicated, one who is in meditative absorption, and one who has gone elsewhere — these are the last.

Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that if a monk, while being solicited, causes another monk to feel regret, it is a transgression. If a monk causes a monk to feel regret by means of a message, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Likewise, if he causes regret through a letter, a gesture, through an intermediary, or passed from one to another — all of these are wrong deeds."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes a mad monk to feel regret, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Likewise, if he causes regret in a monk who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, dull-witted, mute, deaf, asleep, with a speech impediment, intoxicated, in meditative absorption, or residing in another destination — all of these are wrong deeds."

In brief:

Voice, body, and solitude, mantra,

a sign, the fourth, the seventh,
householders and the like,
and the remainder — these apply to nuns.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk causes regret in the noble language, and that monk does not understand the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a noble monk causes regret in a frontier language, and that monk does not understand the frontier language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one from the frontier causes regret in a frontier language, and that monk does not understand the frontier language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one from the frontier causes regret in the noble language, and that monk does not understand the noble language, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes a monk to feel regret by directing his attention toward his body, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a secluded place as non-secluded and causes regret, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk renders himself invisible by means of a mantra or medicine and thereby causes a monk to feel regret, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if, while a monk is causing a monk to feel regret, his sex changes and he becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if, while a nun is causing regret, her sex changes and she becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives one who is fully ordained as fully ordained and causes regret, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives one who is fully ordained as not fully ordained and causes regret, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If he perceives one who is fully ordained as not fully ordained, it is a wrong deed."

"If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained and causes regret, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk intends to cause regret to one who is not fully ordained, perceiving him as not fully ordained, and it is accomplished, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If he intends it toward one who is not fully ordained, perceiving him as fully ordained, and it is accomplished, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If he intends it toward one who is not fully ordained, and it is accomplished with one who is fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If he intends it toward one who is fully ordained, perceiving him as fully ordained, and it is accomplished, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If he intends it toward one who is fully ordained, and it is accomplished with one who has become fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If he intends it toward one who is fully ordained, perceiving him as fully ordained, and it is accomplished with one who is fully ordained, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he intends it toward one who is fully ordained, perceiving him as not fully ordained, and it is accomplished, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes regret to a layman, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

Likewise, causing regret to a woman, a paṇḍaka (a person of indeterminate sex), an expelled nun, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has, with malicious intent, drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one abiding as a thief, one dwelling in isolation, one not dwelling in the community, one against whom an offense had previously arisen, and those who had previously been in conflict — causing regret to all of these constitutes a wrong deed in every case.

"Venerable one, if a monk causes regret to those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, to those who have sided with them, and to those who have administered a training rule — what is the consequence?"

"All of these are transgressions."

"Venerable one, is there a case where a monk causes regret to a monk and yet the offense of causing regret does not constitute a transgression?"

"Upāli, there is. If the offense in question is one accompanied by a residual factor, and he causes regret with respect to it."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes regret on behalf of others, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes regret to a nun, a probationer nun, a novice nun, or to the community of monks, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a nun causes regret to a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If she causes regret to a monk, a probationer nun, a novice nun, or to male novices, all of these are wrong deeds."

Likewise, if a probationer nun, a novice nun, or male novices cause regret to one another, it is a wrong deed in every case.

"Venerable one, if one who administers a training rule causes regret to monks, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

In brief:

One who is mad, mentally disturbed,
one who is senseless, foolish, or asleep,
one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated,
one in meditative absorption — these last are the exceptions.

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that touching another with a finger is a transgression. If a monk touches a mad monk with a finger, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

Likewise, touching one who is mentally disturbed, foolish, mute, senseless, asleep, delirious, intoxicated, in meditative absorption, or a monk dwelling in another place — touching all of these is a wrong deed in every case.

In brief:

The body, a tooth, a fingernail, hair, a covering, a wound — likewise — laymen and others of that kind:
the marks, and then the fourth and the seventh.

"Venerable one, apart from touching with a finger, if a monk touches another using another part of the body — the head, the shoulder, the elbow, the knee, the heel — or using a stick, a stone, or a clod of earth — what is the consequence?"

"All of these are wrong deeds."

"Venerable one, if a monk whose bodily faculties are impaired touches one whose bodily faculties are not impaired, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk whose bodily faculties are not impaired touches one whose bodily faculties are impaired — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk touches using a tooth — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk touches using a fingernail — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk touches using a hair, or touches a hair — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk touches one who is covered — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk touches a wound, or touches at a wound — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk touches a layman — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

Likewise, if one touches in such a manner: a woman, a eunuch, a suspended nun, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one who dwells among thieves, one dwelling apart, one who does not dwell in the community, one who has previously committed an offense, or one who has previously caused a schism — all of these are wrong deeds.

"Venerable one, if a monk touches one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides in a schism, or one who has administered a training rule — what is the consequence?"

"All of these are transgressions."

"Venerable one, if a monk touches a fully ordained nun, or a nun in training, or a female novice, or male novices — what is the consequence?"

"All of these are wrong deeds."

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun touches a monk, a nun in training, a female novice, or male novices — what is the consequence?"

"All of these are wrong deeds."

"Venerable one, if a monk, while touching a monk, has a sex change and becomes a nun — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun, while touching a nun, has a sex change and becomes a monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained and touches that person — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained and touches that person — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one perceives a person who is not fully ordained as fully ordained and touches that person — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one perceives a person who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained and touches that person — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

Likewise, the fourfold matrix is to be applied also to the case of perceiving a human being as a human being.

"Venerable one, if one intends to touch a person who is not fully ordained and touches one who is not fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one intends to touch a person who is not fully ordained and touches one who is in the course of receiving full ordination — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one intends to touch a person who is not fully ordained and touches one who is fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one intends to touch one who is in the course of receiving full ordination and touches one who is in the course of receiving full ordination — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one intends to touch one who is in the course of receiving full ordination and touches one who is fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If one intends to touch one who is fully ordained and touches one who is fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one intends to touch one who is fully ordained and touches one who is not fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if one who has administered a training rule touches a monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun touches a fully ordained nun — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"With regard to a nun in training, a female novice, and male novices — it is a wrong deed."

In brief:

A message, a letter, a hand-signal, speaking through another, and from one to another — a mad person, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, one who is deaf-mute, one who is simple-minded, one who is asleep, one who is vomiting, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, and one traveling elsewhere — these are the last.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if one causes satisfaction with water it becomes a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk causes satisfaction with water by means of a message — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Likewise, if one causes satisfaction with water by means of a letter, a hand-signal, speaking through another, or passing the message from one to another — all of these become wrong deeds."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes satisfaction to a mad woman with water — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Likewise, if one causes satisfaction to one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is simple-minded, one who is mute, one who is deaf-mute, one who is asleep, one who is vomiting, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one who is dwelling elsewhere — all of these become wrong deeds."

Just as the manner in which one causes satisfaction is elaborated, so too playing, expression of desire, laughing, running, and physical striking are to be set forth in full.

In brief:

Water, two, and likewise mantra, another through another's characteristics, seclusion, the fourth, a hermaphrodite, one who has administered a training rule, and a fully ordained nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk causes satisfaction by means of something other than water — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes satisfaction with drops of falling rain, or with drops of snow, or with drops of dew — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk renders himself invisible by means of mantra or medicine and then causes satisfaction — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes another monk to bring about satisfaction — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes satisfaction on behalf of others — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if while a monk is causing satisfaction with water his characteristics change and he becomes a fully ordained nun — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if while a fully ordained nun is causing satisfaction with water her characteristics change and she becomes a fully ordained monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a secluded place as not secluded and causes satisfaction — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives water as not water, it becomes a wrong deed."

"If he perceives what is not water as not water and causes satisfaction — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Likewise, if one perceives a human as a human, this too is to be applied in four ways."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes a hermaphrodite to experience satisfaction — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Likewise, if one causes a female hermaphrodite or a person of dual characteristics to experience satisfaction, all of these become wrong deeds."

Just as the manner of causing satisfaction is elaborated, so too playing, desire, laughing, running, and physical striking are likewise to be set forth in full.

"Venerable one, if one who has administered a training rule causes satisfaction — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun causes satisfaction with water or causes another to do so — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

With regard to a nun in training, a female novice, and male novices — it is a wrong deed.

In brief:

A mad person, one whose mind is disturbed,
a female hermaphrodite, one traveling in an emanated form, space, mantra, characteristics, the fourth — and likewise a hermaphrodite.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk sleeps together with a woman in the same dwelling it becomes a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk sleeps together with a mad woman in the same dwelling — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Likewise, if one sleeps together with one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, or one dwelling elsewhere, in the same dwelling — it is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk sleeps together with an emanated woman in the same dwelling — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk sleeps together with a woman in the same dwelling, up in the open sky — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk renders himself invisible by means of mantra or medicine and sleeps together with a woman in the same dwelling — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk is sleeping together with a woman in the same dwelling and his sex changes so that he becomes a nun — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a nun is sleeping together with a man in the same dwelling and her sex changes so that she becomes a monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a woman as a woman and sleeps with her — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a woman as not a woman — there is no offense."

"If he perceives a non-woman as a woman — it is a wrong deed."

"If he perceives a non-woman as a non-woman — there is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a human woman as human and sleeps together with her in the same dwelling — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a human as non-human — it is a wrong deed."

"If he perceives a non-human as human — it is a wrong deed."

"If he perceives a non-human as non-human — it is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk sleeps together with a hermaphrodite in the same dwelling — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

In summary:

A mountain ravine, dense forest,
Surrounded, covered, a large one,
Grasped, likewise by day,
Giving the training, and a nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk sleeps together with a woman in a mountain ravine, a dense forest, or the hollow of a tree — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk sleeps together with a woman wholly covered, or half-encircled, or not encircled — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk sleeps together with a woman encircled by a boundary, uncovered, half-covered, or half-uncovered — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if one sleeps in the same dwelling as a being born in an animal rebirth it is a wrong deed. Of what kind is that?"

"Upāli, it is a great female animal."

"Of what kind, great one?"

He declared: "Among birds — a hen, or another like a hen. Among four-footed animals — a female monkey, or another like a female monkey."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk sleeps in the same dwelling together with a non-human woman it is a wrong deed. Of what kind is a non-human?"

"One who possesses and displays all her limbs."

"Venerable one, if a monk sleeps together with a woman in the same dwelling during the daytime — what is the consequence?"

"Upāli, up until dawn it is a wrong deed. From dawn onward it becomes a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who has been given the training sleeps together with a woman in the same dwelling — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun sleeps together with a man in the same dwelling — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

For a female probationer, a novice nun, and male novices — it is a wrong deed.

In summary:

Sending a message, a letter, a hand-signal,
Another saying it, from one to another,
Mad, mentally disturbed, ill,
Mute, foolish, asleep,
Delirious, intoxicated,

In meditative absorption, and finally the one departing.

Thus did the venerable Upāli petition the Blessed One, the Buddha.

"Venerable one, if the Blessed One has declared that blaming or causing to be blamed incurs a transgression — then, venerable one, if a monk causes a monk to be blamed by means of a messenger, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Likewise, if it is done through a letter, a hand-signal, through another person speaking, or passed along from one to another causing blame — all of these are wrong deeds."

"Likewise, if a monk who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, foolish, mute, deaf, asleep, delirious, intoxicated, in meditative absorption, or one who has gone to dwell elsewhere — if such a one causes blame or is caused to blame another — all of these are wrong deeds."

In summary:

By voice, by body, and by a secluded place's signal,
Another blamed by another's seventh,
Laymen and the rest,
The fourth case — including the night — is likewise.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk causes a monk to be blamed in the noble language, and that monk does not know the noble language — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If a noble monk causes a monk to be blamed in a frontier language, and that monk does not know the frontier language — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If a frontier monk causes a monk to be blamed in a frontier language, and that monk does not know the frontier language — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If a frontier monk causes a monk to be blamed in the noble language, and that monk does not know the noble language — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk blames a monk using a physical gesture — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as non-secluded, blames a monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk renders himself invisible by means of a mantra or a drug and then blames a monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes another to be blamed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk blames a monk on behalf of another monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if the blame was prepared before full ordination and completed before full ordination — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If it was prepared before full ordination and completed during the act of full ordination — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If it was prepared before full ordination and completed after full ordination — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If it was prepared during the act of full ordination and completed during the act of full ordination — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If it was prepared during the act of full ordination and completed after full ordination — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"If it was prepared after full ordination and completed after full ordination — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If it was prepared after full ordination and completed before full ordination — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Venerable one, if a monk blames a layman — what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrong deed."

"Likewise, if it concerns a eunuch, an expelled nun, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one who dwells among thieves, one who dwells apart, one who does not dwell in the community, one against whom an earlier offence has occurred, or one against whom there was a prior dispute — if blame is given or caused to be given to any of these, all such acts are wrong deeds."

"Venerable one, if a monk directly blames or causes to be blamed a monk who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has sided with the schismatic faction, or a monk who has been given a formal instruction — what is the consequence?"

"All of these are transgressions."

"Venerable one, if a monk directly causes a monk to blame a layman — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, a eunuch, an expelled nun, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, and one who with malicious intent has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata —" one who holds non-Buddhist views, one who has gone over to non-Buddhist views, one who is dwelling illicitly, one who is living separately, one who is not residing in the community, one against whom a prior offense has arisen, one who was previously involved in a dispute, one who has sided with a faction, a monk who has been given a formal instruction, a nun, a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices — if a monk directly blames or causes any of these to be blamed, all of these are transgressions.

"Venerable one, if a monk directly blames or causes to be blamed a nun, a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun directly blames or causes to be blamed a monk, a female probationer, a female novice, or male novices — what is the consequence?"

"All of these are transgressions."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving one who is fully ordained as fully ordained, directly blames or causes him to be blamed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives one who is fully ordained as not fully ordained, it is a transgression. If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, it is a transgression. If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained and directly blames or causes him to be blamed, it is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk directly blames or causes a monk to be blamed and, while this is occurring, that monk changes his status and becomes a nun — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun directly blames or causes a nun to be blamed and, while this is occurring, that nun changes her status and becomes a monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who has been given a formal instruction directly blames or causes a monk to be blamed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun directly blames or causes a nun to be blamed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

As for a female probationer, a female novice, and male novices, these are to be explained extensively as transgressions.

In brief:

By messenger, by letter, by hand-signal,
through another's words, and from one to another;
one who is mad, mentally disturbed, or ill,
one who is mute, simpleminded, or asleep,
one who is intoxicated, one who is drunk, one in meditative absorption, and one who has gone elsewhere — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk conceals or causes to be concealed the alms bowl, the robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic belonging to another monk, it is a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk causes such concealment by means of a messenger — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if it is done by letter, by hand-signal, through another's words, or by passing it from one to another and causing the concealment — all of these are transgressions."

"Venerable one, if a monk conceals or causes to be concealed the alms bowl, the robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic belonging to a monk who is mad — what is the consequence?"

"All of these are transgressions."

"Likewise, if it involves the alms bowl, the robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic belonging to a monk who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is simpleminded, one who is mute, one who is blind, one who is asleep, one who is intoxicated, one who is drunk, one who is in meditative absorption, or one who has gone to dwell elsewhere — if anyone conceals or causes the concealment of such items, all of these are transgressions."

In brief:

Unsuitable items and likewise mantras, small and large, and also robes;
laypeople and so forth;
with marks, and the fourth, and the seventh;

one Saṅgha acting on behalf of another Saṅgha, giving a training precept, and a nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk conceals or causes to be concealed the alms bowl, the robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic belonging to another monk by hiding something that is unsuitable — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk, by means of a mantra or medicine, renders a monk invisible and conceals his alms bowl —"

"— or a robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk by means of a mantra, or medicine, or supernatural power conceals a monk's alms bowl, or robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes to be concealed a robe smaller than a cubit, or a small alms bowl, or an alms bowl larger than the standard measure — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk conceals or causes to be concealed, not the alms bowl, or robe, or any other requisite of a monk proper, but rather some other item belonging to a layperson — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes to be concealed a layperson's vessel, or robe, or any other such item — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

Likewise in all the following cases: one who has eaten a meal with a hermaphrodite; one who has expelled a nun; one who has killed his father; one who has killed his mother; one who has killed an arhat; one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent; a tīrthika; one who has gone over to the tīrthikas; one who is a thief living among the community; one who is living separately; one who is not residing properly; one who was previously involved in a schism; one who has previously incurred an offense — if the alms bowl, or robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic belonging to such a person is concealed or caused to be concealed, all cases constitute a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk conceals or causes to be concealed the alms bowl or robe of a monk who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or who has taken sides in a schism, or who has received a training precept — what is the consequence?"

"All are downfalls."

"Venerable one, if a monk conceals or causes to be concealed the alms bowl, or robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic belonging to a nun, a female probationer, a female novice, or a male novice — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun conceals or causes to be concealed the alms bowl, or robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic belonging to a monk, a female probationer, a female novice, or a male novice — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes a layperson to conceal in plain sight a monk's alms bowl, or robe, or any other requisite of a monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

Likewise, in all the following cases: one who has eaten a meal with a hermaphrodite; one who has expelled a nun; one who has killed his father; one who has killed his mother; one who has killed an arhat; one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent; a tīrthika; one who has gone over to the tīrthikas; one who is a thief living among the community; one who is living separately; one who is not residing properly; one who has previously incurred an offense; one who was previously involved in a schism; one who has taken sides in a schism; one who has received a training precept — and likewise a monk, a nun, a female probationer, a female novice, or a male novice — if any of them are caused to conceal such requisites in plain sight, it is a downfall.

"Venerable one, if a monk conceals or causes to be concealed the alms bowl, or robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic belonging to a monk, and in the meantime that monk changes his status and becomes a nun — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun conceals or causes to be concealed the alms bowl, or robe, or any other requisite of an ascetic belonging to a nun, and in the meantime that nun changes her status and becomes a monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk conceals — perceiving a fully ordained person as fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained, it is a transgression. If he perceives one who is not fully ordained as fully ordained, it is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who is not fully ordained is concealed while being perceived as not fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one sets out to conceal while the other is not fully ordained, and the concealment is accomplished while the other is still not fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets out to conceal while the other is not fully ordained, and the concealment is accomplished just as the other becomes fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets out to conceal while the other is not fully ordained, and the concealment is accomplished after the other has been fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets out to conceal just as the other is becoming fully ordained, and the concealment is accomplished just as the other is becoming fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets out to conceal just as the other is becoming fully ordained, and the concealment is accomplished after the other has been fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one sets out to conceal while the other is fully ordained, and the concealment is accomplished after the other has been fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one sets out to conceal while the other is fully ordained, and the concealment is accomplished while the other is not fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives another person the bowl or robe of a monk, or any other requisite of a renunciant, to be hidden — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk hides the property of the Saṅgha, or gives it to another to be hidden — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk hides the bowl or robe of a monk, or any other requisite for the livelihood of a renunciant, on behalf of another — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who gives the training hides or gives to another to be hidden the bowl or robe of a monk, or any other requisite of a renunciant — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun hides or gives to another to be hidden the bowl or robe of a nun, or any other requisite of a renunciant — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

For novice nuns, novice nuns, and male novices it is a transgression.

In summary, the categories are:

by messenger, written message, gesture,

through another's word, or passed from one to the next, in the case of one who is mad, mentally disturbed, or ill, a mute, a deaf person, one who is asleep, one who has lockjaw, one who is intoxicated, one who has entered absorption, or one dwelling elsewhere — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has taught that if a monk gives a robe and it is used without being reclaimed, it becomes a downfall. If a monk gives a robe to a monk by messenger and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if a robe given by written message, gesture, through another's word, or passed from one to the next is used without being returned — all of these are transgressions."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a mad monk and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

Likewise, if a robe is given to a monk who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, confused, mute, deaf, asleep, suffering from lockjaw, intoxicated, in meditative absorption, or dwelling in another place, and it is used without being returned — all of these are transgressions.

In summary:

improper cloth, and likewise mantras, small and large robes,
householders and the like,
by night, and the fourth, and the seventh, another's property and given to another, given as training, and a nun.

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk gives a robe to a monk, and even though it is used without being reclaimed, the offense does not become a downfall?"

"Upāli, there is. It is when the cloth has become improper. Improper cloth is: wool from a female yak, wool from an ox, wool from a deer, wool from a goat, mixed wool, or wool that has not been woven. If a robe of such material is given and used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives something produced by mantra, medicine, or miraculous transformation, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe that is smaller than a cubit in measure, or of the size of a robe of the Sugata (the Well-Gone One, an epithet of the Buddha), and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives items of a recluse's requisites other than robes, and they are used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a layman, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a female monk who eats together with the community, or to a hermaphrodite, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

Likewise, if a robe is given to one who has killed a father, or a mother, or an arhat; to one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent; to a non-Buddhist adherent; to one who has gone over to non-Buddhist adherents; to one who is in hiding; to one who does not remain in the community; to one who dwells in seclusion; to one against whom a prior offence has arisen; or to one who was previously in dispute — and in each case it is used without being reclaimed — all such cases are transgressions.

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a monk who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or to one who sides with such a person, or to a monk who confers the training precepts, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a nun, a probationary nun, a female novice, or a male novice, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a nun, a probationary nun, a female novice, or a male novice, and while it is being used without being reclaimed, a change of status occurs and the recipient becomes a fully ordained nun — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to a monk, and while it is being used without being reclaimed, a change of status occurs and the recipient becomes a fully ordained nun — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun gives a robe to a fully ordained monk, and while it is being used without being reclaimed, a change of status occurs and the recipient becomes a fully ordained monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe to one who has received full ordination, perceiving that person as fully ordained, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a person who has not received full ordination as fully ordained — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If one perceives a person who has not received full ordination as not fully ordained, gives a robe, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if while one has not yet received full ordination a robe is given, and before full ordination has been received it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If it is given before full ordination, and is used without being reclaimed while full ordination is in the process of being conferred — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If it is given before full ordination, and is used without being reclaimed after full ordination has been completed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a robe is given while full ordination is in the process of being conferred, and it is used without being reclaimed while full ordination is still in the process of being conferred — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a robe is given while full ordination is in the process of being conferred, and it is used without being reclaimed after full ordination has been completed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If a robe is given after full ordination has been completed, and it is used without being reclaimed after full ordination has been completed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If a robe is given after full ordination has been completed, and it is used without being reclaimed before full ordination was completed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a robe away that he received from another monk, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a monk a robe that is held in common, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk gives a monk a robe on another's behalf, and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who confers the training precepts gives a robe to a monk and it is used without being reclaimed — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

For a probationary nun, a female novice, and male novices, all such cases are to be stated as transgressions.

As for giving the surplus property of the Saṅgha with malicious intent — the distinctions are to be set forth in the same manner as what has been described regarding malicious intent toward a root downfall.

The Noble Vinaya Text, the Thirteenth Fascicle.

In brief:

One who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed,

One who is ill, and likewise one who uses mantra,
The sky, the fourth case with its counterpart,
Youths and those of indeterminate sex,
And likewise an emanated being of indeterminate sex.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that any monk who, without a man present, enters into a secluded place together with a woman — that is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk enters into a secluded place together with a woman who is insane — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"And likewise with a woman whose mind is disturbed, a woman afflicted by illness, a foolish woman, a mute woman, a deaf woman, and a woman who is dwelling elsewhere but is traveling on the road together with him — all such cases are transgressions."

"Venerable one, if a monk enters into a secluded place together with an insane man and a woman — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"And likewise with a man whose mind is disturbed, a man afflicted by illness, a foolish man, a mute man, a deaf man, and a man dwelling elsewhere — if he enters the secluded place together with such a man and also with a woman, all such cases are transgressions."

"If a monk enters into a secluded place together with a woman and a person of indeterminate sex — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk makes himself invisible through mantra or medicine and then, without a man present, enters into a secluded place together with a woman — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk, without a man present, travels through the sky together with a woman — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk who has entered into a secluded place together with a woman, without a man present, then undergoes a change of sex-mark and becomes a nun — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a nun who has entered into a secluded place together with a man then undergoes a change of sex-mark and becomes a monk — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a human woman as a human, enters into a secluded place with her — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives a human as not human — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a non-human as human — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a non-human as non-human — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a human woman as a woman, enters into a secluded place with her — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives a human woman as a man and enters into a secluded place — what is the consequence?"

"There is no offence."

"If he perceives a man as a woman and enters into a secluded place — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives a man as a man and enters into a secluded place — what is the consequence?"

"There is no offence."

"Venerable one, if a monk enters into a secluded place together with a young woman, without a man present — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk enters into a secluded place together with a person of indeterminate sex — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk, without a man present, enters into a secluded place together with a woman — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk enters into a secluded place together with a person of indeterminate sex — what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if one who confers training precepts enters into a secluded place together with a woman, without a man present — what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun, without a woman present, enters into a secluded place together with a man — what is the consequence?"

"It is as the matter stands."

For a probationary nun, a female novice, and male novices, all such cases are to be stated as transgressions.

In brief:

One who has become insane, one whose mind is disturbed,

One who is ill, one who is deaf, one who is a traveler —

The sky, the sex-change case, the fourth case, the wrong path, and the case of the nun.

An emanated being, and the path of one of indeterminate sex.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk travels along a road together with a large band of thieves, it is a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk travels along a road together with a single thief who is insane, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Likewise, if he travels along a road together with a large band of thieves who are mentally disturbed, who are tormented by illness, who are foolish, who are mute, who are deaf, or who are staying in another destination — in all such cases, what is the consequence?"

"In all such cases it is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk, having made himself invisible by means of a mantra or a medicine, travels in the company of a large band of thieves, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk travels through the sky together with a large band of thieves, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk is traveling together with a large band of thieves and along the way his sex changes and he becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun is traveling along a road together with a large band of thieves and along the way her sex changes and she becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a large band of thieves as a large band of thieves and then travels along a road with them, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives a large band of thieves as not a large band of thieves and travels with them, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"If he perceives those who are not a large band of thieves as a large band of thieves and travels with them, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives those who are not a large band of thieves as not a large band of thieves, what is the consequence?"

"There is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives a person as a person and then travels along a road together with a large band of thieves, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If he perceives a person as not a person, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives one who is not a person as a person, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"If he perceives one who is not a person as not a person, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk travels along a road together with an emanated likeness of a large band of thieves, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, if a monk travels along a road together with a thief who is a person of indeterminate sex, what is the consequence?"

"It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk travels along a road together with a large band of thieves and yet incurs no offense?"

"Upāli, there are. If within the distance of one league he turns back, or if the thieves seize the monk and lead him away, or if they themselves disperse, or if he loses the road and someone shows him the way."

"Venerable one, if a monk travels along a road that is not the same road as that taken by a large band of thieves, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if one who has been given a training rule travels along a road together with a large band of thieves, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun travels along a road together with a large band of thieves, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

For a probationary nun, a female novice, and male novices, it is a transgression.

In brief:

The prior disturbance, full ordination, and the sex-change case,

The fourth: one insane, one mentally disturbed,

One ill, one deaf, one who is traveling,

A layman and so forth, a laywoman,

One given a training rule, and a nun.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk confers full ordination as a monk upon a person who has not yet reached the age of twenty, it is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk confers full ordination upon a person who has not yet reached the age of twenty, perceiving them to be of that age, does that constitute a valid full ordination?"

"Upāli, these four are prior disturbances. The first: the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty, the monk perceives them as not having reached twenty, and when the monk asks whether they have reached the age of twenty, the candidate says, 'I know and am aware that I have not reached twenty — I have no doubt about this.' If that person is then given full ordination as a monk by the monk, this is the first prior disturbance. The second: the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty, the monk perceives them as not having reached twenty, and when the monk asks whether they have reached twenty, the candidate says, 'I do not know, I do not recall.' If that person is then given full ordination as a monk by the monks, this is the second prior disturbance. The third: the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty, the monk perceives them as not having reached twenty, and when the monk asks whether they have reached twenty, the candidate says, 'I am uncertain.' If that person is then given full ordination as a monk by the monk, this is the third prior disturbance. The fourth: the candidate has not yet reached the age of twenty, the monk perceives them as not having reached twenty, and when the monk asks the question, the candidate gives no answer. If that person is then given full ordination as a monk by the monks, this is the fourth prior disturbance. Upāli, apart from these four prior disturbances, all remaining cases constitute a valid full ordination."

"Venerable one, if a monk confers full ordination as a monk upon a person who has not yet reached the age of twenty, and that person then undergoes a sex change and becomes a nun, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun confers full ordination as a nun upon someone who has not yet reached the age of twenty, or who has not yet reached the age of twelve, and that person undergoes a sex change and becomes a monk, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving someone who has not yet reached the age of twenty as not having reached that age, confers full ordination upon them, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

"If one has not yet reached the age of twenty but is perceived as having done so, and full ordination is conferred, there is no fault."

"If one has reached the age of twenty but is perceived as not having done so, and full ordination is conferred, it becomes a wrongdoing."

"If one has reached the age of twenty and is perceived as having done so, and full ordination is conferred, there is no fault."

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving an insane person as not having reached the age of twenty, confers full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, if one perceives a mentally disturbed person, one afflicted by illness, a simpleton, a mute, a deaf person, or one who is traveling elsewhere as not having reached the age of twenty and confers full ordination upon any of them, in every case it becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a layman as not having reached the age of twenty, confers full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a downfall."

A male novice is likewise the same.

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a sexually indeterminate person as not having reached the age of twenty, confers full ordination, what is the consequence?"

"It is a wrongdoing."

Likewise, if one perceives as not having reached twenty any of the following and confers full ordination upon them: a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed their father, one who has killed their mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has maliciously drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who is a thief by position, one who is not a resident, one who is dwelling separately, one in whom a prior disturbance has occurred, or one in whom a prior fault has arisen — in every case it becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, can it occur that a monk confers full ordination perceiving the candidate as not having reached the age of twenty, yet it neither constitutes a fault nor a downfall, and the full ordination is properly conferred?"

"Upāli, it can."

"Go to a person who has not yet reached the age of twenty and confer full ordination upon them."

"Venerable one, if one confers full ordination by means of giving the training upon a person who has not yet reached the age of twenty, what does that become?"

"It becomes a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun confers full ordination upon a young woman who has not yet reached the age of twenty, or upon a married woman who has not yet reached the age of twelve, what does that become?"

"It becomes a downfall. For a female probationer, a female novice, and male novices, there is no fault."

In brief:

By messenger, letter, gesture,
through another's word, or passing it from one to another, while insane, while mentally disturbed, while ill, while mute, or while traveling — these are the categories.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk digs the earth or has it dug with his own hand, it becomes a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk has earth dug by means of a messenger, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"Likewise, if one causes earth to be dug by means of a letter, by a gesture, through another's word, or relayed from one to another — all of these become wrongdoings."

"Venerable one, if a monk has a madman dig the earth, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing. Likewise, having one who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, dull-witted, mute, incapable of speech, or residing in another place dig the earth — all of these become wrongdoings."

In brief:

At dawn, on the fourth and seventh,
in the presence of householders and others, without sound, without body, without intervention,
a stake, a clod, the burning of earth.

"Venerable one, if a monk, while digging the earth with his own hand, undergoes a change of sex and becomes a nun, what does that become?"

"It becomes a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a nun, while digging the earth with her own hand, undergoes a change of sex and becomes a monk, what does that become?"

"It becomes a downfall."

"Venerable one, if a monk perceives earth to be earth and digs it or has it dug, what does that become?"

"It becomes a downfall."

"If he perceives earth as not being earth, there is no fault."

"If he causes what is not earth to be dug while perceiving it as earth, it becomes a wrongdoing."

"If he perceives what is not earth as not being earth, there is no fault."

"Venerable one, if a monk causes another to dig the earth, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk digs for the sake of another, what does that become?"

"It becomes a downfall."

"Venerable one, if one prepares to dig before full ordination and completes it before full ordination, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"If one prepares before full ordination and completes it at the moment of full ordination, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"If one prepares before full ordination and completes it after full ordination, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"If one prepares at the moment of full ordination and completes it at the moment of full ordination, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"If one prepares at the moment of full ordination and completes it after full ordination, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"If one prepares after full ordination and completes it after full ordination, what does that become?"

"It becomes a downfall."

"If one prepares after full ordination and completes it before full ordination, what does that become?"

"It becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk directly causes a householder to dig the earth, what does that become?"

"It becomes a downfall."

Likewise for a woman, a hermaphrodite, an expelled nun, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has maliciously drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, a thief by position, one who is dwelling separately, one who is not a resident, one in whom a prior disturbance has occurred, one in whom a prior fault has arisen, one who has drawn near to disrobing, one who has given back the training, a monk, a nun, a female probationer, a female novice, and male novices — if he directly causes any of them to dig the earth, all of these become downfalls.

Venerable ones, if a noble monk invites someone to dig earth using the noble language, and that person does not seek permission in the noble language, what does this become? It is a misdeed. If a noble one invites someone to dig earth using the border language, and that person does not seek permission in the border language, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a border monk invites someone to dig earth using the border language, and that person does not seek permission in the border language, what does this become? It is a misdeed. If a border person invites someone to dig earth using the noble language, and that person does not seek permission in the noble language, what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a monk causes earth to be dug by means of a bodily gesture, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a monk causes unsettled earth to be dug, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a monk drives a peg into the earth, what does this become? It is a downfall. Venerable ones, if he then pulls it out, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a monk scrapes mud from the earth, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a monk presses down on the earth, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a monk digs earth that contains ox dung or has become sodden and clumped, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a monk digs burnt earth, what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if one who has given the training digs or causes the digging of earth with his own fingernail, what does this become? It is a downfall. Venerable ones, if a nun digs or causes the digging of earth with her own fingernail, what does this become? It is a downfall. For a female probationer it is a misdeed. For a female novice and a male novice there is no fault.

In brief:

By message, by letter, by hand signal,
by word of another, relayed from one to the next,
by one who is mad, whose mind is disturbed, who is ill, by one who is mute, who is foolish, who is asleep, by one who is stammering, who is intoxicated, and one who is in meditative absorption — these are the last.

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that a monk should accept an invitation within four months, and that accepting beyond that becomes a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk, for however long and for however many times he has been invited, accepts and seeks food beyond that limit by means of a message, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if he accepts and eats beyond that limit by means of a letter, a hand signal, the word of another, or by relay from one to the next, all of these become misdeeds.

Venerable ones, if a monk is invited by a madman, and he accepts and seeks food beyond that limit, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if one whose mind is disturbed, one who is afflicted by illness, one who is foolish, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is stammering, one who is intoxicated, one who is in meditative absorption, or one who is dwelling elsewhere — if any of these invite for however long, and the monk accepts and eats beyond that limit, all of these become misdeeds.

In brief:

What is unsuitable and what is excluded, what pertains to the name, and likewise the fourth — what is appointed, and again the interruption, and another's on behalf of another — these are the seventh.

Venerable ones, if a monk is invited for however long and for however much food and drink, and he accepts food and drink that is suitable beyond that limit, what does this become? It is a downfall. Venerable ones, if a monk is invited for however long and however much food and drink, and setting aside that food and drink, he seeks other things — medicines — intending to use them as medicine, and accepts and receives those things that are not food, what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a monk is invited for however long and for however much, and while accepting beyond that limit his status changes and he becomes a nun, what does this become? It is a downfall. Venerable ones, if a nun is invited for however long and for however much, and while accepting beyond that limit her status changes and she becomes a monk, what does this become? It is a downfall.

Venerable ones, if a monk, perceiving a human being as a human being, solicits and accepts from him, what does this become? It is a downfall. If he perceives a human being as a non-human, it becomes a misdeed. If he perceives a non-human as a human being, it becomes a misdeed. If he perceives a non-human as a non-human and accepts beyond that limit and receives, what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, is there any case in which a monk, however long and for however much he has been invited, accepts within that limit and yet incurs no offense? Upāli, there is. It is as a monk hears when invited to a village where the training precepts are given. Venerable ones, is there any case in which a monk, however long and for however much he has been invited, accepts beyond that limit and yet incurs no offense? Upāli, there is. It is when that monk, while still there, flees and goes elsewhere, and any one of the eight interruptions arises.

Venerable ones, if a monk, invited for however long and for however much, accepts beyond that limit on behalf of another and receives, what does this become? It is a misdeed. Venerable ones, if a monk, invited for however long, accepts beyond that limit and gives the invitation to another who then receives, what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if one who has not received full ordination accepts, and one who has not received full ordination receives, what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one who has not received full ordination accepts, and one who is in the act of receiving full ordination receives, what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one who has not received full ordination accepts, and one who has fully received ordination receives, what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one who is in the act of receiving full ordination accepts, and one who is in the act of receiving full ordination receives, what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one who is in the act of receiving full ordination accepts, and one who has fully received ordination receives, what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one who has fully received ordination accepts, and one who has fully received ordination receives, what does this become? It is a downfall. If one who has fully received ordination accepts, and one who has not received full ordination receives, what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if one accepts more than what the training precepts allow and then receives, what does this become? It is a downfall. Venerable ones, if a nun accepts more than that limit and receives, what does this become? It is a downfall. If a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a novice nun, or male novices accept more than that limit and receive, what does this become? It is a misdeed.

In brief:

Through messenger, letter, gesture, through the word of another, through relay from one to the next,
through one who is mad, mentally disturbed, or ill, through one who is deaf, dull-witted, asleep, through one with cleft palate, one who is intoxicated, and one entering meditative absorption — these are the final cases.

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has also declared that if a monk is instructed by another monk — "Venerable one, train in this precept" — and that monk says, "I will not train in this precept as the venerable one has instructed me," this becomes a downfall. Venerable one, if a monk instructs another monk, and through a messenger that monk says, "I will not train in this precept as the venerable ones have instructed me," what does this become? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if he says so through a letter, through a gesture, through the word of another, or through relay from one to the next — all of these become misdeeds.

Venerable ones, if the monks instruct a monk and a mad monk says, "I will not train in this precept as the venerable ones have instructed me," what does this become? It is a misdeed. Likewise, one who is mentally disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one with a cleft palate, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, and monks dwelling in another region — if any of these say, "I will not train in this precept as the venerable ones have instructed me," all of these become misdeeds.

In brief:

By voice, by body, by solitude,
by a seventh party acting for another, by laypeople and the like — these are the mark: the fourth and the seventh.

Venerable ones, if a monk instructs a monk in the noble language saying, "I will not train in this precept as the venerable one has instructed me," and that monk does not understand the noble language — what does this become? It is a misdeed. If a noble one says this in the language of the border regions, and the monk does not understand the language of the border regions — what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one from the border regions says this in the language of the border regions, and the monk does not understand the language of the border regions — what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one from the border regions says this in the noble language, and the monk does not understand the noble language — what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a monk conveys this meaning through a bodily gesture — namely, "I will not train in this precept as the venerable one has instructed me" — what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a monk, perceiving one who is present alone as though he were not present alone, says, "I do not train in accordance with the words of the venerable one — train as you will" — what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a monk has another person say, "I will not train in this precept as the venerable one has instructed me" — what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a monk says on behalf of another, "The venerable one will not train in this precept as instructed" — what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if one who has not yet received full ordination gives the instruction, and one who has not yet received full ordination says, "I will not train in this precept as the venerable one has instructed me" — what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one who has not yet received full ordination gives the instruction, and one in the act of receiving full ordination says this — what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one who has not yet received full ordination gives the instruction, and one who has fully received ordination says this — what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one in the act of receiving full ordination gives the instruction, and one in the act of receiving full ordination says this — what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one in the act of receiving full ordination gives the instruction, and one who has fully received ordination says this — what does this become? It is a misdeed. If one who has fully received ordination gives the instruction, and one who has fully received ordination says this — what does this become? It is a transgression. If one who has fully received ordination gives the instruction, and one who has not yet received full ordination says this — what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a layperson instructs a monk, and the monk says, "I will not train in this precept as the venerable one has instructed me" — what does this become? It is a misdeed.

Likewise, if the instruction is given by a woman, by a eunuch, by an expelled nun, by one who has slain his father or mother, by one who has killed an arhat, by one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, by a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), by one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, by one who is a thief living in hiding, by one who is not residing, by one who is residing apart, by one who has previously committed an offense, or by one who has previously caused a schism — if the instruction is given by any of these and that declaration is made, all cases become misdeeds.

Venerable ones, if a monk who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or who has sided with that schism, or monks who have given the training — if they give the instruction and that declaration is made, all cases become misdeeds.

Venerable ones, if a monk is instructed by a fully ordained nun, by a probationary nun, by a female novice, by male novices — if the instruction is given by them and that declaration is made, all cases become misdeeds.

Venerable ones, if a monk says, "I will not train in this training as instructed by the venerable one," and his gender then changes and he becomes a nun, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a nun says the same, and her gender then changes and she becomes a monk, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

Venerable ones, if a monk, perceiving someone who has received full ordination as one who has received full ordination, says, "I will not train in this training as instructed by the venerable one," what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If he perceives someone who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, it becomes a misdeed. If he perceives someone who has not received full ordination as one who has received full ordination, it becomes a misdeed. If he perceives someone who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, it becomes a misdeed.

Just as a monk incurs a transgression by speaking in that way, so too does one who has given the training, and likewise a nun incurs a transgression. In the cases of a probationary nun, a female novice, and male novices, it becomes a misdeed.

In brief:

One who has gone mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, one who is unable to speak, one who departs — these are the same as the fourth, namely the characteristic; with mantra and the other, these seven,
householders and the like,
the pacification, and the nun.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that if monks are quarreling and a monk is present, and he listens without speaking, he incurs a transgression. Venerable one, if monks who are mad are quarreling and a monk is present, and he listens without speaking, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Likewise, in the cases of monks whose minds are disturbed, those afflicted by illness, those who are dull-witted, those who are mute, those unable to speak, and those who have gone to dwell elsewhere — if one listens without saying anything to them, all cases become misdeeds.

"Venerable one, if monks are quarreling and a monk is present listening without speaking, and his gender then changes and he becomes a nun, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Venerable one, if a nun is present listening without speaking, and her gender then changes and she becomes a monk, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving one who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, is present listening without speaking, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Venerable one, if a monk has made himself inconspicuous through mantra or medicine and is present listening without speaking, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Venerable one, if monks are quarreling and a monk causes another to listen to it, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Venerable one, if monks are quarreling and a monk listens on behalf of others, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Venerable one, if one seats a person who has not received full ordination in a place not for those who have not received full ordination, and that person listens there, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed. If one seats a person who has not received full ordination in a place for those who have received full ordination, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed. If one seats a person who has not received full ordination in a place for those who have received full ordination, and that person listens there, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed. If one seats a person who has received full ordination in a place for those who have received full ordination, and that person listens there, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed. If one seats a person who has received full ordination in a place for those who have received full ordination, and that person listens in a place for those who have received full ordination, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed. If one seats a person who has received full ordination in a place for those who have received full ordination, and that person listens in a place for those who have received full ordination, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If one seats a person who has received full ordination in a place for those who have received full ordination, and that person listens in a place for those who have not received full ordination, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Venerable one, if laypeople are quarreling and a monk is present listening without speaking, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

"Likewise with respect to a woman, a paṇḍaka, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who is dwelling as a thief, one who is not residing in the community, one who is living separately, one who previously committed an offense, and one who was previously in a dispute — if a monk listens to all of these without saying anything, it is a misdeed in every case.

"Venerable one, if a monk has caused a schism in the Saṅgha and another monk, without taking leave, listens while staying on without saying anything, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If one listens without taking leave among those who are siding with a party and among those who have been given training precepts, what becomes of it? It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk listens without taking leave among nuns, probationary nuns, novice nuns, and male novices, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed in every case.

"Venerable one, is there a case where monks who have come together and are quarreling — a monk listens without taking leave yet commits no offense?"

"Upāli, there is. It is as follows: that monk listens having thought to pacify the situation.

"Venerable one, if one who has been given training precepts listens without taking leave, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if a nun listens without taking leave, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If probationary nuns, novice nuns, and male novices listen without taking leave, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed.

In brief: through messenger, letter, gesture, through hearsay and from one to another, through one who is mad, mentally disturbed, through one who is deaf, dull-witted, or sleeping, through one who is mute, intoxicated, or one who has entered meditative absorption — these are the last.

"The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: 'Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that any monk who, while the Saṅgha is reciting a definitive statement of Dharma, rises from his seat and departs without having taken leave and without saying anything — such a monk commits a transgression. If a monk, while the Saṅgha is reciting a definitive statement of Dharma, sends a message granting approval and then departs, what becomes of it?' It is a misdeed. 'Likewise, if approval is sent and one departs by letter, by gesture, through hearsay, or relayed from one to another, what becomes of it in every case?' It is a misdeed in every case.

"Venerable one, if a monk, while the Saṅgha is reciting a definitive statement of Dharma, grants approval to a mad monk and then departs, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed. Likewise, if approval is granted and one departs to a monk who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, dull-witted, deaf, mute, sleeping, mute, intoxicated, in meditative absorption, or residing elsewhere — it is a misdeed in every case.

In brief: to paṇḍakas and the like, to one bearing marks, and likewise the fourth,
to śramaṇas, and those who perform sky-mantras, to one acting by body, one acting by voice, and a nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk grants approval to a paṇḍaka and then departs, what becomes of it? It is a misdeed. Likewise, to a female paṇḍaka, to an expelled nun, to one who has killed his father, to one who has killed his mother, to one who has killed an arhat, to one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, to a tīrthika, to one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, to one who is dwelling as a thief, to one who is not residing in the community, to one who is living separately, to one who was previously in a dispute, to one who previously committed an offense, to one who is siding with a party, and to those who have been given training precepts — if approval is granted and one departs to any of these, it is a misdeed in every case.

"Venerable one, if a monk, while the Saṅgha is reciting a definitive statement of Dharma, rises from his seat and departs without saying anything and without granting approval, and in the meantime his status changes and he has become a nun, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if a nun, while a definitive statement of Dharma is being recited, rises from her seat and departs without saying anything and without granting approval, and in the meantime her status changes and she has become a monk, what becomes of it? It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a Dharma-act as a Dharma-act, departs without granting approval, what becomes of it?"

It is a transgression. If one perceives a Dharma-act as not a Dharma-act, it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives a non-Dharma-act as a Dharma-act, it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives a non-Dharma-act as a non-Dharma-act and yet departs without granting approval, what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk, while a definitive statement of Dharma is being recited by the Saṅgha, rises from his seat and departs without saying anything, and yet no transgression or downfall occurs?" Upāli, there is: when one is sitting merely at the edge of hearing range, and the recitation does not reach one's ears with its meaning understood.

"Venerable one, if a monk, while a definitive statement of Dharma is being recited by the Saṅgha, departs without granting approval by going up into the sky, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk, while a definitive statement of Dharma is being recited by the Saṅgha, makes himself invisible by means of a mantra or medicine and then departs, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk, while a definitive statement of Dharma is being recited by the Saṅgha, grants approval by means of a bodily gesture and then departs, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, during the recitation of a definitive Dharma-statement by the Saṅgha, if a noble monk grants approval in the noble language, but the monk in question has not sought out the noble language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If a noble monk grants approval in a border dialect, but the monk in question has not sought out that border dialect, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If a border-dweller grants approval in a border dialect, but the monk in question has not sought out that border dialect, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If a border-dweller grants approval in the noble language, but the monk in question has not sought out the noble language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk who has given up his training, while a definitive statement of Dharma is being recited by the Saṅgha, rises from his seat and departs without saying anything, what becomes of it?" It is a downfall. "Venerable one, if a nun, while a definitive statement of Dharma is being recited by the Saṅgha, rises from her seat and departs without saying anything, what becomes of it?" It is a downfall. For a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a novice nun, and novice monks, it is a wrongdoing.

In summary:

By message, letter, hand-sign,
through an intermediary, and from one to another, through madness, mental disturbance, illness, stupidity, and sleep,
through being deaf, through intoxication, and through meditative absorption — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that if one plugs one's ears when an instruction is being given, it is a downfall. If a monk, when an instruction is given by the Saṅgha's spokesman, turns back the message and does not heed it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one turns back and does not heed an instruction conveyed by letter, by hand-sign, through an intermediary, or passed from one to another, all of these are wrongdoings.

"Venerable one, if a monk, when an instruction is given by the Saṅgha's spokesman through a madman, turns it back and does not heed it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one turns back and does not heed an instruction conveyed through one who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, stupid, mute, or deaf, all of these are wrongdoings.

"Venerable one, if a monk, when an instruction is given by the Saṅgha's spokesman, fails to heed it because he is asleep, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one fails to heed it because one is yawning, intoxicated, or in meditative absorption, all of these are wrongdoings.

"Venerable one, if a monk turns back and does not heed an instruction given by the Saṅgha's spokesman of a Saṅgha residing in a different place, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

The Noble Vinaya, the fourteenth fascicle.

In summary:

Language, body, seclusion, and mantra, marks, the fourth and the seventh,
counting and the seventh, not-speaking, giving up training, and the nun.

"Venerable one, when the Saṅgha's spokesman conveys an instruction and a noble monk turns back and does not heed it in the noble language, and that monk has also not sought the noble language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "When a noble monk turns back and does not heed it in the border language, and that monk has also not sought the border language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "When a border monk turns back and does not heed it in the border language, and that monk has also not sought the border language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "When a border monk turns back and does not heed it in the noble language, and that monk has also not sought the noble language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, when the Saṅgha's spokesman conveys an instruction and a monk turns back and does not heed it on account of a bodily fixation, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, when the Saṅgha's spokesman conveys an instruction and a monk, perceiving a secluded place as non-secluded, turns back and does not heed it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, when the Saṅgha's spokesman conveys an instruction and a monk renders himself invisible through mantra or medicine, then turns back and does not heed it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, when a monk turns back and does not heed the Saṅgha's instruction and then changes his status and becomes a nun, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, when a nun turns back and does not heed the Saṅgha's instruction and then changes her status and becomes a monk, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, when the Saṅgha's spokesman conveys an instruction and a monk, perceiving what is Dharma as Dharma, turns back and does not heed it, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If one perceives what is Dharma as not Dharma, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one perceives what is not Dharma as Dharma, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one perceives what is not Dharma as not Dharma, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, is there a case in which one turns back and does not heed the Saṅgha's spokesman's instruction and yet the offense does not constitute a transgression?" Upāli, there is: when the Saṅgha has counted one without respect. Even so, to transgress what the Saṅgha has established to be done is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if one who has not received full ordination has been counted by the Saṅgha without respect, and one who has not received full ordination turns back and does not heed it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who has not received full ordination has been counted and, at the time of receiving full ordination, turns back and does not heed it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who has not received full ordination has been counted and, after receiving full ordination, turns back and does not heed it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one counted at the time of receiving full ordination turns back and does not heed it at the time of receiving full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one counted at the time of receiving full ordination turns back and does not heed it after receiving full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one counted after receiving full ordination turns back and does not heed it after receiving full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If one counted after receiving full ordination turns back and does not heed it when one has not received full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, when the Saṅgha's spokesman conveys an instruction to a monk and he does not heed it by remaining altogether silent, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if one who has given up the training does not heed the Saṅgha's spokesman's instruction by turning back, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, when the Saṅgha's spokesman conveys an instruction to a nun and she turns back and does not heed it, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. For female trainees, novice nuns, and male novices, it is a wrongdoing.

In summary:

Two fruits, and likewise mantra,
the fallen, salt, and one carrying liquor, root, trunk, and bearing fruit,
the seventh, mixed with the rootless, what was instructed, the deity, the fourth, and the mark.

This was asked of the Blessed One, the Buddha, by the Venerable Upāli.

"Venerable one, the Blessed One declared that if one seeks liquor or fruit-liquor that would cause intoxication, it is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk seeks roots, trunks, leaves, flowers, or fruits that would cause intoxication, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk seeks roots, trunks, leaves, flowers, or fruits, or other such things placed inside liquor, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk, having received liquor or fruit-liquor that would cause intoxication from someone in his vicinity by means of a mantra or medicine, then seeks it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk seeks the dregs, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, may one seek liquor that has turned to salt?" Upāli, in such a case: if the substance of the liquor is much and the substance of the salt is little, one may not drink it. But if the substance of the salt is clearly predominant and the substance of the liquor is little, one may drink it, diluted with water using a straining cloth. Upāli, why so? Because in that case it cannot perform the function of liquor. "Venerable one, is it permitted to seek liquor that has turned to salt at an irregular time?" Upāli, in such a case: if it has become clear and clarified and does not cause intoxication, dilute it with water, strain it through a water-straining cloth, and drink it in the company of the community. "Venerable one, if a monk, while carrying liquor, seeks it from the one holding it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, is it permitted to seek the juice of these roots, trunks, leaves, flowers, and fruits at an irregular time?" Upāli, in such a case: if it has become clear and thoroughly transparent, strain it through a water-straining cloth, dilute it with water, and drink it. But if, from its own substance, it has transformed into the substance of liquor, may one seek it? Upāli, one may not. "Venerable one, if a monk, apart from intoxicating liquor, seeks the smell of liquor, the taste of liquor, the colour of liquor, and the fragrance of liquor that are other than that, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. Salt that resembles the colour of liquor incurs no offence. "Venerable one, if a monk, from a mixture of liquor and rice grains, strains out the liquor and then seeks the rice, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if one who has not yet received full ordination takes it and seeks it before receiving full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who has not yet received full ordination takes it and seeks it just as one is receiving full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who has not yet received full ordination takes it and seeks it after having received full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who is in the process of receiving full ordination takes it and seeks it in the process of receiving full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who is in the process of receiving full ordination takes it and seeks it before full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who has received full ordination takes it and seeks it after having received full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If one who has received full ordination takes it and seeks it before full ordination, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk seeks the foam of grape-liquor, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk seeks something that has been poured into liquor, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk seeks something fumigated by the steam of liquor so as to carry the fragrance, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may seek an intoxicating drink and yet the offence does not become a transgression?" Upāli, there is: if one drinks the liquor of the gods, it becomes a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving liquor as liquor, seeks it, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If, perceiving liquor as not being liquor, one seeks it, what becomes of it?" There is no offence. "If, perceiving what is not liquor as liquor, one seeks it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If, perceiving what is not liquor as not being liquor, one seeks it, what becomes of it?" There is no offence. "Venerable one, if a monk, in the course of seeking liquor or fruit-liquor, undergoes a change of marks and becomes a nun, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a nun, in the course of seeking liquor or fruit-liquor, undergoes a change of marks and becomes a monk, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if one who has been given the training seeks liquor or fruit-liquor, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a nun seeks liquor or fruit-liquor, what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. For a female trainee, a novice nun, or a male novice, it becomes a wrongdoing.

In brief:

By messenger, letter, or sign,
through another's word, or passed from one to the next,
one who is mad, disturbed in mind, or afflicted by illness,
one who is deaf, dull-witted, or asleep,
one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated,
one who has entered meditative absorption — these are the final cases.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk goes to the midday meal in a village without having sought permission from a monk who is present, it is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk seeks permission from another monk by sending a messenger and then goes, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "In the same way, if one sends a letter, a sign, a word through another, or has word relayed from one to the next and then goes, all of these become wrongdoings."

"Venerable one, if a monk seeks permission from a mad monk and then enters the village for the midday meal, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "In the same way, if one seeks permission from a monk who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, dull-witted, mute, deaf, asleep, delirious, one who has entered meditative absorption, or a monk who is staying in another place, and then goes — all of these become wrongdoings."

In brief:

By mantra, through the sky, or by means of the body,
a remote place, or a place where there is no monk,
a temple, a circumambulation circuit,
a boundary, the night, and the fourth case,
a householder, an interruption, the Saṅgha, one who has been given the training, and a nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk renders himself invisible by means of a mantra or medicine and goes, having failed to seek permission from a monk who is present, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk goes to the midday meal in a village through the sky, having failed to seek permission from a monk who is present, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a noble monk seeks permission from another monk using the noble language and goes, but that other monk did not seek it in the noble language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If a noble monk seeks permission using a border-region language and goes, but that other monk did not seek it in the border-region language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If a border-region monk seeks permission using a border-region language and goes, but that other monk did not seek it in the border-region language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If a border-region monk seeks permission using the noble language and goes, but that other monk did not seek it in the noble language, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk signals his intention to go to a monk who is present by means of a bodily gesture and then goes, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk perceives a remote place as not being remote, seeks permission, and goes to a village, what becomes of it?" There is no offence.

"Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk goes to the midday meal in a village without having sought permission from a monk who is present and yet incurs no transgression?" Upāli, there is. It is the case in which that monk is dwelling in a place where there are no monks.

"Venerable one, if there is a temple inside a village, or a circumambulation circuit, and one goes from there without having sought permission, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk goes through the sky, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if permission is sought from a monk who is travelling through the sky, is that considered to be having sought permission?" Upāli, it is considered to be having made it known. In the same way, when one who is on the ground does so in regard to one who is in the sky, and when one who is within a boundary seeks permission from one who is outside the boundary, is that considered to be having sought permission? Upāli, it is considered to be having made it known.

Venerable one, if a monk goes to a village in the afternoon without having sought permission from a monk who is present, and then the night passes and he has become a nun, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if a nun goes from a nuns' residence to a village in the afternoon without having sought permission from a nun who is present, and then the night passes and she has become a monk, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving the afternoon to be afternoon, goes to a village in the afternoon while a monk is present and without having sought permission, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If one goes at an improper time while perceiving it to be the proper time, what becomes of it? There is no offence. If one perceives the proper time to be an improper time, what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. If one perceives the proper time as the proper time, what becomes of it? There is no offence.

Venerable one, if a monk seeks permission from a layman, what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one makes it known to a woman, to a eunuch, to an expelled nun, to a father, to a mother, to one who has slain an arhat, to one who with malicious intent has shed the blood of a Tathāgata, to a tīrthika, to one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, to a thief, to one who does not reside in the community, to one who lives separately, to one who has drawn near to apostasy, to one who has previously committed an offence, to one who has previously caused a schism, or to one who has surrendered the training — in all these cases it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk may go to a village in the afternoon without incurring a fault? Upāli, there is. For instance, if one of the eight impediments has arisen for that monk in the monastery. Venerable one, what if the entire Saṅgha, or a preceptor, or an abbot, or any other learned individual who leads a holy life, should go to the village in the afternoon at an improper time without having sought permission from a monk — should they too seek permission? Upāli, they too should make it known.

Venerable one, if one who has surrendered the training goes to a village in the afternoon while a monk is present and without having sought permission, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. Venerable one, if a nun goes from a nuns' residence to a village while nuns are present and having sought permission, what becomes of it? It is a transgression. For a female trainee and female novices, it is a wrongdoing; for male novices, it is a wrongdoing.

In summary, the exemptions are as follows:

By messenger, by letter, by hand-signal,
by having another say it, by relay from one to the next — for the mad, the mentally disturbed, the ill, the deaf, the dull-witted, those asleep,
those who cry out in pain, the intoxicated, and those departing from meditative absorption — these are the last.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, the Blessed One has also declared that if a monk has been invited as a meal-guest to a village, whether for a meal before noon or after, and he goes to another village without having sought permission from that householder, it is a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk who has been invited as a meal-guest makes it known to the householder by messenger and then goes to another village, what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if he makes it known by letter, by hand-signal, by having another say it, or by relay from one to the next, and then goes to another village — in all these cases it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk has been invited as a meal-guest to another village, whether for a meal before noon or after, and he goes to another village without having sought permission from the householder — who is mad — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise in the case of one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who cries out in pain, one who is intoxicated, and one going to stay elsewhere — in all these cases, going to another village without having sought permission is a wrongdoing.

In brief:

Voice and body and solitude, mantra and mark and the fourth, food and the two kinds of invitation — these apply to eunuchs, to those under training, and to nuns.

Venerable one: if a monk has sought permission from the householder in the noble language (Sanskrit), and has come to the village, but the householder did not seek permission in the noble language — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. If the monk sought permission in the language of the frontier regions, and came to the village, but the householder did not seek permission in the language of the frontier regions — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. If a person of the frontier regions sought permission in the language of the frontier regions, and came to the village, but the householder did not seek permission in the language of the frontier regions — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. If a person of the frontier regions sought permission from the householder in the noble language, and went to another village, but the householder did not seek permission in the noble language — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: if a monk sought permission from the householder by means of a bodily sign, and came to the village — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable one: if a monk, perceiving a secluded place as not secluded, sought permission and came to the village — what becomes of it? There is no fault. Venerable one: if a monk, having made himself invisible by mantra or medicine, sought permission and came to the village — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: if a monk went to the village without having sought permission from the householder, and in the meantime changed his status and became a nun — what becomes of it? It is a transgression. Venerable one: if a nun went to the village without having sought permission from the householder, and in the meantime changed her status and became a monk — what becomes of it? It is a transgression.

Venerable one: if a monk, perceiving a person as a person, went to the village without having sought permission — what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If he perceived a person as a non-human being, it is a wrongdoing. If he perceived a non-human being as a person, it is a wrongdoing. If he perceived a non-human being as a non-human being, it is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: if a monk was invited as a meal-guest to a village for things other than food — namely for drink, for delicacies, or for licking-foods and so forth — and went to the village without having sought permission from the householder — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: are there cases where a monk goes to a single village without having sought permission from the householder and yet does not incur a fault or transgression? Upāli, yes there are: entering a village and passing the time until the shadow has moved.

Venerable one: if a monk is invited as a meal-guest by a woman, a eunuch, or a hermaphrodite, and goes to the village without having sought permission — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable one: if one who has received the training precepts is invited as a meal-guest to a village for food, and goes to the village without having sought permission from the householder — what becomes of it? It is a transgression. Venerable one: if a nun is invited as a meal-guest to a village for food, and goes to the village without having sought permission from the householder — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. For female probationers, novice nuns, and male novices it is a wrongdoing.

In brief:

Mantra and sky — likewise — mark and likewise the fourth, village and wandering in open space,
the not-having-stayed and the having-stayed.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable Blessed One, you have said that if a monk, in the home of a royal-clan king — one consecrated by having the royal water poured upon his head — has not gathered together the jewels or things that count as jewels before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, and then passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity, he incurs a transgression. Venerable one: if a monk, before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, has not gathered the jewels or things that count as jewels, but has made himself invisible by mantra or medicine, and then passes beyond the near vicinity of the threshold — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: if a monk, before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, has not gathered the jewels or things that count as jewels, and then passes through the sky beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: if a monk, before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, has not gathered the jewels or things that count as jewels, and while in the act of passing beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity the night-watch changes and he becomes a nun — what becomes of it? It is a transgression.

Venerable one: if a nun, while in the act of passing beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity, the night-watch changes and she becomes a monk — what becomes of it? It is a transgression.

Venerable one: if a monk perceives that the dawn, which has not yet broken, has not yet broken, and without gathering the jewels or things that count as jewels passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If he perceives that the dawn, which has not yet broken, has already broken, and then passes beyond — what becomes of it? There is no offense. If he perceives that the dawn, which has already broken, has not yet broken, and then passes beyond — it is a wrongdoing. If he perceives that the dawn, which has already broken, has already broken, and then passes beyond — there is no offense.

Venerable one: if a monk perceives that the jewels or things that count as jewels, which have not been gathered, have not been gathered, and passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If he perceives that what has not been gathered has been gathered, and then passes beyond — what becomes of it? There is no offense. If he perceives that what has been gathered has not been gathered, and then passes beyond — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. If he perceives that what has been gathered has been gathered, and then passes beyond — what becomes of it? There is no offense.

Venerable one: if a monk perceives a human being as a human being and passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If he perceives a human being as a non-human being — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. If he perceives a non-human being as a human being — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. If he perceives a non-human being as a non-human being — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: if a monk, in a village other than Rājagṛha, before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, without having gathered the jewels or things that count as jewels, passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: is there a case in which a monk passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, without having gathered the jewels or things that count as jewels, and yet incurs no offense? Upāli, there is — namely, when that monk departs while Rājagṛha is empty.

Venerable one: if all the royal palaces of Rājagṛha are surrounded and whether they are curtained off or not, and that monk, before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, without gathering the jewels or things that count as jewels, passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? It is a transgression.

Venerable one: if all of Rājagṛha is curtailed off and only half of it is surrounded, and the monk, before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, without gathering the jewels or things that count as jewels, passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? It is a transgression.

Venerable one: if a monk, after dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, gathers the jewels or things that count as jewels and then passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? There is no offense.

Venerable one: if a monk, before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, gathers the jewels or things that count as jewels and then passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: is there a case in which a monk passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, without having gathered the jewels or things that count as jewels, and yet the offense does not become a transgression? Upāli, there is — namely, those dwelling in a destiny other than the human destiny: if one passes beyond a single threshold of theirs, it becomes a wrongdoing.

Venerable one: if one who has been given the training precepts passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, without having gathered the jewels or things that count as jewels — what becomes of it? It is a transgression.

Venerable one: if a nun, before dawn has broken and the sky has brightened, without having gathered the jewels or things that count as jewels, passes beyond the threshold or its immediate vicinity — what becomes of it? It is a transgression.

What of a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a novice nun, a novice monk — for all of them it becomes a wrongdoing.

In summary:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
by having another speak, or from one to another,
by one who is mad, mentally disordered, or ill,
by one who is mute, simple-minded, or asleep, by one who is intoxicated, drunk, or in deep meditative absorption — these are the final cases.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has also declared that when a monk, at the recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra every half-month, says the following words — 'Venerable one, I now request that these Dharma teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection' — it becomes a transgression." "Yes," declared the Blessed One. "Venerable one, if a monk sends a messenger saying, 'Venerable one, I now request that these Dharma teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection' — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one sends a letter, a gesture, has another speak the words, or conveys the message from one person to another — in all such cases it becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk says to a mad monk: 'Venerable one, I now request that these Dharma teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection' — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one says this to a mentally disordered monk, one afflicted by illness, one who is simple-minded, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is asleep, one who is intoxicated, one who is drunk, or a monk dwelling in another realm of existence — in all such cases it becomes a wrongdoing.

In summary:

By voice, by body, in private, by mantra, by sign — the fourth case — to laypeople and the like, for the sake of another, and to a nun.

"Venerable one, if a monk who knows the noble language says in that noble language, 'I now request, venerable one, that these Dharma teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection,' and the monk to whom it is said does not know the noble language — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who knows the noble language says these words in a border dialect, and the monk to whom it is said does not know the border dialect — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who speaks a border dialect says these words in a border dialect, and the monk does not know that border dialect — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one who speaks a border dialect says these words in the noble language — 'I now request, venerable one, that these Dharma teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection' — and the monk does not know the noble language — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk conveys this meaning through bodily gesture — making it understood that 'I request, venerable one, that these Dharma teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection' — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a private place as not private, says, 'I now request, venerable one, that these Dharma teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection' — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk renders himself invisible through mantra or medicine, and says, 'I now request, venerable one, that this be done' — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if while such words are being spoken the sex changes and the monk becomes a nun — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if while such words are being spoken the sex changes and the nun becomes a monk — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving one who has received full ordination as one who has received full ordination, says, 'Venerable one, I now request that these teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection' — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If one perceives one who has received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives one who has not received full ordination as one who has received full ordination, it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives one who has not received full ordination as one who has not received full ordination, it is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if a monk says to a layman, 'Venerable one, I now request that these teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection' — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Likewise, if such words are spoken to a woman, to a hermaphrodite, to an expelled nun, to a father, to a mother, to one who has killed an arhat, to one who with malicious intent has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata, to a non-Buddhist adherent, to one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, to one who is dwelling in a place of thieves, to one who is without a dwelling, to one dwelling separately, to one who has previously caused a dispute, or to one in whom a previous offense has arisen — in all cases it is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, if such words are spoken to those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, to those who have taken sides in such a schism, or to those who are being given training — what becomes of it?" In all cases it is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk says to nuns, to probationary nuns, to female novices, or to male novices: 'Venerable one, I now request that these teachings be included in the sūtra collection and gathered into the sūtra collection' — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

In brief:

By message, letter, hand-signal, speaking through another, one to another,
one who has gone mad, one mentally disturbed, one who is ill, going on a journey —

The noble Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a monk who makes a needle-case from bone, tooth, or horn commits a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk has another make a needle-case from bone, tooth, or horn on his behalf — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Likewise, if he causes it to be made by sending a message, by letter, by hand-signal, speaking through another, or relayed one to another — it is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if he causes a madman to make it, or one mentally disturbed, or one tormented by illness, or one who is foolish, or one who is mute, or one who is dumb, or one dwelling in another region — in all cases it is a wrongdoing."

In brief:

Caught by another, for another's sake — the fourth is improper, as is the seventh; likewise excepted is the last.

"Venerable one, if a monk approves of a needle-case from bone, tooth, or horn that was begun by another — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk makes a needle-case for the sake of another — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk makes one improperly and then discards it — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if while a monk is making a needle-case from bone, tooth, or horn the sex changes and he becomes a nun — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if while a nun is making a needle-case from bone, tooth, or horn the sex changes and she becomes a monk — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving a human being as a human being, has a needle-case made — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If one perceives a human being as a non-human being, it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives a non-human being as a human being, it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives a non-human being as a non-human being, it is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk who has a needle-case made from bone, tooth, or horn commits no transgression thereby?" Upāli, there is: when it is made from what is improper.

"Venerable one, if one begins while not yet fully ordained and it is completed while not yet fully ordained — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one begins while not yet fully ordained and it is completed at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one begins while not yet fully ordained and it is completed after full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one begins at the moment of full ordination and it is completed at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one begins after full ordination and it is completed after full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If one begins after full ordination and it is completed while not yet fully ordained — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk has other implements besides a needle-case made from bone, tooth, or horn — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if one who has given the training has a needle-case made from bone, tooth, or horn — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If a nun has it made, it becomes a transgression. If a female trainee, a female novice, or a male novice has it made — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

In brief:

Made by another, for another, not held, with the marks, likewise the fourth,
laypeople and the like — these are what is improper, and the seventh.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that if a monk makes a seat or bench for the Saṅgha more than eight finger-breadths of the Sugata in height — except for mortise work in the legs — and retains it, it becomes a transgression. Venerable one, if a monk finishes off something begun by another that exceeds eight Sugata finger-breadths in height — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if a monk has it made for another's sake — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable one, if one makes it improperly and then discards it — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable one, if a monk who was having a seat or bench for the Saṅgha made in excess of eight Sugata finger-breadths undergoes a change of marks and becomes a nun — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a nun who was having a seat or bench for the Saṅgha made in excess of eight Sugata finger-breadths undergoes a change of marks and becomes a monk — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "Venerable one, if a monk, perceiving that a seat or bench for the Saṅgha is in excess of eight Sugata finger-breadths and knowing it to be in excess, has it made — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If it is in excess and one does not perceive it as in excess, and has it made — there is no offense." "If it is not in excess and one perceives it as in excess, and has it made — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If it is not in excess and one does not perceive it as in excess — there is no offense."

"Venerable one, if a monk has a seat or bench for the Saṅgha made for a layperson in excess of eight Sugata finger-breadths — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Likewise, if it is made for a female trainee, a hermaphrodite, an expelled nun" — and so on through to having it made for one who has been given the full training — "in all cases it becomes a wrongdoing."

"Venerable one, is there any case in which a monk who has a seat or bench for the Saṅgha made in excess of eight Sugata finger-breadths commits no transgression thereby?" Upāli, there is: when it is made from what is improper.

"Venerable one, if one begins making a seat or bench for the Saṅgha exceeding eight Sugata finger-breadths while not yet fully ordained and it is completed while not yet fully ordained — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one begins while not yet fully ordained and it is completed at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one begins while not yet fully ordained and it is completed after full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one begins at the moment of full ordination and it is completed at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one begins at the moment of full ordination and it is completed after full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"If one begins at the moment of full ordination and it is completed at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a transgression. "If one begins at the moment of full ordination and it is completed before full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

In brief:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
Through an intermediary, from one to another,
Through one who has gone mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
One who is ill, one who is mute, one who has gone elsewhere.

Venerable monks: if a monk causes the Saṅgha's chair or small chair to be used as a messenger for an amount exceeding eight of the Sugata's finger-breadths — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one causes it to be done by written letter, by gesture, through an intermediary, or relayed from one to another, all of these become wrongdoings. Venerable monks: if a monk causes one who has gone mad to act using the Saṅgha's chair or small chair for an amount exceeding eight of the Sugata's finger-breadths — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, if one causes it to be done by one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is stupid, one who is dumb, one who is mute, or one who is dwelling elsewhere — all of these become wrongdoings.

Venerable monks: if one who has been given a training rule causes an act to be done involving the Saṅgha's chair or small chair for an amount exceeding eight of the Sugata's finger-breadths — what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If a fully ordained nun causes it to be done — what becomes of it? It is a transgression. If a female trainee, a female novice, or male novices cause it to be done — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing.

Just as this chapter on the basis of training has been set forth, so too the same is to be stated in the same manner concerning the alms bowl, the sitting mat, the blanket cover, the cloth of the summer rains, and the Sugata's robe of Dharma.

Here ends the section on transgressions from the noble Vinaya scripture.

The noble Vinaya scripture, the fifteenth fascicle. In brief:

One who has gone mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
One who is ill, one who is mute, one who has gone elsewhere,
The improper, the sign, and likewise

The fourth and the seventh are the same.

The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that if a monk lifts and receives alms food from a fully ordained nun who is not a relative while she is on her alms round, it constitutes an offense requiring individual confession. Venerable One, if a monk lifts and receives alms food from a mad fully ordained nun while she is present on her alms round — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Likewise, if he receives it from a nun whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is stupid, one who is dumb, one who is mute, or one who is dwelling elsewhere, and eats it — all of these become wrongdoings."

"Venerable One, can it be that a monk who lifts and receives alms food from a fully ordained nun who is not a relative while she is present on her alms round would not incur a transgression as a downfall?" Upāli, if one eats what is improper food it becomes a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk receives staple and non-staple food from a fully ordained nun who is not a relative, one who is on her alms round and is present, and in the midst of receiving it a change of gender occurs and she becomes a fully ordained monk — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a fully ordained nun receives alms food from a fully ordained monk who is not a relative, one who is on his alms round and is present, and in the midst of receiving it a change of gender occurs and he becomes a fully ordained monk — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk perceives a fully ordained person as fully ordained and receives and lifts alms food from that person — what becomes of it?" It requires individual confession. "If one perceives a fully ordained person as not fully ordained — it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives a person who is not fully ordained as fully ordained — it is a wrongdoing. If one perceives a person who is not fully ordained as not fully ordained — it is a wrongdoing." Likewise, with regard to perceiving a human as a human, the same fourfold treatment applies.

"Venerable One, if one receives and lifts food while not yet fully ordained, and accepts it while not yet fully ordained — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if one receives and lifts food while not yet fully ordained, and accepts it at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one receives and lifts food while not yet fully ordained, and accepts it after full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one receives and lifts food at the moment of full ordination, and accepts it at the moment of full ordination — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one receives and lifts food at the moment of full ordination, and accepts it as a fully ordained person — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one receives and lifts food after full ordination, and accepts it after full ordination — what becomes of it?" It requires individual confession. "If one receives and lifts food after full ordination, and accepts it while not yet fully ordained — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

In brief:

Food and mantra likewise,

One person receiving for another's female paṇḍaka,

Paṇḍaka women and the like,

One who has surrendered training, and nuns.

Venerable One, if a monk receives and accepts things other than food — namely prepared provisions, drinks, things to be licked, and things to be tasted — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable One, if a monk, having taken almsfood from a nun who is not a relative while she stands in the alleyway, on behalf of someone else, and then consumes it himself — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable One, if a monk takes almsfood from a nun who is not a relative and consumes it, is there a case in which the individual wrongdoing need not be confessed? Upāli, there is. It is like this: if that monk is standing in the alleyway and a nun is sitting in a summer retreat house or in a village and gives it — it becomes a wrongdoing. Venerable One, if a nun takes almsfood from a nun who is a female paṇḍaka standing in the alleyway and then accepts it — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable One, if a monk takes almsfood from a nun who is a female paṇḍaka standing in the alleyway and then accepts it — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Likewise, from a nun who has been expelled, and so on through all the cases up to one previously embroiled in disputes: if one has taken almsfood from any of these and eaten it, all of them become wrongdoings. Venerable One, if a monk takes almsfood from a nun who has created a schism in the Saṅgha, or who has taken a partisan side, or who has surrendered her training, while she stands in the alleyway, and then accepts it — what becomes of it? It requires individual confession. Venerable One, if a monk takes almsfood from a female probationer or a novice nun and then accepts it — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Venerable One, if one who has surrendered training takes almsfood from a monk who is not a relative while he stands in the alleyway, and then accepts it — what becomes of it? It requires individual confession. Venerable One, if a nun takes almsfood from a monk who is not a relative while he stands in the alleyway, and then accepts it — what becomes of it? It requires individual confession. If one takes almsfood from a novice monk and accepts it — what becomes of it? It is a wrongdoing. Just as a monk must make individual confession, so too in the case of female probationers, novice nuns, and novice monks it becomes a wrongdoing.

In brief:

Verbal message, written letter, hand-signal,

Quoting another's words, and passing from one to another;

One who is mad, whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill,

One who is senseless, a fool, one overcome by sleep,

One who is delirious, one who is intoxicated,

And one who is entering meditative absorption — these are the final cases.

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, Blessed One, if the Blessed One had instructed those monks to say this to that nun, 'Sister nun, stay here until the meal is finished' — and if some monks did not dare to say this to that nun, they must make individual confession. That being so, Venerable One, if a monk conveys the instruction through a messenger and thereby has her accept it — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Likewise, if one conveys and has her accept it through a written letter, through a hand-signal, through quoting another's words, or through passing the message from one to another — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a nun who is insane and wandering is present and those monks have eaten without conveying the instruction to her — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Likewise, if monks eat without conveying the instruction to a nun who is mentally disturbed, or afflicted by illness, or mentally dull, or mute, or deaf, or who has gone to stay elsewhere — all of these are wrongdoings."

"Venerable One, if a nun is waiting for the sake of the monks and falls asleep, and those monks convey the instruction to her while she is sleeping and then eat — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Likewise, if the instruction is conveyed to a nun who is snoring, or intoxicated, or in meditative absorption, and they then eat — all of these are wrongdoings."

In brief:

By voice and body, by a private place, by mantra and sign — these being the fourth — by improper food, by the layman, by the training given, and by the nun.

"Venerable One, if a monk who is a noble one conveys the instruction to a nun in the noble language, and that nun does not accept it in the noble language — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If a noble one conveys the instruction in the language of the frontier regions, and that nun does not accept it in the language of the frontier regions — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one from the frontier regions conveys the instruction in the language of the frontier regions, and that nun does not accept it in that language — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "If one from the frontier regions conveys the instruction in the noble language, and that nun does not accept it in the noble language — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk conveys the instruction by means of a bodily gesture and she accepts it — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if monks, with the perception that a nun who is waiting is not in a secluded place when she actually is, convey the instruction to her and eat — what becomes of it?" There is no transgression.

"Venerable One, if a monk makes himself invisible by means of a mantra or medicine and eats without conveying the instruction to a nun — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk eats without conveying the instruction while a nun is waiting, and in the meantime his sex changes and he becomes a nun — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable One, if a nun eats without conveying the instruction while she is waiting for the sake of monks, and in the meantime her sex changes and she becomes a monk — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk, perceiving a fully ordained nun as a fully ordained nun, eats without conveying the instruction to her — what becomes of it?" Individual confession is required. "If he perceives a fully ordained nun as not fully ordained and eats without conveying the instruction — it is a wrongdoing." "If he perceives a not-fully-ordained woman as fully ordained — it is a wrongdoing." "If he perceives a not-fully-ordained woman as not fully ordained — it is a wrongdoing."

"Venerable One, if a nun is waiting while serving a single dish of improper food, and monks eat without conveying the instruction to her — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Venerable One, if a nun is waiting while serving, apart from cooked grain, other kinds of prepared food — drinks, eatables, lickables, and the like — and monks eat without conveying the instruction to her — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk eats without conveying the instruction while a laywoman is waiting — what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing. "Likewise, if he eats without conveying the instruction while waiting is being done by an expelled nun, or a woman who has killed her father, or one who has killed her mother, or one who has killed an arhat, or one who with malicious intent has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata, or a tīrthika, or one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, or one dwelling as a thief, or one living separately, or one who has left the community, or one against whom a prior offense has arisen, or one who was previously involved in a schism — all of these are wrongdoings."

"Venerable One, if a monk receives the instruction conveyed by a nun who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or one who has taken sides in a schism, or one who has been given a training — what becomes of it?"

It is to be confessed individually.

"Venerable One, what becomes of it if a monk receives instruction conveyed by a nun, a female trainee, or a novice nun?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, what becomes of it if a nun conveys food that has been received from one who has been given a training?" It is to be confessed individually.

"Venerable One, what becomes of it if a nun conveys food that she has received and then seeks it?" It is to be confessed individually. For a female trainee, a novice nun, and male novices, it becomes a wrongdoing.

In brief:

By messenger, by written letter, by hand signal,
By speaking through another, from one to another,
By the mad, the mentally disturbed, the afflicted,
The deaf, and the foolish.

The venerable Upāli then put a further question to the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has also declared to the Saṅgha that regarding one who has become a student-village — one upon whom a training vow has been conferred — if a monk who has accepted a training vow with respect to such a student-village makes an arrangement and accepts food through his own lay supporter and seeks it, that is to be confessed individually." In that case, "Venerable One, if a monk, from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred, makes an arrangement and accepts food through a messenger and seeks it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

Similarly, if he accepts and eats it through a written letter, through a hand signal, through speaking via another, or through transmission from one person to another — all of these become wrongdoings.

"Venerable One, if a monk accepts food and provisions from a mad person's village upon which a training vow has been conferred and seeks it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

Similarly, if he accepts and eats food and provisions from one who is mentally disturbed, one afflicted by illness, a foolish person, a mute, a deaf person, a person of intermediate sex (paṇḍaka), a female of intermediate sex, or one who has gone to dwell elsewhere — all of these become wrongdoings.

In brief:

By another for another's sake, likewise;

By mantra and medicine, by food unfit,

And by a guest at night — likewise;

Thus the fourth case: the nun.

"Venerable One, if another person accepts food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred by a monk and then seeks it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk accepts food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred, on behalf of another, and seeks them for himself, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk, having concealed his own identity by means of mantra or medicine, accepts food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred and seeks them, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk seeks from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred — other than cooked grain — other kinds of provisions, drinks, things to taste, things to lick, and the like, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, if a monk accepts unfit food from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred and seeks it, what becomes of it?" It is a wrongdoing.

"Venerable One, is there a case in which a monk who accepts food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred through his own lay supporter and seeks them does not incur a downfall?" Upāli, there is. It is as follows: a monk was previously invited to a village as a guest, and after that the Saṅgha conferred a training vow upon it.

"Venerable One, if a monk seeks food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred, and then changes status and becomes a nun, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually.

"Venerable One, if a nun seeks food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred, and then changes status and becomes a monk, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually.

"Venerable One, if a monk accepts and seeks food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred, perceiving it as having been given, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually.

"Venerable One, if a monk accepts and seeks food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred, perceiving what has been given as not having been given, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "If he perceives what has not been given as having been given and seeks it, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "If he perceives what has not been given as not having been given, what becomes of it?" There is no offence.

"Venerable One, if a monk accepts and seeks food and provisions from the people of a village upon which a training vow has been conferred, perceiving those people as human beings, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "If he perceives human beings as non-human beings, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "If he perceives non-human beings as human beings, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "If he perceives non-human beings as non-human beings, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually.

"Venerable One, if one who has conferred training vows accepts and seeks food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "Venerable One, if a nun accepts and seeks food and provisions from a village upon which a training vow has been conferred, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "If a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a female novice, or male novices seek it, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually.

In brief:

By messenger, by letter, by gesture,
by having another say it, from one to another,
one who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is sick, a deaf-mute — these are the cases.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has taught that when the Saṅgha is dwelling in a monastery, one should seek food and provisions with apprehension, with fear, and while being frightened and alarmed. If a monk, while dwelling in such a monastery with apprehension, fear, and while being frightened and alarmed, takes food and provisions from beyond the boundary of the monastery courtyard and then seeks food and provisions within the monastery courtyard, it is to be confessed individually." To this the Blessed One declared: "Venerable One, if a monk, while dwelling in such a monastery, takes food and provisions from beyond the boundary of the monastery courtyard and seeks food and provisions within the monastery courtyard through a messenger, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "Likewise, if he does so by letter, by gesture, by having another say it, or by passing it from one to another, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually.

"Venerable One, if a monk dwelling in such a monastery takes food and provisions from a madman beyond the boundary of the monastery courtyard and seeks them, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "Likewise, if he takes and consumes food and provisions from beyond the boundary of the monastery courtyard from one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is mentally deficient, one who is mute, one who is deaf-mute, a hermaphrodite, a female hermaphrodite, one with both characteristics, or one dwelling elsewhere — in all such cases it is to be confessed individually."

In brief:

When another acts on behalf of another in the same way,
by mantra and medicine, and what is unsuitable, by full understanding, and likewise the thief, the characteristics, and the fourth.

"Venerable One, if a monk dwelling in such a monastery, while within the monastery courtyard, seeks food and provisions that another person has taken, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "Venerable One, if a monk dwelling in such a monastery himself takes food and provisions intended for others and seeks them within the monastery courtyard, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "Venerable One, if a monk dwelling in such a monastery disguises himself through mantra and medicine so as not to be recognizable, and then accepts and seeks food and provisions within the monastery courtyard, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "Venerable One, if a monk dwelling in such a monastery accepts and seeks things other than food — such as provisions, drinks, soft foodstuffs, and things to be licked — what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually.

"Venerable One, if a monk dwelling in such a monastery accepts and seeks improper food within the monastery courtyard, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "Venerable One, is there any case in which a monk dwelling in such a monastery might accept and seek provisions and foodstuffs within the monastery courtyard without incurring an offense?" Upāli, there is: if he eats in a properly designated forest, there is no offense. "Venerable One, is there any case in which a monk dwelling in such a monastery might accept and seek provisions and foodstuffs both in a properly designated forest and within the monastery courtyard without incurring an offense?" Upāli, there is: if that monk eats while staying in close proximity to a band of thieves. "Venerable One, if a monk is in the act of accepting and seeking provisions and foodstuffs within the monastery courtyard and his sex changes so that he becomes a nun, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "Venerable One, if a nun is in the act of accepting and seeking foodstuffs and provisions within the monastery courtyard and her sex changes so that she becomes a monk, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually.

"Venerable One, if a monk perceives a properly designated place as properly designated and then accepts and seeks provisions and foodstuffs there, what becomes of it?" There is no offense. If he perceives a properly designated place as not properly designated, it becomes a transgression. "If he perceives a place that is not properly designated as properly designated and seeks food there, what becomes of it?" There is no offense. "If he perceives a place that is not properly designated as not properly designated and seeks food there, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. Likewise, the same analysis is to be applied regarding perceiving a person as a person.

"Venerable One, if one who has been given a training rule accepts and seeks provisions and foodstuffs in a forest that is not properly designated, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. "Venerable One, if a nun accepts and seeks provisions and foodstuffs within the courtyard of a monastery that is not properly designated, what becomes of it?" It is to be confessed individually. For female probationers (śikṣāmāṇā), novice nuns, and novice monks, it becomes a transgression.

This completes the training rule on individual liberation as found in the section on full ordination within the noble Vinaya.

In brief:

Shape and color, impediment,
Two preceptors, expulsion,
Place and person, the island groups,
Ground and boundary, and full ordination.
The fifth, and the three acts,
Householder, border regions, and the last.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has said that one who resembles a woman in bodily appearance should not be ordained and given full ordination. Now, if a man whose complexion resembles a woman's, whose physical marks resemble a woman's, whose voice resembles a woman's, and whose bodily shape resembles a woman's were given full ordination as a monk in proper form, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would be called a full ordination, and the act of ordination would be valid. "Venerable One, if a woman whose complexion resembles a man's, whose physical marks resemble a man's, whose voice resembles a man's, and whose bodily shape resembles a man's were given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would be called a full ordination, and the act of ordination would be valid.

"Venerable One, if a person who possesses the qualities of an impediment declares, 'I possess the qualities of an impediment,' and the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk in proper form, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would not be called a full ordination, yet the act of ordination would be valid.

"Venerable One, if a person who possesses the qualities of an impediment declares, 'I do not possess the qualities of an impediment,' and the monks then give that person full ordination as a monk in proper form, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would not be called a full ordination, and those who perform the ordination also incur a transgression.

"If a person who does not possess the qualities of an impediment declares, 'I do possess them,' and the monks give that person full ordination as a monk in proper form, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would be called a full ordination, and those who perform the ordination incur a transgression.

"If a person who does not possess the qualities of an impediment declares, 'I do not possess them,' and the monks give that person full ordination as a monk in proper form, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would be called a full ordination, and those who perform the ordination would not incur a transgression.

"Venerable One, if one who is conferring full ordination does so without having asked about the qualities of an impediment, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would be called a full ordination, yet those who perform the ordination incur a transgression.

"Venerable One, if someone who has not reached the age of twenty is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, with the exception of one who is able to know, all others would be called fully ordained.

"Venerable One, if full ordination is given without a bowl being present, or without robes being present, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would be called a full ordination, and those who perform the ordination incur a transgression.

"Venerable One, if full ordination is given without the permission of one's father and mother, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would be called a full ordination, and those who perform the ordination incur a transgression.

"Venerable One, are there cases where one ordained without the permission of one's father and mother would not incur wrongdoing?" Upāli, there are. These are: where the father and mother have passed away, where they have taken rebirth as animals, or where the permission of a master has been granted.

"Venerable One, if a child is in such a situation, to whom should one apply? One should apply to the person acknowledged as his parent."

"Venerable One, if a slave is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would be called a full ordination, and those who perform the ordination incur a transgression.

"Venerable One, if someone who is a thief, a debt-evader, one cherished by a king, one at enmity with a king, or one who performs acts harmful to a king is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would be called a full ordination, and those who perform the ordination incur a transgression.

"Venerable One, if a eunuch is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would not be called a full ordination, and those who perform the ordination also incur a transgression.

"Venerable One, if a hermaphrodite is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, it would not be called a full ordination, and those who perform the ordination incur a transgression.

"Venerable One, if someone who has been expelled from the community of nuns is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, in some cases it would be called a full ordination, and in some cases it would not. One who has been expelled from the community of nuns on account of unchaste conduct — this would not be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, one should treat them as though they are invisible to the eye. One who has been expelled from the community of nuns merely because of physical contact — this would be called a full ordination; do not drive such a person away.

"Venerable one, if a person who has not killed their mother is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, in some cases it would be called a full ordination, and in some cases it would not. One who has separated from their mother's livelihood under the mistaken perception that she belongs to another — or even one who has merely contracted such a relationship — this would be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, do not treat them as invisible to the eye. One who has knowingly separated from their mother's livelihood — this would not be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, do not let them be visible to the eye. Just as this has been stated regarding one who has not killed their mother, the same should be said regarding one who has killed their father and one who has killed an arhat.

"Venerable one, if a person who caused a schism in the Saṅgha then relinquished their training and fell away, and who thereafter, with faith in the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya, went forth into renunciation, received full ordination, and sought the status of a fully ordained monk — if a monk were to give such a person full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, in some cases it would be called a full ordination, and in some cases it would not. One who split the Saṅgha under the perception that it was not in accordance with the Dharma — this would not be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, treat them as invisible to the eye. One who split the Saṅgha under the perception that it was in accordance with the Dharma — this would be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, do not treat them as invisible to the eye.

"Venerable one, if a person who drew blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" Upāli, in some cases it would be called a full ordination, and in some cases it would not. One who knowingly drew blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent — this would not be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, treat them as invisible to the eye. One who drew blood without knowing, without malicious intent — this would be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, do not treat them as invisible to the eye.

"Venerable one, if a tīrthika is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" In some cases it would be called a full ordination, and in some cases it would not. One who has not abandoned their tīrthika views — this would not be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, treat them as invisible to the eye. But if they have abandoned those views, it would be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, do not treat them as invisible to the eye.

"Venerable one, if a person who has gone over to the tīrthikas is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" In some cases it would be called a full ordination, and in some cases it would not. One who, without having relinquished their training, took up the banner of the tīrthikas and delights in their views — this would not be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, treat them as invisible to the eye. One who relinquished their training, then took up the banner of the tīrthikas but does not delight in their views — this would be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, do not treat them as invisible to the eye.

"Venerable one, if a person who abides as a thief is given full ordination, would that be called a full ordination?" In some cases it would not be called a full ordination, and in some cases it would be. One who, with a thieving mind, received their insignia and then participated in the restoration ceremony two or three times — this would not be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, treat them as invisible to the eye. One who, with a thieving mind, had not yet gone forth and had participated in the restoration ceremony once, or had not yet participated at all — this would be called a full ordination; even if such a person is nearby, do not treat them as invisible to the eye.

"Venerable one, if a person who has been restrained by the training surrenders the training, becomes a layman, and then receives full ordination again in this well-taught Dharma and Vinaya — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed."

"Venerable one, if one who has previously committed an offense receives full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is not called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed."

"Venerable one, how much is required for one to be called a person who has previously committed an offense?" Upāli replied: "One who previously went forth without surrendering the training and then incurred any one of the four defeats, and who, without having surrendered the training, went and became a layman, and who then again goes forth and receives full ordination in this well-taught Dharma and Vinaya and wishes to be established as a monk — this is called a person who has previously committed an offense."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One declared that a person who has previously committed an offense must not be given ordination or full ordination. If such a person is given full ordination — does a valid full ordination result?" Upāli replied: "There is a case where it does. It is like this: one who has incurred a defeat that is not shared with nuns, and who then surrenders the training and becomes a layman, and in that state undergoes a change of sex and is reborn as a man, and then goes forth and receives full ordination in this well-taught Dharma and Vinaya and wishes to be established as a monk, and monks confer full ordination upon that person — this is called a full ordination."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One declared that a nun who has once fallen back must not be given the going-forth or full ordination. If full ordination is nonetheless conferred — is this called a full ordination or not?" It is not called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed.

"Venerable one, if a person who has previously caused a schism receives full ordination — is this called a full ordination or is it not?" In some cases it is called a full ordination, and in some cases it is not. One who knowingly ordains a person who has not yet reached twenty years of age and who accepted such a candidate on the claim that they fulfill this Dharma and Vinaya — if monks confer full ordination on such a person, this is called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination does not thereby transgress.

"Venerable one, if one who has drawn near, surrendered the training, become a layman, and then receives full ordination in this well-taught Dharma and Vinaya — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is not called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed."

"Venerable one, one who was given the training, then surrendered the training and became a layman — if such a person again goes forth and receives full ordination in this well-taught Dharma and Vinaya, wishing to be established as a monk, and monks confer full ordination upon them — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed."

"Venerable one, if a debtor receives full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed."

"Venerable one, if a sick person receives full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed."

"Venerable one, if full ordination is conferred without an abbot being present — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination."
the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed.

"Venerable one, if a full ordination is conferred while dismissing the abbot — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "In some cases it is called a full ordination, and in some cases it is not called a full ordination. If someone abuses and dismisses the abbot, saying of the candidate himself, 'He is unworthy, he is shameless, he is without restraint' — that is not called a full ordination. But if someone abuses the abbot, saying 'He is unworthy, he is shameless,' and dismisses as abbot one who is not himself a monastic — that is called a full ordination."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a person who disrupts the assembly should not be given going forth or full ordination. If that person is given full ordination, is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "There are four kinds of assembly-disrupters. Apart from the first kind, those who have caused disturbance in the past, the rest are called fully ordained, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed."

"Venerable one, is it permitted for the officiating monk to be on one side and for four persons in four locations to be given full ordination?" It is permitted. And this is how it is done: the officiating monk, standing at the boundary of all four locations — whether leaning against a post, a pillar, or a door-frame — confers full ordination on them one by one, two by two, or three by three, so long as the full four are not incomplete.

"Venerable one, is it permitted for a single act of karma to give full ordination to two or three persons?" Upāli replied: "It is permitted."

"Venerable one, if the officiating monk is on one side, and four persons are given full ordination by a single motion and a single act of karma — is the karma valid, and will those monks not have transgressed?" Upāli replied: "There is such a case. This is how it is done: the officiating monk, standing at the boundary, whether lying, standing, or sitting at the boundary — places two within the boundary and two outside the boundary and performs the act."

"Venerable one, if a person from the western land of the Cow-Conduct, or from the eastern continent of Superior Body, is given full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed."

"Venerable one, if a person from the northern land of Unpleasant Sound is given full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is not called a full ordination, and the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed."

"Venerable one, is it permitted for those who are present on enclosed ground to count numbers and confer full ordination on those who are in open sky?" Upāli replied: "It is not permitted."

"Venerable one, is it permitted for those who are present in open sky to count numbers and confer full ordination on those who are on enclosed ground?" Upāli replied: "It is not permitted."

"Venerable one, is it permitted for one performing the act on enclosed ground to perform the act for those in open sky?" Upāli replied: "It is not permitted."

"Venerable one, is it permitted for one performing the act in open sky to perform the act for those on enclosed ground?" Upāli replied: "It is not permitted."

Likewise, those sitting inside the boundary and those sitting outside the boundary — the same four cases apply.

The Noble Vinaya, the sixteenth fascicle.

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that in border regions, full ordination may be conferred by five monks including one who holds the Vinaya. If ten are present but full ordination is conferred by four including a Vinaya-holder — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that in central regions, full ordination may be conferred by ten or more monks including one who holds the Vinaya. If twenty or more are present, but full ordination is conferred by fewer than twenty — is this called a full ordination or not a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that full ordination is recognized in five ways: from the naming of the candidate who seeks full ordination up to the point at which the act is performed without flaw. If, when performing full ordination, the name of the one seeking full ordination is not stated, but the name of the preceptor is stated, the name of the Saṅgha is stated, the formal request is made, and the act is performed without flaw — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"If the name of the one seeking full ordination is stated, the name of the Saṅgha is stated, but the name of the preceptor is not stated, the formal request is made, and the act is performed without flaw — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"If the name of the one seeking full ordination is stated, the name of the preceptor is stated, but the name of the Saṅgha is not stated, the formal request is made, and the act is performed without flaw — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"If the name of the one seeking full ordination is stated, the name of the preceptor is stated, the name of the Saṅgha is also stated, but the formal request is not made, and the act is performed without flaw — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"If the name of the one seeking full ordination is stated, the name of the preceptor is stated, the name of the Saṅgha is stated, the formal request is made, but the act is flawed — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"Venerable one, if a male novice is fully ordained by the act of a community of fully ordained nuns — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"Venerable one, if a female probationer is fully ordained by the act of a community of fully ordained monks — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"Venerable one, if, while the act of conferring full ordination is being performed, the time lapses — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "If in that case the act has been performed in its greater part, it is called a full ordination."

"Venerable one, if during full ordination the ceremony is interrupted and one speaks back, saying, 'Do not confer full ordination upon me' — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli replied: "It is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed."

"Venerable one, if during full ordination one declares a wish to be a layman — is this called a full ordination or not a full ordination?" It is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all transgressed.

"Venerable one, if full ordination is conferred upon a border-region person in the noble language, and that border-region person does not understand the noble language — is this called a full ordination?" If that person possesses and fully commands this scriptural tradition and has the intention to accept it, it is called a full ordination.

Those who confer full ordination upon such a person have engaged in what ought not to be done and incur a transgression by conferring that full ordination.

In brief:

One who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one who is mute, one who is dull, one who is asleep,
one who stammers, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, and one in the act of departing — these are the marks.

"Venerable one, if full ordination is conferred upon a madman — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, if that person has the perception of full ordination and accepts it with body or speech through an intentional act, it is called a full ordination. Just as in the case of the madman, the same should be stated in full for one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull, and one who is mute or deaf.

"Venerable one, if full ordination is conferred upon one who is asleep — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, if that person's body and speech are present and directed toward the request, and the rite is being performed while the person has fallen asleep, it is nonetheless called a full ordination. Just as in the case of one who is asleep, the same should likewise be stated for one who stammers and one in meditative absorption.

"Venerable one, if full ordination is conferred upon one who is in the act of departing to another place — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have incurred a transgression.

"Venerable one, if the ordination name is changed in the very midst of the full ordination ceremony — is this called a full ordination?" It is called a full ordination. Count it among those of nuns.

In brief:

One who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one who is ill, one who is deaf, one who is dull, and laymen and the like — give the training and note these as the marks.

"Venerable one, if a madman who is capable of performing acts confers full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, if the monk performing the act possesses the perception of Saṅgha, has made the request, and the rite has not broken down, it is called a full ordination, though those who have conferred the full ordination have all incurred a transgression. The same is to be stated in full for one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is mute, one who is deaf, and likewise for one who stammers.

"Venerable one, if a layman who is performing the act confers full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all incurred a transgression. Likewise, a paṇḍaka, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed a father or mother or an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who resides in a stolen place, one who does not reside permanently, one who dwells in a separate abode, one in whom a prior offense has arisen, or one who performs the act on the basis of a prior dispute — is this called a full ordination? Upāli, it is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all incurred a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a person who is acting as celebrant while under vows of the laity confers full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have all incurred a transgression.

"Venerable one, if those acting as celebrant who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, who have aligned themselves with a schismatic faction, or who have given the training, confer full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have incurred a transgression.

"Venerable one, if the celebrant is one who has gone to dwell in another realm and confers full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is not called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have incurred a transgression.

"Venerable one, if during the performance of the rite the ordination name of the celebrant is changed — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have incurred a transgression.

In brief:

One who is mad or mentally disturbed, one who is mute, foolish, or asleep, one who is intoxicated, one who is in meditative absorption, one who is a being of ill omen, laypeople, and the like — giving precepts to these is the lowest of transgressions.

"Venerable one, if a celebrant who is mad confers full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have incurred a transgression. Likewise, from a celebrant who is mentally disturbed, through one who is ill, down to one who is in meditative absorption — all the same applies.

"Venerable one, if a celebrant who has gone to dwell in another realm confers full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have incurred a transgression.

"Venerable one, if, while a novice is being given full ordination, the ordination name of the celebrant is changed — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have incurred a transgression.

"Venerable one, if a layman acts as celebrant and confers full ordination — is this called a full ordination?" Upāli, it is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have incurred a transgression. Likewise, from a celebrant who is a woman, through a hermaphrodite, down to one who gives the extended training — if any of these confer full ordination, is this called a full ordination? Upāli, it is called a full ordination, and those who confer full ordination have incurred a transgression.

Here ends the section on the essentials of full ordination from the noble Vinaya.

In brief:

Half, three, encirclement,
the fourth, the boundary, and the night mark,
the broken, the prior boundary, and the tree, exclusion, the ineligible, the layman, and finally exclusion was declared.

The venerable Upāli then put a question to the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has taught that a great boundary should be established — venerable one, what is the measure of a great boundary?" Upāli, it is three and a half leagues. Anything less than that is a small one, namely a maṇḍala that can contain a circle of forty assembled monks. "Venerable one, if a boundary is established that exceeds three and a half leagues — is that called a boundary?" Upāli, it is not. Three and a half leagues is the boundary; beyond that it is not a boundary. If such a boundary has been established, it is still to be called not established, and the monks too have incurred a transgression. Likewise, all should be understood in the same way.

"Venerable one, what constitutes the lower boundary?" Upāli, it extends as far as there is water.

"Venerable one, if there is water at a distance exceeding three and a half leagues, is that called a boundary?" Upāli, it is not. Three and a half leagues is the boundary; below that it is not a boundary.

"Venerable one, what constitutes the boundary of the upper sky?" Upāli, it extends as far as there is a rooftop or a treetop.

"Venerable one, if there is a rooftop or treetop at a distance exceeding three and a half leagues, is that called a boundary?" Upāli, it is not. Three and a half leagues is called the boundary; beyond that it is not a boundary.

"Venerable one, what constitutes the boundary of a mountain peak?" Upāli, it extends as far as there is a spring.

"Venerable one, if there is a spring at a distance exceeding three and a half leagues, is that called a boundary?" Upāli, it is not. Three and a half leagues is the boundary; beyond that it is not a boundary.

"Venerable one, is it permitted for a boundary to be encircled by another boundary?" Upāli, it is not permitted — except for a boundary of earshot, a boundary of a wall, or a maṇḍala encircled by water.

"Venerable one, if a noble one performing a rite has pronounced the establishing of a boundary in the noble language — — but those monks have not mastered the noble language, is that called nullifying the boundary?" Upāli, it is called cutting the boundary; the act, however, is accomplished and has passed.

"Venerable one, if a noble one has established a boundary using the language of the borderlands, and those monks have not mastered the language of the borderlands, is that called nullifying the boundary?" Upāli, it is called cutting it; the act, however, is accomplished and has passed.

"Venerable one, if a person of the borderlands has established a boundary using the language of the borderlands, and those monks have not mastered the language of the borderlands, is that called nullifying the boundary?" Upāli, it is called cutting the boundary; the act, however, is accomplished and has passed.

"Venerable one, if a person of the borderlands has established a boundary using the noble language, and those monks have not mastered the noble language, is that called nullifying the boundary?" Upāli, it is called cutting the boundary; the act, however, is accomplished and has passed.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to establish a boundary in the open sky above?" Upāli, it is not permissible. And why is that, Upāli? Because a boundary cannot be indicated there.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to establish a boundary using the sun, the moon, or the stars?" Upāli, it is not permissible. And why is that, Upāli? Because the sun, the moon, and the stars are unstable and in motion.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to establish a boundary using waves, a succession of waves, or a riverbank?" Upāli, it is not permissible. And why is that, Upāli? Because waves, a succession of waves, and a riverbank are shifting and unstable.

"Venerable one, if a riverbank were to become stable, would it then be permissible to establish a boundary there?" Upāli, it is not permissible.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to establish a boundary by means of supernormal powers or illusion?" Upāli, it is not permissible. And why is that, Upāli? Because supernormal powers and illusions cannot serve as conventional designations.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to fix a boundary from a river or a dry watercourse?" Upāli, it is not permissible, for such a river or dry watercourse does not flow without ceasing.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to fix a boundary from water that flows constantly and runs deep?" Upāli, it is permissible — provided that such a river or dry watercourse has been covered over with planks of wood, a wall, or boards.

"Venerable one, if wood or boards come to be subject to decay, is that called destruction?" If the intention to repair them has been abandoned, it is called destruction. But if the intention to cover them again has not been abandoned, it is not called destruction.

"Venerable one, if night falls while a monastic act for cutting a boundary is being performed, is that called cutting the boundary?" Upāli, it is called cutting the boundary.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to release a boundary by means of a boundary?" Upāli, it is permissible only for a boundary of earshot and a boundary of a wall; for all others it is not permissible.

"Venerable one, in how many ways is a boundary destroyed?" Upāli, in five: by there being no boundary marker, by there being no monk, by there being no expectation, by a motion, and by a formal act — five in all.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to establish another boundary without first dissolving the previous one?" Upāli, it is not permissible, except for a boundary of earshot, a boundary of a wall, and a maṇḍala boundary.

And why is that, Upāli? A boundary is cut by a motion and a formal act; and it is released by a motion and a formal act.

"Venerable one, can it happen that establishing a boundary dissolves another, or that dissolving a boundary establishes another?" Upāli, it can. If a boundary is cut by a formal act, a boundary of earshot and a boundary of a wall are released. And if a boundary is released by a formal act, a boundary of earshot and a boundary of a wall are cut.

"Venerable one, what follows upon going?" Upāli, a boundary. "Venerable one, what follows upon having gone?" Upāli, a boundary.

"Venerable one, is it permissible for a single person to establish a boundary where there are four, five, or even more residences?" Upāli, it is permissible.

"As long as it can be proclaimed and established, that is the extent of a boundary.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to move a boundary from one place to another?" Upāli, it is not permissible — except for a boundary of earshot and a boundary of a wall.

"Venerable one, how many kinds of boundaries that cannot be moved are there?" Upāli, there is one: a boundary of a formal act, a spring, or a well.

"Venerable one, what is meant by a suitable place and an unsuitable place?"

"Venerable one, what is a suitable place?" Upāli, whatever residence within a boundary has been consecrated as a suitable residence — that is called a suitable place. "Venerable one, what is an unsuitable place?" Upāli, whatever residence within a boundary has not been consecrated as a suitable residence — that is called an unsuitable place. Upāli, as long as the holy Dharma exists, an unsuitable place may also exist. Upāli, if the holy Dharma were to disappear, all would become suitable places.

"Venerable one, by what measure does the holy Dharma exist?" Upāli, so long as those who undertake training do undertake training and also perform formal acts — that is, so long as they undertake training by means of what is to be undertaken through training, and also perform formal acts — for that long the holy Dharma is said to exist.

"Venerable one, by what measure has the holy Dharma ceased to exist?" Upāli, when those who undertake training do not undertake training and do not perform formal acts — that is, when through what should be undertaken as training they do not undertake training, and do not perform formal acts — at that time, the holy Dharma is said to have ceased to exist.

"Venerable one, if a layman who is performing a formal act collapses a boundary, is it called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, it is not. Likewise, if one who is performing a formal act is a paṇḍaka, or a hermaphrodite, or one who has expelled a nun, or a patricide, or a matricide, or one who has killed an arhat, or one who with malicious intent has shed the blood of a Tathāgata, or a tīrthika, or one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, or a thief, or one who has no [legitimate] residence, or one who resides separately, or one who previously caused a schism — if such a person collapses a boundary, is it called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, it is not.

"Venerable one, if one who is performing a formal act has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or has sided with the schism, or has been given a probationary penalty — if such a person collapses a boundary, is it called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, it is called cutting a boundary, and the Saṅgha is bound up with transgression.

"Venerable one, if a madman who is performing a formal act collapses a boundary, is it called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, if he has the perception of a monk, is able to state the marks, and has made a formal request, and the formal act has not been impaired, then it is called cutting a boundary. Likewise, one who is performing a formal act and is mentally disturbed, tormented by illness, deranged, or mute — all of these should be stated in the same manner.

"Venerable one, if one who is performing a formal act collapses a boundary while residing elsewhere, in another place, is it called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, it is not.

"Venerable one, when a boundary is collapsing, if the monk performing the formal act is late — is that called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, if he understands that the boundary has been proclaimed, and the formal act has been performed many times, then it is called cutting a boundary. Upāli, if he neither understands that the boundary has been proclaimed, nor has the formal act been performed many times, then it is called not cutting a boundary.

Likewise, knowing that one is a layman, knowing that one is a paṇḍaka, knowing that one has expelled a nun, knowing that one has killed one's father or mother, knowing that one has killed an arhat, knowing that one has with malicious intent shed the blood of a Tathāgata, knowing that one is a tīrthika, knowing that one has gone over to the tīrthikas, knowing that one is a thief, knowing that one has no legitimate residence, knowing that one resides separately, knowing that one has previously committed an offence, knowing that one was previously a schismatic — and in the same way, knowing that one is oneself residing elsewhere in another place — all of these should be stated in full.

"Venerable one, when a boundary is about to collapse, if one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or sided with the schism, or been given a probationary penalty, wishes to do so — is that called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, it is called cutting a boundary, and the Saṅgha is bound up with transgression.

"Venerable one, if a boundary is collapsed by a layperson making up the number, is that called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, it is not. And in the same way, from the hermaphrodites through to those who previously caused a schism — if those persons make up the number and a boundary is collapsed, is that called collapsing a boundary? Upāli, it is not.

"Venerable one, if a boundary is collapsed by a monk who is a glutton making up the number, is that called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, one should not say

'cut'; yet the Saṅgha is bound up with transgression. "If those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, sided with the schism, or been given a probationary penalty make up the number and collapse a boundary, is that called collapsing a boundary?" Upāli, it is called cutting a boundary, and the Saṅgha is bound up with transgression.

In brief:

Boundaries and suitable dwellings, and likewise the single-act recitation zone;
collapse and the three islands, and the village — the third is likewise so.

"Venerable one, if the marker of a boundary has ceased to exist, is that called a boundary having collapsed?" Upāli, it is called having collapsed. "Venerable one, if a boundary has collapsed, is the suitable dwelling also called collapsed?" Upāli, it is called collapsed.

"Venerable one, is it permissible to collapse boundaries for a place with four residences, when the formal act is done with a single motion and a single recitation, in a single area?" Upāli, it is permissible; and in whichever way the monk performing the act cuts the boundary of the four residences, he presses upon a piece of wood, a stick, or a key.

"Venerable one, if a river or water from a stream floods and submerges the marker of a boundary that was being collapsed, is that called a boundary having collapsed?" Upāli, if the marker of the boundary is firm and stable, it is not called collapsed. If the marker of the boundary has ceased to exist, it is called collapsed.

"Venerable one, if a boundary has collapsed, is the vow of not parting from one's robes also absent?" Or is it present? Upāli, it is said to be present.

"If the venerable one has said that a vow of not parting from one's robes should be established for a boundary intended for formal acts — should a vow of not parting from one's robes also be established for a call-distance boundary and for a wall boundary?" If the need arises, establish it.

"Venerable one, if a village and a monastery are adjacent and the boundaries are connected, how far should the vow of not parting from one's robes be established for that?" Up to the village's immediate surroundings, but not including them.

"Venerable one, if the Blessed One has taught the vow of not parting from one's robes as not extending to the village or its immediate surroundings — if a village is established within a place for which a vow of not parting from one's robes has been set, does the vow of not parting from one's robes collapse in that direction?" Upāli, it is called collapsed.

"Venerable one, if the village moves away from a place for which a vow of not parting from one's robes has been established, why should a vow of not parting from one's robes be established again in that direction?" Upāli, there is no need; restoring the previous vow is sufficient.

In brief:

The fourth mindfulness, the third,
the fifth, and the two characteristics;
two offences and the division of occasions;
intention, sitting, arising;
laypeople and so forth,
the insane, the explanation, and the many.

"Venerable one, if the Saṅgha has mentally noted 'today is our restoration ceremony' at the time of dawn breaking — how should those monks perform the restoration ceremony? They should express from the mind in words 'today is our restoration ceremony,' and then if the Prātimokṣa is recited there, it is called having been recited. Those monks will indeed have performed the restoration ceremony, but it will be bound up with transgression."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has taught that the formal act of the restoration ceremony has four aspects: performing it improperly and without assembly; assembling but doing so improperly; assembled properly but without the proper procedure; and assembled properly with the proper procedure." —

What is meant by performing it improperly and without assembly? It is when, at the time the Prātimokṣa should be recited, it is not recited at that time; it is not recited by the one who should recite it; it is not recited in the manner in which it should be recited; it is not recited for as long as it should be recited; and the assembly has not gathered.

What is meant by assembling but doing so improperly? It is when, at the time the Prātimokṣa should be recited, it is not recited at that time — and so on in full through: it is not recited for as long as it should be recited — yet the assembly has gathered.

What is meant by assembled properly but without the proper procedure? It is when, at the time the Prātimokṣa should be recited, it is recited at that time; it is recited by the one who should recite it; it is recited in the manner in which it should be recited; it is recited for as long as it should be recited — yet the assembly has not gathered.

What is meant by assembled properly with the proper procedure? It is from the time the Prātimokṣa is recited at the proper time, recited through to completion for as long as it should be recited, all the way until the assembly has gathered.

"Venerable one, if a noble one recites the Prātimokṣa in the noble language, and those monks do not understand the noble language, may it be said that they have performed the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, it may not. The recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra, too, will be bound up with transgression."

"If a borderlander recites the Prātimokṣa in the border language, and those monks do not understand the border language, may it be said that they have performed the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, it may not. The recitation of the Prātimokṣa, too, will be bound up with transgression."

"If a noble one recites the Prātimokṣa in the border language, and those monks do not understand the border language, may it be said that they have performed the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, it may be said that they have. The recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra, too, will be bound up with transgression."

"If a borderlander recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra in the border language, and those monks do not understand the border language, may it be said that they have performed the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, it may not be said that they have. The recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra, too, will be bound up with transgression."

"Venerable one, if the number of those dwelling on the ground is made up by those dwelling in the sky, and they recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra, may it be said that they have performed the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, it may not. Those monks, too, will be bound up with transgression."

"Venerable one, if the number of those dwelling in the sky is made up by those dwelling on the ground, and they recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra, may it be said that they have performed the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, it may not. Those monks, too, will be bound up with transgression."

"Venerable one, if one dwelling in the sky recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra and performs the restoration ceremony for those dwelling on the ground, may it be said that they have performed the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, it may not. Those members of the Saṅgha, too, will be bound up with transgression."

"Venerable one, if one dwelling on the ground recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra and performs the restoration ceremony for those dwelling in the sky, may it be said that they have performed the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, it may not. Those monks, too, will be bound up with transgression."

In the same way, the four cases of those who sit inside the boundary and those who sit outside the boundary should be elaborated in full.

"Venerable one, in how many ways may the Prātimokṣa be recited?" "Upāli, in five ways. The first way of reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra is this: a request is made, the occasion is recited, and then it is announced that the remainder has been heard. The second way of reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra is this: a request is made, the occasion is recited, the four defeats are recited, and then it is announced that the remainder has been heard. The third way of reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra is this: a request is made, the occasion is recited, the four defeats are recited, the thirteen remainders of the Saṅgha are recited, and then it is announced that the remainder has been heard. The fourth way of reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra is this: a request is made, the occasion is recited, the four defeats, the thirteen remainders of the Saṅgha, and — the two indeterminate offenses are recited, and then it is announced that the remainder has been heard. This is the fourth way of reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra. Together with the full recitation, these make five.

Venerable one, in how many ways is the act of the restoration ceremony performed? Upāli, there are five: by recitation, by mental resolve without recitation, by consecration, by complete purity, and by the opening of a boundary. These are the five ways.

Venerable one, if, while a monk is reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra, night should fall during the recitation, may one say that the restoration ceremony has been performed? Upāli, one should say it has been performed.

Venerable one, if monks who are assembled in one direction recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra in four separate groups and also perform the restoration ceremony, may those monks be said to have performed it without transgression? Upāli, yes. In such a case, the monk who is reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra presses down a stick, a piece of cane, or a key at the boundary at which he stands, and thus recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra.

Venerable one, if monks who share a single boundary perform the restoration ceremony separately in four directions within that single boundary, may the ceremony be said to have been performed and may those monks be said to have done so without transgression? Upāli, yes. They have granted consent to one another.

Venerable one, if a monk who is reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra is present on one side, and some monks are residing within the boundary while others are residing beyond the boundary, and the Prātimokṣa is recited for them, may the ceremony be said to have been performed and may those monks be said to have done so without transgression? Upāli, yes. In such a case, the monk reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra presses down and marks the boundary, and while standing or sitting at the boundary line, he recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra for those who are both within and outside the boundary.

Venerable one, among the five ways of reciting the Prātimokṣa sūtra, may the restoration ceremony be considered performed even without any one of the five methods of recitation being recited? Upāli, yes. When the boundary is opened, it is opened by the opening of the boundary.

Venerable one, may the restoration ceremony be considered performed even without a word being spoken? Upāli, yes. By mental resolve alone.

Venerable one, if you were to say that the assembly has not risen and that the monks have not departed, what is the measure by which one would say the assembly has not risen? Upāli, wherever four or more monks are seated, that is called not having risen. If fewer than four are present, it is called having risen.

Venerable one, if a monk, having recited the Prātimokṣa sūtra, rises from his seat and departs, and even though monks are still present does not take leave of them, will he necessarily have committed a general transgression? Upāli, not necessarily. If he has gone to a place for the purpose of relieving himself, and has not gone beyond the range of hearing from that place, he has not transgressed.

If a layman recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra and the restoration ceremony is performed, may it be said that the restoration ceremony has been duly performed? Upāli, it should be said that the restoration ceremony has not been performed, and the Saṅgha has transgressed along with it.

Likewise, if a eunuch performs it, or a paṇḍaka, or one who has been expelled from the order of nuns, or one who is not abiding in it, or one who is residing separately, or one who has gone to dwell elsewhere — up to and including one who previously was in conflict — in all such cases, Upāli, it should be said that the restoration ceremony has not been performed, and the Saṅgha has transgressed along with it.

Venerable one, if those who have created a schism in the Saṅgha, those who have taken one side, or those who have been given a disciplinary training measure, recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra and perform the restoration ceremony, may it be said that it has been performed? Upāli, it should be said that it has been performed, and the Saṅgha has not transgressed.

Venerable one, if a mad person recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra and the restoration ceremony is performed, may it be said that the restoration ceremony has been performed? Upāli, it should be said that it has been performed, and the Saṅgha has not transgressed.

Venerable one, similarly, if one whose mind is disturbed, or one tormented by illness —

If a person with paralysis recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra and the restoration ceremony is performed, may it be said that the restoration ceremony has been performed? It should be said that it has been performed, and the Saṅgha has not transgressed. Just as it is with the recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra, so too the extensive forms of restoration are to be applied in the same way.

In brief:

What has not been offered, the Saṅgha,
The fourth and the second designated,
Transmitted from one to another,
Given, the path, and likewise the many.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, if a monk, having taken up faith and complete purity, travels beyond reach of the sky above and arrives on the other side of a boundary, may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have not been offered.

Venerable one, but if one travels there with hope, may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, no, it may not be so said.

Venerable one, is it permissible for one standing on the ground to give faith and complete purity to those who are stationed in the sky? Upāli, it is not permissible. Is it permissible to receive it? Upāli, it is not permissible.

Venerable one, is it permissible for one stationed in the sky to give faith and complete purity to those standing on the ground? Upāli, it is not permissible. Is it permissible to receive it? Upāli, it is not permissible.

Similarly, regarding one who is inside a boundary and one who is outside a boundary, these four cases apply in the same way.

Venerable one, if a monk offers faith and complete purity to the entire Saṅgha assembled and gathered together, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have been offered. Who might be harmed by this? No one at all.

Venerable one, if a noble monk offers faith and complete purity in the noble language, and the receiving monk does not understand the noble language, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, no. If a noble monk offers faith and complete purity in a border language, and the receiving monk does not understand the border language, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, no. If a border person offers faith and complete purity in a border language, and the receiving monk does not understand the border language, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, no. If a border person offers faith and complete purity in the noble language, and the receiving monk does not understand the noble language, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, no.

Venerable one, if a monk indicates it through a physical gesture without uttering a word, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have been offered. If it is expressed verbally without any physical gesture, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have been offered. If it is expressed by both body and speech, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have been offered. If it is expressed by neither body nor speech, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, no.

Venerable one, if the monk who is to receive faith and complete purity from the one giving them changes his name in the interval, may it be said that it has not been offered? Upāli, no.

Venerable one, if faith and complete purity are offered by transmission from one to another, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have been offered, and those monks have not transgressed.

Venerable one, if faith and complete purity are offered by one who is under a suspension that has lapsed, may it be said that faith and complete purity have been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have been offered, and those monks have not transgressed.

Venerable one, if a monk, having offered faith and complete purity, then declares himself a layman, may it be said that the offering has been made?

Upāli, it should be said that they have not been offered. Likewise, in full detail, from declaring oneself a pandaka up through declaring oneself previously in a state of conflict — in all those cases, may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have not been offered.

Venerable one, if a monk, having offered faith and complete purity, then declares himself a eunuch, may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have not been offered.

If those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, who have taken sides, or who have relinquished the training declare this, may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should not be said so.

Venerable one, if a monk, having received faith and complete purity, then declares himself a layman, may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have not been offered. Likewise, in full detail, from declaring oneself a pandaka up through declaring oneself previously in a state of conflict — in all those cases, may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have not been offered.

Venerable one, if a monk, having received faith and complete purity, declares himself a eunuch, a layman, one who has departed, or one who dwells apart — may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have not been offered.

Venerable one, if a monk, having received faith and complete purity, declares himself one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides, or one who has relinquished the training — may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should not be said so.

Venerable one, if a monk, having received faith and complete purity, enters the midst of the Saṅgha and then declares himself a layman — may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have been offered. Likewise, from a pandaka up through declaring oneself previously in a state of conflict — in all those cases, may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should be said that they have been offered.

Venerable one, if a monk, having received faith and complete purity and entered into the midst of the Saṅgha, then declares himself a eunuch — may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should not be said so. Likewise, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has departed, one who dwells apart, one who has taken sides, and one who has relinquished the training — if any of these declares this, venerable one, may it be said that faith and complete purity have not been offered? Upāli, it should not be said so.

This completes the substance of the restoration ceremony.

The Noble Vinaya. The seventeenth fascicle.

In brief: the fourth type with its four aspects, and the two kinds of substance, likewise; mindfulness, walking and refraining, sitting and standing as marks; laymen and the like; the mad, and the enumeration of the suspended.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, the act of opening an opportunity has many aspects. How many, Upāli? Four: opening an opportunity in a non-Dharmic way without a quorum; assembling in a non-Dharmic way; not assembling in a Dharmic way; and assembling in a Dharmic way.

What is opening an opportunity in a non-Dharmic way? It is when one does not open the opportunity at the time it should be opened; does not open it in the manner in which it should be opened; does not open it to the extent to which it should be opened; and is not opened by the one by whom it should be opened — and a quorum has not been formed.

What is assembling in a non-Dharmic way? In full detail, from not opening it at the time it should be opened up through not being opened by the one by whom it should be opened — stated in full — and a quorum has been formed.

What is not assembling in a Dharmic way? It is when one does open the opportunity at the time it should be opened, and opens it in the manner in which it should be opened; opens it to the extent to which it should be opened; and is opened by the one by whom it should be opened — and a quorum has been formed.

What is assembling in a Dharmic way? It is when one opens the opportunity at the time it should be opened, from that point all the way through to being opened by the one by whom it should be opened — stated in full — and a quorum has also been formed.

Venerable one, if a noble one (ārya) opens the opportunity in the noble language, and those monks do not understand the noble language, should we say that the opportunity has been opened? Upāli, it is said that the opportunity has not been opened, and those monks too have committed a transgression.

If a noble one opens the opportunity in a border dialect, and those monks do not understand the border dialect, should we say that the opportunity has been opened? Upāli, it is said that the opportunity has not been opened, and those monks too have committed a transgression.

If a border person opens the opportunity in a border dialect, and those monks do not understand the border dialect, should we say that the opportunity has been opened? Upāli, it is said that the opportunity has not been opened, and those monks too have committed a transgression.

If a border person opens the opportunity in the noble language, and those monks do not understand the noble language, should we say that the opportunity has been opened? Upāli, it is said that the opportunity has not been opened, and those monks too have committed a transgression.

Venerable one, if the number of those present on the ground is completed by those dwelling in the sky, and the opportunity is opened, should we say that the opportunity has been opened? Upāli, it is said that the opportunity has not been opened, and those monks too have committed a transgression.

Venerable one, if the number of those present in the sky is completed by those dwelling on the ground, and the opportunity is opened, should we say that the opportunity has been opened? Upāli, it is said that the opportunity has not been opened, and those monks too have committed a transgression.

Venerable one, if those dwelling on the ground open the opportunity to those dwelling in the sky, should we say that the opportunity has been opened? Upāli, it is said that the opportunity has not been opened, and those monks too have committed a transgression.

Venerable one, if those dwelling in the sky open the opportunity to those dwelling on the ground, should we say that the opportunity has been opened? Upāli, it is said that the opportunity has not been opened, and those monks too have committed a transgression.

In the same way, those situated within the boundary and those situated outside the boundary together make four cases to be treated accordingly.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that at the time one opens the opportunity, the act itself exists, but the person does not. Venerable one, what then is the act, and what is the person? The transgression is the act. The one who commits the transgression is called the person.

Venerable one, can the opportunity be opened without any words being spoken? Upāli, yes it can. In such a case, the monk opens the opportunity by means of a letter or a hand signal.

Venerable one, if a monk stands off to one side and opens the opportunity to those in the four directions, does the opportunity thereby become opened? Upāli, yes. In such a case, that monk who opens the opportunity presses a stick or a key at the boundary-point of the four directions and thereby opens the opportunity.

Venerable one, if monks who share a single dwelling and a single boundary open the opportunity in the four directions, can it come about that the opportunity is opened and yet those communities have not assembled? Upāli, yes — when each has granted consent to the other.

Venerable one, if the entire Saṅgha recalls at dawn having already opened the opportunity, how should the monks proceed with the opening? They should say the words: "We are now opening the opportunity." Alternatively, if the opportunity is opened with the third utterance, it is said to be opened, and those monks have committed a transgression.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One declared, "Open the opportunity during the rains retreat for the sake of relatives," Venerable one, by what means should it be granted? Upāli: to one who dwells at a distance and cannot come at the time of opening the opportunity.

Venerable one, if a monk, having opened the opportunity during the rains retreat for the sake of relatives and having gone with the blessing for seven days or forty days, returns at the very moment of the fifteenth-day opening of the opportunity — should he also open the opportunity then? Upāli: No. The opening that was already performed is sufficient for him.

Venerable one, if a monk who is to open the opportunity has abandoned his vows on the very day of the fifteenth, should the opportunity be opened together with him? Upāli: No.

Venerable one, the Blessed One declared, "The retinue of monks has not risen, has not departed." Venerable one, how many does it take for the retinue to be considered as not having risen? Upāli: wherever four monks, or five, or more than that are seated, it is called "not having risen." If fewer than four, it is called "having risen."

Venerable one, if on that very fifteenth day one rises from one's seat and departs without seeking out the monks who are present — is there no transgression in that? Upāli: There is none, provided one has gone to relieve oneself and has not gone beyond earshot of those who have heard.

Venerable one, if someone is in the process of opening the opportunity and during the opening of the opportunity the night passes and he has become a nun and then opens the opportunity — is it considered opened? Upāli: It is considered opened.

Venerable one, if a layperson opens the opportunity, is it considered opened? Upāli: It is not considered opened, and the Saṅgha too has incurred a transgression.

Likewise, if it is opened by a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, an unsettled person, or one who has gone to dwell elsewhere — all the way through, in detail, to those who were previously in dispute — it is not considered opened, and those Saṅghas too have incurred a transgression.

Venerable one, if the opportunity is opened by one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or who has taken sides in a schism, or who has been given a training — is it considered opened? Upāli: It is considered opened, but the Saṅgha has incurred a transgression.

Venerable one, if a madman opens the opportunity, is it considered opened? Upāli: It is considered opened, and the Saṅgha has incurred a transgression. Likewise, if the opportunity is opened by one who is mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, an imbecile, a mute, or one who is deaf — is it considered opened? Upāli: It is considered opened, and the Saṅgha has incurred a transgression.

Venerable one, if the opportunity is opened by messenger, is it considered opened? Upāli: It is considered opened, and the Saṅgha has incurred a transgression. Likewise, if opened by written message, by hand signal, or by transmission from one person to another — is it considered opened? Upāli: It is considered opened, and the Saṅgha has incurred a transgression.

Venerable one, if it is opened with the words "Another says so" — is it considered opened? Upāli: No.

Venerable one, if a layperson completes the number and opens the opportunity — is it considered opened? Upāli: It is not considered opened, and the Saṅgha has incurred a transgression. Likewise, the same should be applied to a eunuch, a hermaphrodite, an unsettled person, one dwelling separately, and one who has gone to dwell elsewhere, all the way through to those who were previously in dispute.

Venerable one, if those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or who have taken sides, or who have been given a training, complete the number and open the opportunity — is it considered opened? Upāli: It is considered opened, and the Saṅgha has incurred a transgression.

Venerable one, likewise if those who are mentally disturbed, afflicted by illness, an imbecile, a mute, a deaf person, one who is asleep, one who is intoxicated, one who is rambling in speech, one who has entered meditative absorption, or one who has gone to dwell elsewhere, complete the number and open the opportunity — is it considered opened? Upāli: It is not considered opened — — and the Saṅgha has incurred a transgression.

In brief:

The offering and the acceptance, the Saṅgha,
The fourth and the second, the boundary sign,
Penalty and expulsion, one to another,
The path and the many — likewise so.

Venerable one, if a monk takes the consent and the opening of the opportunity and, going to the sky above, arrives beyond the boundary without there being any expectation — is it said that the consent and the opening of the opportunity have not been offered? Upāli: It is said they have not been offered.

Venerable one, but if one arrives with expectation — is it said they have not been offered? Upāli: Not so; it will count as having transgressed.

Venerable one, is it permissible for those dwelling on the ground to offer consent and the opening of the opportunity to those dwelling in the sky? Upāli: It is not. Venerable one, is it permissible to accept it? Upāli: It is not.

Venerable one, is it permissible for those dwelling in the sky to offer consent and the opening of the opportunity to those dwelling on the ground? Upāli: It is not.

Likewise, those assembled within the boundary and those assembled outside the boundary are also to be stated in four ways.

Venerable one, if a monk, when the entire Saṅgha has assembled and gathered, offers consent and the opening of the opportunity — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have been offered? Upāli: It is said they have been offered. By whom should it be proclaimed? By no one in particular.

Venerable one, if a noble monk offers consent and the opening of the opportunity in the noble language, but those monks have not sought it in the noble language — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have been offered? Upāli: It is not.

If a noble monk offers consent and the opening of the opportunity in a border language, but those monks have not sought it in a border language — is it said they have been offered? Upāli: It is not.

Venerable one, if a border monk offers consent and the opening of the opportunity in a border language, but those monks have not sought it in a border language — is it said they have been offered? Upāli: It is not.

Venerable one, if a border monk offers consent and the opening of the opportunity in the noble language, but those monks have not sought it in the noble language — is it said they have been offered? Upāli: It is not.

Venerable one, if the monk who is offering consent and the opening of the opportunity indicates it by body but not by speech — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have been offered? Upāli: It is said they have been offered. Likewise, if by speech but not by body — is it said they have been offered? Upāli: It is said they have been offered. And if indicated by both speech and body — is it said they have been offered? Upāli: It is said they have been offered.

Venerable one, but if not indicated by body and not spoken by speech — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have been offered? Upāli: It is not.

Venerable one, if the monk who is offering consent and the opening of the opportunity falls asleep during the night — is it said they have been offered? Upāli: It is not.

Venerable one, if consent and the opening of the opportunity are offered by one who has incurred a penalty or been expelled — is it said they have been offered? Upāli: It is said they have been offered, but those monks have incurred a transgression.

Venerable one, if consent and the opening of the opportunity are conveyed by transmission from one to another — is it said they have been offered? Upāli: It is said they have been offered, but those monks have incurred a transgression.

If, after offering consent and the opening of the opportunity, one acknowledges oneself to be a layman — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have not been offered? Upāli: It is said they have not been offered.

Likewise, if one acknowledges oneself to be a eunuch, and so forth up through acknowledging oneself to have previously been in a dispute — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have not been offered? Upāli: It is said they have not been offered.

If, when a monk is offering consent and the opening of the opportunity, he acknowledges himself to be a eunuch — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have not been offered? Upāli: It is said they have not been offered.

If one acknowledges oneself to have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, to be a partisan, or to have been given a training rule — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have not been offered? Upāli: No, it is not.

If a monk who has received consent and the opening of the opportunity, having accepted them, enters into the midst of the Saṅgha and then acknowledges himself to be a layman — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have not been offered? Upāli: It is not said that they have not been offered.

Likewise, if one acknowledges oneself to be a eunuch, and so forth up through acknowledging oneself to have previously been in a dispute — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have not been offered? Upāli: It is not said that they have not been offered.

If one acknowledges oneself to be a eunuch — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have not been offered? Upāli: No, it is not.

Likewise, from acknowledging that one has caused a schism in the Saṅgha up through acknowledging that one has been given a training rule — is it said that consent and the opening of the opportunity have not been offered? Upāli: No, it is not.

The subject of the opening of the opportunity is complete.

In brief:

A boat, the sky as a third, and the domain of movement with doubt arisen, marks with a third, places, and the rains retreat as a third — or likewise so.

If a monk enters the rains retreat properly in a boat moored to a peg — is it said that he has entered properly? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly.

If during the rains retreat the boat is sent off elsewhere — is it said that the rains retreat is broken? Upāli: No, it is not.

If a monk who has properly entered the rains retreat is granted the seven-day leave and travels beyond the boundary through the sky above — is it said that the rains retreat is broken, or that it is not broken? Upāli: It is said that it is not broken.

If a monk enters the rains retreat properly in the sky above — is it said that he has entered properly? Upāli: No, it is not.

If a monk enters the rains retreat properly in a palace suspended in the sky above — is it said that he has entered properly? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly.

If he then departs from that palace to another dwelling — is it said that the rains retreat is broken? Upāli: No, it is not.

The Blessed One (the Buddha) said, "Enter the rains retreat in dependence on a domain of movement." If a monk enters the rains retreat properly without having a domain of movement — is it said that he has entered properly? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly.

If a monk has entered the rains retreat in dependence on a domain of movement, may he then go from it to that domain of movement with the seven-day leave? Upāli: No, because he has entered the rains retreat in dependence on that very place.

If a monk, having entered the rains retreat, is in doubt and uncertainty as to whether he has entered properly or not — is it said that he has entered properly? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly.

If he is unable to resolve that doubt and uncertainty, should he enter the rains retreat again? Upāli: He should enter again.

What then is the status of that rains retreat? Upāli: It is the earlier one.

If a monk sets his intention on dwelling in a certain place for the rains retreat, travels there, and when dawn breaks it has become the latter rains retreat period — is it said that he has entered the rains retreat properly? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly, because he had the intention of entering properly there.

If a monk goes to a temple, thinks to himself "I shall enter the rains retreat here," and then places one foot inside the boundary — — and one foot outside the boundary, and then dawn breaks and it has become the latter rains retreat period — is it said that he has entered the rains retreat properly? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly, because he had the intention of entering properly there.

Venerable one, if a monk enters the rains retreat properly and night falls — is it said that he has entered properly? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly. But should he remain in that very place? Upāli: No. He should go to the nuns' rains retreat quarters and remain there.

Venerable one, can it be that a monk enters the rains retreat properly in four residences and yet it counts as a proper entry? Upāli: Yes, it can. This is how: that monk pressed down the boundary-marker of four residences — whether a piece of wood, a slab of slate, or a key — and thereby entered the rains retreat properly. Where then should he reside? Wherever he pleases.

Venerable one, if that piece of wood, slate slab, or key becomes subject to destruction — is it said that his rains retreat is broken? Upāli: No. Where should he then reside for the rains retreat? In whichever single place he pleases. To which of those residences does his rains retreat belong? To whichever one his mind intended. As for the remaining ones, they are said to be relinquished.

Venerable one, if from that point on he goes to the second of those residences within the seven-day period without having received a blessing — is it said that his rains retreat is broken? Upāli: It is said that his rains retreat is broken.

Venerable one, if a monk makes four residences — or more than four — share a single boundary and then enters the rains retreat properly — is it said that he has entered the rains retreat properly in all those residences? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly. Where should he then reside? Wherever he pleases.

Venerable one, if a monk enters the rains retreat properly in one residence and thereafter enters the rains retreat properly in a second, a third, and a fourth residence — is it said that he has entered properly? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly. In which residence? The latter one.

Venerable one, if someone has neither an earlier nor a latter rains retreat — what is the term for that? Upāli: It is said that his rains retreat is broken.

Venerable one, if someone has both an earlier and a latter rains retreat, and yet, without having received a blessing for the seven-day period, goes beyond the boundary on some business with the intention of returning — is it said that his rains retreat is broken? Upāli: It is said that his rains retreat is broken. Can he then re-enter the rains retreat properly? Upāli: No. Since he has transgressed his commitment, let him be made to incur the penalty.

Venerable one, for how long does one enter the rains retreat? Upāli: Three months.

Venerable one, how does one who entered the rains retreat for the latter period properly conclude the retreat? Either by completing the count of three months from the time of entry, or else because some circumstance has arisen.

In brief:

At dawn, abandoning intention — a residence, a carriage house, a home, a tree, a cave, likewise;
even if broken, it is the same.
The five classes, and intention,
the seven, and not remaining.

Venerable one, if a dispute arises within the Saṅgha during the rains retreat, and a monk, while fully aware, takes the side of the Dharma or the side of what is not the Dharma — is it said that his rains retreat is broken? Upāli: If he aligns with a party that is still deliberating the matter and dawn then breaks, it is said that his rains retreat is broken.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said to a monk "Enter the rains retreat properly before me," and that monk then sets his intention and enters the rains retreat properly in the presence of a nun — is it said that he has entered the rains retreat properly? Upāli: It is said that he has entered properly. However, if a monk was present, then it counts as a transgression.

Venerable one, may one reside together with a monk who has been expelled from within the rains retreat during that same rains retreat? Upāli: One may reside with him, but only after the matter has been opened for deliberation. One should not remain without that.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said to a monk: "Enter the rains retreat properly in this place among monks who are sūtra-holders and who are like me — that is, monks of such a kind who neither generate doubts that have not yet arisen nor fail to remove doubts that have arisen — whether such a thing is possible or not," then, venerable one, is it permissible to enter the rains retreat in the absence of sūtra-holders and those who are like me? Upāli: It is permissible. Venerable one, is it permissible to enter the rains retreat in the absence of a Vinaya-holder? Upāli: It is not permissible. In that case, venerable one, if there is no Vinaya-holder, should one seek a monk who can recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra? If there is no one who can recite the Prātimokṣa, then it is not permitted to enter the rains retreat.

Venerable one, is it permissible to reside in a house where carriages pass or in a cowherd's house and there enter the rains retreat? Upāli: If one has resolved in one's mind that one will not depart from that rains retreat location, then it is permissible. Venerable one, if one departs from a place where the rains retreat has been properly entered, is it said that the rains retreat is broken? Upāli: It is not.

Venerable one, is it permissible to enter the rains retreat at the foot of a tree, or on a mountain slope, or in a cave, or in a makeshift shelter? Upāli: It is not permissible.

Venerable one, if a monk has gone out with a seven-day or forty-day permission for a particular purpose, and that time runs out — is it said that the seven-day or forty-day permission is broken? Upāli: It is not. Let it be exhausted by the other purpose.

Venerable one, if a monk has gone out with a seven-day permission, thinking "I will open a matter for deliberation," is it said that the rains retreat is broken? Upāli: It is said that the rains retreat is broken. Venerable one, if he has gone out with a six-day, five-day, four-day, or one-day permission, thinking "I will depart from the retreat by such-and-such means," is it said that the rains retreat is broken? Upāli: It is said that the rains retreat is broken.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "Go with a seven-day permission," to whom should the permission be granted? Upāli: To the five groups. Where should the permission be granted? Within the boundary. How should the permission be granted? One should form the intention and speak the words: "I, of such-and-such a name, having properly entered the former rains retreat here in this place within the boundary, and having been granted permission to go beyond the boundary for such-and-such a purpose, I, of such-and-such a name — this is my rains retreat; I remain in this same rains retreat." For whose sake should the permission be granted? Upāli: For the sake of the seven groups.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "Confer the forty-day vow," upon whom should it be conferred? Upāli: Upon the five groups. Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "Give the forty-day vow for the sake of the Saṅgha," may the forty-day vow be conferred upon monks, nuns, female probationers, female novices, male novices, laywomen, laymen, those with family connections, and beyond these upon other non-Buddhist renunciants, brahmins, wanderers, and mendicants? Upāli: It is not permissible.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "The instructions should be given for forty days," is it permissible to give the instructions for thirty-nine days, for thirty days, or for twenty days? Upāli: It is permissible. Venerable one, is it permissible to give the instructions for thirty-nine days, thirty days, twenty days, ten days, or seven days in addition to the forty days?

Upāli: It is not permissible. Venerable one, is it permissible to give the instructions for thirty days, twenty days, ten days, or seven days in addition to thirty-nine days? Upāli: It is not permissible. Venerable one, is it permissible to consecrate for seven days in addition to forty days? Upāli: It is not permissible. And why is that, Upāli? Within the boundary one should remain for more days; outside the boundary one should remain for fewer days. Venerable one, is it permissible to consecrate for seven days in addition to thirty-nine days? Upāli: It is not permissible. Venerable one, is it permissible to consecrate for seven days in addition to thirty days, twenty days, or seven days? Upāli: It is permissible. Venerable one, is it permissible to give the instructions for forty days in addition to seven days? Upāli: It is not permissible. And why is that, Upāli? Within the boundary one should remain for more days; outside the boundary one should remain for fewer days. Venerable one, is it permissible to give the instructions for thirty-nine days, thirty days, twenty days, ten days, or seven days in addition to seven days? Upāli: It is permissible. Venerable one, is it permissible to give the instructions for yet another seven days in addition to seven days? Upāli: It is permissible. Venerable one, if a monk has entered the rains retreat and his preceptor and abbot have passed away, and he then cannot find a place to reside, is he called one whose rains retreat has been broken? Upāli: He is called one whose rains retreat has been broken.

The substantive matters of the rains retreat are complete.

In brief:

Sandals of two kinds of leather, bear-hide or those with a tail,
a high bed and a large bed, sandals with an upper, and wooden sandals.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "Do not keep the five kinds of impermissible sandals," are there also other wild animals, bad woollen oxen, bad horses, and the like, such that sandals made of their hides should also not be kept? Upāli: Those sandals too should not be kept. Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "Accept sandals given by householders that have not had medicine applied to them," if a monk keeps sandals given by a householder that have had medicine applied to them, does he incur an offense? Upāli: He does. For instance, if the monk has kept ones that are entirely decorated with designs, or adorned with gold, or adorned with silver. Venerable one, are there cases where a monk keeps five impermissible kinds and yet does not incur an offense? Upāli: There are. For instance, if he is frightened by a small wild animal or by a nāga. Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "A monk should not keep a hide; he should not sit on a hide," venerable one, how much contact with a hide counts as sitting on it? Upāli: As much as is settled by resting the buttocks upon it. Venerable one, how much contact counts as lying down? Upāli: As much as the body is stretched out upon it. Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "A monk should not keep a hide," are there cases where a monk keeps a hide and yet does not incur an offense? Upāli: There are. One who is ill may keep a hide; one who is not ill may not. Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "Bear-hide may be used," should only the sick keep it, or may the healthy also keep it? Upāli: Both the sick and the healthy may use it. If the Blessed One has said "Take five tail-hairs and use them as a ford-crosser," venerable one, if there are other four-footed animals, may one cross with those as well? Upāli: One may cross. Venerable one, if the male is not present, may one cross with the female? Upāli: If an obstacle has arisen, one may cross with that. Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "A monk should not sit on a high bed," what is the measure of a high bed?

A high bed is one that exceeds eight finger-breadths of the Sugata's measure. Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said to the monks "Do not sit on a bed that is both high and large," are there cases in which a monk may sit on a bed that is both high and large without incurring a transgression? Upāli: There are. When there is no other seat available in the dwelling of a god (deva), the dwelling of a nāga, the dwelling of a yakṣa, the dwelling of a king, or the dwelling of a minister.

Venerable one, are there cases in which a monk's mounting a vehicle would result in three transgressions? Upāli: There are. Namely, when the vehicle is female, and when it is adorned with gold.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "In a snowy region, wear boots," are there cases in which a monk may keep boots even in a region other than that without incurring a transgression? Upāli: There are. In a place where one cannot survive without boots.

Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said "Monks should not keep wooden sandals," are there cases in which a monk may keep wooden sandals without incurring a transgression? Upāli: There are. In a place where there is water and the ground is flooded, so that one cannot travel without wooden sandals.

The section on leather goods is complete.

In brief:

Two medicines, two kinds of salt,
two kinds of butter — likewise so.
Raw and cooked, and molasses, grain-oil is the last that profits.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: Venerable one, can that very same medicine be a morning medicine, that same one an afternoon medicine, that same one a seven-day medicine, and that same one a medicine to be kept for the duration of one's life? Upāli: There can be. Sugar-cane is for the morning. Its juice is for the afternoon. Molasses is for seven days. Burnt ash is for the duration of one's life.

Upāli: Curd is for the morning. Water is for the afternoon. Butter is for seven days. Burnt ash is for the duration of one's life.

Upāli: Meat is for the morning. Fat is for seven days. Burnt ash is for the duration of one's life.

Upāli: Grain is for the morning. Grain-oil is for seven days. Burnt ash is for the duration of one's life.

Venerable one, if the morning medicines, the afternoon medicines, the seven-day medicines, and the lifetime medicines are mixed together, may they be consumed? Upāli: They may not.

Venerable one, may medicines that have been taken up but not yet received as a gift, or that have been taken up and received as a gift, or that have been stored inside, or that have been cooked inside, or that one has cooked oneself — may these be consumed? Upāli: They may not.

Venerable one, if a monk consumes whatever morning, afternoon, seven-day, or lifetime medicines he has taken up but not received as a gift, or taken up and received as a gift, or stored inside, or cooked inside, or cooked himself, or cooked by a monk — what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a nun consumes whatever morning, afternoon, seven-day, or lifetime medicines she has taken up but not received as a gift, or taken up and received as a gift, or stored inside, or cooked inside, or cooked herself, or cooked by a nun — what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a monk has taken up medicines and received them as a gift, or stored them inside, or cooked them inside, or cooked them himself, or had them cooked by a monk, and while consuming them he changes his ordination status and becomes a nun — what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, if a nun has taken up medicines and received them as a gift, or stored them inside, or cooked them inside, cooked herself, or had them cooked by a nun — and while consuming them she changes her ordination status and becomes a monk: what does that become? It becomes a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, with respect to medicines that are suitable for the morning period, those that are suitable for the afternoon period, those that are suitable for seven days, and those that are suitable for life — if these are mixed together and not separated, may those mixed medicines be consecrated for use throughout one's lifetime? Upāli: That is not permissible. The morning-suitable, afternoon-suitable, and seven-day-suitable medicines cannot be put to the purpose of medicines for life, and they cannot be consecrated as such.

However, if one is able to separate out those morning-suitable, afternoon-suitable, and seven-day-suitable medicines, then consecration is permissible.

Venerable one, may one consume salt cooked on an impermissible day? Upāli: The sick may not eat it.

What of food cooked with meat, or cooked with butter, or cooked with oil? The same applies.

Venerable one, may one consume grain-oil or butter cooked with impermissible salt? Upāli: That is not permissible.

Venerable one, may one consume butter or grain-oil cooked together with beer? Upāli: That may be eaten.

Venerable one, may one consume butter or grain-oil that has become mixed together with beer? Upāli: That is not permissible.

Venerable one, may one consume medicine that has been rejected by reason of beer? Upāli: For the sick it is permissible; for those who are not sick it is not.

Venerable one, if a tree has grown in an impermissible place and a fruit falls in an impermissible place, may that fruit be consumed? Upāli: That is not permissible.

If a tree has grown in an impermissible place and a fruit falls in a permissible place, may that fruit be consumed? Upāli: That is not permissible.

If a tree has grown in a permissible place and a fruit falls in an impermissible place, may that fruit be consumed? If it has not yet been there for a full day, it may be eaten.

If a tree has grown in a permissible place and a fruit falls in a permissible place, may that fruit be consumed? Upāli: That may be eaten.

Venerable one, if a tree is rooted in permissible ground and it leans over impermissible ground — if one in impermissible ground grafts it, or grafts a branch, or by cutting a branch renders it permissible, can one say "it has been rendered permissible," or say "it has been done," or consume it? Upāli: That is not permissible.

Venerable one, if a tree is rooted in permissible ground and one who is in impermissible ground causes it to be grafted — can one say "it is permissible," or say "it has been done," or consume it? Upāli: That is not.

If a tree is rooted in impermissible ground and one who is in permissible ground grafts it, or grafts a branch, or by cutting a branch renders it permissible — can one say "it has been rendered permissible"? Upāli: One may say "it has been rendered permissible," and it may be eaten.

If a tree is rooted in impermissible ground and one who is in permissible ground causes it to be grafted — can one say "it has been rendered permissible"? One may say "it has been rendered permissible." May it be consumed? Upāli: It may be eaten.

Venerable one, if three stumps are in impermissible ground and a grafting branch from a tree that is in permissible ground bridges them — may that be consumed? Upāli: That is not permissible.

Venerable one, if a tree is rooted in impermissible ground and two stumps are in permissible ground and one stump is in impermissible ground, and a grafting branch bridges them — may that be consumed? Upāli: That is not permissible.

Venerable one, if one stump is in impermissible ground and a tree is rooted in permissible ground and its grafting branch bridges them — may that be consumed? Upāli: That is not permissible.

Venerable one, if a tree is rooted in permissible ground and two stumps are in permissible ground and one stump is in impermissible ground, and a grafting branch bridges them — may that be consumed? Upāli: That may be eaten.

If three stumps are in permissible ground and a tree is rooted in permissible ground, and a grafting branch bridges them — may that be consumed? Upāli: That is permissible.

Venerable one, if a monk renders any of the five classes of seeds permissible — by piercing, cutting, or scratching with a fingernail — may one say "it has been made permissible," or "it is permissible"? And having been made permissible, may it be eaten? Upāli: It may be eaten. All except those made permissible by fire may be eaten.

Venerable one, the Blessed One declared, "Drink these eight kinds of drink." Are roots, trunks, leaves, fruits, and those mixed with something strained — are these permissible to receive? Upāli: They are permissible.

Venerable one, may sugar-cane water consecrated seven times by sky be received? Upāli: It is permissible. For how long may it be drunk? Until it has transformed into something else.

Venerable one, may a medicine that is impermissible be had dissolved in sugar-cane water? Upāli: No.

Venerable one, how should one attend upon a sick person? One should attend upon them with the attitude of a teacher, with medicines that are beneficial and appropriate.

Venerable one, what should one give to a sick person? Upāli: Except for what is intrinsically blameworthy, give whatever will bring about the recovery of the sick person.

In summary:

The owl, the vulture, and the crow, the heron, the kite, the cormorant — birds that eat human corpses, and those possessed of powerful claws and beaks.

Venerable one, may the flesh of an owl be received? Upāli: It is not permissible. May the flesh of a vulture, the flesh of a crow, the flesh of a heron, the flesh of a kite, the flesh of a cormorant, and likewise other carrion-eating birds, and the flesh of those possessed of powerful claws and beaks — may these be received? Upāli: They are not permissible.

In summary:

Animals with stripes, flesh and lotus, insects and frogs likewise — the mongoose, the snake, the monitor lizard, the white frog, the she-donkey, the otter.

Venerable one, may the flesh of a striped animal be received? Upāli: It is not permissible. Venerable one, may the flesh of a lotus-dweller, the flesh of a frog, the flesh of a mongoose, the flesh of a snake, the flesh of a monitor lizard, the flesh of a white frog, the flesh of an otter, the flesh of a crow, and likewise those that dwell in water, those possessed of powerful claws and fangs, and other carrion-eaters — may the flesh of these be received? Upāli: They are not permissible.

In summary:

The yak, the fox, and the horse, the monkey and the human likewise — the lion, the tiger, and the bear, and those possessed of powerful claws and fangs.

Venerable one, may the flesh of a yak be received? Upāli: It is not permissible. Venerable one, may the flesh of a horse, the flesh of a fox, the flesh of a monkey, the flesh of a human, the flesh of a lion, the flesh of a tiger, the flesh of a bear, and likewise other four-footed animals possessed of powerful claws and fangs — may the flesh of these be received? Upāli: They are not permissible.

Venerable one, as for that whose flesh is not permissible — may its fat and its milk be received? Upāli: They are not permissible. Upāli, why is that? Upāli: All that pertains to one whose flesh is impermissible is likewise impermissible.

Venerable one, may raw flesh be received? Upāli: It is not permissible. May the flesh of one slain on one's own behalf be received? Upāli: It is not permissible.

The section on medicinal substances is complete.

The Noble Vinaya, the eighteenth chapter.

In summary:

The place where the rains retreat is divided in two,
the two of gain and the Saṅgha — the madman, the suspension, these three — the preparation, the many guests during the rains.

Venerable one, a householder approaches one who has entered the rains retreat properly and says, "I offer this Dharma robe." If a Dharma robe is offered to those observing the rains retreat, but the final month of the rains retreat has not yet come and no resolution has been set — who receives it? Upāli: Those observing the rains retreat receive it.

Venerable one, a householder approaches and says, "I offer this Dharma robe to those who have entered the rains retreat properly." If it is offered to the Saṅgha who have entered the rains retreat properly, and the final month of the rains has arrived and a resolution has been set at that place — who receives it?

Those observing the rains retreat receive it.

Venerable one, a householder approaches the Saṅgha and says, "I offer this Dharma robe to whatever monks are residing here at this place." If a robe is offered in this way, who receives it? Whoever it was given to receives it. And likewise for the second, and expanding in the same way from the third up through the tenth — if offered to those monks, who receives it? Whoever it was given to receives it.

Venerable one, a householder offers a robe to the Saṅgha and says, "I offer this robe to the monks who will be residing here at this place tomorrow." Who receives it? Whoever it was given to receives it. And likewise from the second up through monks residing for ten years — if he says, "I offer it to those who have resided here," who receives it? Whoever it was given to receives it. But if it happens that those monks are no longer residing at that place, may those monks divide those robes? Upāli: They should divide them.

Venerable one, if the Saṅgha separates during the rains retreat, should those gains of the rains retreat be given out? Upāli: No. Venerable one, if the Saṅgha separates from those who have resided long at the rains retreat residence, should those gains of the rains retreat be given out? Give them. To whom? To both sides equally.

Venerable one, if during the rains retreat a monk goes out seeking a bowl and Dharma robe, should the gains of that rains retreat be given to him? Upāli: No. Venerable one, if he has resided long at the rains retreat residence, should the gains of the rains retreat be given to him? Upāli: Give them. To whom? To whoever the gift was dedicated or assigned.

Venerable one, if during the rains retreat a monk passes away, should the gains of that rains retreat be given to him? Do not give them. If he has resided long at the rains retreat residence and then passes away after his time, should the gains of the rains retreat be given? Upāli: Give them. To whom? To whoever it was dedicated. But if it was not dedicated to anyone, to whom should it be given? To the Saṅgha.

Venerable one, if during the rains retreat a monk acknowledges having been a novice's father — should he receive the gains of the rains retreat? He should be given them. How much should be given to him? A novice-father's share. If he has resided long at the rains retreat residence and then acknowledges having been a novice's father, how much should be given? A monk's full share.

Venerable one, if during the rains retreat a monk acknowledges having been a layman — should he receive the gains of the rains retreat? He should not be given them. If he has resided long at the rains retreat residence and then acknowledges having been a layman, should he receive the gains of the rains retreat? Give them. To whom? To whoever it was dedicated.

Venerable one, if during the rains retreat a monk acknowledges having been a eunuch, or having expelled a nun, or having killed his father, or having killed his mother, or having killed an arhat, or having created a schism in the Saṅgha, or having drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, or having been a non-Buddhist, or having gone over to non-Buddhists, or having been a thief who entered the order under false pretenses, or having previously committed an offense, or having previously been a troublemaker — should those persons receive the gains of the rains retreat? Upāli: They should not be given them.

Venerable one, if someone who has resided long at the rains retreat residence then comes to full understanding — should he receive the gains of the rains retreat? Upāli: He should be given them.

Venerable one, if during the rains retreat a monk acknowledges having been a nun, or having been non-resident, or having dwelt separately, or having sided with one party, or having relinquished the training — should those persons receive the gains of the rains retreat? Upāli: They should not be given them.

Venerable one, if monks have resided long at the rains retreat residence, or have resided through the full rains period — if they acknowledge this, should those persons receive the gains of the rains retreat? Upāli: They should be given them.

Venerable one, can there be a case where a monk appropriates robe-cloth from any of the four residences without thereby incurring an offense? Upāli: There can. This is the case where that monk, having made all four residences into a single boundary, then entered the rains retreat in proper form.

Venerable one, by what measure does one speak of a monk having obtained robe-cloth? Upāli: It is like this: thinking "this is my robe-cloth," it has come into view with the eye, or has been placed in one's hand, on one's shoulder, or in one's lap.

Venerable one, can there be a case where a single monk appropriates the gains of the Saṅgha without thereby incurring an offense? Upāli: There can. This is the case where that monk was residing alone, and people offered robes there on behalf of the Saṅgha.

Venerable one, can there be a case where a monk who has received an allocation of the Saṅgha's gains appropriates them and thereby incurs an offense? Upāli: There can. When those gains had been dedicated to the Saṅgha.

Venerable one, may a monk who has gone mad be appointed to distribute robe-cloth? Upāli: No. One whose mind is disturbed, one oppressed by illness, one who is mentally deficient, one who is mute, and one who is deaf — these are likewise.

Venerable one, may a blind monk be appointed to distribute robe-cloth? Upāli: No.

Venerable one, from when are the robes of a mad monk to be held and dedicated? Up until the time when his own mind is restored.

Venerable one, should robes be received from a mad monk, or should they not? From some they should be received; from others they should not. From whom should they be received? From one who has a living father, mother, brother, or sister, or who has made a gift from his own home and with the intention of relinquishing it.

Venerable one, should the gains of the rains retreat be given to one who has broken the rains retreat? To some they should be given; to others they should not. To whom should they not be given? To one who is known to have neither the manner of the earlier rains period nor the manner of the later rains period. To whom should they be given? To one who is known to have the manner of the earlier rains period and also of the later.

Venerable one, if a nurse sent out an attendant to assist another, and the patient then passed away — to which nurse should the robe be given? To the latter one.

Venerable one, if a nurse who has gone beyond the boundary for a reason returns, and the patient then passes away — should that nurse be given the robe? If the nurse went for the sake of the patient, that nurse should be given the robe. But if the nurse went for some other purpose, the robe should not be given.

Venerable one, if a nurse entered the rains retreat at a different residence — should that nurse be given the robe or not? The robe should be given.

Venerable one, if a novice served as a nurse and the patient passed away — should that novice be given the nurse's robe? Upāli: It should be given.

Venerable one, if a fully ordained nun served as nurse and the patient passed away — should that nurse be given the robe? It should not be given. Probationary nuns and novice nuns are likewise.

Venerable one, if robes obtained from robbing many travelers are encountered — should they be received or not? Upāli: If a merchant has given them, they may be received. But if a thief has given them, they should not be received at that time.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk should not set aside rains retreat gains inside the rains retreat itself. If a householder, having invited monks from many residences and gathered them in one place — whether that place was sought out or not — then presented robes directly to those members of the Saṅgha, should those monks divide the robes?

Upāli: Those robes may be divided as robes occasioned by circumstance.

Venerable one, if during the rains retreat a monk passes away, may those monks divide his robes? They may be divided as the goods of the deceased.

In brief:

The outer boundary between two villages, and likewise that of a stūpa — dedicated from the boundary, and finally lapsed.

Venerable one, if there is a temple within a village and the Saṅgha that has entered the rains retreat there goes beyond the boundary for some purpose, and monks stationed at the edge of that boundary are within the boundary of the town, and people there then offer rains-retreat gains to the Saṅgha — who receives them? The Saṅgha of the town.

Venerable one, if the Saṅgha has entered the rains retreat in a town and is dispersed within the rains retreat period — who receives the rains-retreat gains? Upāli: Those who have inclined toward the Dharma.

Venerable one, if a monk consecrates wool as the three Dharma robes — is that considered to be consecrated? If there is other cloth available, it should not be consecrated. If it is consecrated, a transgression is incurred.

Venerable one, if a monk goes beyond the boundary and takes the Saṅgha's gains for himself — what becomes of that? It is a wrongdoing.

Venerable one, can it happen that a Saṅgha that has entered the rains retreat divides the gains of a stūpa during the rains retreat without incurring a fault, and that it is allowable? Upāli: There is such a case. Gains dedicated to a stūpa of a hearer may be divided as the goods of the deceased.

Venerable one, when the Blessed One has said "let those within the boundary divide the goods of the deceased" — if a monk consecrates the goods of the deceased and then goes beyond the boundary, is a share of the goods of the deceased given? Upāli: It is given. But if he has gone without consecrating them? Upāli: It is not.

Venerable one, if other monks are present and the goods of the deceased and the robes have not been consecrated — should those monks be given a share of the goods of the deceased? Upāli: They should be given. Venerable one, if they have come after consecrating them? Upāli: No.

Venerable one, when the Blessed One has said "consecrate the goods of the deceased by petition and by formal act" — if a monk is alone in a residence, how should he consecrate them? Upāli: That monk should arouse the intention and speak the words aloud: "This article, obtained through division, I shall take up as this Dharma robe. I shall make it my own. This I shall consecrate." Thus he should consecrate it. If two or three monks are staying in a place, they should say this to one another.

Venerable one, may cloth that has not been examined be consecrated? Upāli: It may not. Venerable one, if a circumstance similar to that arises, may it be done? Upāli: It may.

The section on robes is complete.

In brief:

Two old ones, and what is laid aside, a new permanent one, a damaged one,
one received and one not received, gains at the right time and undivided — the impermissible, beyond the boundary, and the undesignated person: these too are ten.

Venerable one, if an old robe is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression. What is an old robe? It is one that the Saṅgha has previously set aside permanently.

Venerable one, if a held old robe is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression. What is a held old robe? It is one that has been used by a monk.

Venerable one, if a set-aside robe is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression. What is a set-aside robe? It is one that has been relinquished.

Venerable one, if a new robe is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha does not incur a transgression. What is a new robe? It is one that the Saṅgha has permanently set aside for the first time.

Venerable one, if a permanent robe is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression. What is a permanent robe? It is a robe obtained in the final month of the rains retreat.

Venerable one, if a worn-out robe is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression. What is a worn-out robe? It is a robe that has rotted.

Venerable one, if an unsuitable robe is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression.

Venerable one, if a suitable robe is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha does not incur a transgression.

Venerable one, when the Blessed One declared that a robe obtained at the right time should be permanently set aside — if a robe obtained at the right time is permanently set aside, is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside. What is a robe obtained at the right time? It is a robe obtained on the very same lunar day, one day after three months have passed.

Venerable one, when the Blessed One declared that an unworn robe should be permanently set aside — what is an unworn robe? It is one on which the dye has just been applied.

Venerable one, when the Blessed One declared that a suitable unworn robe should be permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside. What is a suitable unworn robe? It is one that is of a permissible color.

Venerable one, if an impermissible robe is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression. What is an impermissible robe? It is one that is impermissible by reason of its own nature.

Venerable one, if a robe or the one appointed for permanent setting aside has not been distributed, and yet a permanent setting aside takes place — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression.

Venerable one, if a Dharma robe appointed beyond the boundary is permanently set aside — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression.

Venerable one, if a permanent setting aside takes place that has been interrupted by one who is carrying out a forfeiture — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression.

Venerable one, likewise, if the permanent setting aside is carried out by one undergoing forfeiture, by one who is content to undergo it, by one who conducts himself contentedly, by one who has acted in such contentment, by one who has surrendered the training, by one who has not entered the rains retreat, by one who has broken it, by one who has entered the later rains retreat in the proper manner, by one residing elsewhere for the rains retreat, or by those who are insane — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression.

In summary:

Two fives, two minds,
two leavings-over, and likewise — women, the mark, the permanent, and the place:
these are to be understood in six aspects.

Venerable one, the Blessed One declared that five types of persons should not be appointed for permanent setting aside: namely, those carrying out a forfeiture, those undergoing a forfeiture, those who conduct themselves contentedly, those who have acted in such contentment, and those who have surrendered the training. If a person carrying out a forfeiture permanently sets aside a robe — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression.

Venerable one, likewise, if those undergoing a forfeiture, those who conduct themselves contentedly, those who have acted in such contentment, and those who have surrendered the training permanently set aside a robe — is it considered set aside? Upāli: It is considered set aside, and the Saṅgha incurs a transgression.

The Saṅgha includes both those who have passed away and those still living. Furthermore, there are five classes of person who are not appointed to preside over the invitation ceremony: those who have observed no rains retreat, those whose rains retreat has been broken, those who have entered the later rains retreat in the proper manner, those who have spent the rains retreat elsewhere, and those who have surrendered the training.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has further declared that if those same five classes of person — those who have observed no rains retreat, those whose rains retreat has been broken, those who have entered the later rains retreat in the proper manner, those who have spent the rains retreat elsewhere, and those who have surrendered the training — conduct an invitation ceremony, it is to be considered conducted. In that case, venerable one, if a person who observed no rains retreat conducts an invitation ceremony, is it considered conducted? Upāli: In some cases it is considered conducted; in some cases it is not. Venerable one, in which case is it considered conducted, and in which case is it not? Upāli: Here is how it is: a novice who has entered the rains retreat properly, and who, within that same later rains retreat period, receives full ordination, and then three months pass — if such a person conducts an invitation ceremony, it is considered conducted for that person. Why is that? Upāli: Because one who has passed three months is called one who has completed the rains, and this too is manifest in three months. But as for one who, having gone forth from the later rains retreat and received full ordination, stays together with monks for three months and then conducts the invitation ceremony — that is not considered conducted. Upāli: Three months of staying is what is called the rains, and this has not been completed in three months.

Venerable one, if a person whose rains retreat has been broken conducts an invitation ceremony, is it considered conducted? Upāli: In some cases it is considered conducted; in some cases it is not. Venerable one, in which case is it considered conducted, and in which case is it not? Upāli: Here is how it is: a person who has no knowledge of the earlier rains retreat and no connection to the later rains retreat either — if that person stays together with monks for three months and simultaneously conducts the invitation ceremony, it is not considered conducted for that person. Upāli: Three months of staying is what is called the rains, and for such a person there is no recognition of three months. But as for one who has stayed in the earlier rains retreat, or who also knows the later one, and who, having gone beyond the boundary with the seven-day or forty-day authorization, and the dawn has risen outside the boundary — if that person, having stayed three months, conducts the invitation ceremony, it is considered conducted for that person. Upāli: Three months of staying is what is called the rains, and for that person too it is manifest in three months. But if one violates the commitment, it becomes an offense.

Venerable one, if a person who has entered the later rains retreat in the proper manner conducts an invitation ceremony, is it considered conducted? Upāli: In some cases it is considered conducted; in some cases it is not. Venerable one, in which case is it considered conducted? Upāli: When the monks of a Saṅgha who entered the earlier rains retreat properly — those conducting an invitation ceremony together — and those who entered the later rains retreat properly all conduct the invitation together, it is considered conducted for those persons. Upāli: Three months of staying is what is called the rains, and for them there is no recognition of three months. But if the entire Saṅgha has entered the later rains retreat in the proper manner, stays for three months, and then conducts the invitation ceremony, it is considered conducted for all of them. Upāli: Three months of staying is what is called the rains, and for them it is manifest in three months.

Venerable one, if a person who has spent the rains retreat elsewhere conducts an invitation ceremony, is it considered conducted? Upāli: In some cases it is considered conducted; in some cases it is not. Venerable one, in which case is it considered conducted, and in which case is it not? Upāli: Monks who reside in a place where the boundaries have been separately established, and who, having spent the rains retreat elsewhere, go somewhere else and then conduct the invitation ceremony — for those persons it is not considered conducted. Upāli: What, then, is the invitation ceremony? The invitation ceremony that is conducted after staying three months — for those persons there is no recognition of three months.

Upāli: When the Saṅgha of monks who have resided through the three months of the rains retreat — once the three rains months have passed and, on that very last day of the additional period, they dissolve the great boundary and consolidate four or five separate boundaries into a single one and then perform the invitation ceremony — it is to be called the invitation ceremony conducted for all of those residences. Likewise, for those who were residing in one place and perform the invitation ceremony in another, it is to be called the invitation ceremony conducted in another residence.

Venerable one: If the invitation ceremony is conducted after a dismissal, is it to be called conducted?

Upāli: In some cases it is called conducted; in some cases, not conducted.

Venerable one: In which case is it not called conducted?

Upāli: When a monk who entered the rains retreat has had a formal act of suspension performed against him by an assembled Saṅgha — and those monks who are residing through the rains also perform the invitation ceremony together with him without his having sought their consent — in that case it is not called conducted.

And in which case is it called conducted?

Upāli: When a monk who entered the rains retreat has had an act of suspension from association imposed upon him by an assembled Saṅgha, or has had a formal act of censure performed against him, and he then seeks consent — and the Saṅgha of monks residing through the rains performs the invitation ceremony together with him — in that case it is called conducted.

Venerable one: The Blessed One has declared that a monk who performs the invitation ceremony, having taken up the invitation-robe, should go first to washing it, straightening it, mending it, and sewing it — right up to the final needle-stitch — and should generate a threefold mental resolve: "With this Dharma-robe I shall establish the invitation ceremony for the Saṅgha; I am establishing it; I am performing it." Even if the threefold mental resolve is generated, if with this Dharma-robe one establishes the invitation ceremony for the Saṅgha and generates the twofold mental resolve — "I am performing it" — then it is called conducted.

Venerable one: Is it sufficient to perform the invitation ceremony with a single mental resolve?

Upāli: It is sufficient. It is as follows: when a monk who is performing the invitation ceremony generates the mental resolve — "I, called such-and-such by name, am performing the invitation ceremony for the Saṅgha with this robe" — it is called the performing of the invitation ceremony.

Venerable one: When monks are expelled by a king after leaving the monastic life, how are those monks to perform the invitation ceremony?

Just as when one has gone forth in the proper way.

Venerable one: Can that very invitation ceremony be both valid and invalid?

Upāli: Yes. It is as follows: if among those monks some have been expelled by the king and some have not, and they go forth in the proper manner — and on that very last day of the additional period a householder of the place where those who were not expelled reside provides a meal for both groups of Saṅgha and offers a robe for the invitation ceremony — that robe is valid for those who were not expelled by the king, and it is not valid for those who were expelled.

Venerable one: By which of these eight phrases does one come forth from the invitation ceremony? And which among them are shared, and which are not shared?

Upāli: All of them except the first and the last are shared.

Venerable one: If night falls while a monk is performing the invitation ceremony, is it called conducted?

Upāli: It is called conducted. Take that monk who is concealing the invitation-robe as a believer.

Venerable one: We speak of the invitation-robe, we speak of performing the invitation ceremony, and we speak of coming forth from the invitation ceremony. Venerable one, what then is the invitation-robe, what is performing the invitation ceremony, and what is coming forth from it?

Upāli: The robe is the invitation-robe. The generating of the mental resolve is the performing of the invitation ceremony. The eight phrases are the coming forth from the invitation ceremony.

Venerable one: If monks entered the rains retreat within four or five boundary areas, and then departed from the retreat and performed the invitation ceremony, is it called performed in all of those residences?

Upāli: It is called performed in all of them.

Venerable one: If, having performed the invitation ceremony, one dissolves the great shared boundary and then draws up individual boundaries separately, is it called the invitation ceremony having been withdrawn?

Upāli: It is not. It is called the invitation ceremony having been performed in all of those residences.

Venerable one: If one draws up separate individual boundaries and then withdraws the invitation ceremony, is it called the invitation ceremony having been withdrawn from all of those residences?

Upāli: It is not. Those from which it is withdrawn, it is called the invitation ceremony having been withdrawn. Those from which it is not withdrawn, it is called the invitation ceremony not having been withdrawn.

Venerable one: If those who have come forth from the ceremony and the monks took four or five boundary areas and merged them into one and then performed the invitation ceremony, is it called the invitation ceremony having been performed in all of those residences?

Upāli: It is called the invitation ceremony having been performed in all of them.

Venerable one: If, having performed the invitation ceremony, one dissolves the great shared boundary and draws up separate individual boundaries, is it called the invitation ceremony not having been performed?

Upāli: It is not. It is called the invitation ceremony having been performed in all of them.

Venerable one: If one draws up separate individual boundaries and then withdraws the invitation ceremony, is it called the invitation ceremony having been withdrawn from all of those residences?

Upāli: It is not. Those from which it is withdrawn are called the invitation ceremony having been withdrawn. Those from which it is not withdrawn are called the invitation ceremony not having been withdrawn.

In brief:

The third and fifth months, and the five and three limits of the restoration ceremony, the robe and the large cloth as conditions, two withdrawals and two separations,
the second measure likewise, and laypeople and the rest —
last is the giving of the precepts.

Venerable one: For how long may one hold the invitation ceremony open?

Upāli: Three months — just as one dwells for three months having entered the rains retreat.

Venerable one: For how long may one keep the invitation ceremony?

Upāli: Five months.

Venerable one: For those who perform the invitation ceremony at the end of the later rains retreat, does that also count as keeping it for five months?

Upāli: However many there are among those who thus perform the invitation ceremony, they should each keep it according to that number of months, up to five months.

Venerable one: Should the invitation ceremony be held open until the end of the restoration ceremony?

Upāli: It should be done at the end of the restoration ceremony.

Venerable one: Should the invitation ceremony be withdrawn at the end of the restoration ceremony?

Upāli: It should be done at the end of the restoration ceremony.

Venerable one: On what causes and conditions did the Blessed One declare that an unsuitable rains retreat should be set aside?

Upāli: The Blessed One declared five causes and five conditions, and those five are these: a residence that has monks together with doors and shutters; a locale that has danger and that has cause for suspicion; when it rains or there is reason to suspect rain; when one wishes to go at an improper time to another village; when one has taken up the invitation ceremony at one's residence; and last is the petition and the formal act.

Venerable one: On what causes and conditions did the Blessed One declare that the large cloth of the rains season is permissible?

Upāli: Three: when it does not rain and there is no reason to suspect rain; when one wishes to go at an improper time to another village, another town, or to cross a river; and when one is not staying at the bank of a river or by a well.

Venerable one: For how long may one keep the large cloth of the rains season?

Upāli: A month and a half.

Venerable one: How many are the conditions that disqualify a residence for performing the invitation ceremony?

Upāli: Ten: not being separated for even a single day; not exceeding ten days; not exceeding one month; keeping robes that have not been stitched together; going about using both the upper and lower robes without a third robe; not eating in excess; not eating repeatedly; going without having been invited; seeking robes as one pleases; and from the last month of autumn up to the beginning of spring — whatever gains are obtained in that period should be distributed by the Saṅgha of those who have dwelt in the rains retreat.

Venerable one: Is this a matter of training or — Venerable one: Will those who have received the kathina robe be deprived of it?

Upāli: No. These are qualities.

Venerable one: Is there a case in which the established ground can be revoked without a formal request and without a Saṅgha act having been performed?

Upāli: There is. For example, if the resident monks have established their ground on the very last day of the month of Kārttika, and then a large number of monks arrive unexpectedly, so that that very day is the fifteenth for those newcomers, and they perform the restoration ceremony and recite the code of individual liberation — if the resident monks too join in after them and perform the restoration ceremony, this is called revoking the established ground without a formal request and without a Saṅgha act.

Venerable one: If the resident monks have established their ground and gone beyond the boundary, and monks arrive unexpectedly and revoke the established ground, is that called a revocation?

Upāli: No. And why? Because it is only the one who established the ground who can revoke the established ground.

Venerable one: When the Saṅgha has separated in a proper rains retreat, who presides?

Those who speak in accordance with the Dharma.

Venerable one: When the Saṅgha has separated in the place where the ground was established, who receives the gains of the rains retreat?

Both parties.

Venerable one: If gains are obtained directly and in person, who receives them?

The Dharma-side receives them.

Venerable one: If cloth that is below the required size is stitched together in pieces and sewn into a robe, and then established as the kathina ground, is it called the establishing of the kathina ground?

Upāli: It is not called establishing.

Venerable one: If something below the required size is established as the kathina ground, is it called establishing?

Upāli: It is not called establishing.

Venerable one: With what kind of robe is the kathina ground to be established?

Upāli: One that is five spans in length and three spans in width.

Venerable one: If a layperson establishes the robe for the purpose of establishing the kathina ground, is it called establishing?

Upāli: It is not called establishing, and the Saṅgha act too is void.

Likewise, when the robe for establishing the kathina ground is laid down by one who is no longer in good standing, or who is no longer residing, or who is dwelling separately, up until the point of the preceding dispute — if they establish the kathina ground, is it called establishing?

Upāli: It is not called establishing, and the Saṅgha act too is void.

Venerable one: If a novice establishes the robe for the kathina ground and establishes the kathina ground, is it called establishing?

Upāli: It is not called establishing, and the Saṅgha act too is void.

Venerable one: If those who establish the kathina ground have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, have taken a partisan position, or have given up their training, and they establish the kathina ground, is it called establishing?

Upāli: It is called establishing, and the Saṅgha act too is void.

Venerable one: If a mad person establishes the robe for the kathina ground and establishes the kathina ground, is it called establishing?

Upāli: It is not called establishing.

If one has the perception of a monk, and, thinking "I who am called such-and-such am establishing the kathina ground for the Saṅgha; I am establishing it," arouses that intention — it is called establishing. Likewise, it should be understood the same way for those with distracted minds and those tormented by illness.

Venerable one: If a fool, a mute, or a deaf person establishes the robe for the kathina ground and establishes the kathina ground, is it called establishing?

Upāli: It is called establishing, and the Saṅgha act too is void.

Venerable one: If one dwelling elsewhere establishes the kathina ground, is it called establishing?

Upāli: It is called establishing, and the Saṅgha act too is void.

The topic of the kathina ground is complete.

In summary:

Where, by whom, the four boundaries, assigning, robe, and four restorations, four kathinas, separation, and the individual —

Venerable one: In the region of Kauśāmbī, when the Saṅgha separates, if one who dwells alone within the boundary performs the restoration ceremony, and the affairs of the Saṅgha and the purposes of the Saṅgha are conducted separately —

Venerable one: In the region of Kauśāmbī, which faction of the Saṅgha first caused the division? It was those who spoke contrary to the Dharma — they were the first to perform the restoration ceremony separately within the boundary, and to conduct the affairs of the Saṅgha and the purposes of the Saṅgha separately.

Venerable one: If one who broke the boundary at Kauśāmbī breaks it again, is it called breaking the boundary?

Upāli: No.

Venerable one: If one dwelling at Vaiśālī breaks it, is it called breaking the boundary?

Upāli: No.

Venerable one: When the community of nuns has separated and dwells in different quarters, should one recite and teach the fortnightly confession to them half by half, announcing: "Sisters, be more harmonious with one another"?

Venerable one: May the nuns who dwell in a separate quarter, the community of nuns having divided, seek the fortnightly recitation and teaching?

They should seek it. From whom should they seek it? From those who incline toward the Dharma.

Venerable one: May those monks who dwell in the two separate quarters, the community of monks having divided, give the recitation and teaching to the nuns? Give it, in order that the community of nuns not be split.

Venerable one: In the region of Kauśāmbī, when both factions assemble and are gathered together, where shall the individual monk recite to the nuns? Outside the boundary.

Venerable one: In the region of Kauśāmbī, when both factions have assembled and gathered together, and the individual monks have also gone outside the boundary, and a householder comes and offers a robe to the Saṅgha — who receives it? Both factions.

If one dwelling in Kauśāmbī performs the restoration ceremony together with those dwelling in Vaiśālī, is it called having performed the restoration ceremony?

Upāli: No.

If one dwelling in Vaiśālī performs the restoration ceremony together with those dwelling in Kauśāmbī, is it called having performed the restoration ceremony?

Upāli: No.

If individual monks perform the restoration ceremony together with those dwelling in Kauśāmbī, is it called having performed the restoration ceremony?

Upāli: No.

If individual monks perform the restoration ceremony together with those dwelling in Vaiśālī, is it called having performed the restoration ceremony?

Upāli: No.

If they do so, the individual's matter comes to nothing.

Venerable one: When the Saṅgha divides in a place where a sentence of suspension has been pronounced, by whom is the suspension to be imposed? By those who speak in accordance with the Dharma.

Venerable one: When the Saṅgha divides in a place where a sentence of suspension has been pronounced, by whom is it to be lifted? By those who speak in accordance with the Dharma.

Venerable one: Does every case of partial alignment entail separate standing?

There is partial alignment without separate standing; there is separate standing without partial alignment; there is both partial alignment and separate standing; and there is neither partial alignment nor separate standing.

Partial alignment without separate standing is this: a monk who has become partially aligned on five matters but has not been expelled by the Saṅgha because he has not been seen, or has not been expelled because the act has not been repeated, or has not been expelled because his view of wrongdoing has not been abandoned.

Separate standing without partial alignment is this: a monk who has been expelled by the Saṅgha because he has not been seen, or because the act has not been repeated, or because his view of wrongdoing has not been abandoned — but who has not become partially aligned on the five matters.

Both partial alignment and separate standing is this: a monk who has become partially aligned on the five matters and has also been expelled by the Saṅgha because he has not been seen, or because the act has not been repeated, or because his view of wrongdoing has not been abandoned.

Neither partial alignment nor separate standing is this: all cases other than those described above.

Is it the case that everything that is partial alignment is also non-standing? There is partial alignment that is not non-standing; there is non-standing that is not partial alignment; there is that which is both partial alignment and non-standing; and there is that which is neither partial alignment nor non-standing.

Partial alignment that is not non-standing is this: a monk who has become partially aligned on the five matters, but in whom none of the offenses of the four defeats has arisen.

Non-standing that is not partial alignment is this: a monk in whom one or another of the offenses of the four defeats has arisen, but who has not become partially aligned on the five matters.

That which is both partial alignment and non-standing is this: a monk who has become partially aligned on the five matters and in whom one or another of the offenses of the four defeats has arisen.

That which is neither partial alignment nor non-standing is this: all cases other than those described above.

Is it the case that everything that is separate standing is also non-standing? There is separate standing that is not non-standing; there is non-standing that is not separate standing; there is that which is both separate standing and non-standing; and there is that which is neither non-standing nor separate standing.

Separate standing that is not non-standing is this: a monk who has been expelled by the Saṅgha because he has not been seen, or because the act has not been repeated, or because his view of wrongdoing has not been abandoned, but in whom none of the offenses of the four defeats has arisen.

Non-standing that is not separate standing is this: a monk in whom one or another of the offenses of the four defeats has arisen, but who has not been expelled by the Saṅgha because he has not been seen, or because the act has not been repeated, or because his view of wrongdoing has not been abandoned.

That which is both non-standing and separate standing is this: a monk who has been expelled because he has not been seen, and in whom one or another of the offenses of the four defeats has arisen.

That which is neither non-standing nor separate standing is this: all cases other than those described above.

Venerable one, is it only a monk who can split the monastic Saṅgha of monks — not a nun, not a female trainee, not a female novice, not a male novice?

Upāli, it is indeed only a monk who splits the monastic Saṅgha of monks — not a nun, not a female trainee, not a female novice, not a male novice. Nevertheless, nuns do strive to bring about schism in the Saṅgha.

Venerable one, is it only a nun who can split the monastic Saṅgha of nuns — not a monk, not a female trainee, not a female novice, not a male novice?

Upāli, it is indeed only a nun who splits the monastic Saṅgha of nuns — not a monk, not a female trainee, not a female novice, not a male novice. Nevertheless, monks do strive to bring about schism in the Saṅgha.

Venerable one, what is schism, and what constitutes blameworthy conduct?

Schism is the Saṅgha itself. Blameworthy conduct belongs to the one who creates the division.

Venerable one, when the Saṅgha is split, what results? It is a grave matter. If the summons and the act are not heeded, then the remainder constitutes the Saṅgha.

Venerable one, how much is required for there to be said to be a split Saṅgha?

Upāli, when however many monks are within the boundary and are required to be present, when all of them have assembled and are face to face, when they have accepted adherence by means of a valid form of accepting adherence, and when those monks, perceiving what is within the boundary to be within the boundary, perform the restoration ceremony and formal acts separately — that is what is called a split Saṅgha.

What transgression should one who has split the Saṅgha confess? It is a grave offense.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has said: do not speak about a person of that kind.

"Do not speak of such a person." What sort of person is that? It is a person who holds the sūtras differently from how the sūtras should be held, who has great merit, many attendants and followers, and great renown. If one were to expel such a person, what would result? It would become a grave offense. Here ends the matter of Kauśāmbī.

The Vinaya, the Sacred Texts. The nineteenth fascicle.

In brief:

Language, and the boundary of space and earth,
The two factors, and the non-assembled,
Lapsing, the group, and one by one,
The non-assembled person, and the place accordingly.

Venerable one, if a noble one performs an act in the noble language, and those monks do not understand the noble language, should it be said that the act has been performed? Upāli, it is called an act performed, and the monk who performed it is included among those who have passed over.

Venerable one, if a noble one performs an act in the border language, and those monks do not understand the border language, should it be said that the act has been performed? Upāli, it is called an act performed, and the monk who performed it is included among those who have passed over.

Venerable one, if a border person performs an act in the border language, and those monks do not understand the border language, should it be said that the act has been performed? Upāli, it is called an act performed, and the monk who performed it is included among those who have passed over.

Venerable one, if a border person performs an act in the noble language, and those monks do not understand the noble language, should it be said that the act has been performed? Upāli, it is called an act performed, and the monk who performed it is included among those who have passed over.

Venerable one, if one standing on the ground is counted in the number of those standing in the sky, may an act be performed? Upāli, it may not. Venerable one, if one standing in the sky is counted in the number of those standing on the ground, may an act be performed? Upāli, it may not. Venerable one, may one who has performed an act while standing on the ground perform an act for those standing in the sky? Upāli, it may not. Venerable one, may one who performs an act while standing in the sky perform an act for those standing on the ground? Upāli, it may not. In the same way, these four cases apply equally to those dwelling within the boundary and those dwelling outside the boundary.

Venerable one, may those standing on the ground perform an act together with those standing on the ground? Upāli, they may. Moreover, in such a case, those standing on the ground complete the count and accept the consent from those standing on the ground.

Just as those standing on the ground may act together with those standing on the ground, so too: those standing on the ground with those standing on a wall; those standing on the ground with those standing in a tree; those standing on a wall with those standing on a wall; those standing on a wall with those standing on the ground; those standing on a wall with those standing in a tree; those standing in a tree with those standing in a tree; those standing in a tree with those standing on the ground; and those standing in a tree together with those standing on a wall — may an act be performed? Upāli, it may, for in whatever combination those standing in trees complete the count and accept the consent from those standing on the ground.

There are four kinds of acts: one performed contrary to the Dharma and without assembly; one performed contrary to the Dharma but with assembly; one performed in accordance with the Dharma but without assembly; and one performed in accordance with the Dharma and with assembly.

What is an act performed contrary to the Dharma and without assembly? It is when a motion has been made but the act has not been announced and the assembly has also not gathered. What is an act performed contrary to the Dharma but with assembly? It is when a motion has been made but the act has not been announced, yet the assembly has gathered. What is an act performed in accordance with the Dharma but without assembly? It is when a motion has been made and the act has been announced, but the assembly has not gathered. What is an act performed in accordance with the Dharma and with assembly? It is when a motion has been made, the act has been announced, and the assembly has gathered.

Furthermore, there are four kinds of acts: one performed contrary to the Dharma, in harmony, and without assembly; one performed contrary to the Dharma, in harmony, and with assembly; one performed in accordance with the Dharma, in harmony, and without assembly; and one performed in accordance with the Dharma, in harmony, and with assembly.

What is an act performed contrary to the Dharma, in harmony, and without assembly?

It is when the motion was announced first and the appeal comes afterward, and the assembly has not gathered.

What is an act performed contrary to the Dharma, in harmony, and with assembly? It is when the motion was announced first and the appeal comes afterward, and the assembly has also gathered.

What is an act performed in accordance with the Dharma, in harmony, and without assembly? It is when the motion itself has been proposed and a different act has been announced, but the assembly has not gathered.

What is an act performed in accordance with the Dharma, in harmony, and with assembly? It is when the motion itself has been proposed and a different act has been announced, and the assembly has also gathered.

Venerable One, we speak of an act performed without assembly and an act performed with assembly. What, Venerable One, is an act performed without assembly?

Upāli, when all the monks who are within the boundary have come to the boundary, have come to be present for the act, have all assembled in person, and those who are eligible to give consent have given their consent — if the monks then turn back and wander off, and the act is performed while they are turning back and wandering off in that way, that is called an act performed without assembly.

What is an act performed with assembly? When all the monks within the boundary have come to the boundary, have come to be present for the act, have all assembled in person, and those who are eligible to give consent have given their consent — if the monks do not turn back or wander off, and the act is performed while they remain without turning back and without wandering off, that is called an act performed with assembly.

Venerable One, is it possible that even when the entire Saṅgha has assembled and gathered and an act has been performed, that act could become an act performed without assembly?

Upāli, yes, it is possible — namely when, in the course of making the motion and performing the act, monks turn back and wander off, and the act is performed while they are turning back and wandering off in that way.

Venerable One, if an act is performed by one who has been interrupted and whose turn has passed, can it be said that the act has been performed?

Upāli, it can be said that the act has been performed, and the members of the Saṅgha are included in what has passed.

Venerable One, if one who has been interrupted and whose turn has passed gives consent and then an act is performed, can it be said that the act has been performed?

Upāli, it can be said that the act has been performed, and those monks are included in what has passed.

Venerable One, if consent is given by one in place of another and an act is performed, can it be said that the act has been performed?

Upāli, it can be said that the act has been performed, and the members of the Saṅgha are included in what has passed.

Venerable One, if an act is performed without the assembly having gathered, can it be said that the act has been performed?

Upāli, it cannot be said that the act has been performed, and the Saṅgha too is included in what has passed.

Venerable One, is it proper for one to perform acts for one, for two, for three, or for many?

Upāli, it is not proper.

Venerable One, is it proper for two to perform acts for one, for two, for three, or for many?

Upāli, it is not proper.

Venerable One, is it proper for three to perform acts for one, for two, for three, or for many?

Upāli, it is not proper.

Venerable One, is it proper for many to perform acts for many?

Upāli, it is not proper.

Venerable One, if those who perform the act are in one location, is it proper to perform all acts for four locations?

Upāli, it is proper — provided that the monk performing the act does so by marking the boundary of all four locations with a wall, a fence, or a latch.

Venerable One, if one who performs an act, in a single boundary, with a single motion and a single announcement, performs an act for four individuals, can it be said that the act has been performed?

Upāli, it cannot. And why? Because it is not proper for many to perform acts for many in a single boundary.

Venerable One, is it possible that a monk might perform an act for monks who share the same boundary and co-reside there, and yet no transgression occurs and the Saṅgha is not considered to have failed to assemble?

Upāli, yes, it is possible — by means of consent that has been duly given.

Venerable One, is it possible that a monk who is present in a single boundary performs an act for four individuals, and yet the act is considered performed, and those monks are not considered to have incurred a transgression?

Upāli, yes, it is possible — when the monk performing the act stands or sits astride the boundary, touching it and holding it, so that two persons are inside the boundary and two are outside the boundary when the act is performed.

In brief:

Those present, those who gave consent before,
Three kinds of acts, death,
The boundary of comfort where none can serve,
Transgressions — so too with these.

Venerable One, when the Blessed One says "Acts must be performed for those who are present," is it possible that the Saṅgha performs acts for those who are not present and yet the acts are considered performed?

Upāli, yes, it is possible — as when the assembly of nuns confers a vow of non-salutation or a vow of deprivation of requisites, and when the assembly of monks confers a vow of insanity upon a monk.

Venerable One, if the announcement is made first and the motion is made afterward, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is called performed, but those monks have incurred a transgression.

Venerable One, if one abandons oneself, is it called abandoned?

Upāli, it is called abandoned.

Venerable One, if one has abandoned oneself and then consents to oneself on one's own behalf, is it called consenting?

Upāli, it is called consented.

Venerable One, if a censure act has been performed and one performs a censure act again upon it, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is not.

Likewise, if upon one who has had a rebuke act performed one performs a rebuke act; or if one performs an expulsion act, a reconciliation act, an act of suspension for not seeing a transgression, an act of not restoring, an act of suspension for not abandoning a wrong view, an act of punishment, an act of probation, or an act of removal — is it called performed?

Upāli, it is not.

Venerable One, if upon one who has had a censure act performed one performs a rebuke act, an expulsion act, a reconciliation act, an act of suspension for not seeing a transgression, an act of not restoring, an act of suspension for not abandoning a wrong view, an act of punishment, an act of probation, or an act of removal — is it called performed?

Upāli, it is called performed. And so it is for all acts, to be understood in sequence like the turning of a wheel.

Venerable One, if upon one who deserves a censure act one performs a rebuke act, an expulsion act, or a reconciliation act, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is called performed, but it is an act of degradation.

Venerable One, if upon one who deserves a censure act one performs an act of suspension for not seeing a transgression, an act of not restoring, or an act of suspension for not abandoning a wrong view, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is not called performed. And why? Because an act of degradation is one thing, and an act of suspension is another.

Venerable One, if upon one who deserves a censure act one performs an act of punishment, an act of probation, or an act of removal, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is not called performed. And why? Because an act of degradation is one thing, and an act of purification is another.

Venerable One, if upon one who deserves an act of suspension for not seeing a transgression one performs an act of not restoring or an act of suspension for not abandoning a wrong view, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is called performed.

And why? Because all of those are acts of suspension.

Venerable One, if upon one who deserves an act of suspension for not seeing a transgression one performs an act of censure, an act of rebuke, an act of banishment, or an act of reconciliation, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is not called performed. And why? Because an act of suspension is one thing, and an act of degradation is another.

Venerable One, if upon one who deserves an act of suspension for not seeing a transgression one performs an act of punishment, an act of satisfaction, or an act of removal, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is not called performed. And why? Because an act of suspension is one thing, and an act of purification is another.

Venerable One, if upon one who deserves an act of punishment one performs an act of satisfaction or an act of removal, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is called performed. And why? Because all of these are acts of purification.

Venerable One, if upon one who deserves an act of punishment one performs an act of censure, an act of rebuke, an act of banishment, or an act of reconciliation, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is not called performed. And why? Because an act of purification is one thing, and an act of degradation is another.

Venerable One, if upon one who deserves an act of punishment one performs an act of suspension for not seeing a transgression, or an act of suspension for not restoring, or an act of suspension for not abandoning a wrong view, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is not called performed. And why? Because an act of purification is one thing, and an act of suspension is another.

Venerable One, if a motion is made by one party and the proclamation is made by another, is it called performed?

Upāli, it is not called performed — and those monks also have committed an offense.

Venerable One, the Blessed One has said that a person who is childish, foolish, unclear, unskillful, shameless, unstable in speech, fallen from his commitments, who has previously committed offenses, who has previously caused disruption, or who is deranged — that even when disturbed by such ten types of persons, no disruption counts. Venerable One, if they act contrary to the Dharma and those persons nonetheless obstruct and cause disruption again, does their repeated obstruction and disruption count?

Upāli, it does count. Because I said that with reference to a Dharma-conforming act, the obstruction and disruption by those persons does not count when one is performing a Dharma-conforming act.

Venerable One, when assigning an act to twelve persons, or when performing full ordination for one who is fit for full ordination, or when granting removal to one who is fit for removal, if they obstruct and cause disruption, saying "Do not perform this act against us" — does their obstruction and disruption count?

Upāli, it does count. I spoke with reference to acts of punishment.

Venerable One, if one who is performing an act does so when the time has passed, is it called performed?

Upāli, if the act has been performed many times over and the time has also passed, it is called performed.

Venerable One, should one associate and live together with one who has been suspended, or not?

Upāli, one should not associate or live together with one who has been suspended.

Venerable One, is one who has been suspended called a companion, or not a companion?

Upāli, all who have been suspended are to be called not companions.

Venerable One, when the Blessed One has said that one should grant consent to one upon whom a censure act has been performed — Venerable One, where should consent be granted?

Within the boundary.

How should consent be requested?

One who has been given a probationary penalty should, while lying down as if with hair bristling, make an effort to rise and present oneself prostrating to the Saṅgha, and should sit within the appointed session, request forgiveness, and acknowledge one's fault.

Venerable One, if one against whom the Saṅgha has announced the matter three times within the community does not send back a reply — do all of them incur a fault? And should the announcement be made three times within the community to all of those against whom a fault has occurred? All who, having been announced to three times within the community, do not send back a reply incur a fault.

Venerable One, can it happen that even though a fault has occurred, one would not have the announcement made three times within the community?

Upāli, it can. If the announcement is of a kind that would be fitting to announce, but a different fault from that one has arisen, then one is exempt from that other fault.

Venerable One, the Blessed One has said that for a monk possessed of certain qualities, acts of censure, acts of removal, and acts of purification should be performed. Venerable One, if a nun likewise comes to possess such qualities, should those acts also be performed upon her?

Upāli, they should.

Venerable One, if female trainees (śikṣamāṇās), female novices, and male novices come to possess those qualities, should those acts also be performed upon them?

Upāli, all the acts other than the act of purification should be performed.

In brief:

One who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one who is dull, one who is asleep, one who babbles, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, one who has departed, those who are pandakas, and so forth, and finally one who has been given a training — these are the last.

Venerable One, if an act is performed upon one who is mad, is it called a performed act?

Upāli, for one who is mad — apart from the act of granting a vow — for the remaining acts: if one still has the perception of being a monk and knows that this act is being performed upon oneself, it is called a performed act.

The same applies to one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull, one who is mute, and one who is deaf.

Venerable One, if an act is performed upon one who is asleep, is it called a performed act?

Upāli, if at the time when one is addressed in body or speech and the act is to be performed one falls asleep, it is called a performed act.

The same should be said concerning one who is intoxicated, one who babbles, and one who is in meditative absorption.

Venerable One, if an act is performed upon one who has gone and is dwelling elsewhere, is it called a performed act?

Upāli, apart from the presenting of the bowl, the remaining acts are called performed.

Venerable One, if the one upon whom an act is to be performed has died in the meantime, is it called a performed act?

Upāli, it is called a performed act.

Venerable One, if an act is performed upon a pandaka, is it called a performed act?

Upāli, it is not called a performed act.

The same should be said from the case of a nun who has been expelled through to the case of one who was previously in dispute.

Venerable One, if an act is performed upon a hermaphrodite (ubhatovyañjanaka), is it called a performed act?

Upāli, it is not called a performed act.

Venerable One, if an act is performed upon one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who has taken sides in a dispute, or one who has been given a training, is it called a performed act?

Upāli, it is called a performed act — and the Saṅgha includes both those who are present and those who are deceased.

In brief:

One who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed,
one who is ill, one who is deaf, one who is dull,
laypeople and the like,

one who has been given a training, and one who has died in the same way — Venerable One, if one who is mad has performed an act, is it called a performed act or not a performed act?

Upāli, if one has regained the perception of being a monk and has made the request and the act is not impaired, it is called a performed act.

The same applies to one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull, one who is mute, and one who is deaf.

Venerable One, if one who is dwelling elsewhere has performed an act, is it called a performed act?

Upāli, it is so.

The same should be said concerning a layman who has performed an act, a hermaphrodite, and a neuter person — and, from "not dwelling together" and "dwelling separately" up through "the previously disputed matter" — if those individuals perform an act, is it called a performed act?

Upāli: it is not.

Venerable One, if those who have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, those who have taken sides, and those who have been given a training — if those perform an act, is it called a performed act?

Upāli: it is called performed, and the Saṅgha includes the departed.

Venerable One, if while performing an act it is called a performed act, and then the name changes, is it called a performed act?

Upāli: it is called performed. And just as one says it of the one performing the act, so too should one say it of the one who completes the number.

Here ends the substance of acts — the substance of the red-yellow section.

In summary:

Suspension is made in seven kinds — the three abodes and the tīrthika case, proclamation, and offense, and mark, and not a gift.

Venerable One, could it be that the very same person who imposes the suspension is himself the one around whom it turns, and the very same person who performs the invitation ceremony is himself the one by whom the invitation ceremony is performed?

Upāli: Yes, it can be. For instance, a person performed the invitation ceremony, and from that there arose for him a further Saṅgha offense. He requested the invitation ceremony from the Saṅgha, and the Saṅgha granted him the invitation ceremony. While he was performing the invitation ceremony, two further Saṅgha offenses arose for him — one incurred on the first day, and one incurred on the second day. He then requested suspension from the Saṅgha on account of those offenses, and the Saṅgha granted him the suspension. He carried out the suspension for one day; the suspension for one of his offenses was completed. He is carrying out the second suspension; thirdly he performs the invitation ceremony; and fourthly the invitation ceremony has been performed.

Venerable One, if the invitation ceremony is granted to a person who is fit for suspension, is it called granted?

Upāli: it is called granted, and the Saṅgha includes the departed.

Venerable One, if one individual who is fit for suspension is expelled, is it called expulsion?

Upāli: it is called expulsion, and the Saṅgha includes the departed.

Venerable One, if suspension is granted to a person who is fit for the invitation ceremony, is it called granted?

Upāli: it is not, and the same applies to the Saṅgha — it includes the departed.

Venerable One, if one individual who is fit for the invitation ceremony is expelled, is it called expulsion?

Upāli: it is called expulsion, and the Saṅgha includes the departed.

Venerable One, if suspension is granted to a person who is fit for expulsion, is it called granted?

Upāli: it is not, and the same applies to the Saṅgha — it includes the departed.

Venerable One, if the invitation ceremony is granted to one individual who is fit for expulsion, is it called granted?

Upāli: it is not, and the same applies to the Saṅgha — it includes the departed.

Venerable One, if those performing the act are stationed at one boundary and are at the four positions, may they perform the acts of suspension, granting the invitation ceremony, and expulsion?

Upāli: It is permissible if the monk performing the act is pressed at the junctures of the four positions by a stick, a staff, or a key.

Venerable One, if at the junctures of the four positions for performing the act, pressed with a stick, a staff, or a key, they perform with a single motion and a single act the acts of suspension, invitation ceremony, and expulsion for four persons, is it called a performed act?

Upāli: it is not.

Why is that? Upāli: at a single boundary it is not proper for many to perform acts for many with one act.

Venerable One, if a monk who dwells within a single boundary performs the acts of suspension, invitation ceremony, and expulsion while the monks who are assembled there together are not present — without there being a failing on his part — could it be that there is also no non-concordance with the Saṅgha?

Upāli: There is such a case — it is one where consent has been duly submitted.

Venerable One, if a monk who performs an act stands to one side and performs the acts of suspension and invitation ceremony for four persons, is it both the case that the act is performed and that those monks do not incur a transgression?

Upāli: There is such a case. It is as follows: that monk who performs the act presses the boundary, seizes the boundary, and then — whether standing or sitting at the boundary — places two within the boundary and two outside the boundary, and so performs it.

Venerable One, the Blessed One has declared that two persons under suspension must not dwell in the same lodging. Is there a case where two persons under suspension dwelling in the same lodging do not thereby incur a transgression?

Upāli: There is such a case — it is when one dwells together with a non-Buddhist (tīrthika).

Venerable One, could one for whom no transgression whatsoever has arisen also be placed under suspension?

Upāli: There is such a case — it is a non-Buddhist.

Venerable One, could one who has not incurred a Saṅgha remainder offence be given a suspension without that constituting a transgression?

Upāli: There is such a case — it is a non-Buddhist.

Venerable One, if a monk has not announced the category and name of the offence, is it called a concealment?

Upāli: It is called a concealment.

Venerable One, if the category has been announced but the name has not been announced, is it called a concealment?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, from how many sources does a Saṅgha remainder arise?

Upāli: From thirteen.

Venerable One, is there a case where a monk incurs a Saṅgha remainder offence and, without having confessed it and without having restored it, is nonetheless purified of it?

Upāli: There is such a case. It is as follows: that monk has incurred a non-shared Saṅgha remainder offence, and then his status has changed and he has become a nun — for him the Saṅgha remainder offence has arisen, but the wrongdoing transgression must be confessed.

Venerable One, is there a case where a nun incurs a Saṅgha remainder offence and, without having confessed it and without having restored it, is nonetheless purified of it?

Upāli: There is such a case. It is as follows: that nun has incurred a non-shared Saṅgha remainder offence, and then her status has changed and she has become a monk — the Saṅgha remainder offence has arisen, but the wrongdoing transgression must be confessed.

Venerable One, is there a case where one who has incurred a Saṅgha remainder offence is again required to confess that same offence a second time?

Upāli: There is such a case. It is as follows: that monk has incurred a non-shared Saṅgha remainder offence, and then his status has changed and he has become a nun, and the Saṅgha remainder has arisen; and then once again his status changes and he becomes a monk — that offence must be confessed.

Venerable One, if a monk who is undergoing a suspension changes status and becomes a nun, is it called being released from suspension?

Upāli: It is not. The suspension must be applied to the nun.

Venerable One, if that monk who is undergoing the invitation ceremony changes status and becomes a nun, is it called being released from suspension?

Upāli: It is not. For as many days as have been observed, that number must be completed before both communities for a half-month.

Venerable One, if a nun who is undergoing a suspension changes status and becomes a monk, is it called being released from suspension?

Upāli: It is not. Let the suspension be applied to the monk.

Venerable One, if a nun who is undergoing the invitation ceremony changes status and becomes a monk, is it called being released from suspension?

Upāli: It is not. Six days shall be surrendered and a fresh start made.

Venerable One, is it proper to impose a suspension and an invitation ceremony on a monk who has been given training?

Upāli: It is not proper.

Venerable One, is it proper to impose a suspension and an invitation ceremony on one who has been given training?

Upāli: It is not proper.

In brief:

Offences, and likewise the nighttime,
Utterances, and also the fourth —

Body, seclusion, and likewise mantra,
The fourth two, and trained —

Venerable One, is it proper to impose a suspension and an invitation ceremony on a monk by one who is himself under offense?

Upāli: It is not proper.

Venerable One, is it proper to carry out a suspension or an invitation ceremony from a state of offense?

Upāli: It is not proper.

Likewise, the completion of the count should be stated in the same way.

Venerable One, when those who are imposing a suspension are dwelling in one place, is it proper to carry out a suspension or an invitation ceremony?

Upāli: It is not proper. Many should carry out the suspension or invitation ceremony for many.

Venerable One, if the Blessed One has said that one who is imposing a suspension should not remain in another dwelling-place, and that monk does remain in another dwelling-place, shall the days be counted?

Upāli: They shall not.

Venerable One, if a noble one (ārya) speaks an offense to a monk in the noble language, and that monk does not know the noble language, is it considered as having been spoken?

Upāli: It is not.

Is it considered as having been received?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if a noble one speaks an offense to a monk in a border dialect, and that monk does not know the border dialect, is it considered as having been spoken?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if a border person speaks an offense to a monk in a border dialect, and that monk does not know the border dialect, is it considered as having been spoken?

Upāli: It is not.

Is it considered as having been received?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if a border person speaks an offense to a monk in the noble language, and that monk does not know the noble language, is it considered as having been spoken?

Upāli: It is not.

Is it considered as having been received?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if an offense is indicated and shown by means of body alone, is it considered as having been spoken?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if one speaks while perceiving a secluded place as non-secluded, is it considered as having been spoken?

Upāli: It is not.

Is it considered as having been received?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if a monk has made himself invisible by medicine or by mantra and then speaks an offense, is it considered as having been spoken?

Upāli: It is not.

Is it considered as having been received?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if those dwelling on the ground impose a suspension, an invitation ceremony, or even a lifting act on those dwelling in the sky, is it considered as having performed the act?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if those dwelling in the sky impose a suspension, an invitation ceremony, or even a lifting act on those dwelling on the ground, is it considered as having performed the act?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if those dwelling on the ground complete the count of those dwelling in the sky and then impose a suspension, an invitation ceremony, or even a lifting act, is it considered as having performed the act?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if those dwelling in the sky complete the count of those dwelling on the ground and then impose a suspension, an invitation ceremony, or even a lifting act, is it considered as having performed the act?

Upāli: It is not.

Likewise, for those dwelling within the boundary and those dwelling outside the boundary together, this should be set out in four ways.

The Sacred Text of the Vinaya, the Twentieth Fascicle.

Upāli addressed the Buddha, the Blessed One: Venerable One, of these thirteen remaining rules of the Saṅgha — from the one-day suspension arising from an emission of semen up to and including the thirteen-day suspension arising from words that cause mental distress — is it proper that those thirteen offenses, having been received at different and dissimilar times, be dealt with by a single motion and a single act?

Upāli: It is proper.

Venerable One, is it proper to grant the satisfaction of the suspension from the beginning of the penalty period?

Upāli: It is proper.

Is it proper to grant release from the satisfaction period?

Upāli: It is proper.

Venerable One, is it proper that, by a single motion and a single act, the Saṅgha's many remaining offenses arising from different and dissimilar sources be dealt with simultaneously — imposing a suspension on one person, granting satisfaction to another, and granting release to yet another?

Upāli: It is not proper.

Venerable One, is it proper that, by a single motion and a single act, the Saṅgha impose upon a single person, simultaneously, both the suspension and the satisfaction and the release for many remaining offenses arising from different and dissimilar sources?

Upāli: It is not proper.

In brief:

One who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness,
One who is dull-witted, mute, sleeping, delirious,
One who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, one in transit,
Householders and the like,
And lastly, one who has relinquished the training.

Venerable One, if a mad person confesses an offense, is that considered a spoken confession?

Upāli: It is not.

Will it count as having been registered?

Upāli: It will not.

The same applies to one whose mind is disturbed and to one tormented by illness.

Venerable One, if an offense is spoken in the presence of a mad person, is that considered spoken?

Upāli: It is not.

Is it considered registered?

Upāli: It is not.

The same applies likewise to one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is sleeping, one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, and one who has entered meditative absorption: if an offense is confessed to any of them, it is not considered spoken, and it will not be registered.

Venerable One, if a monk confesses an offense to someone who is staying in a different locality, is that considered spoken?

Upāli: It is to be considered spoken.

Will it be registered?

Upāli: It will be registered.

Likewise, from the case of a paṇḍaka down to that of a nun who has been expelled, and up through the case of one who was formerly in dispute — if an offense is confessed to any of these, it is considered spoken.

Will it be registered?

Upāli: It will not be registered.

Venerable One, if a monk confesses an offense to a novice, is that considered spoken?

Upāli: It is to be considered spoken.

Will it be registered?

Upāli: It will not be registered.

The same applies likewise to one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who is not residing, one who is residing separately, one who has taken sides, and one who has been given the training: if an offense is confessed to any of these, it is considered spoken, but it will not be registered.

Venerable One, if a monk confesses an offense while changing his name, is that considered spoken?

Upāli: It is to be considered spoken.

Will it be registered?

Upāli: It will not.

Venerable One, is there a remaining offense of a monk for which it would never be proper to grant release as long as he lives?

Upāli: There is. It is as follows: if a monk has committed any one of the four root defeats, and thereafter a remaining offense of the Saṅgha arises subsequent to that, release is not to be granted for it as long as he lives.

In brief:

One who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill,

One who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is sleeping, one who is delirious,

One who is intoxicated, one who has entered meditative absorption, one in transit,

Paṇḍakas and the like,

And lastly, one who has relinquished the training.

Venerable One, if the acts of suspension, satisfaction, and release are performed in the presence of a mad person, are they considered performed?

Upāli: They are considered performed if that person still perceives himself as a monk, and if he is aware, through body or speech, of being the object of the act and understands that this act is being done to him. The same is to be stated for one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, and one who is deaf.

Venerable One, if the acts of suspension, satisfaction, and release are performed in the presence of one who is sleeping or one who is delirious, are they considered performed?

Upāli: They are considered performed if, at the time the motion is made — having been perceived through body or speech — he then falls asleep. The same applies likewise to one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, and

The same is also to be stated for those in meditative absorption.

Venerable One, if the acts of suspension, satisfaction, and release are performed in the presence of a monk who is residing in another district, are they considered performed?

Upāli: They are not.

Likewise, the same is to be stated from the case of a paṇḍaka through to one whose mind was previously disturbed.

Venerable One, if a monk performs an act of suspension, satisfaction, or release in the presence of a eunuch, are they considered performed?

Upāli: They are not considered performed.

Venerable One, if the acts of suspension, satisfaction, or release are performed in the presence of a monk who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, or one who has sided with such a monk, or one who has been given training precepts, are they considered performed?

Upāli: They are not considered performed, and the Saṅgha too has transgressed.

The section on persons and the section on the subjects of suspension are complete.

In summary:

Through messenger, letter, gesture, through another's words, and one from another — one who is mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one who is ill, one who is mute, and one who is dull-witted, and a paṇḍaka and so forth, and last of all, one given training precepts.

Venerable One, if a monk obstructs the restoration ceremony by messenger, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Likewise, if the restoration ceremony is obstructed by letter, by gesture, by another's words, or by being passed from one to another, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

One whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is deaf, a paṇḍaka, a nun who has been expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who dwells as a thief, one who is not residing, one residing separately, one who has sided with a schismatic, one who has previously committed an offense, and one whose mind was previously disturbed — for all of these it is likewise the same.

Venerable One, if one who has been given training precepts obstructs the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if a eunuch obstructs the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

In summary:

One who has become mad, one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is deaf, one who is dull-witted, one who is sleeping, one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, one in meditative absorption, one residing in another district, a paṇḍaka and so forth, and last of all, one given training precepts.

Venerable One, if a mad monk obstructs the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Likewise, the same is to be stated for one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, one who is deaf, one who is sleeping, one who is delirious, one who is intoxicated, and one in meditative absorption.

Venerable One, if a monk who is residing in another district obstructs the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is considered obstructed.

Venerable One, likewise, from the case of a paṇḍaka through to those who have been given training precepts — if they obstruct the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is considered obstructed.

Venerable One, if a eunuch obstructs the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is considered obstructed.

In summary:

Voice and body, a secluded place and mantra, eye and ear likewise — boundary, ground, and those dwelling there — these constitute the restoration ceremony; that is the last.

Venerable One, if a noble one obstructs the restoration ceremony by speaking in the noble language, and that monk does not understand the noble language, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Likewise, it is to be elaborated in four ways.

Venerable One, if a monk obstructs the restoration ceremony by means of a bodily gesture, and the other monk does not perceive it, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if one perceives a secluded place as not secluded and obstructs the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if a monk renders himself invisible by means of a spell or medicine and thereby obstructs the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if one sees by means of divine sight and obstructs the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not considered obstructed, and the Saṅgha has also transgressed.

Venerable One, if one hears by means of divine hearing and obstructs the restoration ceremony, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is, and the Saṅgha has also transgressed.

Venerable One, if one who is within a boundary obstructs the restoration ceremony for those who are beyond the boundary, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if one who is beyond a boundary obstructs the restoration ceremony for those within the boundary, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if one standing on the ground obstructs the restoration ceremony of those standing in the sky, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, if one standing in the sky obstructs the restoration ceremony of those standing on the ground, is it considered obstructed?

Upāli: It is not.

Venerable One, is it possible for a single monk, situated in one direction, to obstruct the restoration ceremony of four persons in four locations?

Upāli: It is. If that monk presses a stick, a clod of mud, or a key against the boundary at the boundary points of the four locations and thereby obstructs the restoration ceremony, it is considered obstructed.

Venerable One, is it possible for a monk to obstruct the restoration ceremony of a monk and yet it not constitute obstruction?

Upāli: It is. This is the recitation of an auspicious restoration ceremony.

In brief:

Recall the raising of the subject, and likewise the opening of the occasion and the speaking;
the citing of scripture and the objection, the restoration ceremonies and the division of occasions.

Venerable One, the Blessed One has said, "One should speak having opened the occasion; one should recall." Venerable One, if one speaks and recalls having opened the occasion, can a transgression result?

Upāli: It can. This occurs when one speaks and recalls after having let the opened occasion pass.

Venerable One, where should one speak in accordance with the Dharma? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where should one recall in accordance with the Dharma? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where should one open an occasion in accordance with the Dharma? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where should one speak out in accordance with the Dharma? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where in accordance with the Dharma should one object to the citing of scripture? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where in accordance with the Dharma should one object to the opening of an occasion? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where should one request the opening of an occasion? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where should one open an occasion? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where should one perform the procedure in accordance with the Dharma? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where should one debate in accordance with the Dharma? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, where should one make a lawful agreement? Within the Saṅgha.

Venerable One, how many ways are there of obstructing the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma, and how many ways not in accordance with the Dharma?

Obstructing the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma: one. In accordance with the Dharma: one.

Not in accordance with the Dharma: two. In accordance with the Dharma: two. Not in accordance with the Dharma: three. In accordance with the Dharma: three.

Not in accordance with the Dharma: four. In accordance with the Dharma: four.

Not in accordance with the Dharma: five. In accordance with the Dharma: five.
Not in accordance with the Dharma: six. In accordance with the Dharma: six.
Not in accordance with the Dharma: seven. In accordance with the Dharma: seven.

Not in accordance with the Dharma: eight. In accordance with the Dharma: eight.

Not in accordance with the Dharma: nine. In accordance with the Dharma: nine.

Not in accordance with the Dharma: ten. In accordance with the Dharma: ten.

What is the one way that is not in accordance with the Dharma of blocking the restoration ceremony? Blocking the restoration ceremony on the grounds that there is no basis in something that was done is blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Blocking the restoration ceremony on the grounds that there is a basis in something that was done is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma. These, then, are one way of blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma and one way in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the two ways not in accordance with the Dharma and the two ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? In whatever manner a monk blocks the restoration ceremony against a monk — blocking it without a basis in something done and without a basis in something not done — that is blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Blocking it with a basis in something done and with a basis in something not done is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the three ways not in accordance with the Dharma and the three ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? In whatever manner a monk blocks the restoration ceremony against a monk — blocking it without a basis in something done, without a basis in something not done, and without a basis in something both done and not done — that is blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Blocking it with a basis in something done, with a basis in something not done, and with a basis in something both done and not done is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the four ways not in accordance with the Dharma and the four ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? Blocking the restoration ceremony without a basis in any of the four — degeneration in moral discipline, degeneration in view, degeneration in conduct, and degeneration in livelihood — is blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Blocking the restoration ceremony with a basis in the four — degeneration in moral discipline, degeneration in view, degeneration in conduct, and degeneration in livelihood — is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the five ways not in accordance with the Dharma and the five ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? Blocking the restoration ceremony without a basis in any of the five — a defeat, a Saṅgha remainder offense, a transgression, a confessable offense, and a wrong act — is blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Blocking the restoration ceremony with a basis in any of the five — a defeat, a Saṅgha remainder offense, a transgression, a confessable offense, and a wrong act — is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the six ways not in accordance with the Dharma and the six ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? Blocking the restoration ceremony without a basis in something done where there is a remainder, without a basis in something not done where there is a remainder, without a basis in something both done and not done where there is a remainder, without a basis in something done where there is no remainder, without a basis in something not done where there is no remainder, and without a basis in something both done and not done where there is no remainder — that is blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. What are the six ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? Blocking it with a basis in something done where there is a remainder, with a basis in something not done where there is a remainder, with a basis in something both done and not done where there is a remainder, with a basis in something done where there is no remainder, with a basis in something not done where there is no remainder, and with a basis in something both done and not done where there is no remainder — that is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the seven ways not in accordance with the Dharma and the seven ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma?

Blocking the restoration ceremony without a basis in any of the seven — a defeat, a Saṅgha remainder offense, a transgression, a confessable offense, a wrong act, degeneration in view, and degeneration in livelihood — is blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma.

Blocking the restoration ceremony with a basis in degeneration in livelihood is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the eight ways not in accordance with the Dharma and the eight ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? Blocking the restoration ceremony without a basis in degeneration in moral discipline, degeneration in conduct, degeneration in view, or having brought about degeneration in livelihood — and without a basis in degeneration in moral discipline, degeneration in view, degeneration in conduct, or not having brought about degeneration in livelihood — is blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Blocking the restoration ceremony with a basis in degeneration in moral discipline, degeneration in conduct, degeneration in view, or having brought about degeneration in livelihood — and with a basis in degeneration in moral discipline, degeneration in view, degeneration in conduct, or not having brought about degeneration in livelihood — is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the nine ways not in accordance with the Dharma and the nine ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? Blocking the restoration ceremony without a basis in: something done where there is a remainder; something not done where there is a remainder; something both done and not done where there is a remainder; something done where there is no remainder; something not done where there is no remainder; something both done and not done where there is no remainder; something done where there is both a remainder and no remainder; something not done where there is both a remainder and no remainder; or something both done and not done where there is both a remainder and no remainder — is blocking the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Blocking the restoration ceremony with a basis in: something done where there is a remainder; something not done where there is a remainder; something both done and not done where there is a remainder; something done where there is no remainder; something not done where there is no remainder; something both done and not done where there is no remainder; something done where there is both a remainder and no remainder; something not done where there is both a remainder and no remainder; or something both done and not done where there is both a remainder and no remainder — is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the ten ways not in accordance with the Dharma and the ten ways of blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? They are: he has committed a defeat; he has entered into discussion of a defeat; he has degenerated in moral discipline; he has degenerated in view; he has degenerated in conduct; he has degenerated in livelihood; he has relinquished the training; he has entered into discussion of relinquishing the training; he has incurred a liability to the Saṅgha; or he has entered into discussion of a liability to the Saṅgha.

As to how he has committed a defeat: whatever the aspect, whatever the manner, and whatever the characteristic mark by which a monk has incurred an offense involving defeat — when a monk is seen to have incurred an offense involving defeat by that same aspect, that same manner, and that same characteristic mark, then blocking the restoration ceremony on the basis of having so seen him is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma. That is how he has committed a defeat.

As to how he has entered into discussion of a defeat: in whatever way — whether inside a monastic hall or outside it — when many monks are assembled and gathered together, he has entered into discussion of matters arising from that and in conformity with it, of that very nature; whether one has heard this from a believer or whether one has oneself formed a suspicion — blocking the restoration ceremony on the basis of having heard it or having formed that suspicion is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

As to how he has degenerated in moral discipline: he has thoroughly transgressed any one of the four defeats.

As to how he has degenerated in view: he has come to hold and thoroughly adopted any one of the sixty-two views.

As to how he has degenerated in conduct: he engages in what ought not to be done and does not train in the trainings of a monk.

As to how he has degenerated in livelihood: his livelihood is thoroughly impure.

As to how he has returned the training: one sees a monk returning the training in such a form, in such a manner, and with such marks, and in that very form, that very manner, and those very marks one recognizes him as a monk — and having seen him thus, blocking the restoration ceremony on that basis is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

As to how he has entered into discussion of matters relating to the return of the training: in whatever way — whether in the temple or outside the temple — monks have assembled and gathered, and he has entered into discussion of matters arising from that and in conformity with it, of that very nature; whether one has heard this from a believer or whether one has oneself formed a suspicion — blocking the restoration ceremony on the basis of having heard it or having formed that suspicion is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

As to how he has imputed a grievance against the Saṅgha: one sees a monk reviling the Saṅgha in such a form, in such a manner, and with such marks — and having seen him thus reviling the Saṅgha in just such a form, just such a manner, and just such marks, blocking the restoration ceremony on that basis is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

As to how he has entered into discussion of matters relating to a grievance imputed against the Saṅgha: in whatever way — whether in the temple or outside the temple — monks have assembled and gathered, and he has entered into discussion of matters arising from that and in conformity with it, of that very nature; whether one has heard this from a believer or whether one has oneself formed a suspicion — blocking the restoration ceremony on the basis of having heard it or having formed such a suspicion is blocking the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

The reversal of these ten things that accord with the Dharma is to be applied as not in accordance with the Dharma. The subject of blocking the restoration ceremony is complete.

In brief, as a verse:

One who has not completed a novice's years,
one of bad color, and likewise one who dwells there, one who has not been appointed, and one who makes obeisance, one seen in person, and one without food —

"Venerable Upāli, if novice monks enter the rains retreat in a brief manner, may they distribute sleeping places?" — "No." — "May they receive sleeping places?" — "Upāli, they may receive them."

"Venerable one, if those who have not completed their years enter the rains retreat in a brief manner, may they distribute sleeping places?" — "No." — "May they receive sleeping places?" — "Upāli, they may receive them."

"Venerable one, if one, two, three, or four monks enter the rains retreat, may they distribute sleeping places?" — "No." — "May they receive sleeping places?" — "Upāli, they may receive them."

"Upāli, if five or more monks are residing somewhere, they should make a request and appoint someone to distribute sleeping places; and let the one appointed distribute them."

"Venerable one, is there a case where using that very sleeping place would constitute an offense, and a case where using that very sleeping place would not?" — "Upāli, there is. If one uses a sleeping place that has not been rendered of bad color for a particular person, or if one uses an end-piece that is too long, that constitutes an offense. Using one belonging to the Saṅgha does not constitute an offense."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk should not take a Saṅgha sleeping place to another location and use it there. If a monk seeks out a Saṅgha sleeping place and uses it at another location, what does that entail?" — "It is a transgression." — "Unless it happens that any one of the eight obstacles has arisen, and one is unable to protect the sleeping place in that very location, and one who has taken a vow not to remain in that location — in such cases there is no offense."

"Venerable one, may one who has not been appointed distribute sleeping places?" — "No."

"Venerable one, is there a case where a monk using that very Saṅgha sleeping place would constitute an offense, and where using that very sleeping place would constitute no offense?" — "Upāli, there is such a case: if one wears it with the fur turned outward, that is an offense; if one lies down on it, there is no offense. If one wears it without a sweat-cloth, that is an offense; if one wears it with a sweat-cloth, there is no offense."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that one must not draw near to and remain in all places. Does it follow that one who has not drawn near should bow to an elder who has drawn near?" — "No, Upāli. All those who have drawn near must bow to those who have not drawn near. They are placed last among the monks."

"Venerable one, are those monks also given sleeping places last?" — "Upāli, those who have drawn near are given neither gains nor sleeping places."

"Venerable one, may a sleeping place be given to one who is not present? Give it to some and not to others? To whom should it be given?" — "Give it to one who has gone and will return. To whom should it not be given? Do not give it to one who has gone and will not return."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk must not use Saṅgha property without a sweat-cloth. Is there a case where a monk uses Saṅgha property without a sweat-cloth and yet commits no offense?" — "Upāli, there is. This is when a householder has presented to the Saṅgha a servant or a share to be used without a sweat-cloth."

In brief:

Ānanda, and individuals, and those who have drawn near, and those who are fitting,
and lastly, those residing during the rains, and the writing of one-third — likewise;
householders and others, and those who have given back their training — these are last.

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said, 'Ānanda, you must distribute the surplus sleeping places.' What constitutes a surplus?" — "Whatever exceeds the allocation of one and of two."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that a monk must not use a Saṅgha sleeping place without a sweat-cloth. If a monk uses an individual's sleeping place, what does that entail?" — "It is a transgression."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said: 'Monks who have just arrived and those who are resident should bow according to seniority.' Does it follow that one bows even to an elder monk who is inflicting a penalty?" — "No, Upāli." — "Why is that?" — "Upāli, one must not bow to all those for whom it is improper to bow — except in a case where there is bad feeling."

"Upāli, who are the individuals within the Saṅgha for whom it is improper to bow? One against whom a censure act has been carried out; one against whom a degradation act has been carried out; one against whom a banishment act has been carried out; one against whom a reconciliation act has been carried out; one against whom an act of suspension for not seeing a fault has been carried out; one against whom an act of suspension for not redressing a transgression has been carried out; one against whom an act of suspension for not relinquishing a wrong view has been carried out; one who inflicts a penalty; one who inflicts a penalty by rising from the seat; one who is accompanied by those inflicting a penalty; one who engages in conduct requiring appeasement; one who engages in conduct requiring appeasement by rising from the seat; a layman; a eunuch; one who has expelled a nun; one who has killed his father; one who has killed his mother; one who has killed an arhat; one who, with malicious intent, has drawn blood from a Tathāgata; a tīrthika; one who has gone over to the tīrthikas; a corrupter; one who is not a resident; one who lives apart; one who has previously committed an offense; one who was previously in dispute; one who has drawn near; one who has given back the training; a fully ordained nun; a probationer nun; a novice nun; a novice monk; and one who is very young — do not bow to these. One must not bow to a person who is defecating; one who is defecating must not bow. One must not bow to a person who is urinating; one who is urinating must not bow. One must not bow to a person chewing a tooth-wood; one who is chewing a tooth-wood must not bow. One must not bow to a person who is eating;

one who is eating must not bow. One must not bow to a person who is drinking; one who is drinking must not bow. One must not bow to a person who is hungry; one who is hungry must not bow. One must not bow to a person wearing only a single garment; one wearing only a single garment must not bow. One must not bow to a person sitting in the dark; one sitting in the dark must not bow. One must not bow to a person sitting in discomfort; one sitting in discomfort must not bow. One must not bow to a person engaged in reciting scripture, in reflection, or in listening to Dharma; one engaged in reciting scripture, in reflection, or in listening to Dharma must not bow. One must not bow to a person who is distracted. One must not bow to a person who has entered a household. These are the individuals to whom it is not fitting to bow.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk who sits or lies down on a seat or bench belonging to the Saṅgha does not incur an offense? Upāli, there is:

when it is improper to do otherwise, when one sits or lies down there — that which monks may not properly use.

Venerable one, when the Blessed One said that a monk who carries out a penalty shall be placed last among the monks, is that so? Upāli, it is not so — he is placed there gradually.

Venerable one, when the Blessed One said, "Give the sleeping mat first to those who have not yet entered the rains retreat and to those who are dwelling according to their natural seniority, and thereafter to those who have renounced," if more mats then remain, are they given together with those who are dwelling by natural seniority? Upāli, they are not given; they are given separately.

Venerable one, is there a case in which a monk who takes a sleeping mat from one of the four residences does not incur an offense? Upāli, there is: when a monk has marked the boundaries of the four residences with a stake, mud, or a peg, and has properly entered the rains retreat.

Venerable one, when the Blessed One said, "Give novices a third of the gains," does that also apply to sleeping mats? Upāli, it does not — they are to be given an equal share.

Venerable one, when the Blessed One said, "Let the newly ordained monks not take sleeping mats before the senior monks," is there a case in which a young monk who takes a sleeping mat before a senior monk does not incur an offense? Upāli, there is: one who has received the Saṅgha's permission for a residence, one who has received permission as an attendant, and one who has fled and come from a place of danger.

Venerable one, may a layman be appointed to arrange the sleeping mats? Upāli, he may not. Likewise, from a probationer nun up through one who has been given the training — may any of them be appointed to arrange the sleeping mats in an extensive manner? Upāli, they may not. Venerable one, may a madman be appointed to arrange the sleeping mats? Upāli, he may not. Likewise, this applies also to one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, and one who is deaf.

Venerable one, may those dwelling in another destination be appointed to arrange the sleeping mats? Upāli, they may not. Venerable one, may a hermaphrodite be given a sleeping mat? Upāli, he may not. Likewise, from a suspended nun through one previously in dispute — may sleeping mats be given to these? Upāli, they may not.

Venerable one, may sleeping mats be given to one who has divided the Saṅgha and to one who has been given the training? Upāli, they may be given. Venerable one, may a sleeping mat be given to a madman? Upāli, if he does not use it as it ought to be used, do not give it. Likewise, this should be said also of one whose mind is disturbed, one afflicted by illness, one who is dull-witted, one who is mute, and one who is deaf.

Venerable one, if the night passes while a monk has been appointed to arrange sleeping mats, is he still called "appointed"? Upāli, he is still called "appointed." Does he then distribute the sleeping mats? Upāli, he does not.

This concludes the section on sleeping mats.

The Vinaya Pitaka. The twenty-first fascicle. In brief.

Done thrice, the gravitas, and likewise the mark of full quiescence — the direct perceptions of the restoration ceremonies, and the occurrences as well are just the same.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, possessing how many qualities of gravitas is a holder of the Vinaya able to quell disputes?"

Upāli, eleven. And what are the eleven? He knows a dispute. He knows from what a dispute has arisen. He knows how to summarize a dispute. He knows how to quell a dispute. He knows how to quell a dispute so thoroughly that it does not arise again afterward. He knows what has arisen. He knows what has been established. He knows what has been subsequently established. He knows what has been blocked. He knows what has been expressly permitted. He knows what actions have been done and what have not been done. Upāli, a person of gravitas endowed with these eleven qualities is one who, as a holder of the Vinaya, is able to quell disputes.

Furthermore, another eleven qualities. And what are the eleven? He knows an offense. He knows a non-offense. He knows a grave offense. He knows a light offense. He knows how an offense has arisen. He knows from what an offense has arisen. He does not go astray out of desire. He does not go astray out of aversion, fear, or delusion. He knows what punitive actions are to be done and what are not to be done. Upāli, these eleven are an elaboration up to the point of quelling.

Furthermore, another eleven qualities up to that point. And what are the eleven? He is learned in the sūtras. He is learned in the Vinaya. He is learned in the analysis. He is versed in scripture. He is one who opens up the sūtras. He does not hold to mistakes. He does not hold to secret words. He holds without fail to what is certain. He does not hold to many words. He holds to what has been agreed upon. He refutes up to three times. Upāli, a person of gravitas endowed with these eleven qualities is one who, as a holder of the Vinaya, is able to quell disputes.

"Venerable one, does one endowed with these qualities thoroughly quell a dispute?"

Upāli, twenty-one. And what are the twenty-one? He gives instructions to the Saṅgha. He accords with the Dharma and is in harmony with the Teacher's teaching. He makes the monks of both sides understand. He proceeds in accordance with the Dharma toward monks who argue and monks who counter-argue, and he ensures that monks who argue and counter-argue do not violate the Vinaya. He does not cover up the offense of an impure person. He does not distort what has arisen. He does not distort what has been established. He does not distort what has been subsequently established. He does not distort what has been blocked. He does not distort what has been expressly permitted. He does not distort an offense. He holds very firmly to the commitment of the arguing monk. He holds very firmly to the commitment of the replying monk. He also teaches the words of the sūtras. He accords with the Vinaya. He follows the eye of the Dharma. Having been appointed, he quells the matter. He points out the offense. He applies the punitive action that is called for. He shows the way to purification. He quells the dispute by means of the Dharma, the Vinaya, and the Teacher's teaching. Upāli, one who is endowed with these twenty-one qualities is said to quell disputes.

"Venerable one, if a monk who is arguing or counter-arguing has changed his affiliation, is the dispute said to be quelled?"

Upāli, it is said to be quelled.

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that when a dispute arises, immediately upon its arising one should quell it by means of the seven Dharmas for quelling disputes. Venerable one, if any one of the four kinds of dispute arises — when a dispute has arisen — is it possible that without quelling it by means of whichever of the seven Dharmas for quelling disputes is the appropriate one for quelling it, it is nonetheless quelled?"

Upāli, there is such a case: it is the consensual restoration ceremony (poṣadha).

"Venerable one, if any one of the four kinds of dispute — when a dispute arises, whose words among the monks who bring the charge and the monks who respond to the charge should be taken? One takes according to seniority of ordination.

"Venerable one, if their years of ordination are equal, whose words should be taken?" Whichever of them is more learned.

"Venerable one, if both are equally grounded in the texts, whose words should be taken?" Whichever of them is of purer conduct.

"If both are of pure conduct, whose words should be taken?" Whichever of them is more substantially pure of conduct — and by that person's words the disputes should be quelled.

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that when a dispute is to be quelled by means of many voting sticks, if one side gains even a single voting stick more, the dispute should be quelled in favor of that side. Venerable one, if the voting sticks of both sides turn out to be equal, by whose authority is the dispute quelled?" Upāli, whichever side has the greater majority of monks of purer conduct.

"Venerable one, if monks are unable to quell a dispute among monks, may nuns quell it?" Upāli, they may. And likewise the five groups should each be applied to the others in turn.

In brief:

By messenger, letter, gesture,
by hearsay and by transmission from one to another,
by the mad, the disturbed, the sick, by the dull-witted, laypeople, and the like —
the giving of the training is the last.

"Venerable one, if a dispute has been quelled by means of a messenger, is it said to be quelled?" Upāli, it is called quelled, and the Saṅgha's act has been performed. Likewise if it has been quelled by means of a letter, or a gesture, or hearsay, or transmission from one to another — is it called quelled? Upāli, it is called quelled, and the Saṅgha's act has been performed.

"Venerable one, if a madman has quelled a dispute, is the dispute said to be quelled?" Upāli, it is called quelled, and the Saṅgha's act has been performed. Likewise, if it has been quelled by one who is mentally disturbed, by one afflicted by illness, by one who is dull, by one who is mute, or by one who is deaf — is it called quelled? Upāli, it is called quelled, and the Saṅgha's act has been performed.

"Venerable one, if a layman has quelled a dispute, is it called quelled?" Upāli, it is called quelled, and the Saṅgha's act has been performed.

"Venerable one, likewise from the intermediate beings down to those upon whom the training has been bestowed — if these have quelled a dispute in full, is it called quelled?" Upāli, it is called quelled, and the Saṅgha's act has been performed.

"Venerable one, if the one who brought the charge or the one who responded to the charge acted at an improper time, is the dispute said to be quelled?" Upāli, it is called quelled. Likewise, from the case of one accepted as a layman down to the case of one duly accepted as a recipient of the training — if one who has been fully accepted in this way has quelled a dispute, is it called quelled? Upāli, it is called quelled.

"Venerable one, if a monk who brought the charge or responded to the charge has changed his name, is the dispute said to be quelled?" Upāli, it is called quelled.

The section on the substance of disputes is complete.

In brief:

Schism, uproar in the Saṅgha, separation, proper procedure, kalpas, wrongdoing and perversion, schism of the Saṅgha, and the unskilled.

"Venerable one, one speaks also of the Saṅgha being split, and one speaks also of the Saṅgha being assembled. Venerable one, what is the splitting of the Saṅgha?" Upāli, when one who creates a schism perceives what is not Dharma as not Dharma, and perceives what is not Vinaya as not Vinaya — yet that person suppresses this perception, suppresses assent, suppresses confidence — and with intelligence and views and thoughts suppressed — and then declares, "This is the Dharma, this is the Vinaya, this is what the Teacher taught" — and having said this, he instructs the monks, properly instructs them, trains them, and leads them to accept it, and he carries out and follows the five bases of the rules of conduct; and those among you, venerable ones, who have faith and acceptance and conviction in him — let them take the wooden rule; let them proclaim the five bases of the rules of conduct and make the formal motion; and having properly enacted the wooden rule, he leads away a great many — this is called a splitting of the Saṅgha.

What is the assembling of the Saṅgha? However many monks are dwelling within the boundary, when they are performing an act, all of them have come together, have come into each other's presence, and those from whom acceptance is to be received have given their acceptance; and the monks are without quarrel, without dispute; they perceive things as Dharma, they perceive them as Vinaya, and they perform the restoration ceremony — this is called the assembling of the Saṅgha.

Venerable one, when one splits the Saṅgha, what is it that constitutes an unpardonable wrongdoing and becomes an act of immediate retribution?

Upāli, when one who creates a schism perceives what is not Dharma as not Dharma — and with respect to the schism also perceives it as not Dharma — yet suppresses this perception, suppresses assent, suppresses faith, suppresses intelligence, suppresses views and thoughts, and then declares, "This is the Dharma, this is the Vinaya, this is what the Teacher taught" — and having said this, he instructs the monks, properly instructs them, trains them, and leads them to accept it, and he carries out and proclaims the five bases of the rules of conduct — when this schism-maker proclaims the five bases of the rules of conduct and makes the formal motion, properly enacts the wooden rule, and leads away a great many — this is indeed a splitting of the Saṅgha. An unpardonable wrongdoing is incurred, and by properly instructing others, by accepting and leading them to receive it, it further becomes an act of immediate retribution.

When one splits the Saṅgha, what is it that constitutes an unpardonable wrongdoing yet does not become an act of immediate retribution?

Upāli, when one who creates a schism perceives what is not Dharma as not Dharma, and with respect to the schism also perceives it as Dharma; or perceives what is not Dharma as not Dharma, and with respect to the schism also perceives it as not Dharma; or perceives what is not Dharma as not Dharma, and with respect to the schism is uncertain; or perceives what is not

Dharma as Dharma, and with respect to the schism perceives it as not Dharma; or perceives what is not Dharma as Dharma, and with respect to the schism also perceives it as Dharma; or perceives what is not Dharma as Dharma, and with respect to the schism is uncertain; or perceives what is Dharma as Dharma, and with respect to the schism perceives it as not Dharma; or perceives what is Dharma as not Dharma, and with respect to the schism perceives it as Dharma; or perceives what is Dharma as not Dharma, and with respect to the schism is uncertain; or perceives what is Dharma as not Dharma, and with respect to the schism also perceives it as not Dharma; or perceives what is Dharma as not Dharma, and with respect to the schism perceives it as Dharma; or perceives what is Dharma as not Dharma, and with respect to the schism is uncertain; or is uncertain about both Dharma and what is not Dharma, and with respect to the schism perceives it as not Dharma; or is uncertain about what is not Dharma, and with respect to the schism perceives it as Dharma; or is uncertain about what is not Dharma, and with respect to the schism is also uncertain; or is uncertain about Dharma, and with respect to the schism perceives it as not Dharma; or is uncertain about Dharma, and with respect to the schism perceives it as Dharma; or is uncertain about Dharma, and with respect to the schism is also uncertain — and suppresses this perception, suppresses assent, suppresses faith, suppresses intelligence, suppresses views and thoughts — and having suppressed these thoughts, says the following: "This is Dharma. This is Vinaya. This is what the Teacher taught." And then he instructs the monks, properly instructs them, trains them, and draws them in toward it. Striving in this way for the sake of splitting the Saṅgha — that is what causes a schism in the Saṅgha. An offense without remainder is incurred, yet it does not become an act without interval.

"Venerable one, does it follow that in every case where the Saṅgha is split there is also a Saṅgha in dispute? There is splitting of the Saṅgha without a Saṅgha dispute; there is a Saṅgha dispute that does not lead to a split; there is both a split and a dispute; and there is neither a split nor a dispute.

"What is splitting without a dispute? It is when one splits the Saṅgha while perceiving it as Dharma. What is a dispute without a split? It is when any one of the fourteen matters giving rise to schism has been firmly and definitively taken hold of, yet the Saṅgha has not been divided. What is both a split and a dispute? It is when the Saṅgha has been divided and any one of the fourteen matters giving rise to schism has been firmly and definitively taken hold of.

What is neither a split nor a dispute? It is all cases other than these.

"Venerable one, does it follow that in every case where the Saṅgha is split there is also a differentiated Saṅgha? There is a differentiated Saṅgha that does not entail a split; there is a split that does not result in a differentiated Saṅgha; there is both a split and a differentiated Saṅgha; and there is neither a split nor a differentiated Saṅgha.

"What is a differentiated Saṅgha without a split? It is when the two sections of the Saṅgha abide in separate localities, with separate support, separate dwelling, and separate boundaries, yet the Saṅgha has not been divided. What is a split without a differentiated Saṅgha? It is when one splits the Saṅgha while perceiving it as Dharma. What is both a split and a differentiated Saṅgha? It is when the Saṅgha has been divided and the two sections abide separately in their own localities, with separate support, separate dwelling, and separate boundaries. What is neither a split nor a differentiated Saṅgha? It is all cases other than these.

"Just as four cases arise in connection with a differentiated Saṅgha, so too four cases should be stated in connection with the conduct of the Saṅgha.

"Venerable one, does it follow that those who perform the act of schism in the Saṅgha remain thus for an aeon? There are those who have caused a Saṅgha schism yet do not remain for an aeon; there are those who remain for an aeon yet have not caused a Saṅgha schism; there are those who have caused a Saṅgha schism and remain for an aeon; and there are those who have neither caused a Saṅgha schism nor remain for an aeon.

"Those who have caused a Saṅgha schism yet do not remain for an aeon are those who have divided the Saṅgha while perceiving it as Dharma. Those who remain for an aeon yet have not caused a Saṅgha schism are the elephant king Airāvaṇa, the elephant king Most Steadfast, the elephant king Pleasing, the elephant king Yama, and the gods of the Brahma heaven who are Brahmā's close helpers. Those who have divided the Saṅgha and remain for an aeon are Devadatta. Those who have neither divided the Saṅgha nor remain for an aeon are all cases other than these.

"When the Saṅgha has been split by such an act, the offense of remaining for an aeon is likewise to be stated in four cases, and these too are to be distinguished in the same way."

"Are all those who have performed the act of dividing the Saṅgha necessarily destined to fall into the lower realms? No — there are those who divide the Saṅgha yet are not destined to fall, those who are destined to fall yet do not divide the Saṅgha, those who both divide the Saṅgha and are destined to fall, and those who neither divide the Saṅgha nor are destined to fall. One who divides the Saṅgha yet is not destined to fall is one who divides the Saṅgha believing it to be Dharma. One who is destined to fall yet does not divide the Saṅgha is one who has committed one of the four acts of immediate retribution. One who both divides the Saṅgha and is destined to fall is Devadatta. One who neither divides the Saṅgha nor is destined to fall is anyone not falling into these categories.

"Are all those who have performed the act of dividing the Saṅgha unskilled and ignorant? No — there are those who divide the Saṅgha yet are neither unskilled nor ignorant, those who are unskilled and ignorant yet do not divide the Saṅgha, those who divide the Saṅgha and are unskilled and ignorant, and those who neither divide the Saṅgha nor are unskilled nor ignorant. One who divides the Saṅgha yet is neither unskilled nor ignorant is one who divides the Saṅgha believing it to be Dharma. One who is unskilled and ignorant yet does not divide the Saṅgha is the six teachers. One who divides the Saṅgha and is unskilled and ignorant is Devadatta. One who neither divides the Saṅgha nor is unskilled nor ignorant is anyone not falling into these categories."

In brief, the division is made in six aspects:

The challenger in four cases, the restoration ceremony,
The four cases of immediacy, a third of the same,
Remaining for an aeon or not — likewise —
Then those such as householders and so on,
And lastly those who have relinquished the training.

"Venerable Upāli, what possesses the quality of schism? What is a fault? Schism in the Saṅgha possesses the quality of division. Creating the schism is the fault."

"Venerable one, if the Saṅgha is divided, into what does one fall? One falls into a grave offense."

"Venerable one, if the Saṅgha is divided, what transgression is to be confessed? A grave offense."

"Venerable one, monks can divide the monks' Saṅgha, but not nuns, not probationary nuns, not novice nuns, not novice monks — is that so?" "Upāli, that is so. Monks can divide the Saṅgha, but not nuns, not probationary nuns, not novice nuns, not novice monks."

"Upāli, likewise nuns can divide the nuns' Saṅgha, but not monks, not probationary nuns, not novice nuns, not novice monks — yet they do strive to bring about a schism."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that the Saṅgha is divided in two ways: by proclamation and by taking up the procedural staff. Now, venerable one, if someone who is seeking amusement or not seeking it makes a proclamation and takes up the procedural staff, is that called dividing the Saṅgha?" "Upāli, it is not." "Then what is it?" "It is an offense."

"If a monk who is dividing the Saṅgha changes his precept category while in the act of dividing it, is that called dividing the Saṅgha?" "Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, if the nuns' Saṅgha has been split and abides in two factions on opposite sides, and a nun requests instruction every fortnight, should that be given?" "Upāli, without giving it, say this: 'Sisters, be harmonious with one another.'"

"Venerable one, if the monks' Saṅgha has been split and abides in two factions on opposite sides, may a nun request instruction every fortnight?" "Upāli, she may request it." "From whom should she request it?" "From those who have not yet taken sides."

"Venerable one, if the monks' Saṅgha has been split and abides in two factions on opposite sides, should the instruction be given to nuns?" "Upāli, it should be given, so that nuns too will not cause a split."

"Venerable one, if the nuns' Saṅgha has been split and abides in two factions on opposite sides, who should give instruction to the nuns?" "Those who have not yet taken sides should give it."

"Venerable one, if the monks' Saṅgha has been split and abides in two factions on opposite sides, should nuns perform the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, they should."

"Venerable one, if the monks' Saṅgha has been split and abides in two factions on opposite sides, should the monks who have taken sides perform the restoration ceremony?" "Upāli, they should not." "For what reason?" "The restoration ceremony is to be performed by an assembled Saṅgha."

"Venerable one, if those who have taken sides break the boundary of those who have not taken sides, is that called breaking a boundary?" "Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, if those who have not taken sides break the boundary of those who have taken sides, is that called breaking a boundary?" "It is called breaking a boundary."

"Venerable one, if some of those who have taken sides abide separately, each on their own — is that so stated?" "It is stated in full in four modes."

"Venerable one, if some have taken sides and all of them do not abide — is that so stated?" "It is stated in full in four modes."

"Venerable one, if some abide separately each on their own, and all of them do not abide — is that so stated?" "It is stated in full in four modes."

"Venerable one, if the Blessed One has said that one should seek out even a fragment of iron shattered into a hundred pieces, what does 'a fragment of iron' mean?" "One should seek out faith, one should seek out conviction, one should seek out reconciliation, and one should seek out an assembled Saṅgha — but one should not seek it out for the sake of dividing the Saṅgha."

"Venerable one, if the Saṅgha has been split and abides in two factions on opposite sides, by whom should the resolution be raised?" "By those who have not taken sides."

"Venerable one, if a paṇḍaka splits the Saṅgha, is that called a split?" "Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, likewise, beginning from the expulsion of a nun down to the giving of the training — if throughout all of that they split the Saṅgha, is that called a split?" "Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, if a madman splits the Saṅgha, is that called a split?" "Upāli, it is not."

"Venerable one, likewise, if those who are mentally disturbed, tormented by illness, deranged, mute, or paralyzed split the Saṅgha, is that called a split?" "Upāli, it is not." "For what reason?" "Upāli, one who does not abide in a natural state of mind is unable to split the Saṅgha." Just as is said of one who splits the Saṅgha, so too it should be stated that they do not count in the same way.

The chapter on the substance of schism in the Saṅgha is complete. The questions of Upāli are complete.

In brief: Supriya, Vajrasaṃjñā, the female buffalo, the female camel, the female yak, the mare, the female deer, the female donkey, the female sheep, the female dog, and the female pig.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in Vaiśālī, in the Gabled Hall beside the Monkey Pool. Supriya, son of Kalandaka, had not had a rule of training laid down for him, and so when there is no offence for a first offender, he began to wonder: "When the training had not yet been laid down, and I on many occasions engaged in sexual misconduct — what was my first such act?" Doubt arose in his mind, and from it came apprehension and remorse. He spoke of his condition to the monks, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, before the rule of training had been laid down, all acts of Supriya, son of Kalandaka, that had already passed — all of those were first offences.

There is no offence for a first offender. The monk known as Vajraputra did not formally relinquish his training, and without confessing a lapse in his training he became a layman. Having then engaged in sexual misconduct, the act of intercourse, he thought to himself: "For now, let me ask the monks whether I am eligible to go forth and receive full ordination — if I am, I will go forth; if I am not, I will simply remain as I am." Thinking this, he reported everything that had happened, from beginning to the declaration of the Blessed One, in full detail. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, one who has not relinquished his training and not confessed a lapse in his training, and who has then taken on the status of a layman and engaged in sexual misconduct, the act of intercourse — such a person is no longer eligible to go forth and receive full ordination again. Accordingly, the case of training is to be explained in full." Furthermore, the Blessed One declared: "Whatever monk, without having relinquished his training and without having confessed a lapse in his training, engages in sexual misconduct, the act of intercourse — that monk too has incurred a defeat and must not remain in the community."

A certain monk was dwelling alone in a hermitage. Not far from there, a female yak gave birth, and from that female yak a calf was born. The mother went off in search of food, and the monk took some grass and gave it to the calf, and poured water for it. As he sat there, he saw the calf's female parts, and seeing them he became attached and penetrated her. He then felt shame, and he thought: "I wonder whether I have incurred an offence of defeat." Doubt arose in him, and he reported what had happened in full to the monks. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, since there was no contact, there is no offence of defeat, but a grave offence does arise."

When the calf of the female yak had grown large, the monk saw her female parts; seeing them he became attached, and intending to penetrate her he inserted his member into her opening. She gave him a slight kick and he became frightened. He thought: "I wonder if I have not incurred an offence of defeat." He reported everything in full detail. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, since when she was frightened there was no attachment on his part, there is no offence of defeat, but a grave offence does arise."

Just as in the case of a female yak, so too is it with a female camel, a female mare, a female deer, a female donkey, a female sheep, a female dog, and a female pig.

In brief:

One who has become insane, one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness, those who are human, one who mistakes what is not the path for the path — these three cases have been clearly proclaimed.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that there is no offence for one who is insane. How much insanity qualifies one as insane? One becomes insane by five means: the exhaustion of one's kinsmen and friends; the exhaustion of one's enjoyments; the exhaustion of one's wealth; the imbalance of the bodily elements; and being afflicted by non-human beings; and the karmic maturation of past karma. By these five means one becomes insane. If one knows that it is the property of a monk, the matter stands as it is. If one does not know that it is the property of a monk, there is no offence for the insane person.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that there is no offence for one whose mind is disturbed. How much disturbance qualifies one as having a disturbed mind? One is said to have a disturbed mind by five means: a non-human being disturbs that person's mind; a non-human being afflicts that person; a non-human being steals that person's vitality; imbalance of the bodily elements; and the karmic maturation of past karma. By these five means one is said to have a disturbed mind — and this is to be explained in full.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that there is no offence for one tormented by illness. How much illness qualifies one as being tormented by illness?

One is said to be tormented by illness by five means: disturbance by wind, by bile, by phlegm, by a combination of these, and by a change of season. These five means constitute being tormented by illness.

A monk, perceiving a path where there is no path, engaged in unchaste conduct — the act of sexual intercourse. That monk then wondered whether a defeat offense had arisen for him, and, with doubt having arisen, he related in full what had occurred. The Blessed One declared: If one perceives a path where there is no path, it is a defeat. If one perceives a path where there is no path with doubt, it is also a defeat. If one perceives what is not a path as a path, it is a grave offense. If one has doubt about what is not a path, it is a grave offense. The three paths are the defecation passage, the urination passage, and the mouth.

If a monk inserts the tip of his member beyond the foreskin into the urination passage, it is a defeat. If a monk inserts the tip of his member beyond the buttocks into the defecation passage, it is a defeat. If a monk inserts his member beyond the teeth into the mouth, it is a defeat.

In brief:

The female monkey, the lioness, the female crane, the peahen, and the domestic hen — likewise these.
Longmark and Backdoor-Kin,
Nandikā, and the two orifices.

The four grave offenses are: the female monkey, Longmark — these are as they arise in their full analysis. The Blessed One declared: it is a defeat. Backdoor-Kin is also a defeat. Regarding Nandikā, the training is given as set forth in the Vinaya.

A monk, sitting without cover, was bathing naked. Four men were attending him, and through contact with his body his male member became functional, with attachment pervading it. Another monk who happened to be sitting before him took that monk's member into his own mouth, and that monk also bent his body and emitted semen. That monk, with doubt having arisen, wondered whether a defeat offense had arisen for him. He related the matter in full from what had occurred up to the declaration of the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: there is no defeat offense in this. However, whether standing or sitting without cover, one should not allow what another does to be taken as one's own doing.

A monk was tormented by attachment pervading him entirely. He had a fellow monk who was his close friend. He went to that friend and said: "Venerable one, I am overwhelmed and tormented by attachment." The other said: "Go and engage in unchaste conduct," and he indeed went and engaged in unchaste conduct. Doubt then arose in him about whether a defeat offense had arisen for him, since he had been instructed. The Blessed One declared: there is no defeat offense, but it is a grave offense.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable one, how should a grave offense be confessed? Upāli, there are four kinds of grave offense: the heavy kind arising from a defeat, the light kind arising from a defeat, the heavy kind arising from a Saṅgha remainder offense, and the light kind arising from a Saṅgha remainder offense. Upāli, a heavy grave offense arising from a defeat is to be confessed before the entire Saṅgha within the boundary. A light one arising from a defeat is to be confessed before four monks outside the boundary. A heavy grave offense arising from a Saṅgha remainder offense is to be confessed before four monks outside the boundary. A light one arising from a Saṅgha remainder offense is to be confessed before a single monk within the boundary.

In brief:

One who has become functional, the mother, and the charnel-ground dwellers, Odbzang and Bzangskyes, the supremely good one who plunges in,
and the one called Rab-tu-bzang.

A monk who, without having been restrained, lay down, and another monk tormented and utterly oppressed by attachment was sitting in front of him, placed his male organ into that monk's mouth, and the monk, having bent his body, drew out the seminal fluid — and then that monk arose in doubt, wondering whether a defeat had come upon him or not. The Blessed One declared: "A defeat has not occurred; however, from this time forward a monk must not lie down without being restrained. If he does so, it will become an offense requiring confession."

A monk, while his male organ was erect and functional, thought to himself that even if he were to insert it into a woman's organ it would not become an offense. He then inserted it into a woman's organ, and arose in doubt, wondering whether a defeat had come upon him or not. The Blessed One declared: "The moment of insertion, it becomes a defeat."

A monk was completely covered and tormented by attachment, and went to his mother and said to her: "I am tormented, oppressed by attachment that pervades me entirely." The mother replied: "Son, you came forth from this very place — let it return to this very place." He, thinking to insert it there, placed it at the wound, but then he felt shame, and that monk arose in doubt, wondering whether a defeat had come upon him or not. The Blessed One declared: "Because of the shame, there was no attachment, and so there is no defeat; however, it will become a grave offense."

A monk went to a charnel ground to examine a human corpse, and there he saw the corpse of a woman that had been cast away still adorned with ornaments. Upon seeing it, a state of attachment arose in him. Thinking to insert into it, he placed himself at the wound, but the inside was filled with worms. That monk arose in doubt, wondering whether a defeat had come upon him or not. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, that transgression is of two kinds: inner transgression and outer transgression. A defeat has not occurred, but it will become a grave offense."

A laywoman by the name of Ödzangmo died in the evening and was cast into the charnel ground still adorned with her ornaments. A monk who had gone to the charnel ground to examine a human corpse saw her, and a state of attachment arose in him toward her. Thinking to insert into her, he placed himself at the wound — and she then rose up and sat upright, and that monk was filled with terror. He arose in doubt, wondering whether a defeat had come upon him or not. The Blessed One declared: "Because of the terror, there was no attachment, and so there is no defeat; however, it will become a grave offense."

The wife of a householder named Bzangskyes was walking near his village, and a monk who was there went to her and said to her: "The householder's wife is tormented, oppressed by attachment." She replied: "Thrust in from below and release the seminal fluid from above; thrust in from above and release the seminal fluid from below." And she said that she herself did not know how to engage in unchaste conduct. He, for his part, thought: "This is good, this is excellent, this is fitting and proper." He thrust in from below and released the seminal fluid from above, and that monk arose in doubt. The Blessed One declared: "The moment of insertion, it becomes a defeat."

The narrative occasion of Śintubzangmo is as it appears in the full analysis of the Vinaya.

A monk named Rabtubzang was dwelling alone in a solitary hermitage. Not far from there was a brahmin's field, and he observed that the brahmin came there regularly.

Upon seeing him, faith arose in the brahmin. He invited the monk to a meal, and the monk accepted. The next morning the brahmin prepared food in advance and sent a small girl to summon the monk. The monk caught sight of the girl's genitals. Upon seeing them, attachment arose in him, and he performed the act. When the girl's genitals were torn, doubt arose in him. The Blessed One declared: "If pleasure is felt through unchaste conduct, it becomes a defeat. If no pleasure is felt, it becomes a grave offence."

In brief, what is unfit to receive does not apply to the sleeping, the pressed down, the mad, the afflicted by disease, the unwilling, males, and those of indeterminate sex.

A monk whose male organ is by nature unfit to receive — if it is inserted into one that is fit to receive, it becomes a defeat offence. Thinking that if it is inserted into one unfit to receive, no offence would result, he inserted it while it was not erect. Doubt arose, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no defeat offence, but it becomes a grave offence."

A monk performed the act with a sleeping woman, and doubt arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "If hand meets hand, foot meets foot, thigh meets thigh, and body presses against body, it becomes a defeat. If there is no such contact, it becomes a grave offence." Exactly as with the sleeping woman, so too with the mad, the disease-afflicted, and the unwilling. Just as it is stated in four ways with respect to a woman, so too it is the same with respect to males and those of indeterminate sex.

The Vinaya: the Noble Fundamental Text, the twenty-second fascicle.

In brief: the four modes, the fifth, all actions, and the sleeping woman, performed once and a third time, woman, man, and one of indeterminate sex.

A woman performed the act with a sleeping monk, and remorse arose in him. The Blessed One declared: "O monk, did you feel pleasure?" He replied: "I felt pleasure." The Blessed One declared: "Did you know?" He said: "I was not aware of it; I had only moved slightly." The Blessed One declared: "For a monk who was sleeping and merely moved slightly, there is no defeat offence, but it becomes a grave offence."

A monk was sleeping and a woman performed the act with him, and remorse arose in him. The Blessed One declared: "O monk, did you feel pleasure?" He replied: "I did not feel pleasure." The Blessed One declared: "If no pleasure was felt, there is no offence."

A monk was lying down and sitting up when a woman performed the act with him, and remorse arose in him. The Blessed One declared: "O monk, did you know?" He replied: "I was not aware." The Blessed One declared: "If there was no awareness, there is no offence."

A monk who was lying down and then sitting up when a woman performed the act with him, and remorse arose in him. The Blessed One declared: "O monk, did you know, or did you feel pleasure?" He replied: "I was not aware, and I did not feel pleasure." The Blessed One declared: "Where there is no awareness and no pleasure felt, there is no offence."

What applies to a monk applies equally to a nun (bhikṣuṇī), a female trainee (śikṣamāṇā), a female novice (śrāmaṇerikā), and a male novice (śrāmaṇera).

Three evil ascetics said: "Even if one seizes a woman and performs the act throughout the journey, no offence will result," and they did so throughout the journey. Doubt arose in them, and the Blessed One declared: "The moment of insertion, it becomes a defeat." What applies to a woman applies in the same way to all men and those of indeterminate sex.

In brief: woman, man, and one of indeterminate sex, expelled for sensing pleasure, no offence;
three for the wilderness, five for the renunciant.

A woman performed the act upon a monk who was asleep. When that monk arose with remorse, the Blessed One declared: "Monk, did you know?" He replied: "I did not notice, Lord." The Blessed One declared: "For one who did not know, there is no offence."

What applies to a woman applies in the same way to a man and to one of indeterminate sex.

An evil monk of a forest dwelling deceived a female trainee and said to her: "Since you have not received full ordination, if unchaste conduct is performed, no offence will result for either of us." She consented. Having consented, she then felt remorse; yet he performed the act without her assent, and the female trainee felt remorse thinking: "Perhaps I have not become disqualified as a female trainee." The Blessed One declared: "The training has been broken; let it be restored. It becomes a transgression."

An evil monk of the forest dwelling deceived a male novice, saying: "Since you have not received full ordination, even if unchaste conduct is performed it will not result in an offence for either of us." And at length the Blessed One declared: "It becomes a transgression for the male novice." What applies to the male novice applies in the same way to the female novice.

An evil nun of a forest dwelling said to one whose time had not yet come: "You have already received full ordination; it will not be long now — even if unchaste conduct is performed, no offence will result for us." That one consented. Having consented, she then felt remorse again; yet he performed the act upon her without her assent, and that monk felt remorse thinking: "Perhaps the offence of defeat has not arisen for me." The Blessed One declared: "For one who does not experience pleasure, there is no defeat; yet it becomes a grave offence."

A monk performed the act upon a monk who was asleep. If that sleeping monk did not know at the beginning, in the middle, or at the end, the monk who performed the act should be dealt with as unfit. The full detail is as it appears in the Vinaya analysis.

In brief:

Fourth: an image, a female nāga,
a female yakṣa, a goddess, a female gandharva, a female asura, a female hungry ghost, a cannibal ogress — these too are the same.

A monk made a wooden image — well-formed, pleasant to behold, beautiful. Upon seeing it, desire arose in him, thinking he would insert himself into it, and he thrust into its wound. It opened, and the monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "If he made contact with all the limbs and thereby incurred a defeat, yet if it was merely the insertion of the organ, it becomes a grave offence."

Just as with one made of wood, so too with one made of earth, made of stone, or made of cloth — it is the same.

A daughter of the nāgas came to a monk and said: "Venerable one, come and engage in unchaste conduct with me." He consented. He inserted himself into her, thrusting into her aperture. She then expanded her body to great length, and the monk, filled with terror, felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "Because there was no attachment in the monk's terror, there is no offence of defeat; yet it becomes a grave offence."

Likewise in detail up to the daughter of the yakṣas: she too became invisible, and that monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence of defeat; it becomes a grave offence."

Daughters of the gods, daughters of the gandharvas, and daughters of the asuras — in all these cases it is the same, explained at length: just as with the daughter of the nāgas, each expanded her body to great size, and the monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "Because there is no desire in one who is terrified, there is no offence of defeat; it becomes a grave offence."

Likewise, the daughter of the hungry ghosts grew her female organ to great size, and she planted it upon the monk. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence of defeat; it becomes a grave offence."

A monk who was dwelling alone in a forest hermitage was visited by a human woman. She said: "Venerable one, come and engage in unchaste conduct with me." The monk, being virtuous, felt no arousal. She said: "Venerable one, be aroused — you have been made unworthy. Let him do to me whatever he wishes." "I will not be aroused," he replied. She then wrapped the monk in her outer garment while he lay sleeping and placed him in the bedchamber where the king slept together with his queen. The king saw the monk and said: "What are you doing here?" The monk replied: "I was dwelling alone in a forest hermitage, and a human woman came to me and said, 'Venerable one, come and engage in unchaste conduct with me.' When I did not become aroused, she said, 'Venerable one, be aroused — you have been made unworthy. Let me do to him whatever I wish. I will not become aroused,' I said. And while I lay sleeping she wrapped me in her garment and placed me here." The king said: "Venerable one, why do you dwell in such a hermitage where such frightening things can happen?" and expelled the monk. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence of defeat. From now on, do not dwell in a hermitage in which such frightening things can happen."

Likewise, a flesh-eating demoness did the same — she too wrapped the monk in her garment while he lay sleeping and placed him in the shop of a liquor-seller. The liquor-seller looked into his shop, saw the monk, and the rest proceeds in detail just as in the case of the human woman.

In brief, here is a summary verse:

The blue-lotus complexion, and the joyful one,
two young children, blood and flesh,
a female dog, a vixen, a female crow,
a non-human being, a water-crosser, a fish, a shrew, and a piece of wood.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī. The nun Upālavarṇā, early in the morning, having put on her lower robe, entered Śrāvastī for alms. She washed her feet thoroughly and, entering her dwelling to enter into meditation, she opened the door and went inside. The hot season had arrived, and she fell asleep lying down. Some rogues who were wandering and walking along a lane saw her, did what they did to her as she lay there, then went away. She awoke, and the nun felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence. From now on, a nun must not lie down without having bolted the door. If she does, it becomes a wrongdoing."

Likewise, if it was done to her while she was in meditative absorption, there is no offence; but from now on, a nun must not enter meditative absorption without having bolted the door. If she does enter absorption, it becomes a wrongdoing.

A monk was on his alms round at Śrāvastī and entered the home of a householder. A piglet belonging to that householder had been tied to a stake and was circling around the stake. The monk, feeling compassion, released it from the stake and sent it off. The householder saw the monk, ran after him, grabbed him by the neck, and said: "You have let loose my piglet — you are a thief! You are a fool! You are a wicked ascetic!" The monk thought: "I have let the piglet go, therefore I am a thief, I am a fool,

I am a wicked ascetic — I shall go and engage in unchaste conduct." Having thought thus, he went and engaged in unchaste conduct. He then thought: "Let me ask the monks about this: if, after I have gone forth and received full ordination, I can still be accepted back, then I shall go forth again; if not, I shall remain as I am." Having thought this, he told the monks what had happened, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense for the former act; the latter has become a wrongdoing." The case of the chick of a crow is the same.

A householder was carrying a piece of raw meat and going on his way, when a vulture snatched it and flew off with it. The piece of raw meat slipped from the vulture's beak and fell into the alms bowl of a monk who was on his alms round. The householder, seeing the meat sitting in that monk's alms bowl, grabbed the monk by the scruff of the neck and said: "That vulture snatched my piece of raw meat, and it was caught by your alms bowl — you are a thief! You are a fool! You are a wicked ascetic!" The monk thought: "His piece of raw meat was caught by my alms bowl, therefore I am a thief, I am a fool, I am a wicked ascetic — I shall go and engage in unchaste conduct." He thought thus. The full account is just as in the case of the piglet.

A monk urinated in front of a female dog. She inserted his member into her mouth, and he discharged semen; his body became flaccid as well. The monk was seized with remorse, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat. Henceforth, monks must not urinate in front of a female dog; or else drive her away, or move aside."

While a monk was walking, a female fox made a sound and tore the cloth from his rag pile. He then thought: "Who is it that has torn the cloth from my rag pile? I shall go and look." He went and found himself wrapped up in the rag-pile cloth, and the female fox then came and mounted on top of the monk. He wrapped the fox in the rag-pile cloth and held her, thinking: "Let me look and see whether this fox is male or female." He thus saw her female organ. Seeing it, a lustful thought arose in him, and he thought: "I shall insert myself right into that." He pushed into the wound, and she withdrew, pulled back, and escaped. The monk was frightened, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat for the frightened monk, but it becomes a grave wrongdoing."

A monk was dwelling alone in a dense forest. A female spirit of some sort led him from there into a cave and did to him whatever perception arose in her. She then changed his perception and went off to her domain, and the monk, having regained his perception, rose from that place and fled. The monk was seized with remorse, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offense. Henceforth, monks must not dwell in a wilderness that is frightening in such a way."

A monk was crossing a river in the cold of winter, and his member was seized by a fish. His body too became flaccid and he discharged semen. The monk was seized with remorse, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offense.

Henceforth, do not cross in the cold of winter any river where such a danger may occur."

A woman was crouching in a thicket of wood, relieving herself, when a monk, peering through the branches of the thicket, saw her private parts. Having seen them, he was overcome by desire, and he touched her private parts with his own member. The Blessed One declared: "There is no root defeat, but it becomes a grave offense."

The Blessed One was dwelling in the Jeta Grove at Śrāvastī, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. Some monks, having completed their duties and gone to a place for walking and taking the day's ease, one of them spread out his mat there, sat cross-legged, and rested. As the hot season had come, he grew drowsy in that spot, lay down, and fell asleep. As he slept, his lower robe became disordered and his member became responsive. A woman who had come to that place to gather firewood saw the monk lying there in an unsightly state. She was seized by intense desire and performed the sexual act upon him as he slept. Having done so, she departed. The monk awoke and, regaining his senses, she said: "Noble one, I have a household here, and if you should ever wish it again, come there." The monk was seized with remorse. The Blessed One declared: "Monk, were you aware of it?" He replied: "I was not, Blessed One." "If one was unaware, there is no offense. Henceforth, do not lie down to sleep alone, uncovered and unguarded. If one does so, it becomes a wrongdoing."

In brief:

The five grasses of Śāketā,
the five ingredients of Campā,
the medical treatments of Rājagṛha, and the courtesan of Bharukaccha.

The Blessed One was dwelling in the forest of Ketā's woodsman. Then, in the case of another monk, a grass called "the five grasses," in its elaborate form, works just as with the firewood gatherer. In the city of Campā, when one is afflicted by a festering disease, through five causes and five conditions the member becomes responsive — as is set forth in the Vibhaṅga.

The Blessed One was dwelling in Rājagṛha. A monk was tormented by a disease of the member. His life-sustaining member was also tormented by disease. He had it placed in a woman's mouth. He then heard that one is thereby freed from such a disease. He thought: "The Blessed One has permitted this as a medical treatment for the sick," and, thinking so, he placed it in a woman's mouth and was freed from that disease. The monk was seized with remorse. The Blessed One declared: "The moment of insertion constitutes a root defeat."

In the land of Bharukaccha, a thief had taken up residence in the house of a courtesan. He went out from there and was harming the people of that place. They appealed to the king, and the king summoned the courtesan and asked: "Is a thief living in your house?" She replied: "There is no one, Sire." "If he is found upon search, you will be convicted of having harbored and concealed him, and you shall be put to death by that penalty. If he is still alive, you will be given to the dogs." The people seized the thief, brought him, and presented him to the king. The king commanded: "Go, bind this courtesan by her ankles, drag her along the ground, tie her face downward, and throw her in the charnel ground. Whoever releases her shall be put to death by this same penalty. If she survives, she shall be given to the dogs." They bound her by her ankles, dragged her along, tied her face down, and threw her into the charnel ground. A monk who was sitting in the charnel ground contemplating a corpse saw her, and a thought of desire arose in him. He thought: "I will insert right then and there," and placed his member in her wound. She rose and sat up, and said: "Venerable one, please give me some water first." He poured water over her. She said: "Venerable one, what use is this impure body and womb of mine?" He held her from that moment onward. When her relatives and friends came, the monk saw them from a distance and, ashamed, departed off to one side.

She said to her relatives and friends: "Whatever little life remains in me is entirely due to the power of this monk. Please call him." When they called him, he said: "Venerable lady, whatever little life remains in you is entirely due to your own merit. These are your relatives and friends — let them nurse you back to health. And if there is anything I can do for you, I am at this house; come there." The monk then felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no root downfall; however, it becomes a gross offense."

In brief:

Inside a wool-bull pen and a pit,
by touch, and a sunken boat as well, men — both lay and ordained — women, girls, and nuns,
a noble-born wealthy man tending a palace,

a monk tending a palace retinue —

A monk entered a pen containing an unruly bull. The bull, being unruly, tossed him and he fell on top of a woman. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense. Be mindful, and enter the bull pen." A monk looked into a broken pit and fell in, and there grasped around the neck a woman who had previously fallen in as well. Householders took a rope and pulled the monk out, and seeing a woman grasping him around the neck, they said: "Woman, where have you come from?" The monk said: "This is the woman who fell in before me; she grabbed me around the neck." The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense. Be mindful, and watch out for pits." A monk who was going on alms-round came out through a narrow doorway, and a woman who was also entering brushed her female member against his male member. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense. Be mindful, and go on alms-round in the village." A monk was crossing a river by boat when the boat capsized. A woman was also there, and she grasped him around the neck. The monk swam across, and then felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense. Be mindful, and cross rivers." A layman called Blessedly Born went to a nun and said: "Noble lady, please ordain me." Without examining the matter, they ordained him, and he touched a nun. They felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense. Examine very carefully before ordaining." The nun Śomā Gāndhinī abandoned a child in the same manner as others abandon a child. The Blessed One declared: "Nuns should not abandon a child. If one does, it becomes a gross offense." The incident of the laywoman Blessedly Good was told at length, and the Blessed One asked: "Blessedly Good, did you feel pleasure?" She replied: "Venerable one, how could I have felt pleasure? It was like burning iron tongs." The Blessed One declared: "The region of a woman's female member arises from the ripening of karma; there is no offense when something is done by force." The nun called Blessedly Born Supriyā was seized by wrongdoers who covered her mouth, led her into a dense forest, defiled her, and released her; the nuns then expelled her from the residence. She said: "Noble ladies, I did not experience pleasure." They replied: "You were seized by wrongdoers, led into a dense forest, defiled, and released — why then did you not feel pleasure?"

The nuns reported what had happened to the monks, and the monks in turn informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One asked: "Did you experience pleasure?" She replied: "Blessed One, when someone is waving a handful of grass and thorns at you, how could you possibly experience pleasure?" The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, the region of a woman's female member arises from the ripening of karma. Coming and going, and the waving of a hand, constitute being taken by force, and for one taken by force there is no offense."

There was a nun in Śrāvastī named Norchen who, while going on her alms round, was seized by wrongdoers, led into a dense forest, defiled, and released. The nuns expelled her from the residence, and she said: "Noble ladies, I did not experience pleasure." They replied: "You were seized by wrongdoers, led into a dense forest, defiled, and released — why then did you not feel pleasure?" The nuns reported what had happened to the monks, and the monks in turn informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One asked: "Did you experience pleasure?" She replied: "Blessed One, I wept and cried out loud, saying 'Do not seize me!' — how could I have felt pleasure?" The Blessed One declared: "The region of a woman's female member arises from the ripening of karma. Weeping constitutes being taken by force; crying aloud and saying 'Do not seize me!' constitutes being taken by force; and for one taken by force there is no offense."

There was a nun in Śrāvastī named Phorang Kyong who, while going on her alms round, was seized by wrongdoers, led into a dense forest, defiled, and released. The nuns expelled her from the residence. She said: "I did not experience pleasure." They replied: "Then go to Ānanda." She went to him, but when the elder saw her he did not speak to her respectfully, and he too sent her away. She then thought to herself: "It is better for me to leave than to go on living like this." She thought to fill a clay pot with sand, tie it around her neck, and leap into the Ajiravatī river. She did just that — she tied the sand-filled pot around her neck and leapt into the Ajiravatī — but a rotten rope broke and she floated and sank, and the wrongdoers, seeing this, pulled her out and laid her down. When she regained consciousness, they defiled her again. The nuns, who had been searching for her, arrived at that place and saw them defiling her. She said: "Was I not already a nun before? Am I still a nun even now?" She reported what had happened to the monks, and the Blessed One asked: "Did you experience pleasure?" She replied: "Blessed One, when someone waves grass and thorns at you and you say 'Do not seize me!' — how could you feel pleasure?" The Blessed One declared: "Monks, the region of a woman's female member arises from the ripening of karma. From the point of 'walking constitutes being taken by force' down through 'saying "Do not seize me!" constitutes being taken by force' — in full — for one taken by force there is no offense."

In brief:

The Norchen monastery, the perception and going-forth,

The ten alms rounds and ten thieves —

And likewise the ten of the gambling board and the residence —

The buddha, the Blessed One, dwelt in Rājagṛha.

Previously, the monk Norchen the potter had not established the training rules, so there is no offense for a novice beginner. He thought: "If I take a good many pieces of wood without permission and bring them back, who will hold me to account for being a first offender?" His mind was tormented by this and he came to regret it; he became remorseful. The Blessed One then declared:

Monks, because the training rules had not yet been established, the former potter, the monk Norchen, had already passed beyond them all, and since he was a first offender in every respect, there is no offense for a first offender.

A monk who perceived ownerless monastery supplies as having an owner and took them without being given them — that monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One then declared: If one perceives what has an owner as having an owner and takes it, it incurs defeat. If one is in doubt about what has an owner and takes it, it incurs defeat. If one perceives what has no owner as having an owner and takes it, it incurs a grave offense. If one perceives what has no owner as having no owner and takes it, there is no offense.

A monk took alms-food bearing grain without being given it. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense of defeat; it incurs a grave offense. With regard to alms-food bearing grain — in the same way, alms of flour, alms of cooked grain-porridge, alms of meat, and alms of cooked food: all of these likewise incur a grave offense.

A monk ate food without being invited. That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense of defeat; it incurs a wrongdoing.

When the Saṅgha's food distribution was taking place in the province of Kosala, a resident monk had gone to another village. There were two monks who lived together, and the two of them had each accepted the preceptor's food separately. The two of them thought: "You accepted it, and I accepted it — in which case, neither of us knows who took it without permission, so perhaps it has not incurred the offense of defeat." The Blessed One declared: There is no offense in having taken it. Let it be regarded as belonging to someone else.

When the Saṅgha's food distribution was taking place in the province of Kosala, a resident monk had gone to another village. A friend of that monk accepted his food on his behalf. When he returned, that friend said: "Venerable one, did you accept my food?" He replied: "I accepted it." The monk said: "Why did you accept it without my having commissioned you?" That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. What was not commissioned — do not accept it.

When the Saṅgha's food distribution was taking place in the province of Kosala, there was a sick monk. His nurse accepted food on his behalf and then departed. The monk's meal time had passed, and he did not know what to do. The Blessed One declared: If the meal time had not yet passed before and the food was accepted afterward, then return it then and there. But if it was accepted before and the meal time passed afterward, handle it as one would any other requisite in the appropriate manner.

A monk said to another monk: "Come here, venerable one — let us go to the thieves." The two of them set out and had gone halfway along the road, when they thought: "We have gone forth into the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya, and if we commit theft it would be unseemly and improper for us." Being possessed of a sense of shame, the two of them did not go there. They came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense of defeat; it incurs a wrongdoing.

A monk said to several monks: "Come here, venerable ones — let us go to the thieves." They set out and had gone halfway along the road, when they thought: "This would be unseemly for us," and being possessed of a sense of shame they did not go there. Those monks came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense of defeat; it incurs a wrongdoing.

Among those who acted in the same manner, one of them, being possessed of a sense of shame, thought: "If I do not go, they will deprive me of my livelihood. Yet I shall go, and I shall not take what is not given, nor shall I accept my share." Thinking thus, he went there, and he neither took what was not given nor carried off his share. That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense of defeat; it incurs a wrongdoing.

Some monks said to other monks: "Come here, venerable ones — let us go to the thieves." They set out, and of them, half carried out the deed while the other half stood guard on the road. Those who were standing guard on the road thought: "We have not taken anything and have not stolen, so we will not incur an offense." When the other monks heard what had occurred, they reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: If the full constituent elements are present, it incurs defeat. If the constituent elements are not complete, it incurs a grave offense.

A monk said to another monk: "Come here, venerable one — let us go to the thieves." They took what was not given, but in some other instance the constituent elements were not complete; yet from the very location where they had taken the goods, the full constituent elements were subsequently present there, and both those monks came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: The value is to be reckoned from the place from which it was moved.

A monk said to several monks: "Come here, venerable ones — let us go to the thieves. Whatever each one obtains, that shall be his own to keep." They set out and went there, and of them some obtained something while others obtained nothing. They came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense of defeat; it incurs a grave offense.

As for those monks, if the thieves gave them a share and the guards also gave them something, yet they came to feel remorse and did not take it, the Blessed One declared: When permission is granted, regard the giver with the mind of a donor and accept it.

A companion of a certain monk was carried off by thieves. That companion escaped and came back, and the monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: It is permissible for a monk to rescue himself; there is no offense.

If a monk has in hand an object used for playing dice, and if it passes beyond the boundary of the gaming place, it incurs defeat. But if he thinks: "This belongs to my mother, this to my father, this to my son, this to my sister, to my preceptor, to my teacher, to a stūpa, or to the Saṅgha" — and he dedicates it to many and it passes beyond, it incurs a grave offense. If it passes beyond into the sky, there is no offense.

In brief:

A stool, a book, a bolt of linen cloth,
Alcohol, meat, clothing, and the interior;
A funeral streamer, a charnel ground,

And the two locations of a charnel ground.

A monk stole a stool and carried it off, thinking that its owner would not give it back. That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense of defeat; it incurs a grave offense.

A monk stole a book and carried it off; that case too is elaborated in the same way.

A monk took a bolt of linen cloth without it being given, and having stolen it he tore it apart. From inside it there emerged a piece of silk of great value. That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: The value of the linen cloth is to be reckoned.

Some thieves took some alcohol and went to a monastery. Some of the alcohol they drank, and some they concealed and departed.

Some monks also went out to that place to take their morning exercise. They saw it and said, "Before those turn sour, take them to the monastery," and they carried it to the monastery. The thieves, growing thirsty, went back there and searched for it, and not finding it they saw those monks and asked them: "Venerable ones, did you not take some alcohol?" The monks replied, "We took it." The thieves said, "We had hidden that alcohol, so you are thieves." Those monks came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. One should examine carefully whether there is an owner or not, and then take it. Likewise with meat, it is the same.

Some thieves sacked a village and were chased away by arrows. They went to a monastery and, out of fear, entered it; they gave their garments to the monks and fled to a hermitage. The householders surrounded the monastery and entered it, and seeing those garments in the hands of the monks they said, "These garments are ours." The monks replied, "The thieves gave them to us." Those monks came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. Do not accept goods that have been stolen and not yet settled. However, if a thief bearing a victory banner gives something, one may accept it from him; wash the garment, change its color, and use it. If even after changing its color someone comes back to claim it again, give it back to that person as well.

A launderer put a garment into the washing water and then forgot it and went into the village. He later remembered the garment and turned back to go and retrieve it. In the meantime a monk who was searching for rag-robes went to that place, saw the garment, took it, and left. The launderer saw this and said, "Venerable one, do not steal the garment!" The monk replied, "I was searching for rag-robes and found this — what do you need it for?" The launderer said, "Venerable one, I put this garment in the wash water and forgot it; it is my garment, do not steal it. You have taken it without it being given." That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. One should examine carefully whether there is another owner or not, and then take it.

A launderer washed a garment and left it by a tree. A rag-robe seeker, searching for rag-robes, came to that place, saw the garment, took it, and left. The launderer saw this and said, "Venerable one, this is my garment; do not steal it. If it is yours, take it back." That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: One should examine most carefully — and this is elaborated at length.

A householder set down his garment while attending to the call of nature. A rag-robe seeker, searching for rag-robes, came to that place, saw the garment, took it, and left. The householder stood up and said, "Venerable one, this is my clothing; do not steal it. If it is yours, take it back." That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. Examine it thoroughly and take it.

Not far from the Jeta Grove, a field laborer set down his garments and was working the field. A monk who was a rag-robe seeker, searching for rag-robes, came to that place, saw the garment, took it, and left. The field laborer saw this and said, "Venerable one, do not steal the garment!" But the monk did not listen to him, and —

He ran after him, caught him, and said, "Venerable one, do not take the garment without it being given. I saw it when I was searching for rag-robe cloths. What need do you have of this? Venerable one, I left the garment there and went off to till the field. This garment is mine." And he added, "If it is yours, take it back." That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. Examine it thoroughly and take it.

A householder had heard that the monks, the sons of the Śākyan ascetic, take whatever fallen garments they find, calling them rag-robe cloths. He therefore took a fine piece of cloth worth eight kārṣāpaṇas, buried it deep in a heap of discarded rags, and left it with just a corner showing, then went away. A monk who was searching for rag-robe cloths came to that place, saw the corner, pulled the cloth out from there, and took it. The householder saw this and said, "Venerable one, do not steal the cloth!" The monk replied, "I found this while searching for rag-robe cloths — what concern is it of yours?" The householder said, "Venerable one, I heard that the monks, the sons of the Śākya ascetic, take whatever fallen garments they find, calling them rag-robe cloths. So I buried the cloth in the heap of rags, having paid eight kārṣāpaṇas for it." Upon hearing this, the monk saw the eight kārṣāpaṇas and said, "If they are yours, take them." That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. Examine it carefully and treat it with respect.

A householder's boy set down his garment in the street and went off to play. After he had finished playing and gone home, a monk who was searching for rag-robe cloths came to that place, saw the garment, took it, and left. A woman came out from that house and, seeing the monk, said, "Venerable one, do not steal the garment!" He replied, "I found it while searching for rag-robe cloths." She said, "Venerable one, her boy was playing and forgot the garment and went home." He replied, "If it is yours, take it." That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. Examine it thoroughly and take it.

A monk hid a rag-robe cloth and then went into Śrāvastī on alms round. Another monk, also searching for rag-robe cloths, came to that place, saw it, and washed it. The first monk, having searched for his rag-robe cloth and not found it, then saw that other monk washing it, and said to him, "Venerable one, a root defeat has occurred for you." The other monk asked why. "Because you took my rag-robe cloth without it being given." The first monk added, "I did not know that this had an owner." That monk came to feel remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. Examine it carefully and take it.

Those monks were carrying rag-robe cloths that had been touched by unclean things, and the lesser gods (devas) were mocking them. The Blessed One declared: Rag-robe cloths should be washed, properly dried, and then carried. Therefore monks must not carry rag-robe cloths that have been touched by unclean things. Whoever does so commits a wrongdoing.

Those monks took garments from a charnel ground that had an owner. People of low birth, whatever work they did, did it on account of these monks, and they began to spread disagreeable talk, saying, "Do not steal garments from here."

The Blessed One declared: Do not take garments from a charnel ground that has an owner. If one does take them, a serious offense results.

Not far from a certain charnel ground there was a temple that was facing the wrong direction. A piece of cloth had been blown by the wind into the charnel ground, and a monk who was searching through the charnel ground for rag-robe cloths came there, found that piece of cloth, took it, and carried it away. Those who dwelt in the wrongly-facing temple saw this and said: "Venerable one, this cloth of ours fell from the temple into the charnel ground — do not steal this cloth." He replied: "If it is yours, then take it back." That monk became remorseful. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. Inquire very carefully and with an open mind as to whether or not there is another owner.

Here ends the Vinaya section.

The Noble Vinaya. The twenty-third fascicle.

In brief: two boys crossing a third, missions and the Saṅgha's field, requisites and pegs, wood and two kinds of bird's nest.

The great Mahāmaudgalyāyana freed the boys of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada in the Jeta Grove from wrongdoers, and this is to be understood in detail as it appears in the extended explanation.

A householder had invited the Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha at the time of midday. The Saṅgha of monks headed by the Buddha was coming, but one monk remained in the monastery and missed the meal. Meanwhile the boys of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada were playing in the Jeta Grove when wrongdoers stole them. That monk heard of this, and having learned a mantra, before long he thought to himself: "With this mantra I shall awaken my mother." He recited the mantra, and those wrongdoers found themselves surrounded by four armies, whereupon they abandoned the boys and fled.

When the monks heard what had happened, they said to that monk: "A root defeat has occurred." The monk became remorseful. The Blessed One declared: "Monk, what was your intention when you freed the boys?" He replied: "My intention was to awaken her with the mantra." The Blessed One declared: There is no offense in reciting a mantra.

In the province of Kosala, when the Saṅgha distributed robes, a resident monk went to another village, and two companions of his who lived together there each collected the portion owed to the preceptor separately. After collecting and returning, each asked the other: "Did you collect the preceptor's robe?" When both said they had, they said: "Since both of us collected it, we do not know whose collecting caused a root defeat." The Blessed One declared: There is no offense in the collecting, but one should inform the other party.

In the province of Kosala, when the Saṅgha distributed robes, a resident monk went to another village. A friend of that monk collected his robe and came back, saying: "Venerable one, this is your robe — I collected it and have brought it." The monk replied: "I did not entrust you with that." The monk became remorseful. The Blessed One declared: There is no root defeat. Do not accept what is found without being entrusted with it; if one does accept it, it becomes a wrongdoing.

In the province of Kosala, at the time of distributing robes, a monk was ill, and his attendant collected his robe and took it away.

That monk too had passed away, and the attendant monk did not know what to do. The Blessed One declared: If the robe was distributed before the time had passed but was given to the attendant only after the time had passed, then it must be returned to the Saṅgha right then. If it was given to the attendant before the time had passed but the time then passed afterward, handle it as one would any other requisite. A monk said to another monk: "Come here, venerable one — taking something small by small amounts without its being given does not become a wrongdoing." The monks heard this and reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: It is to be assessed by a single combined valuation.

A layman was plowing a field belonging to the Saṅgha, and a resident monk came to him and said: "Layman, either give a share or stop plowing." The man did not comply and continued plowing. The monk then lay down at the tip of the furrow. The layman then abandoned the furrow and said: "May this one such as this śramaṇa be parted from it," and cursed and dismissed him with unkind words. The monk became remorseful. The Blessed One declared: There is no wrongdoing. But from now on, monks should not make themselves a bodily nuisance in this way.

A monk said to another monk: "Come here, venerable one — even if we were to steal the wealth of a stūpa, no wrongdoing would arise for the two of us." The Blessed One declared: Monks, from stūpa property that has no guardian, if the full value is present, it becomes a root defeat.

A resident monk caused a field belonging to the Saṅgha to be plowed, and not long after, a layman also plowed that field. The layman came and said: "Venerable one, do not plow my field." The monk replied: "This is not yours — it is the Saṅgha's field." "Venerable one, let me be shown what is not under my authority," said the layman, and he dug up the boundary stake that had previously been planted. Having dug it up and been shown this, the layman abandoned the furrow and left. After the layman had gone, the monk pushed his stake back in and plowed the field. The layman returned and said: "Venerable one, even though I won just now, why are you plowing again?" The monk became remorseful. The Blessed One declared: If the thing is present in full, it becomes a root defeat.

A monk took without permission a flowering tree belonging to a layman. The monk became remorseful. The Blessed One declared: If the thing is present in full, it becomes a root defeat. A fruit tree is likewise.

A tree grew in a monk's walking-meditation path, and sparrows built their nest in it. As the monk walked, it caused him to drop the tree and make a noise. He destroyed the nest, and the bird cried out. The Blessed One asked: "Why is the beloved one causing the beloved one to cry out?" The monks replied: "It was because of destroying the sparrows' nest." The Blessed One declared: Do not destroy sparrows' nests. Whoever destroys one incurs a wrongdoing. A monk who destroyed a sparrows' nest and then boiled the dye — that case is also detailed in the same way.

In brief:

A hollow tree, a trunk, and fruit, and leaves and flowers — these make three;
stealing a horse and a horse-rider, crossing by boat, and a jewel.

At Śrāvastī a certain layman had a hollow tree, and a monk went there and said: "Give me the hollow tree." The layman replied: "Venerable one, please pay for it." "There is nothing to pay." "If there is no payment, how can I give it?" "Give it without payment for the sake of the Dharma." The layman said: "Venerable one, if we were to give everything to all who come here without payment, we would have not even a little food and clothing."

"Will you not give even a little? I am not asking for much." Having said this, he dried out the roots of the hollow tree by means of mantras. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat, but it becomes a grave offense."

Just as with the roots of a hollow tree, so too it is the same with the roots of a trunk, the roots of leaves, and the roots of fruit.

A horse was standing and grazing on grass, and a monk took a bundle of grass and held it up in front of the horse, and the horse followed along behind him. Then that monk, thinking, "I shall steal it in this way," moved his body aside, and then remorse arose in him. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat, but it becomes a grave offense."

A monk was traveling together with many merchant travelers, and they went down into a ravine in Kosala, passing through a road beset with danger. The merchants, riding on horseback, said to the venerable one: "This road is dangerous — mount a horse and pass through quickly." The monks mounted horses, and thinking, "We shall steal in this manner," they moved their bodies. Remorse then arose in those monks. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat, but it becomes a grave offense."

A monk who was crossing over on a boat laden with jewels thought, "I shall steal in this manner," and moved his body. Remorse then arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat, but it becomes a grave offense."

A merchant's boat laden with jewels sank in the water. He was in distress, and a box of jewels was carried away by the current. Some monks who were washing below in the water saw the box of jewels and retrieved it. The merchant saw this and said: "Venerable ones, this box of jewels is mine." They replied: "We found it, carried here by the current." He said: "Venerable ones, my boat laden with jewels sank in the water, and I was thrown into distress, and this small box of jewels was carried away by the current. This box of jewels is mine." They answered: "If it is yours, then take it." Remorse then arose in those monks. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense."

A resident monk, with a mind of theft, transferred the property of the Saṅgha of the four quarters from place to place. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat, but it becomes a grave offense."

Some thieves led a cow up to a forest dwelling, tied it there, and departed. Some monks came to that place for their daytime sojourn, and seeing the cow, they took pity on it and let it go. Remorse then arose in them. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat, but it becomes a minor offense."

In brief:

A corpse, a golden garland,
a finger, and two kinds of rat,
three wild animals, and two empty vessels,
a pestle, a bird, and a bird's nest.

At Śrāvastī, some people petitioned others regarding a corpse, and a certain householder, having requested something, had his request fulfilled. He then laid out for the other a piece of white cloth as a covering. A monk named Nāgapīta went there and took that cloth. The monks said to him: "A root defeat has come upon you. For what thing? Because you took without permission the cloth belonging to the corpse." Remorse arose in him. The Blessed One declared:

There is no root defeat. It becomes a grave offense.

At Vaiśālī, a corpse had been adorned with a golden garland and was being kept under guard. A monk by the name of Nāgapīta Gāvaya heard of this and went there. He struck the corpse, and the corpse spoke. Because he was brave and capable, he seized the golden garland and made off with it. When the monks heard of this, it too was reported in the same way at length.

A number of women had left their clothes and ornaments on the bank of the river Vaggumudā and were bathing. A monkey came down from a tree, took the ornaments, and climbed back up into the tree. The women came out of the water, divided the clothes among themselves, and were told to each take their own ornaments. When one woman's pearl necklace was nowhere to be found, she wept at not having found it. Thereupon the monkey dropped that pearl necklace back down in that very spot. Some monks who were walking nearby saw the pearl necklace, picked it up, and gave it to the women. The women said, "You have stolen this pearl necklace." The monks replied, "We did not steal it. While you were bathing, a monkey came down from a tree, took this pearl necklace, and climbed back up. When you searched and could not find it and wept, it came back down and placed it in that very spot." Remorse arose in the monks. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense.

A monk dismantled a nest in a window frame and took the eggs, whereupon the window frame made a sound. It too was then reported in the same way at length.

A number of monks were staying in a temple when some rats came out of their holes, stole valuables and food, and returned to their holes. The monks thought to themselves, "Who is it that is stealing from us?" They had gone out on alms rounds and were sitting out at midday, when a rat again emerged from its hole, carried off food, and returned to its hole in the same manner. The monks then thought, "This is the one that has been stealing from us." They caught it and showed it to the other monks, saying, "This is the one that has been stealing from us." Those other monks said, "A root defeat has come upon you, for you seized without permission, on account of the rat." Remorse arose in them. The Blessed One declared: There is no offense. Whatever belongs to the monks, that may be reclaimed. Whatever belongs to the rat, that must not be taken.

A rat brought provisions and food and placed them under the sleeping mat of a certain monk. The next morning, that monk first cleaned his teeth and washed his face, then performed the collection of alms and ate what had been placed there. When he had eaten, the other monks said to him, "Venerable one, though you always wash your hands and feet well, you do not enter the village for alms rounds. Why is that?" He replied, "A rat brought provisions and food, placed them under my sleeping mat, and I performed the collection and ate them in the morning." They said, "Venerable one, a root defeat has come upon you, for you took without permission the provisions and food belonging to the rat." When the monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: That monk in a former life was the rat's father. Because of the paternal love the rat bears him, it brought food and gave it to the monk. There is no offense.

A wild deer, having been chased by hunters, came into the monastery. The hunters said, "Our deer has been chased and gone into the monastery — give it back." When the monks did not hand it over at that point, they let it go and departed. The monks then felt remorse, and the Blessed One declared: There is no offense. The case of a deer struck by a hunter's arrow is to be elaborated in the same way.

A hunter struck a deer with a poisoned arrow, and the deer came into the monastery. The hunters said, "Our deer has been shot with a poisoned arrow and will certainly die — give it back." The monks did not return it, and the hunters let the matter go and left. After they had gone, the deer passed away in due course. The monks did not know what to do, and the Blessed One declared: Give it back to those hunters. If a monk cuts the throat of a deer in order to harm it, it becomes a grave offense. If it is done out of compassion, it becomes a minor offense. Likewise, if a monk cuts the wing of a bird in order to harm it, it becomes a grave offense. If it is done with compassionate intent, it becomes a minor offense. A bird's nest is likewise the same.

In brief: a cloth merchant, a market trader, a triangular cake and thick soup, a bag, goods and robes.

A monk took a piece of cloth from a cloth-selling tanner and carried it off. The cloth merchant saw this and said, "You have stolen the cloth." The monk replied, "I took it openly and am bringing it." The monk felt remorse, and the Blessed One declared: There is no root defeat; it becomes a grave offense.

A monk borrowed a great quantity of goods on credit from a market trader. Before he repaid the debt, the monk thought, "I will not give this back to him." Remorse then arose, and the Blessed One declared: There is no root defeat; it becomes a grave offense.

There was a sick monk who entrusted another monk with a triangular cake and thick soup, thinking, "Let him offer it to the Saṅgha and let me also eat some." He told his attendants, "Prepare a triangular cake and thick soup — offer it to the Saṅgha, and I too will eat." He gave payment for this, and the attendants thought, "Why do we need to give this monk alone a triangular cake and thick soup? Let us give it to him alone and divide the payment among ourselves." So they gave him the triangular cake and thick soup and divided the payment, and remorse arose among the monks. The Blessed One declared: There is no root defeat; it becomes a grave offense.

There was a sick monk who had a great many provisions. He thought, "When I die, these will be divided among the Saṅgha." He told his attendants, "Venerable ones, prepare a small pea-broth for me." They prepared a small pea-broth and gave it to him. While the attendants were busy, he mixed the provisions into the pea-broth and drank it. Because the food was heavy, he passed away in due time, and the monks gathered and carried him to the charnel ground. After leaving him there, they told the attendants, "Bring a large share of that monk's provisions to be distributed." When the monks searched, they could not find them; they rose from their seats and departed. The monk had been disemboweled by a predatory animal, and his entrails had been dragged out. As the entrails were drawn out, the provisions came spilling out onto the ground and were found lying there.

A monk who had gone to the charnel ground to inspect a corpse found the provisions there, took them, and offered them to the Saṅgha. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared, "There is no offense."

There was a sick monk who had many material goods. He said to his attendants, "Venerable ones, summon the monks. I will give to the Saṅgha, I will give to the stūpa, I will give to individuals." But the attendants thought, "If it is given to the Saṅgha and the stūpa, we ourselves will receive nothing at all." So they did not call the monks. That monk then passed away, and remorse arose in those attendants. The Blessed One declared, "There is no offense for the attendants. However, attendants should not act contrary to the wishes of the sick. Whatever the sick person directs, that is what they should carry out. Even if the account is set down in a different way, let it be done just as the sick person instructs."

There was another sick monk who had many alms bowls and robes. He said to his attendants, "Summon the monks. I will give to the stūpa, I will give to the Saṅgha, I will give to individuals." That case too should be related in full in the same way.

In brief, the following summary verse applies:

Candalaka, Sodaya,
Sphyarma and Branyaba, Sushima and Zangzhyin, who took an alms bowl thinking it their own;
Ajita and Śaśigupta who stole their own robes.

This summary verse is as it appears in the detailed analysis of the sūtra.

In brief, the following verse applies:

Two nuns with two things, and Maudgalyāyana, and two more besides;
the two of Pilindavatsa, and Nandaka, and the Abandoner.

For the two nuns and the two things, it is as in the Vinaya.

Some merchants from Śrāvastī boarded a great ship and set sail across the ocean. While they were out on the open sea, a great nāga seized the ship and, though the divine servants pleaded, would not release it. At that time there was a lay practitioner from a village near the elder Mahāmaudgalyāyana who thought, "If the noble Mahāmaudgalyāyana were to direct his attention here, may it be auspicious." The elder, too, turned his attention to the matter, and entered into meditative absorption of such a kind that, through his absorption, he became the king of birds, Garuḍa, alighting on the prow of the ship. The nāgas were terrified, released the great ship, and the merchants sailed safely back to Śrāvastī. All proclaimed, "This was the power of the noble Maudgalyāyana." The monks asked what had happened, and he related it in full. Then those monks declared that a root defeat offense had arisen for the elder Mahāmaudgalyāyana on account of the property, saying that the nāga had seized the ship and he had caused it to be released without having been given it. Remorse arose in that monk, and the Blessed One declared, "Maudgalyāyana, with what intention did you release it?" He replied, "I had in mind the manifestation of a miraculous display." The Blessed One then declared, "For Maudgalyāyana's releasing it through miraculous power, there is no offense."

Some merchants from Śrāvastī had taken their goods and set out traveling through a region, and they entered a narrow defile. Many of those travelers were surrounded by bandits, and though they prayed to the gods, the gods did not release them. Among them was a merchant from the village near the elder Maudgalyāyana, who thought, "If the elder were to direct his attention here, may it be auspicious."

The elder too, directing his attention there, entered into meditative equipoise of such a kind that the bandits found themselves surrounded by a fourfold army. Terrified, the bandits released the many travelers and fled, and the merchants went safely and auspiciously to Śrāvastī. The merchants told the monks in full what had happened, just as before. The two sons of Pilindavatsa are as described at length in the Vinaya.

Ānanda, son of the Śākyas, during the final month of the summer rains retreat, was moving about and staying in the monastery asking how many monks had entered the rains retreat in such and such a place, and how much gain the Saṅgha had obtained there. When he arrived at whichever residence those monks came from, they greeted him with pleasant words and asked, "Are you well?" and, having been seated, said, "Venerable one, take whatever Saṅgha gains are here; divide them and take my share of the robe cloth." The monks brought the robes, set them before him, and after he had divided them he took the portion of robe cloth belonging to the elder of the Saṅgha of that residence and rose to leave. The elder said to him, "Venerable one, stay yet a while longer." Ānanda, being eloquent and gifted in various pleasing speech, confident in right reasoning and in liberation, taught Dharma in such a way as to inspire faith in the elder. The elder then said, "Venerable Ānanda, please accept whatever is my share of the robe cloth." Likewise the second elder, the third elder, and many among those monks gave him their robes. Carrying all those robes in a bundle, he entered the Jeta Grove.

The monks asked the venerable Ānanda, "Venerable one, where did you obtain all these robes?" and he recounted to them at length what had occurred. Although such events had transpired, the Blessed One, the Buddha, had not yet laid down a rule of training. The two concerning entering the rains retreat late are as they appear at length in the Vinaya.

A monk must not take another's rains-retreat robe allocation. Whoever takes it commits a transgression.

There was one called the Abandoner, a companion of the venerable Ānanda, who was a person of moral discipline. He used to visit the village of another householder, and that householder had two sons. That householder fell ill, and the Abandoner went to inquire after his illness. The householder gave him wealth. One of the two sons received nothing and, harboring resentment toward the venerable Ānanda, the venerable Ānanda had the Abandoner penalized. Now, since the Abandoner had previously gone forth from among students, he rallied about five hundred of those students and said, "Ask my preceptor to forgive me." They replied, "How should we ask your preceptor to forgive you? Take the boys and bring them to the preceptor. He will teach you all the Dharma. When the teaching of Dharma is finished, then abandon the boys and girls and leave. When they weep, take those boys and girls and go, saying such and such to him. And then say to him, 'And will you forgive the Abandoner as well?'" They did just as they had been instructed. When the teaching of Dharma was finished, the boys and girls were abandoned and departed, and they wept bitterly. The venerable Ānanda said, "Bring these boys and girls here — why have they been sent away?" They replied, "Will you also forgive the Abandoner?" He said, "He is forgiven. Let him confess his transgression." In brief:

The pig, the sugarcane stalk, and Nāgapriya's Dharma robe — a half-measure of butter and aloe wood — the pig, the sugarcane stalk, and Nāgapriya's Dharma robe, being the fifth — all of these are to be understood in their full detail as they appear in the Vinaya.

There was a monk of great merit who was well known among merchants. Another merchant said to him, "Whatever you need or require, I will provide it for you." The monk's attendant thought to himself, "If that merchant keeps offering things again and again, will he do so wholeheartedly, or is he just offering it out of politeness?" Thinking this, he went to the merchant and said, "The preceptor needs some butter." The merchant gave a half-measure of butter, and then said, "Also, venerable one, whatever you need — lentil broth, or meat broth — take it from here." The attendant said, "Very well," and the monk poured a little of that butter into the monk's lentil broth and meat broth.

After some time the merchant sent word to the monk, saying, "Noble one, I sent you the butter before. If you still need lentil broth, or meat broth, or whatever else is needed, please take those things." The monk asked the attendant, "Did you receive butter from this merchant?" and the attendant replied, "I did." The monk said, "Then a pāṛājika offence has occurred." The attendant said, "It was because the merchant kept offering things again and again that I took it and tested whether he was sincere, and then I gave it to the preceptor." The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared, "There is no offence. He went asking for such and such. Go."

In brief:

Sukhavat and a perception,
two wives and five wrongdoers, ten cases of remaining in the womb, and ten more involving non-monks and others.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Vṛjī, in a place among the trees of the plain. Because no rule of training had yet been laid down for the monks on the bank of the river Sukhāvatī, those who were first offenders were without fault. The monks then felt doubt, uncertainty, and remorse, thinking, "We told many monks they would die, without any rule of training yet having been established — what then counts as a first offence for us?" The Blessed One declared, "For the monks who were dwelling beside the Sukhāvatī river when no rule had yet been established, everything — past as well as present — is entirely a first offence, and for a first offender there is no fault."

A monk perceived a human being as not human and deprived him of his life. That monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared, "If one perceives a human as not human, a grave offence is incurred. If one perceives a non-human as not human, a grave offence is incurred. If one is uncertain about whether something is non-human, a grave offence is incurred."

A monk had long been tormented by illness, and thinking to himself, "What is the point of this for me?" he went to a friend and said, "Give me a knife." The friend said, "What do you need a knife for? Here, take it for now," and gave it to him. The monk entered his cell, shut the door, fastened the latch, sat cross-legged, and cut his own throat. He passed away still holding the knife. After two or three days another monk thought, "That monk took the knife and went away — let me go and check on him." He went to the monk's cell and found him seated cross-legged, his throat cut, dead, still holding the knife. That monk felt remorse. Whatever had happened — everything that had passed away at that time had arisen through what had been set in motion —

He thought, "If I had not given him the knife, he would not have been separated from his life." The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression. From now on, give knives to the sick without hesitation, as the occasion demands."

A monk had gone near another village and entered that village. The woman of that household said to the venerable one, "Come here — he has been behaving unchastely." The monk replied, "Your husband is fierce and hard to restrain." The woman said, "I will do whatever it takes to prevent the venerable one from being restrained by his fierceness," and she gave him poison. That householder passed away from this life. A day later the monk went to that house, and the woman said again, "Come here, venerable one — he has been behaving unchastely." He replied, "Sister, do not say such things. I am one who lives in chastity." She said, "Were you truly living in chastity at the very time when, by my doing, your husband was separated from his life?" He replied, "Did I say to you, 'Separate your husband from his life'? Did I not say, 'Your husband is fierce and hard to restrain'? I said that your husband is fierce and hard to restrain — I did not say, 'Separate your husband from his life.'" Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression." That a monk went near another village, entered it, and acted — "Your husband is ill" — the full account is as found in the Vinaya.

A monk intended to kill, and having beaten someone: if that person passes away, it is a defeat. If that person does not pass away, it is a grave offense. A monk, through negligence, crushed a being in the womb and the being in the womb died — it is a defeat. If it did not die, it is a grave offense. If both died, it is a defeat. If both did not die, it is a grave offense. If a living human in the womb is extracted, it is a grave offense. If a being of the animal realm in the womb is extracted, it is likewise a grave offense. If a nun did the same, it is the same in like manner.

Thus is the noble Vinaya text, the twenty-fourth fascicle.

In brief: the five kinds of fierce drink, fresh actions, stones, the horns of an ox, the vixen, the seat, and the one who has become mad.

A monk administered a fierce drink to the Saṅgha, and many monks thereupon passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression."

Two monk friends were staying together; one fell ill and lay down. He said to his attendant in illness: "If you, venerable one, could find a fierce drink, I would be well." The full account is as it appears in the Vinaya.

A brahmin was tormented by an ailment of convulsions and went to a monk, saying: "Venerable one, if I could find a fierce drink, I would be well." The monk replied, "You are a brahmin of wrong views — what need do you have of a fierce drink?" The venerable one continued: "In the past, when I was struck by illness, I drank a fierce drink and became well." That monk poured out a fierce drink for him, and he passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression."

A monk went to a charnel ground to examine a human corpse. There a man was sitting having driven in a sharpened stake. He said to the monk: "Venerable one, if you pour me a fierce drink, I will be well." That monk poured out a fierce drink for him, and he passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk.

The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression." A certain nun poured a fierce drink for five hundred thieves, and they too passed away from this life. The details are as they appear in the Vinaya at length.

In a place called the New Hermitage, a plank was being laid for a building, and a fragment fell from a monk's hand onto a worker below, who passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression. Be heedful and work with a helper."

In a hermitage, while the Saṅgha was building a structure for a building, a monk on an unguarded surface let a brick slip from his hand for placing, and it fell onto a plasterer working below, who passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression. Be heedful and work with a helper."

In a hermitage, while building a structure for shade, when monks were hauling a beam up, there were too few monks for such a heavy and weighty load, and they let it go; it fell onto a carpenter who was setting timber below, and he passed away from this life. Remorse arose in those monks. The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression. Do not let a small number lift a heavy load." The same applies likewise to raising ladders.

In a hermitage, while building a structure for shade, a monk was lifting wet clay up inside a scaffold, when the rope was poor and snapped, and the clay in its scaffold fell onto a mason working below, and he passed away from this life. Remorse arose in those monks. The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression. Be heedful and work with a helper."

The Blessed One was dwelling at Rājagṛha. A monk was sitting cross-legged at the foot of a mountain, and another monk rolled a boulder from the mountain's peak, which fell upon that monk, who passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "Understand this thoroughly, be heedful, and roll boulders with care."

A monk entered among cattle. An untamed bull struck him and he fell upon a boy, and the boy passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "Be heedful when entering among cattle."

A monk had become bent over from prolonged illness, and he thought to himself: "What is the point of my living on like this? Let me jump from a precipice myself." He leapt from a precipice, and there was a vixen below eating a human corpse; the monk fell upon her, and that vixen passed away from this life. The monk himself was straightened. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no transgression. Do not in that way bring harm upon your body."

A sick monk was sitting on his seat, and his attendant said to him: "Venerable one, please rise." The monk replied: "Do not rouse me; I will come when ready." Still the attendant kept saying: "Venerable one, please rise." When the monk rose, he passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no root downfall. However, a grave offense is incurred."

A monk struck a madman with the intent to kill. If he passes away from this life, it is a root downfall. If he does not pass away, it is a grave offense.

In summary:

Many things and what was not requested, presumptuous sight and improper food, medicine and fine provisions, conduct — there is no transgression; apply these likewise to others.

A monk had been afflicted by a long illness, and his attendant, grown weary, said to him: "You will soon die anyway, so I will no longer nurse you." Because the attendant ceased nursing him, the monk passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk's attendant. The Blessed One declared: "There is no root downfall. However, a grave offense is incurred."

A monk said to a sick man's attendant: "Do not nurse him — when he dies, there will be a great deal of property from the Saṅgha's distribution." The attendant then ceased nursing the sick monk, and that monk passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk's attendant. The Blessed One declared: "There is no root downfall. However, a grave offense is incurred."

A monk was lying ill and not yet digesting his food. His attendant said: "Venerable one, please lie down straight." The monk said to the attendant: "I am going to die — do not straighten me." The attendant then said again: "Venerable one, please lie straight," and straightened him. The monk passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk's attendant. The Blessed One declared: "There is no root downfall. However, a grave offense is incurred."

If a monk squeezes an unripe boil and the person passes away from this life as a result, a grave offense is incurred. If the boil is ripe when he squeezes it, there is no offense.

If a nun squeezes an unripe boil and the person passes away from this life as a result, a grave offense is incurred. If the boil is ripe when she squeezes it, there is no offense.

A monk was ill and suitable food for him could not be found. His attendant gave him unsuitable food and said: "Venerable one, eat whatever there is." The monk ate it and passed away from this life. A grave offense is incurred. If suitable food had been given and the monk passed away from it, there is no offense.

If a monk who is ill cannot obtain medicine suitable for him, the same applies to his attendant as well.

A sick monk said to his attendant: "Venerable one, attendant — bring me out of my room, wash me, dry me, bring me back inside, and let me sit." The attendant brought him out, and also let him sit and lie down. If the monk then passed away from this life, there is no offense for anyone.

In summary:

Striking with a stick, a thunder-bolt, or water,
two wilderness places, sleeping on a high bed, anger, and striking the palms together.

A monk was sitting when someone nearby fainted. A monk struck that person to rouse him, and that person passed away from this life. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense. At that time, a wind known as 'sword-like' had arisen in that person."

Furthermore, cases in which someone is struck by lightning and passes away from this life, and cases in which someone is struck by water and passes away from this life — all these are likewise to be explained in full. The seventeen groups are also to be analyzed in detail, just as they appear in the Vibhāṅga.

Another householder, newly faithful, offered the Saṅgha fresh seasonal grain and fresh seasonal fruit of various kinds, and afterward ate some himself. Another monk living in a forest hermitage went to that householder's house. The householder thought: "From now on, instead of offering to the Saṅgha, I will offer to this forest monk," and gave accordingly. Those monks then told that householder: "Previously, when you offered fresh seasonal grain and fresh seasonal fruit to the Saṅgha and then ate afterward yourself, that was given by you — yet now a forest monk came to your house and you have been turned away from giving. Go, and call that monk here." The others then called out, and that forest monk told the householder about the fresh seasonal grain and fresh seasonal fruit — that those fresh seasonal grain and fresh seasonal fruit had been offered first to the Saṅgha and that one ate afterward — "You went to that householder's house and caused him to be turned away." The forest monk replied, "Reverend ones, I did not turn him away. I did not instruct him to do so." The monks then said, "This cannot be settled by words here; bring him and let him be taken to court." They took him to court, and at that point his time had passed. The monks were seized with remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat; however, a grave offense is incurred."

Another householder, who had been in the custom of offering robes to the monks of the Saṅgha during their rains retreat, had a forest monk come to his house. The householder thought: "From now on, rather than offering to the Saṅgha, I will offer to this forest monk," and gave accordingly. The monks then thought: "That householder, who used to offer robes to the monks of the Saṅgha during their rains retreat, has now stopped offering because a forest monk went there and turned him away." They went and called that monk, and when they had called him, they asked the forest monk: "Has that householder, who previously offered robes to the monks of the Saṅgha during their rains retreat, now stopped offering because you went to his house and turned him away?" He replied, "Reverend ones, I did not turn him away. I did not instruct him to do so." The monks then said, "This cannot be settled by words here; bring him and press him as far as the door panel." They pressed him as far as the door panel, and at that point his time had passed. Those monks were seized with remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat; however, a grave offense is incurred."

A monk who was practicing almsround was standing near a house with a closed door, leaning a bed-post against it, when his monastic robe's hem flipped outward and fell upon a child, and that child's time passed. That monk was seized with remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat. Be heedful and practice the almsround."

A brahmin, having performed auspicious rites and taken omens early in the morning, was sitting inside his house. A monk who came to that house on almsround — the brahmin grew angry and pushed him away, and that monk fell upon a child, and the child died. That monk was seized with remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense."

A monk who was striking ashes with a mantra and smearing them with his hand sneezed a handful of ash, and at that point someone's time passed. Those monks were seized with remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense; be heedful and sneeze."

A monk who had been hiccupping reached the point of near death, and another monk pressed a fist against him, causing blood to come along with the hiccup — and that monk's time passed. That monk was seized with remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offense of defeat. Take every care to press in such a way that the hiccup is relieved while no passing of time occurs."

In brief:

A second seat and a second pair of parents, and likewise a second act of throwing, comparable cases with monkeys, and threatening thieves — these are set out.

The case of the venerable one who sat on a seat without checking it for black insects is to be understood in full as it appears in the Vinaya. The case of Bhikṣuṇī Gālinī is to be applied in the same manner. The case of a monk who offered on the road and at whose point time passed is likewise to be understood as it appears in the Vinaya.

Two senior monks — a father and a son who had gone forth — went together to the Jeta Grove, and they reached the monastery village.

The father said to the son, "Inside here, leopards are likely to cause fright — stay within the enclosure." The son replied, "You are elderly. If you stay together with the laypeople, what difference is there between them and us?" The father said, "Son, keep the fire-watch; I will sleep." Then the elderly man lay down, and the monk too lay down. The elderly man snored, and at the sound of this, a leopard came. The leopard seized him by the head, and he cried out. Startled by the cry, the leopard released him and fled. The monk took a lamp and examined the situation, and saw that the time had passed. He thought: "Even though he said to stay inside, I did not heed his words, and so whatever has come to pass that is beyond the time — all of it is my fault." The monk fell into remorse, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offence. Keep the fire-watch."

A monk who sent another monk, with intent to kill, to a place of danger: if the other monk's time passed as a result, this constitutes a root downfall. If the time did not pass, it constitutes a grave offence.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Vaiśālī, and some monks went into a great forest by day to walk about. One of them killed a monkey there, and another monk said to him, "A root downfall has occurred for you. On what grounds? What difference is there between being deprived of a human livelihood and this one who resembles a human?" The monk fell into remorse, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no root downfall. It does entail a downfall."

The case of threatening a thief is to be understood in full as it appears in the Vinaya.

In brief:

The case of Mgo-Idan, the physician of old,
the one who was obstructed and died,
the residence at Vaiśālī, the cutting of a life-cord, and the one who fled.

At Śrāvastī, a certain householder's wife gave birth to a boy child who grew up. Because a crowd burned his scalp as a treatment for scabies, his name was given as Mgo-Idan, "the Head-marked one." In time he went forth from home life, and once, having entered a village for some purpose, another householder's wife arrived, leading a boy child, following just behind him while looking about to left and right. A ram came and butted her, and the monk, walking with his head bowed down, also became aware that he had been struck against her, and as the ram butted him from behind, the monk fell on top of the boy child, and the boy's time passed. The monk fell into remorse, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offence. Henceforth, monks, do not walk in such a manner — look ahead as far as a yoke-length."

Another monk who had formerly been a physician came to a sick monk and said to him, "You should get a bloodletting." He then inserted a needle into him, and when he drew the needle back out, the monk's time passed. The monk fell into remorse, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offence. Henceforth, monks, do not practice medicine without training."

Another sick monk, whose illness was not getting better, thought: "I am alive and lingering on — I may as well die by whatever means." He said to his nursing attendant, "Venerable one, give me a cord." The attendant gave it to him, he tied it around his throat, and his time passed. The monk who had given the cord fell into remorse, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offence. Henceforth, monks, do not give a cord to a sick patient indiscriminately."

While a monk was on his alms round in the city of Vaiśālī, some residents who were carrying bows and arrows approached him, and the monk said, "Good sirs, rather than kill me, let fly at that one there!" They shot an arrow and killed that other person on the spot. The monk fell into remorse, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offence. Henceforth, monks, do not give such instructions."

Another sick monk, in the manner already described in detail, took a rope and went into a great forest. There he climbed a tree, tied the rope to a branch, put his neck through the noose, and leapt from the tree. The rope snapped, and beneath him lay a dog that had just given birth; the monk fell on top of it, and the dog together with her pups passed away. The monks who heard of this reported it in full to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "The former monk incurs an offence; the latter incurs no offence. Monks, do not strive for death by such bodily means. If one does so, a grave offence is incurred."

Another monk needed to go to a village on some business. He led along a monk who had recently recovered from illness and had not yet regained his strength. On the road, they were alarmed by a robber, and the first monk said to the other, "Venerable one, run ahead!" The other replied, "I cannot." The monk then said, "Come here then — hold on to me," and led him along in that way, bringing him toward the village, but that monk passed away. The first monk thought: "Had I not led him, he would not have died." Remorse arose in him, and the Blessed One declared: "There is no offence. Henceforth, monks, do not take a patient who is as frail as that out on the road."

In summary, the following topics have been covered in verse:

Telling one with a pleasant feeling to seek death, an arhat, a brahmin, a lord among the senses,
robes and alms round, and the two forms of going to the village.

The Blessed One, the Buddha (Skt. buddha), was dwelling in the forest grove of the village of Brjī's Light. As no rule of training had yet been laid down for the monks dwelling on the bank of the Suvastu river, they were all first offenders and thus incurred no offence. When, although no rule of training had been laid down, a superhuman quality was claimed in the presence of many people from various clans, doubt arose among them: "Who among us would be a first offender?" Scruple and remorse arose. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, when no rule of training has been laid down, all the monks — including those of the past — who dwelt on the bank of the Suvastu river were first offenders. Therefore, no offence is incurred by first offenders."

A monk, perceiving a person as non-human, claimed to that person a superhuman quality that did not exist. Remorse arose in that monk, and the Blessed One declared: "If one perceives a human as a human and makes such a claim, it constitutes a root defeat. If one has doubt as to whether the other is non-human, a grave offence is incurred. If one perceives a non-human as a human, a grave offence is incurred."

A monk claimed a non-existent superhuman quality to a householder. The householder was distracted and simply said, "Whatever you say, Venerable One." Remorse arose in the monk, and the Blessed One declared: "It does not constitute a root defeat, but a grave offence is incurred."

A householder said to a monk, "Venerable One, as you are an arhat, you are worthy of the finest robes, alms food, lodging, medicines for illness, and requisites." Since the monk said nothing and thereby accepted this, a grave offence is incurred.

If a householder asks a monk, "Are you possessed of the blameless, brahma-like Dharma?" and the monk says nothing and thereby accepts this, a grave offence is incurred.

If a householder says, "Venerable One, if you are an arhat, please accept my alms," and the monk says nothing and thereby accepts this, a grave offence is incurred.

A monk intending to go on alms round in a nearby village puts on his lower robe in the early morning and goes to the village. A householder says to him, "Venerable One, if you are an arhat, please come inside," and the monk says nothing and enters — a grave offence is incurred. Likewise, if the householder says, "Please be seated, take your meal, express your rejoicing, and come again," and the monk says nothing and thereby accepts this, a grave offence is incurred.

A monk intending to go on alms round in another village puts on his lower robe in the early morning and goes to that village. A householder says, "Venerable One, if you are an arhat, please come inside the house." If the monk replies, "I am not in the slightest an arhat — but if you will permit it, I shall come in," there is no offence. If the householder then says, "Please be seated, take your meal and refreshments and the rest, and rejoice; please come again," and the monk replies, "I am not in the slightest an arhat — but if you permit it, I shall withdraw," there is no offence.

If a householder says to a monk, "Venerable One, your sense faculties are supremely restrained and well guarded," and the monk says nothing and thereby accepts this, a grave offence is incurred. But if the householder says, "Please come out again," and the monk says, "I am not in the slightest an arhat," and then comes out, there is no offence.

In brief, the two sūtra verses on the cases of the group of six, of supernormal knowledge, of the absence of a mass of fire, of voices not yet transcended, of gandharvas and asuras, of beating the pool and the outcry of Bā-la-ha, the two lower austerities practised continuously, the two who quarrelled and the child who came in peace, the beautiful one, and these two — all of these should be understood in detail.

In brief: the large curtain, the sky, anointing the head with both hands, the small chamber, intoxication from bathing, and what is improper in conduct and place — these too should be known.

The setting is at Śrāvastī. Before the training rule had been laid down, when there was as yet no offence for a first offender, the venerable Chaṅka thought to himself repeatedly, "The training rule has not yet been laid down," and while thinking this many times ejaculated semen. He then became uncertain, thinking, "Have I committed a first offence or not?" The Blessed One declared: "Before the training rule was laid down, Chaṅka and all cases like his count entirely as first offenders, and a first offender incurs no offence."

A monk who ejaculated semen by blowing upon himself, or practised in open space, or ejaculated into the sky, or touched his own member, or pressed it and experienced pleasure, or pressed it and emitted, or emitted while awake, or began and then emitted again — in all these cases a grave offence is incurred.

A monk who ejaculated semen by rubbing his thigh felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence."

A woman prostrated with both hands at a monk's two feet, and he thereupon ejaculated semen. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence."

The doe Mṛgāra's mother bowed at the feet of the monks. She prostrated her head at the feet of the venerable Nandika. He ejaculated semen, and it fell upon the head of the doe Mṛgāra's mother.

She went off to one side, placed both hands upon her head, and said: "Those who practice the holy life in the presence of the Blessed One practice it under great affliction. As for me, I have made a fine find indeed." And so she uttered words of self-congratulation. The venerable monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence."

A leaping monkey. A monk touched a monkey and ejaculated semen. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence."

A monk was working in a steam house and semen arose. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence."

A monk was walking from lodging to lodging, and semen arose. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence with respect to the Saṅgha's residue, yet a grave offence is incurred." It is the same when there is unwise attention.

In brief:

In five ways with a woman, and five ways with harm,
Five ways with taking hold, and six with a charnel ground dweller.

A monk's mother, sister, daughter, wife, and female friend drew close to him, and before long embraced him around the neck, whereupon semen arose. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence."

A monk rescued a woman from fire, from water, from a precipice, from a weapon, from a wild beast, from a non-human being, and semen arose. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence."

A woman seized a monk by the foot, or by the shin, or by the knee, or by the thigh, or by the toes, and semen arose. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "There is no offence."

When a monk ejaculated semen through discoloration, or through being bloated, or swollen, or reddened, or decayed, or when semen was drawn from a skeleton — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

In brief:

Through scratching, dragging, with the finger,
Through being chilled by water,
And through making it an internal vessel —
These are the twenty modes of conduct.

If a monk ejaculates semen through scratching, there is no offence. It is the same through dragging. But if that monk grasped his own member and semen arose, the Blessed One declared: "A grave offence is incurred."

A monk who was on his alms round encountered a young girl who was lying stretched out, and she said to the noble one: "Come here — do such-and-such to me," and he inserted his finger into her. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed

One declared: "A grave offence is incurred."

A monk who was bathing let his member rest in the current of water, and through the chill semen arose. The monk felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: "A grave offence is incurred."

If a monk ejaculates semen into his own head, or into his ear, or into his nose — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

If a monk ejaculates semen into his armpit, his back, his chest, his navel, or into his hair — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

If a monk ejaculates semen into his hand, his shoulder, or his upper arm — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

If a monk ejaculates semen into his waist, his shin, his foot, or his thighs — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

If a monk ejaculates semen into his palm, his sole of the foot, or — — or into his palms and similar places, in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

If a monk ejaculates semen onto a throne, a small seat, a wooden stool, or between seat cushions — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

If a monk ejaculates semen onto a pot, a small vessel, a ladle, or into the interior of a pot — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

If a monk ejaculates semen onto a stone, onto something cracked, into the interior of something cracked, onto a door-threshold, or onto soft flesh — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

In summary, the foregoing is set forth in verse:

Ejaculating with the perception of a woman — between the thighs and the shoulder, away from the hand and fingers;
grasping with the foot and so forth;
and embracing from a green or similar state onward.

When the Venerable Charka had not yet established a rule of training and thought, "I have come into full bodily contact with many women — what was my first such act?" — the Blessed One declared: Where no rule of training has yet been established, everything that occurred before Charka, including that occasion, is a first offence; and for one who commits a first offence there is no transgression.

A monk grasped a human woman with the perception that she was not human. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: If one perceives a human being as a human being, it is a Saṅgha residue offence. The fuller account is to be understood under four aspects.

If a monk pushes a woman with his foot, it is a minor offence. If a woman pushes a monk with her foot, there is no offence. If a monk pushes a woman with his shoulder, it is a minor offence. If a woman pushes a monk with her shoulder, there is no offence.

A monk embraced a woman around the neck. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no offence.

A woman grasped a monk with her fingers. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no offence.

A monk rescued a woman from fire, water, a precipice, weapons, wild beasts, and non-human beings. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no offence.

A woman grasped a monk with her foot, her arm, her knee, her thigh, or her fingers. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no offence.

If a monk embraces a woman's corpse that has turned blue-green around the neck, or one that is swollen, putrefied, turned red, scattered, or reduced to bones — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

In summary, this is set forth in verse:

Lifting a woman who has fallen and is rolling about;
meeting a woman in the dark;
a young woman calling out from a village — these are the fifth and thirteenth rules.

If a woman has fallen and is rolling about and a monk lifts her up, it is a minor offence. If a woman lifts a monk who has fallen and is rolling about, there is no offence.

An elderly monk went to look after a girl and sat down on her lap. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no offence.

A monk was sitting urinating at midnight. A woman came out from inside and in the darkness they met face to face; she knocked him down and fell on top of him. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no offence.

A monk entered a village for alms. A young girl was seated, calling out from the village. She said to the noble monk, "Come here — please do this and that for me." He approached her; she put alms in his bowl; then she smeared him with excrement and struck him — in all these cases a Saṅgha residue offence is incurred.

A monk was teaching the Dharma to a woman, and she offered him her seat-post, her thigh, her upper arm, her waist, her ribs, her back, her hand, her shoulder, and her head — all of these constitute a wrongdoing.

In brief, the verses run:

Charka's pleasure and his perception, the bee that receives what is vile, the sister engaged in bad conduct —
"I have seen it," and "before you,"
"that one," "this one," "that one pleases me" — these are the cases.

Where no rule of training had yet been laid down, the first offender incurs no offence. The venerable Charka thought to himself, "I have spoken words of indecency to quite a number of women — what is my status as a first offender?" and doubt arose in him. This is elaborated fully. When he reported what had happened to the monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: Where no rule of training has been laid down, one who has acted together with Charka and those like him is in every case a first offender, and a first offender incurs no offence.

A monk perceived a human woman as a non-human and spoke words of indecency to her. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: When one perceives a human as a human, it becomes a Saṅgha residue offence. The full details should be inquired into. If one speaks of it as a matter involving supernormal power and miraculous display, a grave offence is incurred. If one speaks of it as a matter not involving miraculous display, it becomes a Saṅgha residue offence.

A monk went to a woman and said, "Sister, please give me a silk ear-ornament." She replied, "Noble one, what silk ear-ornament can I give you? But I heard you, noble one — I had prepared a silk ear-ornament in advance." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

A monk was going around a village for alms when a woman approached him and said, "Noble one, do it like this," and then said, "A body of yours with such fortune as this accords with a donkey — do it like that, in that way." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no Saṅgha residue offence, but a grave offence is incurred.

A monk who was naturally given to speaking words of indecency spoke such words to a woman. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no Saṅgha residue offence, but a grave offence is incurred.

A nun rose early in the morning, bathed, applied eye-ointment, combed her hair, put on a worn-out old Dharma robe, and went to Śrāvastī. A monk who was out collecting alms saw her and said to her, "Sister, you mount upon men and conduct yourself accordingly." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

An elderly monk went in the manner of a girl — that is, he went about like one. She was a girl of loose conduct. He said to the girl, "Do not destroy two households like this." She replied, "If I cannot refrain, what am I to do?" He said, "If you cannot refrain, then have yourself cut apart with a sickle." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no Saṅgha residue offence, but a grave offence is incurred.

A monk was one who would go frequently to a nearby village. Early one morning he put on his lower robe and went to that village. There he said to the householder's wife, "Sister, give me some." She said, "Noble one, what shall I offer you?" He said, "Sister, give me that." She consented and said, "Noble one, I have prepared it in advance." He said —

When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred. "Sister, give me whatever pleases you." She said, "Noble one, what could please me?" He said, "Sister, give me whatever pleases you." She understood and said, "Noble one, I have prepared it in advance." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred. "Sister, give me whatever is before you." She said, "Venerable one, what is before me? What is before me, noble one?" He said, "Sister, give me whatever is before you." She understood and said, "Noble one, I have prepared it in advance." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

A monk was one who would go frequently to another nearby village. One early morning he put on his lower robe and outer robe, took his bowl, and went to that village. He said to the householder's wife, "Sister, give me whatever is pleasing to you." She said, "Noble one, what could be pleasing to me?" He said, "Sister, give me whatever is pleasing to you." She understood and said, "Noble one, I have prepared it in advance." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no Saṅgha residue offence, but a grave offence is incurred.

The same applies to the expression "whatever is pleasing."

A monk was one who would go frequently to another nearby village. One early morning he put on his lower robe, took his bowl, and went to that village. A householder said to his wife, "Give the monk whatever he wishes," and departed. That monk also, in the early morning, having put on his lower robe and outer robe and taken his bowl, went to that house. The woman said, "Noble one, the householder has instructed me to give the monk whatever he desires." He said, "Sister, I desire you yourself." She also understood and said, "Noble one, I have prepared it in advance." That monk, thinking, "Perhaps no Saṅgha residue offence has arisen for me," felt remorse. The Blessed One declared: There is no Saṅgha residue offence, but a grave offence is incurred.

A monk was one who would go frequently to another nearby village. One early morning he put on his lower robe and went to that village. He said to the householder's wife, "Sister, give me some water to drink." She said, "Venerable one, please wait while I draw water." He said, "Sister, you yourself are the water." She also understood and said, "Noble one, I have prepared it in advance." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred. "Sister, give me some food." She said, "Venerable one, please wait while I prepare it." He said, "Sister, you yourself are my food." She said, "Noble one, I have prepared it in advance." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred. "Sister, give me some porridge." She said, "Venerable one, please wait while I cook it." He said, "Sister, you yourself are my porridge." She said, "Noble one, I have prepared it in advance." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

A monk was one who would go frequently to another nearby village. One early morning he put on his lower robe and went to that village. He said to the householder's wife, "Sister, give me some food."

This is the twenty-fifth fascicle of the Noble Vinaya Text. In brief:

Things pleasing and delightful, water and food set out, porridge and things to eat — what was spoken is the same in each case.

"Noble one, wait here a moment. Sister, you yourself are my porridge." When she understood, she said, "Noble one, I will prepare it in advance." When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

If a monk were to speak lewd words to a woman and she did not understand, that virtuous woman asked, "What did the noble one say?" When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no Saṅgha remainder offence, but a grave offence is incurred.

In brief:

A doe's young and a messenger,
a name and three wives of nobles, two prostitutes and a woman,
a young man — these form a cluster.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove (Jetavana), in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada, at Śrāvastī. The rule not yet having been laid down, there is no offence for one who acts for the first time. The one who is like a doe's young — that dark-complexioned youth — thought to himself: the rule not yet having been laid down, if I were to speak lewdly to a considerable number of people, what would that make of my being one who acts for the first time? Doubt, suspicion, and remorse arose in his mind. He reported what had happened to the monks, and the Blessed One declared: Before the rule was laid down, that dark-complexioned youth who is like a doe's young, and all others together with him who transgressed, are ones who acted for the first time — and for one who acts for the first time there is no offence.

A monk was one who would go frequently to a nearby village in another district. He went to that village, and the householder said to him, "Noble one, would you be willing to carry a message to the woman called such-and-such, saying, 'Come here?'" He replied, "I can go, but I cannot bring back a reply." The householder said, "Well then, how shall it be known that the matter has been remembered and accomplished? I will station a monk at a place called such-and-such." He sent that monk to another house. When he saw that monk return, he said to him, "Venerable one, stay here for just a moment." That monk stayed there, and then the householder came back out and said to the monk, "Reverend one, excellent, excellent — the matter has been accomplished." The monk said, "What was the signal?" When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no offence.

A monk was one who would go frequently to a nearby village in another district. He went to that village, and the householder said to him, "Noble one, would you be willing to carry this message to the woman called such-and-such: 'Come here in this manner?'" He said, "I can," and went and delivered the message. That woman replied, "Reverend one, I do not wish it," and the matter was not accomplished. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: There is no Saṅgha remainder offence, but a grave offence is incurred.

A householder's wife had committed a slight fault, and he beat her with his fist and drove her away. Meanwhile, a monk was one who would go frequently to a nearby village in another district. He brought those two together, and those two were reconciled. When remorse arose in that monk, the Blessed One declared: If they were thrown together as though casting three stones, or clapped together like cymbals, and it was proclaimed that they were not husband and wife, then if one acts as a go-between in such a case a grave offence is incurred.

A monk was one who would go frequently to a nearby village in another district. He went to that village, and the householder said to him, "Noble one, would you be willing to carry a message to this woman called such-and-such, a prostitute, saying, 'Come here?'" He said, "I can," went there, and delivered the message to her.

She thought, "He cannot come to sleep on the far side; I shall sleep here," and with that thought she lay down. When dawn came, the purpose of those two had not been fulfilled.

Remorse arose in that monk, and the Blessed One declared: There is no offence entailing suspension for the Saṅgha, but a grave offence is incurred.

A monk was one who would go frequently to a nearby village in another district. He went to that village, and the householder said to him, "Noble one, would you be willing to carry this message to the woman called such-and-such, saying, 'Come here'?" He said, "I can," went there, and delivered the message to her. She was on her way there when another person intercepted and carried her off, and so the purpose of those two was not fulfilled.

Remorse arose in that monk, and the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

A monk was one who would go frequently to a nearby village in another district. He went to that village, and the householder said to him, "Noble one, would you be willing to carry this message to the woman called such-and-such?" He said, "I can," went, and delivered the message to her. She, however, adorned herself and dressed at once, but her husband arrived, and so the purpose of those two was not fulfilled.

Remorse arose in that monk, and the Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

Two householders were friends, and both their wives became pregnant. They agreed: "If you bear a daughter and I bear a son, give your daughter to my son; and if I bear a daughter and you bear a son, I will give my daughter to your son." In due course one of them bore a son and the other bore a daughter, but that householder passed away. When he had passed away the household affairs fell into decline, and that householder's family resolved not to give the girl in marriage. When the young man heard of this, there was a monk who would go frequently to a nearby village, and when he arrived in that village the young man said to him, "Noble one, would you be willing to carry this message to the girl called such-and-such: 'If your parents have not given you to me, and if you would come to me on your own, then I too, through the ripening of my karma, have fallen into hardship; yet even so, my resources may yet be found again — so for now do not send me away'?" He said, "I can," went, and delivered the message. The girl fled from her mother and father, went to him, and those two came together.

Remorse arose in that monk, and the Blessed One declared: There is no offence entailing suspension for the Saṅgha, but a grave offence is incurred.

A householder said to a woman, "Arrange an opportunity for me with her." She replied, "I am unable to do so." He said, "How shall I know when you are able? Tell that monk who goes frequently to the village: when you strike a fist against the householder's back, she should take note." When that monk came to the village, the woman said to him, "Noble one, would you be willing to strike a fist against the back of the householder called such-and-such?" He said, "I can," went, and struck a fist against that householder's back. Then the noble one said, "Excellent, excellent!" — and when asked, "What is this?" he replied, "It is a signal." Remorse arose in that monk, and the Blessed One declared: There is no offence entailing suspension for the Saṅgha, but a grave offence is incurred.

In brief:

The two who go to the nearby village, and two others of the Saṅgha as well,
the one in robes and the one who is sick,
the young woman — these make five cases.

A certain monk was one who went to a nearby village. He arrived at that village, and the woman said to him, "Noble one, would you be willing to carry a message to the householder called such-and-such, saying, 'Come here'?" He replied, "I can, if I may also arrange a meal for the Saṅgha." She provided the funds, the monk arranged the meal, summoned the householder, and the two of them met. Remorse arose in that monk, and the Blessed One declared: There is no offence entailing suspension for the Saṅgha, but a grave offence is incurred.

Likewise, the same applies in the case of the householder himself.

The wife of a householder was beautiful, attractive, and lovely. A certain great minister named Gzhongs Gyad desired her and sent many messages to her, yet the woman would not yield. Then the householder passed away. After he had passed away, the great minister said on account of some slight grievance: "Is there truly no means at all by which, even now, things might work out well for us without difficulty?" Someone said, "There is a way." The great minister went to her and sent many messages, but she would not yield, it is said. Then he was told, "Well then, dear girl, be willing. Through your efforts alone these people will come to be at ease." She asked him, "Then who shall be sent as a messenger?" and he said, "We have a monk who goes to the nearby village — let us send him as the messenger." That monk also went to that village, and the householder's wife said to him: "Noble one, would you be willing to carry this message to the great minister called such-and-such, offering him this house of mine, these goods of mine, and all these possessions of mine, and saying, 'Come here?'" He said, "I can," went, and conveyed the message to him. The two of them met, and remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

A certain householder's wife built a temple for the Saṅgha, and she was in the practice of offering robes and medicinal supplies to it. Then that householder's wife passed away. After she passed away, there was no one to continue offering robes and medicinal supplies to that temple. The monks went to the householder and said: "Householder, just as your wife established this temple, would you not also offer a little in the way of robes, supplies, and medicine for the sick?" He replied, "Venerable ones, that wife was a woman of great merit and great power. Whatever she said, everything was done because of her. But if the householder called such-and-such's wife would send meals to me, then perhaps I might still be inclined to give." The monks went to that householder's wife and said: "Householder's wife, are you able to send meals to the householder called such-and-such?" She replied, "Venerable ones, I am not able. Here in my own household there is much to be done; I am unable even for that, so what need is there to speak of sending to another?" They then urged the householder's wife to be willing, saying, "It will be an offering to the stūpa; it will be offered to the Saṅgha." Now the householder's wife was a person of faith, and she said, "I have faith," and agreed. The two of them met again and again, and they came together. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: There is no offence.

A certain householder built a monastery for the Saṅgha, and made offerings there of robes and medicines for the sick, rendering benefit in various ways. That householder then passed away. The fuller account follows in the same manner as before. His widow said, "If you send such-and-such works to be done for the householder so-and-so, then I will be able to continue making offerings in the same way." The fuller account follows. The Blessed One declared: There is no offence.

A monk was going to visit a nearby village in another district. Having arrived there, a householder said to him, "Venerable one, can you carry the message to the wife called such-and-such, telling her to come here?" The monk replied that he could, went and delivered the message. But that woman fell ill, and the householder too fell ill, and since both were struck down by illness, the matter was not accomplished. The Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

A monk was going to visit a nearby village in another district. Having arrived there, a woman said to him, "Venerable one, can you carry the message to the householder called such-and-such, telling him to come here?" He replied that he could, went there, and delivered the message. But that householder fell ill, and the woman too fell ill. Since both were struck down by illness, the matter was not accomplished. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

A monk was going to visit a nearby village in another district. In the morning he dressed in his robes and lower garment, took up his alms bowl, and went to that village. A householder there said to him, "Can you carry the message to the householder called such-and-such, asking him to give his daughter or sister in marriage to my son?" He replied that he could, went and delivered the message. But the boy had passed away, or the girl had become hunchbacked, or had gone mad, or had been given to another. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

A monk was going to visit a nearby village in another district. In the morning he dressed in his robes and lower garment and took up his alms bowl, and went to that village. The fuller account is to be given in the same way here too. Whether the boy fell ill or the girl fell ill, or became hunchbacked, or was given to another, in any of these cases the result is the same. Remorse arose in that monk. The Blessed One declared: A grave offence is incurred.

The Vinaya section on the Disciplinarian is concluded.

The sūtra collection of the Vinaya from a single rule upward, comprised under three doors: the first exposition and the second, and the third likewise — having striven to the last, this summary was definitively stated.

The summary of the first door of sūtras: the inexperienced one who was addressed, and the entangled one from whom an offence arose likewise; the learned one and the one who was instructed, and the one greatly learned who abandoned the Dharma.

The second: the abridged exposition, the one who disparaged, and the two who formed views from sifting; and likewise those four who denigrated; and the two of the restoration ceremony.

This is to say: by that single cause of being possessed of the vow, all offences are to be declared. This is to say: by that single cause of not being possessed of the vow, all offences are not to be declared. This is to say: by that single cause of not being possessed of the vow, all offences are not brought together into one. This is to say: by that single cause of being possessed of the vow, all offences are brought together into one.

Among all verbal wrongs, the single gravest is to slander a Tathāgata by attributing to him what does not exist. Among all physical wrongs, the single gravest is to draw blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent.

Among all wrongs, the single gravest is to divide the Saṅgha. Among all wrongs arising from a multitude, the single gravest is to side with one who is dividing the Saṅgha. Among all wrongs arising from slander, the single gravest is to cause a schism in the Saṅgha of the śrāvakas of a Tathāgata. Among all wrongs arising from persons, the single gravest is to falsely attribute what does not exist. Among all wrongs arising from taking life, the single gravest is to deprive a pratyekabuddha of his life. Among all wrongs arising from taking what is not given, the single gravest is to steal from what belongs to the Saṅgha of the śrāvakas of a Tathāgata. Among all wrongs arising from unchaste conduct, the single gravest is to engage in unchaste conduct with one who is both an arhat and a woman. Among all wrongs arising from false speech, the single gravest is to claim, in the absence of any such attainment, a superhuman quality before another person.

One kind of properly conducted restoration ceremony is this: one without a valid basis. One kind of properly conducted restoration ceremony is this: one with a valid basis. The first section is complete.

In brief: with one who is unskilled, act in three ways; and also, together with the remainder, three. With bodily action that is entirely complete, and with verbal action, do not cite scripture.

Transgressions are of two kinds: non-virtuous, and not cited in scripture. Non-virtuous transgressions are also of two kinds: those with a remainder, and those without remainder. Those not cited in scripture are also of two kinds: those with a remainder, and those without remainder. Transgressions too are of two kinds: those with a remainder, and those without remainder. Those with a remainder are of two kinds: non-virtuous, and not cited in scripture. Those without remainder are also of two kinds: non-virtuous, and not cited in scripture.

Transgressions are also of two kinds: those arising from body, and those arising from speech. Those arising from body are of two kinds: those with a remainder, and those without remainder. Furthermore, those arising from body are of two kinds: non-virtuous, and not cited in scripture. Furthermore, those arising from body are of two kinds: those that have an object, and those without an object. Those arising from speech are also of two kinds: those with a remainder, and those without remainder. Furthermore, those arising from speech are of two kinds: non-virtuous, and not cited in scripture. Furthermore, those arising from speech are of two kinds: those that have an object, and those without an object.

Transgressions are of two kinds: those cited in scripture, and those not cited in scripture. Transgressions are also of two kinds: those that are concealed, and those that are not concealed.

In brief:

What is fit to be confessed, and what has not been confessed and is to be raised again — having made a fivefold division, one speaks to an intimate who is pure.

Transgressions are of two kinds: those requiring confession, and those not requiring confession. Transgressions are also of two kinds: those that are fit to be set down, and those that are not fit to be set down. Transgressions are also of two kinds: permitted offences, and non-permitted offences. Transgressions are also of two kinds: those that can be raised again, and those that cannot be raised again. Transgressions are also of two kinds: those that cause division, and those that do not cause division. Those that cause division are of two kinds: those with a remainder, and those without remainder. Those that do not cause division are of two kinds: non-virtuous, and not cited in scripture. Furthermore, those that do not cause division are of two kinds: those with a remainder, and those without remainder.

Transgressions are also of two kinds: those that are grave, and those that are momentary. Transgressions are also of two kinds: those that are spoken, and those that are not spoken.

In brief:

Utterly entangled and without concealment — common and the sevenfold, the time of a buddha and the localities, extreme attachment and the directions.

Transgressions are of two kinds: those that are utterly entangled, and those that are not entangled. Those that lead to concealment, and those that do not lead to concealment. Those that are common, and those that are not common. Those common to nuns and those common to monks. Those common to monks and those common to probationary nuns. Those common to monks and those common to novice nuns. Those common to monks and those common to novice monks. Those common to monks and those common to male lay practitioners. Those common to monks and those common to female lay practitioners. Those at the time of a buddha, and those in an intermediate period. Those permitted by the locality, and those not permitted by the locality. Those with extreme attachment, and those without extreme attachment. Those on one side, and those on all sides.

In brief:

Departing from voluminous reading in other ways, weighty in ripening — likewise so;
the fourfold arousing of confession, and subsequent reliance on disclosure.

Those with karmic ripening, and those without karmic ripening. Those that may be raised again, and those that may not be raised again. Of those that may be raised again there are two: through confession, and through the giving of vows from the outset. Furthermore, those that may be raised again are of two kinds: imputed, and ultimate. Those that may not be raised again are of two kinds: not seen, and not amenable to settlement. Reliance is of two kinds: reliance on the Saṅgha, and reliance on an individual person. Confession is of two kinds: to the Saṅgha, and to an individual.

In brief:

The learned should be understood threefold:
those with conscience, of two kinds,
the challenger and what is declared in words, the steadfast and the petitioner.

Being skilled in recognizing when no transgression has occurred as no transgression, and being skilled in recognizing when a transgression has occurred. Furthermore, skill is of two kinds: being skilled in raising again a transgression that has occurred, and being skilled in purifying that which has not become a transgression. Conscience is of two kinds: those with carefulness, and those without carefulness. The two transgressions that arise for those who act as challengers: from the Saṅgha, and from an individual. The two transgressions arising from speech: what is declared in words, and what is explained. Furthermore, speech-arising transgressions are of two kinds: steady, and unsteady. Furthermore, speech-arising transgressions are of two kinds: those who make petition, and those who do not make petition.

In brief:

Appointed and bound by vows, having examined, listening, and being very attentive, fully knowing, conciliatory, discordant, abiding in one's nature, speaking with certainty, and wisdom.

Of those who preside over the Saṅgha, there are two: the appointed and the unappointed; those bound by vows and those not bound by vows; those who speak after having examined and those who speak without having examined; those who listen and those who proclaim; those who are attentive and those who are not attentive; those who know fully and those who do not know fully; those who are conciliatory and those who are not conciliatory; those who are discordant and those who are concordant; those who abide in their nature and those who do not abide in their nature; those who speak with certainty and those who speak without certainty; those with wisdom and those with faulty wisdom.

In brief:

Much learning and mastery of recitation,
complete and definite,
rendering service, having acted badly, knowing the Dharma — these are the seven.

Of those who preside over the Saṅgha, there are two: those with much learning and those with little learning; those who have mastered the recitation of scripture and those who have not mastered the recitation of scripture; those with complete scriptural transmission and those with incomplete scriptural transmission; those who are certain and those who are not certain; those who render service and those who do not render service; those who know the Dharma and those who do not know the Dharma; those who know the meaning and those who do not know the meaning; those who know the time and those who do not know the time; those who know measure and those who do not know measure; those who know themselves and those who do not know themselves;

those who do not know themselves; those who know the retinue and those who do not know the retinue; those who know noble persons and those who do not know noble persons; those who know noble persons and those who do not know noble persons.

In brief:

In Dharma and Vinaya, when one who has erred,
With surplus rules, with weighty matters too,
Speaks of what to practice, speaking boldly,
Bound yet heedless, one falls into wrongdoing.

There are two kinds of servants of the Saṅgha. The first kind: those who slander the Tathāgata and act in extreme transgression, who do not speak as has been taught, who do not speak in accordance with Dharma, who do not act in accordance with the Dharma that those who seek Dharma should follow — who declare what is not Dharma to be Dharma, and what is Dharma to be not Dharma. When challenged in response to what they have said, such persons become an object of censure among those who accord with Dharma.

The second kind of servants of the Saṅgha: those who do not slander the Tathāgata, who do not act in extreme transgression, who speak as has been taught, who act in accordance with Dharma, following the Dharma that those who seek Dharma should follow — who declare what is Dharma to be Dharma, and what is not Dharma to be not Dharma. When challenged in response to what they have said, such persons do not become an object of censure among those who accord with Dharma.

In the intermediate summary:

One who slanders, who is censured and at fault,
Blameworthy through childishness and sin,
Is rightly gathered in this middle summary.

A servant of the Saṅgha who declares what is not Dharma to be Dharma, and what is Dharma to be not Dharma — one possessed of these two qualities — is to be censured, condemned, expelled, abandoned, left without allies, made to shrink in shame, humbled, and caused to generate doubt, uncertainty, and remorse. They are to be pressed hard, struck to the vital point, and shown to be at fault.

A servant of the Saṅgha who declares what is Dharma to be Dharma, and what is not Dharma to be not Dharma — one possessed of these two qualities — is not to be censured, not to be condemned, not to be expelled, not to be abandoned, not to be left without allies, not to be made to shrink in shame, not to be humbled, and not to be caused to generate doubt, uncertainty, or remorse. They are not to be pressed hard, not to be struck to the vital point, and not to be shown to be at fault.

A servant of the Saṅgha who declares what is not Dharma to be Dharma, and what is Dharma to be not Dharma — one possessed of these two qualities — incurs a transgression. They are accompanied by doubt, accompanied by uncertainty, accompanied by remorse, accompanied by an obligation to be discharged, they are impure and unfit to be reinstated.

A servant of the Saṅgha who declares what is Dharma to be Dharma, and what is not Dharma to be not Dharma — one possessed of these two qualities — does not incur a transgression. They are not accompanied by doubt, not accompanied by uncertainty, not accompanied by remorse, not accompanied by an obligation to be discharged; they are pure and fit to be reinstated.

A servant of the Saṅgha who declares what is not Dharma to be Dharma, and what is Dharma to be not Dharma — one possessed of these two qualities — is accompanied by blame. They are accompanied by proximate blame, accompanied by harm, accompanied by subsequent torment, and accompanied by that which deserves to torment them.

A servant of the Saṅgha who declares what is Dharma to be Dharma, and what is not Dharma to be not Dharma — one possessed of these two qualities — is not accompanied by blame. They are not accompanied by proximate blame, not accompanied by harm, not accompanied by subsequent torment, and not accompanied by that which deserves to torment them.

A servant of the Saṅgha who declares what is not Dharma to be Dharma, and what is Dharma to be not Dharma — one possessed of these two qualities — is to be recognized as childish, foolish, unclear in understanding, unskilled, and not a noble person.

One who has not abandoned personal arrogance becomes accompanied by blame. Even in the slightest matter involving proximate blame, the wise will censure such a person; and demerit, immeasurable and uncountable, will increase without bound. Then, just as an arrow once released brings down its target, after the body falls in death, such a person falls downward into the lower realms, the evil destinies, the states of ruin, and is born in the hells. They are born in the lower realms, born in the evil destinies, born in the states of ruin. They go to the lower realms, they go to the evil destinies, they fall into the states of ruin. Again and again they are born in the lower realms, born in the evil destinies, born in the states of ruin. Wandering and tumbling about for a long, long time, they do not turn back from cyclic existence.

A servant of the Saṅgha who declares what is Dharma to be Dharma, and what is not Dharma to be not Dharma — one possessed of these two qualities — is to be recognized as wise, clear in understanding, keen in mind, possessed of discernment, and a true and noble person. By having abandoned personal arrogance, such a one is not accompanied by blame, not accompanied even in the slightest by proximate blame; the wise will praise them. Merit, immeasurable and uncountable, will increase without bound. Then, just as an arrow once released finds its mark, even when the body falls here, such a one goes to happiness, and is born in the world of the gods of the higher realms. They are not born in the lower realms, not born in the evil destinies, not born in the states of ruin. They do not go to the lower realms, they do not go to the evil destinies, they do not fall into the states of ruin. They do not come to be born in the lower realms, do not come to be born in the evil destinies, do not come to fall into the states of ruin. While dwelling within cyclic existence for a long time, they do not wander lost; they turn back from cyclic existence.

Just as Dharma and not-Dharma have been set forth in five categories, under both the dark side and the bright side, so too Vinaya and not-Vinaya are to be set forth in five categories under both the dark side and the bright side. Likewise, offenses with a remainder and offenses without a remainder are to be set forth in five categories under both the dark side and the bright side. Likewise, grave offenses and light offenses are to be set forth in five categories under both the dark side and the bright side. Likewise, what has been spoken and what has not been spoken are to be set forth in five categories under both the dark side and the bright side. Likewise, what has been established through resolution and what has not been so established are to be set forth in five categories under both the dark side and the bright side. Likewise, what has been determined and what has not been determined are to be set forth in five categories under both the dark side and the bright side. Likewise, what has been expelled and what has not been expelled are to be set forth in five categories under both the dark side and the bright side. Those who have deteriorated in moral discipline and those who have deteriorated in view — these too, in full, are to be set forth in five categories under both the dark side and the bright side.

In brief:

From admonishment to be abandoned, pressed with urgency, up to and including expulsion — all such acts are to be carried out in two ways;
and likewise the identification of faults and disputes.

What is to be admonished is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and assignment by the Saṅgha. What is to be abandoned is likewise of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and assignment by the Saṅgha. What is further to be abandoned is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and abandonment by the Saṅgha. Service and attendance are of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and service and attendance rendered by tīrthikas. Further service and attendance are of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and making use of material things. What is to be approved is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and the abandonment of conceit. Further approval is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and the use of material things. Approval granted from the very foundation is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and censure. Censure is likewise of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and censure directed at the Prātimokṣa.

Expulsion is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and being placed under the rule of the Saṅgha. Reconciliation is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and being placed under the rule of the Saṅgha. Reinstatement is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and acknowledgment by the Saṅgha. Celibate conduct is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and the arising of a virtuous mind. Further celibate conduct is of two kinds: the act of forfeiture, and the complete fulfillment of the training.

The formal acts to be performed as censure against two persons are as follows: censure, expulsion, reconciliation, exclusion for failure to acknowledge an offense, exclusion for failure to cease an act, and exclusion for failure to relinquish a wrong view — together with forfeiture, forfeiture from the very foundation, approval, approval from the very foundation, approval granted from the very foundation, and the acts pertaining to the celibate life.

The formal acts to be performed as censure against both monks and nuns are: censure, expulsion, reconciliation, exclusion for failure to acknowledge an offense, exclusion for failure to cease an act, and exclusion for failure to relinquish a wrong view.

For those who are fully ordained and those who are not yet fully ordained, the following acts apply: forfeiture, forfeiture from the very foundation, approval, approval from the very foundation, approval granted from the very foundation, and the act of expulsion.

The same applies to female trainees and male novices.

Transgressions that arise from offenses are of two kinds: those that are intentional and those that are unintentional. The expulsion of offenses is of two kinds: intentional and unintentional. Disputes are of two kinds: those involving monks and those involving nuns. Further, disputes are of two kinds: those involving monks and those involving female trainees. Further, disputes are of two kinds: those involving monks and those involving female novices. Further, disputes are of two kinds: those involving monks and those involving male novices.

Here ends the first gate of the Vinaya alone, treating of forfeiture.

The Noble Vinaya Text, the twenty-sixth fascicle.

Now follows the summary of the second gate:

Three offenses, and what is improper,
What has been legislated and what has been transgressed,
Forfeiture likewise, and the two acts,
Instruction and expulsion in the same way.

In brief: the three dust-like offenses,
The Vinaya codes and the three gates,
The two collections and the two acts,
And the training in its two aspects.

The three dusts are the dust of attachment, the dust of aversion, and the dust of delusion.

The three offenses arising from body are: those arising from attachment, those arising from aversion, and those arising from delusion. The three offenses arising from speech are: those arising from attachment, those arising from aversion, and those arising from delusion. The three offenses arising from non-Vinaya conduct are: those arising from attachment, those arising from aversion, and those arising from delusion. The Vinaya is of three kinds: the Vinaya of attachment, the Vinaya of aversion, and the Vinaya of delusion.

All offenses are gathered under three headings: arising, legislated, and distinguished. All offenses are entered into through three kinds of formal act: the act of a single motion, the act of a motion and one proclamation, and the act of a motion and three proclamations. Three kinds of formal act serve as the basis of authority: the act of the Saṅgha, the act of individual liberation, and the act of forfeiture. The training is of three kinds: training in higher moral discipline, training in higher mind, and training in higher wisdom. Furthermore, the training is also of three kinds: training in general conduct, training in higher Vinaya, and training in higher individual liberation.

In brief: the three kinds of what becomes an offense,
And disputes likewise of three kinds — acts, schism of the Saṅgha, and what is prescribed — these are likewise three. One incurs offense through three kinds of action that lead to offense: bodily action, verbal action, and mental action. Disputes are of three kinds: virtuous, non-virtuous, and indeterminate. Formal acts are of three kinds: a lawful act, an unlawful act, and a concordant act. Schism of the Saṅgha is of three kinds: virtuous, non-virtuous, and indeterminate. One is not absolved of what has been prescribed by virtue of three conditions: the arising, the prescription, and the subsequent prescription.

In brief: dwelling improperly, not dwelling,
And dwelling separately — likewise so;
Offerings, honor, prostration,
Rising up and joining the palms.

Through three conditions one becomes unworthy of dwelling: together with an offense, and without an offense. Through three kinds one comes not to dwell: together with an offense, and without an offense. Through three kinds one comes to dwell separately: together with an offense, and without an offense. There are three who are worthy of offerings: a Tathāgata, arhat, and perfectly complete buddha; one in training; and those who are beyond training. Furthermore, there are another three who are worthy of offerings: a preceptor, an abbot, and those very senior in holy conduct. Just as these are worthy of offerings, so too should one understand who is fitting to be honored, prostrated to, risen before, and greeted with palms joined.

In brief: prescription of two kinds,
And the four categories of occasion,
Vows, and fellowship,
And setting aside — that is the last.

Prescription is of three kinds: prescription arising from an occurrence, prescription arising from an offense, and prescription made by way of differentiation. Furthermore, prescription is of three other kinds: prescription for the sake of guarding henceforth, prescription for the sake of teaching henceforth, and prescription for the sake of benefiting henceforth. Categories of occasion are of three kinds: occasion, and individual occasion. Furthermore, there are three other categories of occasion: occasion through faith, occasion through complete purity, and occasion through wealth. There are yet another three categories of occasion: occasion for the alms bowl, occasion for the monastic robe, and occasion for material goods. And there are three further categories of occasion: occasion for medicine, occasion at the proper time, and occasion of indefinite kind. Vows are of three kinds: the vow of the Saṅgha, the vow of a donor, and the vow of a physician. Fellowship is of three kinds: inferior, middling, and excellent. Setting aside is of three kinds: setting aside of what has been obtained, setting aside of a boundary, and setting aside of a person.

In brief: the past-and-prescribed are fourfold, Offenses are of two kinds,
Delegation also fourfold,
And attendants are of two kinds.

Three kinds of person are rendered past-and-prescribed when one performs a prostration before them: one in whom a prior offense has arisen, one who is a resident in hiding, and one who dwells in separation. Furthermore, three other kinds are rendered past-and-prescribed when a prostration is performed: one who is shameless, one who is resentful, and one who takes sides. Three kinds of person, when no prostration is performed before them, are rendered past-and-prescribed: a Tathāgata, arhat, and perfectly complete buddha; those who are venerable; and those who are very senior in holy conduct. Furthermore, three other kinds, when no prostration is performed, are rendered past-and-prescribed: a Tathāgata, arhat, and perfectly complete buddha; an abbot; and those who are very senior in holy conduct. Three kinds for whom no prostration is performed yet no offense is incurred:

one who previously committed an offense, one who is in hiding, and one who is dwelling apart. Furthermore, three other kinds for whom no prostration is performed yet no offense is incurred: one who is shameless, one who is resentful, and one who takes sides.

Three kinds of assignment: assignment by the Saṅgha, assignment by an individual, and assignment by the Prātimokṣa. Furthermore, three other kinds of assignment: assignment by the Saṅgha, assignment by a group, and assignment by the elders of the Saṅgha. Furthermore, three other kinds of assignment: assignment by a preceptor, assignment by an abbot, and assignment by the Saṅgha. Furthermore, three other kinds of assignment: assignment by a king, assignment by a thief, and assignment by the reasoning class.

Three kinds of Saṅgha steward: one who is skilled, one who is more skilled than skilled, and one who is even more skilled than the more skilled.

Furthermore, three other kinds of Saṅgha steward: one who is appointed, one who is not appointed, and one who is permitted.

In brief, in verse:

Knowing the penalty, removing it, relying on the abbot, gathering the assembly, relinquishing the two remedies, and permissions — the place and the act —

A monk who, on four grounds of cause, performs the act of penalty and conducts himself to the satisfaction of the penalty, should count the days of penalty: those together with whom a straightforward monk has spent the night at the break of dawn; those who have gone to a place without monks and the break of dawn has come; those for whom the penalty is incomplete and there is no penalty; and those who are unwilling to be told of the penalty by monks who are satisfied with the penalty.

Four kinds of knowledge: knowing what has arisen, knowing the offense, knowing the absence of offense, and knowing what has been raised.

Four kinds of raising: raised by seeing, raised by confession, raised by not having acted previously, and raised by disclosure.

Four things to rely upon: rely on the meaning, not the letter; rely on the Dharma, not the person; rely on sūtras of definitive meaning, not those of interpretable meaning; and rely on gnosis, not on consciousness.

Four kinds of abbot: there is an abbot who gathers by the Dharma and not by material goods; there is an abbot who gathers by material goods and not by the Dharma; there is an abbot who gathers both by the Dharma and by material goods; and there is an abbot who gathers neither by the Dharma nor by material goods. Among these, an abbot who gathers by the Dharma and not by material goods — one should recognize such an abbot and remain with him. An abbot who gathers by material goods and not by the Dharma — from such an abbot one should take leave with a respectful glance and depart. An abbot who gathers both by the Dharma and by material goods — even though it is uncomfortable, one should remain with him for as long as one lives. An abbot who gathers neither by the Dharma nor by material goods — even if one is instructed not to go, one should depart without a backward glance.

The four means of gathering: generosity, kind words, acting for the benefit of others, and consistency of purpose.

Four kinds of remedy: there is a remedy that is improper in itself and whose secondary application is also improper; there is a remedy improper in itself but whose secondary application is proper; there is a remedy proper in itself but whose secondary application is improper; and there is a remedy both proper in itself and proper in its secondary application.

Relying on four kinds of power of purpose, the Blessed One granted remedies to the monks: the power of season, the power of place, the power of the person, and the power of circumstance.

Four kinds of relinquishment: that which is blameworthy, that which is cut by penalty, that which is beneficial, and abiding in the holy Dharma.

Four kinds of permission: that which is not blameworthy, that which is not cut by penalty, that which is beneficial, and that which conduces to ease.

The training of the śrāvakas of the Tathāgata is established in four domains: the domain of gnosis, the domain of Dharma, the domain of persons, and the domain of miracles.

There are four kinds of formal act. There is the act of conferring benefit, the act of formal censure, the act of penalty, and the act of establishing one in the rules of conduct.

In brief, the five acts are:

Formal acceptance with faith, and the act with admonition,

Pure acts and Vinaya acts,

And the act of formal censure — these are likewise.

The five kinds of formal acceptance are: performing an act on one's own behalf; accepting after having come into the presence of the assembly; presenting a declaration of faith; making an oral statement of one's own view; and accepting by remaining silent.

When five are not openly present within the boundary, the act of presenting faith may be performed; but not within a gathering of many who are openly present. The five cases are: the spy, one who abides separately, one who does not abide, one who is partisan, and one who has expelled a nun.

The five acts that are not permitted unless performed are: "You are to do this in this place," "You are to do this within this Saṅgha," "You are to do this within the Saṅgha of another place," "Such-and-such a transgression shall be imposed upon you" — and with those words having charged him with the transgression, the transgression is formally established, and he is dismissed having been bound, admonished, made to undergo rehabilitation, and sanctioned accordingly.

There is the act of confession, the act of blessing, the act of assignment, the act of permission, and the act of establishing in the rules of conduct.

The five kinds of purifying acts are: penalty, the raising of a penalty from its basis, satisfaction, the raising of satisfaction from its basis, and rehabilitation.

The five instruments of discipline are: censure, reproof, dismissal, reconciliation, and rejection.

The five objects of reproof are: censure, reproof, dismissal, reconciliation, and rejection.

The five kinds of act of penalty: one should proclaim them until abandonment of each of those has been achieved.

In brief, two ways of conduct within the Saṅgha,
Two modes of the elder's heedlessness,
Becoming inferior and falling into dispute,
And self and the notion of self — these are likewise.

A monk who conducts himself within the Saṅgha, when going before the Saṅgha, should set these five Dharma-factors inwardly in mindfulness and then enter into the Saṅgha. What are the five? Being composed in proper order, being composed in respectful comportment, being composed under the sway of caution, being composed with a humble mind, and being skilled in sitting on the seat with a mind equal to one who is a broom-sweeper.

A monk who conducts himself within the Saṅgha should further set these other five Dharma-factors inwardly in mindfulness and then enter into the Saṅgha. What are the five? A mind of loving-kindness, a mind of beneficence, a mind of tenderness, speaking kindly, and not speaking harsh words.

Now there are also those who dispute in ways that are not in accordance with the Dharma within the Saṅgha. In that case, a monk who conducts himself within the Saṅgha should take the side that accords with the Dharma. Or else, having stated his own view, he should rise from his seat and depart, and without stirring up that occasion for dispute, he should remain devoted to meditative practice.

A senior monk who is endowed with five Dharma-factors should be censured, subjected to formal punishment, rejected, rendered without a side, silenced, and humiliated; doubt, uncertainty, and regret should be caused to arise in him; and he should be bound, admonished, and subjected to rehabilitation. What are the five? He is of bad moral discipline; transgressions of moral discipline have occurred in him and he holds wrong views; he views things in a perverted way and is without shame; he is without shame before his peers and incites monks who dispute and counter-dispute to quarrelling, fault-finding, ill-will, and conflict; and he is contentious and — — leads monks who dispute and counter-dispute into what is contrary to Dharma.

A monk possessing five qualities is one whom laywomen (upāsikā) are right to regard with a feeling of distrust. What are the five? He speaks ill of laypeople; he speaks unpleasantly about laypeople; he speaks of laypeople by pointing out their faults; he does what is neither beneficial nor purposeful toward laypeople; and he engages in the pursuit of gains that bring them no benefit.

Furthermore, a monk possessing five qualities is one whom laymen (upāsaka) are right to regard with a feeling of distrust. What are the five? He speaks ill of the Buddha; he speaks ill of the Dharma; he speaks ill of the Saṅgha; he engages in conduct that should not be engaged in; and he has no respect for the training of monks.

A layman possessing five qualities is one who deserves to have the Saṅgha's alms-bowl turned upside down before him. What are the five? He speaks ill of monks; he speaks unpleasantly about monks; he speaks badly of monks; he is one who harms monks, acts contrary to their benefit and purpose, desires gains from them, and pursues such gains.

Furthermore, a layman possessing five qualities is one who deserves to have the Saṅgha's alms-bowl turned upside down before him. What are the five? He speaks ill of the Buddha; he speaks ill of the Dharma; he speaks ill of the Saṅgha; he engages in conduct that should not be engaged in; and he does not train in the training of a layman.

A Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of settling a dispute. What are the five? He has become hostile and contemptuous toward others; he goes astray; he has become one who speaks a great deal; he speaks with scattered and careless words; and he has become one who gathers what is harmful. The reversal of these five into their wholesome counterparts should also be stated.

Furthermore, a Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of settling a dispute. What are the five? He retains confused accounts; he retains secret words; he retains many words; he retains them without definiteness; and he renders service without having caused a commitment to be made within three repetitions. The reversal into five wholesome counterparts should also be stated.

Furthermore, a Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of settling a dispute. What are the five? He does not know the full extent of what he himself has said; he does not bring the words of others to their conclusion; he does not listen; and he does not make things clear and known. The reversal into five wholesome counterparts should also be stated.

Furthermore, a Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is wholly incapable of settling a dispute: he does not give instructions to one who has not been instructed; he does not give correct instructions to one who has not been correctly instructed; he does not bring to attention what has not been attended to; he incites monks who dispute and counter-dispute into quarrelling, fault-finding, ill-will, and conflict; and he leads monks who dispute and counter-dispute to side with what is contrary to Dharma. The reversal of these five into their wholesome counterparts should also be stated.

In brief:

Guidance, dispute, formal act, taking up a case, what is contrary to Dharma — the sūtras and Vinaya regulate these;
the unappointed who arise, and the transgression likewise —

A Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of giving guidance. What are the five? He does not know the five modes of speech for giving guidance; he does not know how to counter-argue; he does not know how to connect things to what is Dharma; he does not know how to connect things to what is contrary to Dharma; and he makes no resolution. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

A Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of settling a dispute.

What are the five? He does not know disputes; he does not know from what a dispute has arisen; he does not know how to contain a dispute; he does not know how to bring a dispute to peace; and even when a dispute has been brought to peace, he is not skilled in preventing transgressions from arising again. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

A Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of performing formal acts. What are the five? His giving of the meaning is thoroughly impure and he does not convey it step by step — he instructs, Ānanda, using the words of a novice, and does not know the words of the sūtra. He does not know the formal act of a single motion. He does not know the formal act of motion-and-one proclamation. He does not know the formal act of motion-and-three proclamations. He does not know the formal act of conveyance; and he does not know the formal act of consecration. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

A monk possessing five qualities should not have his words accepted when he acts as the proposing party. What are the five? His giving of the meaning is thoroughly impure and he does not convey it step by step; he teaches, in the manner of Ānanda, using the words of a novice; he does not know the basis in the sūtra; he does not know how to teach what was spoken from the position of what is not manifest as it was spoken; and he does not purify by resting in whatever is required. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

A monk possessing five qualities is unfit to have his words accepted as the responding party. What are the five? When the proposing monk asks about one thing, he attacks another; he spreads false rumor; he harms a pure monk; standing on a partisan side, though knowing a transgression, he says he does not know the transgression. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

A Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of settling a dispute. What are the five? He causes the proposing and the responding monks to draw near to a side contrary to Dharma; he incites the proposing and responding monks to quarrel, to expose faults, to bear grudges, and to provoke disputes; he does not listen to the sūtra words of the respected monks; he slanders the senior monks; and he is unskilled in the beginning, middle, and end of a dispute. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

A Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of knowing the qualities of the sūtra. What are the five? He is unskilled in the sūtra; he is unskilled in the Vinaya; he is unskilled in the mātṛkā; he is unskilled in analysis; and he has not trained in the oral recitation of scripture. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

Furthermore, a Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of knowing the qualities of the sūtra. What are the five? He does not know the Vinaya that is temporary and the Vinaya that is complete in every case; he does not know the Vinaya that is provisional and the Vinaya that applies at all times; he does not know the Vinaya of transgressions; he does not know the Vinaya of disputes; and he does not know the Vinaya of afflictions. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

A Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of knowing the qualities of the sūtra. What are the five? He is undecided with respect to the Vinaya of transgressions, the Vinaya of disputes, the temporary and the complete, and the provisional and the perpetual.

A Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of settling a dispute. What are the five?

He settles disputes without having been appointed to do so; he does not show transgressions; he does not cut short proceedings for punishment; he does not demonstrate purification; and in this way what was entrusted to him by the Saṅgha is left undone. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

A Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of showing transgressions. What are the five? He does not know what constitutes a transgression; he does not know what does not constitute a transgression; he does not know what is heavy; he does not know what is light; and he has not learned to recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra by heart. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

Furthermore, a Vinaya-holder possessing five qualities is incapable of showing transgressions. What are the five? He does not know the arising of a transgression; he does not know what is accompanied by it; he does not know what follows from it; he does not know its abandonment; and he does not know what is permitted regarding it. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

In brief:

Rising, formal acts, covering over,
fire-giving, and the sleeping place;
mental disturbance, the male organ, semen,
the wooden sounding board, and appointment.

The five kinds of rising from a transgression are these. What are the five? Rising by request; rising without need of a request; rising by sign; rising in the ultimate sense; and that which goes beyond what nuns share in common and has become manifest.

By five causes, what is done becomes an act contrary to the Dharma and an act contrary to the Vinaya. What are the five? Performing it without it having come before the assembly; without deliberation; without having brought it to mind; without the matter being present; and without having established a resolution.

A monk who acts when such characteristics have passed away falls like an arrow that has been shot, and immediately upon death falls into the lower realms, the bad destinations, the wrong course, and is reborn in the hells. What are the five? He goes out of desire; he goes out of aversion; he goes out of delusion; he goes out of fear; and he does not know what was done and what was not done.

By five causes, if a monk takes what has not been given from another's side, it becomes the transgression of defeat. What are the five? He takes it without the perception that it belongs to another; he takes it without the perception of seizing it for even a moment; he takes it without the perception of borrowing it; when taking it he lets another know and then does not take it; and the intention to steal remains present. Again, the reversal into five wholesome counterparts should be stated.

The improper use of sleeping places is to be understood under five headings. What are the five? By smoke; by dust; by water; by dragging; and by hauling — these are the five.

By five causes mental disturbance arises. What are the five? Exhaustion of friends and companions; exhaustion of resources; imbalance of the elements; affliction by non-human beings; and the ripening of past karma.

Furthermore, mental disturbance arises from five causes. What are the five? Agitation of the wind element; bile; phlegm; a combination of these; and the ripening of past karma.

Furthermore, mental disturbance arises from five causes. What are the five? Being struck by a non-human being; having the mind disturbed by a non-human being; having one's vitality seized by a non-human being; imbalance of the elements; and the ripening of past karma.

By five causes the male organ becomes functional while not free from attachment. What are the five? Blockage of defecation; blockage of urination; blockage of wind; being seized by a creature called ucca-tiṅka; and being thoroughly bound by attachment to desired objects — these are the five.

Semen is of five kinds: blue-black; yellow; red; hot; and thin — these are the five.

The striking of the wooden sounding board is of five kinds: the sounding board of the entire Saṅgha; the sounding board for a formal act; the sounding board for a death; the sounding board for a transgression; and the sounding board for abandonment — these are the five.

The sounding board of the entire Saṅgha comprises three series and three urgent strikes.

The sounding board for a formal act comprises two series and one urgent strike. The sounding board for a death comprises one series. The sounding board for a transgression is sounded until the matter is resolved. The sounding board for abandonment is struck at the throat of the board.

A monk who possesses five qualities may transmit scriptural instruction to nuns. What are the five? He is one who is endowed with moral discipline; he is one who is learned; he is one who is like a king among elders; he is one who is conversant with the language of the city; and he is one who has not caused offense to nuns through physical conduct. How is he endowed with moral discipline? He has not transgressed any of the four root defeats. How is he learned? He has recited or given oral teaching on the Sūtra of Individual Liberation. How is he one who is like a king among elders? He has reached twenty years since his full ordination, or has passed beyond that. And as for causing offense to nuns through physical conduct — either he has not done so, or any such transgression has been handled by him in accordance with the Dharma.

The two sections are complete.

A summary verse for the three sections:

Dispute and satisfaction, wealth found and the person likewise,
Upāli's completion of discipline, and the going forth and giving — likewise.

In brief: the six transmissions on the root of strife, formal acts and teaching likewise, what is to be assigned and what is impaired, and what is to be reversed — likewise.

Monks, in this regard the roots of strife are six. There exists a monk who is wrathful and holds grudges. Monks, a monk who is wrathful and holds grudges does not treat the Teacher as a superior, does not show him respect, does not bow down before him, and does not honor him. Because he has not treated the Teacher with deference, not treated him as a superior, not shown him respect, not bowed down before him, and not honored him, he does not see the Dharma. Not seeing the Dharma, he does not conduct himself with proper regard toward the Saṅgha. Acting without proper regard toward the Saṅgha, he acts heedlessly toward the very life of renunciation. Acting heedlessly toward the life of renunciation, he comes to generate strife in the Saṅgha, mud-slinging, grudge-holding, and quarreling of that sort. Strife, mud-slinging, grudge-holding, and quarreling are not of benefit to the many, are not for the welfare of the many, but bring suffering to the many. They are neither of benefit nor of help to gods and humans, and bring suffering. Monks, should you observe such a root of strife present within or without, and see that it has not yet been abandoned by oneself, then, harmonizing together with one another with great joy, generate faith, diligence, effort, and enthusiasm. Having generated enthusiasm, strive without releasing mindfulness and awareness until that root of strife has been relinquished. Likewise, monks, if you observe a root of strife present within or without that has not been abandoned, then harmonizing together with one another in joy, strive with mindfulness that guards the mind with great care until the fault of that root of strife is exhausted. Then that root of strife of yours, having been utterly destroyed, will not arise again in the future.

Just as with grudge-holding, so too with concealment, spite, envy, arrogance, deceit, fraud, shamelessness, lack of conscience, and holding one's own views in high esteem — these are all to be set forth at length as words that are hard to abandon because they are grasped at again and again.

The transmissions are of six kinds: transmission by a buddha; transmission by the Saṅgha; transmission by a preceptor; transmission by a preceptor; transmission by a king; and transmission by a thief.

There are six kinds of livelihood that are improper for a male lay practitioner to pursue: trading in sentient beings; trading in weapons; trading in alcohol; trading in poison; work involving lacquer; and the work of making oil from grain.

The six cases of something being shown to be spurious are as follows.

When a monk says to other monks, "Venerable ones, I myself heard directly from the Blessed One and received directly from him: 'This is the Dharma; this is the Vinaya; this is what the Teacher taught,'" the monk who hears this should neither express enthusiasm for what that monk has said nor condemn it. Without either expressing enthusiasm or condemning it, taking the words, the meaning, and the syllables together, he should compare them against the sūtras and examine them against the Vinaya. If, upon comparing them against the sūtras and examining them against the Vinaya, they are found to be inconsistent with the sūtras, to be absent from the Vinaya, and to contradict the nature of reality, then he should address that monk thus: "Venerable one, what you claim the Blessed One said — he did not say it. Or else, venerable one, you have grasped this teaching wrongly. For when I compared this teaching against the sūtras and examined it against the Vinaya, it was inconsistent with the sūtras, absent from the Vinaya, and contradictory to the nature of reality. Therefore know that this is not the Dharma, this is not the Vinaya, this is not the teaching of the Teacher — and set it aside."

Furthermore, when a monk says to other monks, "Venerable ones, in such-and-such a place there resides a great community of monks, elders with full individual liberation, and I myself heard directly from that community of monks and received it directly: 'This is the Dharma; this is the Vinaya; this is what the Teacher taught,'" the monk who hears this should neither express enthusiasm nor condemn it. Without expressing enthusiasm or condemning it, taking the words, the meaning, and the syllables together, he should compare them against the sūtras and examine them against the Vinaya. If, upon comparing them against the sūtras and examining them against the Vinaya, they are found to be inconsistent with the sūtras, absent from the Vinaya, and contradictory to the nature of reality, then he should address that monk thus: "Venerable one, you have perceived what you heard from that community of elders with full individual liberation as Dharma, as Vinaya, and have spoken what is not Dharma and not Vinaya. Or else, venerable one, you yourself have grasped this teaching wrongly. For when these teachings are compared against the sūtras and examined against the Vinaya, they are inconsistent with the sūtras, absent from the Vinaya, and contradictory to the nature of reality. Therefore know that this is not the Dharma, this is not the Vinaya, this is not the teaching of the Teacher — and set it aside."

Furthermore, when a monk says to other monks, "In such-and-such a place there reside many monks who are holders of sūtras, holders of Vinaya, and holders of the Māṭṛkā. I myself heard directly from those monks and received it directly: 'This is the Dharma; this is the Vinaya; this is what the Teacher taught'" — from that point onward to the words "address that monk as follows," everything proceeds exactly as before: "Venerable one, those monks have perceived it as Dharma, as Vinaya, and have spoken what is not Dharma and not Vinaya. Or else, venerable one, you yourself have grasped these teachings wrongly. For when this teaching is compared against the sūtras and examined against the Vinaya, it is inconsistent with the sūtras, absent from the Vinaya, and contradictory to the nature of reality. This is not the Dharma; this is not the Vinaya;

this is not what the Teacher taught — know it to be so, and set it aside."

Furthermore, if a monk says to other monks: "Venerable ones, in such-and-such a place, among the resident senior monks of that monastery, and among the presiding officers of that monastery, there dwell certain monks. From those venerable monks I have heard directly and received directly: 'This is the Dharma; this is the Vinaya; this is what the Teacher taught'" — from that point onward to the words "address that monk as follows," everything proceeds exactly as before: "Just as the venerable one, being any senior monk among the senior monks and any presiding officer among the presiding officers, has perceived this as Dharma and as Vinaya and has spoken what is not Dharma and not Vinaya — or else, venerable one, you yourself have grasped these teachings wrongly" — from that point onward to "know it to be so, and set it aside," everything proceeds exactly as before.

Furthermore, if one monk says to another monk: "Venerable one, in such-and-such a place there is a faithful and believing layman. From that layman I have heard directly and received directly: 'This is the Dharma; this is the Vinaya; this is what the Teacher taught'" — from that point onward to the words "address that monk as follows," everything proceeds exactly as before: "Just as the venerable one, having heard from a layman what he perceived as Dharma and as Vinaya, has spoken what is not Dharma and not Vinaya — or else, venerable one, you yourself have grasped these teachings wrongly" — from that point onward to "know it to be so, and set it aside," everything proceeds exactly as before.

Furthermore, if a monk says to other monks: "Venerable ones, I have heard directly from gods: 'This is the Dharma; this is the Vinaya; this is what the Teacher taught'" — from that point onward to the words "address that monk as follows," everything proceeds exactly as before: "Just as the gods have spoken to the venerable one what they perceived as Dharma and as Vinaya, yet have spoken what is not Dharma and not Vinaya — or else, venerable one, you yourself have grasped these teachings wrongly" — from that point onward to "know it to be so, and set it aside," everything proceeds exactly as before.

Now, what is called the Six Great Pronouncements is this: If a monk says to other monks, "Venerable ones, I have heard directly from the Blessed One and received directly: 'This is the Dharma; this is the Vinaya; this is what the Teacher taught'" — one should neither rejoice in nor disparage what that monk has said. Without either rejoicing or disparaging, one should take hold of the words, the meaning, and the syllables, compare them against the sūtras, and examine them against the Vinaya. If, upon comparing them against the sūtras and examining them against the Vinaya, they are consistent with the sūtras, present in the Vinaya, and not contradictory to the nature of reality, then address that monk as follows: "Venerable one, these teachings were indeed spoken by the Blessed One, and the venerable one has grasped them well. Therefore, since these teachings, when compared against the sūtras and examined against the Vinaya, are consistent with the sūtras, present in the Vinaya, and not contradictory to the nature of reality, know this to be the Dharma, know this to be the Vinaya, know this to be what the Teacher taught — and hold it fast."

These six great pronouncements in their extended form are to be recited in the same way for the positive side as well.

The six modes of transmission are: transmission from a monk, transmission from a nun, transmission from both, individual transmission, transmission from a person, and transmission through one who has aroused the awakening mind.

There are also a further six modes of transmission: transmission through faith, transmission through complete purity, transmission of material goods, transmission of requisites, transmission of medicine, and transmission at the proper time.

The six kinds of degradation are: degradation of oneself, degradation of others, degradation of moral discipline, degradation of view, degradation of conduct, and degradation of livelihood.

The six kinds of excellence are: excellence of oneself, excellence of others, excellence of moral discipline, excellence of view, excellence of conduct, and excellence of livelihood.

The Noble Vinaya, the twenty-seventh fascicle. In brief:

Pleasing, stealing,
What has become manifest in the same way —
Degraded and not degraded,
Six kinds of action are taught.

What is meant by "pleasing": the Dharma that reads, "May I dwell nearby with love toward my own body for those who are skilled practitioners of the holy life equal to the Teacher's" — this is what is pleasing, what is delightful. Proceeding with love toward the venerable preceptor — it should be delighted in, regarded as a superior, honored, venerated, cultivated, upheld, accorded with, not resented, not disputed; and to the end of becoming one, loving action of speech and loving action of mind are set forth.

Whatever gain has been obtained in accordance with the Dharma, if it is small and has come within the begging bowl or falls within the bowl's compass — such gain should be shared in common with those who are skilled practitioners of the holy life equal to the Teacher's. This Dharma is what is pleasing. And as before, up to and including "in order to become one, it is set forth."

As before, up to the same point: whatever moral disciplines are not torn, not broken, not mixed, not become turbid, not degraded, without fault, perfectly complete, perfectly held, praised by the wise — such moral discipline: "May I share moral discipline in common together with those skilled practitioners of the holy life equal to the Teacher's." This Dharma is what is pleasing, and as before up to and including "in order to become one, it is set forth."

As before, up to the same point: the view of definite emergence that leads the noble ones to arise toward the complete exhaustion of suffering and toward passing to the end of suffering — "May I share that view in common together with those skilled practitioners of the holy life equal to the Teacher's." This Dharma is what is pleasing. As before, up to and including "in order to become one, it is set forth."

The six kinds of stealing are: stealing by stealth, stealing by deception, stealing by force, stealing after promising to return it, stealing by snatching, and stealing through an accomplice.

The six cases in which one who has become manifest may receive full ordination: when the Teacher is manifest, when the Dharma is manifest, when the Saṅgha is manifest, when purity is manifest, when the preceptor is manifest, and when the abbot is manifest.

The six Dharma factors that become causes for the degeneration of what the Teacher has taught: delighting in work, delighting in talk, delighting in sleep, delighting in gossip, delighting in gain, honor, and fame and being unable to relinquish them — being devoted to not relinquishing them and therefore taking no delight in renunciation and not engaging in yogic practice, and not delighting in meditation and having no interest in it, so that one takes no delight in meditation and does not engage in yogic practice.

The six Dharma factors that become causes for the non-degeneration of what the Teacher has taught: not delighting in work, not delighting in talk, not delighting in sleep, not delighting in gossip, not delighting in gain and honor — and instead delighting in renunciation, being devoted to renunciation, and therefore delighting in renunciation and engaging in yogic practice; and delighting in meditation, being devoted to meditation, and therefore delighting in meditation, being devoted to it, and engaging in yogic practice. These six Dharma factors become causes for what the Teacher has taught. Monks, you should know this.

Those Dharma factors that become causes for universal attachment, universal aversion, universal delusion, universal engagement in afflictions, and abundant conceptual elaboration — these are not the Dharma, these are not the Vinaya, these are not what the Teacher has taught. You should understand and know this.

Those six Dharma factors that become causes for what the Teacher has taught — monks, you should know these. Those Dharma factors that do not become causes for universal attachment, that do not become causes for universal aversion, that do not become causes for universal delusion, that do not become causes for universal engagement, but rather become causes for thorough purification and non-elaboration — these are the Dharma. These are the Vinaya. These are what the Teacher has taught. You should understand this.

Furthermore, those six Dharma factors that become causes for what the Teacher has taught — monks, you should know these. Those Dharma factors that become causes for not knowing contentment — causes for not experiencing satisfaction, for being hard to fill, for being difficult to sustain, for having many desires — these are not the Dharma, these are not the Vinaya, these are not what the Teacher has taught. You should understand and know this.

Those six Dharma factors that become causes for what the Teacher has taught — monks, you should know these. Those Dharma factors that become causes for knowing contentment — causes for being easy to please, easy to sustain, easy to satisfy, and for having few desires — these are the Dharma. These are the Vinaya. These are what the Teacher has taught. You should determine and know this.

In brief:

Wealth and strength and calm abiding,
degenerations, and robes as well, not allowing qualities to decline — such is the Saṅgha's conduct in accordance with the Dharma.

The seven wealths are: the wealth of faith, the wealth of moral discipline, the wealth of a sense of propriety, the wealth of conscientiousness, the wealth of learning, the wealth of generosity, and the wealth of wisdom — these seven.

The seven powers are: the power of faith, the power of diligence, the power of mindfulness, the power of meditative absorption, the power of wisdom, the power of a sense of propriety, and the power of conscientiousness.

The seven factors that resolve disputes are: resolution in the presence of those concerned, resolution through mindfulness, resolution through the absence of confusion, decision by majority vote, inquiry into the matter itself, proceeding by agreement, and that which is like spreading grass.

The seven factors of degeneration are: conducting oneself without veneration toward the Buddha, without veneration toward the Dharma, toward the Saṅgha, toward the trainings, toward heedfulness, toward the settled mind, and toward meditative absorption.

The seven factors of non-degeneration are: conducting oneself with veneration toward the Buddha, with veneration toward the Dharma, toward the Saṅgha, toward the trainings, toward heedfulness, toward the settled mind, and toward meditative absorption.

The seven things suitable as robes are: wool, a linen garment of śāṇaka fiber, cotton wool cloth, a coarse fabric, a grass-cloth of dugulaka, a grass-cloth of koṭavaka, and — and spider silk. The seven things unsuitable as robes are: the wool of a female yak, the wool of a bull, goat's wool, the wool of a wild deer, the wool of a female deer, blended fiber, and fiber that has not been woven into cloth.

A person who holds the Vinaya possesses seven qualities: they are the guardian of the treasury within the Victor's dispensation; they guard and carefully conceal their own aggregate of moral discipline; they possess inexhaustible resources of scripture for transmission and teaching; they attract the fourfold assembly; they become a refuge for those who have fallen into doubt; they conduct themselves fearlessly within the Saṅgha; and they act with great clarity of mind.

The seven spheres of conduct that a monk should not frequent are: the household of a partisan, the household of one who distributes gifts, the household of a prostitute, the household of a liquor-seller, the household of a musician, the royal palace, and the household of a person of low caste.

The seven things that are not noble Dharma are: not knowing the Dharma, not knowing the meaning, not knowing the proper time, not knowing the proper measure, not knowing oneself, not knowing the assembly, and not knowing how to distinguish persons — those who are superior and those who are inferior.

A monk conducting himself within the Saṅgha who possesses seven qualities should not conduct himself within the Saṅgha: being impatient and ungrateful; speaking too much; speaking in a garbled and rambling way; speaking without circumspection; and not knowing what is within bounds.

The seven qualities of noble Dharma are: knowing the Dharma, knowing the meaning, knowing the proper time, knowing the proper measure, knowing oneself, knowing the assembly, knowing whether many people are unfriendly, not being skilled in the beginning, middle, and end of a dispute, and not knowing what is similar and what is dissimilar. This completes the groups of seven.

In brief:

Stable gains and their relinquishment, and likewise sandals as well;
the eight worldly dharmas, and equally the absence of schism and its roots;
the middle of the eight kinds of gains — boundary occasions, duties, residence, the rains retreat, the five matters of the Saṅgha, persons who are manifest, and the eighth — each one's own domain.

The eight kinds of gains are: offerings made within a boundary; offerings made at the time of an act; offerings made at the time of residence; gains of the rains retreat; gains designated to the Saṅgha; gains designated to a particular person; gains that have become manifest; and gains that have become separate — these eight.

The eight causes that lead to relinquishing gains from a situation resembling a mother are: departure, taking hold, thinking one will not return, having secretly heard, having heard openly, going beyond the boundary, having given up hope, and the deed of request — these eight.

The eight kinds of sandals that a monk should not wear are: sandals made of kuśa grass, sandals made of muñja grass, sandals made of balbaja grass, sandals made of rice straw, sandals made of bamboo, sandals made of palm leaves, and sandals of wheat straw.

Furthermore, the eight other kinds of sandals that a monk should not wear are: sandals made of cord, sandals fitted with bells, sandals made of hide, wooden sandals, sandals made of bone, sandals made of iron, sandals made of precious jewels, and sandals made of tree bark.

The eight worldly dharmas are: gain, no gain, fame, no fame, blame, praise, pleasure, and suffering.

Among the eight dharmas that cause division in the Saṅgha, these are: declaring "this is Dharma" and declaring "this is not Dharma"; declaring "this is Vinaya" and declaring "this is not Vinaya"; declaring "this is a transgression" and declaring "this is not a transgression"; declaring "this is serious" and declaring "this is light"; declaring "there is a remainder" and declaring "there is no remainder whatsoever"; declaring "it should be confessed" and declaring "it should be restrained"; declaring "this goes beyond the Vinaya" and declaring "this is to be explained wrongly"; declaring "this is non-virtuous" and declaring "this is not supported by scripture."

There are eight ways by which one who is without a basis is condemned: resentment, despondency, anger, contrariness, displeasure, being hard to please, envy, and miserliness.

In summary:

Examining a person,
objecting and counter-objecting,
the dust-like factors of the Vinaya and the eight modes, and the laying down of individual liberation.

The eight ways of examining a person are: conduct, domain of activity, friendships, companionship, livelihood, learning, bodily actions, and verbal actions. Just as a person is, so too should their objecting and counter-objecting be understood.

The eight factors by which one arrives at complete mastery in taming attachment are the noble eightfold path: right view, right thought, right speech, right action in its entirety, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right meditative absorption. Just as one arrives at complete mastery in taming attachment, so too does one arrive at complete mastery in taming aversion and complete mastery in taming delusion — it is the same in each case.

The eight dust-like factors are: dust-like in housing, dust-like in food, dust-like in drink, dust-like in licking, dust-like in tasting, dust-like in medicine, dust that is dust itself — these are the eight.

The eight improper grounds for laying down individual liberation are: degradation of moral discipline performed as though one has a basis, when one does not; degradation of view; degradation of conduct; degradation of livelihood — and again, degradation of moral discipline not performed on a basis, when one genuinely lacks a basis; degradation of view; degradation of conduct; and degradation of livelihood.

The eight proper grounds for a restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma are: degradation of moral discipline performed with a genuine basis; degradation of view; degradation of conduct; degradation of livelihood — and again, degradation of moral discipline not performed when a genuine basis exists; degradation of view; degradation of conduct; and degradation of livelihood.

In summary:

Upāli, the unobstructed one, and Gautamī — Gautama's lineage;
what is not fitting to abide in,
harm, and the Vinaya.

The venerable Upāli then addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Blessed One, it would be good if you would briefly explain to me the teaching by which I may seek the Dharma and the Vinaya." The Blessed One then spoke to the venerable Upāli as follows:

"Upāli, whatever Dharma leads to quarreling, to fault-finding, to resentment, to dispute, to speaking separately, to discordant speech, to disunity, to loss of mindfulness, to proliferation — with regard to such things, understand clearly: this is not Dharma, this is not Vinaya, this is not the teaching of the Teacher.

"Upāli, whatever Dharma leads to non-quarreling, to not finding fault, to non-resentment, to non-dispute, to not speaking separately, to concordant speech, to unity, to not losing mindfulness, to becoming one — with regard to such things, understand clearly: this is Dharma, this is Vinaya, this is the teaching of the Teacher.

"Upāli, the eight are just as has been said."

As for what has not yet been covered, those should be stated as eight in the dark and light modes.

The occasion: it was in Śrāvastī. At that time, Gautamī, the great lady, mother of the people, went to where the Blessed One was and, having arrived, bowed her head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat to one side. Seated to one side, Gautamī, the great lady, mother of the people, said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, it would be well if you would teach me the Dharma in such a way that I might know how to seek Dharma and Vinaya."

And when she had said that, the Blessed One spoke thus to Gautamī, the great lady, mother of the people: "Gautamī, whatever Dharma serves as a cause for universal attachment, but not as a cause for freedom from universal attachment; serves as a cause for universal aversion, but not as a cause for freedom from universal aversion; serves as a cause for universal delusion, but not as a cause for freedom from universal delusion; serves as a cause for universal engagement, but not as a cause for non-engagement; serves as a cause for universal affliction, but not as a cause for purification; serves as a cause for great desire, but not as a cause for the diminishment of great desire; serves as a cause for not knowing contentment, but not as a cause for knowing contentment; serves as a cause for being hard to satisfy, but not as a cause for being easy to satisfy; serves as a cause for being hard to support, but not as a cause for being easy to support — with regard to such things, understand clearly: this is not Dharma, this is not Vinaya, this is not the teaching of the Teacher.

"Gautamī, whatever Dharma serves as a cause for freedom from universal attachment, but not as a cause for universal attachment; serves as a cause for freedom from universal aversion, but not as a cause for universal aversion; serves as a cause for freedom from universal delusion, but not as a cause for universal delusion; serves as a cause for non-engagement, but not as a cause for universal engagement; serves as a cause for purification, but not as a cause for universal affliction; serves as a cause for the diminishment of great desire, but not as a cause for great desire; serves as a cause for knowing contentment, but not as a cause for not knowing contentment; serves as a cause for being easy to satisfy, but not as a cause for being hard to satisfy; serves as a cause for being easy to support, but not as a cause for being hard to support — with regard to such things, understand clearly: this is Dharma, this is Vinaya, this is the teaching of the Teacher.

"As has been said to Gautamī, the great lady, mother of the people, so shall the sūtra be recited."

The eighth is complete.

The nine are as follows: abiding in the Teacher, abiding in the Dharma, abiding in the Saṅgha, abiding in one's ācārya, abiding in one's upādhyāya, abiding in one's senior master, abiding in one's dwelling, abiding in a person, and abiding in a domain.

The nine instances of what is improper: it is improper for an arhat in whom the defilements are exhausted knowingly to deprive a living being of life; to take what is not given; to engage in unchaste conduct, in the sexual act; knowingly to speak falsehood; to wish to partake of and consume what is stored away; knowingly to transgress the training; to hand over the training and fall away; to seek another teacher outside of this; and to trust in divination and omens for purification rather than in deeds of faith. These are what is improper.

The nine objects of desire: "This one wishes to harm me. This one wishes to bring me no benefit. This one wishes me to be unhappy. This one does not wish me to have happiness. This one wishes me to be without ease." And: "This one has harmed me. This one does harm me. This one will do harm to me." Thinking thus, one does harm to that person.

"Whoever wishes to harm me, wishes me no benefit, wishes me to be unhappy, does not wish me to have happiness, and does not wish me to have ease — this one does not wish me harm, wishes me benefit, wishes me happiness, wishes me to have happiness, and wishes me ease; this one has not done me harm, does not do me harm, and will not do me harm." Thinking thus, one does harm to that person.

"Whoever wishes me no harm, wishes me benefit, wishes me happiness, wishes me to have happiness, and wishes me to have ease — this one wishes that person harm, wishes that person no benefit, wishes that person unhappiness, does not wish that person happiness, and does not wish that person ease." And so one does harm to that person.

The nine objects of desire that are to be subdued: "This one wishes to harm me, wishes me no benefit, wishes me unhappy, does not wish me happiness, and does not wish me ease. This one has done me harm, does do me harm, and will do me harm." Thinking thus, one repays that person by generating harm toward them.

"Whoever wishes to harm me, wishes me no benefit, wishes me unhappy, does not wish me happiness, and does not wish me ease — this one does not wish that person harm, wishes that person benefit, wishes that person happiness, wishes that person happiness, and wishes that person ease; and this one has not done harm to that person, does not do harm, and will not do harm." Thinking thus, one reflects: "Would that I might be thus — how could I receive from another what I have not become?" And so, thinking in this way, one repays that person by generating harm toward them.

And again, "Whoever wishes me no harm, wishes me benefit, wishes me happiness, and wishes me ease — this one wishes that person harm, wishes that person no benefit, does not wish that person happiness, and does not wish that person ease. This one has done harm to that person, does harm, and will do harm." Thinking thus, one further reflects: "Would that I might be thus and not be otherwise — how could I receive from another what I have not become?" And so, thinking in this way, one repays that person by generating harm toward them.

The ninth is complete.

In brief:

What is not discipline is of two kinds,
And what is discipline is of three:
Generosity, and what is to be gathered in,
And virtuous qualities are the last.

The ten that are not discipline are the ten paths of non-virtuous action: killing, taking what is not given, sexual misconduct, lying, divisive speech, harsh speech, idle chatter, malice, covetousness, and wrong view.

Further, another ten that are not discipline are the ten limbs of the wrong path: wrong view, wrong thought, wrong speech, wrong end of action, wrong livelihood, wrong effort, wrong mindfulness, wrong meditative absorption, wrong liberation, and wrong gnosis.

The ten that are discipline are the ten paths of virtuous action: refraining from killing, refraining from taking what is not given, refraining from sexual misconduct, refraining from lying, refraining from divisive speech, refraining from harsh speech, refraining from idle chatter, and refraining from malice, covetousness, and wrong view.

Further, another ten that are discipline are the ten limbs of the right path: right view, right thought, right speech, right end of action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right meditative absorption, right liberation, and right gnosis.

Still further, another ten that are discipline: arising in the age of a buddha, arising at all times, arising in an age of decline, going everywhere, discipline of time, discipline of place, discipline of persons, discipline of dwelling, discipline of effort, and discipline of afflictions.

Ten that are the gathering of things: gathering of the alms bowl, gathering of robes, gathering of medicine, gathering of material goods, gathering of bedding and seats, gathering of sūtras, gathering of Vinaya, gathering of the Mātṛkā, gathering of complete purification, and gathering of rising from transgression.

Ten that are generosity: giving of the alms bowl, giving of robes, giving of medicine, giving of material goods, giving of bedding and seats, giving of sūtras, giving of Vinaya, giving of the Mātṛkā, giving of complete purification, and giving of rising from transgression. These likewise are to be understood as the ten objects of gathering.

Ten qualities of the person who upholds the Vinaya: knowing what has arisen, knowing what is accompanied by conditions, knowing what is subsequently accompanied by conditions, knowing what is not permitted, knowing what is permitted, being renowned as one who is manifest on my side, having become manifest, having become fully manifest, being renowned as one who has not emptied my side, and the Tathāgata having less activity to perform in whatever region that person who upholds the Vinaya in such a manner dwells.

In brief, as verse:

The ten acts of penalty and, directly, ordination with its obstacles,
the discussions, the fourth, the pleasing, and the sixfold — these are the categories.

Ten acts of penalty: censure, reproach, expulsion, suspension, the penalty levied on the basis called "unseen," removal from residence, withholding of the restoration ceremony, withholding of the invitation ceremony, withholding of the statement of request, and satisfaction — these are the ten.

Ten things by which, upon being made directly present, one undergoes full ordination: the Teacher being directly present and one undergoing full ordination, a buddha being directly present, the Dharma being directly present, the preceptor being directly present, the instructor being directly present, the one wishing full ordination being directly present, the requisites of one wishing full ordination being directly present, complete purification being directly present, the request being directly present, and the formal act being directly present.

Ten things that become obstacles to full ordination: having become a hermaphrodite, having expelled a nun, having killed one's father, having killed one's mother, having killed an arhat, having caused a schism in the Saṅgha, having drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, being a thief who has entered the robes through deception, having previously committed a transgression, having previously caused disruption, and having gone over to the non-Buddhists.

Ten forms of full ordination: full ordination from a Tathāgata without a preceptor, the five forms of full ordination following the direct realization of gnosis, full ordination by Mahā-Kāśyapa's self-declaration before the Teacher, full ordination by knowing that one has received the reply to Soḍāya's question, full ordination of Gautamī, the Great Mistress of Beings, by her acceptance of the precepts of her guru, full ordination of Dharmadinnā who had not crossed over, full ordination in the borderlands by a holder of the Vinaya together with five persons, full ordination without a preceptor and without an instructor, full ordination by the utterance "Come here, monk," and full ordination through the formal act with the request and the four motions.

Ten discussions: timely and untimely, true and untrue, with meaning and without meaning, pleasant and harsh, and loving and hateful.

One who possesses ten qualities may discuss matters with others: one who has become endowed with moral discipline; who is learned through extensive hearing; who has applied diligence; who abides in close mindfulness; who is endowed with wisdom; who speaks in a timely way and does not exceed the proper moment for discussion; who speaks truthfully and not untruthfully; who speaks with meaning and not without meaning; who speaks pleasantly and not with harsh words; and who speaks with loving-kindness and not with aversion.

Furthermore, one who possesses ten qualities may discuss matters with others: one who has become endowed with moral discipline; who is learned through extensive hearing; who has applied diligence; who is undistracted; who is endowed with wisdom; who speaks in a timely way and does not exceed the proper moment for discussion; who speaks truthfully and not untruthfully; who speaks with meaning and not without meaning; who speaks pleasantly and not with harsh words; and who speaks with loving-kindness and not with aversion.

Furthermore, one who possesses ten qualities may discuss matters with others: one who is endowed with moral discipline; who is learned through extensive hearing; who has applied diligence; who abides in close mindfulness; who has become possessed of the power of individual analysis; who speaks in a timely way and does not exceed the proper moment for discussion; who speaks truthfully and not untruthfully; who speaks with meaning and not without meaning; who speaks pleasantly with agreeable words and not with harsh words; and who speaks with loving-kindness and not with aversion.

A monk who possesses ten qualities will be beloved by those of brahma-like conduct. Those qualities are: being endowed with moral discipline; being learned through extensive hearing; having applied diligence; abiding in close mindfulness; being endowed with wisdom; having become possessed of the aggregate of moral discipline belonging to one who is beyond training; the aggregate of wisdom; the aggregate of meditative absorption; the aggregate of liberation; and the aggregate of the wisdom that sees liberation.

Just as such a one is beloved, so too the ten qualities are to be enumerated for the second category, those who are agreeable. For the third category, those made into a preceptor, the ten qualities are likewise to be enumerated. For the fourth category, those to be shown confidence in, the ten are likewise to be enumerated. For the fifth category, those worthy of veneration, the ten are likewise to be enumerated. For the sixth category, those worthy of praise, the ten are likewise to be enumerated.

In summary:

Going forth and the four,
liberation and excellence, qualities and likewise giving,
and the restoration ceremony — these are their foundations.

One who possesses ten qualities may perform the going forth, confer full ordination, and grant residence: one who has completed ten years since full ordination, or more than that; who is capable of setting one's companions in practice and one's attendants to nursing the sick; who is capable of resolving or causing to be resolved any remorse that arises in companions and attendants; who is capable of sending away or causing to be sent away companions and attendants who have come to display a blameworthy manner; who is capable of sending to another locality companions and attendants who are unwilling to remain in that region; who is endowed with moral discipline; who is learned through extensive hearing; who has applied diligence; who abides in close mindfulness; and who is endowed with wisdom.

Furthermore, one who possesses ten qualities may perform the going forth, confer full ordination, and grant residence. What are the ten? Knowing what constitutes a transgression; knowing what does not constitute a transgression; knowing what is weighty; knowing what is light; having learned the sūtra of individual liberation by heart so as to be able to recite it; the aggregate of moral discipline belonging to one in training; the aggregate of meditative absorption; the aggregate of wisdom; the aggregate of liberation; and the aggregate of the gnosis that sees liberation. One who possesses these ten qualities may perform the going forth, confer full ordination, and grant residence.

Furthermore, one who possesses ten qualities may perform the going forth, confer full ordination, and grant residence. What are the ten? Knowing what has arisen; knowing what is prescribed; knowing what is subsequently prescribed; knowing what is not permitted; knowing what is permitted; knowing what constitutes an obstacle; knowing what does not constitute an obstacle; being one who transmits the scriptures; being one who gives instruction; and being capable of introducing others to the ten topics of practice.

Furthermore, one who possesses ten qualities may perform the going forth, confer full ordination, and grant residence. What are the ten? Excellence in faith; excellence in moral discipline; excellence in learning; excellence in generosity; excellence in wisdom; excellence in moral discipline; excellence in meditative absorption; excellence in wisdom; excellence in liberation; and excellence in the gnosis that sees liberation.

By means of ten qualities one becomes a cause for entering perfectly into liberation: the aggregate of moral discipline belonging to one in training; the aggregate of meditative absorption; the aggregate of wisdom; the aggregate of liberation; the aggregate of the gnosis that sees liberation; the aggregate of moral discipline belonging to one beyond training; the aggregate of meditative absorption; the aggregate of wisdom; the aggregate of liberation; and the aggregate of the gnosis that sees liberation.

The ten excellences are: excellence in the Teacher; excellence in the Dharma; excellence in the Saṅgha; excellence in the preceptor-teacher; excellence in the abbot; excellence in moral discipline; excellence in learning; excellence in wisdom; excellence in liberation; and excellence in the gnosis that sees liberation.

The ten qualities are: gathering the Saṅgha together; bringing virtue to the Saṅgha; enabling the Saṅgha to live at ease; dealing strictly with those individuals who are shameless; letting those who have a sense of shame live at ease; causing those who have not yet gained trust to gain trust; causing those who have gained trust to increase their trust still further; restraining the defilements of the present life; thoroughly overcoming those that would arise in future lives; and, by means of the holy life, bringing benefit to others and causing the holy life to endure long in harmony with the holy life, so that it may be of benefit to the many and, spreading wide, be rightly proclaimed to gods and humans alike. Having seen these ten qualities, the Tathāgata established this rule of training for the śrāvakas.

The ten cases in which giving is improper: if any person whatsoever gives a gift to one person and then gives the same to another as well, it has been given contrary to the Dharma and received contrary to the Dharma, and that is improper conduct. If a gift has been given to one person and is then also offered to the Saṅgha, it has been given contrary to the Dharma and received contrary to the Dharma, and that is improper conduct. Likewise, if a gift has been given to two persons and is then given to one person, or to many, or to two communities, it has been given contrary to the Dharma and received contrary to the Dharma, and that is improper conduct. In the same way, whether given to one person, to two, to many, or offered to the Saṅgha, if it has been given contrary to the Dharma and received contrary to the Dharma, that is improper conduct. Likewise, if a gift has been given to the Saṅgha and is then given to one, or to two, or to many, or offered to the Saṅgha again, it has been given contrary to the Dharma and received contrary to the Dharma, and that is improper conduct. Likewise, if a gift has been given to the community of monks and is then given to the community of nuns, or given to both communities of monks and nuns; if a gift has been given to the community of nuns and then offered to the community of monks, or offered to both communities; if a gift has been given to both communities and then offered to the other two communities in exchange; or if the Saṅgha dwells separately in two different directions and a gift given to one group is then offered to the group in the other direction — in all such cases, it has been given contrary to the Dharma and received contrary to the Dharma, and that is improper conduct. When the reverse of all these applies, the gift is proper, and it should be declared as belonging to the virtuous side. There are ten cases in which the restoration ceremony conducted in accordance with the Dharma is set aside: one who has incurred a root defeat; one who has entered into talk of incurring a root defeat; one who has relinquished the training; one who has entered into talk of relinquishing the training; one who has reviled the Saṅgha; one who has entered into talk of reviling the Saṅgha; one whose moral discipline has deteriorated; one whose view has deteriorated; one whose conduct has deteriorated; and one whose livelihood has deteriorated.

In brief:

Those who raise objections, the analysis of circumstance, the taking up of the matter, and the twofold pacification;
the one who presses the charge, the offense, and what has directly arisen — these are to be cut off.

If the monk who raises the charge wishes to take up the matter, he should think very carefully about the ten grounds, examine them very carefully, and investigate them very carefully, and then take up the matter. What are the ten? Does the matter I wish to take up rest on truth, or would I be taking it up on the basis of something untrue? Is the time right to take up this matter, or is it not the right time? Is the taking up of this matter opportune, or is it not opportune? Does the taking up of this matter serve a purpose, or does it not? Is there something I have seen, heard, suspected, or some offense of body or speech, about which I should speak? And have I thought, "Am I able to lead this venerable one away from an unwholesome state and establish him in a wholesome state?" The monk who replies should likewise think very carefully about the ten grounds, examine them very carefully, and investigate them very carefully, and then analyze the circumstances with respect to the monk who raised the charge. What are the ten? Is this venerable one endowed with moral discipline or not? Does he have a sense of shame? Does he have remorse? Does he have restraint? Does he have a desire for the training? Is he learned? Does he retain what he has heard? Does he uphold it? Is he highly skilled in the Vinaya and the higher Vinaya? Has he mastered the recitation of the scriptural transmissions? And does this venerable one have the substance of a senior?

Then, Upāli, a senior Vinaya-holder who wishes to take up a dispute should also think very carefully about the ten grounds, examine them very carefully, and investigate them very carefully, and then take up the dispute. What are the ten? Am I skilled in the origin of this dispute I am taking up? Does this dispute I am taking up fall within what I have mastered of its origins? Do I have the substance of a senior? Can I get these monks — the one who raised the charge and the one who replied — to listen to me? Can I instruct these monks who raised the charge and who replied in accordance with the Dharma? Can I purify these monks who raised the charge and who replied of transgressions? Can I admonish these monks who raised the charge and who replied? Can I bring this dispute to a resolution in accordance with the Dharma, in accordance with the Vinaya, and in accordance with what the Teacher taught? Can I lead these monks who raised the charge and who replied away from unwholesome states and firmly establish them in wholesome states? And can I bring this dispute to rest in such a way that it will not arise again in the future? With these thoughts in mind, the matter should be undertaken.

Then, Upāli, if a senior Vinaya-holder wishes to take up a dispute, he should think very carefully about the ten grounds, examine them very carefully, and examine them very carefully, and then bring the dispute to rest. What are the ten? He should think: Will there be monks in this Saṅgha who hold the sūtras, hold the Vinaya, and hold the matrices — monks like myself who have mastered what I am about to teach? Is there a companion of mine within this Saṅgha who will bring this dispute among monks to rest in accordance with the Dharma, in accordance with the Vinaya, and in accordance with what the Teacher taught? Is there a companion of mine within this Saṅgha who will prevent this dispute among monks from spreading further? Is there a companion of mine within this Saṅgha who will bring this dispute among monks to rest in accordance with the Dharma, in such a way that it will not arise again in the future? Is there someone in this Saṅgha who intends to scatter this dispute — together with the monks who raised the charge and who replied — into the royal court, and to scatter it into its proper category there, and who should therefore be properly restrained in accordance with the Dharma? Can I bring this dispute to rest within this Saṅgha? Will it be the case that I need not seek the resolution of this dispute outside? Will it be possible for me to manage the matter so that the monks who raised the charge and who replied need not go from place to place? Can I bring this dispute to rest in such a way that it will not arise again in the future? These are the thoughts he should hold in mind.

Upāli, a Vinaya-holder who is endowed with ten qualities is capable of resolving a dispute that has arisen. What are the ten? He is able to teach the sūtras spoken by the Buddha; he is able to explain the sūtras taught by the śrāvakas; he is able to explain the sūtras that arose at the time of the Buddha; he is able to explain the sūtras that arose at all times; he is able to explain the sūtras that belong to one school; he is able to explain the sūtras that were taught as dark and as bright; he is able to explain the sūtras that are spoken everywhere, having sought out the sūtra tradition according to sūtra; he is able to explain the harmonious sūtras; and he is able to explain the sūtras that are in accord with the Vinaya.

Upāli, a Vinaya-holder who is steady and composed, having taken up a dispute, should bring it to rest by means of ten methods. What are the ten? He should know the monk who raised the charge. He should know the monk who replied. He should examine the monk who raised the charge. He should examine the monk who replied. He should have the monk who raised the charge take an oath. He should have the monk who replied take an oath. He should bring the monk who raised the charge to a determination. He should bring the monk who replied to a determination. He should cause the monk who raised the charge to rise. He should cause the monk who replied to rise.

A Vinaya-holder endowed with ten qualities is able to set forth offenses. What are the ten? He knows what is a grave offense. He knows what is a light offense. He knows what has a remainder. He knows what has no remainder. He knows what is a case of bad conduct. He knows what is not a case of bad conduct. He knows what was laid down. He knows what was not laid down. He knows what has been confessed. He knows what requires restraint.

A Vinaya-holder endowed with ten qualities is capable of performing formal acts. What are the ten? He knows a formal act that is manifest. He knows a formal act that is not manifest. He knows a formal act performed in the wrong context. He knows a formal act performed in the right context. He knows what is fitting to bring up for discussion. He knows what is not fitting to bring up for discussion. He knows what is fitting to recall. He knows what is not fitting to recall. He knows what is fitting as a basis for adjudication. He knows what is not fitting as a basis for adjudication.

A Vinaya-holder endowed with ten qualities is capable of resolving disputes. What are the ten? He does not err regarding what occurred. He does not err regarding what was laid down. He does not err regarding what was subsequently laid down. He does not err regarding what was not permitted. He does not err regarding what was subsequently permitted. He does not set forth an offense in a manner that is improper for a monk. He administers oaths to the monks who raised the charge and to those who replied.

He presents the words of the sūtras in their proper sense. He does not impair what has been subsequently established. He is in accordance with the Vinaya. He resolves disputes in accordance with the Dharma.

A Vinaya-holder endowed with ten qualities is capable of adjudicating by means of acts of penalty. What are the ten? He knows the act of brahmatic penalty. He knows the act of causing displeasure. He knows the act of causing non-association. He knows the act of making one unfit. He knows the act of causing one to seek one's own essential nature. He knows the act of reversal. He knows the act of expulsion. He knows the act of purification. He knows the act of consecration. He knows the act of reproof.

This completes the ascent from one section of the text of the holy Vinaya.

The holy text of the Vinaya, the twenty-eighth fascicle. This is a summary of the fifth among the five sūtras of the Vinaya: the twenty-four topics, the dispelling of fears, accepting and taking by stealth, full ordination, the boundary sections, food likewise with the division of occasions, the assembly hall, and the final topic. In summary:

The twenty-four, moral discipline and truth,
What is to be spoken, the defeats,
The two offenses, and the views,
Transgressions and weighty matters,
And how it is fitting, O son of good family,
These and the rest are set forth in order.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Reverend One, if a monk who is an accuser wishes to bring a charge against another, where should he stand and speak? And should he cause the monk to undergo a division of occasions?"

The Buddha replied: "Upāli, a monk who wishes to bring a charge against another monk should stand in five positions and then speak. And he should cause the monk to undergo a division of occasions."

"What are the five in which one causes a monk to undergo a division of occasions? One bares one shoulder of the upper robe, removes one's sandals, sits in order of seniority, joins one's palms in añjali toward the community of monks, and with a mind of loving-kindness, one causes the monk who is the subject of the charge to undergo a division of occasions."

"A monk who brings a charge and wishes to speak against another should keep these five things inwardly in mind and then speak against the other. What are the five? He should reflect: 'Am I possessed of moral discipline and have I completed prior training? Am I endowed with a sense of shame and the capacity to distinguish? Am I restrained by my vows and do I wish to train? Am I widely learned and do I retain what I have heard — am I trained in the recitation of scriptural transmissions and so forth? Am I utterly unassailable in the Vinaya and in the higher Vinaya?' Having thus reflected, the monk who brings the charge and wishes to speak against another should, keeping those five things inwardly in mind, then speak against the other."

"Furthermore, a monk who is an accuser and who wishes to bring a charge should keep these five things inwardly in mind before speaking. What are the five? He should think: 'Is it with truth or with untruth that I, wishing to bring this charge against another, am taking up this matter? Is this a timely matter or untimely? Is the matter I am raising fitting to the occasion or unfitting? Is the matter I am raising one that is meaningful or not meaningful? And am I speaking from what I have seen, from what I have heard, or from what I suspect?' The monk who brings charges and wishes to speak against another should keep those five things inwardly in mind and then speak against the other."

"A monk who speaks a charge should cause the monk who is being charged to undergo a division of occasions in five ways. What are the five? As follows: 'Know that a charge is being brought against you. Venerable One, a statement is being made to you. Venerable One, a charge is being brought against you. Venerable One, you are to be reminded. Venerable One, you are to open an occasion for me.' Whichever among defeats, the remainder pertaining to the Saṅgha, transgressions, confessable offenses, and wrongdoings is being stated to you, expressed to you, charged against you, recalled to you, and opened as an occasion against you — if it has become a wrongdoing, whether it arose from a defeat or from the remainder pertaining to the Saṅgha, or —"

— or arising from a confessable offense, or arising from a training: whatever is to be stated to you, confessed, restrained, whatever has gone far beyond the Vinaya, or arising from wrong speech, or from misconduct — whatever wrongdoing is to be stated to you, whatever is to be stated to you as seen, heard, or suspected; whatever transgression of body or transgression of speech is to be stated to you; whether a grave downfall or a light one, with remainder or completely without remainder, or having gone beyond all — whatever downfall is to be stated to you; whether a breach of moral discipline, a breach of view, or a breach of livelihood — whatever breach in its entirety is to be stated to you; whether while walking, standing, sitting, lying down, or pacing — whatever mode of conduct is to be stated to you; whether done in a village, at a hermitage, on a road, gone astray from a road, or done in a secluded place — in whatever place it was done: the charging monk makes this statement, saying, "It shall be raised with you." Having opened the occasion in these five respects and having taken an oath, only then should the charge be brought.

If the one being charged does not acknowledge the charge, the charging monk should bring it with a mind of loving-kindness, a mind of compassion, a mind of wishing benefit, a mind of affection, and a mind of wishing to uplift him.

The monk who answers the charge, for his part, when the one bringing the charge does so, should stand in five modes and open an occasion for the charging monk. What are the five? He should rise from his seat, remove his sandals, arrange his outer robe over one shoulder, bow with palms joined in deference to those senior in the order, remain in a respectful posture, and — bringing himself under the sway of a sense of reverence — open an occasion for the charging monk.

When the monk who has answered the charge wishes to open an occasion for the charging monk, he should first examine the charging monk in these five respects. What are the five? First, whether this venerable one is possessed of moral discipline and is formerly complete in it; whether he is possessed of conscience and remorse; whether he holds his vow and wishes to hold it. Second, whether the venerable one has heard much, retains what he has heard, has accumulated what he has heard, and has learned the recitation of texts by heart; and whether he is thoroughly and unquestionably versed in the Vinaya, the Higher Vinaya, and the sūtras. It is after the answering monk has examined the charging monk in these five respects that he should thereafter open an occasion for him.

When the answering monk wishes to open an occasion for the charging monk, he should settle within himself mindfulness of these five things, and then open the occasion. What are the five? "The charge brought against me is brought on the basis of truth, not on the basis of falsehood; it is brought at the right time, not at the wrong time; it is brought with meaningful purpose, not without purpose; it is brought in gentle words, not in harsh ones; it is brought with loving-kindness, not with aversion — where else would I find such a thing from another?" Having reflected in this way, the answering monk who wishes to open an occasion for the charging monk should settle these five things inwardly in mindfulness, and then address the charging monk with these words: "O venerable charging one, take note and speak to me. Venerable One, open an occasion for me. Venerable One, bring your charge against me. As to what you have stated by way of opening an occasion for the venerable one — what you have stated to me, what you have charged me with, what you have recalled to me, what you have opened as an occasion against me — and for what reason you open an occasion for me: of the offenses, whether it be a defeat, a remainder pertaining to the Saṅgha, a downfall, or a confessable offense — which of these do you raise?"

Of all such offenses — whether arising from a defeat, from what remains pertaining to the Saṅgha, from a downfall, or from a confessable offense, or from a training — I shall open an occasion. Whether it is something to be confessed, something to be restrained, a transgression of the Vinaya, something arising from slander, or something arising from manifest conduct: state which offense it is that opens an occasion. Was it something I saw, heard, suspected, transgressed in body, or transgressed in speech? State what manifest conduct you speak of against me. State whether what you bring against me is grave or light, whether it comes with a remainder or without remainder, or whether it has entirely passed. State what fault you speak of against me. Whether it is a fault in moral discipline, a fault in view, a fault in conduct, a fault in livelihood, or a fault in all of these — state which fault you name. Speak from whatever deportment was observed: walking, standing, sitting, lying down, or not lying down. Speak from what was done in a village, what was done in a monastery, what was done on a road, what was done off the road, what was done at night, or what was done by day — state where I did it.

The charging monk, having opened an occasion for the charged monk in these five ways, should cause him to make a pledge and should say these words: "State the offense in accordance with the pledge made by the charging monk."

In brief:

Those relating to fear and confusion, brahmic penalties and non-observance of proper conduct, censure penalties and direct confrontation, and those relating to truths — all are to be handled accordingly.

When the charging monk has opened an occasion, the charged monk should at that time be steadfast in five points: "O venerable one, do not be frightened. Do not make yourself afraid. Do not make yourself terrified. Do not be altogether terrified. Do not make yourself altogether terrified. Do not be alarmed. Do not make yourself alarmed. Do not shrink back. Do not make yourself shrink back."

The charging monk should further be steadfast in five points toward the charged monk: "O venerable one, I do not take hold of your confusion. I do not take hold of the occasion of your alarm. O venerable one, I hold you to a definitive position. O venerable one, I place the matter in a pledge to be made up to three times."

The charging monk should further be steadfast in yet another five points toward the charged monk: "If you, venerable one, are to be rightly subject to a brahmic penalty, then a brahmic penalty shall be pronounced upon you. If you are to be rightly subject to an act of censure, then an act of censure shall be performed. If you, venerable one, act without proper conduct, then you shall be counted among those who act without proper conduct. If you, venerable one, speak face-to-face of a fault, then you shall be counted among those who speak face-to-face of a fault. If you lay hands on another saying 'He is the one who said it,' then you shall be counted among those who lay hands on another saying 'He is the one who said it.' If you do not heed the pronouncement, then you shall be counted among those who do not heed pronouncements. If by remaining silent you do not heed the pronouncement, then you shall be counted among those who remain altogether silent."

The charging monk should further be steadfast in yet another five points toward the charged monk: "If you, venerable one, are to be rightly subject to a censure act, then a censure act shall be performed upon you. If you are to be rightly subject to an act of separate enjoyment of requisites, then an act of separate enjoyment shall be performed. If you are to be rightly subject to an act of not appearing in sight, then an act of not appearing in sight shall be performed upon you. If you are to be rightly subject to expulsion, then an act of expulsion shall be performed. If you are to be rightly subject to an act of reproach, then an act of reproach shall be performed. If you are to be rightly subject to reconciliation, then an act of reconciliation shall be performed upon you. If you are to be rightly subject to abandonment, then an act of abandonment shall be performed upon you."

Furthermore, the monk who raises the matter shall, in five further respects, be confident before the monk who has been addressed. If it is right that you, Venerable, be punished with a penalty, then you shall be punished with a penalty. If it is right that you be dismissed from the root and punished with a penalty, then you shall be dismissed from the root and punished with a penalty. If it is right that you be made to carry out a probationary penance, then you shall be made to carry out a probationary penance. If it is right that you be dismissed from the root and made to carry out a probationary penance, then you shall be dismissed from the root and made to carry out a probationary penance. If it is right that you be again dismissed from the root and made to carry out a penalty, then the formal act of again dismissing you from the root and making you carry out a penalty shall be performed upon you. If it is right that you be again dismissed from the root and made to carry out a probationary penance, then you shall be again dismissed from the root and made to carry out a probationary penance.

Furthermore, the monk who raises the matter shall, in five further respects, be confident before the monk who has been addressed. If it is right that you, Venerable, be disciplined by direct acknowledgment, then you shall be disciplined by direct acknowledgment. If it is right that you be disciplined by recollection, then you shall be disciplined by recollection. If it is right that you be disciplined through a declaration of non-confusion, then you shall be disciplined through a declaration of non-confusion. If it is right that you be disciplined by an inquiry into the nature of the matter, then you shall be disciplined by an inquiry into the nature of the matter. If it is right that multiple blades of grass be given to you, then multiple blades of grass shall be given to you.

Furthermore, the monk who raises the matter shall, in five further respects, be confident before the monk who has been addressed. You who have been addressed, hear this. Concerning whatever has been asked of you, speak accordingly. Do so in such a way that you do not disgrace yourself, that you do not harm others, that you do not oppress those monks who are without fault, that you do not openly revile those monks who have come forward openly, and that you do not bring what you say into conflict with the words of the sūtras in the presence of authoritative monks. If you act in this way, it will be virtuous and exceedingly wholesome.

In brief:

The offense alleged is to be admitted accordingly — acknowledgment, view, the restoration ceremony, the teacher and what is practiced,
the fall of status, and expulsion.

The five ways in which an offense is committed: an offense arising from shamelessness, an offense arising from doubt, an offense arising from not knowing, an offense arising from weakness of mind, and an offense arising from failure of mindfulness.

The five things to be abandoned: making a request, making an inquiry, giving an instruction, speaking to some, and making a declaration.

What is meant by making a request? One requests of you, Venerable, saying: "Do not, even in the slightest, do what would prevent you, Venerable, from becoming an ascetic." What is meant by making an inquiry? One asks you, Venerable: "Have you, Venerable, done even the slightest thing that would prevent you from becoming an ascetic?" What is meant by giving an instruction? One gives you the instruction: "Do not, Venerable, do what would prevent you from becoming an ascetic." What is meant by speaking to some? One urges: "Venerable, be careful not to act as certain others do in preventing themselves from becoming ascetics." What is meant by making a declaration? One declares again and again to you, Venerable, for the sake of preventing you from ceasing to be an ascetic.

The five ways of making an acknowledgment that is not in accordance with the Dharma: making an acknowledgment out of fear of the king, making an acknowledgment out of fear of a thief, making an acknowledgment out of fear of the intimidation of the village community, making an acknowledgment out of fear of punishment, and making an acknowledgment without regard for the ascetic life itself.

The five ways of making an acknowledgment in accordance with the Dharma are the reversal of the above in five modes toward the white side.

The five ways of declaring a view that is not in accordance with the Dharma: declaring a view with respect to an object, omitting nothing that remains — declaring a view with respect to the object of what is being acknowledged, declaring a view with respect to the object of the offence when a different offence has arisen, declaring a view with respect to an object that is not fit to be acknowledged, and declaring a view while wishing not to rise. The five ways of declaring a view in accordance with the Dharma are likewise those that arise from virtue and method, reversed toward the white side in five modes.

The five preceptors of a novice are: the preceptor of the novice's training, the preceptor who instructs in secret, the preceptor who performs the act, the preceptor who assigns the residence, and the preceptor who reads aloud. Who is the preceptor of the novice's training? The one who has given the basis of training for a novice. Who is the preceptor who instructs in secret? The one who gives the secret instruction at the time of full ordination. Who is the preceptor who performs the act? The one who has carried out the act of full ordination. Who is the preceptor who assigns the residence? The one from whom one has earnestly requested a residence up to three times, and by whom it has been assigned. Who is the preceptor who reads aloud? The one from whom even a single word has been received with the intention of taking it up.

The five kinds of exclusion are: being forbidden to speak, not being shown scriptural transmission, not being kept company, cutting off the virtuous side, and dissolving the assigned residence — these are the five. What is being forbidden to speak? Not being spoken to at all, in any way whatsoever. What is not being shown scriptural transmission? Not transmitting scriptural texts to that person, nor giving subsequent instruction. Not showing teachings. What is not being kept company? Not making one's own whatever service that person has rendered. What is cutting off the virtuous side? Not teaching that person recitation, yoga, or mental application. What is dissolving the assigned residence? Not allowing entry into the residence.

By five factors the assigned residence is broken: being expelled, rising up and leaving, falling back, going from one's own side to a different side, and giving rise to the thought of hopelessness — these are the five.

If one is endowed with five qualities, one may be given a residence assignment. What are the five? One has faith, one is accompanied by respect, one has applied diligence, one is receptive to speech, and one is a spiritual friend of virtue.

If one is endowed with five qualities, the residence assignment is to be dissolved. What are the five? One lacks faith, one has no respect, one is lazy, one is unreceptive to speech, and one is a companion in wrongdoing.

If a companion and attendant are endowed with five qualities, they are to be expelled. What are the five? Lack of faith, absence of respect, laziness, unreceptiveness to speech, and companionship in wrongdoing.

If a companion and attendant are endowed with five qualities, they are not to be expelled. These five, reversed toward the white side in five modes, are to be stated.

If a companion and attendant are endowed with five qualities, they are not to be tolerated: lack of faith, absence of respect, laziness, unreceptiveness to speech, and companionship in wrongdoing.

If a companion and attendant are endowed with five qualities, they are to be tolerated: these are to be stated reversed toward the white side in five modes.

In brief: the three types of receiving, destruction, the nāga and the acknowledgment of offences, the paṇḍaka of male and female types, the suitable residence, and the two kinds of dust.

The five types of receiving are: giving with the body to the body, receiving with the body in the body, giving with what is held by the body to the body, giving with what is held by the body to what is held by the body, and receiving by placement — these are the five. How is the giving with the body to the body? Something passes from the hand and is received in the hand. How is the receiving with the body in the body? Something is given from the hand and received into the alms bowl. How is the giving with what is held by the body to the body? Something is given by means of a vessel and received in the hand. How is the giving with what is held by the body to what is held by the body? Something is given from a vessel and received into a vessel.

How is the receiving by placement? There are people known as the reviled — even their fathers and brothers revile them, to say nothing of others. One places an alms bowl before them and says: "Good-looking one, if you would give, pour it into this alms bowl." If they then pour into that bowl, this is called receiving by placement.

Furthermore, there are five kinds of giving and receiving: on a seat, on a small seat, on a low stool, on a mat, and at the base of an alms bowl.

There are five ways in which, even though giving and receiving occur, no valid giving and receiving has taken place: taking without it having been given; taking without intending to eat it; taking it while perceiving it as belonging to someone else; taking it when one is not present before the giver; and taking from someone who is not a proper person.

There are five ways in which giving and receiving, though completed, become invalidated. What are the five? It is seized away; it is lost; it is discarded; it returns; or the time has passed.

The five natures of nāgas: the remainder are emanations. By nature they are born; by nature they die; by nature they sleep; by nature they become angry; and by nature they engage in unchaste conduct, that is, they engage in sexual behavior.

The five transgressions are: defeat, that which belongs as a remainder to the Saṅgha, downfall, individual confession, and wrongdoing.

Five modes in which a transgression arises: there are transgressions that arise from body but not from speech; transgressions that arise from speech but not from body; transgressions that arise from body and mind but not from speech; transgressions that arise from speech and mind but not from body; and transgressions that arise from body, mind, and speech together.

Five modes in which one is cleared of a transgression: by being seen; by being proclaimed; by not having done it from the beginning; by consecration; and by confession — these are the five.

Five types of pandaka of the male kind: the pandaka by nature, the half-monthly pandaka, the pandaka of jealousy, the pandaka of attachment, and the impaired pandaka.

What is the pandaka by nature? One who has become a pandaka by nature. What is the half-monthly pandaka? For half the month they become male, and for half the month they become female. What is the pandaka of jealousy? One who, upon seeing another engaged in misconduct, thereupon commits misconduct himself. What is the pandaka of attachment? One who, when another acts upon him and presses him, thereupon does it. What is the impaired pandaka? One whose male organ has been eaten by an animal or severed by a weapon.

There are also five types of pandaka of the female kind: one who has both sets of marks; one who is connected at both openings; one who flows continuously; one who lacks a monthly mark; and one who has only the appearance of a mark.

Five suitable sites: one where an object has been obtained; one where an object has not yet been obtained; one where an object has been abandoned; one where there was already something beforehand; and one that is unoccupied — these are the five.

What is a suitable site where an object has been obtained? It is one where all those objects are fully complete. Whatever has been consecrated is consecrated by three means: by generating the intention, by declaring it to one another, and by making a request.

What is a suitable site where an object has not yet been obtained? Even if it is small, it is one where even a foundation stone has been laid. This too is consecrated in that same threefold manner of consecration.

What is a suitable site where an object has been abandoned? One that has been consecrated as a formally suitable site but then abandoned, and then consecrated again as a suitable site by that same threefold consecration.

What is a suitable site that existed beforehand? It is one that has been shared in common by various remarkable tīrthikas (non-Buddhist adherents), such that consecrated by the Saṅgha through that same threefold consecration.

What is a suitable site where none has yet been established? It is a place where previously there was no suitable site, but which has been enclosed by a wall, enclosed by a fence, or enclosed by a ditch — and within that enclosure the Saṅgha has drawn a line on the ground, or driven in a stake, or enclosed it with a wall, or erected any other marker whatsoever. Through that threefold consecration it is consecrated as a suitable site.

The five kinds of dust are: dust of food, dust of drink, dust of fragrance, dust of medicine, and dust that is dust itself — these are the five. Furthermore, there is another set of five kinds of dust: dust of what is chewed, dust of what is placed in the mouth, dust of porridge, dust of what is licked, and dust of what is tasted — these are the five.

In brief:

Theft, and the opening of an opportunity, gifts, and the place of the restoration ceremony, the recitation of a scriptural ruling, and the two kinds of going near a village.

The five kinds of theft are: stealing by deception, stealing by force, stealing while saying "I am returning it," stealing by snatching, and stealing after having dedicated it — these are the five.

The five kinds of persons one must not admit into an assembly are: one who is shameless, one who has an impediment, one whose word is unreliable, one who does not remain in their natural state, and one who has incurred a root defeat — these are the five.

The five kinds of giving that are counted as non-meritorious are: giving a weapon, giving alcohol, giving poison, giving a woman, and giving what is contrary to Dharma — these are the five.

Five causes and conditions whereby not attending the restoration ceremony does not constitute an offense: being impeded by a king, being carried away by water, being burned by fire, being impeded by non-human beings — these are the five.

The five kinds of recitation of a scriptural ruling are: reciting it while being mad, with a disturbed mind, afflicted by illness; reciting it while pretending to be disciplined, out of devotion to wrongdoing; reciting it while being foolish, being stupid, lowly, and confused; reciting it out of manifest arrogance; and reciting it while being genuinely and fully liberated — these are the five.

When a monk who goes near a village enters that village, five occasions of fault are to be recognized. What are the five? Going into the village at an improper time without having informed the monks who are present; sitting down on a seat without having examined it properly; teaching the Dharma to a woman in more than five statements; sitting together with a woman alone on the same seat; and insistently sitting down on a seat in a village that has a bad reputation — these are the five.

When a monk who goes near a village enters the village with heedlessness, these further five occasions of fault are also to be recognized: looking at a woman continually; looking at her and then engaging in conversation; becoming familiar through conversation; once familiar, entertaining improper thoughts; and having entertained improper thoughts, coming to dislike the celibate life — up to the point of committing a grave offense, or surrendering the training, or falling back to the lower state.

In brief:

Full ordination and individual liberation, admission, Vinaya, liberation, the five permanent ones and the lesser,

the unborn, and the suspected.

Full ordination is spoken of for five reasons: the name is drawn from the preceptor, the name is drawn from the Saṅgha, the name comes from the one who wishes to be fully ordained, a request is made, and the act is not impaired — these are the five.

In the age when a buddha has appeared, the five kinds of full ordination are: direct penetration of gnosis, acceptance of what one will teach, acceptance of the pure code of conduct, being addressed by the words "Come, monk," and the absence of a master and preceptor — thus these are the five.

The five kinds of recitation of the individual liberation:

a request having been made, the origin-statement is recited, and then "the remainder has been heard" is proclaimed — this is the first recitation of the individual liberation. A request having been made, and the origin-statement and the four defeats having been read, and "the remainder has been heard" proclaimed — this is the second reading of the sūtra of individual liberation. A request having been made, and the origin-statement, the four defeats, and the thirteen remainders of the Saṅgha having been read, and "the remainders have been heard" proclaimed — this is the third reading of the sūtra of individual liberation. A request having been made, and the origin-statement, the four defeats, the thirteen remainders of the Saṅgha, and the two indeterminate cases having been read, and "the remainder has been heard" proclaimed — this is the fourth reading of the sūtra of individual liberation. And the fifth is the complete reading of the sūtra.

The five ways of taking something to heart: it is dear, in that it is pleasing; it is patient, in that there is no opposition; it is a teacher, in that it is to be revered; it is accepted, in that it acts according to one's wishes; and it provides lodging and sustenance — thinking of it in that way. And upon hearing that it has been taken up, one becomes glad.

The five kinds of discipline: during the lifetime of a buddha, constantly, one-sidedly, universally, and taming the afflictions.

Further, another five kinds of discipline: taming through objects, taming through time, taming through place, taming through persons, and taming through conflict.

The Vinaya is not expounded to five kinds of persons: one who questions while seeking an opportunity to cause harm, one who questions with the intention of injuring, one who questions with the intention of finding fault, one who questions with the intention of defeating in argument, and one who questions with the desire to speak of faults.

The five qualities of a permanent robe: it does not become obligatory after one day, it does not become obligatory after ten days, it does not become obligatory even beyond ten days, one may keep a surplus robe without dedicating it, and one may travel and move about wearing an upper and lower garment.

Further, another five qualities of a permanent robe: there is no communal eating, no repeated eating, one may go without being invited, one may seek a Dharma robe as one pleases, and from the last month of autumn until the beginning of the first month of spring, whatever is obtained is divided equally with the Saṅgha that has kept the rains retreat together.

Five kinds of persons are not appointed to assign a permanent robe: one who has not kept the rains retreat, one whose rains retreat was interrupted, one who entered the later rains retreat, one who entered the rains retreat elsewhere as is the custom, and one who has been expelled.

Further, another five kinds of persons are not appointed to assign a permanent robe: one who remains separately, one who does not remain, one who has sided with a faction, one who has surrendered the training, and one who has disrobed.

Further, another five kinds of persons are not appointed to assign a permanent robe: one who has been suspended for not seeing a fault, one who has been suspended so as not to repeat the act, one who has been suspended for not relinquishing a wrongful view, one who has sided with a faction, and one who does not remain.

Further, another five kinds of persons are not appointed to assign a permanent robe: one who imposes penalties, one who imposes penalties on the basis of a root matter, one who acts to please, one who acts to please on the basis of a root matter, and one who has behaved in a manner aimed at pleasing.

Five kinds of persons have no authority over gains: one who has not kept the rains retreat, one whose rains retreat was interrupted, one who entered the later rains retreat as is the custom, a novice monk's father, and one who has surrendered the training.

Further, another five kinds of persons have no authority over gains: one who has been suspended for not seeing a fault, one who has been suspended for not repeating the act, one who has been suspended for not relinquishing a wrongful view, one who has drawn near to a faction, and one who does not remain.

Five kinds of persons are neither in authority over gains nor have any quality in relation to them: one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, and one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent.

Further, another five kinds of persons are neither in authority over gains nor have any quality in relation to them: a hermaphrodite, one who has expelled a nun, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), one who is a thief-dweller, and one who had previously committed an offense.

Five qualities render a monk incapable of being made a preceptor: he is without faith, he is of bad moral discipline, he has heard little, he is miserly, and he is of defective wisdom.

Five kinds of persons are of such a nature that they cannot be born from within this Dharma and Vinaya: one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, and one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent.

Further, another five kinds of persons are of such a nature that they cannot be born from within this Dharma and Vinaya: a hermaphrodite, one who has expelled a nun, one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one who is a thief-dweller, and one who had previously committed an offense.

A monk possessing five qualities is one who is suspected of wrongdoing: one who consorts with a female yakṣa, one who consorts with a prostitute, one who consorts with a widow, one who consorts with a young woman of high station, and one who consorts with a female hermaphrodite.

In brief:

More than three intervals remaining,
one who moves to a swift residence, robes and suitable medicines, and a needle-case likewise the same.

A boundary is dissolved again in five ways: the entire Saṅgha departs, the entire Saṅgha disperses, the entire Saṅgha dies and passes away, the entire Saṅgha scatters in all directions and is cut off, and a fifth is that a formal request and act have been performed.

Further, a boundary is dissolved again in five other ways: there is no marker, there is no monk, there is no expectation, another boundary is encircled, and a fifth is that a formal request and act have been performed.

In five ways it is said that no surplus has been made: one makes a surplus of food and drink without it having come into direct presence, one makes a surplus of food and drink without receiving it, one makes a surplus without directing another, one makes a surplus in the presence of one not fully ordained, and one makes a surplus in the presence of one who does not remain by nature. The making of a surplus is to be stated as reversed in five ways on the side of the wholesome.

For a person who speaks rapidly, five objects of fault are to be known. What are the five? The body will become weary, mindfulness will decline, the mind will be harmed, the throat will be obstructed, and one will not reach a clear understanding at the margins. These are the objects of fault for a person who speaks rapidly. For a person who does not speak rapidly, five virtues arise — to be stated reversed in five ways on the side of the wholesome.

For a person who remains long in one place, five objects of fault arise: what has not been absorbed will not become absorbed, what has been absorbed will decline, even what Dharma has been heard will be forgotten, one will experience great harm, and one will not be accompanied by friends. For a person who does not remain long in one place, five virtues arise — these are to be stated reversed in five ways on the side of the wholesome.

For one who is constantly on the move, five objects of fault arise: what has not been absorbed will not become absorbed, what has been absorbed will decline, even what Dharma has been heard will be forgotten, one will experience great harm, and one will not be accompanied by friends. For one who is not constantly on the move, five virtues arise — these are to be stated reversed in five ways on the side of the wholesome.

Permissible robes are of five kinds: wool, cotton-wool, silk-wool, kambala-hemp cloth, and linen cloth.

In five ways a Dharma-robe that has been consecrated is dissolved back: it is seized away, it is given away, it is retrieved back, it lapses, and the owner has died.

In five ways, what has been consecrated is likewise dissolved back: it is seized away, it is given away, it is retrieved back, it lapses, and the owner has died. The same is to be stated for a consecrated alms-bowl. Likewise, the same is to be stated for consecrated medicine and dedicated medicine.

A needle-case is not to be entrusted to five kinds of persons: one without shame, one who harbors resentment, one who does not know moderation, one whose mindfulness has weakened, and one who is naturally unstable.

In brief:

The wandering ascetic who eats in the prescribed manner, the layman, the sick person — two — the five who have gone forth, and the many virtues — all are likewise to be understood.

Five are the objects of fault in one who eats without measure: the body becomes heavy; one becomes unfit for work and unable to endure exertion; breathing in and out becomes uncomfortable; excrement and urine increase greatly; and the mind becomes entirely overcome by torpor and sleep, so that it does not become one-pointed but becomes distracted. For one who observes measure in eating, five virtues arise — these are to be stated reversed in five ways on the side of the wholesome.

If possessed of five qualities, a wandering ascetic who follows along behind need not be led: he goes far too much ahead, he comes dawdling far behind, he walks jostling others, he interrupts conversations, and he is unable to receive what is obtained in a fitting and appropriate manner. The same reversed in five ways on the side of the wholesome is likewise to be stated for receiving what is found when one has two alms-bowls or finds something while carrying an alms-bowl.

A layman possessed of five qualities is a defiled layman, a deceiving layman, a corrupt layman — he is to be known as a layman of ignoble kind: he is one of bad moral discipline who does not fulfill the training completely; he relies on omens and auspicious signs, trusting in omens and auspicious signs to purify rather than through the activity of faith in the Dharma; he holds wrong views, and with wrong views he is one who extensively disparages monks; he dominates the Saṅgha of elders, middle-standing monks, and novices, and thereby reviles the monks residing there.

A layman possessed of five qualities is a layman like a lotus, a layman like a white lotus — he is to be regarded as an excellent layman. These are to be stated reversed in five ways on the side of the wholesome.

A sick person possessed of five qualities is difficult to attend upon as a patient: he possesses the qualities of being unamenable to instruction, being unamenable to what is instructed; he does not act as directed by the attendant; he does not know what is beneficial and what is not; he does not rely on medicine; and whatever provisions come to him he distributes them all to others for their sustenance, while not knowing when ailments are exhausted or not exhausted. These same are to be stated reversed in five ways on the side of the wholesome.

If possessed of five qualities, it is inappropriate to appoint someone as an attendant for a sick patient: he is unamenable to instruction and possesses the qualities of being unamenable; he does not act toward the patient as directed; he does not know what is beneficial and what is not beneficial for the patient; he is unable to prepare medicine for the patient; and he attends the patient for the sake of food rather than for the sake of Dharma, and he is one who reviles — having thoroughly abused the patient, he is unwilling and contemptuous when it comes to disposing of the patient's excrement, urine, saliva, vomit, and pus. These are to be stated reversed in five ways on the side of the wholesome.

One who is possessed of five qualities and has completed ten years may bestow going forth, may bestow full ordination, and may bestow residence. What are the five? Being endowed with moral discipline, being learned, holding the sūtra collections, holding the Vinaya, and holding what resembles a mother.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being endowed with moral discipline, being learned, being skilled in the sūtra collections, being skilled in the Vinaya, and being skilled in what resembles a mother.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being endowed with moral discipline, being greatly learned, knowing the sūtra collections, knowing the Vinaya, and knowing what resembles a mother.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being endowed with moral discipline, being greatly learned, being clear in the sūtra collections, being clear in the Vinaya, and being clear in what resembles a mother.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being possessed of moral discipline, being greatly learned, being able to introduce a companion or a personal attendant to the sūtra collections, the Vinaya, and what resembles a mother.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being possessed of moral discipline, being greatly learned, and having trained in the higher moral discipline, the higher mind, and the higher Vinaya.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being possessed of moral discipline, being greatly learned, training in the training that goes beyond the training, the higher Vinaya, and the higher individual liberation.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being endowed with faith, being endowed with moral discipline, being endowed with learning, being endowed with generosity, and being endowed with wisdom.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being endowed with moral discipline, being endowed with wisdom, being endowed with meditative absorption, being endowed with liberation, and being endowed with the gnosis that sees liberation.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being possessed of moral discipline, being greatly learned, undertaking diligence, establishing mindfulness, and being possessed of wisdom.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being possessed of moral discipline, being greatly learned, having undertaken diligence, abiding in meditative equipoise, and being possessed of wisdom.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being possessed of moral discipline, being greatly learned, having undertaken diligence, striving to place the mind correctly within, and being possessed of wisdom.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being endowed with the aggregate of moral discipline belonging to one still in training, the aggregate of meditative absorption, the aggregate of wisdom, the aggregate of liberation, and the aggregate of the gnosis that sees liberation.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: being endowed with the aggregate of moral discipline belonging to one beyond training, the aggregate of meditative absorption, the aggregate of wisdom, the aggregate of liberation, and the aggregate of the gnosis that sees liberation.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: knowing what constitutes a transgression, knowing what has been instituted, knowing what has been subsequently instituted, knowing what is permitted, and knowing what has been subsequently permitted.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: knowing what is an impediment, knowing what is not an impediment, being able to instruct, to give supplementary instruction, and to assign residence.

Furthermore, stated in another set of five: knowing what is a transgression, knowing what is not a transgression, knowing what is heavy, knowing what is light, and being thoroughly versed in the sūtra of individual liberation and able to recite it by heart.

One who is possessed of these five qualities may bestow going forth, may bestow full ordination, may bestow residence, and may himself sit without taking up residence. Of the first group of five, there are two deficient cases: after having received full ordination, whether ten years have passed or more, and whether one is a companion or a personal attendant — if one is able to nurse a sick person or to cause another to nurse them; and whether one is a companion or a personal attendant — if, when a doubt arises, one is able to resolve it or cause it to be resolved; and whether one is a companion or a personal attendant — if, when the companion or attendant has fallen to looking upon what is blameworthy, one is able to send them away or cause them to be sent away; and whether one is a companion or a personal attendant — if the companion or attendant has become discontented in this residence, one is able to bring them to accept a different location. If one possesses these five qualities, one may confer the going forth, confer full ordination, grant residence, and dwell without setting oneself up as their preceptor.

The noble text of the Vinaya, the twenty-ninth fascicle. The middle verses of the Sūtra of the Five are to be recited.

Ten years: the fourth sūtra collection, and the remaining: the conduct and the complete — these two are made, and diligence is begun.

Yet another, the third: the aggregates, and likewise the arising — in two;

the interruptions and the offenses, and finally, gathered into categories.

The five objects of fault for one who does not uphold the Vinaya are: it is profound; one lacks confidence; one's intentions are many; it is expressed in worldly script; and it is difficult to understand.

The five qualities of a person who upholds the Vinaya are: one becomes the guardian of the treasury within the Victor's domain; one conceals and utterly conceals the heap of one's own moral discipline; one transmits the scripture to others; the teaching does not come to depend on another; one becomes a refuge for the four assemblies gathered together; and one becomes a refuge for the wise, for those leading the holy life equal to Brahmā, when remorse arises in them.

Furthermore, the five qualities of a person who upholds the Vinaya are: one dwells fearlessly in the midst of the Saṅgha; one comes to have thoroughly mastered the topics of training; one causes the teaching of the Teacher to increase; one proclaims the Dharma; and, having made this training the governing principle, one stands established at the crown of those outside this — the non-Buddhists.

Furthermore, the five qualities of a person who upholds the Vinaya are: in whatever direction a person who upholds the Vinaya resides, that direction becomes illumined, becomes clearly illumined, becomes brilliantly illumined; that direction is not left empty by me; and in whatever direction a person who upholds the Vinaya dwells, the Tathāgata's activity in that direction is lessened.

Furthermore, the five qualities of a person who upholds the Vinaya are: knowing what has arisen; knowing what has been laid down; knowing what has been subsequently laid down; knowing what has been abandoned; and knowing what has been permitted.

Furthermore, the five qualities of a person who upholds the Vinaya are: knowing what is an offense; knowing what is not an offense; knowing what is heavy; knowing what is light; and one recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra and proclaims it in full.

Furthermore, the five qualities of a person who upholds the Vinaya are: knowing what constitutes an interruption; knowing what does not constitute an interruption; transmitting the scripture; giving subsequent instruction; and being able to establish one in a residence.

In brief:

What has been abandoned and the second, and the bowing there — make these two;
the second permitted: the food, and the lodging allowance — likewise.

The five ways in which one is said to have abandoned: manifestly eating; manifestly appearing to give food; manifestly receiving food; manifestly appearing to renounce food; and manifestly rising from one's seat.

How does one manifestly eat? One abandons again the five kinds of food and the five kinds of lodging allowance.

How does one manifestly appear to give food? One manifests to a man, a woman, or a neuter person.

How does one manifestly receive food? The five foods and the five lodging allowances have been brought to accord.

How does one manifestly appear to renounce food? One declares, "I do not want the five foods and the five lodging allowances," and abandons them.

What is meant by manifestly rising from one's seat? It is simply rising from one's seat.

The five ways in which one is said to have not abandoned: the reverse of such, expressed in five ways.

Furthermore, the five reasons why one is said to have not abandoned are:

One abandons by mixing what is unsuitable to eat with food, and what is unsuitable to lodge with lodging. One abandons by setting it down or mixing it with what has been set down. One abandons by what is not beneficial, or by mixing it with what is not beneficial. One abandons by what is not wanted, or by mixing it with what is not wanted. And there is the case of not having been satisfied, or of not having become complete.

These are called the five ways of abandoning. The reverse of those, expressed as five, is to be stated as not having abandoned.

Furthermore, the five ways in which abandonment expressed in words that include a remainder is called not having abandoned are these: saying "That will do for now," saying "Set it aside for now," saying "I will eat it later," saying "I do not need it for now," and saying "I will see whether I am satisfied or not." These five are called not having abandoned.

The five ways of abandoning expressed in words that include no remainder are: saying "That is enough," saying "Set it aside," saying "I have finished eating," saying "I do not need it," and saying "I am satisfied." These five words, free from any remainder, are called having abandoned.

The five kinds of rag-robes are: the rag-robe from a market, one carried away by water, one that has been used as a rag, one found lying in a wilderness, and one taken from an old storehouse — these are the five.

Furthermore, the five kinds of rag-robes are: one eaten by cattle, one eaten by rats, one eaten by birds, one scorched by fire, and one discarded by a mother — these are the five.

The five ways of making something suitable for use are: making it suitable by fire, making it suitable by a blade, making it suitable by a fingernail, making it suitable by a needle, and making it suitable by wringing — these are the five.

Furthermore, the five ways of making suitable are: extracting, picking out, cutting, scraping off, and rendering it into a non-seed state — these are the five.

The five foods are: grain that has been husked, flour that has been cooked, meat, fish, and dry provisions.

The five medicinal lodging allowances are: root preparations, trunk preparations, leaf preparations, flower preparations, and grain preparations.

Furthermore, the five additional lodging allowances are: preparations of flour cakes, preparations of fermented foods, preparations of dried provisions, preparations of sugar, and preparations of ale.

One who is weakened in five ways may take consecrated sugar as a lodging allowance: one who has eaten only a small amount of food, one who has not eaten at all, one who is afflicted by illness, one who has set out on a journey, and one who is beginning new work.

In brief:

The bath-house, moral discipline one cannot bear,
Many friends who are not of the true Dharma,
The begging bowl, food, and likewise
Clothing and alms-rounds — these are the same.

The five qualities of the bath-house are: it removes impurity from the body, it brightens the skin and complexion, it draws out diseases present within the skin, it counteracts wind and phlegm that have become imbalanced, and the many illnesses of monks are eliminated by the bath-house — these are the five.

If a monk possesses these five qualities, the Saṅgha will dwell in ease.

The five are: being restrained by the vow of individual liberation (prātimokṣa), being endowed with conduct and the path of conduct, taking fear even in the slightest fault that is blameworthy and training firmly in the bases of training, looking after oneself without looking after others, and having few companions, with knowledge and understanding being extremely limited.

Now, having few companions means that one will be free from the suffering of longing to meet with others, that one dwells at ease and is happy in that one does no harm to others; and when others speak disagreeable words or speak harshly, one will not be tormented by others and will not become unable to bear it.

The five faults perceived in a person who lacks patience are: one is unsuitable, one is fierce, one is disliked by many people, one is disagreeable, and one will be remorseful afterward.

The five qualities of a person endowed with patience are to be stated as the reverse, expressed in the five ways of the virtuous side.

The five faults perceived in a person who lacks patience are: one will come to have many enemies; one will have much suffering and mental discomfort; one will come to have many separations; one will pass one's time in a state of constant remorse; and, upon leaving the body at death, one will be reborn in a lower realm, in the continuum of a being in hell. The five qualities of a person endowed with patience are to be stated as the reverse, expressed in the five ways of the virtuous side.

When the holy Dharma is in decline — when the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma — five things that are not the holy Dharma will arise in the world. What are those five?

When the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, monks will be without faith, without a sense of shame, without a sense of conscience, will be lazy, and their mindfulness will deteriorate; they will be unable to unify the mind and their minds will become disturbed. Thus, when the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, this is the first arising of what is not the holy Dharma in the world.

When the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, monks will engage in fighting, in fault-finding, in grudges, and in quarreling. Thus, when the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, this is the second arising of what is not the holy Dharma in the world.

When the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, certain monks who feign good conduct while holding to a view of evil will rely on mere calm abiding and will cite scriptural authority for their words. Thus, when the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, this is the third arising of what is not the holy Dharma in the world.

When the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, monks will pass their time in death while their moral discipline is in decline, and they will denigrate those who are endowed with moral discipline. Thus, when the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, this is the fourth arising of what is not the holy Dharma in the world.

When the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, householders will have done service to the renunciants, yet those householders, upon leaving the body at death, will be reborn as gods of the higher realms in a happy existence, while the renunciants will in large numbers fall into the lower realms. Thus, when the holy Dharma is in decline and the world has come to be at odds with the holy Dharma, this is the fifth arising of what is not the holy Dharma in the world.

One should not associate with, and should not rely upon, a companion endowed with these five qualities: one who has entered into worldly affairs, one who has entered into quarreling, one who is given to wandering about continuously, one who fraternizes with cherished ones, and one who dwells in the retinue of a king. These are to be stated as the reverse on the virtuous side, expressed in the five ways. The five distinctions are: a distinct Teacher, a distinct Dharma, a distinct Saṅgha, a distinct karma, and a distinct path.

Even if one does not have these five alms bowls, one should not seek them; and even if one has them, one should not keep them. What are the five? A crystal alms bowl, a stone alms bowl, a wooden alms bowl, a jeweled alms bowl, and a lidded alms bowl.

A monk who eats food in five ways incurs a transgression. These are: eating from a bowl made of leaves, eating with cupped hands, eating by extending the tongue, eating by drawing food in with the lips, and eating with food pushed in by the hand.

The five kinds of torn robes are: one given because it is worn out from walking, one given for the purpose of walking, one given to a sick person, one given on account of sickness, and one given when something has been torn.

The five who receive long-stored provisions are: one who is traveling, one who is ill, one who is caring for the sick, one who is doing work, and one who is maintaining a residence.

One should not sit on five kinds of seats: the seat of a Tathāgata, the seat of an elder of the Saṅgha, the seat of a preceptor, the seat of an abbot, and the seat of one who is teaching the Dharma.

Here ends the fifth chapter of the noble text of the Vinaya.

The Vinaya in sixteen sections — in brief:

What is to be stated, and the counter-argument,
The reply, two: keeping composed and responding in turn,
The suitable, and the qualities,
The basis and the exposition, likewise —
Two transgressions and the act of penalty,
Two pacifications and abundant merit,
And finally, gathered into sections.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, when a monk who wishes to raise a counter-argument desires to argue a matter on its merits, he should think it through very carefully, examine it very thoroughly, and investigate it very searchingly — and then raise the counter-argument on its merits."

"Upāli, when a monk who wishes to raise a counter-argument desires to argue a matter on its merits, he should think it through very carefully in the sixteen bases, examine it very thoroughly, and investigate it very searchingly — and then raise the counter-argument on its merits."

"What are the sixteen? He should ask himself: Is this matter about which I wish to raise a counter-argument true or false? Has the time come for raising this counter-argument on its merits, or has the time not come? Is this the appropriate occasion for raising this matter, or is it not the appropriate occasion? Is this counter-argument meaningful, or is it without meaning? Beyond this, he should investigate further: On the basis of what has been seen, heard, or suspected should he speak? Was it done in body, or done in speech? Was it done in a village, or done in a hermitage? Was it done at night, or done in the daytime? Was there a remainder, or was there no remainder? Is this venerable one capable of being raised from a wholesome ground and established on a wholesome ground? Upāli, a monk who wishes to raise a counter-argument should think through these sixteen bases very carefully, examine them very thoroughly, and investigate them very searchingly — and then raise the counter-argument on its merits."

"If a monk who raises counter-arguments possesses these five qualities, one should not accept his words. What are the five? The counter-argument he raises is not thoroughly pure; he raises counter-arguments based on what one person told another; he proceeds from a place of ill-will; he raises counter-arguments against the words of his novice-master; and he does not know the words of the sūtras as they were definitively taught, nor does he know the basis on which purification is to be undertaken. Upāli, if a monk who raises counter-arguments possesses these five qualities, one should not accept his words."

"Upāli, if a monk who raises counter-arguments possesses five qualities, one should accept his words. The counter-argument he raises is thoroughly pure; he does not raise counter-arguments based on what one person told another; he proceeds from a place of good will; he does not raise counter-arguments against the words of his novice-master; he knows the words of the sūtras as they were definitively taught; and he knows the basis on which purification is to be undertaken. Upāli, if a monk who raises counter-arguments possesses these five qualities, one should accept his words."

"Upāli, a monk who gives a reply should think through these sixteen bases very carefully, examine them very thoroughly, and investigate them very searchingly — and then give room to the monk who is being challenged. What are the sixteen? He should ask: Is this venerable one one who possesses moral discipline? Has he been fully ordained from the very beginning? Does he have a sense of shame? Does he have remorse? Does he have restraint? Does he desire to train? Is he one of great learning? Does he retain what he has heard?

Has he accumulated learning? Does he know the Vinaya? Does he understand the higher Vinaya with certainty? Has he mastered the recitation of the scriptures? And further, beneath all of that, he should also investigate: Is it by what he himself has seen, or by what he has heard, or by what he suspects, or by a physical transgression, or by a verbal transgression, that he speaks? Was it committed in a village or in a forest? Was it done at night or by day? Was it done with a remainder or without a remainder? And is this venerable one capable of lifting the monk from an unwholesome state and establishing him in a wholesome state? Upāli, having very carefully thought through, very thoroughly examined, and very searchingly investigated all sixteen of these bases, the monk who is giving a reply should give room to the monk who is being challenged.

Upāli, if a monk who is giving a reply possesses these five qualities, his words should not be accepted. What are the five? He does not answer according to what the challenging monk asked; after being asked, he reveals something that was not what was intended; he speaks of one thing in terms of another; he introduces extraneous talk; he puts the monk who has been cleared in an unfavorable position; he relies on taking sides; and he does not know what is a transgression and does not know what is not a transgression. Upāli, if a monk who is giving a reply possesses these five qualities, his words should not be accepted.

Upāli, if a monk who is giving a reply possesses these five qualities, his words should be accepted. What are the five? He answers according to what the challenging monk asked; he does not speak of the matter asked about in one way and then another; he does not introduce other extraneous talk; he does not put the monk who has been cleared in an unfavorable position; he does not rely on taking sides; and he knows what is a transgression and knows what is not a transgression. Upāli, if a monk who is giving a reply possesses these five qualities, his words should be accepted.

Upāli, when the monks on both sides — the challenger and the one giving the reply — wish to settle a dispute, they should seek out an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses sixteen qualities. What are the sixteen? He possesses moral discipline; he was fully ordained from the very beginning; he has a sense of shame; he has remorse; he has restraint; he desires to train; he is one of great learning; he retains what he has heard; he has accumulated learning; he knows the Vinaya; he understands the higher Vinaya with certainty; he knows the sūtras; he has mastered the recitation of the scriptures. And further, beneath all of that, one should also investigate: Does this venerable one actually possess the qualities of an impartial arbiter? Has this venerable one not been previously entangled with the matter? Is this venerable one skilled in disputes that have arisen before? Is this venerable one perhaps acting for the sake of a bowl, or for the sake of robes, or for the sake of some small material gain? Is he perhaps acting out of desire, or out of aversion, or out of delusion, or out of fear? Is this venerable one afflicted by attachment? Is he afflicted by aversion? Is he afflicted by delusion? Does he transgress the word of the Victor? Does this venerable one fail to treat what is reasonable as reasonable, or does he cut down what is reasonable? Does this venerable one pacify matters through the Dharma and Vinaya as taught by the Teacher? And does this venerable one lift this venerable one from an unwholesome state and establish him in a wholesome state? Upāli, when the monks on both sides — the challenger and the one giving the reply — wish to settle a dispute, they should seek out an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses those sixteen qualities.

Upāli, if an impartial holder of the Vinaya possesses these five qualities, he will be unable to settle a dispute. What are the five? He leads the challenging monk and the monk giving the reply toward an unlawful side; he causes conflict between the challenging monk and the monk giving the reply;

he exposes faults, he foments resentment, he incites further conflict, he causes the monks who hold the sūtras to refrain from reciting the scriptural text, he imputes blame to the elder monks, and he is not skilled in the beginning, middle, and end of a dispute.

Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses these five qualities will be able to settle a dispute. What are the five? He guides the challenging monk and the monk giving the reply toward the side of the Dharma; he prevents conflict between the challenging monk and the monk giving the reply; he does not expose faults, does not foment resentment, and does not incite further conflict; he causes the monks who hold the sūtras to recite the scriptural text; he does not impute blame to the elder monks; and he is skilled in the beginning, middle, and end of a dispute.

Upāli, if that impartial holder of the Vinaya wishes to take up the settling of a dispute, he should first examine himself and others thoroughly in those sixteen respects, and only then take up the dispute. He should examine himself thoroughly by eight criteria, and he should examine others thoroughly by eight criteria.

What are the eight criteria for examining oneself? He reflects: Am I skilled in the beginning, middle, and end of this dispute? Have I been uninvolved in this dispute from the very start? Have I grasped the words of the challenging monk and the monk giving the reply? Have I listened to the words of the challenging monk and the monk giving the reply? Am I able to purify the faults of the challenging monk and the monk giving the reply? Am I able to instruct each side in accordance with the Dharma? Am I able to settle this dispute in accordance with the Vinaya and as the Teacher has taught? Am I able to lift the challenging monk and the monk giving the reply from an unwholesome state and establish them in a wholesome state? By these eight criteria he should examine himself thoroughly.

What are the eight criteria for examining others? He reflects: Among those members of the Saṅgha, are there monks who hold the sūtras, who hold the Vinaya, and who hold the summaries, who will support what I say in proclaiming the word of the Victor? At that time, are there monks who hold the sūtras, who hold the Vinaya, and who hold the summaries who intend to settle this dispute in accordance with the Dharma, in accordance with the Vinaya, and in accordance with what the Teacher has taught? Among those members of the Saṅgha, are there senior monks, middling monks, and junior monks who intend to properly turn back the monks on either side in accordance with the Dharma? Will this dispute be spread to the royal court, or will it not be spread among those of proper reasoning? Do the venerable ones not seek to settle this dispute outside this very Saṅgha? Do the venerable ones seek to settle the dispute within this very Saṅgha? By these eight criteria he should examine others.

Upāli, having thus examined oneself and others by sixteen criteria, one should take up the settling of the dispute.

Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses these five qualities will be unable to settle a dispute. What are the five? He does not know disputes, he does not know how disputes arise, he does not know how to properly take up a dispute, he does not know how to settle a dispute, and he does not know how to ensure that once a dispute is settled it does not arise again. Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses those five qualities will be unable to settle a dispute.

Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses these five qualities will be able to settle a dispute.

What are the five? He knows disputes, he knows how disputes arise, he knows how to properly take up a dispute, he knows how to settle a dispute, and he knows how to ensure that once a dispute is settled it does not arise again. Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses those five qualities will be able to settle a dispute.

Now, Upāli, when an impartial holder of the Vinaya has taken up a dispute, he should examine the monk who brings an accusation by sixteen points, and he should examine the monk who responds to the accusation by eight characteristics.

What are the eight characteristics by which the accusing monk is to be examined? His conduct, his resort, his friendships, his companions, his bodily actions, his verbal actions, his livelihood, and his learning.

If the impartial holder of the Vinaya thinks: "This venerable one is of bad character — he conducts himself badly, his resort is bad, his friends are bad, his companions are bad, his bodily actions are bad, his verbal actions are bad, his livelihood is bad, his learning is bad — and this venerable one is capable of bringing disrepute upon a pure monk and of bringing such a dispute into the Saṅgha," then he should instruct him: "Do not speak in that way."

But if the impartial holder of the Vinaya thinks: "This venerable one is of good character — he conducts himself well, his resort is good, his friends are good, his companions are good, his bodily actions are good, his verbal actions are good, his livelihood is good, his learning is good — and this venerable one is not capable of bringing disrepute upon a pure monk, nor of bringing such a dispute into the Saṅgha," then he should instruct him: "You may speak."

Upāli, it is by these eight characteristics that the accusing monk is to be examined.

The monk who responds to the accusation is likewise to be examined by these same eight characteristics: his conduct, his resort, his friendships, his companions, his bodily actions, his verbal actions, his livelihood, and his learning.

If the impartial holder of the Vinaya thinks: "This venerable one is of bad character — he conducts himself badly, his resort is bad, his friends are bad, his companions are bad, his bodily actions are bad, his verbal actions are bad, his livelihood is bad, his learning is bad — and this venerable one is capable of entering into such conduct," then he should speak gently to the responding monk and say the following to him: "Venerable one, at that time, how were your bodily formations? How were your verbal formations? How were your mental formations? Whatever you admit to, let it be done accordingly."

Upāli, if the impartial holder of the Vinaya thinks: "This venerable one is of good character — he conducts himself well, his resort is good, his friends are good, his companions are good, his bodily actions are good, his verbal actions are good, his livelihood is good, his learning is good — and this venerable one would not engage in such conduct," then he should speak gently to the responding monk and instruct the accusing monk to understand the matter according to the Dharma, and examine the other by these eight characteristics.

Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses these five qualities will be unable to settle a dispute. What are the five? He seizes upon errors, he seizes upon words spoken in confidence, he seizes upon many words, he seizes upon what is uncertain, and he does not proceed to a formal charge up to the third time. An impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses these five qualities will be unable to settle a dispute.

Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses these five qualities will be able to settle a dispute. What are the five?

He does not seize upon errors, he does not seize upon words spoken in confidence, he does not seize upon many words, he does not seize upon what is uncertain, and he does proceed to a formal charge up to the third time. Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses these five qualities will be able to settle a dispute.

Now, Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya must examine the monks who make a charge and those who respond to it according to sixteen points, and must settle the matter by reasoning in sixteen points. What are the sixteen?

He must reason with the monk who makes the charge; he must examine the monk who makes the charge; he must reason with the monk who responds; he must examine the monk who responds; he must request forbearance from the monk who makes the charge; he must request forbearance from the monk who responds; he must cause the monk who makes the charge to withdraw; he must cause the monk who responds to withdraw; he must question the monk who makes the charge; he must question the monk who responds; he must cause the monk who makes the charge to act; he must cause the monk who responds to act; he must cause the monk who makes the charge to affirm his position; he must cause the monk who responds to affirm his position; he must cause the monk who makes the charge to make a formal declaration; he must cause the monk who responds to make a formal declaration. He must then recite the relevant sūtra, and having recited it, he must settle that dispute in accordance with the Dharma, in accordance with the Vinaya, and in accordance with what the Teacher taught. Upāli, this is how an impartial monk must settle matters by reasoning in these sixteen points.

Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses the following five qualities will be unable to establish a matter by reasoning. What are the five? He does not know the five qualities to be followed. What are those five? He does not know how to make a charge, he does not know how to respond, he does not know what is in accordance with the Dharma, he does not know what is not in accordance with the Dharma, and he has not made a formal declaration. Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses these five qualities will be unable to establish a matter by reasoning.

Upāli, an impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses the following five qualities will be able to establish a matter by reasoning. He will know the five qualities to be followed. What are those five? He knows how to make a charge, he knows how to respond, he knows what is in accordance with the Dharma, he knows what is not in accordance with the Dharma, and he has made a formal declaration. An impartial holder of the Vinaya who possesses these five qualities will be able to establish a matter by reasoning.

Now, Upāli, when an impartial holder of the Vinaya settles a matter by reasoning in sixteen points, he should proclaim the sūtra having seen sixteen benefits. What are the sixteen? He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will teach the sūtra." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will analyze the sūtra." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will come to follow the Vinaya." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "My words will be well composed." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will cut off the shameless party by means of a penalty." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will be able to convey the words of the Omniscient One." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "The Saṅgha will be shown to be in harmony." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will convey it to others." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "My words will be taken up by others." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will instruct the monks." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will lead the faithless to faith." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "Those with faith will increase further in faith." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will cut off the shameless party by means of a penalty."

He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will take up the position of those who know shame." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "Disputes that are arising will not arise." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "Disputes will be pacified." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "Once disputes have been pacified, they will not arise again later." He should proclaim the sūtra thinking, "I will long abide in the holy life."

Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder sees these sixteen qualities, he should proclaim the sūtra.

Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder possesses the following five qualities, he will not understand the virtues of the sūtra. What are the five? Not being skilled in sūtra, not being skilled in Vinaya, not being skilled in what is analogous, not being skilled in analysis, and not having recited the scriptures. Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder possesses those five qualities, he will not understand the virtues of the sūtra.

Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder possesses the following five qualities, he will understand the virtues of the sūtra. What are the five? Being skilled in sūtra, being skilled in Vinaya, being skilled in what is analogous, being skilled in analysis, and having trained in scriptural recitation. Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder possesses those five qualities, he will understand the virtues of the sūtra.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who is able to understand the sūtra, having seen these sixteen virtues in this sūtra, should recite the sūtra.

Moreover, the sūtra should be recited in sixteen contexts. What are those sixteen? The sūtra spoken by a buddha should be recited. The sūtra taught by a śrāvaka should be recited. The sūtra from the time when a buddha appeared should be recited. The sūtra of a single direction should be recited. The sūtra that exists everywhere should be recited. The sūtra that resembles that very thing should be recited. The sūtra that accords with Vinaya should be recited. The sūtra that goes beyond Vinaya should be recited. Having sought the virtues of the sūtra, the sūtra should be recited. Having sought the ornament of the sūtra, the sūtra should be recited. Having sought the narrative occasion of the sūtra, the sūtra should be recited. Having sought even a portion of the sūtra, the sūtra should be recited. Having sought the words of the sūtra, the sūtra should be recited. Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder sees those sixteen virtues, he should recite the sūtra.

Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder possesses the following five qualities, he will be unable to recite the sūtra. What are the five? Not knowing the Vinaya of monks, not knowing the Vinaya of nuns, not knowing the Vinaya of offenses, not knowing the Vinaya of disputes, and not knowing the Vinaya of afflictions. Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder possesses those five qualities, he will be unable to recite the sūtra.

Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder possesses the following five qualities, he will be able to recite the sūtra. What are the five? Knowing the Vinaya of monks, knowing the Vinaya of nuns, knowing the Vinaya of offenses, knowing the Vinaya of disputes, and knowing the Vinaya of afflictions. Upāli, if a conscientious Vinaya-holder possesses those five qualities, he will be able to recite the sūtra.

The Noble Vinaya, the thirtieth fascicle.

Now, Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder, having recited in the sixteen contexts, should examine the Vinaya in sixteen contexts. What are the sixteen? Scripture, the transmission of scripture, the substance of the matter, analysis, conduct, the domain of conduct, desiring little, desiring much, contentment, discontentment, difficulty in satisfying, ease in satisfying, difficulty in maintaining, ease in maintaining, what is most precious, and knowing sufficiency. Upāli, by these sixteen points one should examine the Vinaya.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses five qualities will be unable to expel a transgression. What are the five? Not knowing what arose, not knowing what was established, not knowing what was subsequently established, not knowing what was permitted, and not knowing what was subsequently permitted. Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses those five qualities will be unable to expel a transgression.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses five qualities will be able to expel a transgression. What are the five? Knowing what arose, knowing what was established, knowing what was subsequently established, knowing what was permitted, and knowing what was subsequently permitted. Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses those five qualities will be able to expel a transgression.

Now, Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder, having examined the Vinaya in the sixteen contexts, should declare transgressions in sixteen contexts. What are the sixteen? Grave, light, with remainder, without remainder, one involving habitual acquisition, one of body, one of speech, non-virtuous, not shown by scripture, established, not established, leading to confession, leading to restraint, leading to transgression of the Vinaya, leading to ill speech, and — Upāli, by these sixteen contexts one should examine the Vinaya, and by these sixteen contexts declare transgressions.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses five qualities will be unable to declare a transgression. What are the five? Not knowing what is a transgression, not knowing what is not a transgression, not knowing what is grave, not knowing what is light, and not being able to recite the scriptural text. Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses those five qualities will be unable to declare a transgression.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses five qualities will be able to declare a transgression. What are the five? Knowing what is a transgression, knowing what is not a transgression, knowing what is grave, knowing what is light, and being able to recite the scriptural text. Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses those five qualities will be able to declare a transgression.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder, having declared a transgression by these sixteen contexts, should admonish with a punitive act in sixteen contexts. What are the sixteen? Declaring the transgression to one's face, imposing a probationary penalty, not heeding the instruction given, neither speaking nor heeding, threatening, approving, expelling, reconciling again, setting aside on account of not seeing, setting aside on account of not making amends, setting aside on account of not abandoning a wrong view, imposing a punitive act, imposing a punitive act starting from the basis, making one satisfied, making one satisfied starting from the basis, and declaring starting from the basis. Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder, having declared the Vinaya by these sixteen contexts, should admonish with a punitive act in these sixteen contexts.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses five qualities will be unable to admonish with a punitive act. What are the five? Acting out of attachment, acting out of aversion, acting out of delusion, acting out of fear, and not knowing whether a punitive act has been performed or not performed. Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses those five qualities will be unable to admonish with a punitive act.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses five qualities will be able to admonish by means of a punitive act. What are the five? Not proceeding where attachment would lead, not proceeding where aversion would lead, not proceeding where delusion would lead, not proceeding where fear would lead, and knowing whether a punitive act has been performed or not performed.

Regarding this matter, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who has admonished by means of a punitive act applied through sixteen grounds should further admonish by means of a punitive act through those same sixteen grounds. What are the sixteen? Reproaching with a brahma-penalty; causing one to perform an act of reconciliation so that faith will not be lost; causing one to perform an act of reconciliation so that enjoyments are not experienced; causing one to perform an act of absence from sight; causing one's character to be investigated; harming; disparaging; rejecting; making partyless; humiliating; cowing; producing regret; complete remorse; renewed remorse; being placed under censure; being brought to a critical point; and being declared at fault. Thus, Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder should admonish by means of a punitive act through these sixteen grounds.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses five qualities will be unable to admonish by means of a punitive act. What are the five? Not knowing the five Vinaya matters. What are the five? Reproach, disparagement, expulsion, reconciliation, and rejection — these are the five.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses five qualities will be able to admonish by means of a punitive act. What are the five? Knowing the five Vinaya matters. What are the five? Reproach, disparagement, expulsion, reconciliation, and rejection — these are the five. Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses those five qualities will be able to admonish by means of a punitive act applied through penalty.

Thus, Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder, having admonished by means of a punitive act applied through penalty using these sixteen grounds, should then perform the formal act through sixteen grounds. What are the sixteen? Performing the act when the matter is manifest; performing the act even when it is not manifest; performing the act when an opportunity is given; performing the act even when no opportunity is given; performing the act when reminded; performing the act even without being reminded; performing the act when one's memory is invoked; performing the act even without one's memory being invoked; performing the act when questioned; performing the act even without being questioned; performing the act when applied; performing the act even when not applied; performing the act when individually known; performing the act even when not individually known; performing the act when settled; and performing the act even when not yet settled. These are the sixteen grounds on which the act should be performed.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses these five qualities will be unable to perform the formal act. What are the five? Not knowing the single-motion act; not knowing the motion-and-one-proclamation act; not knowing the motion-and-three-proclamations act; not knowing the act of assignment; and not knowing the act of consecration. Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses those five qualities will be unable to perform the formal act.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses these five qualities will be able to perform the formal act. What are the five? Knowing the single-motion act; knowing the motion-and-one-proclamation act; knowing the motion-and-three-proclamations act; knowing the act of assignment; and knowing the act of consecration. Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who possesses those five qualities will be able to perform the formal act.

Upāli, a conscientious Vinaya-holder who has performed the formal act through those sixteen grounds and then settles a dispute through sixteen grounds — that is a faulty settlement. What are the sixteen? It has occurred without a motion being put to the Saṅgha; it has occurred in discord with the word of the Victor; it has occurred without assignment being made to the monks of both sides and neither side; the Vinaya of the objecting monk has been violated; a fault has been covered by an impure monk; what has arisen has become improper; what has been enacted has become improper; what has been subsequently enacted has become improper; what has been permitted has become improper; what has been subsequently permitted has become improper; the objecting monk has not been allowed to state his position; the responding monk has not been allowed to state his position; the wording of the sūtra has become improper; it has occurred in discord with the Vinaya; the eye of the Dharma has not been opened wide; and the dispute has not been settled in the manner consistent with the Dharma, consistent with the Vinaya, consistent with the teaching of the Teacher. Upāli, a settlement of a dispute carried out through these sixteen grounds is a faulty settlement.

Upāli, if a settlement of a dispute is carried out while possessing these five qualities, that settlement of a dispute is faulty — what are the five? One settles without having assigned the matter; one does not state the fault; one does not bring down a censure through a formal act of penalty; one does not demonstrate purification; and it has occurred without his having petitioned the Saṅgha. Upāli, even if one settles a dispute while possessing these five qualities, it has not truly been settled.

Upāli, if a settlement of a dispute possesses these sixteen qualities, it is a proper settlement — what are the sixteen? He has petitioned the Saṅgha; it has occurred in accord with the word of the Victor; assignment has been made to the monks of both sides and neither side; the Vinaya of the objecting monks has not been violated; a fault has not been covered by an impure monk; what has arisen has not become improper; what has been enacted has not become improper; what has been subsequently enacted has not become improper; what has been permitted has not become improper; what has been subsequently permitted has not become improper; the objecting monk has been fully allowed to state his position; the responding monk has been fully allowed to state his position; the wording of the sūtra has become proper; it has occurred in accord with the Vinaya; the eye of the Dharma has been opened wide; and the dispute has been settled in the manner consistent with the Dharma, consistent with the Vinaya, consistent with the teaching of the Teacher. Upāli, if a settlement of a dispute possesses these sixteen qualities, it is a proper settlement.

Upāli, if one settles a dispute while possessing these five qualities, it is a proper settlement — what are the five? One settles having first assigned the matter; one states the fault; one does not bring censure down through a formal act of penalty; one demonstrates purification; and it has occurred with his having petitioned the Saṅgha. Upāli, if one settles a dispute while possessing these five qualities, it is a proper settlement.

Now in that regard, Upāli, if a conscientious upholder of the Vinaya settles a dispute through sixteen grounds, merit will greatly increase — what are the sixteen? He has endowed himself with many heaps of merit; he has likewise endowed others with great heaps of merit; the objecting and responding monks have purified their faults; the faults of those who object and respond have been extinguished; the afflictive streams of the four factions have been stilled; one has entered for the purpose of gathering the Saṅgha together; the eye of the Dharma has been opened wide for the purpose of maintaining the sacred Dharma; one has pressed hard against those who are without conscience; one has properly gathered together those who do have conscience; what is not the sacred Dharma has been turned back; what is the sacred Dharma has been fully grasped; the nature of reality has been proclaimed; illumination has been extended to people of future generations; and one has entered for the purpose of the sacred Dharma's enduring and for the benefit of the many. Upāli, if a conscientious upholder of the Vinaya settles a dispute through these sixteen grounds, merit will greatly increase.

Upāli, if a conscientious upholder of the Vinaya settles a dispute while endowed with these five qualities, merit will greatly increase. What are the five? Declaring what constitutes a transgression to be a transgression, and declaring what does not constitute a transgression to be no transgression; declaring what is weighty to be weighty, and declaring what is light to be light; declaring what carries a remainder to carry a remainder, and declaring what carries no remainder to carry no remainder; declaring that a person who has no transgression has no transgression, and declaring that a person who has a transgression has a transgression; and investigating a person who has no transgression as having no transgression, and investigating a person who has a transgression as having a transgression. Upāli, if a conscientious upholder of the Vinaya settles a dispute while endowed with these five qualities of Dharma, merit will greatly increase.

Upāli, therefore train in just this way, thinking: whenever a dispute has arisen and occurred, I shall settle it in accordance with the Dharma, in accordance with the Vinaya, and in accordance with what the Teacher has taught. Upāli, train yourself in exactly this way.

This concludes the text called The Sixteen Qualities Arising from the Vinaya.

A summary verse of the chapters: Full ordination first, then the separate sections, the maṇḍala, likewise the flat door and the awakening mind — the grounds for instruction are here summarized.

A further summary: Full ordination, the superior, the completely pure, and the encircling; the half, the three, the various groups, and likewise the transgressions; the accepted, the bare flesh, and the collected — this is the brief account of the summaries.

In brief: At the time of conferring full ordination, a woman is present as a man; full ordination without prior going forth; and the impediments are of four kinds — no preceptor, the crow, and these are also stated in the first group.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Venerable One, if during full ordination the name is changed, should that be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

The Blessed One declared: "Upāli, it is indeed full ordination — but count it among the nuns."

"Venerable One, if monks confer full ordination on someone born from a woman resembling a man — having a male voice, speaking in a male manner, possessing a male sound, and appearing in a male form — should that be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

"Upāli, it is indeed full ordination, but the one who conferred full ordination incurs a transgression."

"Venerable One, if someone born as a man resembles a woman — having a female voice, speaking in a female manner, possessing a female sound, and appearing in a female form — and monks confer full ordination on that person, should it be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

"Upāli, it is indeed full ordination, but the one who conferred full ordination incurs a transgression."

"Venerable One, if monks confer full ordination on someone who has not gone forth, should that be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

"Upāli, it is indeed full ordination, but the one who conferred full ordination incurs a transgression."

"Venerable One, if someone who has not received full ordination is made a preceptor and monks thereby confer full ordination, should that be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

"Upāli, it is indeed full ordination, but the one who conferred full ordination incurs a transgression."

"Venerable One, if someone who has an impediment declares 'I have an impediment' and monks nonetheless confer full ordination on that person, should that be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

"Upāli, it is not full ordination, and the ones who conferred full ordination also incur a transgression."

"Venerable One, if someone who does not have an impediment declares 'I have an impediment' and monks confer full ordination on that person, should that be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

"Upāli, it is indeed full ordination, but those who conferred full ordination incur a transgression."

"Venerable One, if someone who neither has an impediment nor declares having one, and monks confer full ordination on that person, should that be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

"Upāli, it is full ordination, and those who conferred full ordination do not incur a transgression."

"Venerable One, if monks confer full ordination without a preceptor present, should that be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

"Upāli, it is indeed full ordination, but those who conferred full ordination incur a transgression."

"Venerable One, if monks confer full ordination with a preceptor present, should that be called full ordination or not full ordination?"

"Upāli, it is full ordination, and those who conferred full ordination do not incur a transgression."

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has said, 'If one who has reached the age of seven can chase away crows, let him go forth.' Venerable One, if one who has reached the age of six can chase away crows at the monastery gate, should that person be given going forth or not?"

"Upāli, do not give going forth to one who has not yet reached seven years of age."

"Venerable One, if one has indeed reached seven years of age but cannot chase away crows from the monastery gate, should that person also be given going forth?"

"Upāli, do not give going forth until one is able to chase away crows."

This is the first sūtra verse of the introductory section on the opening of the gateway.

In summary:

For brahmins, days of the fortnight,
the date-count, and likewise for others,
the remainder, six years, making six, fourteen, added with the intercalary month —
the same is to be done with those who are questioned.
In a place where monks are present, let the precepts given be recited.

When the Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove (Jetavana), the park of Anāthapiṇḍada, in Śrāvastī, brahmins and householders came before the monks and asked, "Noble ones, what is today's date?" The monks replied, "Alas, we do not know." The brahmins and householders said, "Even non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) know the date, the day, the stars, and the very moment — can it be that you who have gone forth do not even know the date?" The monks had no answer and said nothing.

The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Therefore, I hereby permit the counting of dates." And so all the monks took up the counting. The monks then again reported this matter to the Blessed One,

The Blessed One declared, "Rather than everyone counting individually, let the elder of the Saṅgha and the keeper of the monastery do the counting together." But when even the elder of the Saṅgha and the keeper of the monastery lost track, those monks became subject to censure. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, he declared, "Make fifteen clay balls, thread them on a string, and set them out, then remove one each day." When the string became tangled, the Blessed One declared, "Make fifteen discs of felt, thread them on a string, and set them out, removing one each day." All the monks did so, but they still lost track. The Blessed One then declared, "Let the elder of the Saṅgha do the counting."

Then brahmins and householders came to the monastery and asked, "Noble ones, what is today's date?" The monks replied that the elder of the Saṅgha and the keeper of the monastery knew, and referred them to those two. But those two said, "Noble ones, are we the treasurers of your date-count? When you are asked, why do you refer the question to others? You yourselves must answer." And those two had no reply and said nothing. The brahmins and householders mocked them and departed from the monastery.

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One reflected: "The mockery of the brahmins and householders is a grave matter. Therefore, the date should be announced within the Saṅgha." He then declared to the monks, "Since the mockery of the brahmins and householders is a grave matter, you must announce the date within the Saṅgha." When the Blessed One had thus declared that the date should be announced within the Saṅgha, the monks announced the date but did not take hold of the fortnight of the month. The householders and brahmins then said, "Noble ones, you do not even know how to grasp the fortnight of the month — if you do not grasp the fortnight, how will you know the waxing half and the waning half of the month?" And those monks had no reply and said nothing.

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "You must take hold of the fortnights and announce the dates. The announcement is to be made as follows: when the entire Saṅgha has assembled and is seated, one monk, sitting first in order of seniority, should press his palms together with all due ceremony and speak these words: 'Today is the first day of the waning fortnight of the month. For the sake of the patron of the monastery and of the gods, let each recite a verse.' "

The monks then announced the date but did not mention the name of the patron of the monastery. The Blessed One declared, "The name of the patron of the monastery must also be stated." The announcement is to be made in this way: "The donor named such-and-such has invited the community of monks for a meal tomorrow. May the venerable ones regard him with a mind of virtue and affection. Since the patron of the monastery gives in various other ways as well, may the venerable ones regard the generous donor too with a mind of virtue and affection. For when you regard someone with a mind of virtue and affection, that person's virtuous qualities will increase and will not diminish." Similarly, all the sentient beings present there are to be named individually. After all these words are complete, let each monk recite a verse in turn.

Then brahmins and householders came there as well, and

The noble ones were asked what the date was, and they replied, "Today is the fifteenth." The brahmins and householders said, "Noble ones, for all the world it is the fourteenth today — how then can it be the fifteenth for you? Do you not reckon the days by halves of the month?" When this matter was reported to the Blessed One by the monks, the Blessed One declared, "You should reckon the days by halves of the month." When the Blessed One had declared that they should do so, the monks began dividing the month into two halves and reckoning the days accordingly.

Brahmins and householders came there again and asked, "Noble ones, what is today's date?" The monks replied, "Today is our fourteenth." They said, "Noble ones, for all the world it is the fifteenth today — how then can it be the fourteenth for you? Do you really reckon the days by halves of the month, one day at a time?" The monks said that they did. When the brahmins and householders had raised this objection and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "Monks, the brahmins and householders are causing embarrassment, and so you should not reckon the days by halves of the month one day at a time. Instead, let a half-month and two days together pass, and then reckon the intercalary day. In this way, in one year there will be six restoration ceremonies on the fourteenth, and the remainder will be on the fifteenth."

Then brahmins and householders came there again and asked, "Noble ones, which month of the year is this current month for you?" The monks replied, "For us this is the last month of the rains season." They said, "Noble ones, for all the world this current month is the middle month of the rains season — how then can it be the last month of the rains season for you? Have you dropped an intercalary month?" The monks replied that they had not. The brahmins and householders, having raised this objection, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, the brahmins and householders are causing embarrassment, and so you should add in an intercalary month." When the Blessed One had declared that they should add an intercalary month, the monks began inserting an extra month every single year. Brahmins and householders came there again and asked, "Noble ones, what is this current month for you?" The monks replied, "For us it is now the middle month of the rains season." They said, "Noble ones, for all the world this month is the last month of the rains season — how then is it the middle month for you? Do you insert an intercalary month every single year?" The monks replied that they did. The brahmins and householders raised this objection, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Monks, the brahmins and householders are causing embarrassment, and so you should not add an intercalary month every year, but rather every six years. Six times six is thirty, and when calculated thus against days, half-months, months, and years, everything will balance out, and non-Buddhists who seek a pretext will find none." When the Blessed One had declared that an intercalary month should be added every six years, the monks began inserting an intercalary month every six years. Kings insert an intercalary month every three years.

When the monks failed to do likewise, the ministers raised objections, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Monks, the ministers are causing embarrassment, and so you should follow the royal calendar as well."

The stars fell out of alignment, and when the monks did not adjust for this, the astronomers mocked the monks about what had occurred. The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, the astronomers are causing embarrassment, and so you should follow the astronomical reckoning as well."

This is the second verse of the first section within the origin story.

In summary:

The two purifications are to be performed, and the boundary is to be set in four ways;
likewise, faith received from the sky remains, like before, unreleased.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Venerable One, may one who is inside the boundary grant purification to those who are outside the boundary?" "Upāli, one may not." "Venerable One, may one who is outside the boundary grant purification to those who are inside the boundary?" "Upāli, one may not." "Venerable One, may one who is inside the boundary perform a formal act for those who are outside the boundary?" "Upāli, one may not." "Venerable One, may one who is outside the boundary perform a formal act for those who are inside the boundary?" "Upāli, one may not." "Venerable One, while performing a formal act and being inside the boundary, may one perform that act for those who are outside the boundary?" "Upāli, one may not." "Venerable One, while performing a formal act and being outside the boundary, may one perform that act for those who are inside the boundary?" "Upāli, one may not."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable One, if a monk who is receiving an offering of faith has taken that offering and then goes up into the sky, is it considered received or not received?" "Upāli, it is not received — go back and look again." "Venerable One, may a later boundary be annulled while a prior boundary has not been dissolved?" "Upāli, one may not."

This is the third verse of the first section's sūtra within the origin story.

The noble Vinaya text. The thirty-first fascicle.

In summary:

Encircling and destruction, the arising of trees and earth,
non-arising and arising,
and death — it is likewise so.

When the Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada, the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Venerable One, may a boundary be enclosed by another boundary?" "Upāli, a maṇḍala boundary, a water boundary, and the rains-retreat building of the bhikṣuṇīs are permissible; other cases are not." "May a boundary be annulled by another boundary?" "Upāli, one may not." "Venerable One, in how many ways may a boundary be annulled?" "Upāli, five: when the entire Saṅgha abandons it and departs; when the entire Saṅgha transfers to a night lodging elsewhere; when the entire Saṅgha returns; when the entire Saṅgha has died; and with a formal act of petition — those are the five." "Venerable One, may a single tree serve to annul the boundary of two assembly halls?" "Upāli, it may — and likewise for three or four assembly halls; only the tree itself should be divided."

While the Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in Campā practicing the practice there, he smiled in another place. By the very nature of things, whenever the Blessed One smiled, rays of blue, yellow, red, and white light would issue from his mouth. Some went downward and some went upward. Those that went downward reached into the hells for sentient beings — the Arbuda hell, the Aṭaṭa hell, the Mahāvīci hell, the Raurava hell, the Loud Cries hell, the Burning hell, the Greatly Burning hell, the Unrelenting hell, the Blister hell, the Repeated Blister hell, the Aṭaṭa hell, the Hahāpa hell, the Huhūpa hell, the Blue-Lotus-like hell, the Lotus-like hell, and the Great-Lotus-like hell. When those rays fell upon the hot hells, they became cool. When they fell upon the cold hells, they became warm. The pain of those sentient beings was transformed into a distinction of ease, and they thought: "Oh — have we passed away from here, or have we been born elsewhere?" Then, in order to arouse faith in them, the Blessed One sent forth an emanation. When they saw the emanation, they thought: "We have not passed away from here, nor have we been born elsewhere — yet by the power of this sentient being we had never seen before, our pain has been transformed into a distinction of ease." Having reflected thus, they turned their minds in faith toward the emanation, and the karmic action driving their suffering in the hells was exhausted. They were reborn among gods and humans in a place fit to receive the noble truths.

The rays that went upward reached the gods of the Heaven of the Four Great Kings, the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, the Yāma Heaven, the Tuṣita Heaven, the Heaven of Delight in Transformation, the Heaven of Mastery over Others' Transformations, and then the Brahmā Heaven, the Heaven of Brahmā's Ministers, the Great Brahmā Heaven, the Heaven of Minor Light, the Heaven of Limitless Light, the Heaven of Radiant Light, the Heaven of Minor Virtue, the Heaven of Limitless Virtue, the Heaven of Abundant Virtue, the Cloudless Heaven, the Heaven of Increasing Merit, the Heaven of Great Fruit, the Heaven of Non-Ideation, the Untroubled Heaven, the Heaven of Clear Vision, the Heaven of Beautiful Appearance, and the Akaniṣṭha Heaven and the rest. There they proclaimed impermanence, suffering, emptiness, and selflessness, and spoke two verses as well:

Strive to arise!

Be diligent in the Buddha's teaching!

Like a great elephant in a swamp, vanquish the armies of the lord of death!

Whoever with great heedfulness walks this path of training and restraint will, having thoroughly abandoned the wandering of rebirth, bring suffering to its final end.

Then those rays circled the great three-thousandfold world-system and returned, tracing their way back to the Blessed One, and disappeared.

Now, if the Blessed One intended to prophesy concerning past karma, the rays would vanish at his back. If he intended to prophesy concerning future karma, they would vanish at his front. If he intended to prophesy rebirth in the hells, they would vanish at the sole of his foot. If he intended to prophesy rebirth as an animal, they would vanish at his heel. If he intended to prophesy rebirth as a hungry ghost, they would vanish at his great toe. If he intended to prophesy rebirth as a human, they would vanish at his two knees. If he intended to prophesy that someone would become a wheel-turning king of power, they would vanish at the palm of his left hand. If he intended to prophesy that someone would become a wheel-turning monarch, they would vanish at the palm of his right hand. If he intended to prophesy rebirth as a god, they would vanish at his navel. If he intended to prophesy awakening as a śrāvaka, they would vanish at his mouth. If he intended to prophesy solitary awakening, they would vanish at his hair between the brows. If he intended to prophesy the unsurpassed, perfectly complete awakening, they would vanish at his crown protrusion.

Then those rays circled the Blessed One three times and vanished into his crown protrusion. Thereupon the venerable Ānanda joined his palms together and — addressed the Blessed One in verse:

Many thousands of rays of diverse hues have issued forth from his mouth in abundance, illuminating every direction all around just as the sun rises in the east.

And then he spoke these further verses:

Free from agitation and despondency, having abandoned pride, the cause for beings to attain the highest — the buddha — white as a conch or lotus root, without any cause or condition, the Victor, subduer of foes, does not display a smile in vain.

At such a time, those who are themselves aware and resolute, those who hope and long to hear the speech of the sovereign of victors — by the firm and excellent words of the chief of sages, may those in whom doubt has arisen have it removed through virtue.

As a king of mountains stands firm above the ocean, so the true Protector does not lightly rest in a causeless smile.
Since in his steadfastness he has displayed a smile, may the many beings hear why he has done so.

Then the venerable Ānanda declared in prose: "Tathāgatas, arhats, perfectly and completely awakened buddhas do not smile without cause and without condition. O Venerable One, for what cause and for what condition did he smile?" And the Blessed One spoke: "Ānanda, it is so, it is so. A Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and completely awakened buddha does not smile without cause and without condition. Ānanda, in this very direction there dwells the perfectly and completely awakened buddha Kāśyapa, who has been teaching the Dharma there."

Thereupon the venerable Ānanda swiftly and without delay folded his upper robe into four layers and spread it as a seat, then said this to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, I beg you to be seated on this seat I have spread. If you sit here, this place will have been graced by two perfectly and completely awakened buddhas — Kāśyapa and the present Blessed One."

The Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Excellent, Ānanda! It is excellent that you understood this without my having to say it." So saying, the Blessed One sat down upon that seat.

Having sat, the Blessed One then said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, this direction is the temple of the perfectly and completely awakened buddha Kāśyapa. This is the walking-meditation ground. This is the dais. This is the gatehouse. This is the foot-washing place. This is the warming house. This is the dwelling house. This is the latrine."

The venerable Upāli then put a question to the Blessed One, the bhagavān: "Venerable One, one may speak of a 'permitted place' and of a 'non-permitted place.' Venerable One, by what criterion does one recognize a permitted place?" The Blessed One answered: "Upāli, so long as the true Dharma exists, there are permitted and non-permitted places. When the true Dharma has perished, all places become permitted."

Upāli asked: "Venerable One, by what criterion does one say the true Dharma is present? And by what criterion does one say it has perished?"

The Blessed One answered: "Upāli, for as long as formal acts are performed and those who make effort in performing them are present — that is to say, so long as formal acts are carried out and those who engage in them with diligence also exist — one should say the true Dharma is present. When formal acts are no longer performed and those who engage in them with diligence are also absent, then one should say the true Dharma has perished."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the bhagavān: "Venerable One, is it permitted to perform a formal act within a boundary while the Victor is in residence?" The Blessed One answered: "Upāli, it is permitted." "Is it permitted to perform a formal act after the Victor has been counted among the number?" The Blessed One answered: "Upāli, it is not permitted." "Why is that?" "Upāli, the Jewel of the Buddha is one thing; the Jewel of the Saṅgha is another."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the bhagavān: "Venerable One, is it permitted to establish a new boundary where no boundary previously existed?" The Blessed One answered: "Upāli, it is not permitted." "Venerable One, by what criterion is one to know that it is not permitted to establish a boundary?" The Blessed One answered: "Upāli, by three: a maṇḍala boundary, a water-encircled boundary, and the interior of an already existing boundary."

The venerable Upāli asked: "Venerable One, is it permitted to establish a boundary on the far bank of a flowing river?" "Upāli, it is not permitted." "What if there is a sturdy bridge?" "In that case it is permitted." "Venerable One, if the bridge should break or be destroyed, for how long does it remain unbroken?" "Upāli, if there is the intention to repair it, it will not be considered destroyed for seven days."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the bhagavān: "Venerable One, when a monk performs an act at the same time as a boundary is being dissolved, and the boundary dissolves while the act is being performed — is that act considered completed or not completed?" The Blessed One answered: "Upāli, if the marks have been announced and the act has been performed in full, it is called completed. If it was stopped, it is not completed." "Venerable One, when a nun performs an act at the same time as a boundary is being dissolved, and the boundary dissolves while the act is being performed — is that act considered completed or not completed?" "Upāli, if the marks have been announced and the act has been performed in full, it is called completed. If it was stopped, it is not completed."

These are the four verses of the first sūtra within the section on the opening cases.

In brief:

Acts performed on land or in the sky —
the boundary, and the question of full purity, and monks dwelling in one place:
these are what one must examine in all acts.

When the Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the park of Anāthapiṇḍada, the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the bhagavān: "Venerable One, is it permitted for those on the ground to perform an act together with those on the ground?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. However, giving consent is permitted. If those dwelling on the ground are complete in number and consent has also been received from those on the ground, that is permissible."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those on the ground to perform an act together with those on a wall?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. However, giving consent is permitted. If those dwelling on the ground are complete in number and consent has also been received from those on the wall, that is permissible."

"Is it permitted for those on the ground to perform an act together with those on a tree?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. However, giving consent is permitted. If those dwelling on the ground are complete in number and consent has also been received from those on the tree, that is permissible."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those on the ground to perform an act together with those in the sky?" "Upāli, it is not permitted."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those on top of a wall to perform an act together with those on top of a wall?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. However, giving consent is permitted. If those dwelling on top of the wall are complete in number and consent has also been received from those on top of the wall, that is permissible."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those on top of a wall to perform an act together with those on the ground?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. However, giving consent is permitted. If those on top of the wall are complete in number and consent has also been received from those dwelling on the ground, that is permissible."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those on top of a wall to perform an act together with those on top of a tree?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. However, giving consent is permitted. If those dwelling on the wall are complete in number and consent has also been received from those dwelling on top of the tree, that is permissible."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those on top of a wall to perform an act together with those in the sky?" "Upāli, it is not permitted."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those on a tree to perform an act together with those on a wall?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. However, giving consent is permitted. If those dwelling on the wall are complete in number and consent has also been received from those dwelling on the tree, that is permissible."

"Is it permitted for those on a tree to perform an act together with those on the ground?" "Upāli, it is not permitted."

giving consent is permitted. If those dwelling on the tree are complete in number and consent has also been received from those dwelling on the ground, that is permissible."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those on a tree to perform an act together with those on a wall?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. However, if those dwelling on the tree are complete in number and consent has also been received from those dwelling on the ground, that is permissible."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those on a tree to perform an act together with those in the sky?" "Upāli, it is not permitted."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those in the sky to perform an act together with those in the sky?" "Upāli, it is not permitted."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those in the sky to perform an act together with those on the ground?" "Upāli, it is not permitted."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those in the sky to perform an act together with those on a wall?" "Upāli, it is not permitted."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for those in the sky to perform an act together with those on a tree?" "Upāli, it is not permitted."

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, the Blessed One has taught one hundred and one acts within the scope of this Vinaya. Among those one hundred and one acts, Venerable One, which acts require consent and which do not require consent?" "Upāli, all of them require consent — except for those in which the boundary has been nullified."

"Venerable One, is it permitted to nullify a boundary by means of supernatural power or illusion?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. Why is that? Because supernatural power and illusion cannot be designated by conventional expression."

"Venerable One, is it permitted to nullify a boundary by means of a planet, a ray of light, the sun, the moon, or stars?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. Why is that? Because planets, rays of light, the sun, the moon, and stars are unstable."

"Venerable One, is it permitted to nullify a boundary by means of a wave of water?" "Upāli, it is not permitted. Why is that? Because waves of water are unstable."

The venerable Upāli then asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, if a monk who is receiving a formal declaration of purity has received that declaration and is then above in the sky, is that considered to be a received declaration of purity?" "Upāli, it has not been received — it must be received again from the beginning."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for a single performer of the act, a single reciter of the act's formula, and a single suppliant to perform an act for four assemblies in four locations?" "Upāli, it is permitted — provided that in each of the four locations there are three monks present, and that the supplication and the act are manifest there; and that the monk performing the supplication, stationed at the juncture of the four locations, presses down with a board, a door-bar, a throne, or any other such thing at the boundary of the four locations, and sits upon it and performs the act. That performer of the act himself thereby completes the count for each of those groups."

"Venerable One, is it permitted for a single monk present in a single location to perform an act for four locations?" "Upāli, it is permitted — and those four-location acts are as follows: an act of censure, an act of rebuke, an act of banishment, an act of reconciliation, an act of suspension for not seeing a fault, an act of suspension for not rectifying conduct, an act of suspension for not relinquishing a wrong view, and an act of penalty — when these are manifestly present, the monk performing the act sits upon a board or door-bar pressed into the juncture of the four locations."

This concludes the fifth verse-set of the first section of the root narrative.

In summary:

Beyond a half and three, and at a half and three, on the slopes of a mountain,
A Saṅgha of ten million — at dawn, blessed within the boundary.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha:

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a great boundary should be established. Venerable one, what is the measure of such a great boundary?"

"Upāli, it is a yojana and a half."

"Venerable one, does something beyond a yojana and a half also count as a boundary?"

"Upāli, no. Up to a yojana and a half is a boundary."

"Venerable one, what is the boundary of the lower realm?"

"Upāli, it extends as far as the water is reached."

"Venerable one, if one goes beyond a yojana and a half and reaches the water, does that also count as a boundary?"

"Upāli, no. Up to a yojana and a half is a boundary; beyond that is not."

"Venerable one, what is the boundary of the upper realm?"

"Upāli, it extends as far as the top of a tree or the top of a wall is reached."

"Venerable one, if the top of a tree or the top of a wall lies beyond a yojana and a half, does that also count as a boundary?"

"Upāli, no. Up to a yojana and a half is a boundary; beyond that is not."

"Venerable one, what is the boundary of a mountain?"

"Upāli, it extends as far as it is encircled by water."

"Venerable one, if beyond a yojana and a half it is entirely encircled by water, does that also count as a boundary?"

"Upāli, no. Up to a yojana and a half is a boundary; beyond that is not."

"Venerable one, during the rains retreat, when the Saṅgha is divided, if a monk has been blessed for seven days and, intending to go to the proper side, goes instead to the improper side, is his rains retreat broken or is it unbroken?"

"Upāli, if he is confident in his view and goes there, and dawn rises, his rains retreat is broken. But if he is not confident in his view and goes there, and dawn has not yet risen, his rains retreat is not broken."

"Venerable one, during the rains retreat, when the Blessed One declares 'Go beyond the boundary for seven days, blessed with leave,' where is the blessing to be given?"

"Upāli, within the boundary."

"How is it to be done?"

"Sit before the monk, join one's palms, and speak these words: 'Please attend, venerable one. I, so-and-so by name, having entered the rains retreat properly — either the first or the final — within this dwelling inside the boundary, I, so-and-so by name, have been blessed with seven days' leave to go beyond the boundary for the sake of the Saṅgha. I keep this rains retreat here. I dwell in this rains retreat here.' This is to be declared in full, as before."

This concludes the sixth verse-set of the sūtra of the first gateway of the root narrative.

In summary:

The five groups — deliberately, and likewise when going to relatives — when doubt has arisen concerning scripture, and when going again because one has not obtained what was needed.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha:

"Venerable one, when the Blessed One has declared 'Enter the rains retreat,' who are those who are to enter it?"

"Upāli, there are five: fully ordained monks, fully ordained nuns, female probationers, male novices, and female novices."

"How are they to enter?"

"All of them in the same manner as before."

"Venerable one, when the Blessed One has given seven days' leave, declaring 'Go beyond the boundary for the sake of a layman,' if there is a non-Buddhist present, should one go for his sake as well?"

"Upāli, if one wishes to free him from that wrong view, one may go."

"Venerable one, if there is a relative present, should one go for his sake as well?"

"One may go."

"Venerable one, if a monk has a doubt or suspicion regarding the rule, may one go for his sake as well?"

"Upāli, one may go for his sake as well."

"Venerable one, if a monk has a doubt or suspicion regarding what has not been attained — so that it may be attained — regarding what has not been understood — so that it may be understood — regarding what has not been realized — so that it may be realized, may one go for his sake as well?"

"Upāli, one may go for his sake as well."

These are the seven verses of the sūtra of the first topic of the opening section.

In summary:

Unwashed cloth is the same in this regard;
yet going into the village, wandering about, and the like — when settled, follow the former rule.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, is it permissible to consecrate unwashed cloth?"

"Upāli, it is not permissible in general, yet it is permissible under such circumstances."

"Venerable one, is it permissible to receive unwashed cloth and then go into the village?"

"Upāli, it is not permissible in general, yet it is permissible under such circumstances."

"Venerable one, is it permissible to receive unwashed cloth and go to a layman's house?"

"Upāli, it is not permissible in general, yet it is permissible under such circumstances."

"Venerable one, is it permissible to receive unwashed cloth and stay at a layman's house?"

"Upāli, it is not permissible in general, yet it is permissible under such circumstances."

"Venerable one, is it permissible to receive unwashed cloth and go to a wanderer's house?"

"Upāli, it is not permissible in general, yet it is permissible under such circumstances."

"Venerable one, is it permissible to receive unwashed cloth and stay at a wanderer's dwelling?"

"Upāli, it is not permissible in general, yet it is permissible under such circumstances."

"Venerable one, is it permissible to receive unwashed cloth and go beyond the boundary?"

"Upāli, it is not permissible in general, yet it is permissible under such circumstances."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that a robe should be made of the measure of a cubit. If a particular monk's arm is short and his body is tall, should he too make it to the measure of a cubit?"

"Upāli, it is not to be made to the measure of a cubit; rather, make it to the measure of his body."

"Venerable one, what should one do if one cannot afford to have a robe made?"

"Upāli, follow the former rule and make do."

These are the eight verses of the sūtra of the first topic of the opening section.

In summary:

Footwear is to be made in five ways.

That of lion, wild beast, and unfit animals — sitting in them is also not permissible, and one must not lie upon such hides.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that sandals made from the hide of a yak should not be worn. Venerable one, then is it also not permissible to make and wear sandals from the hide of an ordinary ox?"

"Upāli, sandals from the hide of those animals also must not be made and worn."

"Upāli, why is that? Because they too possess powerful noses, powerful teeth, and powerful legs."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that sandals made from the hide of a horse should not be worn. Venerable one, is it also not permissible to wear sandals made from the hide of an ordinary horse?"

"Upāli, sandals made from the hide of such animals also must not be worn."

"Why is that? Upāli, because they are possessed of speed and strength."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that sandals made from the hides of lions, tigers, and leopards should not be worn. Venerable one, are there other wild and unfit animals as well? Should sandals made from their hides also not be worn?"

"Upāli, sandals made from their hides must also not be worn."

"Why is that? Upāli, because they too are possessed of the power of claws and the power of fangs."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that one must not sit on hide. Venerable one, how much of one does it take to count as sitting on hide?"

"Upāli, it is however much of one's haunches are placed upon it."

"Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that one must not lie on hide. Venerable one, how much of one does it take to count as lying on hide?"

"Upāli, it is however much of one's body is stretched out upon it."

This is the ninth verse of the first section of the origin stories.

In brief:

Raw meat, and sour whey,
And what has been thoroughly pressed out,
Feces and abscesses must not be treated —
These apply in a temple setting.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli put this question to the Blessed One: "Venerable one, the Blessed One has declared that one should give raw meat to the monk who is convalescing. Venerable one, from whom should it be obtained?"

"Upāli, it is from among the five kinds of meat-sellers. And what are those five kinds? They are: butchers, those who slaughter domestic fowl, those who slaughter wild fowl, those who slaughter pigs, and those who slaughter game."

"Well then, venerable one, from whom should one receive and accept it?"

"Upāli, from a faithful layman."

The origin story is set at Śrāvastī. At that time a certain monk fell ill and went to a physician. He said, "Good sir, I am ill. I suffer from such-and-such an ailment — please diagnose it and prescribe a treatment." The physician said, "Noble one, you should drink butter — that will sustain you." The monk replied, "Good sir, the Blessed One has not permitted it," and the physician said, "Noble one, your Teacher is compassionate; he will certainly permit it." The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "If the physician has prescribed that butter will sustain him, then he may drink it."

When that monk drank the butter, he was afflicted by thirst. He went to the physician and said, "Good sir, I am tormented by thirst." The physician said, "Noble one, drink sour whey." The monk replied, "Since the Blessed One has not permitted food at improper times, how can I drink it?" The physician said, "Noble one, your Teacher is compassionate; he will certainly give permission." The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Then he may drink sour whey," and gave permission accordingly. But the monks did not know how sour whey was to be drunk. They reported this again to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, sour whey is of five kinds. What are the five? These: the lees of fruit wine, the lees of grain ale, whey water, strained whey liquid, and whey itself."

"The lees of fruit wine are what has been made from fruits and has gone sour by turning bad. The lees of grain ale are what has been prepared from grains, gone bad, and turned sour. Whey water is the liquid that has come out of curd. Strained whey liquid is whey that has become like whey water. Whey itself is just whey."

"When any of these has been diluted with water and strained through a cloth until it has taken on the colour of arrow-shaft pigment, it may be drunk by monks both in season and out of season, both by the sick and by the healthy — let there be no doubt about this."

The origin story is set at Śrāvastī.

At that time, another monk was afflicted with a fistula of the anus. He had cut the boil with his fingernail, and as a result it became painful, raw, hot, harmful, and aching. Tormented by this suffering, he thought to himself: "The Blessed One has not looked upon me with compassion, even though I have been oppressed by pain and am in a wretched state."

Then the Blessed One, moved by his great compassion, came to where the monk was staying. "Monk, what ails you?" he asked. The monk, feeling sorrow and unhappiness, his eyes brimming with tears and his mouth trembling, spoke with difficulty and reported to the Blessed One in full detail what had happened. The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, did I not instruct you previously not to cut an anal fistula?" "You did, Blessed One." "Then why did you do so?" "Blessed One, I was tormented by suffering." The Blessed One then addressed the monks: "Monks, because this monk was tormented by suffering, there is no offence. Yet I now give this further instruction: Monks, when afflicted by the disease of an anal fistula, do not cut it yourselves with a fingernail or any such thing, and do not cause others to cut it. Two kinds of treatment should be applied to it: medicinal and mantra-based. If a monk who is afflicted by the disease of an anal fistula cuts it with a fingernail or any such thing, or causes another to cut it, he incurs a transgression along with what has passed."

The Blessed One, the awakened Bhagavān, was residing in the Śākya border-town called Merchant Gourd-Leaf. At that time, a certain householder, of his own accord, with his own faith, and with his own joy, constructed a shrine-hall and offered it to the single individual of the venerable Śāraṇa. Then the venerable Śāraṇa, for as long as he stayed in that shrine-hall, took his bowl and robes and went to use it as a place of resort. The householder heard that the noble Śāraṇa had stayed in the shrine-hall for a certain time, then taken his bowl and robes and departed to use it as a place of resort elsewhere. Upon hearing this, the householder offered the shrine-hall to the Saṅgha.

Then the venerable Śāraṇa, for as long as he wished, used it as a place of resort elsewhere, then took his bowl and robes and, going to the Śākya border-town called Merchant Gourd-Leaf, travelled along using it as a place of resort in stages, until he arrived at the place called Merchant Gourd-Leaf. There the venerable Śāraṇa heard that the householder had offered that shrine-hall to the Saṅgha. Upon hearing this, he went to where the Blessed One was staying. He bowed with his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Śāraṇa addressed the Blessed One thus:

"Venerable One, a certain householder, of his own accord, with his own faith, and with his own joy, built a shrine-hall and offered it to me as a single individual. I stayed in that shrine-hall for a certain time, then took my bowl and robes and went to use it as a place of resort. Then that householder heard that the noble Śāraṇa had stayed in that shrine-hall for a certain time, had taken his bowl and robes, and had gone to use it as a place of resort. Upon hearing this, the householder offered the shrine-hall to the Saṅgha. Now, Venerable One, what am I to do?" "Let Śāraṇa come here." The householder went to where the Blessed One was and came into his presence, and the Blessed One said to him:

"Householder, ask whether I have committed any offense in body, speech, or mind." The venerable Śāraṇa replied, "Very well, Venerable One," and having received this instruction from the Blessed One, he went to where that householder was. When he arrived, he said to the householder: "Householder, have I committed any offense in body, speech, or mind?" The householder replied: "The noble Śāraṇa has not committed even the slightest offense in body, speech, or mind." Thereupon the venerable Śāraṇa examined the matter carefully with that householder and then went to where the Blessed One was. Coming into his presence, he prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's feet and said to the Blessed One: "Venerable One, when I said to that householder, 'Householder, have I committed even the slightest offense in body, speech, or mind?', he replied: 'The noble Śāraṇa, you have not committed even the slightest offense in body, speech, or mind.'"

At that time, the venerable Ānanda was standing behind the Blessed One, holding a fan and fanning him. The Blessed One then said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and gather all the monks who are staying and residing in the Śākyan border-town called Merchant-of-Gourds into the assembly hall." Ānanda replied, "As you command, Venerable One," and having received this instruction from the Blessed One, he gathered all the monks who were staying and residing in the Śākyan border-town called Merchant-of-Gourds into the assembly hall. He then went to where the Blessed One was and, having prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's feet, said to the Blessed One: "Venerable One, Blessed One, if it please you, the time has come: all the monks who are staying and residing in the Śākya border-town called Merchant-of-Gourds have assembled in the assembly hall." The Blessed One then went to where the assembly hall was. Having arrived, he took a seat on the appointed throne in front of the Saṅgha of monks. Seated there, the Blessed One addressed the monks:

"Monks, when a gift has been given to a single individual and is then given to another, it is given contrary to Dharma, received contrary to Dharma, and wrongly used. When given to more than two, or to the Saṅgha, it is likewise given contrary to Dharma, received contrary to Dharma, and wrongly used. Monks, when a gift has been given to two individuals and is then given to one, or to another, or to two, or to many, or to the Saṅgha, it is given contrary to Dharma, received contrary to Dharma, and wrongly used. Monks, when a gift has been given to many individuals and is then given to one, or to two, or to other many, or to the Saṅgha, it is given contrary to Dharma, received contrary to Dharma, and wrongly used. When a gift has been given to the Saṅgha and is then given to a single individual, or to two, or to many, or to another Saṅgha, it is given contrary to Dharma, received contrary to Dharma, and wrongly used. When the Saṅgha of śrāvakas of the Tathāgata is divided, residing in factions and non-factions, and a gift given to one faction is then given to the other, it is given contrary to Dharma, received contrary to Dharma, and wrongly used. Monks, when a gift has been given to a single individual and is not given to another, it is given in accordance with Dharma, received in accordance with Dharma, and rightly used. When it is not given to two, not given to many, not given to the Saṅgha, it is given in accordance with Dharma and rightly used."

Monks, when a gift has been given to two persons, it is not given to one, not given to others, not given to many, and not given to the Saṅgha — it is given in accordance with Dharma, received in accordance with Dharma, and rightly used. Monks, when a gift has been given to many persons, it is not given to one, not given to two or to other many, and not given to the Saṅgha — it is given in accordance with Dharma, received in accordance with Dharma, and rightly used. Monks, when a gift has been given to the Saṅgha, it is not given to a single person, not to two, not to many, and not to another Saṅgha — it is given in accordance with Dharma, received in accordance with Dharma, and rightly used. And when the Saṅgha of śrāvakas of the Tathāgata is divided, residing in factions and non-factions, and a gift given to one faction is not then given to the other — it is given in accordance with Dharma, received in accordance with Dharma, and rightly used.

Monks, a king has authority over the land. An owner has authority over the bedding. A monk has authority over his bowl and robes. One who gives a gift, and the master of a gift, should not redirect to another those things that have been given — it is not fitting to give them to another. Why so? Because, monks, the giving is the former act, not the latter. Therefore the monastery should be returned to Śroṇakaraṇin.

Monks, if someone gives a gift to another and that same person then gives it again to yet another, then — except in a case of such a condition — it becomes something of the past. The monks also returned the monastery to the venerable Śroṇakaraṇin.

The Sacred Vinaya Text, the thirty-second bundle. The occasion is at Śrāvastī, when the Blessed One said, "Hold the fifth-year festival, the sixth-year festival, the monastery's seasonal festivals, and the great seasonal festivals," and the brahmins and householders did likewise. Monks who dwelt in various regions also assembled, and the faithful brahmins and householders gave them abundant provisions. Having eaten a little, those monks gave the remainder to their novice fathers. The next day those same monks were given the same in return, and they asked their novice fathers, "Where did this food of yours come from?" They replied, "It is precisely what you yourselves gave us yesterday." The monks said, "We gave this to you," but they fell into doubt and did not accept it. The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: If he gave with expectation and they ate again with expectation, then both the giving and the eating were transgressions — the giving was a wrongdoing, and the eating was a downfall. If he gave with expectation and they ate again without expectation, then the giving was a wrongdoing, but the eating was without fault. If he gave without expectation and they ate with expectation, then the giving was without fault, but the eating was a downfall. If he gave without expectation and they ate without expectation, then the giving was without fault and the eating was also without fault.

The tenth sūtra of the first section of the occasion is complete. The first section is complete.

In summary:

Dispatching and re-announcing,
and likewise not receiving the deposit;
giving instruction, performing the act, being patient, and expelling;
conducting in accordance with Dharma, cutting off by cutting the wall — this is the second of the collected sūtras.

In brief:

The monk who answered questions by invitation and transgressed the time — at Śrāvastī: the dispute, the two Saṅghas, and the robe.

The Blessed One (the Buddha) was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder who took a wife from a family of equal rank and enjoyed himself with her in sport and pleasure. From that sport and pleasure, his wife conceived a child; after eight or nine months she gave birth to a son. Within twenty-one days — seven times three — a great birth-feast was held on a lavish scale, and the child was given a name in keeping with his family lineage.

Then at a later time that son went forth into the teaching of the Blessed One, and again at a later time he was struck by illness. He passed away, and the monks, taking his alms-bowl and robes together, discarded them in the charnel ground. Some brahmins and householders who happened to be passing along that road came upon them and, speaking among themselves as they went, said: "We householders, dwelling at home, acquire wealth and goods by many means, and yet we do not discard our vessels and utensils or our clothing. These sons of the Śākya renunciant — though they beg for their food with great difficulty, going past a hundred thresholds — why do they discard alms-bowls and robes?" The monks were coming toward them from that direction, and those people said to them: "Noble ones, we householders dwell at home; we acquire wealth and goods by many means and yet we do not discard our vessels or clothing. You, who with great difficulty fill your bellies by going for alms past a hundred thresholds — whence then come your alms-bowls and robes? Why do you discard this monk's alms-bowl and robes together in the charnel ground?" The monks replied that the Blessed One had not permitted otherwise, and those people went away without another word.

The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Do not discard them together with the alms-bowl and the robes." When the Blessed One had said, "Do not discard them together with the alms-bowl and the robes," the monks discarded the body naked. The Blessed One declared: "Do not discard it naked; wrap it in a lower garment and a sweat-cloth and then discard it." Thereupon the monks discarded it with fine robes, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not discard it with fine ones." So they discarded it with poor ones. The Blessed One declared: "Do not discard it with poor ones either; discard it with middling ones." The Blessed One had declared, "Do not discard them together with the alms-bowl and the robes," but the monks did not know what to do. The Blessed One then declared: "Give them to whatever monk is in need." The group of six monks habitually feigned poverty, so the Blessed One declared: "Do not give to the group of six; give in order of seniority." The junior monks then went without receiving anything, and the Blessed One declared to the monk who answered questions by invitation: "Announce it to the Saṅgha, and when the entire assembly of the monks has gathered and is seated, let the monastery-keeper cause an appraisal to be made within the Saṅgha."

The occasion of origin is at Śrāvastī. At Śrāvastī another monk had passed away, and his alms-bowl and robes were placed in the hands of a certain nun. After the monks had cremated his body and returned to the monastery, they searched for the alms-bowl and robes but could not find them. Learning that they were in the possession of a certain nun — known by such-and-such a name — in the nuns' winter quarters, the monks went to those winter quarters.

They said to her, "Noble nun known by such-and-such a name, the alms-bowl and robes of the recently deceased monk are stored here. Please hand them over." She replied, "Noble ones, where did that monk pass away? He passed away in our monastery. What is present there belongs to you; what is present here belongs to us. How so? Our Dharma-brother by such-and-such a name also passed away here." The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "The alms-bowl and robes of a monk belong to the monks. Nuns must not retain them."

The occasion of origin is at Śrāvastī. At Śrāvastī another nun had passed away, and her alms-bowl and robes were placed in the hands of a certain monk. After the nuns had cremated her body, they went to the monks' monastery in search of the alms-bowl and robes, but could not find them. Learning that they were with a monk known by such-and-such a name in another monastery, they went to that monastery, paid homage at the feet of the monks, and said, "Noble ones, a nun known by such-and-such a name has passed away, and if her alms-bowl and robes are here, we ask that you please return them to us." He replied, "Where did that nun pass away? She passed away in our winter quarters. Noble ones, what is staying there — that is yours to keep; but what is here with us belongs to us, for she was our Dharma-sister." The nuns reported this to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "If those are the alms-bowl and robes of a nun, they belong to the nuns. Since they belong to the nuns, monks must not retain them."

The occasion of origin is at Śrāvastī. At Śrāvastī, a certain monk was travelling on alms-rounds when he went to another village in the rocky hills and passed away in the house of a householder there. That householder brought him to the charnel ground, then concealed and set aside his alms-bowl and robes. Some time later, a number of nuns, while travelling on alms-rounds, went to that village in the rocky hills, and the householder, seeing them, said, "Noble ones, here are the alms-bowl and robes of a monk who passed away in my house. Please take them." They replied, "Householder, the Blessed One has not granted this. These belong to the monks." The nuns thus reported the matter to the monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "In places where there are no monks, nuns may take them. Have no hesitation about this."

The occasion of origin is at Śrāvastī. At Śrāvastī, while a number of nuns were travelling on alms-rounds, one nun among them fell ill. As she walked slowly and came back late, she lost the way and reached another village in the rocky hills, where she passed away in the house of a householder there. That householder brought her to the charnel ground, then concealed and set aside her alms-bowl and robes. Some time later, a number of monks, while travelling on alms-rounds, went to that village in the rocky hills, and the householder, seeing them, said, "Noble ones, a nun passed away in my house; here are her alms-bowl and robes. Please take them." They replied, "Householder, the Blessed One has not granted this. These belong to the nuns."

The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Where there are no nuns present, the monks may take the robes and bowl. Have no doubt about this."

The occasion for the next ruling arose at Śrāvastī. The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, when a monk passes away, and his alms-bowl and robes are in the possession of a layman there, who has the right to them?" The Blessed One declared: "Upāli, whoever came first to claim them has the right." "If two come, who has the right?" "Whoever picked them up first." "If both picked them up at the same time, who has the right?" "Whoever received them first." "If both received them at the same time, both have the right." "And if both received them at the same time, then whoever the householder has faith in and gives them to has the right."

The occasion for the next ruling arose at Śrāvastī. At that time, in the Jeta Grove, two monks came to quarrel, and they stood there surrounded by other monks. Some brahmins and householders, seeing this, said: "Noble ones, when we laypeople quarrel, you yourselves intervene to stop us — so why do you stand here surrounding these monks and not intervene?" Others among those present replied: "These monks are the very ones who are quarreling — what is the point of intervening?" Having no answer to that, those people fell silent and remained standing there.

The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "You should intervene and not stand around watching." They did intervene, but they were unable to stop the fight. The monks again reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If intervention does not work, then carry out the act of censure."

The Blessed One declared that the act of censure should be carried out, and some time later two monks got into a dispute, arguing, "This belongs to you," and "This belongs to me." In the course of that dispute they spoke roughly to each other. The Saṅgha then imposed the act of censure on both of them. The two monks said: "Venerable ones, all we did was speak roughly to each other while arguing over a matter — why have you cut us off with the act of censure?" The others replied: "Because the Blessed One said to carry out the act of censure against those who quarrel — that is why we have imposed it on you two." The two monks said nothing further and stood in silence.

The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Rather than imposing the act of censure on those two, you should intervene and separate them. If one of them is a newcomer, his preceptor and teacher should admonish him. If one of them is an elder, let him gather the entire Saṅgha and settle the dispute. If even that fails to bring reconciliation, then and only then impose the act of censure on both."

The occasion for the next ruling arose at Śrāvastī. The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable one, if a monk passes away in a border region, who gains the right to the possessions of the deceased?" The Blessed One replied: "Upāli, whoever is on that side." "Venerable one, if both sides are equidistant?" "Upāli, then both."

Here ends the second section of the body of occasions, the first verse section.

In summary:

What is to be proclaimed, and the vehicle,
then the garland, and the robes, and likewise the robes belonging to the Saṅgha — doubt is a matter for the individual.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada (the Benefactor of the Destitute), at Śrāvastī, and many remarkable things occurred and were set down there.

During that time when the Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī, the non-Buddhist adherents (tīrthikas) were losing their influence and receiving fewer offerings. Accordingly, they took whatever they wanted and began to carry on their non-Buddhist activities. Meanwhile, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, the Benefactor of the Destitute, who had become a Buddhist, would rise early in the morning and go to see the Blessed One. Then one day, having risen early in the morning and gone to the Jeta Grove, he was approached by the non-Buddhist adherents, who took from him whatever they wished and urged him vigorously. He then thought to himself: "These are non-Buddhist adherents of bad doctrine and bad discipline. They take whatever they want and carry on their non-Buddhist activities. The Blessed One himself has also said, in such and such sūtras, that those who lack faith should be properly urged, introduced, and established in perfect faith. If the Blessed One gives his permission, I shall also establish many people in the practice of making offerings to the Saṅgha." With this in mind, he went to where the Blessed One was, arrived, prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One, and sat to one side. Seated to one side, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada said this to the Blessed One: "Venerable one, these non-Buddhist adherents of bad doctrine and bad discipline take whatever they want and carry on their non-Buddhist activities. If the Blessed One gives his permission, then — from the point of doing such and such — I shall establish people in the practice of making offerings to the Saṅgha." And the rest proceeds as before, up to those words. The Blessed One then declared: "In that case, householder, I give you permission. Take whatever you want and carry out activities for the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha." After the Blessed One had given this command — "Take whatever you want and carry out activities for the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha" — and the householder Anāthapiṇḍada began to urge people properly, some brahmins and householders said: "If noble ones are also properly urged, we shall gain even more merit than that." The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, too, should assist. The brahmins and householders then said: "If it is announced in our names, that would be excellent." The Blessed One declared: "It should be announced when the donor has given." Then the householder had it announced accordingly, and the brahmins and householders said: "If noble ones also announce it, we shall gain even more merit than that." The Blessed One declared: "Monks should also announce it. When brahmins and householders come to the assembly hall and make an offering, the Blessed One declared: "It should be announced in the assembly hall as well." When the one making the announcement was surrounded by a great many people and could not be seen, the Blessed One declared: "Mount a chariot and make the announcement." Then heat, rain, and wind arose, and the Blessed One declared: "Erect a high pavilion." When many people blocked the doorways, the Blessed One declared: "Place four announcers at the four gates." Thereupon the householder Anāthapiṇḍada took what he wanted and gathered a great many pairs of robes — many hundreds and thousands of pairs of robes. He then thought to himself: "Now that a great many robes have been assembled, I shall serve a meal to the monastic Saṅgha of monks beginning with the Buddha, and then offer the robes to the monastic Saṅgha of monks beginning with the Buddha, in order of seniority."

He adorned the Jeta Grove with robes of every kind, stringing garlands of robes throughout, and posted guards as well. He invited friends, relatives, and kinsmen as guests. Then, having prepared clean and abundant food and drink, he invited the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of monks to a meal in the Jeta Grove.

The next morning he rose early, arranged the seats, filled the water vessels and set them out, and then served the meal to the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of śrāvakas. He addressed the Blessed One, saying: "Venerable One, these are worthy recipients of offerings in the world."

Now there are two kinds of householder: those who are still in training and those who are beyond training. Among these, the householder in training is of eighteen kinds, and the one beyond training is of nine kinds.

What are the eighteen kinds of one in training? One who has entered the path for the purpose of realizing the fruit of stream-entry; one who has attained stream-entry; one who has entered the path for the purpose of realizing the fruit of once-returning; one who has attained once-returning; one who has entered the path for the purpose of realizing the fruit of non-returning; one who has attained non-returning; one who has entered the path for the purpose of realizing the fruit of arhatship; one who follows through faith; one who follows through the Dharma; one who is liberated through faith; one who is attained through view; one who proceeds ever higher; one who is bound for one more life; one who passes into nirvāṇa in the intermediate state; one who passes into nirvāṇa immediately upon birth, with mental formation; one who passes into complete nirvāṇa without mental formation; and those who are ascending upward — these are called the eighteen kinds in training.

What are the nine kinds beyond training? One whose Dharma has faded; one whose Dharma has not faded; one who has the hidden Dharma; one who is protected by subsequent mindfulness; one who dwells unmoved; one who, having realized individually, does not become a person of fortune; one who has the Dharma of the immovable; one who is liberated through wisdom; and one who is liberated on both sides — these are called the nine kinds beyond training.

The Blessed One spoke these words. Having spoken them, the Sugata, the Teacher, then declared in verse:

Those in training and beyond training who dwell in this world with body, speech, and mind made straight — they are worthy of gifts, worthy of veneration; that supreme field of merit — great is the fruit of giving there.

Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada sat before the assembly in order of seniority and appointed an announcer. When the noble announcer proclaimed this, he said: "Let the Blessed One's Saṅgha of śrāvakas — those worthy of giving, worthy of abundant giving, worthy of joined palms, worthy of homage, the unsurpassed field of merit, the world's worthy recipients of offerings — receive these robes and accept them at their pleasure."

Then the monk acting as announcer sat before the assembly in order of seniority and proclaimed: "Listen, venerable members of the Saṅgha. The Saṅgha of the Blessed One's śrāvakas — worthy of giving, worthy of abundant giving, worthy of joined palms, worthy of homage, the unsurpassed field of merit, the world's worthy recipients of offerings — let them receive these robes that have been obtained and accept them at their pleasure."

Then those monks who were free from attachment, free from aversion, free from delusion thought to themselves: "The householder Anāthapiṇḍada has proclaimed this: 'Let those of the Blessed One's Saṅgha of śrāvakas who are worthy of giving, worthy of abundant giving, worthy of joined palms —" worthy of joined palms, worthy of homage, the unsurpassed field of merit, the world's worthy recipients of offerings — let them receive these robes that have been obtained and accept them at their pleasure.'" We are the unsurpassed, and so this acquisition is within our power — yet the Blessed One has said, "Monks, you should proclaim your virtues and declare your faults." How then could we bring ourselves to speak of ourselves merely for the sake of obtaining robes? We are free from attachment, free from aversion, free from delusion." And so they remained, saying nothing.

Those who still had the remainder of fetters also thought to themselves: "The offering has been dedicated to the unsurpassed; we still have the remainder of fetters, and so we are not our own masters." And they too remained, saying nothing.

Those who were bound by every kind of bondage thought to themselves: "That is being offered to the unsurpassed." And they too said nothing and remained still. Those with the remainder of fetters likewise remained silent, thinking: "We are bound by every kind of bondage, and so in all respects and at all times we are not our own masters." And they too said nothing and remained still.

Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, having offered those robes, found that not a single monk had accepted them. He thought to himself: "I wonder whether I have caused the noble Saṅgha to upend their bowls." His body became pale and gaunt, and he grew thin and wasted with distress. He went to where the Blessed One was, approached him, prostrated himself at the Blessed One's feet with his head, and sat down to one side.

Sitting to one side, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Buddha, though already knowing, asked: the Blessed One asked the venerable Ānanda, "Ānanda, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada arranged and gave robes to the monks — why did they not accept them?" Thereupon the venerable Ānanda reported to the Blessed One that the householder Anāthapiṇḍada had said: "Those of the Blessed One's Saṅgha of śrāvakas who are worthy of giving, worthy of abundant giving, worthy of joined palms —" and he recited everything just as before, up to the point of "— and let them say nothing." And so he reported: "The Blessed One's householder Anāthapiṇḍada gave, and not a single monk accepted."

Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and gather in the assembly hall every single monk, however many are residing and staying in Śrāvastī." The venerable Ānanda replied, "Blessed One, I shall do so," and having heard the Blessed One's instruction, he gathered together every single monk residing and staying in Śrāvastī into the assembly hall. He then went to where the Blessed One was, approached him, prostrated himself at the Blessed One's feet with his head, and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the venerable Ānanda said to the Blessed One: "Blessed One, may the Blessed One know that the time has come. Every monk residing and staying in Śrāvastī has assembled and gathered in the assembly hall."

Then the Blessed One went to where the assembly hall was and, upon arriving, sat down on the seat that had been prepared. Having taken his seat, the Blessed One addressed the monks in these words: "Monks, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada gathered many robes and gave them — why did you not accept them?"

The monks remained silent, saying nothing. The Blessed One, though already knowing, asked nonetheless. When the Blessed One questioned the venerable Ānanda, asking, "Ānanda, why are the monks sitting in silence without speaking?" Ānanda reported the whole matter to the Blessed One in full detail.

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, did you go forth under me with the thought of passing beyond sorrow into nirvāṇa?"

"Venerable One, it is so," they replied.

"Monks, if that is the case, then for one who has gone forth under me with the thought of passing beyond sorrow into nirvāṇa, I permit: fine robes of a thousand threads, multi-storied dwellings with five hundred windows, and foods possessing a hundred flavors. However, monks, those who have broken their moral discipline are not permitted to make use even of a single heel-step of the Saṅgha's pleasure grove.

"Why is that? Because for a person who has broken moral discipline, there are these ten objects of reproach. What are the ten? Being reviled by one's own moral conscience; being reviled by others, by the gods, and by the Teacher; being censured by those who are skilled in the holy life of pure conduct; being condemned by the very nature of reality; becoming known in all directions through the ugly sound and verse of an ill reputation; those who have not realized coming to no realization; those who have realized suffering decline; what was previously heard being forgotten; spending one's time in continual remorse; and, upon being separated from the body and dying, falling downward into an evil destiny, an evil path, and being reborn in a hell among sentient beings.

"Nevertheless, monks, there are four modes of using things. Enjoying what has no owner; enjoying what has been given; enjoying by permission; and enjoying through debt. Among these, those monks who are free from attachment, free from aversion, and free from delusion — these enjoy what has no owner. Those who still have the residue of active engagement enjoy what has been given. Ordinary persons of virtue who are engaged in meditative concentration and in recitation enjoy by permission. Those who are lazy enjoy through debt. As for those who have broken their moral discipline, none of the four modes of use is permitted to them.

"Therefore, if there are any gains, they should be divided equally by the Saṅgha."

This is the second verse of the sūtra of the second occasion for the rule.

In summary:

Accepted and not accepted,
Withdrawn and likewise not withdrawn,
And so too, staying outside the boundary —
These are to be understood through learning and reflection.

The Blessed One was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Venerable One, is it possible that a monk might not come to a vote while the Saṅgha is casting a vote, even though he has been fully present?"

"Upāli, it is possible. When the Saṅgha is casting a vote, if that monk has not given his consent and lies down asleep, the Saṅgha's vote will still be carried."

"Upāli, in that case, a monk does not come to cast a vote even though he has been fully present.

"Venerable One, is it possible that a monk who has not been present at all would come to have the Saṅgha's vote cast?"

"Upāli, it is possible. If at the time the Saṅgha is casting a vote, a monk gives his consent and then lies down — the Saṅgha's vote will still be carried. In that way, even one who was not fully present would have the vote cast.

"Upāli, likewise, when the Saṅgha is casting a vote, if a monk who has given consent lies down in sleep or enters meditative absorption —" the vote will still be carried. In that way, even one who was not present at all would have the vote cast.

"Venerable One, is it possible that a monk, even though he was present when the Saṅgha was casting a vote, would not have the vote carried?"

"Upāli, it is possible. This is the case: when the Saṅgha is casting its vote, a monk has not given his consent and then lies down in sleep or enters meditative absorption. In that way, Upāli, even though a monk was present when the Saṅgha was casting a vote, the vote would not be carried for him."

"Venerable One, is it possible that a monk, even though he was not present when the Saṅgha was casting a vote, would have the vote carried?"

"Upāli, it is possible. This is the case: when the Saṅgha is casting its vote, a monk gives his consent and then lies down in sleep, or enters meditative absorption, or goes outside the boundary — and yet he hears that the Saṅgha has carried the vote, and upon hearing it he rejoices, saying, 'It has been carried well — excellent!' In that way the vote is carried."

This is the third verse of the sūtra of the second section on the ruling case.

In brief:

One who has given a training rule, and the ceremonial wood,
And those for whom acts are to be performed,
And reversal of the twelve, and impurity,
And non-validity.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, when a training rule has been given, is it proper that the ceremonial wood be prepared and the act performed?"

"Upāli, it is not proper."

"A paṇḍaka, a eunuch, a woman, one who has caused a nun to be expelled, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who has gone over to the non-Buddhists, one who dwells in a stolen place, one who dwells separately, and one who does not dwell properly — is it proper that the ceremonial wood be prepared and the act performed?"

"Upāli, it is not proper."

"Venerable One, the Blessed One has said that an act performed for one for whom it was reversed is not valid. If an act is performed for such a one in a way that does not accord with the Dharma and is then reversed in that manner, will it still not be valid?"

"Upāli, it is valid."

"Venerable One, when the twelve acts have been assigned to a person and those persons say, 'Do not assign these to us' — is that reversal also not valid?"

"Upāli, it is valid. That was said by me out of consideration for those who abide by the penalty."

"Venerable One, the Blessed One has said that if those who are impure reverse an act, it is not valid. Venerable One, how much impurity makes one 'impure'?"

"Upāli, that is the case in which any one of the four defeats has occurred for the person in question. That much makes one impure."

This is the fourth verse of the sūtra of the second section on the ruling case.

In brief:

One who has given a training rule and one who performs acts,
And likewise one who dwells in a stolen place,
Outside the boundary of full ordination,
And sending by proxy — these are not to be done.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, when one who performs an act has been given a training rule and then performs an act, is it considered done, or is it considered not done?"

"Upāli, it is to be called not done, and it must be done again."

"Likewise for a paṇḍaka, a eunuch, and all cases up through 'one who does not dwell properly' — it is to be done as before."

The ruling case took place at Śrāvastī. A certain monk, wishing to give full ordination to another monk, gathered the monks who were to perform the full ordination. In order to perform the full ordination, he brought along the preceptor's novice, entered the assembly area, and went into the assembly area together with the monks.

He was sent outside the boundary, and his relatives took him and departed. The impediment arose for those venerable ones between the time of their going forth and their receiving full ordination and becoming established as monks. When this occurred, the monks reported it to the Buddha, the Blessed One, and the Buddha, the Blessed One, declared: "Therefore, monks, a novice who desires full ordination should not be sent outside the boundary. Consider this, monks: just as a prince who is eligible to receive the consecration of a wheel-turning king, if he has not yet received the consecration, must be carefully protected and guarded until he obtains the regency, in the same way it is fitting that a novice who desires full ordination should likewise be carefully protected and guarded. Therefore, monks, those novices who desire full ordination should be placed outside the range of hearing but within the range of sight, their palms joined in reverence, visibly present. In this way no transgression will arise." This is the fifth verse of the sūtra of the second chapter of the ruling case.

In summary:

Requesting forbearance, and the boundary — shaving hair too is the same.

Overturning the latrine-stand and threatening, rebuking, and condemning the lineage.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was residing at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Blessed One, you have said that monks against whom a censure act has been performed should ask for forbearance. Where should they ask for forbearance?"

"Upāli, within the boundary."

"How should they ask for forbearance?"

"Having stood up with hair erect and having risen fully, let them communicate to the Saṅgha that they lay their hair down. Let them demonstrate prostration openly, and they should also restore the overturned latrine-stand."

"Blessed One, if you have said that a censure act should be performed upon monks who overturn the latrine-stand, and if at that time the venerable one becomes displeased when the censure act is being performed upon him, what is to be done in that case?"

"Upāli, among his goods and belongings, some should take away his bowl and robes; others should take away his water vessels and throw them outside and discard them. If he seizes hold of a pillar, cut the pillar. If he seizes hold of a door-post, remove the door-post. And do not fail to turn him away even if he cannot be made to comply. Who should then repair things afterward?"

"The Saṅgha."

"Whose task is it to gather the repaired goods? Request them from the donors. If they are not forthcoming, have them provided from the common wealth of the entire Saṅgha. Do not be in doubt about this."

"If it is a venerable nun who overturns the latrine-stand, should a censure act also be performed upon her?"

"Upāli, a censure act should indeed be performed upon her also." From "if she becomes displeased" up through "do not be in doubt about this," it is as before.

"Blessed One, and if a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice overturns the latrine-stand, should a censure act also be performed upon them?"

From "do not be in doubt about this," it is as before.

"Blessed One, you have said that a banishment act should be performed upon a monk who condemns the lineage. If at that time the venerable one becomes displeased when the banishment act is being performed upon him, what is to be done?"

"Upāli, from 'his goods and belongings' up through 'do not be in doubt about this,' it is as before." Likewise, if it is a nun who condemns the lineage, or a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice — a banishment act should also be performed upon them — up through "do not be in doubt about this," it is as before. This is the sixth verse of the sūtra of the second chapter of the ruling case.

The Noble Vinaya, the thirty-third fascicle.

The venerable Blessed One declared: "Expel a monk who has transgressed the moral discipline." By whom should he be expelled? He should be expelled by the Saṅgha. As for his belongings, some should take his bowl and robe; others should take his various miscellaneous vessels, carry them outside, and set them down. If he clings to a pillar, the pillar should be cut. If he clings to a doorpost, the doorpost too should be removed — but do not refrain from dismissing him on account of it. By whom should repairs subsequently be made? By the Saṅgha. To whom should the materials for repair be solicited? The patrons (upāsakas) should be urged. If they too are unable to provide, repairs should be made with the wealth of the entire Saṅgha — do not be in doubt about this. Just as in the case of a monk who has transgressed the moral discipline, so too it is the same for a nun, a female trainee, a male novice, and a female novice.

The venerable Blessed One declared: "Perform a reconciliation act upon a monk who speaks ill of laypeople." Then if a nun also speaks ill of laypeople, should a reconciliation act be performed upon her as well? Upāli, let a reconciliation act be performed upon her too. And so it is likewise for a female trainee, a male novice, and a female novice.

The venerable Blessed One declared: "Let a reconciliation act be performed upon a monk who speaks ill of laypeople." If a monk speaks ill of a monk, should a reconciliation act be performed upon him as well? Upāli, a reconciliation act should be performed upon him too. And a monk who speaks ill of a nun, a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice — it is the same likewise. A female trainee who speaks ill of a nun, a monk, a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice — it is the same likewise. A female trainee who speaks ill of another female trainee, a monk, a nun, a male novice, or a female novice — it is the same likewise. A male novice who speaks ill of another male novice, a monk, a nun, a female trainee, or a female novice — it is the same likewise. A female novice who speaks ill of another female novice, a monk, a nun, a female trainee, or a male novice — it is the same likewise. And so it is elaborated extensively, turning like a wheel. This is the seventh verse of the sūtra of the ruling case of the second chapter.

In brief:

Novices, and the censure act, those unable to remain because fewer than five — as Upāli inquired about these, five evenings' worth of answers were given.

The buddha, the Blessed One, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Venerable one, if a male novice upon whom a monk has performed a censure act is then given full ordination, is he to be called fully ordained, or not fully ordained?" Upāli, the ordination itself is completed, but the one who performed the ordination has acted in a manner that is past and done. The approval is called the motion.

The venerable Blessed One declared: "If one has completed five years and possesses five qualities, one may be permitted to use a mentor's requisites without a fixed residence." If one has completed four years and possesses five qualities, would such a one also be permitted to use a mentor's requisites without a fixed residence? Upāli, that is not permitted. Why is that? Because five years not yet completed is not fitting. If one has completed six or nine years but does not possess the five qualities, would that one be permitted to use a mentor's requisites without a fixed residence? Upāli, that is not permitted. Why is that? Because one must possess the five qualities.

The venerable one asked: if a monk has completed three years since full ordination and also possesses the three scriptural collections — and is also endowed with the three kinds of knowledge and free from the three defilements — would such a one also be permitted to use a mentor's requisites without a fixed residence? Upāli, the same applies in that case as well. Why is that? Because it must be done in the prescribed manner. For how long may requisites be given to one without a fixed residence? Upāli, even if they are many, it is for up to five days — and even then only while that one is seeking a fixed residence and has not abandoned the effort.

This is the eighth verse of the sūtra of the second section on the grounds for narrative.

In brief:

Concordant and discordant,
with and without measure, suspended and not suspended, likewise name and class.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable One, there is said to be a transgression that is concordant and also one that is discordant — what, Venerable One, is a concordant transgression, and what is a discordant one? Upāli, defeats (pārājika) are concordant with defeats and discordant with the others. A remainder offense with the Saṅgha is concordant with a remainder offense with the Saṅgha. A downfall is concordant with a downfall. A transgression requiring individual confession is concordant with a transgression requiring individual confession. A wrong act is concordant with a wrong act.

Venerable One, there is also said to be a transgression that has measure and one that does not have measure — what, Venerable One, is a transgression with measure, and what is one without measure? Upāli, whatever one remembers the boundaries of the person and the boundaries of the offense, that is called having measure. Whatever one does not remember the boundaries of the person and the offense, that is called not having measure.

Venerable One, there is also said to be a transgression that is suspended and one that is not suspended — what, Venerable One, is a suspended transgression, and what is one that is not suspended? Upāli, suspension is of two kinds: suspension by intention and suspension by days. Of these, what is suspended by days is not suspended. What is suspended by intention is called suspended.

Venerable One, regarding the name and class of transgressions — what, Venerable One, is the name, and what is the class? Upāli, defeats are the name; what arises from them is the class. What is called a remainder offense with the Saṅgha is the name; what arises from it is the class. Downfalls, individually confessed transgressions, and wrong acts are the names; what arises from them are the classes.

This is the ninth verse of the sūtra of the second section on the grounds for narrative.

In brief:

Expelled by a penalty, surrendering the training and not practicing — to such ones faith is not given;

one either performs or does not accept the role of monk.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The group of six monks had incurred remainder offenses with the Saṅgha, and having been penalized, they formed a circle within the enclosure and enacted the penalty. The monks said to them: "Venerable Ones, what are you doing?" They replied: "We are enacting the penalty." The monks said: "This is one who has been restored — it is not a penalty." Then those monks sat there without saying anything further.

When this had occurred, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not enact a penalty act where only a single monk resides. Monks, do not enact a penalty act where two or three monks reside. Where four monks or more than four reside, monks should enact the penalty, the penalty raised from the basis, restoration from the basis, appeasement, appeasement raised from the basis, and raise from the basis and perform appeasement."

After the Blessed One had declared that monks should enact the penalty, the penalty raised from the basis, restoration from the basis, appeasement, appeasement raised from the basis, and raise from the basis and perform appeasement in places where four or more than four monks reside — monks then enacted a penalty against four monks who had relinquished their training. The Blessed One declared: "I do not permit enacting a penalty against four monks who have relinquished their training." After the Blessed One had declared that he did not permit enacting a penalty against four monks who have relinquished their training, monks enacted it against three who had relinquished their training and one who was dwelling in proper accordance with it; then against two who had relinquished their training and two who were dwelling in proper accordance; then against one who had relinquished their training and three who were dwelling in proper accordance. When this had occurred, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not enact a penalty against four who have relinquished their training. Do not enact it against three who have relinquished their training and one who is dwelling in proper accordance. Do not enact it against two who have relinquished their training and two who are dwelling in proper accordance. Do not enact it against one who has relinquished their training and three who are dwelling in proper accordance. Rather, enact the penalty against a complete four — or more than four — who are all fully pure. And just as this applies to enacting a penalty, the same holds likewise for the penalty raised from the basis, restoration from the basis, performing appeasement, raising from the basis and performing appeasement, and performing appeasement raised from the basis."

Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "May faith be taken from one who has relinquished the training?" Upāli replied: "That is not permitted. But if one has come into contact with the Dharma itself, then it is permitted." "Venerable one, may the going-forth be received from one who has relinquished the training?" "Upāli, if the perception of that person as a monk is maintained, then from the very beginning it is permitted."

The tenth verse-section of the second chapter on the base-case has been completed. The second chapter is complete.

The summary verse:

The maṇḍala, the alms-bowl, the parasol and shelter,
Drinking smoke, and the small cup,
An iron comb, the nave of a chariot,
The stretcher-pole, the lamp, and the stūpa.

In brief: the maṇḍala, the abode of the gods,
A half, a third, and an undesignated spot;
Going forth without an alms-bowl,
And not diminishing the alms-bowl.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Monks were washing their alms-bowls here and there wherever they happened to be, and when that area became filled with bees and turned unsightly, brahmins and householders saw this and said: "Have the noble ones been relieving themselves and urinating here?" The monks said: "Good sirs, no one has done that here. We have been washing our alms-bowls." The householders said: "Noble ones, you must have been performing a maṇḍala rite here." And they sat there without saying anything further. Then they mocked the monks, saying: "The ascetics, the sons of the Śākya, are unclean — they wash their alms-bowls wherever they happen to be." When this had occurred, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared to the monks: "Since brahmins and householders mock you, henceforth monks must not wash alms-bowls here and there wherever they happen to be. Monks should make a maṇḍala in the very place where the alms-bowls are washed."

When the Blessed One had said "Make a maṇḍala," the monks made a round maṇḍala in the place where they had washed the alms-bowls. Then brahmins and householders came to the monastery, and seeing the maṇḍala on the ground in the middle of the courtyard, asked: "What on earth is this?" Some of them said: "Oh, what is there to know about looking at this? The ascetics, the sons of the Śākyas, worship the sun." Others said: "Yes, that is so — the ascetics, the sons of the Śākyas, truly do worship the sun." When this had occurred, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, do not make a maṇḍala that resembles the sun." When the Blessed One had said not to make a maṇḍala resembling the sun, the monks made a maṇḍala shaped like a crescent moon. Again brahmins and householders came to the monastery and said: "The ascetics, the sons of the Śākyas, worship the moon." When this had occurred, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, do not make a maṇḍala resembling the moon either." The monks then set about making a square one, and again brahmins and householders came to that monastery and said: "The ascetics, the sons of the Śākyas, worship the cow." When this had occurred, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, do not make the maṇḍala square, and do not make it in either of those two shapes. Make it resembling a lance-tip or a drum." The monks did not know how to go about this, and the Blessed One declared: "Smear it with cow dung, or with earth, or with water." The Blessed One then said: "Make the maṇḍala in these two ways." The monks made such a maṇḍala in two forms for the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, and those present were pleased. When this had occurred, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "For the Three Jewels, whether in the form of the sun or the moon, or in whatever way one has faith, do it in every manner — have no doubt about it."

The occasion is in Śrāvastī. The Blessed One then declared to the monks: "Monks, those who give alms and the patrons who give offerings should from time to time properly please, properly honor, and properly bring happiness to the gods who receive the food offerings, in three ways. What are the three? From time to time sweep the area clean; from time to time also perform the task of setting out the food offerings; and from time to time dedicate the merit of what has been given. Monks, when those who give alms and the patrons properly please, properly honor, and properly bring happiness to the gods who receive the food offerings in this way, those gods in turn regard the givers and patrons with affection and goodwill."

When the Blessed One had said these words, the Sugata having spoken, the Teacher then declared further in verse:

Those faithful persons who honor the gods, who act in accordance with the Teacher's word — even the buddhas praise them.

In whatever place there dwell the wise, the learned, the morally disciplined — proclaim there the giving of food and make it known;
through gaining such ones, one will be honored.

Through making offerings, one becomes worthy of offering.
After that, with tender heart,
as a mother toward her child, those who are cherished by the gods will behold happiness and all that is good.

When faithful persons honor the gods, the Blessed One declared, they are acting in accordance with the Teacher's word.

— buddhas too have praised them — thus did the Blessed One speak.

Now the group of six monks began making offerings to the gods of the fence, the gods of the forest, the gods of the crossroads, the gods of the triple junction, and the gods of the world, and so forth, making offerings to all of them. Then faithful brahmins and faithful householders, having heard this noble teaching declared as wholesome by the Blessed One, thought: if one who has gone forth under the Dharma and Vinaya declared virtuous by these noble ones were to make offerings to those who harm beings by eating flesh and blood, by consuming fat and sinew, and by taking the lives of others — while we lay practitioners must long abandon such things — then this is what it means to make offerings. They spoke thus to censure them with blame and to speak ill of them, and the monks drove those of the group of six away.

Then some of the monks said: "Venerable ones, did the Blessed One not declare: 'When faithful persons — men and women — make offerings to the gods, they are acting in accordance with the Teacher's word, and buddhas too have praised them'? Are we not also persons of faith? Why, then, should we not make offerings?" So they spoke.

When this had come to pass, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, I spoke that with laypeople in mind — not for monks. Therefore, monks, do not make offerings to the gods."

After the Blessed One had declared that monks should not make offerings to the gods, the group of six monks set out to interfere with those who did make such offerings and to harm them. Then gods appeared in the dreams of those monks, saying: "What wrong have we done to you that you should harm us?" And brahmins and householders who had no faith mocked the noble ones, saying: "What harm have these noble ones done to you that you should treat them so badly?"

When this had come to pass, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "Do not make offerings to them, but do not harm them either."

Then the group of six monks set out on a road, and when they passed by shrines of the gods they turned off the road and went by way of uneven paths full of thorns. Some monks were trodden down by mud; some were pierced by thorns; some tumbled into ditches. When this had come to pass, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not turn off the road. Keep to the straight path. When you come to a shrine of the gods, make a snapping sound with the fingers and recite aloud the verse spoken from the Blessed One's own mouth. Do not hesitate in this."

The occasion for the next rule arose at Śrāvastī. The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that a monk of the same community and a personal attendant monk should attend upon his preceptor and teacher three times a day, and also that they should remain within a major boundary of two and a half yojanas. Venerable One, if the teacher and preceptor are two and a half yojanas away, how often should they attend on him?" "Upāli, they should attend every half month. If those persons dwell within the range of a yojana, they should attend every seven or eight days. Within that distance, they should attend at the proper times. If they dwell within five hundred fathoms, they should attend three times a day. If they fail to attend accordingly, it becomes a transgression."

Another occasion arose at Śrāvastī. A person who wished to take full ordination under the venerable Ānanda came and Ānanda ordained him without an alms-bowl. At that time the monks washed their own bowls, set them in their proper places, made prostrations to the stūpa, each took up his own bowl, and went to the place for taking the meal. When the monks, while eating their meal, washed their bowls and then proceeded to make prostrations to the stūpa —

That newly ordained monk also made prostrations together with the others. At the moment when the monks, having made prostrations to the stūpa, washed their hands, that newly ordained monk took up the alms-bowl of the elder Kauṇḍinya, who was known to all, and Kauṇḍinya took it back. Then he reached for the bowls of Gavāṃpati, Mahānāma, Aśvajit, Śāriputra, Maudgalyāyana, Kāśyapa, Ānanda, Revata, and the others, and each of them likewise took their bowls back. He sat off to one side with tears filling his eyes. The monks who had not yet abandoned attachment made the accusation: "Who ordained someone without an alms-bowl?" Some said it was the venerable Ānanda, and then remarked: "Who else but one who behaves in grossly improper ways would do such a thing?" The monks who had become aware of what happened reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, such accusations are frivolous. Therefore, monks, before conferring full ordination on someone who has no alms-bowl, first seek an alms-bowl for him and only then confer ordination. If none is available, I myself shall provide a small bowl. If a monk confers full ordination without an alms-bowl, there will be an offense."

The occasion for the next rule arose at Śrāvastī. The venerable Aśvajit had a young attendant who carried his alms-bowl. This attendant washed both his own and Aśvajit's bowl, but since the two bowls were alike he could not tell which was his and which was his preceptor's. Some time later he wrote "Preceptor Aśvajit's bowl" on the bottom of the venerable Aśvajit's bowl.

Later, another householder invited the community of monks, headed by the Buddha, to a meal at his home. This householder had a former courtesan whom he had previously kept. He sent word to her: "My dear, I have invited the community of monks headed by the Buddha to a meal; come and serve with your own hands." But as it happened, something else came up and she did not go. The Blessed One and the community of monk-hearers were fed, the gift-dedication was spoken, and they departed. The young attendant carrying the venerable Aśvajit's bowl remained there, planning to wash the bowl before leaving. The householder said to him: "Noble one, lend me the bowl for a moment — I shall send some leftover food to a certain friend." The attendant replied that his own he could not give, but offered the venerable Aśvajit's bowl. The householder filled it with pure food and drink, and sent it to the courtesan with the message: "My dear, I have satisfied the community of monks headed by the Buddha with food such as this; please rejoice on their behalf." When she received the food and was about to eat it, she saw an inscription on the bottom of the bowl. Now, women are skilled in all eighteen scripts. She read it and saw the name of the venerable Aśvajit. She thought to herself: "It is improper of me to have sent back in this way the bowl of the noble Aśvajit, who is venerated by gods and men." She inquired about the bowl, then filled it with fragrant, beautiful flowers, placed it upon a painted stand, and sat before it, bowing down and worshipping it with incense.

Then another man arrived bearing five hundred kārṣāpaṇa coins along with perfumes and garlands, and said to her: "Good woman, whatever you are doing, come away with me." She replied: "Wait a moment — I am making an offering to this bowl." He then asked: "Where did this bowl come from, and to whom does it belong?" She told him everything in detail, exactly as it had occurred. He said: "You give generously even to all sorts of remarkable beings, yet you have let the renunciants slip away." At that she covered her ears and said: "Do not do such a wicked thing as that — it would be the cause of going to hell." Though she spoke thus, he would not desist from his improper behavior, and she did not yield to him.

The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One considered it. He reflected that a monk who inscribes what ought not to be inscribed thereby incurs an offense, and therefore declared: "Monks, do not inscribe what ought not to be inscribed." And further: "Monks, do not engrave what ought not to be engraved." The monks, not knowing what ought not to be engraved, asked, and the Blessed One declared: "There are five kinds of what ought not to be engraved: all the codes of individual liberation, anything pertaining to individual liberation, all the Vinaya, anything pertaining throughout the Vinaya, and individual persons. Marking something with an identifying sign, however, is without offense." This is the first verse of the sūtra of the third topic of the origin narrative.

In brief:

A novice broke an alms bowl.

How should an alms bowl be burned?

The use of a fire cover is to be permitted.

The Great Sage authorized it.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. A certain monk caused the novice who was holding his senior monk's alms bowl to carry it by the strap, and since that novice lacked proper mindfulness it slipped from his hands and broke. The monk was distraught. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One considered it. He reflected that a monk who causes a novice to carry an alms bowl by the strap thereby incurs an offense, and declared: "Monks, do not cause novices to carry the alms bowl by the strap."

After the Blessed One had given this training rule — "Monks, do not cause novices to carry the alms bowl by the strap" — the novice disciple of the venerable Śāriputra named Cundaka was holding his preceptor's alms bowl. When his preceptor said to him, "Hand over the bowl — I will wash it myself," Cundaka replied: "The Blessed One has established a training rule that a monk must not cause novices to carry the alms bowl by the strap, so I myself will wash it; you go elsewhere." The preceptor then asked: "Will I myself also incur an offense?" Cundaka replied: "The Blessed Buddha is the master of the Dharma — what am I to do?" The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Those novices who are possessed of mindfulness may indeed carry the bowl by the strap. Have no doubt about this."

The origin narrative is at Śrāvastī. Monks ate food from the alms bowl and then, without cleaning it, covered it and carried it away, whereupon it split open. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Burn the alms bowl." After the Blessed One had said "Burn the alms bowl," the monks burned the bowl with wood, and the bowl was ruined. The Blessed One then declared: "Do not burn it with wood."

The monks wrapped the bowl in grass and chaff and fired it, and this very act became the occasion for a transgression. The Blessed One then declared: "Do not fire it wrapped in grass and chaff." Since the monks did not know how else to fire it, the Blessed One declared: "Prepare a firing cover for the alms bowl." Since the monks did not know how to prepare a firing cover for the alms bowl, the Blessed One declared: "There are two kinds of firing cover: one made by a craftsman, and one made by oneself. The kind made by a craftsman is like a pot. The kind made by oneself may be either a tube or a clay vessel — fill it with ash, and coat the outside of the clay vessel to whatever depth is fitting." When the monks then fired the bowl inside a cooking pot in the same way, this too became the occasion for a transgression. The Blessed One declared: "On the outside, smear it with a mixture of clay and chaff to a solid coat, and on the inside coat it with sesame residue or cow dung; let it dry. Sweep the ground clean, and beneath it lay a bed of chaff, sesame residue, and other materials that will improve the firing. Cover it over with grass, dung, and chaff, and take care that no smoke escapes, and fire it. Tend to it on both sides, turning it and smothering it carefully, so that the living creatures inside may be at ease. When the firing is finished and it has cooled, take out the alms bowl, rinse it, and continue to fire it until it takes on a sky-blue color." Therefore the alms bowl firing cover and the implements for firing are hereby permitted. This concludes the second verse-summary of the third origin narrative of the sūtra.

In brief: the first narrative, the bath house, the third concerning the layman — likewise, the suspension cord and then hair, and all things made with dung — all these have been heard.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī a certain householder constructed a bath house for the Saṅgha. Thereupon the Group of Six monks, covering themselves below with a single garment, engaged in manual work together in close proximity. Some brahmins and householders arrived at that place and, seeing this, said: "Now who are these who behave in such a manner?" Some among them said: "They are non-Buddhists (tīrthikas)." Others said: "No, they are not non-Buddhists — they are the ascetics (śramaṇas), sons of the Śākya." And they began to mock them, saying: "If the Teacher himself is possessed of shame, why are these ones without shame or modesty?" The monks reported this state of affairs to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is indeed improper that brahmins and householders should mock you. Therefore, monks, do not perform manual work together in a bath house wearing only a single garment. If monks perform work in a bath house while wearing only a single garment, they incur a transgression together with its past instances."

The origin narrative is at Śrāvastī. A certain householder at Śrāvastī constructed a bath house for the Saṅgha, and the monks there anointed themselves with grain ghee, touching the feet and then touching the head, touching the head and then touching the mouth, touching the mouth and then touching the hands and feet, touching the hands and feet and then touching the mouth again, and sat there with a poor, worn garment covering them below. Then a certain faithless householder came to that place and, seeing the monks, began to mock them, saying: "These ascetic sons of the Śākya are impure! They touch what they have touched with their feet to their mouths, and they sit there with a poor garment covering them."

"You are sitting naked in the midst of householders!" At this, the monks who were present reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is shameful to mock brahmins and householders. Therefore, do not allow laypeople into the bathhouse, and do not allow the faithless to work there. Assign monks as doorkeepers of the bathhouse, and have them not let householders inside." The Blessed One had declared: "Do not send laypeople into the bathhouse, and do not allow them to work there."

Then, at a later time, when the monks had gone into the bathhouse, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada came there, and the monk who was doorkeeper said to him: "Householder, do not go inside. The Blessed One has declared that laypeople are not to be sent into the bathhouse." The householder replied: "O noble ones, would I too become someone else? I will certainly perform service for the noble ones!" The monks who were present reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Those who have faith, let them into the bathhouse and allow them to work. Do not be uncertain about this." The Blessed One had declared: "Those who have faith, let them into the bathhouse and allow them to work."

Then, when the householder Anāthapiṇḍada went inside, a brahmin came along with him and was not admitted. The brahmin said: "O noble ones, why is the householder Anāthapiṇḍada sent inside while I am not?" The monk said to him: "Brahmin, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada was sent in because of his faith." The brahmin replied: "Well then, if I too were to become faithful, would you send me in?" The monks who were present reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If he has indeed become faithful, let him in." Then the monks gave him the three refuges and let him inside.

Once inside, he too saw the monks touching their feet and then touching their mouths and heads, and sitting with a poor, worn garment covering them below. He became faithless and launched into mockery, saying: "These ascetic sons of the Śākya are impure! They touch what they have touched with their feet to their mouths and heads, and they sit with a poor garment covering them!" The monks who were present reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, let only those of firm faith inside the bathhouse, and do not admit those of weak faith."

The Vinaya, the Supreme Text. The thirty-fourth fascicle.

The occasion is at Śrāvastī. At Śrāvastī, a certain other householder invited the buddha together with the monastic Saṅgha of monks to his bathhouse, and the monks went inside. There, a monk who was an arhat was performing a service for a monk of broken moral discipline. The Blessed One also entered and, seeing him performing this service, declared to the monks: "Monks, did you see this monk performing a service for that monk?" "Venerable One, we saw it," they replied. "The monk performing this service is an arhat, one whose defilements are exhausted. But the one for whom the service is being performed has broken moral discipline; he is one of evil character, rotten, corrupt, festering, behaving like a hidden enemy, not a true ascetic though claiming to be one, not a practitioner of the holy life though claiming to be one. Therefore, monks, let not one who is like a lion perform the service of one who is like a jackal. If he does so, he comes to be one who has transgressed." The Blessed One had declared: "Let not one who is like a lion perform the service of one like a jackal."

Now in Śrāvastī there was another householder who took a wife from a family of equal standing, and together with her he enjoyed himself in pleasure and delight. From that pleasurable enjoyment, in the course of time his wife became with child, and after eight or nine months had passed she gave birth, and a son was born. He was fine in form, beautiful and lovely to behold, endowed with all his limbs — and upon his birth a great birth-celebration was held, and a name was given to him. He was nursed and raised until he grew up, and then in the course of time he went to the Jeta Grove and went forth into the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya. He came to possess the three collections of scripture. He reflected thus: "The Blessed One has said that a son's parents are those who toil with difficulty, who give benefit, who nourish, who raise him, who suckle him at the breast, and who reveal to him the diverse world of Jambudvīpa. And yet even if a son were to carry his mother on one shoulder and his father on the other for a full hundred years, or even if he were to install them as lords and sovereigns over a great realm filled with jewels, pearls, lapis lazuli, conch, crystal, gold, silver, agate, and red coral, and things such as right-coiling conches of the like — not even by such means would a son have repaid or fully repaid his father and mother. But whoever establishes parents who have no faith in full and perfect faith, who rouses them, tames them, leads them in, and settles them; who from poor moral discipline establishes them in perfect moral discipline, from miserliness establishes them in perfect generosity, and from confused wisdom establishes them in perfect wisdom — rousing them, taming them, leading them in, and settling them aright: in such a way does a son repay and fully repay his father and mother." So having reflected in this way, he thought: "Let me too do something, however small, to be of benefit to my parents." And so he enjoyed the pleasures of youth for as long as he wished while living in Śrāvastī, then departed from there enjoying those pleasures as he went, gradually enjoying them as he traveled, and finally arrived at Śrāvastī. He then established those two in taking refuge and set them thoroughly in the training precepts.

Then in the course of time he recounted to his father in full the qualities of those seven goods through which merit is made from wealth. The noble one said: "Father, I too shall make some merit through the seven kinds of noble wealth." His father replied: "Old man, well then — do so!" "What shall I do?" "Build a rest-house." So he built a rest-house, and the householder himself entered upon his own work in his own rest-house. He labored greatly, and when it was done, much washing water, oil, flour, and the like remained. Then the father said: "Son, I am very tired — scratch my back a little." The son replied: "Father, the Blessed One declared, 'Let not one who is like a lion perform service for those who are like jackals,' and has not permitted it."

The father said: "Son, who is the lion and who is the jackal?" The son replied: "Father, I am like the lion; you are like the jackal." The father said: "Son, why is that?" The son replied: "Father, you possess moral discipline; you are not endowed with poor moral discipline." "Son," said the father, "is it so that from one like a jackal, such as I, one like a lion, such as you, was born?"

When this had come to pass, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, that family in which the parents are properly pleased, properly honored, and properly maintained in happiness — that family is one that dwells together with Brahmā. And why is this so?

"Monks, that family in which a son acts rightly toward his parents in accordance with the Dharma — one who acts thus in accordance with the Dharma is called a Brahmā. Monks, that family in which the parents are properly pleased, properly honored, and properly maintained in happiness — that family is one that dwells together with a teacher. And why is this so? Because when a son acts rightly toward his parents in accordance with the Dharma, he becomes like a teacher. Monks, that family in which the parents are properly pleased, properly honored, and properly maintained in happiness — that family is one worthy of generosity. And why is this so? Because when a son acts rightly toward his parents in accordance with the Dharma, that family is worthy of generosity. Monks, that family in which the parents are properly pleased, properly honored, and properly maintained in happiness — that family is one that dwells together with fire. And why is this so? Because when a son acts rightly toward his parents in accordance with the Dharma, they are like fire. Monks, that family in which the parents are properly pleased, properly honored, and properly maintained in happiness — that family is one that dwells together with the gods. And why is this so? Because when a son acts rightly toward his parents in accordance with the Dharma, they become like gods."

When the Blessed One had so declared, and after the Sugata had thus spoken, the Teacher spoke again in verse:

Father and mother are Brahmā;
they are likewise teacher and god.
As a servant tends the fire-god,
so the parents are worthy of a son's offerings.

Therefore one should bow to them with reverence, honor them, bathe them, wash their very feet as well — so should the wise attend upon them.

With food and drink,
with clothing and bedding likewise, if the wise one serves with such care both father and mother — here in this life no grief shall come, and having gone hence, one shall rejoice in the heavens.

When the Blessed One had taught this sūtra, the monks were filled with doubt, and having been filled with doubt, they asked the Blessed One, the buddha, who cuts through all doubt: "Revered Blessed One, it is wonderful that you have spoken of the virtue of attending upon father, mother, and teacher."

The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, what is so wonderful about this? Now, while the Tathāgata is free from attachment, free from aversion, free from delusion — free from birth, old age, illness, death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, displeasure, and distress — he nevertheless speaks of the virtue of attending upon one's parents. In times long past, when I had not yet been freed from attachment, aversion, and delusion, from birth, old age, illness, death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, displeasure, and distress, I once did a small harm to my mother and in consequence experienced great suffering; and having done a small good for her, I experienced great happiness in consequence. Hold these events well in mind, for I shall tell them to you.

What happened in the past: Monks, in times long past, in the city of Vārāṇasī, there was a caravan-leader named Mitra, who was wealthy, of great possessions, and of great fortune, whose estate was vast and wide — comparable to the wealth of Vaiśravaṇa, a rival to the riches of Vaiśravaṇa. He took a wife of equal birth, and together with her he lived in enjoyment and delight. Though sons were born to him from that life of enjoyment together, they all died, and so he was without a son; and desiring a son, he prayed to a thousand gods — Agulāṅg, Varuṇa, Vaiśravaṇa, Vāsava, and others — yet no living son came to him.

Someone else had told him: "If a son is born to you, give him a girl's name, and he will live long." Then, in later days, he lived together with his wife in enjoyment and delight. Through that enjoyment together, his wife conceived a child, and after eight or nine months she gave birth to a boy. He was handsome and beautiful to behold, fair and lovely, with a complexion like golden hue, a head like a parasol, long arms, a broad forehead, a long neck, even eyebrows, a high nose — endowed with all the major and minor marks of a fine form. Upon his birth they held a great birth-feast and then set about giving him a name. Since a friend had instructed that the boy be given a girl's name, the child was named Priyā — "Dear Girl." And as the child called Priyā grew up, his father ventured into the great ocean — and there he died.

Then Priyā said to his mother: "Mother, by what fruit of my father's former karma do we live? I too will do likewise in time to come." The mother thought: "If I tell him that his father was a merchant who entered the great ocean, then he too will enter the great ocean and die there." So she said to him: "Son, your father used to trade in grain. If you wish, you may trade in grain." So he built a grain stall, and on the first day he earned four kārṣāpaṇas, and he gave them to his mother.

Then, in later days, someone else told him: "Your father used to trade in perfumes." Thereupon he abandoned the grain trade and set up a perfume stall. On the very first day he earned eight kārṣāpaṇas, and again he gave them to his mother.

Then, in later days, someone else told him: "Your father was a gold trader." So he abandoned the perfume trade and took up dealing in gold. On the first day he earned sixteen kārṣāpaṇas, and again he gave them all to his mother. The next day he earned thirty-two kārṣāpaṇas, and gave those to his mother as well.

Then the gold traders, who were full of jealousy, thought: "This one is going to corner all the gold in every city." And so they said to Priyā: "What kind of life is this for you, going on like this? Your father was a merchant who entered the great ocean — who has let you fall into such a wretched livelihood as this?"

Stirred by the words of those gold traders, Priyā went to his mother and said: "Mother, I have now heard that my father was indeed a merchant of the great ocean in former times. Do not grieve. I too will enter the great ocean." The mother said to him: "Son, that is true — but you are young and my only child. Do not abandon me and go to the great ocean." But Priyā did not heed his mother's words. He proclaimed himself a caravan-leader and announced: "Let all those in the city who wish to enter the great ocean come with me."

Then, accompanied by five hundred merchants, he set out. His mother, overwhelmed with grief and heartache, weeping and streaming with tears, seized him by both feet and cried: "Son, do not abandon me and enter the great ocean!" But he — feeling neither compassion nor joy at her quiet pleading — flew into a rage and kicked his mother on the head with his foot. Then he went on his way in the company of many travelers.

His mother said: "May this karma not ripen upon you, my son."

Then he passed through villages and towns and —

He looked upon the retinue in the royal palace and made his way to the shore of the great ocean. There he bought a large ship with five hundred old coins, and he hired men to load and unload the vessel, to bail it, to handle the ropes, and to navigate by the stars. He struck a great bell three times in proclamation, then set out and sailed into the great ocean. But after a time, water-monsters and sea creatures made the ship unnavigable. He clung to a plank of wood together with his beloved and reached the far shore. Then he came to dry land.

He saw a city called Joyful and went to it. There he was met by four divine maidens of fine form and lovely to behold, who said to him: "Dear beloved, have you come safely? These are our houses of food and drink, our houses of clothing, our houses of rest — all full of jewels, pearls, lapis lazuli (vaiḍūrya), conch, crystal, coral, gold, and silver. Take all of this. Come inside and dwell with us." And so he dwelt with them for many years, many hundreds of years, many thousands of years, many hundreds of thousands of years, enjoying pleasures just as a sentient being who has accumulated merit, performed virtue, and who through great miraculous power and great force comes to enjoy the fruits of that merit. They instructed him: "Do not take the road to the south." Yet even as they forbade him, he felt ever more drawn in that direction. After some time he went along the southern road, and he saw a city called Ever Joyous and came to its gate. There he was met by eight divine maidens more beautiful than the first, lovelier to behold, more radiant than those before, who said: "Dear beloved, have you come safely? Come inside, dear beloved. These are our houses of food and drink, our houses of clothing, our houses of rest — all filled with jewels, pearls, lapis lazuli, conch, crystal, coral, gold, and silver. Come inside and dwell with us." And so he dwelt with them for many years, many hundreds of years, many thousands of years, many hundreds of thousands of years, enjoying pleasures just as a sentient being who has accumulated merit and virtue, and who through great miraculous power and great force comes to enjoy such fruits. They too instructed him: "Do not take the road to the south." Yet even as they forbade him, he felt all the more drawn that way and wished to go, and after some time he went along the southern road. He saw a city called Full of Joy and came to its gate. There again sixteen divine maidens appeared, more beautiful than those before, lovelier to behold, more radiant than any yet, who said: "Dear beloved, have you come safely? Dear beloved, come inside. These are our houses of food and drink, our houses of clothing, our houses of rest — all filled with jewels, pearls, lapis lazuli, conch, crystal, coral, gold, and silver. Come inside and dwell with us." And so he dwelt with them for many years, many hundreds of years, many thousands of years, many hundreds of thousands of years, enjoying pleasures just as a sentient being who has accumulated merit and virtue and who through great miraculous power and great force comes to enjoy such fruits. They too instructed him: "Do not take the road to the south." Yet even as they forbade him, he felt ever more pulled in that direction and wished to go, and after some time he set out along the southern road. He saw a fine mansion called the Brahma Dwelling of the Teacher and came to its gate. Inside he found a divine maiden more beautiful than all those before —

Even more beautiful than she — thirty-two of them appeared, and they said to her: "Welcome, dear friend. Are you well arrived? We have here a hall of food, a hall of drink, a hall of robes, a hall for sleeping, filled with all manner of things — jewels, pearls, beryl, conch, crystal, coral, gold, silver, and the rest in great variety. Come, and dwell here with us." And so he enjoyed things together with them for many years, many hundreds of years, many thousands of years, many hundreds of thousands of years, just as a sentient being who has accumulated merit and virtue and who through great miraculous power and great force comes to enjoy such fruits. They too instructed him: "Do not take the road to the south." Yet even as they forbade him, he felt ever more pulled in that direction and wished to go, and after some time he set out along the southern road. As he traveled further south, devotion arose in him, and he continued gradually southward until he saw a city built entirely of iron and entered it. The moment he entered, the gate was shut behind him. He went further inside, and that gate too was shut in the same way. He went still further inside, and again the gate was shut. Then there emerged from within a man of enormous stature, on whose head a burning iron wheel was spinning — blazing, fiercely ablaze, its flames all merged into one — and from his head, pus and blood flowed down, and these were being eaten as food. Then the dear maiden asked that man: "Why have you come to be in this state?" The man replied: "Because I harmed my mother." The instant the man uttered those words, the karma of the dear maiden also ripened openly before her. She thought: "I too harmed my mother, and by that karma I have been brought here and have arrived at this place." And at that very moment a voice from the sky declared: "Whoever is bound is freed; whoever is not bound is bound." The instant that voice arose, the wheel that had been on the man's head was there no more, and a wheel appeared on the head of the dear maiden. Then the man, seeing the dear maiden suffering terribly, spoke these verses:

Always rejoicing and proud,
abandoning delight and happiness,
from the mansion of Brahmā the supreme teacher —
why have you come here?

The dear maiden replied:
Always rejoicing and proud,
abandoning delight and happiness,
from the mansion of Brahmā the supreme teacher —

desiring to come here, fetched by karma accumulated over a long time.
By karma long accumulated, wherever karma leads,
there too karma ripens.
By that karma now ripened,
the blazing, fiercely burning wheel has come to afflict my very life, and on my head the wheel now burns.

The man spoke:
With a wicked mind you raised your hand and struck your mother, who was in distress, upon the head — this is the fruit of that karma.

The dear maiden spoke:
The blazing, fiercely burning wheel that afflicts my very life — for how many thousands of years will it spin upon my head?

The man spoke:
For sixty times a thousand years, and up to a hundred years beyond, the blazing iron wheel will be placed upon your head.

Then the dear maiden said to that man: "Is there yet a prospect that others will come here?" And the man replied:

"Those who have performed such karma as this will come here."

Then the dear maiden, though tormented and afflicted by suffering, roused compassion for all sentient beings and spoke these words to the man: "Good sir, for the sake of all sentient beings I have endured this wheel upon my head.
May those others who have performed karma such as this not come here." The moment she had spoken these words, the wheel rose up from the head of that bodhisattva into the sky to the height of seven tāla palms and remained there — and in that same instant she passed away and was born in the realm of the gods of Tuṣita Heaven. So declared the Blessed One.

"Monks, what do you think? She who was called the dear maiden at that time was none other than myself. At that time I was engaged in trade, and through the karmic maturation of the gift I gave — a single copper coin — I experienced supreme happiness in four great cities. But then, through the karmic maturation of the small harm I did to my mother, I experienced suffering such as this. Therefore, monks, train yourselves accordingly. Benefit your father and your mother; do not harm them. One who does not experience such harm as this is like the dear maiden, who experienced it in her life as an ordinary person. She also became endowed with many good qualities, and today she is a Tathāgata. Monks, train yourselves accordingly.

Monks, for this reason, even when one's moral discipline has seriously deteriorated, service is permitted to these five: one's father, one's mother, one's preceptor, one's teacher, and those who are sick."

The occasion for what follows is at Śrāvastī. The Blessed One declared to the monks: "Monks, the sun has risen; the crow caws; the farmer tills the field; and all thieves have gone to their dens."

"Monks, I have used this as a simile; but because its meaning is not understood, that meaning too must be explained. Monks, 'the sun has risen' is a noble utterance of the Tathāgata, the perfectly accomplished buddha. 'The crow caws' is a noble utterance of those persons who are vessels of the Dharma. 'The farmer tills the field' is a noble utterance of those who give and those who are donors. 'All thieves have gone to their dens' is a noble utterance of the retinue of Māra.

Therefore, monks, the Teacher, with affection and out of compassionate purpose, looking to the benefit of his hearers, acting out of compassion, has performed this service for you — and it is now fitting that you act accordingly. Therefore, monks, dwell in solitary places: in forests, at the foot of trees, in empty houses, on hillsides, in ravines, in mountain caves, among piles of straw, in open spaces without shelter, in charnel grounds, in woodland retreats, and at the outermost edges. Monks, do not be heedless. Regret comes later. This instruction I have given is what I have taught you by way of guidance."

Because the Blessed One had spoken of dwelling in solitude — from "regret comes later" and "this is what I have taught" onward, it is as before.

The monks at Śrāvastī then entered into solitary and forested retreats and took up meditative concentration.

At Śrāvastī there was another householder who built a house in the wilderness for monks who dwelt in solitary retreat. After some time another monk who was living off alms, following an ascetic practice, came to Śrāvastī and then returned to the house and stayed there. As time passed his hair and beard grew long, and one early morning he put on his lower robe, took up his bowl and outer robe, and set out.

The householder said to the noble one, "Your hair and beard are long." The monk replied, "There is no one to shave them." The householder then said, "Noble one, please wait here — I will send a barber." The monk set out to collect alms and then returned, and the householder sent a barber as well. Now that monk on his alms round was exceedingly lazy. He had been sitting on a mat while his hair was being shaved, and the cut hair had fallen onto the mat, but he was too indolent to throw it away. The householder thought to send the barber back with the message: "Go and check whether that monk's hair and beard have been shaved or not." The barber went there, found the monk sitting on the mat, and saw that hairs were clinging to his robe. The householder, having been pleased with the monk on his alms round, returned home. His wife said, "My lord's son, were you at the barber's house?" He looked at his robe and saw that hairs were sticking to it, and he thought, "That monk on his alms round must not have had his hair shaved while sitting on the mat — I should go and see." He went and looked, and saw that the mat was full of hair. He then rebuked the monk to his face, saying, "Noble one, do you not even know enough to sweep the hair off the mat after shaving?" The monk on his alms round was mortified, his face burning with shame, and he sat there saying nothing at all.

When this came about, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Monks, those householders are right to reproach him. Therefore, monks, do not shave hair while sitting on a mat." When the Blessed One had declared that monks should not shave hair while sitting on a mat, some monks then shaved in the dwelling hall, in the storage area, and in the gatehouse, and this itself became a matter of offense. The Blessed One then declared, "Do not shave hair in any place used by the Saṅgha for hanging up cloths. If you do, you incur a transgression."

When the Blessed One had declared that hair should not be shaved in places used by the Saṅgha for hanging cloths, some monks were old, feeble, and shivering, and were unable to go outside. Others fell ill, and those who were not ill found it hot and rainy and were also unable to come out, and so they were harmed. When this came about, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Those monks who are old, feeble, and shivering, and those who are sick and uncomfortable, may shave their hair wherever they are. Those who are not sick but for whom it is hot and rainy so that going outside is uncomfortable may also shave their hair wherever they are. In all places, the ground should be swept clean, or it may be swept by someone else. The cut hair should be gathered up and thrown into the midst of the refuse cloths. The cutting of nails follows the same procedure. As for those who are not unwell, they should not do it in that manner — if they do, they incur a transgression."

The occasion for the next rule is as follows. At Śrāvastī a monk fell ill, and though he was treated with medicines made from roots, stems, leaves, and fruits, his illness did not recover. After some time a physician came to the monastery, and the monks said to him, "Good physician, a monk such as this has fallen ill — please prescribe a medical treatment." The physician said, "Noble one, if he eats ground wheat in the evening, he will recover." The monks then said, "Good physician, the Blessed One has not permitted the eating of ground wheat in the evening — how then are we to give him ground wheat to eat in the evening?"

The physician said, "Noble ones, your Teacher is compassionate — he will permit it." The monks then reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is such a thing as barley that old oxen without teeth have chewed — therefore I permit it: take ground wheat from barley that an old ox has chewed and give it to him. Have no hesitation about this." But even after they gave him that ground wheat, the monk did not recover. The monks then described the matter in detail to the physician, who said, "Noble ones, that has lost its flavour and is of no benefit — grind other barley and give it to him." The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "In that case, grind barley that has not been eaten by another and give it to the assembly by means of a sieve." Yet even when the monks did so the monk did not recover. The monks described the matter in detail to the physician, who said, "Noble ones, make it into a thick porridge and give it to him, and he will recover." They reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If the physician so prescribes, make the ground wheat into a thick porridge and give it to him — and similarly whatever is made from ground wheat is also permitted; give all of it. Have no hesitation about this."

The narrative setting is at Śrāvastī. At that time at Śrāvastī another monk fell ill. Medicines made from roots, stems, leaves, and fruits were used to treat him, but he did not recover. After some time a physician came to the monastery, and the monks asked him, "Good physician, please prescribe a medical treatment for a monk who is ill in this way." The physician said, "Noble ones, give him broth in the evening and he will recover." The monks said, "Good physician, since the Blessed One has not permitted eating in the evening, how can he eat broth in the evening?" The physician replied, "Noble ones, your Teacher is compassionate — he will permit it." The monks then reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there is a creature called the she-bear — the meat she has chewed comes out in such a way that I permit it. Therefore take the meat that a she-bear has chewed, make it into broth, and give it to him. Have no hesitation about this." They made broth from the meat a she-bear had chewed and gave it to him, but the monk did not recover. The monks described the matter in detail to the physician, who said, "Noble ones, that has already lost its flavour — give him broth made from fresh meat, and he will recover." The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If the physician so prescribes to make broth from fresh meat, then I permit it: make broth from fresh meat, strain it through cloth, and give it to him." Yet even when the monks did so the monk did not recover. The monks described the matter in detail to the physician, who said, "Noble ones, prepare a compound medicine and give it to him." The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If the physician so prescribes to give him a compound medicine, then give it — and similarly everything that has been cooked down, and all dry things, give them as well. Have no hesitation about this."

This is the third sūtra verse of the third part of the narrative setting.

In summary:

Smoking inhalation and cotton cloth, nasal irrigation and a small bowl, needle and lancet and eye ointment —
all these the Great Sage has permitted.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli put a question to the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a tube for smoking inhalation.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Upāli, of anything except precious materials." "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a cotton cloth.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Made of wool, of hemp fibre, of woven cloth." "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a vessel for nasal irrigation.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Upāli, of anything except precious materials." "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a small bowl for drinking in sequence.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Upāli, of anything except precious materials." "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a lancet.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Upāli, of anything except precious materials." "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a container for eye ointment.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Upāli, of anything except precious materials."

This is the fourth sūtra verse of the third part of the narrative setting.

In summary:

A medicine bowl and a yarn winder,
a footrest and a foot support, medicinal washes and a fee,
and the robe of one who has died.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli put a question to the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a medicine bowl.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Upāli, of anything except precious materials." "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a yarn winder.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Upāli, it is made of seven kinds of thread: wool, hemp fibre, cotton wool, nettle fibre, coarse grass fibre, jute fibre, and silk thread." "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a foot support.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Upāli, of anything except precious materials." "Venerable Blessed One, you have said, 'Keep a couch and a foot support.' Of what kind should one keep it?" "Upāli, of anything except precious materials."

Now the narrative setting is at Śrāvastī. At Śrāvastī, a certain householder fell ill and consulted a physician, saying, "Good sir, I am afflicted with such-and-such a disease; please show me a means of medical treatment." The physician said to him, "Householder, first eat an oily preparation, and afterwards undergo a medicinal wash." So the householder began eating the oily preparation. After some time, a monk who was going near to that village came to him, and said, "Householder, what are you doing?" The householder told him in detail how things stood. The monk said, "Householder, I am skilled at administering medicinal washes — give me the fee you would give the physician, and I will give you a medicinal wash." The householder replied, "Excellent, I will do exactly so," and the monk administered the medicinal wash to him and then rose and went to the monastery. After the householder's medicinal wash had been completed, his relatives went and asked the physician, "What is to be done when that householder has had his medicinal wash?" The physician said, "Who administered the wash?" They replied, "A noble one of such-and-such a name administered it." He was angered and said, "Go and ask that very person." They reported that the man had nearly died but had recovered, and the monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks, accept the fee but do not administer the medicine. And if you have administered a medicinal wash, do not go off in secret. If a situation of that kind arises, go and show the patient to a physician. If you go off without having done so, you will incur an offense with remainder."

The narrative occasion for this is at Śrāvastī. A creditor seized a debtor and fixed a term, saying, "Pay me at such-and-such a time," and then released him. The debtor thought: "Though the term has been fixed, I cannot repay him on time; I will flee when the time comes." Later he thought again: "To go away and leave this place will be very painful. I will kill that creditor." And thinking so, he killed him on the road to the Jeta Grove. Before long the group of six monks saw the body and thought: "We have found a charnel-ground robe!" and began stripping it. The man's relatives came to that place, saw what was happening, burst into tears, and said, "You have killed him!" The monks replied, "We certainly did not kill him; he was undoubtedly killed by an enemy." The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, the suspicion that arose in the relatives was natural. Therefore, monks, do not pick up a robe of that kind from a charnel ground. Wait until the moment when many people have recognized it for what it is, and only then take it. If you do not do so, you will incur an offense with remainder."

This is the fifth verse of the third subsidiary topic's sūtra.

The Noble Vinaya. The thirty-fifth fascicle.

In brief:

A iron bowl with a carrying cord,
a back-, waist-, and head-load, robes and food for mother and father,
the woolly robe is the third.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Reverend Blessed One, it was said, 'Monks should hang an iron bowl from an iron cord.' How is the iron cord to be attached?" "Upāli, everything except one made of precious materials." "Reverend Blessed One, it was said, 'Monks should carry a medicinal scraper.' How is one to be carried?" "Upāli, everything except one made of precious materials." "Reverend Blessed One, it was said, 'Monks should not carry loads on their backs, waists, or heads.' Should nuns also not carry loads on their backs, waists, or heads?" "Upāli, nuns too should not carry loads on their backs, waists, or heads. If they do, they will incur an offense with remainder."

The narrative occasion for this is at Śrāvastī. A certain householder there took a wife from among his own kind and enjoyed himself with her in happiness. After they had enjoyed themselves together in happiness, in later times his wife became pregnant. When eight or nine months had passed, she gave birth to a boy who was handsome, beautiful, and endowed with all his limbs. They held a great naming ceremony for the newborn and gave him a name. They raised him and he grew up, and then in later times, without asking his parents, he went forth into the teaching of the Blessed One. One morning he put on his lower robe, took his bowl and monastic robe, and entered Śrāvastī for alms. His elderly father saw him and said: "Son, if you have gone forth, who will take care of us?"

He stood there without saying a word. When the monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is parents who endure hardship for the sake of their children. Therefore, even after a son has gone forth, he is permitted to provide his parents with food and clothing." After the Blessed One had said "Even though he has gone forth, provide his parents with food and clothing," the monks did not know how to do so. The Blessed One then declared: "Whatever surplus he has from his bowl and monastic robes, let him provide from that. If there is none, let him seek it from a donor and provide it. If he belongs to the Saṅgha and has access to the Saṅgha's material gains, let him give half of that. If he is one who goes on alms round, let him give half of what he receives on alms round. If he does not do so, he incurs an offense together with the past."

The setting for the next matter is Śrāvastī. Not far from Śrāvastī there was a village called Cliff Village, and in that village there was a temple. Within it there dwelt an elderly monk. In later times he went to Śrāvastī in order to pay homage at a stūpa. Now among the Group of Six monks, one of them was guarding the gate of the Jeta Grove. The venerable Ānanda, who was sitting at the gate, saw from a distance an old white-haired monk with long eyebrows approaching and thought to himself: "Shall I go out to meet this senior monk who is coming?" He went out ahead, and said: "Elder, have you come comfortably?" The monk paid homage to him, saying: "I pay homage." When he said "I pay homage," the venerable Ānanda thought: "This elderly monk does not know who is a teacher and who is an abbot," and realizing this, he said: "Elder, come here. Come along to the temple." He led him to the temple and had him rest. After the elder had sat for a short while, he said: "Teacher, I have come to pay homage at the stūpa." Ānanda said: "Stay. Wait until the time of the assembly and then go." The elder replied: "Teacher, I will take all three of my monastic robes and leave now, before the assembly." Ānanda said: "Elder, stay. I will perform the consecration of the three monastic robes here." When the time for the assembly had come, Ānanda consecrated the rectangular cloth as the lower robe, the upper cloth as the upper garment, and the small piece of cloth as the combined robe. Then he placed the upper cloth and the small cloth over the elder's shoulder, wrapped them with the rectangular cloth over that, fastened the waist-cloth firmly, and then sent him into the assembly. When the monks saw this they were troubled. Some monks confessed it as an offense. Others said: "Why is the elderly monk pretending to be mad?" The elder said: "Venerable ones, these are my three monastic robes. If I am suddenly called away, where would I put them?" They asked: "Are those really three monastic robes?" He replied: "What would one who lacks them do?"

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "That which has become the object of the offense is: monks performed the consecration of three monastic robes from a long hair. Therefore, wishing to rule that monks should not perform the consecration of three monastic robes from a long hair, the Blessed One declared: 'Monks, it is good that monks confess offenses. But that which has become the object of the offense is that one performed the consecration of three monastic robes from a long hair.'"

"Therefore, monks, do not perform the consecration of three monastic robes from a long hair. If one does perform such a consecration, it will result in a transgression." When the Blessed One had declared, "Monks, do not perform the consecration of three monastic robes from a long hair," faithful brahmins and householders then offered wool cloth, blanket material, and cotton cloth. The monks, arising in doubt, did not accept these. Thereupon those donors said: "When a buddha, the Blessed One, had not appeared in the world, the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) were our merit-field. Now that a buddha, the Blessed One, has appeared in the world, you are our merit-field. If you do not accept now, how shall we pass to the next world without any store of virtue?" But the monks said nothing at all.

The monks then reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, what the faithful brahmins and householders say is true. Therefore I permit this: accept the wool; short hairs may be consecrated as extra cloth, and long hairs should be consecrated as the property of the donor and kept accordingly."

This is the sixth verse of the sūtra of the third section of the narrative basis.

In brief, the verse runs:

A stūpa of head-hair and nail clippings, a white-colored lamp,
a house, a lamp-vessel, wool, an ox, a noble lady, and a horse-race.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

The householder Anāthapiṇḍada, faithful by disposition, rose early and went to pay homage at the feet of the Blessed One and the monastic Saṅgha. After some time had passed, the Blessed One, wishing to demonstrate the practice of acquiring merit for sentient beings, summoned a barber and had his hair and beard shaved. Thereupon the householder Anāthapiṇḍada went to the Jeta Grove, prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One, and said: "Blessed One, if the Blessed One permits, I should like to build a stūpa enshrining the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings." The Blessed One declared: "Then, householder, I permit it — build one." He chose a broad and spacious site, made great preparations together with friends, brothers, and relatives, and built a stūpa enshrining the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings that was beautiful to behold by all people. But because it had not yet been plastered with lime, it was not beautiful in appearance. So he went again into the presence of the Blessed One, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's feet, and said: "Blessed One, I have built a stūpa enshrining the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings that is beautiful to behold by all people, but until it is plastered with lime it is not beautiful in appearance. May the Blessed One permit me to plaster it with lime." The Blessed One declared: "Then, householder, I permit it — plaster it with lime." He plastered it with lime and made offerings of incense, perfume, and flowers. Then, because there was no lamp at night, it was not beautiful in appearance. Again he went to where the Blessed One was, prostrated with his head at the Blessed One's feet, and addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Blessed One, I have plastered the stūpa enshrining the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings with lime and made offerings of incense, ointment, and flowers; but at night there is no lamp within, and it is not beautiful in appearance. May the Blessed One permit this" —

"I have made offerings at the stūpa enshrining the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings, and I wish to hang a garland of butter-lamps there at night," he said. The Blessed One declared, "Very well, householder. I permit it. Make offerings there, and in the evening hang a garland of butter-lamps above the stūpa of head-hair and nail clippings." He did so, but the butter dripped down and spoiled the white surface of the stūpa. He went again to where the Blessed One was, prostrated at the Blessed One's feet, and reported this. The Blessed One declared, "Place the garland of butter-lamps lower down." He placed the garland of butter-lamps lower down, but then dogs drank the butter and carried off the vessels as well.

Again he went to where the Blessed One was, prostrated at the Blessed One's feet, and addressed the Blessed One in these words: "Blessed One, when I place a garland of butter-lamps beneath the stūpa enshrining the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings, dogs drink the butter and carry off the lamp-vessels too. May the Blessed One permit me to build a small lamp-house." The Blessed One declared, "Very well, householder. I permit it. Do so." He built the small lamp-houses.

Then oxen fouled the stūpa of head-hair and nail clippings. Again he went to where the Blessed One was, prostrated at the Blessed One's feet, and said these words: "Blessed One, oxen have fouled the stūpa of the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings that I erected. May the Blessed One permit me to enclose it with a railing." The Blessed One declared, "Very well, householder. I permit it. Enclose it with a railing." When he enclosed it with a railing, there was no stairway and it was not beautiful in appearance. Again he went to where the Blessed One was, prostrated at the Blessed One's feet, and said: "Blessed One, I have enclosed the stūpa of the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings all around with a railing, but this railing has no stairway and it is not beautiful. May the Blessed One permit me to add a stairway to the railing." The Blessed One declared, "Very well, householder. I permit it. Build one." He built the stairway, and then having assembled all the requisite materials, he gathered his friends, brothers, and kinsmen and made a great offering at the stūpa of the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings.

Many people seeing this were filled with deep admiration. Faith arose in them, and they too, in just the same manner, erected stūpas enshrining the Blessed One's head-hair and nail clippings in place after place.

Then the Blessed One, having dwelt at Śrāvastī as long as he was pleased to stay, set out to travel toward Rājagṛha and arrived at Rājagṛha. He took up residence in the Bamboo Grove of Kalandaka at Rājagṛha. King Bimbisāra, hearing that the Blessed One had arrived and was staying in the Bamboo Grove of Kalandaka at Rājagṛha, took his great royal retinue and, accompanied by his queens of the inner court, young attendants, ministers, and members of his household, went to where the Blessed One was. He bowed his head at the Blessed One's feet and sat to one side.

The Blessed One, knowing the king's disposition, his latent tendencies, his temperament, and his character, then taught him the Dharma in such a way as would lead him to realize the Four Noble Truths of the noble ones, speaking thus:

Upon hearing this teaching, King Bimbisāra, together with eighty thousand gods, shattered the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection with the vajra of primordial wisdom, and directly realized the fruit of stream-entry. Having thus seen the truth, he together with those eighty thousand gods went to pay homage to the Blessed One three times each day.

Then one day, as spring had come and the trees were in full bloom, and in a dense forest where geese, cranes, peacocks, parrots, cuckoos, the kokila birds, and the jīvañjīvaka birds and others were all calling out, the king was seated together with the queens of his inner court. The queens of the inner court spoke to him, saying: "Your Majesty, since we are unable to go each day to behold the face of the Blessed One, please have a stūpa of the Tathāgata's hair and nails erected in the midst of us, the queens of the inner court, so that we may pay it honor and worship it with flowers, perfumes, unguents, incense, parasols, victory banners, and pennants."

He then made request to the Blessed One: "May the Blessed One grant us his hair and nails, so that we may erect a stūpa of the Tathāgata's hair and nails in the midst of the queens of the inner court."

The Blessed One granted his hair and nails. The king made great reverence and honor, and then, together with the queens of the inner court, erected a stūpa of the Tathāgata's hair and nails in the midst of the queens of the inner court. The queens of the inner court then made excellent offerings to it with lamps, incense, flowers, perfumes, and unguents.

Then at a time when King Ajātaśatru, incited by his evil friend the god Devadatta, had deprived his father, the Dharma-king Bimbisāra who ruled righteously according to the Dharma, of his life and his kingdom, and had himself ascended to the throne, he then made it law that all offerings of Dharma to the Blessed One's teaching were cut off, so that no one would perform any act of devotion at the stūpa of the Tathāgata's hair and nails. And when the occasion of the fifteenth day arrived for the opening of the fortnight, still no one offered silken pennants, lamps, or flowers at the stūpa of the hair and nails.

Then the queens, seeing the stūpa of the hair and nails in such a state, remembered King Bimbisāra. Unhappy and grieving, weeping, they said: "We have become separated from Bimbisāra, the Dharma-king, and our merit too has been exhausted."

Among them was a queen named Śrīmatibuddhi. Heedless of her own life, with her thoughts fixed upon the qualities of the Buddha, she swept the stūpa of the hair and nails with a silken pennant and offered a garland of lamps.

At that moment Ajātaśatru appeared on the rooftop of the palace and, looking out, saw a great radiance blazing forth. He asked what it was. Someone told him that Queen Śrīmatibuddhi had offered a garland of lamps at the stūpa of the hair and nails. Ajātaśatru then summoned Śrīmatibuddhi and said: "Why have you acted against the king's law?" The queen replied: "I have indeed acted against the king's law, yet I have not acted against the law of the Dharma-king Bimbisāra."

Enraged at this, he hurled a wheel at her, separating her from her life. Yet she, as she died, with her mind filled with reverent faith in the Blessed One, departed this life and was reborn in the good abode of the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three.

At that time the gods assembled in their meeting place. Then the goddess Śrīmatibuddhi, her body encircled by a radiant light shining for a full league in every direction, went to the assembly of the gods. Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, seeing a vast and brilliant light radiating a full league in every direction, asked:

Who has anointed your body with gold?
You who resemble a blue lotus in bloom — matchless and glorious, from what have you come?
This light that shines from you — why does your face resemble an opening lotus?
You who are like the radiance of gold — tell me, goddess, what is the fruit of your deeds, and by whose karma have you come to act thus?

The goddess replied:

The protector of the three worlds, the lamp for all living beings —
seeing the excellent marks of the supreme Buddha, the dispeller of darkness, to him I offered a lamp.
I offered it to dispel the darkness of afflictions.
Seeing the light like the rays of the moon, the sage who illuminates, who is a being of clarity — seeing the power and light of the Teacher,
I paid homage to his most excellent speech.
By that karma I am born here, luminous and beautiful to myself.
My face when looked upon is lovely, pure as a lotus, pure as the moon.

Śakra said:

How wonderful — this world is endowed with virtue!
Having abandoned all faults, you have planted the seed for birth in the high realms.
Who would not honor the supreme form, white and heaped like gold?

The Buddha, like a lotus opening wide, lotus eyes born from the pure waters of transcendence, his finest limbs blazing with light, his eyes like the flower of the lotus (kamala).

It is the nature of reality that whether a son or daughter of the gods is born in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, before much time has passed three thoughts naturally arise concerning: from where they died and transmigrated, where they have been born, and by what karma they were born. The goddess Śrīmatibuddhi, upon examining from where she had died and transmigrated, saw that it was from among humans. Upon wondering where she had been born, she saw that she had been born in the excellent realm of the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three. As for the karma, she recalled: "I had sincere faith in the Blessed One."

Then Śrīmatibuddhi thought: "It would not be proper for me to go and see the face of the Blessed One when I have only just been born. By all means let me go to see the Blessed One before my newborn time has passed." And so the goddess Śrīmatibuddhi put on luminous, stainless, flashing earrings and adorned her body with necklaces and ornaments. She filled her arms with divine flowers — blue lotus, lotus, white lotus, great white lotus, coral tree blossoms, and other such flowers — and with that great brilliance she illuminated the entire Kalandaka Bird Forest of the Grove of Light. She scattered flowers before the Blessed One and went to hear the Dharma. The Blessed One, knowing her intention, her latent disposition, her constitution, and her nature, taught the Dharma in such a way that she would fully realize the Four Noble Truths of the noble ones. Upon hearing it, the goddess Śrīmatibuddhi shattered the twenty-peak mountain of the view of the transitory collection (the belief in a personal self) with the vajra of wisdom, and manifestly attained the fruit of stream-entry. Having seen the truth, she proclaimed three utterances of true words:

"Reverend One, this was not done for me by my father, nor by my mother, nor by the king, nor by a god, nor by a beloved one, nor by brother, sister, or relative, nor was it done in previous lives, nor by brahmin or ascetic — it is the Blessed One who has dried up for me the ocean of tears and blood, who has freed me from the mountain of bones, who has closed the door to the lower realms, who has opened the door to the high realms and liberation, and who has established me in the abode of gods and humans."

Then she spoke:

Brilliantly illumined by your power, the path to the lower realms, with its many faults —
the door to high realms and merit I have opened as well.
The path to nirvāṇa, too, have I attained.
Relying on you, I have abandoned all faults.
I have obtained forever a purified eye.
I have gained the path that is joyful and peaceful to the noble ones.
Having crossed to the far shore of the ocean of suffering, even while wandering among the destinies, gods and humans honor me.
Free from the faults of birth, aging, and death — even in a thousand existences, this is exceedingly hard to behold.
Today, having seen the face of the Sage, I have obtained the fruit.
Bowing low, my hair loosened and hanging freely,
I touched my hands to your two feet and joy arose.
Circumambulating the Victor from the right,
I went forth into the realm of the gods.

Then the goddess Śrīmatī, like a merchant who has found profit, like a farmer who has had a good harvest, like a hero who has won a battle, like a sick person who has been freed from all illness, departed with those same riches with which she had come to the Blessed One's presence, and went to her own abode.

Now the monks, having remained without sleeping through the night and at dawn, diligently attending on the Sage, saw a great radiance shining in that place of the Blessed One. Upon seeing this, they inquired of the Blessed One: "O Blessed One, was it Brahma, lord of the assembly, or Śakra (Indra), lord of the gods, or one of the four world-guardians, or who was it that came to look upon the face of the Blessed One?"

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, it was not Brahma, lord of the assembly; it was not Śakra, lord of the gods; nor did the four world-guardians or others come. Rather, it was a being called Śrīmatī, wife of King Rūpasāraṃ, who, without regard for her own life, offered a garland of lamps to the reliquary stupa of the Tathāgata's hair and nails. Thereafter King Ajātaśatru hurled a wheel-weapon and separated her from her life. She, with a mind of manifest faith toward me, at the time of her passing was born as a god in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three. That very night she came to my presence; I taught her the Dharma, she saw the truth, and then departed to her own abode.

Therefore, monks, do not be afraid of merit. Why so? Merit is a word of happiness — desirable, pleasant, supremely pleasant, agreeable. That, monks, is merit. Monks, you should be afraid of non-merit. Why so? Non-merit is a word of suffering — undesirable, unpleasant, supremely unpleasant, disagreeable. That, monks, is non-merit.

Monks, I myself directly perceive from long ago that merit accumulated long ago, at the time of its ripening, is experienced as desirable, pleasant, supremely pleasant, and agreeable.

Monks, because I cultivated the mind of loving-kindness for seven years, for seven aeons of destruction and re-formation I did not come to this world. At the time of the world's destruction I was born in the heaven of the gods of universal light. At the time of re-formation I was born in an empty Brahmā palace, and there too I became the master of Brahmā and Mahābrahmā, prevailing by my own superior power and not by another's. I exercised sovereignty over a thousand hundreds of sentient beings and was praised as supreme among beings. For thirty-six thousand aeons I became Śakra, lord of the gods. For a countless number of hundreds of aeons I became a wheel-turning king who had subdued the four quarters and was endowed with the seven precious things. The seven precious things are of the following kinds, namely:

the precious wheel, the precious elephant, the precious horse, the precious jewel, the precious queen, the precious minister of the household, and the precious general — these are the seven. I had a full complement of a thousand sons, all of them courageous, capable, and handsome, capable of vanquishing enemy forces. And I subdued this great earth as far as the ocean's shore by Dharma alone, without recourse to the rod or the sword, and dwelt there free from all discomfort. At that time I reflected: "By what karma has its ripening made me so mighty and so possessed of great supernatural power?" And then I thought: "It is by three fruits of this karma and three maturations of this karma that I have become so mighty and so possessed of great supernatural power. What are these three? They are: generosity, taming, and self-restraint." Having so reflected, the Blessed One spoke those words, and then the Teacher spoke further as follows.

You who desire virtue and happiness, look to the ripening of merit.
For seven years the monks cultivated a mind of loving-kindness, and for seven aeons of formation and dissolution
they did not return to this world.
At the time of dissolution I remained illuminating all the world in the intermediate state.
After reformation, dwelling in the Brahmā realm,
I abided there as the ruler of great Brahmā for seven successive times.
For thirty-six periods
I became king of the gods.
For countless hundreds of aeons
I became a king of fearsome renown, anointed on the crown with the royal consecration of the warrior lineage, sovereign over Jambudvīpa.
Not by the rod or the sword
did I subdue this world, but by the very nature of reality, without constraint,
I trained beings in the correct way.
Having turned the wheel of Dharma throughout these circles of the earth, in that place of wealth and great abundance
I too was born into such a lineage.
Every manner of wealth was perfectly complete, and likewise the seven precious things.
Endowed with riches and many resources,
I became a king of fame and awe.
By the cause of that great power, wherever I was born I became supreme.
This is what was taught by the Buddha,
the Blessed One who benefits the world.
Those who know this great wonder — and it is no small supernatural feat — what wise person would not have faith?
Therefore, even if one's birth is humble, one who wishes to bring benefit to others and sincerely aspires to great power should take the sacred Dharma as one's teacher and keep the Buddha's teaching in mind.

When the Blessed One had spoken these words, the monks were pleased and rejoiced in what the Blessed One had declared.

This was the seventh verse section of the sūtra of the three doors, from within the narrative framework.

In summary: a house with a foundation and a stairway, a bride with a terrace, pillars plastered with red lac, and walls painted with patterns of resin.

The Blessed One, the Buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove of Anāthapiṇḍada in Śrāvastī. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada went to where the Blessed One was, prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One, and addressed the Blessed One thus: "If the Blessed One grants permission, I will build a circumambulatory perfume chamber around the reliquary shrine of the Blessed One's hair and nails, and will also construct a stairway for it." The Blessed One declared: "Then, householder, proceed with my permission."

Again the householder addressed the Blessed One thus: "If the Blessed One grants permission, I will build a surrounding wall around the reliquary shrine of the Blessed One's hair and nails." And the Blessed One declared:

"Then, householder, proceed with my permission."

Again, when the Blessed One had granted permission, the householder addressed him thus: "I will encircle it with a railing." And the Blessed One declared: "Then, householder, proceed with my permission."

Again, when the Blessed One had granted permission, the householder addressed him thus: "I will paint the pillars with red lacquer." And the Blessed One declared: "Householder, then proceed with my permission."

Again, when the Blessed One had granted permission, the householder addressed him thus: "I will paint the wall surfaces with lac dye." And the Blessed One declared: "Householder, then proceed and paint them with my permission."

This is the eighth verse of the sūtra of the three gates within the introductory narrative.

To summarize in verse:

The tooth of a bull, and thread, a garland, one adorned with precious garlands, an attendant, and the essence,
and also the gate of the essence.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One said: "Monks, offer worship and pay honor to the reliquary shrine of my hair and nails." When the monks were making offerings at the reliquary shrine, they drove in pegs and hung garlands of flowers. Brahmin householders who were devotees, upon seeing this, raised a complaint: "Why are the monks driving pegs into the Teacher's reliquary shrine, which had no pegs?" When matters stood thus, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Setting aside the criticism of the brahmins and householders — do not drive pegs into the reliquary shrine; instead, obtain something small, like the tooth of a bull."

When the Blessed One had declared, "Obtain something small, like the tooth of a bull," the monks began digging a hole in the reliquary shrine and inserting something shaped like a bull's tooth. The Blessed One then declared: "Do not dig a hole in the reliquary shrine and insert something shaped like a bull's tooth; rather, affix it at the time of building the reliquary shrine's wall, before it is erected."

When the monks were making offerings, they climbed up onto the reliquary shrine and hung the flower garlands on the rim of the water-spout trough. Brahmin householders, upon seeing this, raised a complaint: "Why are the monks climbing onto and trampling the Teacher's reliquary shrine in this way, and wandering about upon it?" When matters stood thus, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Setting aside the criticism of the brahmins and householders — monks must not trample and wander upon the Teacher's reliquary shrine. If it is for the purpose of making offerings, a layman may climb up. If there is no layman, a novice who has washed both feet and either anointed them with perfume or wrapped them in cloth may climb up. If none of these is available, a monk, bearing in mind that this is the Teacher's shrine and reflecting on the occasion as it presents itself, may climb up in just that way and make decorative patterns with perfume."

When the reliquary shrine was large and it was not possible to climb it, the Blessed One declared: "One may climb by holding a rope."

Flower garlands were offered at the reliquary shrine of hair and nails, but they wilted and became unsightly. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada said to the Blessed One: "I offered flower garlands at the Blessed One's reliquary shrine of hair and nails, but they wilted and became unsightly. If the Blessed One grants permission, I will offer a garland of precious jewels at the Blessed One's reliquary shrine of hair and nails." And the Blessed One declared:

"Therefore, householder, since it is permitted, you may offer it."

Crows and other birds perched on the reliquary shrine of hair and nails, and their droppings made the shrine unsightly. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada said to the Blessed One: "Crows and other birds have come to the Blessed One's reliquary shrine of hair and nails, and their droppings have made the shrine unsightly. If the Blessed One grants permission, I will wrap it in fine cloth." And the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, householder, since it is permitted, wrap it in fine cloth." And so he wrapped it in fine cloth.

That wrapping rotted in the rains and became dark and invisible. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada said to the Blessed One: "The fine cloth with which I wrapped the Blessed One's reliquary shrine of hair and nails has now been rotted by the rains of summer, grown dark, and is no longer visible. If the Blessed One grants permission, I will put a drainage spout on it." And the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, householder, since it is permitted, put a canopy on it."

This is the ninth verse-summary of the third-gateway sūtra within the accounts of origin.

In brief:

Make a reliquary shrine from copper and the like,
From gold and silver and so forth,
Encircle it with victory banners,
And apply seals of grain and butter.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the pleasure garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada went to where the Blessed One was, bowed his head at the Blessed One's feet, and said to the Blessed One: "If the Blessed One grants permission, I will build a copper reliquary shrine for the Blessed One." And the Blessed One declared: "Householder, therefore, since it is permitted, build it." Again he said: "If the Blessed One grants permission, I will build a golden reliquary shrine." And the Blessed One declared: "Householder, therefore, since it is permitted, build it."

And likewise for one made of silver — build it on a grand scale; for one made of vaiḍūrya — build it on a grand scale; for one made of crystal — build it on a grand scale.

Again he said: "If the Blessed One grants permission, I will offer victory banners at the Blessed One's reliquary shrine of hair and nails." And the Blessed One declared: "Householder, therefore, since it is permitted, offer them." When the Blessed One said to offer victory banners, Anāthapiṇḍada did not know what kind to offer. The Blessed One declared: "There are four kinds of victory banner: the lion victory banner, the makara victory banner, the nāga victory banner, and the garuḍa victory banner."

Again he said: "If the Blessed One grants permission, I will apply seals of grain and butter to the Blessed One's reliquary shrine of hair and nails." And the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, householder, since it is permitted, apply the seals." Again he said: "If the Blessed One grants permission, I will anoint the Blessed One's reliquary shrine of hair and nails with red ochre." And the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, householder, since it is permitted, anoint it. And just as you anoint with red ochre, likewise anoint with sandalwood on a grand scale."

This is the tenth verse-summary of the third-gateway sūtra within the accounts of origin. Herewith the third gateway within the accounts of origin is complete.

In brief:

The flat door-slab, and likewise in summer,
The six groups and the cook,
The bowl-stand and the permanent stand likewise,
The wanderer and the loan,
The application of seals as is fitting —
Thus are the sūtras summarized in brief.

In brief:

The flat door-slab and the knee-embrace,
The net, and likewise the frame of the net,
The field, the crop, and the birth,
What arises from wealth, and garments —
These are the sūtras summarized in brief.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Reverend Blessed One, when you say 'Let a monk take hold of a flat door-slab,' from what material should it be made?" "Upāli, from anything except precious substances."

He asked again: "Reverend Blessed One, when you say 'Let a monk make a knee-embrace,' how should it be made?" "Upāli, from seven kinds of cord: wool, flax stalk fiber, cotton thread, silk, kuśa grass, koṭambaka fiber, and hair-cloth."

He asked again: "Reverend Blessed One, when you say 'Make a net,' of what kind should it be made?" "Upāli, of four kinds: from muñja grass, balvaja grass, silk, and cotton thread."

He asked again: "Reverend Blessed One, when you say 'Make a frame for the net,' of what kind should it be made?" "Upāli, from anything except precious substances."

The account of origin for this takes place in Śrāvastī. At Śrāvastī there lived a certain householder who had faith and a virtuous mind. He had married the daughter of a lay follower who was a Jain, and he instructed her: "My dear, the Buddha is our teacher, the Dharma is our banner, and the monks are our field of offerings — make offerings to them." She, being deceitful and accustomed to acting dishonestly, replied just as the master's son Legs would have done honestly: "I will do so." Accordingly, each day the Saṅgha's appointed monks were served the midday meal at that householder's home.

Then, some time later, the householder had a small matter of business in another rocky mountain village. He instructed his wife: "My dear, I have a small matter of business in the rocky mountain village called such-and-such — I am going there. You, in the same way, continue serving the midday meal to those worthy of offerings." She, deceitful as she was, replied just as the master's son Legs would have done honestly: "I will serve the midday meal."

After he left, he thought: "I have given instructions to my wife; I should also give instructions to the monks." He went to the monastery, paid homage at the feet of the monk in charge of the schedule, and said: "Noble one, I have a small matter of business in that rocky mountain village called such-and-such — I am going there. Please, noble one, send the monks appointed by the Saṅgha as before." The monk replied graciously: "Householder, they will be well sent as before."

The householder then paid homage to the Teacher, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, and departed for that rocky mountain village.

The Saṅgha's appointed monks spoke among themselves, saying: "That householder's wife has no faith; she will send us away before noon." So they arrived before noon. When the householder's wife saw them she accused them, saying: "Noble ones, you have come far too early — is there no one more important among you?" They said not a word in response, but remained there from that time until noon, ate their meal, and departed.

The next day she prepared the food early, set out the seats, and sat there ready, waiting. When the monks arrived at noon she looked them over, and then she taunted them — she taunted them both on both sides together, one by one, saying: "However it may be, after eating and going, tell those who practice celibacy that henceforth the monks need not come here either." Having said this, she ate the food herself and went to the monastery.

Those monks then recited everything that had happened, and from then on the monks did not go there again. Some time later, when that householder came back and asked the Lady Bzang mo, who was in charge of the offerings, "Has the porridge been served?", she replied: "Master, it has been two days now — the monks came, had their porridge, and then stopped coming." Hearing this, he went to the monastery and said to the noble ones: "Why did the Saṅgha not send the assigned monks?" They recited back to him everything that had happened. He said to the noble ones: "In that case, please accept the produce of my fields and take your meal here." The monks replied: "Householder, we cannot do that. Why not? The Blessed One has not permitted receiving uncooked grain." With that, the man said nothing more.

The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Very well then — for the sake of the Saṅgha, go and receive that produce of the fields, and have no hesitation about it."

The origin story is set in Śrāvastī. In Śrāvastī, a certain householder built a dwelling for another person, furnished it with many beds and seats, and had it placed there. The monks gathered them all together and stored them in a large storeroom. A monk then told that householder about it, and the householder mocked him. The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, the householder's mockery is of no consequence. Therefore the beds and seats should be used exactly as they were dedicated. Whoever resides there has authority over them."

Then that same householder offered a large amount of cloth provisions to that dwelling, and a monk spread it out as bedding and put it together with the Saṅgha's provisions. The monk told the householder, and the householder mocked him again. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, the householder's mockery is of no consequence. Put it under the donor's authority, and as for those cloth provisions of the household — authority over them belongs to those who reside there. When they did not give the monk his individual share, the Blessed One declared: "Give from those provisions that belong to the Saṅgha as well — let him enjoy the use of that too, and have no hesitation about it."

This is the first verse of the sūtra of the fourth door within the origin story.

The holy Vinaya, the thirty-sixth fascicle.

In brief:

Whoever resides in a given place — that monk too is entitled to what suits it:
the implements for the work of plastering, food and lamps — he is entitled to these.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In Śrāvastī, a certain householder built dwelling rooms in a monastery, offered beds and seats there, and provided provisions as well. The monks then put those beds and seats into the Saṅgha's general pool and distributed the provisions commonly. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not move things from where they are assigned. Whatever is definitely established in a particular place should be used by those who are definitely residing there, and the provisions too are to be regarded as theirs." When the monks did not give him a share of other provisions, the Blessed One declared: "Give both, and he may use them as he pleases. However, monks are to be assigned according to seniority."

The origin story is set in Śrāvastī.

In Śrāvastī there lived another householder, and another alms-wanderer went to him, took refuge with him, and was established in the training precepts. Later, when the alms-wanderer expounded the merits of the seven kinds of meritorious objects to be accomplished with wealth, the householder became deeply inspired and said, "I too, noble one, will perform some meritorious acts with wealth as their basis." The alms-wanderer replied, "Householder, do so." The householder said, "Noble one, what shall I do?" The alms-wanderer replied, "Build a Dharma hall for the Saṅgha." The householder said, "Noble one, I have the kārṣāpaṇas, but I lack helpers to accomplish the merit." The alms-wanderer said, "Householder, bring the kārṣāpaṇas; I will be your helper in merit." The householder gave him the kārṣāpaṇas and also appointed a building supervisor. But the supervisor stored the kārṣāpaṇas inside a storeroom and did not begin even the slightest work.

When the householder came there wondering how far the construction of his Dharma hall had progressed, he found that not even the least bit of work had been done. He asked the alms-wanderer, "Noble one, why has the work not been started?" The building supervisor replied, "The necessary materials are needed here." The householder said, "The kārṣāpaṇas I donated — why are they not being used to procure the building materials?" The supervisor replied, "Householder, how could I improperly use the possessions of the Saṅgha of the four quarters?" The householder said, "Noble one, there is no fault in doing so — please proceed." The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If the householder has given instructions, use those funds for the building materials and do not have any doubts about it."

The supervisor then applied the funds to the building materials, and the alms-wanderer, after overseeing the building work, went out for alms. The householder saw him and said, "Noble one, while you are going for alms, who is doing the building work on my Dharma hall?" The alms-wanderer replied, "Householder, since all sentient beings depend on food for their existence, would you have me work on your Dharma hall while I go hungry? Please allow me to engage in almsgiving at least." The householder said, "Noble one, in that case, please take the building funds to cover your meals." The alms-wanderer said, "Why should I eat what I have dedicated to the Saṅgha of the four quarters?" The householder said, "Noble one, there is no harm in it — please eat." The monks reported this in turn to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If the householder has given instructions, eat from those very funds without any doubt."

Then, because the alms-wanderer had eaten poor food, he fell ill. The Blessed One said, "Do not eat poor food." So he began eating good food. The Blessed One then declared: "Do not eat the finest food either; eat in the same manner as the provisions customary for other Dharma halls." When he could not obtain clarified butter, the Blessed One declared: "Obtain it in the same way that clarified butter is obtained in other Dharma halls, and have no doubts about it."

When the alms-wanderer took grain-oil for alms in order to care for the building materials, the Blessed One declared: "Purchase the grain-oil from the building funds. Other necessary materials too should be procured from those funds, and you need have no doubts about it."

This is the second verse of the sūtra of the fourth door within the origin story.

In brief, as for the sleeping mats of the monks —

Do not distribute without a cover, do not distribute for use in dyeing work or for alms-bowl maintenance work, and do not distribute sleeping mats in the middle of the night.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The group of six monks, having divided up the Saṅgha's sleeping mats, used them for dyeing work, washing and wringing out dyed cloth, and for alms-bowl maintenance work, scorching robes over fire so that the robes became soiled and ruined by the dye. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Do not use the Saṅgha's robes for dyeing work, for alms-bowl maintenance work, or moreover for any wood-splitting work. If you do so, you will incur a transgression."

The origin story is set at Śrāvastī. Again, the group of six monks, having put on the Saṅgha's robes, sat out in the rain without a cover while doing dyeing work, and the robes were ruined. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Do not sit in the rain without a cover while wearing the Saṅgha's robes. If you do so, you will incur a transgression."

The origin story is set at Śrāvastī. The group of six monks, while wandering about in the countryside, went in the middle of the night — after midnight — to another village in the hills. They arrived at a Dharma hall that was there and settled in to rest, each in whatever lodging he chose. They then said: "Venerable ones, let us rest a little while first. Then call the one who distributes sleeping mats and have the sleeping mats and lodgings distributed according to seniority." Those monks, once some of them had lain down and even as midnight turned, disturbed them and said: "Venerable ones, go and sleep wherever you like, as lodging-companions. Tomorrow at dawn the lodgings and sleeping mats will be distributed." The monks then said: "Venerable ones, would you have the Teacher's teachings destroyed while the Teacher still lives? Distribute the lodgings and sleeping mats to us according to seniority." The sleeping-mat distributor then set about distributing the lodgings and sleeping mats, but without distributing them to the junior monks, waited until dawn; the group of six slept a short while, then rose before dawn, returned the sleeping mats, and departed. When the monks asked why they had returned the sleeping mats, those monks replied: "Venerable ones, we came to pay homage at a stūpa and now we are leaving again." The others said: "Venerable ones, in that case, why did you harass the monks in the middle of the night?" They replied: "Venerable ones, we did it in order to make the teaching firm — what fault is there in that?" The monks imposed a penalty on them.

When the monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, from midnight onward, mats are not to be distributed. If someone unexpectedly arrives in the evening, let him stay in whatever lodging he finds convenient. And if he is still there at dawn, then a lodging and a sleeping mat should be assigned to him."

The origin story is set at Śrāvastī. The group of six monks, wandering about in the countryside, went to another village in the hills. They arrived at a Dharma hall that was there and were seated by the monks each in whatever lodging they chose. Then, when the sleeping mats were being distributed according to seniority, those monks forcibly sat down on the seniority seats and could not be moved from them even according to seniority. When the sleeping mats were distributed, those monks occupied the senior monks' seats together with the others at the same time, and — given to the attendants, and those who had not received sleeping mats were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is wrong to mock the newly ordained monks. Therefore, let the seniority seats and the junior sleeping mats alike be distributed according to seniority."

This is the third verse of the sūtra on the fourth gate within the origin story.

In summary:

The latrine ground, the washing ground,
The urination ground, and the foot-washing place,
The scraper vessel, the scraping tool,
And the various other such things are the same.

The awakened one, the Blessed One, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The group of six were walking about at the door of the latrine, talking and sitting, and in this way they troubled the monks. They said: "Venerable ones, wait a moment — we are senior and must proceed by seniority." Then, right there in that vicinity, they taught, recited aloud, and cooked food, so that monks who needed to go to the latrine were too embarrassed to go, and they could not relieve themselves of excrement, urine, and the like at ease. Just as they came, they were blocked from entering inside, and all of them fell ill. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, monks, do not sit at the door of the latrine talking. Do not teach in that vicinity. Do not read there. Do not recite there. Do not cook food there. If monks sit at the latrine talking, proceed according to seniority there, teach in that vicinity, recite aloud, read, or cook food, there will be a transgression with expiation."

When monks were at the washing place still engaged in washing, the group of six said "We are senior," and drove them away. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not drive away a monk from the washing place while he has not yet finished washing. If one does drive him away, there will be a transgression with expiation."

When monks went to the urination area, the group of six came there afterward and said: "We elders will proceed by seniority," and the monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, at the urination area, do not proceed by seniority. Enter in the order in which one has arrived. If monks proceed by seniority at the urination area, there will be a transgression with expiation."

When monks were sitting washing their feet, the group of six, before they had finished washing, said "We are senior," and took away the foot-washing stand, assigning it by seniority, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not take away the foot-washing stand from monks who have not yet finished washing their feet and distribute it according to seniority. If a monk takes away the foot-washing stand from a monk who has not yet finished washing his feet and distributes it by seniority, there will be a transgression with expiation."

When the group of six saw monks using the face-scraper, they said "We are senior," and before those monks had finished, took away the face-scraper and distributed it by seniority, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not take away the face-scraper from monks who have not yet finished using it and distribute it by seniority."

If a monk takes away the face-scraper from monks who have not yet finished using it and distributes it by seniority, there will be a transgression with expiation. Likewise, the same rule is to be applied in full to the basin, the razor, and the nail-cutter, and so forth.

This is the fourth verse of the fourth-gate sūtra within the body of the canonical occasion.

In summary:

The water pot and the wash-basin,
The black iron bowl and the drinking cup,
The sharpening of the razor and the cutting of nails,
The medicinal thorns and the foot-stand.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The group of six said to monks who had not yet finished the Saṅgha's dyeing work, "We are senior," took away the Saṅgha's dye pot, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not take away the Saṅgha's dye pots by seniority from monks who have not yet finished the dyeing work. If a monk takes away the Saṅgha's dye pots by seniority from monks who have not yet finished the dyeing work, there will be a transgression with expiation. As it is with the dye pot, so too it is with the wash-basin."

The group of six said to monks who had not yet finished eating, "We are senior," took away the black iron bowl, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not take away the black iron bowl by seniority from monks who have not yet finished eating. If a monk takes away the black iron bowl by seniority from monks who have not yet finished eating, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six said to monks who were eating and had drunk only half their fill of liquid, "We are senior," took away the drinking cup, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute the drinking cup by seniority to monks who are eating and have drunk only half their fill of liquid. If monks take away the drinking cup by seniority from monks who are eating and have drunk only half their fill of liquid, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six said to monks who had only half-finished shaving their hair and beard, "We are senior," took away the razor, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute the razor by seniority to monks who have only half-finished shaving their head-hair and facial hair. If monks take away the razor by seniority from monks who have only half-finished shaving their head-hair and facial hair, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six said to monks who were having their razor for shaving head-hair and facial hair sharpened and had only half-finished the sharpening, "We are senior," took away the whetstone, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute the whetstone by seniority when monks have only half-finished sharpening the razor used for shaving head-hair and facial hair. If monks take away by seniority the whetstone for a razor used for shaving head-hair and facial hair when it has only been half-sharpened, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six said to monks who had only half-finished cutting their nails, "We are senior," took away the nail-cutter, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute the nail-cutter by seniority to monks who have only half-finished cutting their nails."

If monks take away by seniority the nail-cutter from monks who have only half-finished cutting their nails, there will be a transgression with expiation.

The group of six said to monks who had only half-finished plucking their nose-hairs, "We are senior," took away the nose-hair tweezers, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute the nose-hair tweezers by seniority to monks who have only half-finished plucking their nose-hairs. If monks take away the nose-hair tweezers from monks who have only half-finished plucking their nose-hairs, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six said to monks who were lying and sitting on Saṅgha couches with legs, "We are senior," and took them away, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute by seniority the couch with legs on which a monk is lying. If monks take away the legs of a couch from monks who are lying or sitting upon a Saṅgha couch with legs, there will be a transgression with expiation."

This is the fifth verse of the sūtra of the fourth gate within the introductory narrative section.

In summary:

The permanent thread, the second,
The knife, the needle, the taking away,
And likewise other things not yet finished —
These are not to be taken away.

The buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The group of six placed robes, upper garments, and lower garments on a Saṅgha plank-board when those robes were only half laid out there, said "We are senior," and took them away, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute by seniority the Saṅgha plank-board when robes, upper garments, and lower garments have been only half laid out upon it. If monks take away by seniority the Saṅgha plank-board from monks who have only half laid out their robes, upper garments, and lower garments upon it, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six said, "We are senior," and took away the Dharma robes of monks that had been only half-sewn with Saṅgha thread, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute by seniority the Dharma robes of monks that have been only half-sewn with Saṅgha thread. If monks take away by seniority Dharma robes of monks that have been only half-sewn with Saṅgha thread, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six half-dyed the Dharma robes of monks in dye and then soaked them in the Saṅgha's dyeing solution, said "It is to be done by seniority," and took them away. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute by seniority robes of monks that have been half-dyed and then soaked in the Saṅgha's dyeing solution. If monks take away by seniority robes of monks that have been half-dyed and soaked in the Saṅgha's dyeing solution, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six said, "We are senior," and took away the Dharma robes of monks that had been only half-cut with the Saṅgha's scissors, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One,

The Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute by seniority Dharma robes of monks that have been only half-cut with the Saṅgha's scissors. If monks take away by seniority the Dharma robes of monks that have been half-cut with the Saṅgha's scissors, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six said, "We are senior," and took away the Dharma robes of monks that had been only half-sewn with the Saṅgha's needle, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute by seniority the Dharma robes of monks that have been only half-sewn with the Saṅgha's needle. If monks take away by seniority the Dharma robes of monks that have been half-sewn with the Saṅgha's needle, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six then said, "We are senior," regarding monks whose hair had been only half-shaved, and took away the cloth used by the Saṅgha for collecting hair, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not distribute by seniority the cloth for collecting hair from monks whose hair has been only half-shaved, and the Saṅgha's hair-collecting cloth. If monks take away by seniority the hair-collecting cloth of monks whose hair has been only half-shaved, there will be a transgression with expiation."

The group of six then caused monks who were seated on the Saṅgha's mats in various places, while still engaged in various tasks that were not yet finished, to be told "Yield your seat in order of seniority," and had them rise and sent them away, and those monks were mocked. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not tell monks who are seated on the Saṅgha's mats in various places, while still engaged in various tasks that are not yet finished, to yield their seats in order of seniority, causing them to rise and go. If monks tell monks who are seated on the Saṅgha's mats in various places, while their various tasks are still unfinished, to yield in order of seniority, causing them to rise and go, there will be a transgression with expiation."

This is the sixth verse of the sūtra of the fourth section within the root narrative.

In brief:

A wandering tīrthika,
one bearing a name but not giving the self at death, five to be received with trust —
a nun who is a keeper, for the sake of the allowance.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Grove of the Veṇuvana. At that time, the Blessed One had tamed the king of Kosala named Prasenajit with a sūtra teaching likened to falling silk, and when the Blessed One had at another time been dwelling there, the king of the land of Samaka, a wise and capable man named Rūpasāra, together with eighty thousand devas of the land of Samaka, along with brahmin and householder assemblies numbering a hundred thousand, had been established by the Blessed One in the truth. At that time a proclamation was made at Rājagṛha as follows: "Listen, you many people dwelling in Rājagṛha and those who have come from various lands — let no one in my realm commit theft. Whoever does so I will banish from the land. To the owners of property, I shall give recompense from my own treasury and storehouses."

And at the time when the Blessed One had tamed Prasenajit, king of the land of Kosala, with the sūtra teaching likened to falling silk, that king likewise had a proclamation made in Śrāvastī as follows: "Let no one in my realm commit theft. Whoever commits theft in my realm shall be put to death as punishment, and to the owners of the property I myself shall give recompense from my own storehouses and treasury."

At that time, the thieves who were dwelling in the land of Samaka and those dwelling in the land of Kosala went and gathered together up to the border between those two territories.

The word spread far and wide that many travelers were gathering there. Hearing this, many travelers from Samaka set out together for the land of Kosala. From Kosala as well, travelers similarly set out toward Samaka. Then, at a later time, when many travelers from Samaka set out together for the land of Kosala, and when they had crossed the border and entered Kosala, the caravan leader spoke: "It is well known that Prasenajit, king of Kosala, is fierce and wrathful toward those who defy him, and that he is brave and mighty. If we attack this large caravan, we shall yet be able to profit by it. Send those escorts back." The many travelers said, "Very well, so be it," and the escorts were sent back.

The thieves had posted a lookout and kept watch. When the lookout saw the escorts turn back, he called out, "The escorts have gone back — fall upon the caravan!" The caravan then entered a grove of sāl trees, and they fell upon it. Some of the merchants were killed, and some fled.

Those who fled, with heads covered in dust, went before King Prasenajit and said, "Sire, we were merchants. Having entered your realm, we are merchants no longer. Why? Sire, we have been set upon by thieves." King Prasenajit commanded the officer Ārya-Janman: "Young man, go swiftly in pursuit, seize the thieves together with the goods, and return." The officer replied, "Sire, so be it," and having received this command from Prasenajit, king of Kosala, he swiftly set out in pursuit with the fourfold army — troops of war elephants, troops of cavalry, troops of chariots, and troops of infantry — all armored, heading for the sāl grove. By that time the thieves were within the grove, deep among the dense sāl trees, at their ease, dividing up the goods and taking their rest. Ārya-Janman fell upon them from above. Some of the thieves were killed, some fled, and some were captured alive. Having won the battle against the thieves, he took the thieves and the plundered goods and went before the king, prostrated at his feet, and said, "Sire, these are the goods of the thieves." The king then commanded the merchants, "Come, identify your own goods and take them back."

Now among those captured were also wandering tīrthikas (non-Buddhist ascetics), and monks as well. The king returned all of the plundered goods to everyone, but a wandering tīrthika had hidden some within his own robe bundle, and some belonging to the monks he took as well. The monks, not knowing that goods had been concealed within their own robe bundles, went about together with those who were wandering thieves, and a dispute broke out. The many wandering tīrthikas seized those goods and went before the king, saying, "Sire, goods hidden within our robe bundles were taken by those wandering tīrthikas and they will not return them." The king summoned those wandering tīrthikas and commanded, "Why did you take the robes of these noble ones? Return them at once." They replied, "Sire, these things concealed within the bundle are our own robes." The king said to the monks, "Noble ones, identify what belongs to you and take it." The monks drew the items out one by one and examined them.

Some of the monks recognized their items and said, "Sire, these are our robes." The king then said to the wandering tīrthikas, "Shame on you, wandering tīrthikas! If you are thieves who steal by stealth, then you are great thieves indeed." Having no reply, they stood there in silence. The king then said, "Noble ones, from this day forward it would be fitting to mark your Dharma robes with a distinguishing sign." When the monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "Monks, what the king said is right. Therefore, obtain a distinguishing mark for the Dharma robes. Stitch a border or patch-seam around them, and attach a corner tab as well." When the Blessed One said "obtain a distinguishing mark," the monks did not know how to do so. The Blessed One then declared, "Apply dots of ink along the edges of the Dharma robes."

The background story takes place in Śrāvastī. In Śrāvastī, a certain householder took a wife from a family of equal rank and enjoyed himself with her in pleasure and sport. From that pleasurable union, after some time the wife became with child, and when eight or nine months had passed, she gave birth to a boy. For a period of seven days, fourteen days, or twenty-one days after the birth, a great birth-celebration was held. The child was given a name in keeping with his family lineage, and he was nurtured and raised until he grew up. Then after some time the boy's mother passed away. The householder took another wife and enjoyed himself with her in pleasure and sport. From that union, in time three sons were born, and they too were given names in keeping with their family lineage.

Now within this family a great quarrel broke out between the elder and younger children. The older son, whose mother had died, was persistently harassed, and feeling unremembered and disheartened, he went to another region, where he went forth into the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya.

Then after some time the householder fell ill, and though he was treated with medicines made of roots, stems, leaves, flowers, and fruits, his illness was not alleviated. Knowing that, tormented by the suffering of sickness, he would soon pass away, the householder gathered his household members together. In their assembly he said to his sons, "Children, your elder brother has gone forth into the community of the renunciant sons of the Śākyas. You must give him his share of the inheritance." After saying this, he recited:

All that is gathered will be exhausted.

All that is high will fall.

All that is assembled will disperse.

The end of all phenomena is peace.

He had come to accord with the nature of time.

Now the younger son who was away enjoying himself in the countryside heard that his father had passed away. He thought to himself, "I shall go and console my stepmother and younger brothers in their grief, and then go to hear the Dharma." So, after enjoying himself for as long as he pleased, he traveled on, making his way through the countryside toward where Śrāvastī was located. Traveling gradually along the road, he arrived at Śrāvastī and, resting from the weariness of the journey, came to his own home. When those within the household saw him, they wept, and the sound of their weeping was heard by the neighbors, who gathered together. Some of them cried aloud, while others sat with their eyes filled with tears. Ordinary people, bound by attachment and now separated from a kinsman, had their eyes filled with tears of grief. He too sat there carried away by weeping.

Then an elderly woman said, "Child, your father gave his share of the inheritance — we all heard him. Do not weep. If there is birth, there will be death." Hearing this, the young man sat quietly for a short while in reflection. He then taught the Dharma to his stepmother and his younger brothers. When their grief had somewhat subsided,

They said to him, "Receive your share of the inheritance." He reflected: "The Blessed One has said that after he passes away he will not give anything — how then should I accept it?" He thought further: "Venerable ones, for one who has gone forth, there is no use for material wealth. Furthermore, the Blessed One has declared that after he passes away he will give nothing. You yourselves take it." At this, they acknowledged their fault, saying: "Give a gift to the noble one who has gone forth. Accumulate merit too. What fault is there in that?" When the monks were informed of what had occurred, they reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, laypeople have hopes of inheritance, whereas those who have gone forth do not. Therefore, what a layperson wishes to give after death is the business of the householder — it is firmly established as such. For one who has gone forth, there is nothing of that kind. Therefore let the layperson's bequest be received by the laity in that spirit, for the sake of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha. Let there be no doubt about this."

The occasion arose in Śrāvastī. Monks were going out on walks and wandering in the walkway, the courtyard, and the gatehouse, and they left behind heavy stone-rollers, tooth-cleaning sticks, bathing implements, and cattle dung. The monks developed doubt and did not make use of them. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "You may make use of five kinds of trustworthy items: what belongs to a friend, what is mixed together, what belongs to a teacher, what is unchanging, and what would cause joy upon hearing. You may make use of those five kinds of trustworthy items. Have no doubt about this."

The occasion arose in Śrāvastī. In Śrāvastī there was a certain householder who took a wife of equal clan and enjoyed himself fully together with her. In the course of his enjoyment, after some time the wife became with child, and when eight or nine months had passed she gave birth to a daughter. Within seven days — and within the twenty-one days after birth — he held a great birth-celebration for her, gave her a name befitting her lineage, raised and nurtured her, and when she had grown, another householder proposed for her, she was given in marriage, and she was sent off. Some time later the householder died, and she, tormented by grief over the loss of her husband, went forth into the well-proclaimed Dharma and Vinaya. Then, some time later, when a famine arose and she was out wandering for alms, her father encountered her on a street while she was making her alms round. He said to her: "Daughter, where are you living and how are you getting by?" She replied: "Father, a famine has come and I am very hungry." He said: "Daughter, if you have not yet fully gone forth, then even against my wishes I would give to you whatever you want. Now, rather than going on alms round, come eat meals at my house and go to the winter quarters." She agreed, and in the company of one or two companions she ate there and went to the winter quarters. When several days had passed and she had been eating there, he said: "I cannot feed the two monastic alms-goers; you alone should eat here and stay." She replied: "Father, the Blessed One has not permitted me to go into the town alone." He said nothing more to that. When the nuns were informed of what had occurred, they told the monks, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "In such a case as this, I permit the nun to approach the nuns' Saṅgha together with a companion, and —"

— and request the vow of associating together with a companion. The request is to be made as follows. The gong is struck while the seats are being laid out, and when the nuns' Saṅgha has assembled and is seated, one pays homage in order of seniority. Then, in front of the senior members, one sits on a mat or a clean seat with palms joined and speaks these words:

"Hearken, venerable members of the Saṅgha of nuns. I, who am called such-and-such, having come upon a time of famine such that I am unable even to go on alms-rounds, request of the venerable Saṅgha of nuns that I, called such-and-such, be granted by the venerable Saṅgha of nuns the vow of associating together with a companion. May the venerable Saṅgha of nuns grant me, called such-and-such, the vow of associating together with a companion — out of compassion, for the sake of compassion."

This is to be repeated a second and a third time.

After that, a single nun is to make the formal motion and perform the act. She speaks thus:

"Hearken, venerable members of the Saṅgha of nuns. This nun called such-and-such has come upon a time of famine and requests of the venerable Saṅgha of nuns the vow of associating together with a companion. If the time is right and the venerable Saṅgha of nuns consents, let the venerable Saṅgha of nuns remain silent. Let those who do not consent speak."

This is the motion. The formal act is likewise performed:

"Hearken, venerable members of the Saṅgha of nuns. This nun called such-and-such has come upon a time of famine and requests of the venerable Saṅgha of nuns the vow of associating together with a companion. Those among the venerable ones for whom it is acceptable to grant the nun called such-and-such, who has come upon a time of famine, the vow of associating together with a companion — let them remain silent. Those for whom it is not acceptable — let them speak. The venerable Saṅgha of nuns has granted the nun called such-and-such the vow of associating together with a companion, and so it is upheld."

When the vow of associating together with a companion has been granted to a nun by the Saṅgha of nuns, she may go alone to eat food at a companion's household — let her have no scruple about that. It is permitted only during a time of famine; outside that time she should not remain thus. If she continues in this way when no famine has arisen, it becomes an offence together with expiation.

This is the seventh verse of the fourth-door sūtra within the opening narrative.

In summary:

Of borrowing there are two types;
of cloth, again, there are three kinds;
of purchasing, there is what is desired;
and all are subsumed in the compendium.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

A certain monk had borrowed a kārṣāpaṇa coin from a householder, and then at some point in time he passed away from one cause or another. That householder heard how that monk had passed away. Having heard this, he went to the monastery and, knowing the situation, asked the monks: "Where is the monk called such-and-such, the noble one?" They replied: "Good sir, he has passed away." "That noble one borrowed a kārṣāpaṇa of mine and I am seeking it. Good sir, take him to the charnel ground — go there and retrieve it. If you distribute his bowl and his robes, I will go to the charnel ground and lay claim to it."

"Give it to him," they said. The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, that householder has spoken rightly. Whatever of his wealth the monk borrowed, the monks shall give it back." Not knowing from where they should give it, the Blessed One declared: "Give it from his bowl and robes." The monks gave the bowl and robes, but the householder did not want them. The Blessed One then declared: "Sell them and give him the proceeds." The monks gave all of it. The Blessed One declared: "Give the amount that was borrowed, and distribute the remainder."

At Śrāvastī, another monk borrowed a kārṣāpaṇa coin from a householder, and at some point in time he passed away from one cause or another. Those monks sold the bowl and robes as before and gave the householder what was owed. The householder said: "That noble one owed me only so much — do not give me anything more than that, but do give the rest as well." When the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Tell him that there are no more bowl and robes of that monk's to give. If he does not believe it, make him understand. If he still cannot be made to understand even after explanation, do not render him any service from the Saṅgha's resources or from any other individual's. Have men of good family explain the matter to him and let him go."

The occasion at Śrāvastī was this: a monk had taken a piece of cloth from a cloth merchant without paying the price. That monk then passed away, and when the cloth merchant heard that the monk had died, he came to the monastery. Knowing the situation, he asked the monks: "Where is the monk who goes by the name of such-and-such, the noble one?" They replied: "Good sir, he has passed away." "That noble one took a piece of cloth from me and carried it off, saying he would pay the price. Good sir, take him to the charnel ground and go retrieve it there. If you are distributing that noble one's robes and bowl among yourselves, why should I go all the way to the charnel ground to claim it? You give it to me." The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, what this cloth merchant says is true — give it to him." The monks gave him the very piece of cloth, and he said: "Noble ones, that monk owed me such-and-such a price for it." The Blessed One then declared: "Sell that cloth and give him the proceeds." The monks began to sell it but did not obtain its original price. The Blessed One declared: "For the remainder, sell the robes and bowl and give him that."

The occasion at Śrāvastī was this: a monk had given thread and a fee to a weaver in order to have a piece of cloth woven, and that monk then passed away. The monks summoned the weaver and said: "Good sir, the monk called such-and-such gave you thread and a fee to weave a piece of cloth — please return them." The weaver replied: "Noble ones, I have already woven the cloth for him — the thread and the fee are not available to return." The monks did not know what to do, and they reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared to the monks: "What the weaver says is true — receive the cloth."

The monks summoned a fine-cloth seller, and that person said to the noble ones: "I have given him a coarser piece in exchange." The Blessed One declared: "Since that monk has passed away, receive what was given accordingly."

The occasion for the next ruling was also at Śrāvastī. A monk gave a cloth merchant a kārṣāpaṇa and said: "Please give me a piece of cloth." That monk then passed away. The monks summoned the cloth merchant and said: "Good sir, a monk by the name of such-and-such gave you the price of a piece of cloth — please return it." The merchant replied: "Noble ones, I gave him cloth in exchange." The monks did not know what to do. They reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared to the monks: "What that cloth merchant says is true — receive the cloth."

The monks then summoned a fine-cloth seller, and that person said to the noble ones: "I gave him a coarser piece in place of it." The Blessed One declared: "Since that monk has passed away, receive what was given accordingly."

The Noble Vinaya, the thirty-seventh fascicle.

The occasion for the next ruling was at Śrāvastī. The group of six monks became well known among worldly people, and whenever anyone was buying or selling something, those people would go to them and ask: "Noble one, what is this thing worth?" Now at Śrāvastī there were two householders — one who bought cloth and one who sold it. While the two of them were talking and haggling over a price, the venerable Nandaka happened to come to that spot. Both of them urged the noble Nandaka to arbitrate. One of them said: "Yes, let him arbitrate." So the two of them asked the venerable Nandaka: "Noble one, what is the price of this cloth?" He pulled each one aside separately: first he asked the buyer privately, "Good sir, are you buying or selling?" The man replied: "I am buying." Nandaka said to him: "This is worth twenty kārṣāpaṇas." Then he drew the other aside and asked him privately: "Good sir, are you buying or selling?" That man replied: "Noble one, I am selling." Nandaka told him: "This is worth forty kārṣāpaṇas." Having deceived them both separately, he then said to them together in front of both: "Do between yourselves as seems best to you." At this, the seller said: "This is worth forty kārṣāpaṇas," while the buyer said: "Out of faith and trust in him, I say it is worth twenty kārṣāpaṇas." The seller replied: "Who is this person you placed your faith and trust in? It is the noble Nandaka. He deliberately cheated the two of us — he told me it was worth forty kārṣāpaṇas." The buyer answered: "He deliberately deceived us both as well — in short, he has behaved in a manner befitting a scoundrel. From now on, even if I have need of something, I will not ask him." The monks heard what had happened, reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, those two householders spoke rightly in rebuking him. Therefore, monks, do not appraise the price of any goods whatsoever, and do not sit in the presence of laypeople who are in dispute. Any monk who appraises the price of goods or sits in the presence of laypeople in dispute shall incur a transgression." Since the Blessed One had declared that monks must not appraise the price of any goods whatsoever, a monk who wished to buy a monastic robe went to the market at the time of trading, and — there he walked alongside a householder, haggling over a single kārṣāpaṇa, or one paṇa, or four paṇas, or a quarter of a paṇa, or an eighth of a quarter. The householder grew angry and said: "Noble ones, we ourselves are merchants — and yet you are the greater hagglers by far!" When the monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Monks, those people were right to say what they said. Therefore, monks, do not make purchases yourselves." When the Blessed One had said that monks must not make purchases themselves, the monks did not know how they were to make a purchase. The Blessed One then declared: "Seek out a male lay practitioner residing at the monastery. If the lay practitioner residing there has no faith, or if one truly wishes to make a purchase, speak the determined word two or three times, but do not negotiate by way of kārṣāpaṇas and the like." Whether the monk wishes to buy or does not wish to buy, if he goes beyond speaking the determined word two or three times by negotiating in terms of kārṣāpaṇas and the like, he shall incur a transgression. There is no fault, however, in negotiating a price for the sake of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha.

This is the eighth verse of the sūtra of the fourth section of the introductory narrative.

In brief:

One must not make a living by trade as one's root livelihood.

The four kinds are not to be divided.

What is to be guarded should be guarded, and done in abundance.

It brings forth a great deal of clamor.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing at Rājagṛha in the bamboo grove, the Kalandaka garden. At that time, King Bimbisāra offered the community of monks a pleasure grove furnished with a thousand fruit trees. The monks ate the fruit and carelessly threw the seeds about, and the grove became like a thicket of arrows. Later, at some point, the king passed by that way and saw what had happened. He asked his ministers whose pleasure grove it was that had become like a thicket of arrows. A minister replied: "Sire, this very grove, furnished with a thousand fruit trees, was the one offered by Your Majesty to the noble ones. They ate the fruit and cast the seeds about carelessly, and so it has now become like a thicket of arrows." The king said: "Do these noble ones not perform tasks and duties here?" The minister replied: "Sire, they are engaged in meditation and recitation, and so they do not perform tasks or duties here." The king said nothing further.

When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, do not neglect duties in the grove that is your source of livelihood — attend to the work." The monks did not know who was to do the work. The Blessed One declared: "Let those who are resident there do it." But those monks were old, and so they were unable to do the work. The Blessed One declared: "Let the entire Saṅgha do the work." Some among them were bent with age; others were unable to work because of illness. The group of six, being unsuitable for such work, did not do it. The Blessed One then declared: "Divide the assembly into portions, and in groups, taking turns, do the work." The monks occupied themselves with receiving scriptural transmission, reading, recitation, and proper mental contemplation, and they entered into that group. The Blessed One declared: "One must not be limited to that alone. Some should eat the tooth-cleaning twigs. Some should wash their faces. Some should wash their feet."

Those monks did the work accordingly, and the fruit ripened and became ready to harvest. Now at some point a group of monks arrived unexpectedly. Seeing the ripened fruit, they said to the venerable ones, "May we also eat ripe mango fruit? Are we permitted?" The monks replied, "These have already been portioned out among us — how could there be any left?" Those new arrivals became disgruntled. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Give some to those who have arrived unexpectedly as well." After the monks had given from what remained after the portioning, the Blessed One declared: "There are four categories that monks must not apportion among themselves. What are the four? They are as follows: whatever belongs to the Saṅgha of all four directions, whatever belongs to all stūpas, whatever is appropriate for all the sick, and all food with monetary value. Therefore, monks may make use of roots, fruit, flowers, and the like — just as individual persons use them for their own purposes — provided that those things fall within their direct purview. As for the flowers and fruit: take care of the trees, and distribute those flowers and fruit to the Saṅgha." The Blessed One said, "Since it falls within their direct purview, each should tend to his own tree, and the flowers and fruit should be distributed to the Saṅgha."

The monks tended the trees accordingly. As the flowers and fruit ripened, the monks abandoned their posts, and thieves carried the flowers and fruit away.

The Blessed One then declared: "Post guards." The monks posted only a small number, and that itself became the object of a fault. The Blessed One declared: "Let half of those in the retinue eat first, in rotation." The Blessed One then declared: "Distribute the ripe fruit on the trees to the Saṅgha." But when the fruit ripened, insects had eaten it. The Blessed One declared: "Let those who are resident in the monastery inspect them individually." When those who were inspecting did so, they made a great commotion, and though the monks tried to dissuade them, those inspectors could not be stopped. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "The inspection should be carried out in noble silence — do not make a clamor. If one speaks, there will be an offence."

This is the ninth verse-summary of the fourth narrative episode of the sūtra.

In brief: making fit for use, and a novice's father, one who has been blessed by me,
one who receives and accepts, or one who has been instructed accordingly,
bounded and empty,
and a stove — these are complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling in the bamboo grove called Veṇuvana in Rājagṛha, at the place of the Kalandakas.

The Blessed One had declared: "Distribute the ripe fruit on the trees." The monks did not know who was to distribute it. The Blessed One declared: "Let the one who makes things fit for use distribute it. If there is no one to make things fit for use, let the father-novice do it. If there is no father-novice, let the monk himself wash his hands, receive the offering, make it individually fit, and then distribute it." The Blessed One declared, "Let the monk wash his own hands, receive the offering, make it individually fit, and then distribute it." When a single branch was laden with much fruit and could not be borne, the Blessed One declared: "A layman may also assist, and the two together shall distribute it. Whatever the layman has distributed, that is to be received."

Whatever has been made fit for use by a monk need not be received again. If there were some other mangoes known as sweet, these were mixed together and made fit for use one by one, and all had been received. The Blessed One then declared, "Make those fit for use separately." When the Blessed One declared that the mangoes known as sweet were to be made fit for use separately, the group of six went to the pleasure garden and took those mangoes known as sweet themselves, then came to the monastery, received them, and ate them. The monks said, "Venerable ones, if those sweet mangoes were not made fit for use, why have they been consumed?" The attendants replied, "How could they have been made fit for use? The group of six took them, went to the monastery, received them, and ate them." The monks were displeased. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One reflected: if a monk receives something later that he had already taken up earlier, he becomes an object of blame. Therefore a monk should not receive later what he has already taken up earlier. Knowing this, the Blessed One declared, "Monks, the group of six has acted improperly. Therefore, monks, do not receive later what you have already taken up earlier. If one receives later what was already taken up earlier, it becomes an offense."

The origin story is from Śrāvastī. The monks, by pointing with a finger at flowers, fruits, prepared foods, and other foods and drinks that had been made fit for use, said, "Give this," and "Give these." When all of it had been eaten up and the making-fit-for-use had not been equalized, some monks who had not yet parted from attachment were displeased. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Monks, being displeased is pointless. Therefore a monk shall not eat while pointing with a finger and saying, 'Give this,' and 'Give these.' If a monk eats while pointing with a finger and saying, 'Give this,' and 'Give these,' it becomes an offense." As for drinks, those lacking warmth are sought when one desires something ripened, while those with great warmth are sought when one desires something unripened.

The origin story is from Śrāvastī. When the group of six were going about on their tour of the region, they arrived at the monastery of another village in the rocky hills, and the monks of that monastery had gone out for their daytime activity, leaving the monastery empty. The members of the group of six said among themselves happily and joyfully, "This monastery is empty and has no boundary established. If we were to stay here, how should we reside? Let us establish a boundary and then come back." They said, "Very well, let it be done just so." And immediately after they had established the boundary, the monks who had previously been residing there arrived. The group of six said to them, "Rest here." Those monks replied, "Venerable ones, you have only just arrived unexpectedly. We have been residing here from before, so it is fitting that we should say to you, 'Please rest.'" The group of six said, "Venerable ones, we too have established a boundary here." Those monks replied, "We too established a boundary here earlier." And so those monks became uncertain, wondering whether the earlier boundary or the later one should prevail. The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared:

Monks who arrive unexpectedly at a monastery, even if they see it empty upon entering, must not establish a boundary. They should rest from the journey, and only after making careful inquiry, if no one was residing there before, may they then establish a boundary for the first time. Otherwise, they may not establish one.

The basis for the next rule arose in Śrāvastī. At the gate of the Jeta Grove, a quarrel broke out between two laymen. One of the monks who had assembled there took sides with one of them, and acting on his behalf, brought a lawsuit against the other before the king's court. When the other party was condemned and fined, the second layman then abused him. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is improper for a layman to abuse another. Therefore, monks must not sit near people who are quarreling, and must not take sides in lawsuits — leave and go elsewhere. If a monk sits near those who are quarreling and takes sides in a lawsuit, he incurs a transgression."

This concludes the tenth set of verses of the fourth group of rules in the sūtra.

The fourth group of rules is complete.

Now the summary verse. Statues of bodhisattvas, going on circuit, vessels for offerings, assemblies and platforms, and the great drum and wheel — these are last.

In brief, what the great sage declared as permitted: images of bodhisattvas, platforms, victory banners, pennants, and iron pillars.

The basis for the next rule arose in Śrāvastī. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada (Anāthapiṇḍika) made a request to the Blessed One: "If the Blessed One will permit it, I should like to make an image of the Blessed One as a bodhisattva." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may make it." Then the householder said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to surround the bodhisattva image with victory banners." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may surround it." Then the householder said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to surround the image with a platform."

The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may surround it with a platform." Then the householder said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to surround the image with an iron railing." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may surround it." Then the householder said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to place pennants atop the iron railing." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may hang them."

This is the first set of verses of the fifth group of rules in the sūtra.

Now the summary verse. A bodhisattva image taken on circuit, likewise adorned with ornaments and anointing substances, with a palanquin and a chariot, a pennant, a parasol, a victory banner, and ear-ornaments.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍika. The householder Anāthapiṇḍika made a request to the Blessed One: "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to take a bodhisattva image on circuit through the town." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may take it on circuit." Since the bodhisattva image had no ornaments and was not beautiful, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika then said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to offer ornaments to the bodhisattva image." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may offer them — offer ankle ornaments, ear ornaments, and the like as well." Then the householder said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to adorn the bodhisattva image with perfumed ornaments." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may adorn it."

The bodhisattva image was carried on foot through the town,

The householder Anāthapiṇḍika then said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to carry the bodhisattva image from the side road into the city." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may — carry it." But when it was carried along the side road, it did not look beautiful. So the householder Anāthapiṇḍika said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to carry the bodhisattva image on a chariot." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may — do so." But the chariot, having neither banners nor a parasol, did not look beautiful. So the householder Anāthapiṇḍika said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to adorn the top of the chariot with banners, a parasol, victory standards, and the like." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may — adorn it." But when the bodhisattva image's ear ornament above the head was adorned with flowers, it did not look beautiful. So the householder Anāthapiṇḍika said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to offer a flower garland ornament for the ear ornament above the head of the bodhisattva image." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may — offer it."

This is the second verse of the fifth section of the sūtra dealing with the narrative occasion.

In brief:

Offerings given and offerings made,
likewise the garland-vessels, and the musical instruments as well — none of these shall be stopped, and none of the assembled ornaments shall be removed.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing in the Jeta Grove of Anāthapiṇḍika's park at Śrāvastī. The householder Anāthapiṇḍika then said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to offer a gift at the feet of the bodhisattva image." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may — offer it."

At the time of that festival offering, monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen from various regions, and also the great majority who had come wishing to view it, made many offerings to the image. The monks who were carrying it did not know into whose care the offerings received should be entrusted. The Blessed One then declared, "Monks shall take charge of it." But the elder monks were displeased at having to carry it. The Blessed One declared, "Those who arrange the lodgings — and also both the junior and senior monks — shall take charge of it. As for the elder monks, the elders themselves shall guard it."

Offerings given — flowers, garments, and the like — were placed on top of the chariot, and some things that had fallen were taken without having been given. People then carried it away in the folds of their robes. The householder Anāthapiṇḍika then said, "If the Blessed One permits it, I should like to place garland-vessels on top of the chariot." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, you may — do so."

The monks did not stop the music, and without dispersing the crowd they concealed the material ornaments. Brahmin and householder devotees then said of the noble ones, "They have the same faith as we do, and yet some have no faith at all — how wrong it is of you to stop the music, to disperse the many people, and to remove the material ornaments!" When things had reached this point, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Monks, to rebuke the brahmins and householders is inappropriate. Therefore the monks shall not stop the music, shall not disperse the crowd, and shall not remove the material ornaments."

If one observes them, one incurs a transgression along with the corresponding offence. This concludes the third set of verses of the sūtra of the fifth ground of the narrative basis.

In brief:

The great assembly, and the festival, the warming of the face in the last month of spring, and those performed every five or six years — these culminate in the great offering feast.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove of Anāthapiṇḍada in Śrāvastī. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada saw monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen who had come from various districts, and joy arose in him, and he thought: "The Blessed One has declared that timely giving is of five kinds. What are these five? Giving to those who have arrived unexpectedly — this is the first occasion of giving. Giving to the sick and to those who care for the sick — this is the second occasion of giving. Giving when the harvest has failed and there is poverty and distress — this is the third occasion of giving. When new grain and new fruit have come in, first offering them to one who is endowed with moral discipline and endowed with virtue, and only thereafter eating oneself — this is the fourth occasion of giving. When the wind rises, or the region is overcast, or rain falls, or there is cold, and by reason of wind, overcast sky, rain, or cold, cooked rice, gruel, porridge, drink, or the like is brought out and offered to the Saṅgha, thinking: 'If the noble ones eat this, their bodies will not be chilled, their Dharma-robles will not be wetted by the rain, and they will dwell in comfort and ease' — this giving is the fifth occasion of giving.

"Since it is so, if the Blessed One permits me, I will prepare a gathered meal for the monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen and others who are weary from the road and dwelling in various districts."

He then went to where the Blessed One was, approached him, prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One, and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, he addressed the Blessed One thus: "Venerable Blessed One, giving to those who have arrived unexpectedly from various districts is called the first occasion of giving — and so on through to the fifth occasion, the giving in due season, which enables them to dwell in comfort and ease, as described before. These five occasions of giving in due season have been taught. Now, here, at this great offering for the bodhisattva, monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen and others who have come unexpectedly from various districts and are thoroughly worn out by the journey — if the Blessed One permits, I will prepare a gathered meal for that assembly."

The Blessed One replied: "Householder, you have permission — make the preparations."

The householder Anāthapiṇḍada then asked the Blessed One: "Venerable Blessed One, in which month was the Blessed One born?" The Blessed One replied: "Householder, in the last month of spring." "Then, if the Blessed One permits, I will prepare a warming of the face at the Blessed One's palace." The Blessed One replied: "Householder, you have permission — make the preparations."

He then asked again: "Venerable Blessed One, after how many years should the head be shaved?" The Blessed One replied: "Householder, after five years have passed." "Then, if the Blessed One permits, I will prepare a great feast for the Blessed One once every five years."

The Blessed One replied: "Householder, you have permission — make the preparations."

He then asked again: "Venerable Blessed One, after how many years is the topknot left in place?" The Blessed One replied: "Householder, after six years." "Then, if the Blessed One permits, I will prepare a feast for the topknot ceremony." The Blessed One replied: "Householder, you have permission — make the preparations."

He then asked: "In which month did the Blessed One attain the supreme wisdom face to face?" The Blessed One replied: "Householder, in the last month of spring." "Then, if the Blessed One permits, I will prepare a great feast in honour of the Blessed One, who dwells in the shadow of the rose-apple tree of Jambudvīpa." The Blessed One replied: "Householder, you have permission — make the preparations."

This is the fourth verse of the sūtra of the fifth section of the nidāna.

In brief:

The grass-mat, and the doubt,
sitting at different times,

the commotion and the roads,
the wooden plank, the conch, and the beating of the drum.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One instructed that a communal meal be prepared. When many monks had no seat, the Blessed One declared: "Arrange grass-mats and sit there to eat." When the Blessed One had said that they were to sit on grass-mats, the monks, having eaten, became uncertain and carried off the grass-mats and departed. The Blessed One declared: "Do not carry the mats away and leave; instead, gather them into bundles and stack them there, and when the feast is fully concluded, everyone take them at that time."

Because the monks sat at various times, both early and late, for the feast, some finished eating and left while others had not yet arrived, and confusion arose. The Blessed One declared: "Sit in proper order."

When many monks gathered and fell into commotion, not knowing what the time was, the Blessed One declared: "Let the time be announced." They announced it then and there: "The time has come, the time has come." When they announced "the time has come," the Blessed One declared: "Strike the wooden plank." Yet even so, it was not clear to those in other places. The Blessed One then said: "First strike the small wooden plank, and afterwards strike the large wooden plank." Still, those who were dwelling in other quarters during the day did not hear it. The Blessed One then declared: "Press the conch to the mouth and blow it, and also beat the drum."

This is the fifth verse of the sūtra of the fifth section of the nidāna.

In brief:

Then the drum too shall be beaten.
After that, sending out a vehicle, the arrival of goods and provisions — these shall be announced in proper fashion.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. When the Blessed One gave the instruction to strike the wooden plank, press the conch, and beat the drum, they struck them one after another in immediate succession, and this caused harm to those who were sick and to those engaged in work. The Blessed One then declared: "When the sick have finished taking their food and those doing work have also finished eating, at that point strike the wooden plank, press the conch, and beat the drum."

Even when the feast was concluded, certain monks, nuns, male lay practitioners, female lay practitioners, and others dwelling in their own quarters had not yet departed. The Blessed One declared: "Send out a vehicle, and once that has gone, everyone depart on their own."

At that time of the feast, the monks did not know how to divide what had been obtained. The Blessed One declared: "Distribute it equally in order of seniority."

When a large gathering of monks made an uproar, the Blessed One declared: "Divide it in groups of ten as one, then in groups of a hundred as one, and after that divide the gains in groups of a thousand as one."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Blessed One, if within a group of ten one person passes away before the time of distribution, who has rights over the belongings of the deceased?"

The Blessed One declared: "Upāli, if someone dies before the time of distribution, the belongings of the deceased pass by right to the assembled Saṅgha as a whole. However, if one has already distributed and someone then passes away after the time of distribution, the remaining nine receive that person's share. The same principle is to be applied likewise to the groups of eight, of a thousand, and so on."

This is the sixth verse of the sūtra of the fifth section of the case-narratives. The fifth section of the case-narratives is complete. The case-narratives are complete.

A summary of the section on individual matters: first there is salutation; second, the vessels are undetermined; third, there are also the requisites — these are designated as individual. In brief summary: salutation and the strainer, likewise placing down, lying down, and the dog; likewise the drinking bowl and sugarcane; likewise butter, roots, and tree-trunks — these are said to be gathered together in the sūtras.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time two monks who had been speaking harsh and contentious words fell into a quarrel, each speaking harshly to the other, until the younger one rebuked the elder. The elder then withdrew to his dwelling and remained there. The younger monk thought to himself: "I have rebuked the elder; I should go and ask his forgiveness." He went to the elder's dwelling, touched his feet with both hands, and said: "Venerable one, please forgive me for having rebuked you." But the elder, greatly angered, struck and harmed him, saying: "You have done me harm."

When the other monks heard this they ran up and asked the venerable one why he was crying out. He said: "Venerable ones, look — such-and-such a one came to my dwelling and is harming me." They said to him: "Venerable one, why did you strike that elder monk?" And he explained what had happened, whereupon they said nothing and sat in silence.

He then reflected on this, and so the Blessed One had declared that one should pay homage, saying: "That my śrāvakas may accomplish their own aims with a mind of loving-kindness, a mind of beneficence, and a mind of affection." With this in mind, he had thought: "When I see this one and feel displeasure and anger, I shall forgive him and depart in whatever manner is fitting." But after he had gone, if later he does not even pay homage to the other person, how much less would he offer forgiveness.

Then at a later time the elder monk was walking and conversing alongside another monk. That monk, coming from the direction where monks were paying homage, arrived there. The monk who was the elder's walking companion said to him: "Why did you not forgive a monk of such virtue, a monk endowed with moral discipline?" The elder replied: "This one has a wicked and wrathful mind — look here, even now he pays homage to you but does not pay homage to me." Just then that monk did pay homage, and the elder said: "Venerable one, do you see that wicked-minded being?" The monk replied: "Venerable one, I do see him."

Then that monk said to him: "Venerable one, if I were to hear elsewhere what I have heard here — that you are one who feels shame and remorse, one devoted to the training — and were to see it confirmed elsewhere, and someone were to say, 'Why are you not like that?' — what then?" The other replied: "Venerable one, what am I to do?" The first then said: "Why do you not forgive a monk such as this, a monk who is fully endowed with moral discipline?" The elder then recounted at length everything that had happened. The monks mocked that elder, and the matter was reported by the monks to the Blessed One. The Blessed One then declared: "Monks, the monk who mocked him should, by all means, ask forgiveness of the one who holds the grudge." When the Blessed One had said that the one who holds the grudge should be asked for forgiveness, a certain monk tried to ask forgiveness but was refused. The Blessed One then declared: "The one who will not forgive should go to the cell of the one who will not be approached, and bow down. That monk need only say 'Be well,' or else simply bow down. If neither is done, a transgression will accrue to both." The Blessed One having said that one should seek forgiveness from a monk who holds a grudge, two monks then fell into a quarrel arising from sharp and unpleasant words, and from that into mutual fault-finding, fighting, and disputing. Of the two, the younger monk addressed the elder monk with harsh and offensive words, then, growing utterly enraged, went into his dwelling, shut the door, and sat there brooding on those very abusive words he had spoken. Yet throughout all of this there was nothing that the blessed Buddha did not know, did not see, did not comprehend, or did not cognize fully. For the blessed buddhas, by the very nature of reality, are possessed of great compassion, and have entered upon the task of benefiting the world; they are guardians, solitary and courageous; they abide alone in calm abiding and insight; they are skilled in the three aspects of those who are to be tamed; they have crossed the four rivers; they stand utterly firm on the base of the four legs of miraculous power; they are fearless, made free from fear by the four fearlessnesses; they have utterly abandoned the five limbs; they have passed completely beyond the five destinies; they are endowed with the six limbs; they have fully completed the six perfections; they ever abide in the six; they are adorned with the flowers of the seven limbs of awakening; they teach the noble eightfold path; they are skilled in the nine successive abiding meditative absorptions; they are endowed with the power of the ten powers; they are renowned in the ten directions; they are supreme in holding sway over the thousand hundreds. They observe who is declining, who is advancing, who has fallen into suffering, who is afflicted, who is being harmed, who has fallen into suffering and affliction and harm, who is inclining toward the lower realms, who is falling into the lower realms, who is heading straight to the lower realms — and they resolve: "Those whom I shall draw out of the lower realms I shall place individually upon the fruit of liberation in the higher realms. Those who have not yet generated roots of virtue, I shall cause them to generate them. Those who have generated them, I shall bring them to full maturation. Those who have fully matured, I shall bring them to complete liberation." Three times by day and three times by night, the Buddha surveys the world with his buddha-eye and enters into the illumination of gnosis.

It has also been said:

Even the ocean that is home to sea monsters may in time be crossed and passed beyond, but for the children who are to be tamed, a buddha will never fail to come at the right moment.

Then the Blessed One, in another place, produced a smile. By the very nature of reality, whenever the blessed buddhas produce a smile, rays of light — blue, yellow, red, white, and so forth — issue from their mouths. Some of these rays descend downward, and some ascend upward. Those that descend downward pass through the realms of the reviving, the black-line, the crushing, the crying, the great crying, the burning, the great burning, the without-respite, the blister realm, the continuous-blister, the Aṭaṭa, the Hahava, the Huhuva, the Utpala, the Padma, and the Mahāpadma — and so forth — the realms of hell-beings. Wherever those rays descended upon the hot hells, they became cool; wherever they descended upon the cold hells, they became warm. In this way, those beings were relieved of their particular torments and made comfortable. Then, as those beings began to wonder, "Might we have died and passed on from here, or have we been reborn elsewhere?" — in order to generate in them deep faith, the Blessed One sent forth an emanation. When they saw that emanation, they thought: "We have not died and passed on from here, nor have we been reborn elsewhere. It is by the power of seeing this being who has come before us that our torments have been relieved." Their minds rejoiced in the emanation, and the karmic force of the torments of hell being exhausted, they were established wherever the right vessel for truth existed, taking rebirth among gods and humans at the border of those realms.

Those rays that went upward then visited the gods of the realm of the Four Great Kings, the gods of the Thirty-Three, the Yāma gods, the Tuṣita gods, the gods who delight in creation, the gods who lord over others' creations, and the gods of the Brahmā realm: Brahmā's Company, the Ministers of Brahmā, the Great Brahmā, the Minor Radiance, the Immeasurable Radiance, the Utter Radiance, the Minor Virtue, the Immeasurable Virtue, the Abundant Virtue, the Cloudless, the Born of Merit, the Great Fruit, the Not-Great, the Not-Tormented, the Clear-Sighted, the Resplendent, and the gods of Akaniṣṭha. There the rays proclaimed impermanence, suffering, emptiness, and selflessness, and also recited two verses:

Strive to take birth in a fortunate state.
Apply yourselves diligently to the Buddha's teaching.
Like a great elephant in a house of mud,
vanquish the armies of the Lord of Death.

Whoever, with true and careful heedfulness, shall practice this Dharma of discipline, having utterly abandoned the wandering of birth, shall in the end draw forth suffering by the root.

Then those rays encircled the great trichiliocosm — the world-system of one billion worlds — and returned to attend upon the Blessed One. If the Blessed One intended to give a prophecy concerning a past event, they dissolved at his back. If he intended to give a prophecy concerning the future, they dissolved before him. If he intended to give a prophecy of birth in hell, they dissolved at the soles of his feet. If he intended to give a prophecy of birth as an animal, they dissolved at his heels. If he intended to give a prophecy of birth as a hungry ghost, they dissolved at his toes. If he intended to give a prophecy of birth as a human being, they dissolved at his knees. If he intended to give a prophecy of becoming a wheel-turning monarch of power, they dissolved at the palm of his left hand. If he intended to give a prophecy of becoming a wheel-turning monarch, they dissolved at the palm of his right hand. If he intended to give a prophecy of birth as a god, they dissolved at his navel. If he intended to give a prophecy of awakening as a śrāvaka, they dissolved at his mouth. If he intended to give a prophecy of solitary awakening, they dissolved at the space between his brows. If he intended to give a prophecy of unsurpassed, perfect, and complete awakening, they dissolved at the crown of his head.

Then those rays circled the Blessed One three times and dissolved at the back of the Blessed One's feet. Thereupon the venerable Ānanda addressed the Buddha, the Blessed One, in verse:

Like the rising of the sun that illumines all,
the many rays that issued from within your mouth, blazing in a thousand hues of varied color, have filled the ten directions with their light.

And then he spoke again in verse:

Free from excitement and dejection, released from pride, the Buddha, the very cause for all beings — the Victor, conqueror of foes, white as a conch and as a lotus — does not smile without cause. You who possess a steady mind, may you yourself know the right moment. Let those who hear and follow the sovereign Victor, the noble supreme herd-leader of the steadfast Sages, have their doubts cleared away by virtue. Without a purpose, the ocean or the king of mountains he would not reveal. A fully awakened buddha does not display a smile. Because he who is steadfast shows a smile for a reason, all these many people long to hear it.

Then the Blessed One declared: "Ānanda, it is so. It is indeed so. Ānanda, a Tathāgata, an arhat, a fully and perfectly awakened buddha does not smile without cause and without condition.

"Ānanda, did you see that young monk? He spoke harsh words to a monk, slandering and abusing him, and that monk became angry." The Blessed One said: "Yes." "That monk entered his room, shut the door, and sat there contemplating inwardly those harsh words that had been spoken to him. Overwhelmed by anger, he dwelt upon them again and again. As a result of that, he fully gave rise to all ten roots of aversion. When his time passed and he died, he will be reborn as a venomous serpent in that very room of his."

The noble Vinaya, the thirty-eighth fascicle.

Thus, while the Blessed One was conversing with the venerable Ānanda, that same monk — he who had spoken the harsh words — had contemplated them many times over, and being utterly consumed by anger, had multiplied and intensified it greatly. Having thereby attained all ten roots of aversion, he died and passed away, and was reborn as a venomous serpent in that very room of his.

Then the Blessed One declared to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, that deluded man has been reborn as a venomous serpent in that same room. Go to him, approach him, and in my name say: 'May you be free from illness.' Say to him: 'You went forth into my teaching, and from the four fruits of the contemplative life you were due to realize any one of those fruits. But now, because of the power of your anger, you have been reborn here as a venomous serpent. Forgive that monk. If further time passes without that, you will be born among hell-beings.'"

"Reverend, I will do as commanded," said the venerable Ānanda. He heard this from the Blessed One, and then, taking the monk along, he went to that monk's room and knocked gently at the door and said: "Good sir, the Blessed One sends you his greeting: May you be free from illness. He says: You went forth into my teaching, and from the four fruits of the contemplative life you were due to realize any one of those fruits. But now, because of the power of your anger, you have been reborn here as a venomous serpent. Forgive this monk. And even now, when your time here is done, you risk being born among hell-beings."

At that very moment the serpent released its venom in anger and remained inside the room, not coming out.

Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana: "Maudgalyāyana, come here. Go to where the venomous serpent is, and when you have gone, say to it: 'Forgive that monk.'" And so he too went there and spoke those words. The serpent showed only its head through the keyhole, then withdrew back inside.

The news spread everywhere, becoming widely known throughout the land, that a monk had harmed a fellow monk in mind and had as a result been reborn as a serpent in his own room. When King Prasenajit of Kośala, together with his inner court ladies, young attendants, ministers, townspeople, and retinue, having heard the news and wishing to see this wonder, were moved by curiosity and set out for the Jeta Grove.

Then the Blessed One too, accompanied by his great śrāvaka disciples — the all-knowing Kauṇḍinya, Vāṣpa, Mahānāman, Acyuta, Śāriputra, the great Maudgalyāyana, Ābhāsvara, Ānanda, Nāgasamāla, and others — entered together with King Prasenajit into that room. When the Blessed One spoke to the serpent in its own tongue, it immediately came out of the room.

Then the Blessed One led it out of the building, and at the gateway of the Jeta Grove, before an assembly of many hundreds of thousands and before the Saṅgha of monks, a seat was arranged and the Blessed One took his place upon it. The venomous serpent then looked all around at the great multitude of people and, seized with fear, came to the side of the Blessed One's seat. Moving to the far end of the row in order of seniority, it coiled there, gazing steadily at the Blessed One.

The Blessed One addressed it: "Fair-faced one — having gone forth into my teaching and having the opportunity to realize any one of the four fruits of the contemplative life, you instead allowed yourself to be utterly overcome by violent anger, which you dwelt upon again and again, and you even generated a malicious mind toward a monk. Because of this, you are now reborn as a venomous serpent — a being that is attached to harming and killing, that takes the lives of others and lives by depriving other creatures of their lives. When you die and pass on from here, into what lineage of birth will you be born? Where will you take birth? Where will you come to be reborn?"

When the Blessed One called to mind the serpent's former existence, it broke into weeping.

Then the Blessed One at that moment spoke these verses:

You have taken birth in the animal realm, born too without leisure.
Why weep to no purpose?
What is there now that you can do?

The Victor is endowed with compassion — arouse from your heart sincere faith in him.
Then, abandoning this animal birth, you will go from here to the higher realms.

Because the Dharma taught by the Buddha, the Blessed One, is unfailing, the habitual dwelling that the serpent had in that place came to an end.

Then the Blessed One addressed the monk: "Come here, monk. Grant forgiveness to that venomous serpent." The monk said, "Blessed One, how am I to grant forgiveness? Am I to touch its feet?" The Blessed One then made it manifest that it had indeed been a monk in a former life and said: "Have no doubt — touch its feet." In accordance with the Teacher's word, the monk touched its feet, and the serpent in turn touched its head to him. The two of them were seen by the great multitude, who were filled with profound wonder. And so the Blessed One, on account of this event, taught the Dharma to that great multitude in a manner befitting the occasion. Upon hearing it, many hundreds of thousands of living beings came to great realization. The venomous serpent itself, with a mind of sincere faith in the Blessed One, passed away at that moment and was reborn in a fine celestial dwelling among the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three.

Then the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Therefore, monks, if this or any other monk is utterly overcome by anger, that is a matter warranting censure. Therefore, when one monk has been angered by another and that other remains still engulfed in anger, let the first monk appeal to him in whatever manner will cause his anger to subside and allow him to dwell in purity. Let that monk also resolve the matter in mind with patience. If someone was angered in the morning, let the other seek his forgiveness in the afternoon. If it was in the afternoon, then let it be in the evening. If it was in the evening, let the other seek his forgiveness the following day."

The Blessed One rose from his seat and went to the assembly hall to enter into inner meditative stillness. Now, by the very nature of things, a certain son of the gods or daughter of the gods, however long or short their life had been, passes away from one place and is reborn in another, and three kinds of thought arise: where did they come from, where have they been reborn, and what karma brought this about? This particular being had died from the bite of a venomous snake and was reborn in the excellent divine realm of the Thirty-Three Gods, where he beheld the Blessed One and, filled with manifest faith toward him, saw clearly. Then that former son of the gods, who had once been bitten by a venomous snake, thought to himself: "I have been here long enough. It would not be fitting for me to go to the Blessed One's presence as I am now. I have not yet been here long enough — I will go to the Blessed One." And so, wearing spotless earrings and a garland, adorned with bracelets and jeweled ornaments, that same evening he gathered armfuls of divine flowers — utpala, padma, kumuda, puṇḍarīka, māṇḍārava, and the like — and illuminated the entirety of the Jeta Grove with a great radiance. He then scattered flowers before the Blessed One and sat in the Blessed One's presence to hear the Dharma. The Blessed One, knowing his intention, his underlying disposition, his temperament, and his nature, taught the Dharma in such a way that he would come to realize the Four Noble Truths of the noble ones in their fullness. Upon hearing this, the son of the gods who had formerly been bitten by the venomous snake shattered the twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection (the belief in a personal self) with the vajra of wisdom and directly actualized the fruit of stream-entry. Seeing the truth, he uttered three words of rejoicing:

"Such benefit as this the Venerable One has given — my mother never gave it, my father never gave it, no king ever gave it, no god ever gave it, no beloved ever gave it, no multitude of my own relatives ever gave it, none of my former ancestors ever gave it, no ascetic or brahmin ever gave it. The Blessed One has dried up my ocean of blood and tears, led me beyond the mountain of bones, closed the door to the lower realms, and opened the door to the higher realms and to liberation, placing me in the abode of gods and humans.

Through your power, you have cut the roads of the lower realms, those paths teeming with manifold faults and intolerable suffering.

The supreme merit — the path leading to the higher realms — and the path beyond sorrow I have attained this very day.

Relying on you, free from fault, today I am utterly pure, with eyes perfectly cleansed.

I have attained the noble, pleasing calm abiding of insight.

I have crossed to the far shore of the ocean of suffering.

I am worthy of worship by humans, gods, and asuras.

Released from birth, old age, sickness, and death, an outcome so difficult to see even in a thousand existences —
O Sage, today, having seen you, I have attained the fruit."

Then, with his ornaments still hanging, he prostrated at the Blessed One's two feet with joy arising in him. He circumambulated to the right around the Foe-Subduer and departed to the divine world, the realm of the gods.

Afterward, the son of the gods who had formerly been bitten by the venomous snake departed with such joy as a merchant who has found his profit, as a farmer rejoicing in a fine harvest year, as a hero who has won the victory in battle, as a sick man released from every illness — he came to the Blessed One with such joy and abundance, and having gone to his own abode, he was seen by the monks who strove diligently without sleeping in the early evening and at dawn. Seeing a great radiance blazing in the Blessed One's presence, they became uncertain and asked the Blessed One: "Blessed One, did Brahmā, lord of the Brahmā assembly, come to visit the Blessed One last night? Did Śakra, Lord of Gods (Indra), come? Did the four World-Protectors come to pay their respects?" And the monks replied: "It was not Brahmā, lord of the Brahmā assembly — nor was it Śakra, Lord of Gods — nor did the four World-Protectors and the like come to pay their respects to me. Rather, the one who was bitten by the deadly snake and endured it through the patience practiced by the monk — he, with open faith arising toward me in his mind, passed away from this life and was reborn in a fair and pleasant abode among the gods of the Heaven of the Thirty-Three. And so last night he came to my presence, I taught him the Dharma, he saw the truth, and then he went to his own abode." Therefore, monks, you should train yourselves in this way: one should practice patience, and one should speak of the virtues of patience. Train yourselves, monks, in precisely that way. When the Blessed One had so declared, those monks rejoiced and took delight in what the Blessed One had spoken.

The setting is in Śrāvastī. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Venerable one, when one performs a full ordination, while saying to those to be fully ordained 'Do not ordain me,' if monks nonetheless perform the full ordination, does that count as a full ordination or not?" The Blessed One replied: "Upāli, it does not count as a full ordination; moreover, those who perform the ordination incur a transgression." "But why, Blessed One?" "Because even a fully ordained monk who surrenders his training is called 'not fully ordained' — how much more so at the time of actually conferring full ordination."

Again, the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Blessed One, you have said that novice monks who have reached the age of twenty should be given full ordination. If other novice monks whose own ages are not known to them — because their bodies are large — and the monks, being uncertain about their age, are unwilling to ordain them, how should one proceed with them?" The Blessed One declared: "Upāli, in such a case, determine it from the physical marks and then confer full ordination. Do not be uncertain about this." When the Blessed One had said, "Determine it from the physical marks and confer full ordination," the monks stripped the candidate bare and proceeded to examine the marks. The candidate was intensely embarrassed, and thereupon the Blessed One declared: "Do not strip him bare. Instead, tell him to place his alms bowl or a vessel covered with a robe or a Dharma robe on the space under his armpit and upon the armpit itself — and examine it there. If those marks are present, confer full ordination; if they are absent, do not."

He asked again: "Venerable one, if monks confer full ordination upon a monk using the procedure for ordaining a nun, does that count as a full ordination or not?" "Upāli, it does count as a full ordination; however, those who perform the ordination incur a transgression." "Venerable one, if monks and nuns together confer full ordination upon a nun using the procedure for ordaining a monk, does it count as a full ordination or not?" "Upāli, it does count as a full ordination; however, both assemblies incur a transgression."

These are the opening verses of the first sūtra of the Single Chapter:

In brief: a gathering place, a village with its surrounds, with the arising of mind — the restoration ceremony — and also the three killings in the same way:
analysis and the remainder of the Saṅgha.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove in Śrāvastī, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. Some monks set out to travel about the region together with many guests. At that time the restoration ceremony (poṣadha) fell due for them, and they saw a direction where the ground was strewn with living creatures. They said to one another: "Venerable ones, come this way."

"Let us perform the restoration ceremony on the side where the ground is clear of living creatures." And so they undertook to perform the restoration ceremony there. Meanwhile, many of the guests had gone on ahead, and those monks followed behind them. Along the way they were waylaid by bandits and arrived at the temple. The monks saw them and said: "Have you come safely? Venerable ones, have you come safely? Did you travel well?" They replied: "How could we have traveled well? What is the trouble? We were waylaid by bandits." They told the monks what had happened to them, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Do not perform the restoration ceremony out of attachment to a place free of living creatures. Perform the restoration ceremony in the village and its surrounds." The Blessed One said this, and then half of the monks entered the village while the other half remained outside, so they did not assemble together and the ceremony was not performed. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Those who reside in the village should perform the restoration ceremony in the village. Likewise, monks should perform the restoration ceremony and not remain sitting through the ceremony without performing it. If they do remain, it becomes a transgression."

Some monks set out on the road together with many merchant travelers. A monk said to the merchants: "Friends, we are going to perform the restoration ceremony — please wait just a moment." The merchants replied: "Noble ones, there is danger from bandits in this direction; please keep moving and stay together." The monks thought: "Shall we stay here? Shall we stay here?" and they followed behind those travelers until dawn came upon them as they went. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, when it is time for the restoration ceremony, do not go without having performed it. Or else perform the ceremony while traveling."

When the monks undertook to perform the ceremony while traveling, the merchants said: "Noble ones, we are saying nothing and moving along out of fear of bandits — why are you making such noise?" The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not perform the restoration ceremony in an elaborate way — do it in brief."

When the monks undertook to do it in brief, the merchants still found fault with them. The Blessed One then declared: "By the mere arising of mind, consecrate it." Therefore there are these four things — the consecration of the monastic robe, the dedication of the robe, the restoration ceremony, and arising from the proper procedure — that are all accomplished by the mere arising of mind. This is how it should be done: fixing mindfulness with the Buddha as its object, one should generate the mind and consecrate the restoration ceremony. Then one should also recite the words aloud: "Today is the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony of the Saṅgha. I, the monk named such-and-such, likewise perform the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. I, named such-and-such, declare my own purification from all impediment-creating phenomena." Having thus consecrated the restoration ceremony by one's own recitation, when the time comes to meet with an assembled Saṅgha, one should perform the restoration ceremony together with the Saṅgha. One should recite this twice, then three times, and perform the ceremony accordingly. It is not the case that the ceremony need not be performed. If it is not performed, a transgression occurs.

The occasion for the next rule is in Śrāvastī. Some monks were traveling through a ravine when bandits seized them. The bandits said among themselves: "Come now, what shall we do with them? Let us strike their heads — kill these ones." The monks thought to themselves:

"We are surely going to be killed and cut down," they thought, and so they said to the bandits: "Why do you wish to kill us?" The bandits replied: "Kings, wealthy men, merchants, and caravan leaders hold great faith in you, and if you were to speak to them, they would harm us." At that point a young monk committed a transgression arising from deliberate false speech. He then said to the venerable ones: "Will it be permitted for me to remain here until I have confessed this transgression to the venerable ones?" The others said: "Very well, then stay right here." He came forward before the monks and knelt down, and said: "Please hear me, venerable ones. I, who am called such-and-such, have committed the transgression of deliberate false speech knowingly. I confess this fault before the venerable ones. I acknowledge it. I disclose it. I do not conceal it. If I confess and acknowledge it, it will be well with me; if I do not confess and acknowledge it, it will not be." He replied to him: "Do you see it clearly?" "I see it." "Do you vow henceforth to restrain yourself?" "I vow." This was said twice, and then three times. When all the bandits heard this, they said: "Do the noble ones not speak falsehood? Truly, they do not speak falsehood." Filled with manifest faith in the noble ones, they then said: "In that case, do not say anything to anyone today." "Certainly, we will say nothing to anyone," the monks said, and departed. They went to the monastery, and when doubt arose among them, the monks who were in that situation reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, the lord of the forest confessed before the bandits — do not have any doubt in that regard."

The occasion for the next rule is also in Śrāvastī. Another monk who was traveling on tour was seized by bandits. The bandits deliberated amongst themselves and said: "Come now, what shall we do? Strike their heads — kill these ones." The monks thought: "We are surely going to be killed and cut down." They said to the bandits: "Why do you wish to kill us?" The bandits replied: "Kings, wealthy men, merchants, and caravan leaders hold great faith in you, and if you were to speak to them, they would do us harm and render our efforts fruitless." The monks said: "Release us and we will say nothing to anyone." The bandits said: "Then if you vow to us that at the time of the fifteenth — when you gather together and recite — you will speak at length before us, we will let you go." At that point one monk, who knew the text well by heart, fearing that they would be killed, was frightened, and quickly recited the Prātimokṣa individually on his own. When the bandits heard this with manifest faith, they said: "Noble ones, do you truly uphold and protect all of this?" He replied: "This is the teaching of the Teacher — why would we not uphold and protect it properly?" The bandits then said: "Noble ones, please depart in peace and do not speak of this to anyone." "Certainly, we will not speak of it," the monks said, and departed. They went to the monastery. When doubt arose among them, the monks in that situation reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, the lord of the forest recited the Prātimokṣa before the bandits — it was well recited. Do not have any doubt in that regard."

The occasion for the next rule is also in Śrāvastī. Some monks who were touring through a district called Beu set out on their way, and —

The bandits seized them. The bandits said among themselves: "These men are useless — what are they good for? Let's cut off their heads and kill them." Now among the bandits there was one who knew about monks. He saw them, and compassion arose in him. Unable to free them, he said out of sympathy: "Kill these men and be done with it — it is better that way. Tie them to some uncut grass, take their belongings, and go. As for me, I am tortured by hunger and cold and shall likely die." At that, one of the others said: "If he speaks like that, what are we to do?" Some said: "It is good that he does so." So they stripped the monks of their belongings, bound them to some uncut grass, and departed.

Now the king of the district of Beu, named Cārpa, had gone out with a fourfold army in pursuit of a wild animal that had strayed. His troops spotted the monks from a great distance. The king asked his minister: "Look there — are those not wild animals?" The minister shielded his eyes to look, then drew closer to the king and saw that they were human beings. The king said: "Are they naked non-Buddhists (tīrthikas), or what?" One of those with him said: "Your Majesty, it would seem so." But one among them who knew about monks said: "Your Majesty, they are not naked tīrthikas — they are monks, sons of the Śākyans." "How do you know?" "Your Majesty, on the one side they are dark, on the other they are white." Then the king went and asked them: "Noble ones, why are you in this state?" "Your Majesty, we were overpowered by bandits." "Noble ones, but then why are you bound like this?" "Your Majesty, we have been bound with the bonds of the training, for the Blessed One has laid down as our training: 'To demolish a village of seeds or a village of living creatures, or to cause it to be demolished, is a transgression.'" The king was filled with faith and rejoicing, and he released them. He then presented each one with three robes.

They went to the monastery. Since they had spoken of the transgression in that manner before the king, doubt arose among them. They described at length what had happened to the other monks, and the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "This king is a consecrated monarch, head-anointed from the kṣatriya lineage, and he is the foremost among all worldly people. Therefore what was spoken was well spoken — do not have any doubt in that regard."

The occasion for the next rule is also in Śrāvastī. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable One, when a person who has committed a transgression is in the presence of another who has likewise committed that same transgression, may that person confess the transgression? Upāli, is that permissible?" "It is not permissible. However, if the offenses are of different kinds, then it is permissible."

The occasion for the next rule is also in Śrāvastī. A certain monk committed an offense against the Saṅgha that exceeded the ordinary, and remorse arose in him. He became pale, emaciated, and despondent, lay down on a bed, and stopped caring for his body. Other monks said to him: "Venerable one, why have you become so pale, so emaciated and despondent — lying in bed and neglecting your body? Tell us what your illness is." He said nothing. Then a monk who was a close friend of his noticed him and asked him, and he told him everything in detail. The friend said: "Venerable one, in that case, you should report it to the monks." "If that is what must be done, I will come," he said. Then the friend said: "In that case, come here — or go to another place and confess it there."

He agreed, and the two of them set out together for another place. But halfway along the road, the time had passed, and that monk thought: "The purpose for which I set out — the time for it has already passed. Why go on?" So he turned back. When he returned, the other monks greeted him: "Welcome, venerable one. Did you have a comfortable journey? Did you make good use of your time?" At that he burst into tears. The monks asked him: "Venerable one, why are you weeping?" He said: "Because the monk who was traveling with me has passed away." They said to him: "Venerable one, why weep? All conditioned things are just so by their very nature." He replied: "It is because he passed away while still bearing a transgression." At this the monks said: "In that case, weeping is appropriate, for he will dwell for a long time in hell."

The monks reported all of this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, that son of good family has been cleared of that transgression. I have taught that a transgression is cleared through intention, not through punitive action. Therefore, one who has natural shame may be permitted to confess before a single person. Let him confess before one person alone, and have no doubt about this."

Now, certain individuals who had not yet been freed from attachment — those who held the sūtras, those who held the Vinaya, those who held the matrices, some elder members of the Saṅgha, those of great renown, and those of great merit — without examining the matter properly, incurred a secondary Saṅgha transgression. They associated with those who were practicing the penalized acts, lived alongside them, and criticized even those monks who had learned little — including attendants, brahmins, householders, and others. Some became displeased. The monks reported this as it had occurred to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "They too, having resolved firmly not to act that way again in the future, should confess before a single person. Have no doubt about this."

This is the second verse of the first sūtra within the section of individual cases.

In summary:

What is to be settled, let it be settled.

Though seven years have passed, one may still proceed.

What was not concluded together remains just so.

It is the case of one whose hide is unsuitable.

The blessed buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. It fell to the venerable Ānanda to look after the monastery. Prasenajit, king of Kośala, came to the Jeta Grove, paid homage at the feet of the Blessed One, and then went to where the venerable Ānanda was staying, approached him, paid homage at his feet, and sat down before him to hear the Dharma. The venerable Ānanda then entered into the sūtra collection, drew from it, and began to explain it at some length before moving on to an abridged explanation. The king said: "Noble Ānanda, I am busy — please do not give the abridged version." He said this two and three times. The venerable Ānanda replied: "Great king, even if you are busy, I am occupied." The king asked: "Noble Ānanda, what are you occupied with?" He said: "I must look after the monastery." The king said: "Noble Ānanda, could someone else take the turn? I belong to the Saṅgha, so I wish to do the work." The king thought: "This is something I can do," and went to where the Blessed One was staying.

He prostrated at the feet of the Blessed One and spoke these words: "Venerable One, I am King Prasenajit, consecrated with the royal diadem upon my head. Whatever work is mine to do, I do it myself. Whatever is fitting for the ladies of the inner court to do, the ladies of the inner court do it. Whatever is fitting for the young attendants to do, the young attendants do it. Whether minister, chief minister, military commander, townsman, or villager — each does their own work. The Blessed One is the unsurpassed king of Dharma. Ah, Blessed One! Surely the compassionate one too ought to leave in place those who are fit to remain, and not assign them to work duties — why would he do otherwise?" When King Prasenajit had spoken thus, the Blessed One said nothing in reply, and so his silence was taken as consent. King Prasenajit, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that he had accepted, prostrated at the feet of the Blessed One and departed from his presence.

Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and gather all the monks residing and staying in Śrāvastī into the assembly hall." The venerable one replied: "Venerable One, as you command." And so the venerable Ānanda, having received the instruction from the Blessed One, gathered together all the monks residing in Śrāvastī into the assembly hall, then went to where the Blessed One was, approached, and bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side.

The venerable Ānanda then said to the Blessed One: "Venerable One, all the monks residing and staying in Śrāvastī have assembled in the assembly hall. Blessed One, may you now consider this the right moment."

Thereupon the Blessed One proceeded to where the assembly hall was, entered, and took his seat on a prepared throne before the community of monks. Seated there, the Blessed One addressed the monks: "Monks, today Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, came to me and said: 'Ah, Blessed One! Those who are fit to remain — let them be set aside; it is not right to assign them to work duties.' He says this on your behalf. So from this day forth, do not assign to work duties those who are fit to remain."

When the Blessed One had said, "Those who are fit to remain, set them aside from work duties," the monks did not know who was fit to remain. The Blessed One then declared: "Those who are masters of the sūtras, masters of the Vinaya, masters of the māṭṛkā (Skt. māṭṛkā — the proto-Abhidharma matrices), those who teach many, and the elders of the Saṅgha — these are the ones fit to remain. As for a master of sūtras, it is just that alone. Similarly, a master of the Vinaya, a master of the māṭṛkā, one who teaches many, and the elders of the Saṅgha — these too are by reason of that very qualification."

When the Blessed One had declared, "A master of sūtras, a master of the Vinaya, and a master of the māṭṛkā — these are so by reason of that very qualification," the group of six monks, having read one or two chapters of a sūtra collection, said: "We are masters of sūtras — therefore, do not assign us to work duties." When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "One who holds all the sūtras — that one is a master of sūtras, and should not be assigned to work. In the same way, those who have committed one or two pārājika offenses said: 'We too are masters of the Vinaya.'" Similarly, those who had read two chapters of the Vibhaṅga said: "I am a master of the māṭṭkā, so do not assign me to work duties." When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "One who holds all the Vinaya and — — all the māṭṭkā — that one should not be assigned to work duties."

The setting for the following rule is at Śrāvastī. At that time, King Prasenajit of Kosala, returning from a certain village in the hills, sent out a company of soldiers. They were defeated and came back. He sent them a second and a third time, and each time they were defeated and came back. The ministers said to the king: "Sire, the power of those hill villages is very great. Now that your majesty's power has waned, if your majesty himself were to march there in person, those hill villages would inevitably fall; otherwise it cannot be done." The king then had a great drum sounded, proclaiming: "Let every person in my realm who lives by the power of arms come, without exception, and assemble." Then the king, together with a great army, marched to those villages and surrounded them on all sides. Yet the villagers took refuge in a dense forest and could not be reached.

A minister then said: "The householder Anāthapiṇḍada is of boundless merit and is encompassed entirely by the gods. If he comes here, those hill villages will without doubt submit; no one else can achieve this." The king, showing great respect to the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, sent him a letter saying: "Householder, I wish to look upon your face." The moment Anāthapiṇḍada heard this letter read, he set out directly and traveled to those hill villages. But before he reached the villages, he was held up for a long time. Not having seen any monks, he grew thin and pale, his body had wasted away, and when the king saw him he asked: "Householder, do you miss your children?" He replied: "Sire, it is not that I miss my children — it is that I long to see the noble ones." The king then sent a letter to his ministers saying: "Without letting it be known that it is my command, arrange by every means for the noble ones to come here."

The ministers read the letter and entered into consultation. "Now then, how shall this be accomplished?" they asked. Another, elder minister said: "I see a way; let me devise a means and present it." At the gate of the Jeta Grove there was an old orchard belonging to Ārdha-Brahmadatta, which had become overgrown like an arrow-thicket. He had it properly repaired and restored. Then, from the courtyard of the stūpa of hair and nail relics, he stretched a cord to that orchard, saying that by disturbing them — the relics themselves — the gods would come to look and walk there. The workers then began to restore that old orchard. He said: "Stretch a cord through the center of the stūpa of hair and nail relics, and dig irrigation channels following that cord to draw water there."

The monks who were dwelling in the monastery, as well as those who had gone out on their daytime rounds, gathered together and went to that minister. "Good sir," they said, "what are you undertaking here?" He replied: "Noble ones, the gods have sent us a letter saying: 'Restore my father's old orchard, and I shall come there.' And so we ourselves are clearing it on the outside and digging irrigation channels to bring water there." The monks said: "Are you demolishing the stūpa of the Blessed One's hair and nail relics? Do not do that." He replied: "Noble ones, it would not be right for us to disobey the command of the god. Since we do not have two heads, it would not be right for us to break the god's command." The senior monk said: "Good sir, we shall petition the god about it. Wait until then." "Noble ones, we will wait — please make the petition." "Good sir, how long will the god be present there?" "Noble ones, the road is long."

"Good sir, will he return in one to seven days, or will he not return at all?"

"Noble ones, he may or may not return." The monks reported what had occurred to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "In that case, monks, for the sake of the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha, I grant the blessing of forty days and permit going beyond the boundary."

Since the monks did not know how to perform the blessing, the Blessed One declared: "Spread out the seats, strike the board, appoint a monk to answer questions that are put, and assemble the entire Saṅgha together. Then, one, two, or three monks — whichever you prefer — should announce: 'Buddhaguputra, Dharmadatta, and the community of Saṅgha — you who have entered the proper early or late rains retreat within this boundary — for the sake of the Saṅgha you have been blessed with forty days and are permitted to go beyond the boundary. Do you consent to remain in this rains retreat, at this rains residence?' If they consent, then following that, one monk should make the motion and perform the formal act.

"Hear me, venerable Saṅgha. Buddhaguptra, Dharmadatta, and this community of Saṅgha — having entered the early or late rains retreat in this place within the boundary — have been blessed with forty days for the sake of the Saṅgha and will go beyond the boundary. This is their rains residence; they will remain in this rains retreat. If the Saṅgha approves and the time is right, let the Saṅgha grant permission and appoint Buddhaguptra, Dharmadatta, and the Saṅgha community for forty days. That is the motion. The formal act is likewise:

"Hear me, venerable Saṅgha. Buddhaguptra, Dharmadatta, and this community of Saṅgha have been blessed with forty days for the sake of the Saṅgha and will go beyond the boundary. This is their rains residence; they will remain in this rains retreat. Those among the venerable ones who consent to Buddhaguptra, Dharmadatta, and the Saṅgha community being appointed forty days for the sake of the Saṅgha — let them remain silent. Those who do not consent — let them speak.'

"The Saṅgha has consented to Buddhaguptra, Dharmadatta, and this community of Saṅgha being blessed with forty days for the sake of the Saṅgha, going beyond the boundary, with this as their rains residence, remaining in this rains retreat. The Saṅgha has approved and granted this by its silence, and so it is taken.

"Those whom the Saṅgha has appointed for forty days — let them receive the blessing and go beyond the boundary. Do not be uncertain about it.

"The blessing itself should be performed as follows. One should sit before a monk with palms joined and speak these words:

"I, whose name is such-and-such, having entered the early or late rains retreat — three months equal — within the boundary, I whose name is such-and-such, for the sake of the Saṅgha, have been blessed with forty days and will go beyond the boundary. This is my rains retreat; I remain in this rains retreat.'

"Say this twice and three times."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, if one has received the blessing for one day, is it permissible to go beyond the boundary?" "Upāli, it is permissible."

"In the same way, if one has been blessed for two days, three days, four days, five days, six days, seven days, eight days, nine days, ten days, twenty days, or thirty days, it is permissible to go beyond the boundary up to forty days."

"Venerable one, is it permissible to be blessed for more than forty days?"

"Upāli, it is not permissible. Why not? Upāli, one should dwell many days within the boundary and few days beyond the boundary."

He asked again: "Venerable one, when the Blessed One has said that one should be blessed for one day — before whom should one be blessed?" "Upāli, that is to be done before a single monk. In the same way, one may be blessed for two days, three days, four days, five days, or up to six days. From six days up to forty days, one should request it from the Saṅgha, and once appointed, one may be blessed before either the Saṅgha or an individual, as one wishes."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable one, if the skin of something is not permissible, is the flesh of it also not permissible?"

"Upāli, if the skin of it is not permissible, then the flesh of it is also not permissible. And the sinews and bones of it are also not permissible."

This is the third verse of the opening sūtra of the first section on the Prātimokṣa.

The Noble Vinaya, the thirty-ninth bundle.

In brief:

Forms with essence, bedding and robes,

And the deceased in the same way —

Crow, owl, and vulture:

These shall not be eaten.

When the Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Bamboo Grove of Kalandaka, at the time when King Ajātaśatru had been deceived by the god Devadatta and had removed his father Bimbisāra — who governed his kingdom righteously according to the Dharma — from his throne, depriving him of his life, at that time the king saw the bedding and robes and began to weep. The ministers said: "Your Majesty, the old divine king took delight in the noble ones; it would be fitting to donate these furnishings to the Saṅgha as well." At that the king offered those robes and bedding to the monastery. The monks stored them by placing them in the gatehouse. Then on a later occasion the king came to the monastery and upon seeing them, began to weep. The ministers said: "These were placed in the gatehouse so that the noble ones' gift to you would not be visible — this has become a matter of blame." The monks said nothing. The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not store things in the gatehouse." Then they were stored on the upper floor, and that too became a cause for blame. The Blessed One declared: "Do not store things on the upper floor." So they were stored in a dwelling room. Those of little faith said: "The royal robes and bedding — the monks have certainly sold and consumed them; that is why they were visible before and are no longer visible now." They made this reproach. The Blessed One then declared: "On the eighth or fourteenth day, display them on the upper floor." Those of little faith, upon seeing them, said: "The divine bedding and cushions have been sold and consumed by the monks and are gone." The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Write and affix a label at the end stating: 'These donated articles belong to King Bimbisāra.'"

The narrative context is at Śrāvastī. At that time a beloved and pleasant-looking grandmother of Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, passed away. She was carried out, cremated, and the funeral rites performed. The next morning, with robes still damp and hair still wet, he went to where the Blessed One was, arrived there, and prostrated with his head at the feet of the Blessed One.

He sat to one side. As he sat there, the Blessed One spoke to Prasenajit, the king of Kosala, saying: "Great king, why have you come here this morning with your hair still wet and your robes still damp?"

"Venerable One, my grandmother, who was so very dear to me and so pleasant to look upon, has passed away. She was carried out, cremated, and the funeral rites were performed. That is why I have come here this morning with robes still damp and hair still wet."

"Great king, was your grandmother truly so dear to you?"

"Venerable One, she was exceedingly dear and pleasant to me. Venerable One, if someone could have kept my grandmother alive in exchange for many draft oxen, I would have given many draft oxen. In the same way, for many horses, for many carriages — even if half my kingdom were asked in exchange for her recovery, and she could thereby have been saved, I would have been able to give even half my kingdom. Yet, Venerable One, though I was gripped by grief such as that, afflicted in such a way, stricken and oppressed by sorrow in such a way, still my grandmother who was so dear and pleasant to me passed on. And I thought to myself: how wonderful is the well-spoken teaching of the Blessed One — that all sentient beings, all living creatures, all born beings reach the end of their life in death. Because it comes to death in the end, the Blessed One's teaching that whatever is born will die — how wonderful that is!"

The Blessed One replied: "Great king, it is indeed so. It is exactly so. All sentient beings, all living creatures, all born beings reach the end of their life in death. Because it comes to death in the end, there is none who, once born, does not die.

"Great king, those of great and high royal lineage, those of great and high brahmin lineage, those of great and high householder lineage — they too reach the end of their life in death. Because it comes to death in the end, there is none who, once born, does not die.

"Furthermore, great king, even those who have received empowerment as rulers, who wield power over many people and have attained dominion, who thoroughly subdue and govern the expanse of great territories — even such beings reach the end of their life in death. Because it comes to death in the end, there is none who, once born, does not die.

"Great king, likewise those who, having gone forth from kingship to dwell as sages, live in such a way that they eat the fruits that fall of themselves, sustaining themselves on roots and fruits — even they reach the end of their life in death. Because it comes to death in the end, there is none who, once born, does not die.

"Great king, likewise even the long-lived gods (devas), resplendent with color in their lofty celestial mansions — even they are subject to dying and passing away from that state of existence.

"Moreover, great king, even the arhats whose defilements are exhausted, who have accomplished what had to be done, who have laid down the burden, who have attained their own goal, whose bond to further existence is destroyed, who are fully liberated in mind through the true teaching — even their bodies are subject to being cast off.

"Further, great king, even the pratyekabuddhas, those solitary awakened ones like a rhinoceros horn, who have tamed themselves alone, who have pacified themselves alone, who have passed beyond sorrow by themselves alone — even they are subject to casting off the body.

"And further, great king, even the Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened Buddha, endowed with the ten powers, unafraid by virtue of the four fearlessnesses, supreme among the great herd, who roars the lion's roar — even such a body is subject to being cast off.

"Great king, know that all things of that nature are likewise so. Of all sentient beings, of all living creatures, of all born beings — all beings without exception will come to the end of their life in death. Since death is the final terminus, there is none born who does not die. All sentient beings will come to the end of their life in death.

According as the actions one has done — so one goes to the fruit of merit or of sin.
Sinful action falls into the hells, meritorious action goes to the higher realms.
Some, by cultivating the path, pass beyond sorrow without any defilement.
When even buddhas, solitary buddhas, and the śrāvakas of the buddhas must cast off the body, what need is there to speak of common folk?

Then Prasenajit, king of the land of Kosala, rejoiced at the words of the Blessed One and expressed his delight. He bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One, took his leave, and went to his own home. There, seeing the bedding of his late queen lying empty, his mind was overcome by the grief of bereavement, and he said to his ministers: "I have seen this bedding and deep sorrow has arisen in me. Go and offer it to the noble Saṅgha." They took it and offered it to the noble Saṅgha in the Jeta Grove, and the monks stored it by placing it in a gatehouse.

Then at a later time the king came to the temple, saw it there, and wept. His ministers said to him: "Because the noble ones kept it and did not display it when it was offered to you, the act of placing it in the gatehouse itself has become a cause for reproach." The ministers said nothing further and sat in silence.

When the monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Do not store it in the gatehouse — hang it upstairs in an upper room." That too became a cause for reproach, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not hang it in the upper room — store it in a dwelling room." When it was placed in the dwelling room, some people of little faith spread the slander that the monks had sold the queen's bedding and eaten the proceeds: "It was visible before; now it is not." The Blessed One then declared: "On the eighth or fourteenth day of the month, hang it in the upper room for display." People of little faith, seeing it, said: "This is not the queen's bedding — the monks have certainly sold it and eaten the money." The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Write an inscription stating that it is the robe offered by Prasenajit, king of Kosala, and display it thus."

Now the occasion for what follows arose in Śrāvastī. At that time a fierce hailstorm struck Śrāvastī, and many animals and birds died there. Many people rose early and gathered the carcasses of animals and birds fit to eat and carried them away, while those not fit to eat — such as those belonging to crows and the like — were discarded. The Group of Six monks ate abundantly of the meat and slept long. They woke up late and, having heard of it, went off in haste, and they returned bringing crows, owls, vultures, and herons. Brahmins and householders saw them and asked: "What do these noble ones intend to do with those?" The monks replied: "To eat them." The people said: "These noble ones should discard what is not fit to eat. Even if other kinds of meat are obtained, why would one eat this?" The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not eat flesh that is not fit to eat — such as that of crows and the like. If one does eat it, one incurs an offense with remainder."

This has been the fourth verse-section of the first chapter on the Single-Pronged Scepter sūtra.

In summary:

Dogs, hawks, owls,
and birds that eat human flesh,
horses, mules, and foxes, and monkeys — these you shall not eat.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

A famine arose, and the householders fell into the habit of eating dog flesh. The group of six went on their alms round in Śrāvastī, and at whichever house they arrived, the people there said, "There is not even a little something worthy." Then they arrived at another householder's home, where inside the cooking pot a piece of dog flesh was boiling away. The householder's wife said,

"There is nothing worthy here whatsoever — please move on." The monks said, "What is that boiling in the pot?" She replied, "Venerable ones, this is dog flesh." "Do you eat dog flesh?" "Venerable ones, a famine has come upon us, and so we seek what we can." "In that case, give us some as well." "Venerable ones, will you eat it too?" "Indeed — if our lives depend on you, and you are eating it, why should we not eat it as well?" They gave it to them. Having received it, the monks took it and departed. The dogs, catching the scent of what was being carried, surrounded them, barking and biting, and followed along close behind. Brahmins and householders saw this and said to the monks, "Venerable ones, why are you walking along harassed by dogs?" The monks replied, "We obtained a little dog flesh on our alms round." The brahmins and householders said, "Do you venerable ones eat dog flesh?" And the monks replied, "At a time like this, when one cannot obtain alms, should we simply die of hunger?" The monks then reported what had happened to the Blessed One. The Blessed One considered the matter and declared: "Monks, eating dog flesh incurs a fault with an object. Therefore, monks, do not eat dog flesh. If monks eat dog flesh, it becomes an offense with remainder."

The setting is in Śrāvastī. The group of six also ate the flesh of hawks, owls, and flesh-eating birds. Brahmins and householders who lacked faith criticized them. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not eat the flesh of hawks, owls, and flesh-eating birds. If monks eat the flesh of hawks, owls, and flesh-eating birds, it becomes an offense with remainder."

The setting is in Śrāvastī. Thieves stole a young mule belonging to King Prasenajit of the kingdom of Kosala, led it away into a dense forest, slaughtered it there, carried off the flesh, and cast away the head and hooves before departing.

Now the group of six had a custom: they would rise early in the morning, go up to the roof, look out in all four directions to see where smoke was heaviest and where vultures were circling, and then set out in that direction. Seeing vultures circling over the dense forest, they ran toward the forest and went a long way in, and there in the dense forest they found the head, legs, and tail of the mule. They said among themselves, "Friends, dear friends, if something fit to take is found in a refuse heap, may one take it?" "Yes indeed, take it," they agreed, and gathered it all together. The keeper of the mule then came searching up and down and, seeing them, said: "Venerable ones, you who bear the victory banner of the sages — why do you behave so badly? What wrong have we done?" They replied, "You have slaughtered the king's mule." The monks said, "May this evil be pacified — we did not kill it." "Then who did kill it?" "Thieves killed it, and we simply consecrated the head, the feet, and the tail by taking them from the refuse heap." The mule keeper then asked, "Venerable ones, did you take and carry mule flesh?" When the monks said, "We ate it," he criticized them. The monks then reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"Monks, eating the flesh of a mule constitutes a fault. Therefore, monks, do not eat the flesh of hoofed animals. If monks eat it, they incur a transgression."

The next occasion arose at Śrāvastī. The group of six monks ate fox meat, and brahmins and householders who saw them said, "Venerable ones, what is that?" "It is fox meat." "Do noble ones also carry and eat fox meat?" When the monks said they did, the brahmins and householders criticized them. The monks then reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, for brahmins and householders to criticize is natural. Therefore, monks, do not eat fox meat. If monks eat fox meat, they incur a transgression."

The next occasion arose at Śrāvastī. In the Jeta Grove, a monkey was leaping from branch to branch and fell and died. The group of six monks placed it in a pot and were boiling it. A woman who had lost her small child was searching for him and came into the Jeta Grove, where she saw the group of six boiling something in the pot. She saw this, and thinking, "Could they have boiled my child here?" she became alarmed and drew near. After a while the pot bubbled and boiled, and the monkey's hand rose to the surface. She beat her breast and cried out, "Kyi hud, my child! Kyi hud, my child!" Then its foot rose up as well, and she cried out again, "Kyi hud, my child! Kyi hud, my child!" The group of six asked her, "Why are you doing that?" She said, "These hands and feet that have risen up — this is my child!" Then after a moment the tail appeared as well. The group of six asked, "Does your child have a tail?" Startled, she said, "Noble ones, is this a monkey?" They replied, "It is a monkey." "Do noble ones also carry and eat monkey flesh?" She said they did, and then criticized them. The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, the monkey resembles a human being. Therefore, monks, do not eat monkey flesh. If monks eat monkey flesh, they incur a transgression."

This is the fifth verse of the first sūtra of the single section.

In brief:

A bowl, a robe, and a hide, and no giving with a leaf-bowl.
Save only for an iron funnel, gemstones are to be passed by mouth.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time in Śrāvastī there was another monk who was severely afflicted by illness. He went to a physician and said, "Please, good sir, I am ill in such-and-such a manner — show me a remedy so that I may be cured." The physician said, "Noble one, take medicine administered from below." The monk replied, "Good sir, the Blessed One has not permitted that." The physician said, "Noble one, your Teacher is compassionate — he will come to permit it." When things stood thus, the monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If the physician prescribes it and the monk will recover by it, then administer the medicine from below — have no hesitation in this." The Blessed One declared, "Administer the medicine from below," and they poured it using a bowl, but it was messy and unsuitable. The Blessed One declared, "Do not pour it with a bowl." They then poured it using the corner of a robe, but that too proved to be a source of fault. The Blessed One declared, "Do not pour it with the corner of a robe." They then poured it from inside a leather bag, and that also proved to be a source of fault. The Blessed One then declared:

"Do not pour it from inside a leather bag," and they poured it from inside a leaf bowl. That too proved to be a source of fault. The Blessed One declared, "Do not pour it from inside a leaf bowl — instead, administer it from inside a tube." They then administered it from a metal tube, but when it was inserted it was exceedingly hot and rough. The Blessed One declared, "Rather than a metal tube, administer it through a tube of crystal or a tube of ivory."

This is the sixth verse of the first chapter of the Sūtra on Individual Liberation.

In brief:

Sugar cane and yogurt, grain, butter, broth, scorched porridge, and ghee, roots, fruits, stems, and leaves — all manner of broths may be administered.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove (Jetavana) of Anāthapiṇḍada at Śrāvastī. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Venerable One, is it possible that from a single medicine the very same one is suitable in the morning, that very same one suitable in the afternoon, that very same one suitable for seven days, and that very same one suitable for the duration of one's life?"

"Upāli, sugar cane is for morning use. Its juice is for afternoon use. Molasses is for seven-day use. Sugar cane and the ash of burnt sugar cane are for use for the duration of life. Upāli, yogurt is for morning use. Whey is for afternoon use. Butter is for seven-day use. The ash of burnt yogurt is for use for the duration of life. Upāli, meat is for morning use. Fat drippings are for seven-day use. The ash of burnt meat is for use for the duration of life. Upāli, sesame is for morning use. Sesame oil is for seven-day use. The ash of burnt sesame is for use for the duration of life."

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. A certain monk fell ill, and a physician who examined him said, "Noble one, prepare a broth of medicinal herbs and drink it." The monk reported this to the other monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Do as the physician has prescribed — have no hesitation in this."

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. Some other monks also fell ill, and for some of them the physician prescribed, "Drink a broth of mustard seed." For some, "Drink a broth of roots." For some, "Drink a broth of stems." For some, "Drink a broth of fruits." The monks reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Therefore, I permit this: whenever a physician prescribes it for a sick monk, drink whatever broth is prescribed — have no hesitation in this."

This is the seventh verse of the first chapter of the Sūtra on Individual Liberation.

In brief:

Molasses dissolved in water and the like,
what is stored for seven days, what is dedicated for the sake of others —
all should be taken up with benefit in mind.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove of Anāthapiṇḍada at Śrāvastī. The Blessed One, accompanied by the Saṅgha of hearers, was going on tour through the countryside. They arrived at another village in the rocky hill country. Knowing that the time had come to tame another householder who dwelt in that village, the Blessed One went to that rocky hill village. When the householder saw the Blessed One, faith arose in him and he came into the presence of the Blessed One. The Blessed One, knowing his intention, his latent dispositions, his constitution, and his nature, taught him the kind of Dharma through which one comes to realize the four noble truths. Hearing this, the householder shattered the twenty-peaked mountain of the view of the transitory collection (the belief in a real self among the heaps) with the vajra of gnosis, and directly realized the fruit of stream-entry.

As the monks were wearied by the fatigue of the road, they arrived at a certain ruined temple, a charnel ground, and — they laid down their outer robes and settled to sleep in the pleasure grove and at the foot of the trees. The householder, filled with profound faith, went in turn to pay his respects to the monks at the charnel ground, the shrine room, and the roots of the trees. When he saw that the monks were lying down and sitting where they had taken up lodging, he said, "Why are you sleeping and resting, you noble ones who are so very diligent in the teaching?" They replied, "Householder, we are oppressed by the weariness of the road and too exhausted to engage in wholesome activity." He then said to the noble ones, "In that case, if the Blessed One would permit it, please ask him whether you might take some molasses this afternoon, and I shall go and bring it." Some among them said, "That householder will provide it." Others said, "The venerable householder Ambāṭhika — owing to his eating molasses — directly realized arhatship. If the Blessed One likewise permits it, those among us who are oppressed by the weariness of the road: unbelieving people in the village will find fault, saying we are eating while settled in the town." These ones said they were displeased and would decline. Others said, "If the venerable one goes ahead in that way, we shall request it of the Blessed One." The monks then reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Molasses may be eaten at any time. Do not have any doubt about this." After the Blessed One had declared that molasses might be eaten at any time, the monks ate. Then, tormented by thirst from the weariness of the road, the Blessed One declared, "Drink molasses-water as a drink."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, "Venerable one, may one bless molasses-water and drink it after seven days?" "Upāli, that is not permitted." "Venerable one, for how long may one store it and drink it?" "Upāli, for as long as it remains clear and has not turned sour nor lost its natural quality."

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. The Blessed One declared that the restoration ceremony, a matter arising from the rules, the blessing of robes, the dedication of robes, and the invitation of a single person as a guest — these five things are accomplished by one's own intention alone.

If monks are invited as guests at a certain place, they may also be invited elsewhere in addition or even beyond that place. In the first case, one goes oneself; in the second, one sends another after setting aside one's own wish.

A time of famine came, and the monks fell into great want in their alms round. Faithful brahmins and householders invited the senior monks to a meal. A monk accepted the invitation of one householder and then sent others in his place. The Blessed One declared, "Therefore, when I permit it — in a time of famine, of suffering, and of scarce provisions — you may take as guests wherever you are invited, as many as are invited: regard it all as your own, and you yourself eat there too, and share it with the monks as well." The monks went to another brahmin's or householder's place, and those hosts said, "We did not invite you noble ones; it is this elder, So-and-so, whom we invited." The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Go yourselves, accept what is offered, eat two or three portions, and then say this: 'Householder, these monks are occupied with their food; please rejoice in giving it to them.' Likewise, whether two, three, or however many were invited, do this for all of them. Having done all that, whatever the last host invited — eat until you are satisfied. Have no doubt about this."

This is the eighth verse-section of the sūtra of the first chapter with a single door.

In brief:

Either butter or grain-butter —

Furthermore: what was set aside, the concealment of eye-medicine, Vaiśālī, and a suitable place.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. A certain monk was afflicted with a wind ailment. He went to a physician and said, "Good sir, I am afflicted with such an illness; please prescribe medicine for me." The physician said, "Noble one, if you drink this much butter, you will recover." The monk reported the matter to the other monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared,

"If the physician prescribes that butter be drunk, then drink it." The monk drank it and felt well during the day, but at night the wind ailment flared up again. The monks asked the physician, and he said, "Drink it at night as well." The monks informed the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Drink it at night as well." The monk accumulated a supply of it, consecrated it over seven days, and recovered.

The occasion for the next rule was likewise at Śrāvastī. Another monk fell ill and went to a physician. After the customary greeting he said, "Good sir, I am afflicted with such an illness; please show me the means of medicine." The physician prescribed, "Noble one, if you drink this much grain-butter, you will recover." The monk reported this to the other monks, and the monks informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "If the physician prescribes that grain-butter be drunk, then drink grain-butter." The monk drank it and recovered during the day, but at night the wind ailment flared up again. The monks asked the physician, and he prescribed, "Drink it at night as well." The monks informed the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Drink it at night as well." The monk accumulated grain-butter, consecrated it over seven days, drank it, and recovered.

The occasion for the next rule was likewise at Śrāvastī. Another monk fell ill. He also went to a physician, spoke the customary greeting, and said, "Good sir, I am afflicted with such an illness; please show me the means of medicine." The physician said, "If you drink this much butter or grain-butter, you will recover." The monk sought it among his few acquaintances but could not find any, and so he went again to the physician and said, "Good sir, even though you prescribed it, I could not find grain-butter anywhere — how could I find butter? Please show me something else, whatever is suitable." The physician said, "There is a monk named so-and-so who has combined grain-butter with another substance, and a monk named so-and-so who has combined butter; go to them. It is also possible that there may be some of what was mixed remaining." The monk went to them and asked, but they said, "The venerable one's seven days have passed and it has all been used up — there is none left." The monk reported the matter to the other monks in this way, and the monks informed the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "When one understands the situation of a sick monk, whether butter or grain-butter or anything else whatsoever that has been set aside, that too may be eaten on the basis of prior acceptance. Have no doubt about this." When the Blessed One declared, "Whether butter or grain-butter or anything else whatsoever that has been set aside, eat it on the basis of prior acceptance — have no doubt about this," there was no one to make the acceptance. The Blessed One then declared, "If there is no one to make the acceptance, even without formal acceptance, eat it nonetheless. When permission has been granted to a sick person and that person recovers, let it not be used further. If it is used, it becomes an offense." The occasion for this rule was at Śrāvastī.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared, 'Fill an eye-medicine container to the brim.' What may be put in it?" "Upāli, anything except that which is made from precious materials."

He asked again: "Venerable Blessed One, you have declared, 'In the city of Vaiśālī, abandon the ten improper things, and consecrate a proper dwelling.' Venerable One, if the lower part of a dwelling has been consecrated as proper, does the upper part also become consecrated as proper?" "Upāli, just as one says of the upper, so too one may say of the side."

This is the ninth verse of the first section of the Ekaśataka.

In summary:

Roots, trunks, leaves, and fruits,
all steeped in fermented liquor,
or washed without food, or of bad food — it is the same.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Kapilavastu in the Nyagrodhārāma. At that time King Śuddhodana offered five hundred Śākyas, one Śākya from each Śākya family, to serve the Blessed One, and the Blessed One ordained them all. Since their bodies had previously been sustained by liquor, once they were without it they fell ill.

The Blessed One, seeing this, said to the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, why have the Śākyas become so gaunt and thin?" Ānanda reported the matter in detail to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Then this is what I permit: roots, trunks, and the like that would become liquor — dry them and grind them into powder; wrap the powder in bundles inside white cloth; soak these bundles in a vessel of earthenware not yet full, which has the strength and potency of liquor; then draw the bundles out again, wash the hands, mix it with water that has no food value, and drink it in sufficient quantity as a group. If they are thirsty, whether in the morning or in the afternoon, drink it without hesitation. Do this, and they will be separated from their craving for liquor. Monks, if you have me your Teacher in mind, do not drink liquor; do not press it out; and do not touch it even with the tip of the finger."

The occasion for this was at Śrāvastī. When another monk fell ill and a physician instructed that he be given bad food, some monks knew what to do and some did not, and those who did not asked the venerable Upāli, who explained it to them in detail.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, when you said, 'Give bad food to the monk Svāti' — does that too require formal acceptance?" "Upāli, that too should be accepted by formal acceptance." "From whom should the acceptance be made?" "Upāli, from a lay devotee of faith."

This is the tenth verse of the first section of the Ekaśataka. The first section is complete.

In brief:

Vessels and robes both together, and Kosala and likewise Sarpa, proclamations and various robes, and companions too — for nuns these are taught last and gathered in summary.

In brief:

Vessels and furnishings, a temple,
many guests, cloth beaten out, cloth and parasols and likewise wood, charnel-ground dwellers — likewise abandoned.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the Garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At that time a certain householder constructed a temple fully equipped with all furnishings in a different village in the rocky hills, and offered it to the Saṅgha of the four quarters. In it there were many beds and utensils, but only a few monks were residing there. Among them some said, "The venerable ones are not using the beds, utensils, and furnishings — they will go to waste."

From among these, they said, "Let us keep as much as we need for our own use, and send the remainder to another temple." And they did so accordingly.

Now, after some time had passed, a wandering alms-seeker came to that temple, using the road as his customary practice. The monks had him rest there. Among them was an elder of that Saṅgha who, having rested from the weariness of the road in the temple, said to them, "Venerable ones, are there beds here?" They replied, "There are none." Then the monks told him in detail exactly how things stood. Without any bedding, he lay down on the bare ground just as it was, and rose early the next morning. There was a crooked key and a key, and taking them he went to the householder's home. The householder greeted him with words of welcome and, bringing out a mat, emerged to meet him. The alms-seeker sat in a posture of peaceful composure.

The alms-seeker then spoke at length of the merit-qualities of the seven objects that constitute the bases for making merit from one's wealth. The householder said, "Noble one, I have done all of that." The alms-seeker replied, "Householder, as for whether there are beds in your temple — last night I too lay down just as I was on the bare ground without any bedding, and came here this morning. And yet you say you have done all of this — what fault is there in that?" The householder said, "Noble one, I had provided many beds, utensils, and furnishings there; those noble ones must certainly have sent them off to another temple." The alms-seeker then asked, "Is the householder himself familiar with the temple's crooked key and its key?" The noble one graciously assented. He showed it to him, and then said, "Noble one, please proceed — I shall come as well."

The alms-seeker went collecting alms, and the householder followed behind and arrived there. He assembled the monks and asked, "Noble ones, I provided many beds, utensils, and furnishings here — where have they gone?" Then everything that had happened was reported to the householder in full. The householder declared the wrong openly and said, "You have not acted well. Given that it has already come to this, is it now possible to retrieve them or not?" They said, "It is not possible. Noble one, we did not offer them there — go and take them back." The monks then reported what had occurred to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Do not send things to another temple. Use them in accordance with the intended purpose. Otherwise, place a valuation on whatever someone has donated, as though it were a price."

The narrative occasion is at Śrāvastī. The group of six monks were going about using the road as their habitual practice, together with many travelers. Being afraid of the dust raised by the Dharma, they walked either ahead of the travelers or behind them. After a time, many of the travelers were attacked by bandits, and many people fled abandoning their goods. The bandits, unable to carry off all the wealth, selected the best things and went off with them. The group of six monks, having followed along behind the many travelers, reached that place and saw the great quantity of goods that had been cast aside. Then, delighted and overjoyed, Nandaka said, "Cloth beaten out — let us take the finds!" And so they selected garments from among those things and carried them away.

The many travelers, together with their escorts of archers and road-guards, turned back and recognized what the group of six had taken. And they thought, "What even the bandits discarded — those have been stolen by the shaven-headed ascetics."

They reproached the group of six, saying, "Those who bear the standard of the ascetics — noble ones — conduct themselves in such a perverse manner!" and denounced them to their faces. The group of six replied, "The many travelers were attacked by bandits — that was not our doing. We found cloth from a charnel ground." The travelers said, "These are not charnel-ground cloths." The six had no answer and fell silent.

When this had come to pass, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, to revile the many travelers is a grave matter. Therefore, monks, do not accept garments taken from travelers who have been attacked. If monks carry off garments from travelers who have been attacked, there will be a transgression along with a downfall. Furthermore, if those who have gained faith say to the noble ones, 'Please take whatever you like,' the monks fall into doubt and do not take. The Blessed One declared: 'If they say, "Take freely," take without hesitation.'"

The setting is at Rājagṛha. The group of six monks went to the charnel ground of the Cool Grove, and seeing the great many funerary requisites — parasols, wooden implements, and cloths — that had been left there, one of them said to Nandaka, "How wonderful, dear Nandaka! A find — charnel-ground cloth! Let us take it." Nandaka said, "Excellent! Well done! Take it." And they took the things and went.

Now a low-caste guardian of the charnel ground came and thought to himself, "There is not a scrap left in this charnel ground. Surely someone has robbed it. And whoever did so may well come back again, having marked the place." Thinking thus, he hid himself and stayed there day by day within a dense thicket.

After seven or eight days, the group of six said, "Nandaka, dear Nandaka — since we have not gone to the charnel ground in quite a while, let us go again today; there may well be a few things to find." And so they went. Just as they began picking up the cloths, parasols, and wooden implements that had been left there, the low-caste man who had been hiding in the dense thicket saw them, ran out, and said to them: "The noble ones cause our family — our brothers, kin, and friends — to carry out the king's decrees, and all on account of these charnel-ground cloths. So why do you take funerary requisites from a charnel ground that has an owner?" They replied, "Good sir, we took cloth from an unowned charnel ground." He said to the noble ones, "If they are truly charnel-ground cloths, well and good." They had no answer and fell silent.

When this had come to pass, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, to revile a low-caste person is a grave matter. Therefore, monks, do not take charnel-ground cloth from a charnel ground that has an owner. If monks take charnel-ground cloth from a charnel ground that has an owner, there will be a transgression along with a downfall. Furthermore, if the faithful say, 'Noble ones, please take freely,' the monks fall into doubt and do not take. The Blessed One declared: 'If they say, "Take freely," then take — do not be in doubt about that.'"

This is the first verse of the sūtra on the second gate of the Single One.

The Glorious Vinaya Compendium, the fortieth fascicle. In brief:

Cloth, wood-wool, and the like,
and likewise what is seized from a shrine —

The three Dharma robes of the Saṅgha must not be taken from individuals.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The group of six monks set out on the road together with many riders in carriages. When they had traveled halfway, the axle-pole of one carriage broke. The merchant replaced it with a new axle-pole and, abandoning the broken one, went on his way. Ānanda picked up the broken carriage axle-pole and placed it at a crossroads on the main road, saying: "Friend, dear Ānanda, we have placed this axle-pole here so that it may serve as the support of a deity named Īśvara." As word spread, other householders too built a platform there. Someone else made a prayer at it, saying: "If such-and-such a purpose of mine is accomplished, I will build a house here and hold a feast for one hundred and eight brahmins." And indeed, through dependent origination, that too came to pass. He fulfilled every vow he had made, and the place became a temple for a heterodox deity, and the temple-keeper consecrated it. Thereafter many merchant travelers entered that road and made many offerings of cloth, wool, and wood-wool there. When the group of six monks returned and saw that the temple had become greatly prosperous, they said: "Friend, dear Ānanda, the carriage axle-pole of Īśvara has received abundant and splendid cloth, wool, and wood-wool — let us take it." And just as they were about to take these things, the temple-keepers came forward and said to the noble ones: "This temple is ours — we maintain and care for it. Why are you taking and using the deity's cloth? Have you not abandoned taking what is not given?" The monks replied: "Poor man, how is this your temple? We placed a broken carriage axle-pole here as a support and left it." The temple-keeper cried out in protest. Then Ānanda, angered, kicked him once and knocked him down. Thereupon, puffed up with pride and arrogance, the temple-keeper said: "Whether it was you noble ones or someone else who did this, we live in dependence on this place and look to it for our livelihood — why then do you, noble ones, do what is not in accord with the Dharma of the noble ones?" The monks were abashed and said nothing. The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, to revile those who dwell in a temple of wrong view is unseemly. Therefore monks must not take cloth and the like from a temple that has an owner. If monks take cloth and the like from a temple that has an owner, there will be a transgression along with a downfall. If a keeper of a temple of wrong view, being of a different faith, says, 'Use freely,' —" and at that, the monks fell into doubt and did not take. The Blessed One declared: "If they say, 'Use freely,' then take — do not be in doubt about that."

The setting for this rule is Śrāvastī. The Blessed One had instructed that the sick be attended to. A certain monk fell ill, and his attendant said to the venerable Saṅgha: "Please give a little something." And that monk replied: "I have nothing whatsoever of my own — I offer my three Dharma robes." No one said anything. He presented his three Dharma robes, and the others sold them and divided the proceeds. When the monk recovered and rose from his sickness, he found himself destitute of his three Dharma robes. The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"Monks, do not take the three Dharma robes from a monk on behalf of the Saṅgha. If they are taken, a transgression is incurred. The Saṅgha likewise should not take them. Even if taken, do not divide them. If they are divided, a transgression is incurred." These are the two verses of the sūtra of the paired chapter.

In summary:

Both are permitted,
and permission is given in different forms.
A third share applies, and also to the novice,
the female probationer, and the nun.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Sixty monks were wandering on tour, and they arrived at a certain mountain village. A faithful householder living there invited them to his home for a meal, intending to offer each monk one bolt of cloth. While they were seated eating, sixty nuns who were also wandering on tour arrived at that same mountain village and began going from house to house for alms. Someone told them: "The monks are being hosted for a meal at this householder's house — go there." They went, and they too ate. Then the householder set out sixty bolts of cloth before the assembly in order of seniority. The monks did not know how to divide them. The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Both communities of the Saṅgha are entitled to it — divide the cloth between the two communities of the Saṅgha."

The setting for this rule is Śrāvastī. At Śrāvastī a certain householder built a temple, then hosted both communities of the Saṅgha for a meal, offered abundant gifts, and the monks divided them. Then the monks said tauntingly: "We need three Dharma robes, yet for you novices even an upper robe and a lower robe are sufficient — why should you share equally with us?" The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks and nuns are to receive an equal share. To male novices, female novices, and female probationers, give one third."

When the Blessed One had declared that male novices were to be given one third, a certain other male novice who was fully twenty years of age and wished to receive full ordination was told by a monk: "Venerable one, you are fully twenty years of age — why do you not take full ordination?" He replied: "With our gains fixed as they are by the Blessed One, even an upper robe and a lower robe do not arise — to say nothing of the three Dharma robes. How am I to take full ordination?" The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "To a male novice who wishes to receive full ordination and to a female probationer, give two thirds. Other male novices and female novices are to receive only a one-third share." This is the third verse of the sūtra of the paired chapter.

In summary:

In Kosala: sixty, one hundred fifty-three,
Śabdāgata, Śrīvṛddha,
the temple, and the stūpa likewise, the parasol and the painting — apply them similarly.
Invited as guests for a meal.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, while wandering on tour through Kosala, arrived at another mountain village. A householder living in that mountain village invited the Blessed One together with the community of śrāvaka monks to his home for a meal.

Sixty nuns who were wandering on tour through that region arrived at that same mountain village and took their meal there. The Blessed One, together with a retinue of one hundred and fifty-three, had received the meal offering, and that householder then placed one hundred and fifty-three lengths of cloth in order before the elders.

The monks, not knowing how to divide these, heard the nuns say to them: "What else is there to be done here? Previously, when the two communities of the Saṅgha were invited for a meal together, we received half of whatever gains were obtained. So now too, give us half of the gains." When the monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Wherever nuns are many and monks are few, divide the gains between both communities. Wherever monks are many and nuns are few, divide according to individual head-count."

The account of the origin is set in Śrāvastī. A householder invited the buddha and the community of monks to a meal. The community of monks went, but the Blessed One remained in the temple and accepted the meal brought to him there. The Blessed One remained in the temple and accepted the meal brought to him for five reasons. What are the five? He wished to teach the Dharma to the gods. He wished to look upon the sick. He wished to look upon the sleeping mats and seats. He wished to enter into inner meditative composure. And he wished to establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the śrāvakas. It was for this last reason — wishing to establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the śrāvakas — that the Blessed One remained in the temple and accepted the meal brought to him.

That householder, having deep faith in the elders, dispensed to the elders in order butter and dishes prepared from butter; to those of middle seniority he dispensed sesame oil and dishes prepared from sesame oil; and to the young he dispensed the dregs of sesame oil.

At that time, the venerable Śabdāgata accepted the meal offerings on behalf of the Blessed One. Having done so, he returned, and the Blessed One asked Śabdāgata: "Were the community of monks satisfied with the food at the meal?" He replied: "Venerable One, the elders were satisfied." The Blessed One said: "Śabdāgata, why do you look so downcast and diminished? Speak and tell me what you mean." He then spoke in verse:

Sesame oil makes one plump, and butter makes one radiant.
With only the thin dregs of sesame oil, where is there any radiance — what of strength?

The Blessed One declared: "Śabdāgata, tell me exactly what happened." Śabdāgata then reported the matter to the Blessed One in detail. The Blessed One asked Śabdāgata who among the senior resident monks had been present, and Śabdāgata replied: "Venerable One, the abbot was present." The Blessed One told Śabdāgata: "It is because the monk Śāriputra did not inspect the lower portions that they were eaten improperly." Because such a thing had occurred, the Blessed One assembled the community of monks, seated himself on a seat laid out before the community, and — in order to establish a rule of training in the Vinaya for the śrāvakas — declared: "I am laying down a rule of conduct for the practice equal to that of the senior resident monk of the community. Instruct him thus: when the senior resident monk of the community distributes food, let him distribute it evenly." He spoke this to each condiment as well. The Blessed One then declared: "Speak of it at the time when salt, or whichever item was distributed first, is being served — not at the time of all the others." If the senior resident monk of the community did not act in accordance with the rule of equal practice, he would incur a transgression together with whatever had already passed.

When the venerable Śāriputra heard that the Blessed One had rebuked him for the manner in which the food had been eaten, he thought to himself, "It is improper for me to remain here when the Teacher has rebuked me for the manner in which I ate," and he vomited up what he had eaten and expelled it.

The monks were filled with doubt, and presenting all their doubts to the Buddha, the Blessed One, they said, "Venerable Blessed One, please look upon the rebuke given by the Blessed One to the venerable Śāriputra for the manner in which he ate, and upon his subsequent vomiting."

The Blessed One declared, "Monks, this is not the only time. In the past as well I rebuked him for the manner in which he ate, and because of that rebuke he vomited. Monks, listen. Long ago, in another city there lived a brahmin who was widely learned and renowned as a teacher. While he was wandering and traveling about together with his brahmin's son, they came to a village at the foot of a cliff. There, beside a pond, the brahmin left the brahmin's son, saying, 'Stay here a while. I will go into the village to fetch flour and other provisions and return.' While the son was sitting there, a dog with mange came to the pond to drink. The brahmin's son said to it, 'Friend, please give me a drink of water as well.' The dog replied, 'Make a vessel out of leaves,' and the boy did so. The dog then took some flour from inside a small bag made from a dog's hide and gave it to him. When the boy kneaded it, he asked, 'What is this that has become so oily?' The dog replied, 'That is the property of the hide from which the bag was made,' and when the brahmin's son inquired more closely about what exactly the bag was made from, he did not understand.

When the brahmin returned he said to his son, 'Go and request some drinking water.' The son replied, 'I have already obtained drinking water.' The brahmin asked who had given it, and the boy said, 'A companion gave it to me — that companion being the mangy dog — and if he gave you flour, you would be defiled by it.' The brahmin then thoroughly rebuked him, and at that the boy vomited up what he had eaten.

Monks, do you not know? The brahmin who was learned and renowned as a teacher at that time was none other than myself as I am now. And the brahmin's son of that time is none other than the monk Śāriputra as he is now. At that time too I thoroughly rebuked him regarding his eating, and he vomited. Now here too I have thoroughly rebuked him regarding what he ate, and here again he has vomited."

The original occasion was in Rājagṛha. At that time, in the city of Rājagṛha, there was a Nirgrantha lay practitioner named Śrī-bhadra who was the husband of the sister of the householder Agnidatta. The faithful householder Agnidatta thought to himself, "I shall encourage Śrī-bhadra to make offerings and present gifts to the Saṅgha," and so he said to him, "Śrī-bhadra, make offerings and present gifts to the Saṅgha — it will become merit for you."

Śrī-bhadra replied, "I too shall make offerings and present gifts to the Saṅgha. You as well should make offerings and serve a meal to the Saṅgha of those who have gone forth, headed by Gaṅgā and the others."

Agnidatta thought to himself, "If I do not agree, Śrī-bhadra may well become an obstacle to making offerings to the Saṅgha. Since there is no fault in giving to all sentient beings, I shall give food to the Nirgrantha community and thereby ensure that he creates no obstacle to my making offerings and presenting gifts to the Saṅgha." Having agreed to provide the food, he accepted the offer.

Śrī-bhadra then thought, "If I first serve a meal to the Saṅgha of monks beginning with the buddhas, Agnidatta will afterward not give food to me. So let me first serve the meal to the Saṅgha of those who have gone forth, headed by Gaṅgā and the others, and afterward I shall give the food." And so he said to Agnidatta, "Agnidatta, you give the food first, and I will afterward give food to the śramaṇa Gautama and the Saṅgha of his hearers."

He agreed, and then the householder Agnidatta went to where the Gaṅgā ascetics were staying. He exchanged many words of delight and pleasure with them and then sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, the householder Agnidatta said this to Gaṅgā: "Gaṅgā, tomorrow please accept the invitation to take a meal at my home together with the many naked ascetics and the Saṅgha."

Gaṅgā thought, "This householder has, without fail, grown disenchanted with the śramaṇa Gautama and has come to have great faith in us — that is truly a fine gain for us. Gaṅgā, he has come to have faith in the community of our kind." And so he accepted.

Then the householder Agnidatta issued the invitation and departed.

That evening, Agnidatta prepared fine, pure food and provisions for the meal. Rising early the next morning, he set out seats, filled bowls with water and set them in place, and then sent word to the Gaṅgā ascetics that the meal was ready: "Come, Gaṅgā — the food is prepared; please know that the time has come."

They set out. Now Śrī-bhadra came to that very place and said, "Noble Gaṅgā, the śramaṇa Gautama has entered the householder's home, and just as he stepped over the threshold at the door, he smiled. Then the hearer named Ānanda drew his outer robe to one side, knelt his right knee on the ground, pressed his palms together, and asked: 'Venerable one, a Tathāgata and the hearers of a Tathāgata do not smile without cause or condition. For what cause and what condition, sir, did you smile?' The Tathāgata replied to Ānanda, 'That is so, Ānanda, that is so. Ānanda, a Tathāgata and the hearers of a Tathāgata do not smile without cause or condition. He smiled in accordance with a prophetic vision he holds.' Having said this, many people were filled with faith. You too, when you go to the householder Agnidatta's home, should do something of that kind — and indeed many people will be filled with faith." Gaṅgā agreed.

Then Gaṅgā, surrounded by many naked ascetics, went to the home of the householder Agnidatta. As he stepped over the threshold at the door of Agnidatta's house, he broke wind loudly. From within, one of the naked ascetics fell at his feet and asked, "Blessed one, O holy man, why is it that someone such as you does not smile without cause or condition?"

He replied: "Listen — on the bank of a river with a gentle current, a male monkey caught sight of a female monkey and, overcome with intense desire for her, thought to mount her and rushed toward her. He slipped and fell from the treetop, and he died on the spot. At that moment I thought to myself: 'This sentient being has come to great suffering on account of desire.' That is what came from my mouth."

The moment he said this aloud, the householder Agnidatta heard it and thought: "This Gaṅgā, son of Buzanmo, is like a needle-seller who returns to the home of a needle-maker to sell needles — I must find some way to humiliate him." All those who carried staffs were sitting comfortably, and the householder filled their bowls with clean, fine food and provisions, then poured soup on top and gave it to them. To Gaṅgā alone, he poured the soup into the base of the bowl, covered the top with cooked rice, and gave it to him.

While the naked ascetics were eating, Gaṅgā thought, "Surely he intends to make a show for me — he must have put tasty soup and fine food in mine." And just as he finished scooping up all the soup, he thought to himself:

He thought, "He must have forgotten out of distraction — I reminded him of it myself," and so he called out: "Householder, only cooked rice came into mine; there is no soup." The other then replied in verse:

One sees what is not to be seen, and fails to see what should be seen.
He sees the monkey on the Gaṅgā's bank, but not the soup inside the bowl.

When Gaṅgā looked at the other man's face, the man showed him that soup was sitting in the base of his bowl, and said: "Gaṅgā, you saw the monkey sitting on the bank of the river Gaṅgā, but you did not see the soup inside the bowl."

At that, the man thought to himself: "This fellow has shamed me. I shall now recite the virtues of generosity in such a way that it will be of benefit neither in this world nor in the next." And as Fireborn became aware that the man intended to shame him, and began to recite the virtues of generosity, Gaṅgā did not stay in his presence. Fireborn finished his meal and then recited the virtues of generosity in verse:

When the donor gives, it is the time of giving.
When other ascetics are eating, it is the time of eating.
When the remainder comes to others, it is the time of remainder.
Merit and non-virtue have no fixed time.

A gatekeeper who had been listening and heard this recitation of the virtues of generosity grew angry, thinking: "A sinner of this kind ate the food but could not even restrain himself. What virtues of generosity could there be from such a one? I shall play a trick on this son of a needle-maker's wife." He filled a jar with the water in which rice had been boiled and hurled it at the doorway. The lintel of the gate was raised up halfway, and as the naked ascetic came out, he slipped on the rice-water and his head struck the lintel, drawing blood.

The gatekeeper then saw this and spoke in verse:

The moment has come when the gate-bolt was drawn.
The moment has come when the rice-water was hurled.
This is indeed the moment for the head to be struck — there is no fixed time for virtue and non-virtue.

And with blood dripping from his head, Gaṅgā went to where the householder Śrībhadrā was and came before him. When Śrībhadrā saw him, he asked:

"Venerable Gaṅgā, what is wrong?" Gaṅgā replied: "Fireborn has harmed me like this." Then Śrībhadrā said: "Be glad you escaped with your life. But please do not do anything that would cause the ascetic Gautama with his community of monks to leave my home alive no more than this." Śrībhadrā thought to himself: "I shall go as an invitation to settle the score against his enemy. If the ascetic Gautama is omniscient, he will not accept even when invited. But if he is not omniscient, he will accept." With this thought, he went to where the Blessed One was.

He exchanged various pleasant words with the Blessed One and then sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the householder Śrībhadrā addressed the Blessed One thus: "O Gautama, please accept my invitation to come tomorrow to my home for the meal together with the community of monks." The Blessed One reflected: "One who will come to see truth from me acts in just such a way. If I do not accept, it will become an obstacle to truth — I must accept." And so he accepted the invitation to come.

Śrībhadrā thought: "This one is not omniscient. If he were omniscient, he would be right not to accept in this way. However I must now settle the score against his enemy by making sure he does not become omniscient at all." With that he went home, and at the gateway of his house he dug a great pit, filled it inside with smouldering charcoal of the tree called kādira where there were no flames, covered it on top with grass, and set soil over it to conceal it. He also laced food and drink with potent poison.

Then Śrībhadrā's sister Meṣkī asked her brother what he intended to do, and he replied: "I am going to kill my enemy." She asked: "Who is your enemy, elder brother?" He answered: "The ascetic Gautama." She then said: "If your enemy is the Blessed One, then consider well — whoever might be a friend of yours should think it wrong for you, a person of such standing, to perform an act unworthy of a noble one." Śrībhadrā then thought: "This one will come as an ally of Meṣkī, and out of faith in the ascetic Gautama she will let the secret out." With that, he put her inside a storage chest, fastened the lock, and left her there.

He called together Gaṃpa and all the other naked ascetics and said: "Come and watch me kill my enemy! For the sake of killing the ascetic Gautama I have dug a great pit at the gateway, filled it inside with smouldering charcoal of kādira wood, and set it there. And into the food and drink I have blended a fierce and potent poison." Those men were overjoyed. They went quickly and in great number, climbed up and stationed themselves on top of the upper story, thinking: "Today we are well placed. Let us watch how the ascetic Gautama burns in the fire pit, how he writhes under the fierce poison, and how he tumbles and falls to the ground."

Śrībhadrā had a seat laid out and, summoning the Blessed One to come, announced the hour: "Gautama, the food is prepared and ready. Come, Gautama — please be mindful that the time has arrived."

Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and tell the monks this: let no monk go ahead to Śrībhadrā's house before the Tathāgata arrives." The venerable Ānanda, having heard this from the Blessed One, conveyed it to the monks: "The Blessed One has commanded: let no monk go ahead to Śrībhadrā's house before the Tathāgata arrives." Thus he relayed the instruction.

Then the Blessed One, in the early morning hour, wrapped his waist-cloth, took up his alms bowl and outer robe, and set out, surrounded by many monks with the monastic Saṅgha before him, toward the place where Śrībhadrā's house stood.

Now the servant-deities dwelling in the Ambavana grove were afflicted and stricken with distress and sorrow of mind. They hastened quickly and in great number to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there and touching their heads to his feet, they spoke these words of compassion: "Blessed One, it is not fitting that you should go to Śrībhadrā's house." The Blessed One replied: "Deity, what harm is there?" They said: "Blessed One, Śrībhadrā has made preparations to do the Blessed One harm." The Blessed One said: "Deity, the Tathāgata is free from all harm — what harm could he possibly do to me?" The servant-deities replied: "Blessed One, for the sake of killing the Blessed One he has filled a great pit with smouldering charcoal of kādira wood." The Blessed One said: "Deity, even the fire of attachment, the fire of aversion, and the fire of delusion are extinguished when doused with the water of gnosis — what then can that lesser fire do? Do not be troubled; be at ease." The servant-deities said: "That is not all — others, too, have taken measures to kill the Blessed One: they have blended into the food and drink a fierce, unbearable poison." The Blessed One replied: "Deity, through gnosis as the antidote, the poison of attachment, the poison of aversion, and the poison of delusion have already been utterly expelled, thoroughly purged.

What then can the least of all poisons do once those have been utterly expelled? Go back and attend diligently to your own work."

Then the Blessed One arrived in Rājagṛha, and the deities who dwelt in Rājagṛha reported to him as before, and the Blessed One instructed those deities as he had the earlier ones and sent them back. Then he arrived at the door of the house of Śrīgupta, and the household deities of Śrīgupta's home reported to him as before, and the Blessed One likewise instructed those deities as he had the earlier ones and sent them back.

Now Śrīgupta's wife thought to herself: "The Blessed One has now passed through the first door — at any moment he will be stepping over the pit. At any moment he will fall in from above the pit whose mouth is covered over with grass — at any moment the Blessed One will tumble into the fire, and smoke will billow up, tears will flow, smoke will rise from the robes burned by the flames." With such dismay she admitted him inside the house, and as he entered, grief arose in her; her eyes filled with tears, her face crumpled and twisted, and she sat weeping, overcome with anguish, brooding on the unwholesome act.

Then the Blessed One, his mind fully engaged in bringing benefit to all sentient beings, came to the middle of the door and stepped down over the fire-pit. The moment his feet touched the surface of the fire-pit, the whole of it was transformed into a lotus pond — covered with blue lotuses, red lotuses, white night-blooming lotuses, and white day-blooming lotuses — and adorned with water-birds such as geese, kārāṇḍa ducks, ospreys, and the like, all uttering varied calls, just like the divine lake Mandāka of the gods. And the deities dwelling in the sky showered down from above divine night-blooming lotuses and divine lotuses of many colors.

Then the Blessed One stepped across the lotus hearts and arrived at Śrīgupta's house. The householder Śrīgupta stared with wide, wonder-filled eyes and said: "Noble Gaṅgopa, look at the miraculous powers and marvels of the Blessed One!" Gaṅgopa turned his face into a scowl and replied: "Householder, is your faith in the ascetic Gautama, or in these illusions of his?" Śrīgupta answered: "Noble Gaṅgopa, if one could accomplish such things as these, then you too, since you are omniscient, should produce and display such illusions. By means like these, accomplish the same for me and my friends and brothers." Gaṅgopa, realizing his aim had not been achieved and thinking he would leave, spat at Śrīgupta, leapt down from the roof of the house, and — terrified and ashamed — was unable to come face to face with the Blessed One. He departed with slow, shuffling steps, eyes cast down at the ground, slipping out of Śrīgupta's house and fleeing away.

Then the householder Śrīgupta went to where his sister, the sister of the householder Agniprabhā, was staying, and opening the door said: "Bhadra, come here. Prostrate at the feet of the Tathāgata." She thought to herself: "This man is trying to deceive me," and with a sorrowful voice said slowly: "If I am to be killed, betrayed by an evil companion, what refuge is there left for me?" He replied: "Bhadra, you speak truly, and there is no deception — it was not possible to harm the Blessed One. Since it was not possible to kill the Blessed One, and since now you cannot come before him, come, let him take you to the Blessed One." Then Śrīgupta's wife, filled with joy and with a gladdened mind, led Śrīgupta and went to where the Blessed One was. Arriving there, she prostrated with her head at the feet of the Blessed One and addressed him with these words: "Venerable one, please forgive us."

She said: "This householder was deceived by an evil companion, and on that account performed these unwholesome acts toward the Blessed One." At that, the Blessed One extended his hand — which resembled the trunk of a great elephant — and said: "Householder, come, and be forgiven. The Tathāgata makes no distinction between friend and foe. The Tathāgata, the arhat, the perfectly and fully awakened buddha makes no distinction between friend and foe. He is like sandalwood and the cassia tree alike."

Then, upon hearing this, the householder Śrīgupta gave rise to great joy toward the Tathāgata, and with a mind full of devotion addressed the Blessed One: "Please accept a little from me — I have now prepared a meal." The Blessed One replied: "Householder, the proper way to invite the Tathāgata is to invite him in order, according to seniority. Say, 'Gautama, the meal is also ready; Gautama, please know it is time.' Why then do you speak otherwise?" Śrīgupta answered: "Venerable one, my mind, having looked upon an evil companion, went astray into three wrong views — through the sins of one who tends toward all that is hateful and pleasant, and having blocked both kinds of beings who go about endearing themselves to all, I undertook to harm the Blessed One."

The Blessed One then declared: "Householder, since the Tathāgata is free from all harm, how could he be harmed by me?" Śrīgupta said: "Venerable one, I mixed potent poison into the food and drink, and had it prepared first for the men." The Blessed One replied: "Householder, one who has thoroughly expelled and cast off the poison of attachment, the poison of aversion, and the poison of delusion — what could such a poor poison as this do? Bring what you have prepared and come."

Then the Blessed One had a seat laid out before the community of monks and took his place there. Seated, he addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and tell the monks this: 'Assemble in order of seniority. Let no one eat food until the signal is given.'" The venerable Ānanda then conveyed the Blessed One's instruction to the monks: "The venerable ones are commanded by the Blessed One: 'Assemble in order of seniority, and let no one eat food until the signal is given.'"

Then that community of monks, settling themselves comfortably, were served food and drink, and with miraculous power, wonder-working, and display of spiritual marvels, gave the signal: "Assemble at Śrīgupta's home in order of seniority." At that moment the food and drink became free of poison.

All the while Śrīgupta, still anxious, was serving and attending to the food and drink, watching as those who came first — the senior monks — arrived before the younger ones, and he thought to himself: "Just now the senior monks might fall stricken by the potent poison." Then the younger monks came after the elders, and he thought likewise. But the thought arose in him: "The Blessed One has abandoned the poisons of attachment, aversion, and delusion — this is not so for all hearers." Yet when all the monks ate the meal, not even one was harmed. Even the young attendants who ate the remainders were not harmed.

Then the householder Śrīgupta gave rise to faith from without and within. He and his wife, having served the Blessed One the meal, knowing that the bowl had been lifted and set aside, took a low seat and sat before the Blessed One to hear the Dharma. Then the Blessed One, perceiving the intention, the disposition, the character, and the natural dispositions of beings, he then taught the Dharma in such a way that they would thoroughly realize the Four Noble Truths of the noble ones (āryasatya). When the householder Śrīgupta heard this teaching, the twenty mountain-peaks of the view of the transitory collection were shattered by the vajra of gnosis, and he actualized the fruit of stream-entry. Having seen the truth, he three times joyfully exclaimed these words:

"Venerable Blessed One, such benefit as this has never been done for me by my father, nor by my mother, nor by loved ones, friends, relatives, and retinue, nor by a king, nor by the gods, nor by people of former times, nor by renunciants and brahmins. The Blessed One has dried up for me the ocean of tears and blood, delivered me from the mountain of bones, cut off the door to the lower realms, opened the door to higher states of existence, and established me in the abode of gods and humans."

Then he spoke again in verse:

The many faults, the paths that lead to lower realms — by your power all of these have been cut through.
You of merit, you have opened the door to higher birth.
The path to passing beyond sorrow I too have now attained.

Faultless, gained through relying upon you, my eyes are pure, utterly purified.
I have reached the four abodes that gladden the noble ones, and crossed to the far shore of the ocean of suffering.

Honored by ordinary beings, asuras, gods, and humans — it is exceedingly rare, in even a thousand existences, to meet you.
Free from birth, aging, and death:
O Sage, today, having seen you, I bear the fruit.

"Venerable one, I have passed beyond, I have truly passed beyond! Now I take refuge in the Blessed One, in the Dharma, and in the Saṅgha of monks. From this day forth, for as long as the sky endures, I take refuge with my life at stake, and with manifest faith. Please accept me as a layman. Venerable one, from this day forth I close the door to the naked tīrthikas, to naked women of that sect, and to the hearers of the naked ones; and I open the door to the hearers of the Blessed One, to monks, to nuns, to male lay practitioners, and to female lay practitioners."

Then the Blessed One instructed the householder Śrīgupta thoroughly with a discourse on the Dharma, thoroughly trained him, thoroughly praised him, and filled him with great joy. Then the Blessed One rose from his seat and departed. The Blessed One then proceeded to the assembly hall, spread out a seat in front of the community of monks, and sat down. Seated there, the Blessed One addressed the monks:

"Monks, at the householder Śrīgupta's house, where such harm was intended, had the Tathāgata not known of it, a great many monks would have died from the poison without escape. That householder, through his evil conduct, would have fallen into the avīci hell. Therefore a rule of conduct (prātimokṣa) is hereby established concerning the elder monk of the Saṅgha's residence. When the elder monk of the Saṅgha is seated in order of seniority and food is brought and offered, not even a pinch of salt should be taken in advance as before. If, without calling out 'Come, be served in order of seniority,' it is taken, one incurs a transgression."

The ground for this ruling is as follows: at Śrāvastī, at that time, a certain householder had undertaken the construction of a great assembly hall, but after he had built about half of it, he passed away. His son then became head of the household. The monks went to him and said: "Good man, your father undertook the construction of an assembly hall, and he completed about half of it before he passed away. It is fitting for you to bring it to completion." When they said this,

He had little faith, and because the assembly hall was large, he said: "Who could complete such a structure? If the Blessed One permits it, I will demolish that large one and build a smaller one instead." When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "If it cannot be completed as it stands, then demolish it and build a smaller one. Have no doubt about this."

The ground for the next ruling is as follows: at Śrāvastī, another householder undertook the construction of a small assembly hall, but after he had built about half of it, he passed away. His son then became head of the household. The monks said to him: "Good man, your father began building an assembly hall and completed about half of it before he passed away. It is fitting for you to bring it to completion." He was a person of great faith, and he replied: "Noble ones, I would gladly build a large one. If the Blessed One permits it, I will demolish what was built before and build a large one instead." When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "If it can be done, permission is granted to demolish the smaller one and build a larger one. Have no doubt about this."

Likewise, another householder undertook the construction of a great stūpa, but after he had built about half of it, he passed away. His son then became head of the household. The monks said to him: "Good man, your father began building a stūpa and had it about half completed. It is fitting for you to bring it to completion." He was a person of little faith, and he said: "Noble one, if at the present time it cannot be completed by those who follow the Dharma, and if the Blessed One permits it, I will demolish what is there and build a smaller one." When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Monks, an assembly hall may be converted from a larger to a smaller one or enlarged — either is permissible. But a stūpa must not be reduced from a larger to a smaller one. If it is made smaller, one incurs a transgression involving the deceased."

Yet another householder undertook the construction of a small stūpa, but after he had built about half of it, he passed away. His son then became head of the household. The monks said to him: "Good man, your father began constructing a stūpa and had it about half completed, and he passed away before finishing it. Now it is fitting for you to bring it to completion." He was a person of great faith, and he said: "I am a man of great faith. If the Blessed One permits it, I will make it larger." When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "If the smaller one can be demolished and a larger one built in its place, permission is granted to do so. Have no doubt about this."

The same ruling applies to old and deteriorating stūpa canopies. The Blessed One issued a ruling, and when someone took down a canopy but then passed away before restoring it, the Blessed One declared: "Do not take down what is earlier until the later one is in hand."

Similarly, clay buddha images that had grown old — the monks, uncertain what to do, left them untouched. The Blessed One declared: "Make one the same size or larger. Do not make it smaller."

In the same way, when painted murals had become worn — the monks, uncertain what to do, left them unpainted. The Blessed One declared: "If you paint, paint them again following the same design."

In the same way, when scriptural volumes of the Buddha's word had become worn — the monks, uncertain, left them uncopied. The Blessed One declared:

"If you copy it, copy the Buddha's word again. Do not be uncertain about it."

This is the fourth verse of the sūtra of the Second Door of the Single Section.

The noble Vinaya. The forty-first bundle.

In brief:

The admission of newcomers, and
The five aspects of the retinue,
Offerings, vessels, and music,
And the proclamation of lay practitioners.

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. The Blessed One declared: "Arrange the image of the Buddha residing in the shade of the jambu tree together with a great reliquary shrine befitting the occasion, and carry it in honor through the city." The monks, not knowing who should carry it, were uncertain. The Blessed One declared: "Let the young monks carry it." When the Blessed One had said that the young monks should carry it, the procession became disorderly and unseemly. The Blessed One then declared: "Let the elder monks give guidance and oversight, and let others carry it." When the monks went without music, a lay householder named Anāthapiṇḍada said: "If the Blessed One permits it, when the image is being taken in procession I will arrange music." The Blessed One declared: "Householder, do so — make the arrangements." Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One: "Reverend sir, is it permissible for monks to perform music?" The Blessed One replied: "Upāli, it is not permissible. At the time of offerings, announce at the door: 'Come and make offerings to the Teacher of the beautiful countenance.'"

This is the fifth verse of the sūtra of the Second Door of the Single Section.

In brief:

Making proclamations, covering vessels,
Providing separate conveyances,
Distributing the vessels in faith —
These are expressed as the verses of the sūtra.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was residing at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One declared: "Organize a great seasonal festival, and arrange for the image of the Buddha residing in the shade of the jambu tree to be carried in grand procession through the city." The monks went without informing the brahmins and householders. Those people said: "Oh, noble ones! If you had informed us in advance, we would have prepared our offerings." The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Seven or eight days before the time, announce in the city, in the marketplace, in the bazaars, on the roads, and at crossroads that a great seasonal festival will be held on such a day." They announced it, calling out: "Festival! Festival!" The Blessed One declared:

"When the day has come, announce: 'On this very day, in so many days' time, the festival will be held.'" Even when that was done, not everyone throughout the world heard it. The Blessed One declared: "Write it on a board, place it on the back of a woolen ox, and proclaim it in the marketplaces, bazaars, on the roads, and at crossroads." On the day of the Blessed One's great seasonal festival, the Blessed One declared: "Let the elder monks give oversight, and let the elders guard the offerings while the younger monks carry them."

When the offerings were carried off and scattered here and there, and when they were stolen by those who took what was not given, the Blessed One declared: "Appoint a monk to watch over the Saṅgha's vessels and supplies." The appointment is to be made as follows. A monk is to be appointed who, after the sitting mat is spread and the wooden sounding board struck, will answer questions that are asked. Then, when the monks of the Saṅgha have assembled and are seated, first ask his consent: "You, whose name is such-and-such — do you consent to being appointed as the Saṅgha's keeper of vessels?" If he consents, he should say, "I consent." After that, let one monk make the motion and perform the formal act. "Hearken, venerable members of the Saṅgha. If this one, named such-and-such, consents to serve the Saṅgha as keeper of vessels, and if the occasion is fitting and the Saṅgha approves, let the Saṅgha grant it — and let this one, named such-and-such, be appointed as keeper of vessels. This one, named such-and-such, serves the Saṅgha as keeper of vessels. This is the motion." The formal act is likewise to be performed thus: "Hearken, venerable members of the Saṅgha. This one, named such-and-such, consents to serve the Saṅgha as keeper of vessels. The Saṅgha appoints this one, named such-and-such, as keeper of vessels. Of those of you who are the venerable ones, whoever consents to the appointment of this one, named such-and-such, as keeper of vessels, let them remain silent. Whoever does not consent, let them speak. The Saṅgha has appointed this one, named such-and-such, as keeper of vessels. The Saṅgha has consented and approved; therefore none spoke, and so it is accepted."

After that, when many offerings had come in, the nuns said to the noble monks: "Noble ones, grant us a share of these offerings" — yet the monks did not give any. The following day, the nuns set out a separate cart, and when the brahmins and householders asked the noble nuns, "Is this the same cart or a different one?" — the nuns too received many offerings. When the monks saw that the nuns had grown satisfied with offerings and honors, they said: "Noble ones, you did not give us a share of the offerings — yet we too have now received many offerings by setting out a separate cart." When the monks then reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One deliberated: "What is blameworthy here is that at the time of the seasonal festival the nuns set out a cart apart from the monks' cart. Therefore, bearing in mind that monks and nuns should not set out their carts separately," the Blessed One declared: "Monks, the nun has acted improperly. Therefore a nun must not set out a cart separately at the time of the seasonal festival. If nuns set out a cart separately at the time of the seasonal festival, it constitutes a schism and will become a grave proximate offense."

Now those vessels remained as they were, and the monks, not knowing what to do with them, reported it to the Blessed One, who said: "Divide them." And when they did not know how to divide them, the Blessed One declared: "Appoint a monk to divide the vessels." The appointment is to be made as follows. After the sitting mat is spread and the wooden sounding board struck, a monk who will answer questions is to be appointed. Then, when all the Saṅgha has assembled and is seated, first ask his consent: "Do you consent to being appointed as the Saṅgha's divider of vessels?" If he says "I consent," then after that let one monk make the motion and perform the formal act. "Hearken, venerable monks. If this one, named such-and-such, consents to serve the Saṅgha as divider of vessels, and if the occasion is fitting and the Saṅgha approves —

— the Saṅgha approves and the Saṅgha appoints this one, named such-and-such, as divider of vessels. This one, named such-and-such, is hereby appointed by the Saṅgha as divider of vessels. This is the motion. And the formal act is to be performed as follows. Hearken, venerable monks. This one, named such-and-such, consents to divide vessels and is hereby appointed by the Saṅgha as divider of vessels. Let the venerable ones who consent to the Saṅgha's appointing this one, named such-and-such, as divider of vessels remain silent. Let those who do not consent speak. The Saṅgha has appointed this one, named such-and-such, as divider of vessels. Since the Saṅgha consents and approves, it remains silent, and so this is held to be the case."

This is the sixth verse of the sūtra of the Two-Part Vinaya.

The middle sūtra:

When things are divided and shares given,
if at some point one exceeds the rest, if at some point of two one takes,

it is not fitting to claim it as one's own.

The Blessed One, the buddha Śākyamuni, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove (Jetavana) in Śrāvastī, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. On an occasion when a great festival took place, many gains were received, and the monks did not know how to proceed. The Blessed One declared: "A monk in charge of storing robes shall strike the wooden sounding board, appoint a monk to answer questions, and then sell the goods in the presence of the fully assembled Saṅgha." When those monks did not know how to set a price, the Blessed One declared: "Let the senior monk of the Saṅgha set it." When that same item was caused to be bought by himself, the Blessed One declared: "Do not cause that same monk to buy it himself; do not make the buyer the same person who set the price." When the senior monk of the Saṅgha set a high price and no one bought it, the Blessed One declared: "Do not set the price too high." Then it was set very low. The Blessed One declared: "Do not set it too low either; let it be obtained at an appropriate price. Whoever first raised the price should be the one permitted to buy. If, after being told he may buy it, the item is not sold to him, and then no one else raises the price, sell it to him first." When the Group of Six set a high price and then raised it higher, saying, "We raised the price for the sake of the Saṅgha," the Blessed One declared: "The one who is buying should raise the price. If another raises it, a transgression is incurred." The Group of Six raised the price, bought the item, washed it, and distributed it. The price was returned to the seller. The Blessed One declared: "Do not give it back to the seller until the price has been received. If distribution is made before the price is paid, a transgression is incurred."

This is the seventh verse of the sūtra of the Two-Part Vinaya.

In summary:

When a temple is in disrepair or heavy, let it be made secluded.

When at some point danger arises and the Saṅgha has been alerted for an instant —

The Blessed One was dwelling in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, let dwelling rooms be built with five stories, bathrooms with seven stories, and gatehouse buildings also with seven stories." The dwelling rooms of nuns are to be three stories. Their bathrooms are to be five stories. Their gatehouses are also to be five stories. The weight of the upper stories was causing the walls to crumble. When this happened, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Remove the top story." But it continued to crumble, and the Blessed One declared: "In the same way, remove stories down from the second to the fourth, leaving only the ground floor." The occasion for this ruling arose in Śrāvastī, where dangers had arisen for the monks and they had left the temple empty.

The Saṅgha's bedding had been abandoned and left behind when they fled, and thieves — those who take what is not given — stole it. Because it was stolen, the monks were left destitute. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not abandon the Saṅgha's bedding and go off. Wherever you go, take it with you." When the Blessed One declared that it should be taken wherever one goes, one monk took his portion of the bedding and fled together with the other monks. That evening, another monk said, "Among this Saṅgha, I am the senior one — it is right that I should have authority according to seniority," and so the bedding was given to him. Having received it, when dawn came he said, "Take this portion away." The other replied, "At the time when the bedding was shared out and you were the elder, you said I should take it — but now, when it is a burden, are you giving it to me, or should you carry it yourself?" The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "The one who carried it away when there was danger is the rightful holder of it." When the danger had passed, however, the bedding was not returned to the Blessed One with the declaration "The Blessed One has given permission." The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, for the present I have given the Saṅgha's bedding as a concession — it is not given permanently. Once the danger has passed, return it and distribute it according to seniority."

This is the eighth verse-summary of the sūtra of the two-leaved gate.

In summary:

When a great feast is held in the Jeta Grove, let the great drum summon the assembly.
When they are arranged in separate rows, appoint a monk as table-server.

The Blessed One, the awakened one, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove at the pleasure garden of Anāthapiṇḍada in Śrāvastī. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada addressed the Blessed One, saying: "Blessed One, if the Blessed One permits, I will hold a great feast." The Blessed One declared: "Householder, I permit it — proceed." A great feast was held in the Jeta Grove, but the monks had not assembled. The Blessed One then declared: "When a great feast is being held, summon the monks with a wooden sounding board, a drum, and a conch. When the monks are notified that the time has come and that it falls at the hour of noon, they will know to come promptly." When the monks were struck by the sound of the drum and conch, they assembled in scattered disorder. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Appoint a monk as table-server to ensure that they are arranged in order of seniority." When they were arranged in order of seniority, the food was distributed from the most senior down, but by the time it reached the youngest, the noon hour had already passed, and the monks were obstructed from taking their meal. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Form a line of five hundred and place the food before those of highest seniority." When the monks did so, the householder found that the distribution of food was too slow. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Appoint monks as supervisors of the distribution." But those too became an obstruction to the meal. The Blessed One then declared: "Let those supervisors be given food first, and afterwards let them perform their table-serving duty."

This is the ninth verse-summary of the sūtra of the second two-leaved gate.

In summary:

The nuns had become many,
and the first monk was content with them.
One, two, and many — and the young children grew exceedingly delighted.

The Blessed One was dwelling in the Jeta Grove (Jetavana), in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. In a certain other village of Rājagṛha, a householder was residing there, and he invited a large number of nuns for a meal. After some time, a single monk was wandering about traveling together with many guests, and when he arrived in that village of Rājagṛha and entered upon alms-round, someone there said to him: "Noble one, in this house the nuns have been invited and their meal is being served — please go there." He then went there and found the senior nun of the nuns' community, Gahaladā, sitting pleasantly. She said to him: "Noble one, if you are able to speak in praise of generosity, then please take your seat in order of seniority. But if you are not able, then go off to one side and partake of the meal." He was embarrassed by this, and he thought: "If I sit here until I have spoken in praise of generosity, the many guests too will have gone, so I will eat my meal off to one side and leave." Thinking this, he ate his meal off to one side and departed. He then went on in due course to Śrāvastī. The monks asked him: "Venerable one, did you arrive comfortably? Was your journey comfortable?" He replied: "How could it have been comfortable? The nuns acted with contempt." They asked: "How did this happen?" and he related the whole matter in detail to the monks. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Wherever there is a single monk and a single nun in residence, that monk shall receive the seat first, the water first, and the food first. If a single monk arrives where there are two or three nuns, or more than three, that single monk shall receive the seat first, the water first, and the food first. Even where there are only nuns, always set aside the first seat at the head of the row, and have it prepared. If a male novice arrives, he too shall sit there and eat. If he is unable to do so, the nun shall speak in praise of generosity. If a nun does not act accordingly, there shall be an offense with expiation."

The occasion for this is in Śrāvastī. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada arranged a great seasonal festival in the Jeta Grove and offered his wife and son to the Saṅgha as servants. The monks, not knowing what to do, reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Ask the householder." When asked, the father said: "Noble ones, have them appraised, and I will pay the ransom." The group of six monks thereupon entered into a rivalry with one another and began to bid against each other. Among them, the wife who had a young child prostrated at the feet of the householder Anāthapiṇḍada and said: "Master, do not send me away because of my small child." The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, among sentient beings there is none more faint-hearted than a woman — do not cause her to be afraid. Therefore monks must not assign a price to a woman. If one does so, there shall be an offense with expiation. Let each one enjoy the gift as the donor is pleased and delighted to give it."

This is the tenth verse-summary of the individual sūtra. It is complete.

In summary:

Household goods packed away in stupidity, and whose cow and whose — in that way a child is not to be taken away.

Anāthapiṇḍada likewise:

the razor, the attendants, and water — these are taught together.

In brief:

Household goods and permissions, and the questions of Upāli — how blessings are to be conferred:
the verses on focusing the mind are briefly taught.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. While monks were traveling on tour, some fell ill. Having no medicine, they tried to sell their alms bowls, yet no householder would buy them, and time passed without relief. The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore I permit you to sew robes from cloth scraps." When the Blessed One had said "Sew robes from cloth scraps," the monks washed the scraps, turned them over, and stitched them together, yet the resulting cloth was of little value. The Blessed One then declared: "Do not wash them, do not turn them over. Stitch them together straightway, as soon as the needle is threaded."

The venerable Upāli then put a question to the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Reverend Blessed One, when you have declared that monks are to consecrate the thirteen requisites, how is that consecration to be done?" The Blessed One replied: "Upāli, it is to be consecrated separately. This robe is consecrated as an inner garment and is to be used for the purpose for which it is meant." In the same way, the upper covering, the bathcloth, the lower robe, the lining of the lower robe, the upper garment, the lining of the upper garment, the face cloth, the body-wiping cloth, the woolen cloth, the hair-wrap, the blanket, and the large cloth — this cloth is consecrated as a requisite cloth, being needed for the sick, and it is consecrated for the purpose of maintaining the life of purity equally with oneself.

The venerable Upāli again put a question to the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Reverend Blessed One, when you have declared that monks should consecrate the thirteen requisites, what is to be done with robes that are in excess of these?" The Blessed One declared: "Upāli, those are to be dedicated and kept for one's teacher, one's preceptor, and one's intimates, and the dedication is to be done in the following way. Sitting before a single monk, one should say these words: 'Please attend, venerable one. I, so-and-so by name, hereby specially dedicate this robe. Since it is appropriate to dedicate it, I dedicate it to the preceptor. With the preceptor's consent, it is to be kept.' In the same way, this should be said two and three times."

This is the first verse-summary of the individual sūtra with three doors.

In summary:

Knowing the packed goods and the rest, and persons of the twelve kinds — likewise the distinctions among them, and what is proper: this is the third.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli put a question to the Blessed One: "Reverend one, how many kinds of persons cannot be corrected in turn?" The Blessed One declared: "Upāli, there are twelve: one who is deluded, one who is stupid, one who is unclear, one who is unskilled, one who is shameless, one who bears grudges, one who dwells outside the boundary, one who has been expelled, one who is unsteady of word, one who transgresses the code of conduct, one who does not abide in what is proper, and one to whom the training has been given." Upāli then asked again: "Reverend one, from what point does one count as childlike, and up to what point as one to whom the training has been given?" The Blessed One replied: "Upāli, one who conceives wrong thoughts and thinks wrong thoughts, who speaks wrongly and speaks wrongly, who is corrected only with difficulty when corrected — Upāli, that is the present-day understanding. As for how long one counts as stupid: one who does not grasp the sūtras, does not grasp the Vinaya, does not grasp the Abhidharma — to that extent, Upāli, one is stupid. As for how long one counts as unclear: Upāli, one who grasps the sūtras, grasps the Vinaya, grasps the Abhidharma, yet does not know the meaning that is to be brought into direct understanding from the sūtras, the Vinaya, and the Dharma — to that extent, Upāli, one is unclear. As for how long one counts as unskilled: Upāli, one who grasps the sūtras, the Vinaya, and the Abhidharma, and knows their meaning as well, yet is unable to make others understand — to that extent, Upāli, one is unskilled. That much, Upāli, constitutes being unskilled.

"Venerable One, to what extent is one counted as shameless?"

"Upāli, one who has incurred a transgression in any one of the four defeats — that one, Upāli, has become shameless. To that extent, Upāli, one is shameless."

"Venerable One, to what extent is one counted as resentful?"

"Upāli, one who is wrathful, contentious, and who moreover becomes a doorway to quarrels in whatever circumstances — to that extent, Upāli, one is resentful."

"Venerable One, to what extent is one counted as dwelling beyond the boundary?"

"That is one, Upāli, who dwells outside the monk's boundary. To that extent, Upāli, one is counted as dwelling outside the boundary."

"Venerable One, to what extent is one counted as expelled?"

"Upāli, one who has been expelled by the Saṅgha through the act of formal request followed by three proclamations — to that extent, Upāli, one is said to have been expelled."

"Venerable One, to what extent is one counted as unreliable in speech?"

"Upāli, one who is unreliable in speech, who speaks falsehood, who engages in divisive talk, who speaks harshly, and who speaks idle chatter — to that extent, Upāli, one is counted as unreliable in speech."

"Venerable One, to what extent is one counted as having departed from proper conduct?"

"Upāli, that is one who has risen and departed from the midst of the Saṅgha. To that extent, Upāli, one is counted as having departed from proper conduct."

"Venerable One, what does it mean to be said not to abide by proper standards?"

"Upāli, that is one who practices what should not be practiced, and who does not train in the training of a monk. To that extent, Upāli, one is said not to abide by proper standards."

"Venerable One, what does it mean to be said that training has been granted?"

"Upāli, that is when the Saṅgha, through a formal request followed by three proclamations, has granted training to a monk for the duration of his life. Such, Upāli, is what is called granting training."

Then Upāli asked further: "Venerable One, to what extent does a person earnestly attempt to turn back?"

The Blessed One declared: "Upāli, there are three aspects: abiding by proper standards, being reliable in speech, and not having departed from proper conduct."

This is the second verse of the sūtra of the third section of the Ekamsaka.

In brief:

Because of the actions and
The twelve persons as well —
Those who undergo full ordination
And those who claim to be laymen.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the buddha: "Venerable Blessed One, when you have declared that one should not be earnest in reversing an act performed against a particular person, and when the twelve persons are each addressed individually and they say, 'Venerable ones, do not address us!' — does their earnestness in reversal then also not apply?"

"Upāli, it does apply. I said that with regard to the act of punishment in mind."

"Venerable One, if one who undergoes full ordination declares himself to be a layman, is he to be called fully ordained or not fully ordained?"

"Upāli, even if one has received full ordination, if one declares oneself to be a layman, then that person is said to be not fully ordained. If that is so even for one who has received full ordination, what need is there even to speak of the case of one who is in the process of being fully ordained?"

This is the third verse of the sūtra of the third section of the Ekamsaka.

In brief:

The five kinds of sandals that are improper,
By which the feet are not to be anointed —
Sovereignty is to be proclaimed,
And the field's property belongs to the Saṅgha.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One, the buddha, declared that sandals of five improper kinds should not be worn, and —

The group of six went and anointed their feet with the fat of those five improper kinds of sandals, and then approached King Prasenajit of Kosala, where his bull-elephants were stationed. The elephant handlers were standing to one side. The bull-elephants caught the scent and bolted. The handlers said to them, "Venerable ones, please restrain them!" They replied, "We cannot restrain them. Good sirs, shall we restrain them? Noble ones, restrain them yourselves — what will you give us?" "We will give a fee for the task." One of them went before the elephants and sat in a position from which the herdsman would not have to rise, and the bull-elephants too settled down. They then said, "Noble ones, do you perhaps know the science of this?" The monks replied, "Good sirs, we know nothing of the science — it is simply that our bull-elephants happened to recognize the fat with which our feet were anointed." The handlers then said, "Noble ones, when the king's finest bull-elephants bolted, did you not cause harm to the king?" And with that they accused them of wrongdoing, derided them, and spoke of it disparagingly.

The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not anoint the feet with the fat of bull-elephants that happen to recognize. Should a monk anoint his feet with the fat of a bull-elephant that happens to recognize, he incurs an offense. Just as in the case of bull-elephants that happen to recognize, so too the same should be stated at length for horses, lions, tigers, leopards, and the like."

The occasion for the next rule arose in Rājagṛha. King Bimbisāra went to where the venerable Ānanda was staying and approached him. He bowed his head to the venerable Ānanda's feet and sat to one side. Seated to one side, King Bimbisāra said this to the venerable Ānanda: "Noble Ānanda, this lion-throne that has been set out — what is it for? Is the Dharma to be proclaimed today?" At that time it happened to be the day of the restoration ceremony. "Great king, it has been taken up by the monks — it has not been taken up by householders." The king then bowed to his feet and departed.

Now, the one who asked while already knowing was the blessed buddha. The blessed buddha said to the venerable Ānanda, "Why did the king depart without hearing the Dharma?" Ānanda reported what had happened to the Blessed One in full detail. The Blessed One declared, "Ānanda, you have acted wrongly. Had King Bimbisāra come to hear the individual liberation teaching, he would certainly have been delighted even by the mere recitation of its opening, and being delighted, by the power of that delight he would surely have done what is to be done. Therefore I permit this: let those faithful men of good standing listen to it. Furthermore, there are those who, though wealthy, have no faith, and those who, though poor, have great faith." The Blessed One declared, "Let those of that kind also listen to it."

Now at that time the venerable monk known as Twenty-Million-Grain was pale, emaciated, dried out, gaunt, wasting away, and had become feeble in body. The Blessed One observed him and said to the venerable Ānanda, "Ānanda, why has the one known as Twenty-Million-Grain become pale, emaciated, dried out, gaunt, wasting away, and feeble?" Ānanda replied, "Blessed One, since first entering the monastic life under the Blessed One, he has sustained his body on porridge alone." The Blessed One declared, "Ānanda, that being so, I permit: let porridge be given to Twenty-Million-Grain."

Then the venerable Ānanda conveyed the message to the venerable Twenty-Million-Grain, saying, "The Blessed One has granted you permission to drink porridge." Twenty-Million-Grain asked, "Venerable Ānanda, is this permission for me alone, or for the entire Saṅgha?" Ānanda replied, "For you alone." Twenty-Million-Grain said, "Venerable Ānanda, since this matter has been raised, the other celibate practitioners have also been saying this: 'Twenty-Million-Grain went forth under the Teaching, and in former times, when the harvest was good in the city of Campā, he gave up even a cart drawn by seven bulls when he went forth — and now he has grown attached to mere porridge.' Since people are saying such things, I ask that if the Blessed One would grant the permission to drink porridge for my sake to the entire Saṅgha as well, then I too would be willing to accept it." The monks then reported this matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Very well. For the sake of Twenty-Million-Grain, let the entire Saṅgha also drink porridge."

When King Bimbisāra heard that the Blessed One had granted the Saṅgha permission to drink porridge, he offered to the Saṅgha fields that had been planted with a thousand seed-jars. The monks declined to accept them. The Blessed One then declared, "Accept them for the sake of the Saṅgha; do not be uncertain in this matter. Therefore let the Saṅgha make use of the yield from those fields."

This is the fourth verse of the sūtra of the third gate of the single section.

In summary:

Ordination candidate, and full ordination too,
A novice's spiritual father, and a newcomer,
One in meditative absorption, and those not permitted —
The second training given, these two make it complete.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, "Venerable one, is it proper for a monk and a layman together to attend a single formal legal proceeding?" The Blessed One replied, "Upāli, that is not proper as a rule; however, if such a circumstance arises, it is permitted."

"Venerable one, is it proper for a novice's spiritual father, a newly ordained monk, a paṇḍaka, a eunuch, a suspended nun, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata, a follower of a non-Buddhist school, one who has gone over to a non-Buddhist school, one who is a thief by nature, one who dwells separately, and one whose status is unsettled — is it proper for all such persons together at a single formal legal proceeding?" The Blessed One replied, "Upāli, that is not proper as a rule; however, if such a circumstance arises, it is permitted." Likewise, in the same way, sharing a single seat, a single throne, a single low seat, or a single mat — it is not proper as a rule, but if such a circumstance arises, it is permitted.

"Venerable one, is it proper for a layman and a monk to be together on a seat that has been placed upon a platform?" The Blessed One replied, "That is not proper as a rule; however, if such a circumstance arises, it is permitted." As for placing mats, that too is not proper as a rule, but if such a circumstance arises and mats have been placed, the same applies.

Likewise, from a novice's spiritual father and a newly ordained monk down through those dwelling separately — if they sit together and no occasion for an offence has arisen in that place, it becomes associated with what is past.

"Venerable one, is it proper for two persons who have been given the trainings to be together on a single seat?" The Blessed One replied, "Upāli, that is not proper."

This is the fifth verse of the sūtra of the third gate of the single section.

The Sacred Vinaya Text, the forty-second fascicle.

In summary:

One not to be invited, and a single low seat,
And one who has become entangled — it is the same;
Even one who has become slightly entangled,
And grass and wood too belong to the Saṅgha.

When the Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada —

Some monks were sitting and attending to cooking duties on small seats, and the group of six came to that very place and sat there causing disturbance. While those monks were busy and occupied, the group of six roused them, and harm came to those monks. The other monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks must not rouse monks who are busy attending to cooking duties. If they do rouse them, it will be an offense."

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. The group of six roused monks who were sitting eating and were occupied, telling them to rise according to seniority. The monks were unable to stand. The Blessed One declared, "Let them sit according to seniority as they are." When the Blessed One had declared, "Let them sit according to seniority as they are," the group of six arrived later and roused the earlier monks who were busy eating. The Blessed One declared, "Monks must not rouse monks who are busy eating; instead they should sit aside. If they rouse them, it is an offense."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, "Venerable one, up to what point is it said that monks are busy eating?" The Blessed One replied, "Even so much as a little salt, or something to dip in, or a small morsel that has been tasted."

When the Blessed One had declared that monks who are busy eating must not be roused, the group of six sat down first according to seniority and then deliberately kept themselves occupied with eating. The Blessed One declared, "Monks must not sit out of order and keep themselves busy with eating. If they do, it is an offense. Monks, be skilled in the order of seating. If one departs from this, it is an offense."

Some monks took the Saṅgha's cooking vessels and bowls and attended to the cooking duties. The group of six said to the venerable ones, "Since we are senior, we have prior right," and then took the dye-solutions and carried them off, leaving the monks in disarray. The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks must hold the vessels and bowls so they cannot be seized by those who are preoccupied, and then face forward." When the Blessed One had declared that monks must not let the vessels and bowls be taken by those who are preoccupied, the group of six deliberately smeared the vessels with just a little dye and left them set aside. The Blessed One declared, "All the dye-solutions should be poured into a single vessel, and when one needs them, they may be taken from there. A monk must not smear the inside of vessels with a small amount of dye-solution and then leave them. If one does, it is an offense."

The occasion was at Śrāvastī. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada had the Jeta Grove surrounded with a fence of dense wood. Householders were breaking pieces off and taking them away. The Blessed One declared, "Have word sent not to take them." When word was sent, they abandoned even the wood and grass and departed. When this wood and grass had deteriorated, the Blessed One declared, "Whatever is unfit for use should be sent off in large quantities. What remains should be offered to those engaged in new construction." The group of six took wood that was fit for new construction, burned it as fuel, and attended to cooking. The Blessed One declared, "Wood fit for new construction must not be burned. If it is burned, it is an offense."

This is the sixth verse of the sūtra of the third gate of the single section.

In summary:

The ornament of Anāthapiṇḍada's grove —
Occupied seats must not be taken.
Vessels in use and things held in hand,
And shoes too are to be set outside.

The Blessed One was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove of Anāthapiṇḍada's park. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada then requested of the Blessed One: "If you would grant your permission, I will also donate the Jeta Grove itself." The Blessed One declared, "Householder, I grant permission — make the offering."

Anāthapiṇḍada then offered trees that bore masculine names adorned with masculine ornaments, and trees that bore feminine names adorned with feminine ornaments. The monks, not knowing how to proceed, reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Ask the householder himself." When they asked the householder, he said, "Do as the noble ones have dedicated it."

They again reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Gather up the ornaments of the trees bearing masculine names and the trees bearing feminine names separately, bundle them, and store them. Whenever festival occasions come, adorn them in the same way again. Use the ornaments of the walls as decorative implements for the walls. For the walls and pillars of the warming hall, use them as new construction; on that site, have them serve as the lamps of the Saṅgha. For the walls and pillars of the infirmary, use them as new construction; on that site, fashion them into medical implements. For the walls and pillars of the latrine block, use them as new construction; on that site, make them into food offered to the Saṅgha. For the walls and pillars of the water structure, use them as new construction; on that site, make them into drinking provisions. For the walls and pillars of the storehouse, use them as new construction; on that site, make them into the storehouse. For the walls and pillars of the greasy-goods room, use them as new construction; on that site, make them into an oil storage vessel. For the walls and pillars of the corridors, platforms, walking areas, gatehouse, and upper storey, use them as new construction; on that site, distribute them in common among the Saṅgha. Whatever accrues from the pond should be placed in common for the Saṅgha of monks of the four directions."

A monk was sitting in his private dwelling, cultivating virtue, when the group of six arrived and, claiming seniority, drove him from his seat and sent him away. The Blessed One declared, "A monk must not drive away a monk who is seated on the grounds of seniority. If he does drive him away, it constitutes an offense."

Then some monks had finished their affairs, risen from their seats, and were walking about, when others took their seats and would not return them, and the monks became troubled. They reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "When one has finished one's affairs and risen from one's seat, one should reserve the seat." After monks had sat for a long time on their seats, risen, and gone to walk, the group of six took those spots, and the monks again reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared, "Do not sit in that spot. If you are rising to go for a walk, leave your robe or your outer wrap on that seat to mark it."

The occasion arose at Śrāvastī. Monks came to the assembly hall while carrying vessels, and one monk, with his hands thus occupied, made a prostration, and his bowl broke. Another struck a fine pillar with his shoe, and the monks were reproached. They reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "I shall establish a rule of proper conduct for monks entering a path."

When a monk entering a path sees water, he should set his bowl and robe aside in one place. Then he should shake out his clothes and wash. Then his feet and — hands with water — water that has collected through the natural seeping of moisture should be wiped off with a damp cloth, and then one should dry the hands after that, put on the upper and lower robes properly, and proceed to the assembly hall with composed deportment. To do otherwise entails a transgression.

This is the seventh verse of the sūtra of the Three-Door Solitary Chapter.

In summary:

The razor's stropping and the cutting of nails, ointment, thorns, and foot supports, the place for defecation and the place for urination — what has been used there one should not retain.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Blessed One declared to the Saṅgha, "A razor case should be procured for the Saṅgha." The group of six monks, however, would take the Saṅgha's razor, use it, and then, picking it back up, claim there was still a use for it, and would not return it. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "After using the razor, one should not retain it. If it is retained, there is a transgression." The same rule applies to the stropping cloth, the nail-cutter, the medicinal lancet, and the foot support.

Those same group of six monks would enter the place for urination, do their business, and yet say they would enter again shortly, and so would not yield the place to monks who came after them needing to use it. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "When a monk has entered the place for urination and finished his business, he should not be blocked from leaving. If he is blocked, there is a transgression." The same applies equally to the place for defecation.

This is the eighth verse of the sūtra of the Three-Door Solitary Chapter.

In summary:

Attendants and the great festival,
turbid water,
scattering from powder, a strainer,
a drain-cover — likewise what has been proclaimed.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The householder Anāthapiṇḍada addressed the Blessed One: "Blessed One, if you would grant permission, I would hold a great festival in honor of the stūpa of the nails and hair." The Blessed One declared, "Very well, do so." And so the Blessed One instructed that a festival be held at the stūpa of the hair and nails.

At the time of the great festival, the monks assembled and washed their bowls in the pond, and lay practitioners also washed their jars of butter, oil, curds, and honey in the pond. As a result, the grease from those bowls and jars formed a film on the surface of the water. The monks became uncertain on account of this and would not drink the water. They reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Since it cannot function as food, stir it and drink. Do not be uncertain about it."

Now the water in that area was stirred by a great many people on all sides, until everything became thoroughly turbid, and one could no longer see one's own reflection in it. Moreover the water-filter was clogged by the turbidity, so that water would not flow through, and this caused them difficulty.

They reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "In water so turbid that one cannot see one's reflection, drop a fruit of the kataka tree into a small bowl or other vessel of water, wait a moment, and observe — the reflection of one's face will assuredly become visible. If no such fruit is available, use a ball of cooked grain. Because that has no grease, it will break apart." And the Blessed One declared —

"Grind it into a powder and pour it in." The water then became salty, and the monks became uncertain. The Blessed One declared, "If it is able to perform the function of salt, accept it and drink it. If it is unable to perform that function, drink it as plain water. Have no doubt about this."

This is the ninth verse of the sūtra on the triple gateway of the sole.

In summary:

Water separated from milk, and what becomes water from curds — likewise the vessel and the little vessel — drinking after rinsing with one's hand — these four ways apply to novices as well.

The alms-bowl and the washing of one's face — two modes for those who are on alms-round.
Fruits, roots, and flowers — when one is in need, these may indeed be eaten.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The monks drew water from a well and, when they strained it, bits of fruit-laden aquatic weed and pieces of stem emerged. Being uncertain, they were unwilling to use them, and the bits of clinging matter and pieces had been washed away. The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Since these cannot serve as food, take them out, discard them, and then assemble. Have no doubt about this."

The monks were drawing water from a pond, and there they washed the water-vessel and the honey-vessel. The monks also washed their greasy alms-bowls. The grease from these clung to the surface of the water in a film, and droplets of curds also appeared. The monks became uncertain and did not scoop up the water. The Blessed One declared, "Since that cannot serve as food, drink it as water."

When they did not drink in the afternoon, the Blessed One declared, "Drink it. Do not be fastidious about the vessels and the balls."

The Blessed One declared, "Pour it off." Some monks who were traveling along a road found that there was no water there. A householder gave water to many travelers from a vessel, and the monks were unable to drink it. The Blessed One declared, "If there is no alternative, understand the situation and drink. Do not be fastidious about vessels and balls." The Blessed One declared, "That too, pour it off." When they did not drink in the afternoon, the Blessed One declared, "Drink it."

Along the road there was a stone water-trough, and the monks became uncertain and did not take water from it. The Blessed One declared, "Monks, a stone water-trough is something that is washed repeatedly — understand the situation and drink it. Do not be fastidious about balls and vessels." The Blessed One declared, "That too, pour it off." When they did not drink in the afternoon, the Blessed One declared, "Drink it. Have no doubt about this."

Likewise, water that stands in a wooden trough or in a hollow — understand the situation and drink it. Regarding afternoon drinking, balls, and the interior of vessels, pour them off as well. Have no doubt about this.

The monks presented water to the Saṅgha, and then the monks said to the venerable one, "We have left it in the alms-bowl because the stream of water had not been cut off." But they did not take it. The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, all liquid naturally flows downward and does not rise upward — drink it, and have no doubt about this." In the same way, he went on to speak at length about milk, curds, whey, butter, thick cream, salt, and so forth.

The setting of the following is Śrāvastī. While monks were wandering and moving about on their rounds, they came upon a cattle shed,

There was no water there, and so the herdsmen gave them whey. But the monks felt doubt and did not wash with it. The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Where there is no water, wash with whey, with thin gruel, or with dough-water. Have no doubt about this."

The monks searched through the jars belonging to a cattle herder and found among them jars of butter and jars of milk. They felt doubt and did not take them. The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, there are five kinds of jar: a jar for excrement, a jar for urine, a jar for fermented drink, a jar for oil, and a jar for butter. Of these, do not store the first three — and if they are found stored, cast them far away. As for the oil jar and the butter jar, burn them in a fire; then, using solid cow-dung or fresh cow-dung as appropriate, scrub them with water, and they may be used both in the morning and in the afternoon. Have no doubt about this."

The setting of this rule is Śrāvastī. A certain monk drank water from inside a water-pot, and insects had gotten into it. The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Monks, do not drink water from inside a water-pot in that way — if you do, a transgression is incurred. First, extend your hand, rinse your mouth, and then drink the water. Do not leave the mouth of the water-pot uncovered." And so the Blessed One declared, "I permit you to fit a cover to the mouth of the water-pot." When the monks did not know what kind of cover to make, the Blessed One declared, "One made of wood, one made of stone, or one made of clay."

When the Blessed One declared, "Extend your hand and drink the water," it happened on a journey that one monk had very little water. The Blessed One declared, "Look for a naturally hollow leaf and drink from that." When that too was unavailable, the Blessed One declared, "Carefully take water from where it clings to a branch and drink it." When that too was unavailable, the Blessed One declared, "Sit in a secluded spot and drink directly from the water-pot itself, in a way that is seemly and not observed by others."

"Monks, what I have permitted when you are in want, do not use when you are not in want. If you do, a transgression is incurred."

The setting of this rule is Śrāvastī. While monks were wandering and traveling on their rounds, the novices' fathers sent loads of goods to them, but the monks did not carry them. The fathers said, "Please carry them," but the monks felt doubt and would not pick them up. The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Pick them up." When the novice fathers, being tired, said, "We are exhausted — please carry some," the monks did not carry them. The monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Carry them." When they carried the loads while the novice fathers had not yet taken hold of them, setting them down and raising them, the Blessed One declared, "Do not set down and raise loads while the novice fathers have not yet taken hold of them." When the novice fathers said, "We have gone some distance and are tired — take a little of this," the monks did not carry it. The Blessed One declared, "Tie a cord to it, have the novice fathers hold the end of the cord, and let them follow behind while the monk carries the load."

When the monks felt doubt and would not eat what was on the load, the Blessed One declared, "Have no doubt — eat of it."

A monk was traveling together with a large group of lay travelers when many of those travelers were set upon by bandits,

The novices threw down their loads and fled. The monks, not having carried the novice fathers' loads, remained right there with them set aside. When the many travelers said, "Venerable ones, your loads were not taken by the bandits," the monks said to the novice fathers, "Come now, take your loads and let us be off." The novice fathers, being frightened, were unable to set out, and said, "Why will you not go? We were not killed by the bandits." When the monks reported this situation to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "Take the loads, and only then have the novice fathers give them to you."

When the monks felt doubt and would not eat what was on the loads, the Blessed One declared, "Have no doubt — eat of it."

When they came to a river crossing, the Blessed One declared, "Ask the novice fathers, 'Are you able to carry these across yourselves?' If they say they can, excellent. If they say they cannot, carry the loads across and let them wade." When monks needed to get loads to the other side, they were to have the novice fathers carry them across and assess the situation. If the novice fathers too were unable to manage, the monks were to convey the loads to the other side and then afterwards bring the novice fathers across as well. If both could be managed at once, the monks were to take the novice fathers and the loads across together. When they had brought both across together, the monks felt doubt and did not eat. When they reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "Have no doubt — eat of it."

The Blessed One then declared to the monks, "Eat from your begging bowls." A monk washed his bowl, tapped it with his thumb, and it did not ring clearly. That monk felt doubt. The Blessed One declared, "Wash it straightforwardly two or three times, and if when you tap the clean bowl with your thumb it rings clearly, have no doubt — eat from it."

Another monk washed his bowl and found inside it a fragment of a joint of food. He felt doubt. The Blessed One declared, "Scrape it out with a wooden skewer, wash it thoroughly up to three times, and have no doubt about it."

Another monk took some warm broth inside a cracked bowl, and from it oil seeped out, rose to the top, and formed a film of grease. That monk felt doubt. The Blessed One declared, "Skim off the film of grease on top and drink the remainder."

A monk was afflicted with a wind ailment and in the afternoon drank some broth. Toward evening he called for drinking water into that same bowl, and inside the bowl the oil had risen and a layer of grease had settled on top of it. That monk felt doubt and did not drink even the water. When the monks reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared, "Wash your hands and mouth, skim off and pour away the grease, and then drink without doubt."

When the Blessed One declared, "Rinse the mouth," the monks did not know with what to rinse it. The Blessed One declared, "With clay, or earth, or strips of tree bark, or other such things."

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Bhagavān, "Blessed One, how much rinsing constitutes having rinsed the mouth?" The Blessed One declared, "The mouth and a wound are alike — one can never prevent them from continually seeping. Nevertheless, rinsing the mouth three times and spitting out the water: that is called rinsing the mouth."

A certain monk had collected his alms-round food, left it in his cell, and gone outside. Another householder then poured some additional food on top of it and left. When the monk who had been on alms-round returned, he saw other food poured on top of his alms food, and doubt arose in him, so he did not eat. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "If there is someone to receive it formally, have it formally received and then eat. If there is no such person, simply turn the top layer over and, without any doubt, eat."

Another monk had collected his alms food, left it in his cell, and gone outside. A householder then touched it. The monk saw this, doubt arose in him, and he did not eat. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Ask that householder why he touched it. If he says he touched it to remove grass or insects, have it formally received and eat. If he says he touched it out of desire, in that case too, take off half and have the rest formally received; eat it without doubt."

When the Blessed One declared, "Monks, carry a travel provision with you," there were no householders or novice fathers available. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared, "Have the donor prepare it with delight. If there is no donor, carry it back yourself and eat it after a layman. If even that is not possible, divide it into two portions, give one to a layman, and if he takes it, receive back his portion and have it formally received; then eat. Give him your own portion. If that arrangement too cannot be made, on the first day remain fasting. If on the following day there is no one to formally receive it, eat one mouthful of tiger-paw bread. If on the day after that there is still no one to formally receive it, eat two mouthfuls of tiger-paw bread. If on the fourth day as well there is still no one to formally receive it, eat as much as you need. Do not be doubtful about this."

"If there is no travel provision and there is fallen fruit, take it and carry it with you until the shadow reaches midday. If you meet a layman, divide it into two, give one portion to him, then receive back his share and make it allowable, and eat. Give him your own share. If you meet no one, whether it is morning or afternoon, as there is no fire to make it allowable and one would perish without it, eat without doubt. If there is likewise no fallen fruit, climb a tree and pluck some. Or shake the tree, dedicate it toward the north, and eat. Similarly with roots and the like: dig them up from the ground yourself and eat without doubt. The permission I have granted you for times of destitution is not to be used when you are not destitute. If you use it then, it will be accompanied by a transgression."

These are the ten verses of the third sūtra of the Ekottarika, and the third sūtra is complete.

The summary verse:

Seeds, a jar, a thief who steals,
and touching with the body likewise;
fruits, brine that has been used,
sugarcane, grapes,
what arrives unexpectedly, and what already abides.

In brief:

Seeds in portions, a cart, a boat,
a load, and a milk-seller too;
from crow, bee, and what is cooked and scooped — Upāli's four allowances: all is known.

The Blessed One, the Bhagavān and buddha, was dwelling at Rājagṛha in the Kalandaka Grove. At the time when King Bimbisāra (Skt. Bimbisāra) offered a gift of seeds sown in a thousand jars, the monks ate from the crop and abandoned the fields, which then became overgrown with kuśa grass. When King Bimbisāra came outside and saw this,

He asked his minister: "Who has abandoned all the fields in this way and left them to become a place of kuśa grass?" The minister replied: "It was when seeds sown in a thousand jars were offered to the noble ones — one may see for oneself how well they received them." The king said: "Did those noble ones not even give a portion share?" The minister conveyed this to the monks, and the monks in turn reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Release the Saṅgha's fields as a portion share." The monks gave them as a portion share. The farmers said: "All the harvested crops — you may take them entirely," but the monks did not accept their allotted portion. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"Accept your portion share of the fields." The monks accepted it but left it right there on the spot. The Blessed One declared: "Have the portion share carried into the monastery." A farmer then carried it in. The Blessed One then declared: "Henceforth let the field-owner have it carried in." But when it was being grown, it was stolen. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Appoint guardian monks." While the crops were growing in a cart, the cart broke and a monk did not offer help. A householder became displeased and said: "Noble one, this is yours — why do you not help?" The monk replied: "The Blessed One has not permitted it." The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Except for the place where the oxen are harnessed to the cart, help there and assist the farmer." Another monk fell ill, and the cart-drivers said: "Mount the cart," but he was in doubt and did not mount. The Blessed One declared: "When ill, mount the cart — have no doubt about it." While a boat was transporting portion-share crops along a river, the boat broke, and the monks did not offer assistance. A householder became displeased and said: "This is yours — why do you not help?" They replied: "The Blessed One has not permitted it." The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Except for the hull of the boat, help with it and assist the farmer." Another monk who was walking along a riverbank fell ill, and someone said: "Noble one, board this vessel here," but he was in doubt and did not board. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Except for the hull, have no doubt about boarding." Furthermore, a load being carried broke, and the carrier said: "Noble one, lower this down here," but the monks were in doubt and did not lower it. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Lower it." The monks lowered it but then did not pick it up again. The Blessed One declared: "Pick it up again just as you set it down." A deity at whose gate some of the crops had been thrown out — those who take what is not given stole them, and the Blessed One declared: "Carry them inside." The monks did not know who should carry them inside, and the Blessed One declared: "A layman should. If no layman is present, a novice's father may. If no novice's father is available either," the Blessed One declared, "carry them inside yourselves." The monks carried them in, but thinking "I am the one who carried them in," they did not eat.

When things had turned out in this way, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not be doubtful about it — eat it." When milk and the like was being boiled in the Saṅgha's bronze vessels over a great fire, someone who was making it suitable went out at the gate and spat, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not let that go outside." If by some circumstance it did go outside, the Blessed One declared: "Drive back in whatever has not been contaminated." Yet it was spat out again just the same, and the Blessed One declared: "Remove the spittle." The spittle was removed, but it was spat again, and the Blessed One declared: "Fan it off with the hem of the outer robe." Still it was spat, and the Blessed One then declared: "Stir it yourself with a ladle." "Monks, what I have permitted for the needy is not to be used when one is not in need. If it is used then, a transgression will have occurred." Likewise, medicines too — if a novice's father or a deity dwelling in the vicinity stirs them, and they then go outside, the earlier methods apply.

The occasion arose in Śrāvastī. A number of merchants together invited the Buddha and the Saṅgha of monks, among others, to a cooked meal. They prepared the cooked food, set it out early in the morning, and before the invitation had come, a fire broke out in the trading hall and they went to extinguish it. The midday mark had passed by the time they returned. The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Since the merchants had surrendered it with their minds, monks, do not be doubtful about it — you may eat it." After eating, offer a blessing dedication at the time of the northern sound of the ill-omened drum.

The Saṅgha's food was touched by a crow's beak early in the morning, and the monks, having grown doubtful, did not eat the rice. When things had turned out in this way, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Just stir around the area the beak has been, and do not be doubtful about it — eat it." The monks did not eat the food in their almsbowls because a crow had touched it, and the Blessed One declared: "Just stir around the area the beak has been, and do not be doubtful about it — eat it." The venerable Namgru was doubtful about everything, and so he came to be known by the name "Doubtful Namgru, Doubtful Namgru." When he went to the toilet he saw a bee. Later, when another one just like it was appointed, he saw it sitting on the food. He then said: "The bee I saw in the toilet has come here and has settled on the food and rendered it improper." Upon hearing this, a number of monks did not eat the food. When things had turned out in this way, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, bees travel everywhere throughout high and low places, and wherever one has touched, simply stir that spot, and do not be doubtful — eat it."

Monks who were doing painting work became confused in their minds, thinking "these are paint jars," and lifted up and carried off the Saṅgha's jars of sesame oil and jars of butter. Then, at the moment they recognized what they had done, they dropped them where they stood and the jars broke. When things had turned out in this way, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If one has ascended only a little way up a full ladder and one has to descend further, lean back and set oneself down comfortably in a stable place without falling. If one has ascended a full ladder many times and then must ascend a short one, ascend and set oneself down comfortably in a stable place without falling." The monks grew doubtful and did not eat. When things had turned out in this way, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared:

"Eat it without hesitation." The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable One, in how many ways may setting down be permitted?" "Upāli, in two ways: one who has no shame and is not devoted to the training, and one who has shame but whose mindfulness has lapsed. By these two it is permitted to set down. Eat both." The Blessed One declared: "If one gives to a sentient being born in an animal existence, one may expect a hundredfold karmic maturation. If one gives to a person seized by bad moral discipline, one may expect a thousandfold karmic maturation. If one gives to a person endowed with moral discipline, one may expect a hundred-thousandfold karmic maturation. If one gives to external sages (ṛṣis) who are free from the attachment of desire, one may expect a tenfold hundred-thousandfold karmic maturation. For one who has entered upon the path toward the direct realization of the fruit of stream-entry, it is immeasurable. For a stream-enterer, it is even more immeasurable than that. For one who has entered upon the path toward the direct realization of the fruit of once-returning, it is even more immeasurable than that. For a once-returner who has entered the stream, it is even more immeasurable than that. For one who has entered upon the path toward the direct realization of the fruit of non-returning, it is even more immeasurable than that. For a non-returner who has entered the stream, it is even more immeasurable than that. For one who has entered upon the path toward the direct realization of the fruit of arhathood, it is even more immeasurable than that. If for an arhat it is even more immeasurable than that, then what need is there even to speak of a pratyekabuddha or a Tathāgata, an arhat, a perfectly complete buddha?

"Now, when believing brahmins and householders sent monks to go and pay homage at a stūpa, sending parasols, victory banners, and pennants, and when such circumstances arose for the monks, they were unable to deliver them to the place they had been sent to deliver them. Among them, some said: 'Venerable ones, the Blessed One has declared that one should dedicate things in one direction and not distribute them in another direction.' Others again said: 'What else is there to do? Let us ask the Blessed One.' When things had turned out in this way, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: 'Monks, there are four occasions to which one must certainly deliver: the awakening, the wheel of Dharma, the great miracle, and the descent from the divine realm. Having dedicated to these, do not redirect to another direction. If, apart from these, dedication has been made in one direction but circumstances of such a kind arise, it is permissible to redirect to another, and about that you need have no doubt.'

"Monks, do not make use in times of abundance of what I have permitted in times of scarcity. If one acts in that way, one incurs an offense along with what is past."

The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Venerable One, if two monks quarrel, dispute, and come to blows, which one should be upheld?" The Blessed One declared: "Whichever one is endowed with moral discipline. If both are endowed with moral discipline, whichever one is learned. If both are learned, whichever one is content. If both are content, whichever one is more content. If both are more content, Upāli, there is no such thing as and it is impossible that, of two who are both more content, one could be yet more content. There is no basis for it. In the case of two such as these, there is no basis for quarrel, dispute, or coming to blows to arise."

This is the first verse section of the fourth sūtra of the Single-Door Gate.

The sacred text of the Vinaya, the forty-third volume, in summary:

The thief's abode and food, and prior quarrels — in four ways:
giving the training, the willow branch applied accordingly — these shall not divide the Saṅgha.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, if one applies the willow branch in a thief's abode, does that divide the Saṅgha?" "Upāli, it does not."

"Venerable One, if a eunuch, a person born of a mixed union, one who has expelled a nun, one who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who with malicious intent has drawn the blood of a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who dwells separately, or one who does not dwell — if such persons apply the willow branch, does that divide the Saṅgha?" "Upāli, it does not."

"Venerable One, if the willow branch is applied by means of the four prior quarrels, does that divide the Saṅgha?" "Upāli, it does not."

"Venerable One, if the willow branch is applied by one who has given up the training, does that divide the Saṅgha?" "Upāli, it does not."

This is the second verse section of the fourth sūtra of the Single-Door Gate.

In summary:

Contact with the body, and a sweat-cloth — one must not interrupt the fall of rain.

A latrine and a privy — what is improper shall not be discarded.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada.

The group of six divided up the Saṅgha's bedding among themselves, distributing it according to bodily contact from the feet to the head, until they were exhausted. The monks then reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not divide the Saṅgha's bedding by bodily contact. If you do, you incur a transgression."

When the Blessed One had declared that monks should not divide the Saṅgha's bedding by bodily contact, the monks did not know how to divide it. They reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Divide it deliberately, with due care, placing one piece upon another on the sweat-cloth."

The group of six divided up the Saṅgha's robes and then sat without any covering during the summer rains, and they were exposed to the rain and became uncomfortable. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not sit without any covering during the summer rains while wearing the Saṅgha's robes. If you do, you incur a transgression."

The group of six divided up the Saṅgha's robes and then went to a latrine, and the smoke made it uncomfortable. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not go to a latrine wearing the Saṅgha's robes. If you do, you incur a transgression."

The group of six divided up the Saṅgha's bedding and went to the privy, and the privy's planks injured them and caused discomfort. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not go to the privy wearing the Saṅgha's bedding. If you do, you incur a transgression."

The occasion for the following rule was at Śrāvastī: monks were discarding worn-out and torn pieces of the Saṅgha's bedding wherever they happened to fall, leaving them unused, and this became a matter of impropriety. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If a piece of the Saṅgha's bedding is somewhat worn or torn, do not discard it. If it is worn, mend it by patching it; if it is torn, have it repaired again. As for the old stuffing inside, take it out and beat the new stuffing. If what is old is still serviceable, use it as the inner core. If even that is not serviceable, mix it with cow dung and earth for the plaster of a pillar base, or —" use it as plaster in the joints of a wall." This will serve both the donor and the patron for long use. This is the third verse of the Sūtra of the Single Gate of the Four.

In brief:

Food, and then oil for lamps, ointment for the body, and shoes, cloth and an umbrella, wood, and root medicines — these are the last.

The Blessed One the Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī there lived another householder. He had built a temple fully furnished with all the necessary requisites and offered it, together with its large retinue, to a community of monks. The community entered the rains retreat there — sixty monks together with their companions. When the retreat ended, those monks who were practicing together, along with their attendants, came from various districts and quarters, wherever they had been residing, to pay homage at his feet. After they had done so and departed, he said to the venerable ones: "This householder, so-and-so, has invited me; please stay right here." They replied: "We accept your invitation, Preceptor." He said: "Very well then, come and take your meal today." They said: "We will come bringing food and requisites — that is what we seek." He said: "Very well, do just so." And they departed carrying food and requisites.

In the same way, some brought butter-oil for the lamps, some brought ointment for the feet, some brought shoes, some brought cloth, some brought umbrellas, some brought wood, and some brought medicines of roots, stalks, leaves, flowers, and fruits. Before long the temple became cluttered with requisites. The monk then went to where the householder was and said: "Your requisites are exhausted." The householder replied: "Noble one, if the monks there are few but a great many requisites have been offered, why were they consumed so quickly?" They explained in detail, and the householder said in acknowledgment of the fault: "Noble one, I offered those things for those who were resident there; those others are residing elsewhere — why should they be used elsewhere?"

The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, it is improper to reproach that patron. Therefore, monks, do not use elsewhere what is brought from elsewhere while residing elsewhere. Monks, if you reside elsewhere and use what belongs to elsewhere, reckon up the full value of whatever amount was used." This is the fourth verse of the Sūtra of the Single Gate of the Four.

In brief:

Insignia, and again clear insignia, with partition screens and those that bear designs,
stool legs with designs,
the so-called "ragged stitching" — a summer dwelling.

The Blessed One the Buddha was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. At Śrāvastī, two men who were brothers had gone forth into the monastic life. One of them was staying in the winter residence, the other in the Jeta Grove. At a certain time the one staying in the winter residence went to the cliff village on some matter. The monk went, dividing the shares, in order to visit his younger brother, and having divided the shares, he went to where he was. He placed one person's share among the Saṅgha's distributed shares, and stayed there engaged in conversation. Then by mistake he put on a share belonging to the Saṅgha and departed.

Thereafter the one from the winter residence returned and noticed a small share there. He said: "Venerable one, have the Saṅgha's receipts been settled?" The other replied: "The Saṅgha has no receipts. What are these shares here? They belong to the Saṅgha." He replied:

"Ours is the larger share; this one is small. Did anyone come here and put on a share and leave? A younger brother of mine came here." The other was told to go and ask. He went and asked, and upon looking, the brother found that it was the Saṅgha's. He said: "I made a mistake — it was the Saṅgha's that I took away, and mine is presumably the one lying there." He took that one and came back.

When this matter arose, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Let a mark be obtained for the Saṅgha's share." The monks, not knowing how to affix a mark, asked the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Write in characters: 'Offered by the monk so-and-so.'" A monk wrote this both for the Saṅgha's share and for the individual's share alike. When this matter arose, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Let a personal mark be obtained for the individual's share."

The origin of this ruling is at Śrāvastī. The Blessed One declared: "Whether it belongs to the Saṅgha or to an individual, a decorated sitting-cloth is not to be used until it has been marked." The monks, embarking on the making of sitting-cloths for individuals, began to disagree among themselves. Some said: "The Blessed One has permitted receiving a decorated sitting-cloth; he did not say one must make it oneself." Others said: "Abandon the ready-made article."

When this matter arose, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Therefore, even if a decorated sitting-cloth belonging to the Saṅgha is found or made, it is permitted. As for an individual's, if it has been given by another and dedicated to that very donor, it is permitted to keep; but making it oneself is not permitted." After the Blessed One had declared this, another monk said: "I have a decorated chair-leg that I did not make myself but that was given to me by another — I shall keep it." When this matter arose, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, my instruction concerned decorated sitting-cloths; it does not apply to decorated chair-legs. Therefore it is permitted for the Saṅgha to keep a decorated chair-leg whether found or made, but for an individual it is not permitted."

The Blessed One instructed that nuns who had entered the rains retreat should go out and walk about after the rains retreat had ended. Some then departed having left the repairs of the building unfinished, and because the repairs were left undone, damage resulted. When this matter arose, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If a nun who has entered the rains retreat departs without having made the repairs, she incurs a transgression."

This is the fifth verse of the sūtra of the fourth gateway of the single door.

In brief:

What went out and came back without being given,
what was given and then returned again, the Saṅgha too shall give — and that from which one was provisioned.

The Blessed One, the buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. A certain layman's relative had died, and for the sake of performing the funeral honors, he led a procession with victory banners and pennants to the charnel ground and conveyed the body there. On returning, he brought these back and offered them to the monks, but the monks did not accept them. When this matter arose, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "What has gone out and come back — let that be called 'returned' and take it." Some, however, were poor, and when they had offered what had been returned and were again looked down upon —

The monks did not give it. The Blessed One declared: "If it is offered back, take it." He was looked down upon again, and that person, feeling regret, offered it once more, and again the monks did not accept it. The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Think of it as having come back again, and take it. Do not be doubtful or resentful toward him."

The occasion for the next rule arose in Śrāvastī. A monk who served as steward had lent something of value to a layman on behalf of the Saṅgha. In due time that monk passed away. When word spread that he had passed away, a certain man came to the monastery and inquired about him. He said: "What of the monk known by such-and-such a name?" The monks replied: "He has passed away." The man said: "Reverend ones, he had lent me something of value." The monks said: "Go and return it directly to him." He replied: "He carried it for the sake of the Saṅgha, not for his own sake, nor for his parents — therefore, please, you must give it over." The monks reported this matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If it is known that he lent it on behalf of the Saṅgha, then let the Saṅgha give the loan." The Blessed One then said: "Monks, I shall establish a rule of monastic conduct for steward monks. A steward monk, when making loans, should consult the senior monks and then collect. If those who act as steward do not follow the rule of conduct as established for their peers in service, they shall incur a transgression."

This is the sixth verse of the sūtra of the fourth section of the single chapter.

In summary:

Sugarcane and monks —
what is eaten and shared brings benefit.
The unsplit portion and the fourth share, and the star — these should not be shown.

The Blessed One, the buddha (Śākyamuni), was dwelling in Śrāvastī, in the Jeta Grove, the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. The Saṅgha had obtained a sugarcane allotment, and the Blessed One declared: "Give the novice fathers a third each." So each of those was given a third of the sugarcane. The monks, arranged in order of seniority, had formed two rows, and the distribution came around again from the top of the seniority order. The Venerable Śābdadhara was seated before the Blessed One, eating a piece of sugarcane while gazing up at the Blessed One's face. The Blessed One declared: "Venerable Śābdadhara, do you wish for more sugarcane?" He replied: "Blessed One, I desire it." Then the Blessed One cut a piece from his own portion and gave it to him. When the monastic community of monks had finished with the sugarcane and returned to the monastery, the Venerable Śābdadhara came into the presence of the Blessed One to pay homage at the Blessed One's feet, and the Blessed One declared: "Venerable Śābdadhara, were you satisfied by eating the sugarcane?" He replied: "Blessed One, how could I have been satisfied when you declared 'Give one third of our gains'? Yet because the Blessed One declared it, I was satisfied from the very start." The Blessed One then assembled the monastic community of monks and addressed them thus: "When I said 'Give the novice fathers a third of the cloth allowances,' that applies to cloth. As for food allowances, divide them equally. Even if it is as little as a leaf from a small tree, divide it equally. If it is divided unequally — whether more or less — a transgression shall be incurred."

The occasion for the next rule arose in Śrāvastī.

There was a householder residing in Śrāvastī who used to go regularly to the Jeta Grove. A monk there spoke to him at length about the seven meritorious objects that arise from wealth, and the householder, having thus generated faith, built a monastery. He regularly provided food for the monks residing there, and for this purpose he gave them some kārṣāpaṇa coins. The monks said to him, "Venerable sir, we go on alms round, so what troubles us is robes, not food. The kārṣāpaṇas shall therefore be distributed for robes." The monks then resolved among themselves: "None of us shall ever go to that householder's house."

Then after some time, a wandering mendicant monk made his way through various districts and arrived in Śrāvastī. He came to the monastery belonging to that householder, and the monks there offered him rest, gave him a place and bedding, and he settled in thinking: "Today I will rest and eat a meal together with the community, and tomorrow morning I will set out on alms round." Meanwhile the resident monks took their bowls and robes and went out to beg alms. The visiting mendicant thought: "The resident monks appear so destitute — I too shall end up like that, so I had better go and beg alms." He took his bowl, his robes, his key, his bent key, and the door-latch along with him, and as he proceeded gradually on alms round through Śrāvastī he arrived at the house of that householder. He greeted him with a word of welcome, spread out a mat, made obeisance at his feet, and sat down before him. As he sat before him, he extolled to him the seven meritorious objects that arise from wealth. The householder then said, "Noble one, I have accomplished all of that." The mendicant replied, "Householder, you have done nothing whatsoever — there is no food at all in your monastery to begin with." He said, "Noble one, what do you mean? I have offered much there — perhaps the noble one went somewhere else in error?" The mendicant said, "Householder, do you know the keys and bent keys of the monastery?" He replied, "I do, noble one, please ask." The householder then showed him the keys and bent keys, and the monk said, "The noble one has grasped the heart of the matter." With that, the mendicant took them and went back. The householder followed after him and sat in the monastery, and as he waited, he saw the monks returning with their alms. When he saw them he said, "Noble ones, where have you come from?" They replied, "Householder, we went in order to generate faith among the patrons in our circuit. As for the kārṣāpaṇas — we thought they were in the dwelling-room, noble one." They brought them out and gave them to him. He said, "Very well then, now please proceed to generate faith among the patrons in your circuit." But they were embarrassed and sat there without saying a word.

The monks then reported all that had happened to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, to disparage that householder is pointless. Therefore, do not divide in four ways what belongs to all the stūpas, to all the Saṅgha of the four directions, to all the fees for the care of the sick, and to all the food funds."

The occasion for the next rule arose in Śrāvastī. The group of six monks were wandering through districts, and around the time when the stars were just rising they arrived at a certain monastery. The monks there let them rest and lodged them in a place dear to them.

They said: "Venerable ones, why are you sitting there? While the Teacher is still present, shall we let the teaching be ruined? Why not divide things in order of seniority?" And so, as they proceeded to divide according to seniority, the juniors received nothing, and dawn came.

When dawn broke they rose and said: "Venerable ones, we are leaving — clear away the bedding." The monks replied: "Venerable ones, because you stayed only for a moment you have caused harm to the entire Saṅgha." They said: "That is in accordance with the Teacher's instruction."

The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, do not divide bedding after the stars have risen. If you do, there shall be a transgression. And do not divide bedding already assigned. If you do, there shall be a transgression."

This is the seventh verse of the Sūtra of the Four-Part Single Section.

In summary:

Grapes and rice and other garments, and likewise what is suitable for fire, cooking hearths, lamps, and tree trunks —
all these the Great Sage has permitted.

The buddha, the Blessed One, was wandering through various districts and came to Rohitaka, where he stayed at the shrine of the yakṣa of Rohitaka named Woolly-Bull. The yakṣa Woolly-Bull went to where the Blessed One was, and having bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One he spoke these words: "Blessed One, would you be so kind as to spend this evening together with the Saṅgha of monks at my abode?" The Blessed One accepted the invitation of the yakṣa Woolly-Bull in silence. Then, knowing that the Blessed One had accepted in silence, the yakṣa conjured five hundred temples, and within them conjured five hundred seats covered with cushions and square seats as well, and also conjured five hundred lamps filled with smokeless fire. He assigned the great temple to the Blessed One, and the remaining temples he assigned to the monks. Having assigned the remaining temples to the monks, he went to where the Blessed One was, bowed his head to the feet of the Blessed One, and addressed him: "Blessed One, would you be so kind as to accept a meal together with the Saṅgha of monks at my home tomorrow?" The Blessed One accepted by remaining silent, giving his consent. Now the yakṣa Woolly-Bull had a friend, a yakṣa named Uṇika who dwelt in the land of Kāśmīra. He sent word to that yakṣa: "I am inviting the Blessed One together with the Saṅgha of hearers to a meal tomorrow — please send fruits from the forests of the northern regions." And that one filled vessels with grapes, pomegranates from Nepal, rice, and so forth, and sent them by the hand of a yakṣa. The yakṣa piled them up and set them in the courtyard of the temple.

The monks reported this to the Blessed One and asked: "Blessed One, what is this?" The Blessed One declared: "Monks, these are fruits from the forests of the northern regions." The monks asked what they should do with them, and the Blessed One declared: "Make them suitable by fire and eat them." The monks made them suitable one by one, but the Blessed One then declared: "If you pile them in a heap and touch them with fire two, three, or four times, they will become suitable." The monks made them suitable and distributed them to the Saṅgha, and there was a remainder. The monks did not know how to proceed. The Blessed One declared: "Squeeze all of them and strain the juice inside with water, then gather the whole assembly together and drink it in the afternoon as a thirst-quencher." When they were drinking it as an afternoon thirst-quencher,

There was a remainder, however, and the Blessed One declared: "Boil it and set it aside, then drink it the following day as an afternoon thirst-quencher."

The setting is Śrāvastī. When the cold season arrived, the monks were cold. They lit fires on the ground-spreads, and the ground-spreads were rendered unsuitable. The Blessed One declared: "Do not light fires on the ground-spreads; light them on a fire-screen instead." When they lit fires on the fire-screen, it became smoky. The Blessed One declared: "Light the fire outside, and blow it into the fire-screen from outside so there is no smoke, and use the hearth-screen as you like."

The setting is Śrāvastī. A craftsman gave the monks a lampstand with a single branch, but they did not accept it. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "A single-branched lampstand, if it is made for the Saṅgha, is permitted; it is permitted for an individual as well. A two-branched or many-branched lampstand is permitted for the Saṅgha but not for an individual."

This is the eighth verse-summary of the sūtra of the fourth gate of the Bare Section:

Regarding the two sudden arrivals, the two far banks of the river, rendering many things unsuitable, the measure for the body is the monastic robe.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in the park of Anāthapiṇḍada. Some monks who had arrived unexpectedly went to the assembly hall, and a monk who was residing there allowed them to rest. Once they had rested, those monks stole whatever was there and left. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not allow those you do not recognize to rest."

After the Blessed One had declared that those who are unrecognized should not be allowed to rest, a monk who was recognized was allowed to rest. Later, a monk who was unrecognized arrived. When that monk went outside, he began to take the other's bowl and robe. The monk residing there thought, "This is surely his companion," and so did not stop him, and the unrecognized monk took them and fled.

Later, when the first monk returned and found his robe and bowl gone, he said: "Venerable one, who took my bowl and robe?" The resident monk said: "Your companion took them." The first monk replied: "I have no acquaintance here. Return my bowl and robe; you owe me the loan." They began quarreling with one another. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "When a monk arrives unexpectedly, ask him who he is. If that monk says, 'I am known to you,' then ask that monk whether he will give or not give the bowl and robe — or indeed anything of yours — that he requests. If he says he will not give it, pursue the matter as one of monetary value. If he takes something by saying he will give it, it is simply a matter of taking."

The setting is Śrāvastī. Another monk who had arrived unexpectedly was allowed to rest by a monk residing there. After that, just as before, an unrecognized monk arrived. While the resident monk had gone outside to dispose of tooth-wood, that monk took his bowl and robe and left. The monks who had arrived unexpectedly thought to themselves:

"He must be one who used to live in this dwelling," they thought, and so they said nothing at all. He took the bowl and robe and fled.

When the resident monk returned and found his bowl and robe missing, he said, "Venerable ones, who took my bowl and robe?" They replied, "Someone staying in the dwelling took them." He said, "Whoever is staying in my dwelling — you have taken my bowl and robe; give me compensation." The two of them fell into a dispute, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "The monk who arrived unexpectedly should ask the resident monk, 'Will you give or not give this monk here anything of yours that he requests?' If he says he will not give it, pursue the matter as one of monetary value. If he takes something by saying he will give it, it is simply a matter of taking."

The setting is Śrāvastī. A monk left his robe with a resident monk as a deposit, with these parting instructions: "If, after I am gone, my disciples come and ask for it, give it to them," and then he departed. One of his disciples took the robe and fled. When the resident monk demanded it back, a dispute arose between the two. The monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "If he said to give it to a disciple, then although the disciple's taking it is simply a matter of taking, if there is a credential, give it. If the Blessed One has said to give it when there is a credential, and the credential becomes known and spoken of publicly, so that others hear of it and steal it, the Blessed One declares: Give the credential in secret. Instruct the recipient that if someone comes who knows the credential as it truly is, then give it to them."

Some monks set out on a journey, went to the bank of a river, and boarded a boat. Another monk was already in the boat. The monk who had boarded said, "Please pass me my bailing scoop." When the other passed the bailing scoop, he lurched in the act of doing so and fell overboard and was swept away by the current. The other then said, "You dropped my bailing scoop, so you must give me compensation." The two fell into dispute, and the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Ask him, 'Did it come into your hands?' If he says it did, give it to him at once. If not, settle it and apportion according to its monetary value. The same rule applies to other articles. Just as in the case of a river, the same rule applies to climbing a mountain, crossing a marsh, and the like: if one says 'It has come into your hands, release it,' and then it is handed over and lost in the handover, it is simply a matter of loss."

The setting is Śrāvastī. In a certain temple, the keeper of the temple had not secured the door and had not checked it properly, so thieves found their opportunity and stole from it. The monks mocked him, saying, "The compensation for that field should be charged to the temple keeper." The monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Monks, there are five means of securing a door, and they are these: a bar-bolt, a door-bolt, a wheel-lock, a door-chain, and a bent key. If all of these are present in the temple and the temple keeper employs four but omits one, charge him for one part. If he employs three but omits two, charge him for three parts. If he employs two but omits three, charge him for three parts. If he employs one but omits four, charge him for four parts. If he employs none of them, charge him for the entirety of whatever is lost."

If all five means of securing a door are employed and something is nonetheless lost, then that is simply a loss. Do not charge the temple keeper for it.

The basis of the following rule is at Śrāvastī. The venerable Upāli asked the Buddha, the Blessed One: "Blessed One, you have declared that monks' Dharma robes should be made to the measure of a cubit. But if a monk's cubit is short yet his body is tall, should he too make his Dharma robe to a cubit's measure?" The Blessed One replied: "Upāli, make it to the measure of the body. And if the body is short yet the cubit is long, should he likewise make it to the measure of the body?" The Blessed One declared: "Upāli, if the body is short yet the cubit is long, make it to the measure of the body. If both body and cubit are large, make it to the measure of the cubit." Otherwise it constitutes an excess. If something beyond what the rule prescribes is found, it need not be consecrated, but if it has been consecrated and rendered serviceable, it should be assigned and used as belonging to one's preceptor, abbot, or close friend.

This is the ninth verse of the Sūtra of the Four Bare Doors.

In summary:

The lower robe is permitted, and the same holds for its inner lining.

The upper robe is to be used for acts of offering, and likewise when not formally received.

The topic of sweat and what is bare is explained.

The Buddha, the Blessed One, was dwelling at Śrāvastī in the Jeta Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍada's garden. When the spring season arrived, the monks' lower robes became soiled and foul-smelling with dust. The Blessed One declared: "Sew a lining for the lower robe." The lining too became dusty and foul-smelling. The Blessed One declared: "Make an upper robe." This likewise became foul-smelling. The Blessed One declared: "Make a lining for the upper robe, and wash it from time to time."

The basis of the following rule is at Śrāvastī. When monks wore their Dharma robes to perform the work of making offerings, and those robes became unsuitable on account of fragrances, flour, and oil, the Blessed One declared: "Whoever has become unsuitable due to fragrances should wash the robe and put it on. Whoever has become unsuitable due to flour should shake it out and put it on. Whoever has become unsuitable due to oil should wash the robe with whatever degreasing agent is available and then put it on."

The basis of the following rule is at Śrāvastī. When monks were eating their meal without having formally received it, food fell into their alms-bowls and they became doubtful and refrained from eating. The Blessed One declared: "Receive it formally and eat." When there was no one present to perform the formal reception, the Blessed One declared: "Turn the bowl upside down, right it again, and eat without entertaining doubt about it." When food fell into a pot of broth, the Blessed One declared: "Likewise turn the bowl upside down, right it, and eat." And he added: "What I have permitted for monks in times of scarcity should not be practiced in times of abundance. If it is practiced, it constitutes a transgression."

When monks were on their alms round and wind and rain fell so that dust entered their alms-bowls, they became doubtful and would not eat. The same thing also occurred while eating together in a row. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, dust is of five kinds: acceptable dust, unacceptable dust, settled dust, unsettled dust, and dust that is merely dust. There is also another set of five kinds of dust: dust from food, dust from drink, dust from cloth, dust from flowers, and dust from fruit. When there is no evident contamination, all of these are acceptable. Eat without entertaining doubt."

This is the tenth verse of the Sūtra of the Four Bare Doors.

The Bare Doors are now complete.

This is the sacred text of the Vinaya, the forty-fourth fascicle.

"Is a transgression something that is observed, or would you say it is not observed?" He declared: "A transgression is not observed."

"Is a transgression something that has form, or would you say it is formless?" He declared: "A transgression is formless."

"Is a transgression something that can be pointed out, or would you say it cannot be pointed out?" He declared: "A transgression cannot be pointed out."

"Is a transgression something that is accompanied by obstruction, or would you say it is not accompanied by obstruction?" He declared: "A transgression is not to be called accompanied by obstruction."

"Is a transgression something that is accompanied by defilement, or would you say it is without defilement?" He declared: "A transgression is accompanied by defilement."

"Is a transgression something conditioned, or would you say it is unconditioned?" He declared: "A transgression is conditioned."

"Is a transgression something worldly, or would you say it is supramundane?" He declared: "A transgression is worldly."

"Is a transgression something belonging to the aggregates, or would you say it does not belong to the aggregates?" He declared: "A transgression belongs to the aggregates."

"Is a transgression something belonging to the elements, or would you say it does not belong to the elements?" He declared: "A transgression belongs to the elements."

"Is a transgression something apprehended, or would you say it is not apprehended?" He declared: "A transgression is not apprehended."

"Is a transgression something foretold, or would you say it is not foretold?" He declared: "A transgression may be called foretold, and it may also be called not foretold."

What is that which is foretold? That which one knowingly transgresses against a training rule laid down by the Blessed One — this is called foretold. What is that which is not foretold? That which one transgresses against a training rule laid down by the Blessed One without having reflected — this is called not foretold.

"Is a transgression something foretold with respect to the great elements, or would you say it is not foretold with respect to the great elements?" He declared: "A transgression is foretold with respect to the great elements."

"Is a transgression something fully engaged in, or would you say it is not engaged in?" He declared: "A transgression is fully engaged in."

"Is a transgression something that is obscured, or would you say it is not obscured?" A transgression is obscured.

"Is a transgression something afflicted, or would you say it is not afflicted?" He declared: "It may be called afflicted, and it may also be called not afflicted."

What is afflicted? That in which one knowingly transgresses against a training rule laid down by the Buddha — this is afflicted. What is not afflicted? That in which one transgresses against a training rule laid down by the Buddha without having reflected — this is not afflicted.

"Is a transgression something accompanied by a material object, or would you say it has no material object?" He declared: "A transgression is accompanied by a material object."

"Is a transgression something that abides in attachment, or would you say it abides in renunciation?" He declared: "A transgression abides in attachment."

"Is a transgression something that has an adversary, or would you say it has no adversary?" He declared: "It has an adversary."

"Is a transgression something that is observed, or would you say it is not observed?" He declared: "It is not observed."

"Is a transgression something with mind, or would you say it is without mind?" He declared: "A transgression is without mind."

"Is a transgression something that has ripened, or would you say it has not ripened?" He declared: "It may be called ripened, and it may also be called not ripened."

What is ripened? That which one has knowingly transgressed against a training rule laid down by the Buddha — this is called ripened. What is not ripened? That which one has transgressed against a training rule laid down by the Buddha without having reflected — this is not ripened.

"Is a transgression something called karma, or would you say it is not karma?" He declared: "A transgression is karma."

"Is a transgression something belonging to the inner sense bases, or would you say —" it belongs to the outer sense bases." He declared: "It is to be called belonging to the outer sense bases."

"Would you say a transgression is past, or future, or present?" He declared: "A transgression may be called past, it may also be called future, and it may also be called present."

What is past? When a transgression has occurred and one has confessed it and been restored from it — one has risen out of that transgression. That is also called past. What is future? When a transgression has not yet occurred but is certain to arise — that is also called future. What is present? When a transgression has occurred — that is the present one.

"Would you say a transgression is virtuous, or non-virtuous, or morally indeterminate?" He declared: "A transgression is to be called non-virtuous, and also to be called morally indeterminate."

What is non-virtuous? That which one has knowingly transgressed against a training rule laid down by the Buddha — this is non-virtuous. What is morally indeterminate? That which one has transgressed against a training rule laid down by the Buddha without having reflected — this is morally indeterminate.

"Does a transgression belong to the desire realm, or to the form realm, or to the formless realm?" He declared: "A transgression is to be called belonging to the desire realm."

"Would you say a transgression belongs to the path of one in training, or to the path of one beyond training, or neither?" He declared: "A transgression is to be called neither belonging to the path of one in training nor to the path of one beyond training."

"Would you say a transgression is abandoned by seeing, or abandoned by cultivation?" He declared: "It is to be called abandoned by cultivation."

"Is a transgression something that arises from body, or from speech, or from mind?" He declared: "There are transgressions that arise from body, there are those that arise from speech, and there are those that arise from mind."

What are those that arise from body? Engaging in unchaste conduct; taking what is not given; depriving a human being of life; intentionally causing an emission of semen; making physical contact; cutting green grass; eating in the afternoon; and drinking fermented drink — these are those that arise from body.

What are those that arise from speech? Claiming for oneself, falsely and before the assembled community, the status of one who is foremost in Dharma, when in fact one has no such quality; addressing a woman with words that speak of a serious offence; extolling to a woman the merits of one's own bodily conduct; and teaching Dharma to a woman in more than five or six words — these are those that arise from speech.

What are those that arise from mind? Take the case of a monk who dwells alone in a wilderness hermitage: he does not generate the thought for the restoration ceremony there, nor does he even say the words. The transgression that arises from his mind is not cleared. Nevertheless, it is said thus: though a transgression arising from mind is not cleared, still this is a failure to connect with roots of virtue.

"Is there a case where, with respect to the very thing on account of which a transgression would occur, if one fails to perform a certain act one incurs a transgression, and yet if one does perform that very act one does not incur a transgression?" He declared: "There is indeed a case where, if one fails to perform the act in question one incurs a transgression, while if one does perform it one does not incur a transgression."

What is that? That in which a monk, without having spread his sitting mat, carries his monastic robe however he likes and, without a companion, enters a village; or enters a village without having been invited; or eats in company; or eats repeatedly — these are transgressions.

And what is the case where one does that very same thing and yet does not incur a transgression? Take this: a monk who has spread his sitting mat and carries his monastic robe however he likes and, without a companion, enters a village; or enters a village without having been invited; or eats repeatedly; or eats in company — in these cases there is no transgression. Thus the very same thing on account of which, when done with a certain basis, a transgression arises, can be done with that very same basis and yet no transgression arises.

It was asked: "Can that very same action, the performance of which incurs a fault, be performed and yet no fault arise?" It was answered: "There is indeed a case where that very same action, the performance of which incurs a transgression, is performed and yet no transgression arises."

What, then, is the action which, though performed, incurs no transgression? It is this: when the monks, having decided "We have not seen the nun," have formally abandoned her, have resolved not to act with her again, and have renounced gazing upon her in wrongdoing — they make this presentation to the monks: to shave the head, to join the palms, and to demonstrate reverence by prostration. If she is then expelled to outside the boundary, a transgression arises. As for that very same action performed without transgression: it is this — when the monks, having decided "We have not seen the nun," have formally abandoned her, have resolved not to act with her again, and have renounced gazing upon her in wrongdoing, and she herself makes this presentation to the monks: to shave the head, to join the palms, and to demonstrate reverence by prostration — and if she is then expelled to within the boundary, there is no transgression. Thus the very same action that incurs a transgression when performed can also be performed without incurring a transgression.

It was then asked: "Can that very same action, when sought or requested, incur a fault, while that same action, when sought, incurs no fault?" It was answered: "There is indeed a case where knowing of that action leads to a transgression, and knowing of that very same action leads to no transgression."

How, then, is it that the very same action, when sought, incurs a fault, while that same action, when sought, incurs no fault? It is like this: the monks, having decided "We have not seen the nun," have abandoned her, have resolved not to act with her again, and have renounced gazing upon her in wrongdoing — they make this presentation to the monks: to shave the head, to join the palms together and to demonstrate reverence by prostration. She is expelled to outside the boundary, and the monks then assemble with her, dwell together, and sleep together in the same dwelling. Then other monks say: "O venerable ones, this monk has been formally expelled by the assembled Saṅgha in accordance with the Dharma on grounds that she was not seen — do the monks support him in this?" And those monks speak thus: "That is true; this monk should be expelled" — and he shaves the head, joins the palms, and demonstrates reverence by prostration, and is expelled. When one says "to outside the boundary," a transgression has arisen.

And in this further case: the monks, having decided "We have not seen the nun," have abandoned her, have resolved not to act with her again, and having renounced gazing upon her in wrongdoing, have abandoned all of this — they make this presentation to the monks: to shave the head, to join the palms, and to demonstrate reverence by prostration. She is expelled to within the boundary, and the monks assemble with her, dwell together, and sleep together in the same dwelling. Other monks then say: "O venerable ones, this monk has been formally expelled by the assembled Saṅgha in accordance with the Dharma on grounds that she was not seen — do the monks support him?" And those monks say: "That is true; this monk should be expelled." He shaves the head, joins the palms together, and demonstrates reverence by prostration, and is expelled — and when one says "to within the boundary," there is no transgression. Thus it is that knowing of an action leads to a transgression, while knowing of that very same action leads to no transgression.

It was then asked: "Can there be a transgression arising from one's own pledge, and a transgression arising from another's pledge?" It was answered: "There is indeed transgression arising from one's own pledge and transgression arising from another's pledge."

"And how does transgression arise from one's own pledge?" It was answered thus: when a monk has incurred any one of the transgressions within the five classes of transgressions, and he himself is aware of it — that is transgression arising from one's own pledge.

"And what is transgression arising from another's pledge?" It was answered thus: when a monk has incurred any one of the transgressions within the five classes of transgressions, and he performs the disclosure of that transgression in proper form in accordance with the word of a faithful layman — that is transgression arising from another's pledge.

Thus there is transgression arising from one's own pledge and transgression arising from another's pledge.

It was then asked: "Can there be a transgression arising from remembering, and a transgression arising from not remembering?" It was answered: "There is indeed."

"And how does transgression arise from remembering?" It was answered thus: when a monk remembers that he has incurred any one of the transgressions within the five classes of transgressions — that is transgression arising from remembering.

"And how does transgression arise from not remembering?" It was answered thus: when a monk, having incurred any one of the transgressions within the five classes of transgressions, does not remember it — even though he has forgotten it entirely, it is still a transgression. Thus it is that whether one remembers, it is a transgression, and whether one does not remember, it is equally a transgression.

It was then asked: "Can there be a transgression arising from something manifest, and a transgression arising from something not yet manifest?" It was answered: "There is indeed."

"And how does transgression arise from something manifest?" It was answered thus: when a monk has incurred any one of the transgressions within the five classes of transgressions and it has become manifest — that is transgression arising from something manifest.

"And how does transgression arise from something not yet manifest?" It was answered thus: when a monk has not yet incurred any one of the transgressions within the five classes of transgressions, yet it is absolutely certain that he will incur it — that is transgression arising from something not yet manifest.

Thus, whether the matter is not yet manifest it is a transgression, and whether it is manifest it is equally a transgression.

It was then asked: "Can there be a matter by which one is not reinstated, and that very same matter by which one is reinstated individually?" It was answered: "There is indeed."

"And how is it that the very matter by which one is not reinstated is also the matter by which one is reinstated individually?" It was answered thus: when the monks have expelled a monk on the grounds of not having seen the transgression, and he undertakes not to repeat the offense, and he relinquishes the wrong view without abandoning it anew — such a case is one where the matter by which one is not reinstated is the very same matter by which one is reinstated individually.

It was then asked: "Can there be an act by which one is not reinstated, and that very same act by which one is reinstated individually?" It was answered: "There is indeed an act by which one is not reinstated, and that very same act by which one is reinstated individually."

"And how is it that the act by which one is not reinstated is also the act by which one is reinstated individually?" It was answered thus: when the monks have expelled a monk on the grounds of not having seen the transgression, and he undertakes not to repeat the offense, and he is expelled having relinquished the wrong view — such a case is one where the very act that brings about non-reinstatement is also, when that same act is performed, the act by which one is reinstated individually.

It was then asked: "Can there be an act whose disclosure leads to non-reinstatement, and that very same act whose disclosure leads to individual reinstatement?" It was answered: "There is indeed an act which, when disclosed, leads to non-reinstatement, and that very same act which, when disclosed, leads to individual reinstatement."

"And how is it that the act which when disclosed leads to non-reinstatement is also, when that very same act is disclosed, what leads to individual reinstatement?" It was answered thus: when the monks have expelled a monk on the grounds of not having seen the transgression, and he undertakes not to repeat the offense, but has not been expelled because he has not relinquished the wrong view — such a case is one where, even though the act is disclosed, there is no reinstatement, and yet the disclosure of that very same act is what leads to individual reinstatement.

It was then asked: "Can there be one's own pledge by which one is not reinstated, and one's own pledge by which one is reinstated individually?" It was answered: "There is indeed one's own pledge by which one is not reinstated, and one's own pledge by which one is reinstated individually."

"And how is it that one's own pledge brings about non-reinstatement, and that very same pledge of one's own brings about individual reinstatement?" It was answered thus: when the monks have expelled a monk on the grounds of not having seen the transgression, and he undertakes not to repeat the offense, and — he has been expelled on account of not repeating the view toward the offense. Such a case as that is one's own pledge bringing about non-reinstatement, and one's own pledge bringing about individual reinstatement.

It was then asked: "Can there be another's pledge by which one is not reinstated, and another's pledge by which one is reinstated individually?" It was answered: "There is indeed another's pledge by which one is not reinstated, and another's pledge by which one is reinstated individually."

"And how is it that another's pledge brings about non-reinstatement, and that same other's pledge brings about individual reinstatement?" It was answered thus: when the monks have expelled a monk on the grounds of not having seen the transgression, and in accordance with the word of a believing layman, and he undertakes not to repeat the offense, and he has been expelled on account of not repeating the view toward the offense — such a case as that is another's pledge bringing about non-reinstatement, and another's pledge bringing about individual reinstatement.

It was then asked: "Can there be non-reinstatement even when it is recollected, and individual reinstatement even when it is recollected?" It was answered: "There is indeed non-reinstatement even when it is recollected, and individual reinstatement even when it is recollected."

"And how does non-reinstatement even when recollected, and individual reinstatement even when recollected, come about?" It was answered thus: when the monks have expelled a monk on the grounds of not having seen the transgression, and he undertakes not to repeat the offense, and he has been expelled on account of not repeating the view toward the offense — such a case as that is non-reinstatement even when recollected, and individual reinstatement even when recollected.

It was then asked: "Can there be non-reinstatement even when it is not recollected, and individual reinstatement even when it is not recollected?" It was answered: "There is indeed non-reinstatement even when it is not recollected, and individual reinstatement even when it is not recollected." It was answered thus: when the monks have expelled a monk on the grounds of not having seen the transgression, and he undertakes not to repeat the offense, and he has been expelled on account of not repeating the view toward the offense — such a case as that is non-reinstatement even when it is not recollected, and individual reinstatement even when it is not recollected.

It was then asked: "Can there be non-reinstatement in the case of what is directly present, and individual reinstatement in the case of what is directly present?" It was answered: "There is indeed non-reinstatement in the case of what is directly present, and individual reinstatement in the case of what is directly present."

"And how does non-reinstatement in the case of what is directly present, and so forth, come about?" It was answered thus: when the monks have expelled a monk on the grounds of not having seen the transgression, and he undertakes not to repeat the offense, and he has been expelled on account of not repeating the view toward the offense — such a case as that is non-reinstatement in the case of what is directly present, and individual reinstatement in the case of what is directly present.

It was then asked: "Can there be non-reinstatement even when it is not directly present, and individual reinstatement even when it is not directly present?" It was declared: "There is indeed such." "And how does non-reinstatement even when not directly present, and individual reinstatement even when not directly present, come about?" It was answered thus: when the monks have expelled a monk on the grounds of not having seen the transgression, and he undertakes not to repeat the offense, and he has been expelled on account of not repeating the view toward the offense — such a case as that is non-reinstatement even when it is not directly present, and individual reinstatement even when it is not directly present.

It was then asked: "Is the matter on account of which the Saṅgha carries out an act something that is many, or two, or one?" It was declared: "The matter on account of which the Saṅgha carries out an act can indeed be many, or two, or one."

"And how can one matter be the matter on account of which the Saṅgha's act is carried out, yet that matter be many, or two, or one?" It was answered thus: when the nuns have been instructed by a resolution stipulating that they shall not pay homage to a monk, that they shall not speak with him, and that they shall not share the same use of resources — a case such as that is one in which the matter on account of which the Saṅgha carries out the act can be many, or two, or one.

As for the act that the Saṅgha carries out as an act, that act can be many, or two — or one — and the same holds for one as well. It was answered thus: just as before, when monks have instructed a monk by stipulating that the nuns shall not pay homage to him, shall not speak with him, and shall not share the same use of resources with him — in such a case the act that the Saṅgha carries out as an act can indeed be many, or two, or one.

"And when the Saṅgha carries out the very act that is sought after as an act to be sought, can that too be many, or two, or one?" It was answered: yes, it can be many, or two, or one. "And the act that the Saṅgha is to carry out knowingly — even though it is known as such, can it also be carried out by many, or by two, or by one?" Yes, it can be so. "And how is it that the very act which the Saṅgha carries out as an act to be sought after can be performed by many, or by two, or by one?" It is as follows: when monks have instructed a monk by stipulating that the monks shall not pay homage to him, shall not speak with him, and shall not share the same use of resources with him — a case such as that is one in which the act the Saṅgha is to carry out knowingly, even though it is known as such, can be carried out by many, or by two, or by one. And the same holds as before.

"When the Saṅgha carries out an act in accordance with its own resolution, can it also be that such an act is carried out by many, or by two, or by one?" It was answered: yes, even when the Saṅgha carries out an act in accordance with its own resolution, it can indeed be done by many, or by two, or by one. "And how is it that the Saṅgha carrying out an act in accordance with its own resolution can be performed by many, or by two, or by one?" It is as follows: when monks have instructed a monk by stipulating that the monks shall not pay homage to him, shall not speak with him, and shall not share the same use of resources with him — a case such as that is one in which even when the Saṅgha carries out an act in accordance with its own resolution, it can be done by many, or by two, or by one.

"And when the Saṅgha carries out an act in accordance with another's resolution, can it also be that such an act is done by many, or by two, or by one?" It was answered: yes, it can be so. When monks have instructed a monk by stipulating that the monks shall not pay homage to him, shall not speak with him, and shall not share the same use of resources with him — a case such as that is one in which even when the Saṅgha carries out an act in accordance with another's resolution, it can be done by many, or by two, or by one, just as before.

"And when the Saṅgha carries out an act while being mindful, can it also be that such an act is done by many, or by two, or by one?" It was declared: yes, even when the Saṅgha carries out an act while being mindful, it can be done by many, or by two, or by one. It is as follows: when monks have instructed a monk by stipulating that the monks shall not pay homage to him, shall not speak with him, and shall not share the same use of resources with him — a case such as that is one in which even when the Saṅgha carries out an act while being mindful, it can be done by many, or by two, or by one, just as before. And the same holds for the case of not being mindful — even without mindfulness, it extends up to the point of being many, or two, or one, in the same way as before.

"And when a matter is directly present and the Saṅgha carries out an act concerning it, can that also be done by many, or by two, or by one?" It was answered: yes, even when a matter is directly present, it can be done by many, or by two, or by one. It is as follows: when monks have instructed a monk by stipulating that the monks shall not pay homage to him, shall not speak with him, and shall not share the same use of resources with him — a case such as that is one in which even when the matter is directly present and the Saṅgha carries out the act, it can be done by many, or by two, or by one, just as before.

It was asked whether, even when a matter is not directly present and the Saṅgha carries out an act concerning it, that too becomes valid in the same way. It was answered: yes. It is as follows: a case in which monks have instructed a monk by stipulating that the monks shall not pay homage to him, shall not speak with him, and shall not share the same use of resources with him — a case such as that is one in which even when the matter is not directly present and the Saṅgha carries out the act, it can be done by many, or by two, or by one, just as before.

The four acts concerning a disciplinary proceeding (Skt. tajjanīyakarman) are: the act of censure, the act of reprimand, the act of banishment, and the act of reconciliation. It was asked: if, in a case that properly calls for the act of censure, the acts of reprimand, banishment, and reconciliation are performed instead, is that considered done? The Blessed One declared: if it was done for the purpose of those three or those five factors, it is considered done. But if it was done merely on the basis of the sūtra text, it is considered not done. Why? Because censure is one thing, reprimand another, banishment another, and reconciliation yet another.

Venerable sir, it was asked: if, in a case that properly calls for the act of reprimand, the acts of banishment, reconciliation, and censure are performed instead, is that considered done? The Blessed One declared: if it was done for the purpose of those three or those five factors, it is considered done. But if it was done merely on the basis of the sūtra text, it is considered not done. Why? Because reprimand is one thing, banishment another, reconciliation another, and censure yet another.

Venerable sir, it was asked: if, in a case that properly calls for the act of banishment, the acts of reconciliation, censure, and reprimand are performed instead, is that considered done? The Blessed One declared: if it was done for the purpose of those three or those five factors, it is considered done. But if it was done on the basis of the sūtra text, it is considered not done. Why? Because banishment is one thing, reconciliation another, censure another, and reprimand yet another.

Venerable sir, it was asked: if, in a case that properly calls for the act of reconciliation, the acts of censure, reprimand, and banishment are performed instead, is that considered done? The Blessed One declared: if it was done for the purpose of those three or those five factors, it is considered done. But if it was done on the basis of the sūtra text, it is considered not done. Why? Because reconciliation is one thing, and censure and the rest are each something different.

It was asked: can the same grounds on which one performs the act of banishment serve as the grounds for reprimand, censure, and reconciliation? The Blessed One declared: if done for the purpose of that matter, it is permissible.

It was asked: can the same grounds on which one performs the act of reprimand serve as the grounds for banishment, censure, and reconciliation? The Blessed One declared: if done for the purpose of that matter, it is permissible.

It was asked: can the same grounds on which one performs the act of censure serve as the grounds for reconciliation, banishment, and reprimand? The Blessed One declared: if done for the purpose of that matter, it is permissible.

It was asked: can the same grounds on which one performs the act of reconciliation serve as the grounds for banishment, censure, and reprimand? The Blessed One declared: if done for the purpose of that matter, it is permissible.

It was asked: can one for whom an offense results in there being no remainder come to have a remainder by means of the same grounds? The Blessed One declared: yes. It is as follows: a nun who commits the four root defeats (Skt. pārajika) that are not shared in common comes to have no remainder. A monk, however, comes to have a remainder.

It was asked: can the very grounds by which a pārajika offense results in a transgression come to constitute a remainder within the Saṅgha? The Blessed One declared: yes. When a nun engages in bodily contact, it constitutes a root defeat for her. For a monk, it constitutes a remainder within the Saṅgha.

It was asked: can the very grounds by which a root defeat offense arises come to constitute a transgression? The Blessed One declared: yes. If a nun knowingly conceals a serious offense committed by another nun until dawn breaks, it constitutes a root defeat for her. If monks conceal an offense committed by a monk, it constitutes a transgression.

It was asked: can the very grounds by which a root defeat offense arises come to constitute a wrongdoing? The Blessed One declared: yes. If a nun, in the following manner — when the Saṅgha is assembled and acting in accordance with the Dharma, she has been dismissed from it after it was proclaimed that such-and-such monk's parents have been seen, and then she enters again — and even though she is admonished up to three times within the Saṅgha she does not leave, it constitutes a root defeat for her. If a monk has been admonished and does not leave, it constitutes a wrongdoing.

It was asked: can that very ground by which something constitutes a remainder within the Saṅgha also constitute a transgression? The Blessed One declared: yes. If a monk intentionally emits semen, it constitutes a remainder within the Saṅgha. If a nun emits semen, it constitutes a transgression.

It was asked: can that very ground by which something constitutes a remainder within the Saṅgha also constitute a wrongdoing? The Blessed One declared: yes. If a nun goes outside at an improper time for the sake of some matter, it constitutes a remainder within the Saṅgha. For a monk, it constitutes a wrongdoing.

It was asked: can the very grounds by which something constitutes a transgression also constitute an offense requiring individual confession? The Blessed One declared: yes. If a monk accepts food solicited from one who is not a relative, it constitutes a transgression. If a nun accepts it, it constitutes an offense requiring individual confession.

It was asked: can those very grounds by which something constitutes a transgression also constitute a wrongdoing? The Blessed One declared: yes. If a nun defecates or urinates on green grass, it constitutes a transgression. If a monk does so, it constitutes a wrongdoing.

It was asked: can those very grounds by which something constitutes an offense requiring individual confession also constitute a wrongdoing? The Blessed One declared: yes. Among the rules of the training that have been formally undertaken — if one has accepted food and drink with one's own hand by spreading it out, it constitutes an offense requiring individual confession. If a nun accepts it, it constitutes a wrongdoing.

It was asked: is it possible that one who has sworn an oath in a place of theft, not yet having received full ordination, will not be given full ordination; that one who has received full ordination will be expelled again; that one who has not yet received full ordination will be given full ordination; and that one who has received full ordination will not be expelled? The Blessed One declared: if one has participated in the restoration ceremony two or three times, that person, not yet having received full ordination, shall not be given full ordination; and if already fully ordained, shall be expelled once more. But if one has participated in the restoration ceremony only once, that person, even without having received full ordination, shall be given full ordination; and even if already fully ordained, shall not be expelled.

It was asked: is it possible, in the case of a nun who has been expelled by oath, that even without having received full ordination she will not be given full ordination; that even if fully ordained she will be expelled again; that even without having received full ordination she will be given full ordination; and that even if fully ordained she will not be expelled? The Blessed One declared: yes. A nun who has been expelled on account of engaging in impure conduct — even if she has not yet received full ordination, she shall not be given full ordination; and even if she has received full ordination, she shall be expelled once more.

A nun who has been expelled on account of bodily contact — even if she has not yet received full ordination, she shall be given full ordination; and even if she has received full ordination, she shall not be expelled again.

Concerning a nun who has been expelled by oath on account of having split the Saṅgha: are there cases where, even without having received full ordination she will not be given full ordination, and even if fully ordained she will be expelled again; where even without having received full ordination she will be given full ordination, and even if fully ordained she will not be expelled? The Blessed One declared: yes. One who perceives what is not in accord with the Dharma as not being in accord with the Dharma, and who, seeing the split as contrary to the Dharma, has nonetheless divided the Saṅgha; and one who perceives what is not in accord with the Dharma as being in accord with the Dharma, and who, seeing the split as contrary to the Dharma, has divided the Saṅgha; and one who is uncertain about what is not in accord with the Dharma, and who, seeing the split as contrary to the Dharma, has divided the Saṅgha — such a person, if not yet fully ordained, shall not be given full ordination, and if already fully ordained shall be expelled again. One who, perceiving what is not in accord with the Dharma as being in accord with the Dharma, has caused a split in the Saṅgha, and who regards that split as well to be in accord with the Dharma — such a person, even if not yet fully ordained, shall be given full ordination, and even if fully ordained shall not be expelled.

Concerning a nun who is under oath regarding not having killed her mother: are there cases where, even without having received full ordination she will not be given full ordination, and even if fully ordained she will be expelled again; where even without having received full ordination she will be given full ordination, and even if fully ordained she will not be expelled? The Blessed One declared: yes. One who has deliberately, with her own hand, deprived her mother of life — if not yet fully ordained, she shall not be given full ordination, and if already fully ordained she shall be expelled again. One who has deprived her mother of life while mistaking her for someone else — even if not yet fully ordained, she shall be given full ordination, and even if fully ordained she shall not be expelled. The same applies in the case of a father, an arhat, and a śrāvaka as well.

Venerable one, does a monk deprive his mother of life with a wholesome mind, or with an unwholesome mind, or with a mind that is neither?

The Blessed One declared: Upāli, a monk deprives his mother of life with a wholesome mind, with an unwholesome mind, and with a mind that is neither.

Venerable one, if a monk deprives his mother of life with a wholesome mind, does that entail a defeat and does it also become a boundless act?

The Blessed One declared: Upāli, if a monk deprives his mother of life with an unwholesome mind, it does entail a defeat, and it does also become a boundless act. There are also cases where, if he deprives his mother of life with a wholesome mind, it does not entail a defeat and it does not become a boundless act.

Venerable one, if a monk deprives his mother of life with an unwholesome mind, does it in all cases entail a defeat and become a boundless act? Or are there cases where, even with an unwholesome mind, it does not entail a defeat and does not become a boundless act?

The Blessed One declared: Upāli, there are cases where depriving one's mother of life with an unwholesome mind entails a defeat and also becomes a boundless act. And there are also cases where depriving one's mother of life with an unwholesome mind does not entail a defeat and does not become a boundless act.

Venerable one, if a monk deprives his mother of life with a mind that is neither wholesome nor unwholesome, does that in all cases entail a defeat and become a boundless act? Or are there cases where, even with such a mind, it does not entail a defeat and does not become a boundless act?

The Blessed One declared:

Upāli, there are cases where a monk who deprives his mother of life with a mind that is neither wholesome nor unwholesome incurs a defeat and also commits a boundless act. And there are also cases where a monk who deprives his mother of life with a mind that is neither wholesome nor unwholesome does not incur a defeat and does not commit a boundless act.

Venerable one, in what cases does a monk who deprives his mother of life with a wholesome mind incur the transgression of defeat and also commit a boundless act? And in what cases does a monk who deprives his mother of life with a wholesome mind not incur the transgression of defeat and not commit a boundless act?

The Blessed One declared:

Upāli, consider this case: a monk's mother has been ill for a long time, suffering and in severe pain, experiencing great distress; and it is under such a circumstance that he deprives her of life. Then he incurs the transgression of defeat and also commits a boundless act. But consider this case: that same monk, while nursing his ailing mother, gives her cooked rice, barley gruel, broth, meat, or game, and she subsequently passes away due to that very condition. Then he does not incur the transgression of defeat, nor does he commit a boundless act. Thus it is that in one case a monk who deprives his mother of life with a wholesome mind incurs the transgression of defeat and commits a boundless act, and in the other case a monk who deprives his mother of life with a wholesome mind does not incur the transgression of defeat and does not commit a boundless act.

Venerable one, in what cases does a monk who deprives his mother of life with an unwholesome mind incur the transgression of defeat and also commit a boundless act? And in what cases does a monk who deprives his mother of life with an unwholesome mind not incur the transgression of defeat and not commit a boundless act?

The Blessed One declared:

Upāli, consider this case: a monk deprives his mother of life for the sake of wealth or for the sake of an inheritance. Then he incurs the transgression of defeat and also commits a boundless act. But consider this case: a monk with an unwholesome mind intends to beat a yak, or to beat a sheep or a goat, and instead strikes his mother, and she subsequently passes away on account of that. Then he does not incur the transgression of defeat, nor does he commit a boundless act. Thus it is that in one case, when a monk with an unwholesome mind deprives his mother of life, he incurs the transgression of defeat and commits a boundless act, and in the other case, when a monk with an unwholesome mind deprives his mother of life, he does not incur the transgression of defeat and does not commit a boundless act.

In what cases does a monk who deprives his mother of life with a mind that is neither wholesome nor unwholesome incur the transgression of defeat and also commit a boundless act? And in what cases does he not incur the transgression of defeat and not commit a boundless act?

The Blessed One declared:

Consider this case: a monk employs a means so that his mother lies down in order for his karma to be pacified, and she dies while lying there beneath him. Then he incurs the transgression of defeat and also commits a boundless act. But consider this case: a monk with a mind that is neither wholesome nor unwholesome strikes the ground, intending to strike the earth or the leaves of a tree, and instead strikes his mother, and she subsequently passes away on account of that. Then he does not incur the transgression of defeat, nor does he commit a boundless act. Thus it is that in one case, when a monk with a mind that is neither wholesome nor unwholesome kills his mother, he incurs the downfall of defeat and commits a boundless act, and in the other case, when a monk with a mind that is neither wholesome nor unwholesome kills his mother, he does not incur the transgression of defeat and does not commit a boundless act.

The same applies to a father and to a śrāvaka arhat — it is just the same.

The Noble Vinaya, the forty-fifth fascicle.

A venerable monk who has been dwelling within a boundary from the very beginning without having withdrawn, and when the Saṅgha has not yet assembled — is it possible that if he performs all the acts by word alone, it counts as having performed them, and yet no transgression is incurred?

The Blessed One declared: It is possible. The Tathāgata, arhat, perfectly and fully awakened Buddha — therefore I directed the son of Maudgala: "You, recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra for them; do not have the Tathāgata stand reading the Prātimokṣa sūtra." That is what I instructed.

Again — is it possible that if a certain monk has never experienced any one of the five kinds of restoration ceremony, and yet the restoration ceremony is performed, no transgression is incurred?

The Blessed One declared: It is possible. It is a consecrated restoration ceremony.

Venerable one, the Blessed One has said that the restoration ceremony is not to be performed in the presence of a householder, and that the Prātimokṣa is not to be recited. If the Saṅgha performs the restoration ceremony and recites the Prātimokṣa sūtra while a householder is present — does it count as having recited it, and yet no transgression is incurred?

The Blessed One declared: Such a case exists as well. This is what I directed: "Monks, assemble before Prasenajit, king of Kosala, without any other retinue, and recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra — and he will come to have deep faith in it." That is what I instructed.

Blessed One, does a monk incur a transgression through a wholesome mind, or does he incur a transgression through a non-virtuous mind, or through a mind that is not in accordance with scripture?

The Blessed One declared: There are cases in which a monk incurs a transgression through a wholesome mind, through a non-virtuous mind, and through a mind that is not in accordance with scripture. As for how a transgression is incurred through a wholesome mind: a newly ordained monk, unskilled in the training rules he has vowed to uphold, who cuts the grass or plants around a stūpa, or the grass or plants of a walking path or courtyard, or picks flowers — this is done with a wholesome mind. As for how a transgression is incurred through a non-virtuous mind: knowingly transgressing the training rules laid down by the Buddha — this is done with a non-virtuous mind. As for how a transgression is incurred through a mind that is not in accordance with scripture: knowingly transgressing the training rules laid down by the Buddha — such an act is done with a mind that is not in accordance with scripture.

Venerable one, do arhat monks incur transgressions through a wholesome mind, or do they incur transgressions through a mind that is not in accordance with scripture?

The Blessed One declared: Upāli, when an arhat commits any such act, it is to be said that all of them are done with a mind that is not in accordance with scripture.

Venerable one, how is it that when a monk who is an arhat incurs a transgression, all such acts are said to be done with a mind that is not in accordance with scripture?

Upāli, it is like this: a monk who is an arhat, having lost mindfulness at this or that moment and at this or that juncture, wears his monastic robes however he pleases, enters a village without having fastened them, eats repeatedly, eats in company, when lying down to sleep is placed upon a great high seat, when lying down to sleep reclines in a woman's bed, lies down when those who have not yet received full ordination are departing, and when those who have not yet received full ordination arrive, confesses according to the Dharma to whoever is sitting with him when he rises. All such acts, when committed as transgressions by a monk who is an arhat, are said to be done entirely with a mind that is not in accordance with scripture.

Is it "the Saṅgha in its entirety is disrupted" that one says, or is it "all the disruptions of the Saṅgha"? The Saṅgha in its entirety — the Saṅgha is not disrupted; there is also a disrupted Saṅgha that is not in its entirety. There is a Saṅgha in its entirety that is not disrupted. There is also a Saṅgha in its entirety that is disrupted.

There is also a Saṅgha that is not in its entirety yet is not disrupted. What is a Saṅgha that is in its entirety yet not disrupted? It is as follows: the Saṅgha has indeed become divided, and the fourteen factors that bring about the division of the Saṅgha have been fully cultivated and set in motion, yet they have not been grasped and acted upon. In that case, the Saṅgha, though divided, is not disrupted. What is a Saṅgha that is disrupted yet not in its entirety? It is as follows: the fourteen factors that bring about the division of the Saṅgha have been fully cultivated, set in motion, and grasped, yet the Saṅgha has not actually become divided. That is a Saṅgha that is disrupted yet has not become divided. What is a Saṅgha that is in its entirety and has also become disrupted? It is as follows: the Saṅgha has become divided, and the fourteen factors that bring about division have also been fully cultivated, set in motion, and grasped — that is a Saṅgha that is in its entirety and is disrupted. What is something that is neither a disrupted Saṅgha nor a Saṅgha that is not in its entirety? It is everything apart from these categories.

Is it "every Saṅgha that is divided is a separate Saṅgha" that one says, or "every separate Saṅgha is a divided one"? There is also a Saṅgha that is divided yet has not become a separate Saṅgha. There is also a Saṅgha that is separate yet not divided. There is also one that is both divided and has become a separate Saṅgha. And there is also one that is neither divided nor has become a separate Saṅgha. What is a Saṅgha that is divided yet has not become separate? It is as follows: the Saṅgha has become divided, but the two Saṅghas do not abide as separate — they are not divided by purpose, not divided by boundary, not divided by material gain, and not divided by food. That is a Saṅgha that is divided yet has not become a separate Saṅgha. What is a Saṅgha that is separate yet not divided? It is as follows: the two Saṅghas abide as separate — divided by purpose, divided by boundary, divided by material gain, divided by food — yet the Saṅgha has not actually been divided. That is a Saṅgha that abides as separate yet is not divided; that is a separate Saṅgha that is not a divided one. What is a Saṅgha that is divided and has become a separate Saṅgha? It is as follows: the Saṅgha has become divided and the two Saṅghas abide as separate — divided by purpose, divided by boundary, divided by material gain, divided by food. That is a Saṅgha that is divided and has become a separate Saṅgha. What is something that is neither a divided Saṅgha nor a separate Saṅgha? It is everything apart from these categories.

Is it "every divided Saṅgha abides as a separate Saṅgha" that one says, or "every Saṅgha abiding as separate is a divided Saṅgha"? There is also a Saṅgha that is divided yet does not abide as separate. There is also one that abides as separate yet is not divided. There is also one that is both divided and abides as separate. And there is also one that is not divided and does not abide as separate. What is a Saṅgha that is divided yet does not abide as separate? It is as follows: those Saṅghas have become divided, but the two Saṅghas do not abide as separate — not separate in purpose, not separate in boundary, not separate in material gain, not separate in food. That is a Saṅgha that is divided yet does not abide as separate. What is a Saṅgha that abides as separate yet is not divided? It is as follows: the two Saṅghas have become separate — separate in purpose, separate in boundary, separate in material gain, separate in food — yet the Saṅgha has not been divided. That is one that abides as separate yet is not divided; that is a Saṅgha that abides as separate yet is not divided. What is a Saṅgha that is divided and abides as separate? It is as follows: the Saṅgha has become divided, and the two Saṅghas have come to abide as separate — separate in purpose, separate in boundary, separate in material gain, separate in food. That is a Saṅgha that is divided and abides as separate.

What is that which is neither a divided Saṅgha nor a Saṅgha that abides as separate? It is as follows: anything other than these forms just described.

Then a question was posed: Are all those divisions of the Saṅgha such that they persist for an eon? And does everything that persists for an eon constitute a schism in the Saṅgha?

It was declared: There is that which has divided the Saṅgha yet does not persist for an eon. There is that which persists for an eon and has also divided the Saṅgha and persists for an eon. And there is that which neither divides the Saṅgha nor persists for an eon.

What is that which has divided the Saṅgha yet does not persist for an eon? One who has divided the Saṅgha while perceiving that one is acting in accordance with the Dharma — that is a division of the Saṅgha that does not persist for an eon.

What is that which persists for an eon yet has not divided the Saṅgha? The nāga king Śaktin, the nāga king Sthira, the nāga king Manāpa, the nāga king Priya, the nāga king Priyadarśin, the nāga king Lābhin, the nāga king Suvarṇāśva, the king of Yama, and the gods of the Brahma realm — these persist for an eon, yet they have not divided the Saṅgha.

What is that which both divides the Saṅgha and persists for an eon? Devadatta. He both divides the Saṅgha and persists for an eon.

What is that which neither divides the Saṅgha nor persists for an eon? Anything other than these forms just described.

Then a further question was posed: Does everything that has divided the Saṅgha thereby incur a fault that persists for an eon? And does everything that incurs a fault that persists for an eon constitute a division of the Saṅgha?

It was declared: There is that which has divided the Saṅgha yet does not incur a fault that persists for an eon. There is that which incurs a fault that persists for an eon yet has not divided the Saṅgha. There is that which both divides the Saṅgha and incurs a fault that persists for an eon. And there is that which neither divides the Saṅgha nor incurs a fault that persists for an eon.

What is that which has divided the Saṅgha yet does not incur a fault that persists for an eon? One who has divided the Saṅgha while perceiving that one is acting in accordance with the Dharma — this is a division of the Saṅgha that does not incur a fault that persists for an eon.

What is that which incurs a fault that persists for an eon yet has not divided the Saṅgha? The nāga king Śaktin, the nāga king Sthira, the nāga king Manāpa, the nāga king Priya, the nāga king Priyadarśin, the nāga king Lābhin, the nāga king Suvarṇāśva, the king of Yama, and the gods of the Brahma realm — these incur a fault that persists for an eon, yet they have not divided the Saṅgha.

What is that which both divides the Saṅgha and incurs a fault that persists for an eon? Devadatta. He both divides the Saṅgha and incurs a fault that persists for an eon.

What is that which neither divides the Saṅgha nor incurs a fault that persists for an eon? Anything other than these forms just described.

Then a question was posed: Is everything that has divided the Saṅgha thereby definitely going wrong? And is everything that is definitely going wrong a division of the Saṅgha?

It was declared: There is that which divides the Saṅgha yet is not definitely going wrong. There is that which is definitely going wrong yet does not divide the Saṅgha. There is that which both divides the Saṅgha and is definitely going wrong. And there is that which neither divides the Saṅgha nor is definitely going wrong.

What is that which divides the Saṅgha yet is not definitely going wrong? One who has divided the Saṅgha while perceiving that one is acting in accordance with the Dharma — that one divides the Saṅgha yet is not definitely going wrong.

What is that which is definitely going wrong yet does not divide the Saṅgha? One who has killed one's father, one who has killed one's mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent — these are cases of definitely going wrong, yet they do not divide the Saṅgha.

What is that which both divides the Saṅgha and is definitely going wrong? It is Devadatta. He both divided the Saṅgha and is definitely going wrong.

What is that which neither divides the Saṅgha nor is definitely going wrong? It is all those apart from the cases mentioned.

Now, is everyone who divides the Saṅgha unskilled, and does everyone who is unskilled speak in an unskilled manner? And is everyone who is unskilled and speaks in an unskilled manner thereby one who divides the Saṅgha?

The Blessed One declared: There are those who divide the Saṅgha and yet are neither unskilled nor speaking in an unskilled manner. There are those who are unskilled and speak in an unskilled manner and yet do not bring about a division of the Saṅgha. There are those who both divide the Saṅgha and are unskilled and speak in an unskilled manner. And there are those who neither divide the Saṅgha, nor are unskilled, nor speak in an unskilled manner.

What is it to divide the Saṅgha and yet be neither unskilled nor speaking in an unskilled manner? Whoever divides the Saṅgha while perceiving that one is acting in accordance with the Dharma — such a one divides the Saṅgha and yet is neither unskilled nor speaking in an unskilled manner.

What is it to be unskilled and to speak in an unskilled manner, and yet not bring about a division of the Saṅgha? It is one who is committed to the six teachers. Such a one is unskilled and speaks in an unskilled manner, and yet does not bring about a division of the Saṅgha.

What is it to both divide the Saṅgha and to be unskilled and speak in an unskilled manner? It is Devadatta. He both divided the Saṅgha and was unskilled and spoke in an unskilled manner.

What is it to neither divide the Saṅgha, nor be unskilled, nor speak in an unskilled manner? It is all those apart from the cases mentioned.

The venerable one then asked: Can a monk bring about a schism in the monks' Saṅgha? Or can a nun, a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice bring about a schism in the Saṅgha?

The Blessed One declared: A monk can bring about a schism in the Saṅgha. A nun, a female trainee, a male novice, and a female novice cannot bring about a schism in the Saṅgha.

The venerable one asked: Can a nun bring about a schism in the nuns' Saṅgha? Or can a monk, a female trainee, a male novice, or a female novice bring about a schism in the nuns' Saṅgha?

The Blessed One declared: A nun can bring about a schism in the nuns' Saṅgha. A monk, a female trainee, a male novice, and a female novice cannot bring about a schism in the nuns' Saṅgha.

The venerable one asked: Does blame accrue to the Saṅgha, or does blame accrue to the one who causes the division?

The Blessed One declared: The Saṅgha acquires merit, while blame accrues to the individual who causes the division.

The venerable one asked: If one has divided the Saṅgha, what transgression does one incur?

The Blessed One declared: It becomes a grave offense.

The venerable one asked: When the Saṅgha has been divided, what transgression should be confessed?

The Blessed One declared: It is a grave offense.

The venerable one asked: Does every one who sides with a faction thereby cease to reside, and does every one who ceases to reside thereby side with a faction?

The Blessed One declared: There are those who side with a faction and yet do not cease to reside. There are those who cease to reside and yet do not side with a faction. There are those who side with a faction and do come to cease residing. And there are those who neither side with a faction nor cease to reside.

What is it to side with a faction and yet not cease to reside? Whoever has sided with one of the five matters and yet has not incurred any of the four categories of transgression — that one sides with a faction and yet does not come to cease residing.

What is it to cease residing and yet not side with a faction? Whoever has incurred any one of the four categories of transgression and yet has not sided with any of the five matters — that one ceases to reside and yet does not side with a faction.

What is it to side with a faction and come to cease residing? Whoever has sided with the five matters and has also incurred any one of the four categories of transgression — that one both sides with a faction and ceases to reside.

What is it to neither side with a faction nor cease to reside? That is anyone who does not fall into any of the foregoing cases.

Then it was asked: Does everyone who ceases to reside thereupon separately abide? And does everyone who separately abides cease to reside?

The Blessed One declared: There are those who cease to reside and yet do not separately abide. There are those who separately abide and yet do not cease to reside. There are those who both cease to reside and separately abide. And there are those who neither cease to reside nor separately abide.

What is it to cease to reside and yet not separately abide? It is this: one has incurred any one of the four categories of transgression, and has been suspended by the Saṅgha on account of not seeing a fault, or for not making amends, or for not relinquishing a wrong view — and yet the suspension has not been lifted. That one ceases to reside but does not separately abide.

What is it to separately abide and yet not cease to reside? It is this: one has been suspended by the Saṅgha on account of not seeing a fault, or for not making amends, or for not relinquishing a wrong view, and that suspension has indeed been lifted — and yet one has not incurred any of the four categories of transgression. That one separately abides but does not cease to reside.

What is it to both cease to reside and separately abide? One has incurred any one of the four categories of transgression, has been suspended on account of not seeing a fault, or for not making amends, or for not relinquishing a wrong view, and that suspension has also been lifted — and one has still incurred any one of the four categories of transgression. That one both ceases to reside and separately abides.

What is it to neither cease to reside nor separately abide? It is anyone who does not fall into any of those cases. Those who fall outside all those cases are neither ceasing to reside nor separately abiding.

Then it was asked: Is what one is made to relinquish also called a penalty?

The Blessed One declared: What one relinquishes — that is identical to the penalty itself.

It was asked: What is the act? What is the object? The act is the action that extracts the transgression. The object is what has not been confessed.

It was asked: What is a sanction? What is imposing a sanction? What is lifting a sanction?

The Blessed One declared: Upāli, the name of that very thing is a sanction. Giving rise to the intention regarding it is imposing the sanction. Deliberating upon it in its eight aspects is lifting the sanction.

It was asked: If a transgression occurred while one was a nun and one has since become a monk, can there be purification? If a transgression occurred while one was a monk and one has since become a nun, can there be purification?

The Blessed One declared: Yes. How is it that a transgression that occurred while one was not yet a monk can be purified once one has become a monk? It is this: a transgression of the Saṅgha's residual offenses belonging exclusively to the order of nuns arose during the time when one was a nun; one then changed status; and having changed status, if one comes within the order of monk-fathers, that transgression is called a pure transgression.

How is it that a transgression that arose during the time of being a monk can be called pure during the time of being a nun? It is this: a transgression of the Saṅgha's residual offenses belonging to a different category arose during the time of being a monk; one then changed status; and having changed status, if one has become a nun, that transgression is called a pure transgression.

It was asked: Can there be purification in a case where a transgression was incurred without knowing, when one subsequently acts with knowing? Can there be purification where a transgression was incurred with knowing, when one subsequently acts without knowing?

The Blessed One declared: Yes. How is it that a transgression incurred without knowing can be purified when one acts with knowing? It is this: a monk, lifted from sleep, was placed upon a large, high bed; or, while lying in sleep, was placed in a woman's bed; or someone not fully ordained was brought out and slept alongside him; or that person not fully ordained then came back, sat down, and when the monk awoke and proceeded to carry out again that same transgression in the lawful manner — this is a case in which a transgression was incurred without knowing, and purification came about with knowing.

It was asked: What is a case in which a transgression was incurred with knowing and purification comes about without knowing? It is this: a monk incurred a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression within the Saṅgha. The formal acts of speech were being performed to remove it; the preliminary recitation had been done; he then fell asleep, and the three formal acts of speech were completed to the end; and when he rose — such a case as this is one in which a transgression was incurred with knowing and purification came about without knowing.

It was asked: Can there be a case where a transgression arose during sleep and purification comes about upon waking? And can there be a case where a transgression arose upon waking and purification comes about during sleep? The Blessed One declared: Yes. What is a case in which a transgression arose during sleep and purification comes about upon waking? It is this: a monk, lifted from sleep, was placed in the vicinity of a high and large bed; or, while lying in sleep, was placed in a woman's bed; or someone not fully ordained was brought out; and that person not fully ordained then came back beneath where he was lying, sat down, and when the monk awoke and proceeded to carry out that same transgression again in the lawful manner — this is a case in which a transgression arose during sleep and purification came about upon waking.

What is a case in which a transgression arose upon waking and purification comes about during sleep? It is this: a monk incurred a saṅghāvaśeṣa transgression within the Saṅgha. The formal acts of speech were being performed to remove it; the preliminary recitation had been done; he then fell asleep, and the three formal acts of speech were completed to the end; and when he rose — such a case as this is one in which a transgression arose upon waking and purification came about during sleep.

It was asked: Can it happen that a monk, by speaking a single utterance to its conclusion, thereby incurs three defeats? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: a monk, together with a nun, says the following: "Whenever I saw the householder so-and-so, he took something of great value without it being given, was cut off from his livelihood, and you should know that I too have attained arhatship" — and all of that is spoken to completion by the nun. Such a case produces three defeats for the monk.

It was asked: Can it happen that a monk, by speaking a single utterance to its conclusion, incurs four defeats? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: a monk, together with a nun, declares: "Whenever you saw me, the householder so-and-so took something without it being given, was separated from his livelihood, and the object referred to as such-and-such was taken by theft, and you should know that I have attained arhatship" — and the monk speaks all of this as a boast.

It was asked: Can it happen that a monk, while dwelling in a single place, incurs five heaps of transgression? The Blessed One declared: Yes. Using just the amount of the Teacher's robes is a misdeed. If, from a village bound by the training precepts and its code of restraint, one takes food and provisions with one's own hand, it becomes a matter for individual confession. Teaching the Dharma to a woman beyond five or six sentences is a downfall. Speaking words of corrupt conduct to a woman becomes a saṅghāvaśeṣa matter. Claiming for oneself, falsely, a state superior to human beings before a woman becomes a defeat.

It was asked: Can a monk, through a single act, incur a hundred transgressions, or a thousand, or even more than that? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: a monk, consumed by burning anger, his mind agitated and disturbed, scatters — whether by throwing cooked peas or by throwing flour — upon a large crowd of people assembled and gathered together; and however many are struck by it, that many transgressions does he incur.

It was asked: Can there be a case in which a monk carries an item of great value from one place to another, and yet it does not become a defeat? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: an item belonging to a non-human being that is of great value, that is, one which does not reach the value of five māṣas.

It was asked: Can a monk incur a defeat by stealing three māṣas? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: when three māṣas constitute a thing of great value.

It was asked: Can a monk steal five māṣas and yet it not become a defeat? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: when a kārṣāpaṇa constitutes a thing of little value.

It was asked: Can there be a case in which taking something small without it being given constitutes a transgression, and yet taking that very same small thing without it being given does not constitute a transgression? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: taking even a small amount from white wool becomes an offense. Taking even a small amount from black wool does not become an offense.

It was asked: Can there be a case in which doing more than what is equal constitutes a transgression, and yet doing more than what is equal does not constitute a transgression? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: doing more than the equal measure of black cloth becomes an offense. Doing more than what is equal with white wool does not become an offense.

It was asked: Can there be a case in which not doing what should be done constitutes a transgression, and in which doing it constitutes no transgression? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: a monk who has obtained a new robe is required to perform one of the three color-alterations; not having performed any of the three color-alterations is the offense. Having done so, there is no offense.

It was asked: Can there be a case in which making something to the proper measure constitutes a transgression, and in which making something to the proper measure does not constitute a transgression? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: making a robe to the measure of the Tathāgata's robe constitutes an offense. Making it to the measure of a maṇḍala does not constitute an offense.

It was asked: Can there be a case in which, with the very same object with which a monk enters into the first meditative concentration and that object thereby becomes a remainder belonging to the Saṅgha, he also enters into the second, third, and fourth meditative concentrations with that very same object, and it likewise becomes a remainder belonging to the Saṅgha? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: when that monk, about to enter the first meditative concentration, gives the instruction, "Let a house be built for me," and immediately upon giving that instruction he enters the first meditative concentration, and while he is in meditative equipoise in the first concentration the house is completed — then that house becomes a remainder belonging to the Saṅgha. And if, on account of that very same object, he again gives the instruction, "Let a house be built for me," immediately before entering the second, third, or fourth meditative concentration, and immediately upon giving that instruction he enters the second, third, or fourth concentration, and while in that state the house is again completed — then it likewise becomes a remainder belonging to the Saṅgha.

It was asked: Can there be a monk who has committed no transgression anywhere, who has committed not even the slightest misdeed, and yet who is unfit to be a monk? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: one who has undergone a change of sex.

It was asked: Can there be a nun who has committed no transgression anywhere, who has committed not even the slightest misdeed — not so much as having shaken and worn the lower robe below the waist — and yet who is unfit to be a nun? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: one who has undergone a change of sex.

It was asked: Can there be a monk who has entered a temple, and within that very temple has his robe with him, and yet may be called one who has let the rains retreat lapse, and also be called one who is separated from his robe, and who has moreover violated his commitment? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: when the final seventh day of the rains retreat which the monk entered has arrived, and he has left his robe — without having consecrated it — lying on a chair, a small chair, or a support, open to the sky above, and then dawn breaks — he is called one who has let the rains retreat lapse, and is also called one who is separated from his robe.

And one may also be called one who has violated his commitment.

Is it possible that a monk alone who has entered a temple may incur a root defeat? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is sexual misconduct — namely, a long pillow and a bolster.

And what of taking what is not given, and taking life? A monk who uses a device and enters inside may have both stolen and taken a life.

And what is the cause of lying? It is this: saying "I am an arhat" or "I am a buddha."

Is it possible that a monk who is separated from the livelihood of a monk — though he is neither a monk nor an arhat — may yet incur a root defeat, and that it may further become a crime without interval? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: when the mother of that monk has gone forth and received full ordination, and then changes her sex, and having changed her sex is separated from her livelihood — that is a root defeat, and it also becomes a crime without interval.

Is it possible that a nun who is separated from the livelihood of a nun — though she is neither a nun nor an arhat — may yet incur a root defeat and that it may further become a crime without interval? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: when the father of that nun has gone forth and received full ordination, and then changes his sex, and having changed his sex is separated from her livelihood — that is a root defeat, and it also becomes a crime without interval.

Is it possible that another speaks, and by reason of what that one has said another may incur a root defeat? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: a nun who sides with a monk assembly that has not been restrained by the Saṅgha, and who, even after being instructed up to three times in the midst of the Saṅgha to desist, does not desist — that is a root defeat.

Is it possible that another speaks, and by reason of what that one has said, another may become one who has gone beyond what is proper for the Saṅgha? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: whoever has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, and who sides with that cause, and who, even after being instructed up to three times within the Saṅgha to desist from words of divisiveness that are difficult to hear, does not desist — that one becomes one who has gone beyond what is proper for the Saṅgha.

Is it possible that another speaks, and by reason of what that one has said, another may commit a transgression? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: whatever monk has taken up and firmly held a wrong view, and who, even after being instructed up to three times within the Saṅgha to desist, does not desist — that is a transgression.

Is it possible that another speaks, and by reason of what that one has said, another must confess? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: a monk who, when invited to a home and eating a meal there, a nun who is directing the serving is present and says, "Give this one rice, give this one legumes, give this one as well" — if he eats what is served without having signaled her, he must confess.

Is it possible that another speaks, and by reason of what that one has said, another commits a fault? The Blessed One declared: Yes. It is this: whatever monk, when the Prātimokṣa sūtra (the code of individual liberation) is being recited, is aware of an offense and yet, even after it has been proclaimed up to three times within the Saṅgha, does not rise to confess — that becomes a fault committed.

Venerable Blessed One, it has been said that once a nun has surrendered her training, she may not again be fully ordained into the state of being a nun, and that any nuns who readmit her to going forth or to full ordination are themselves at fault.

Venerable Blessed One, if from that nun who has surrendered her training and disrobed, those other nuns admit her to going forth and grant her full ordination, and the full ordination is valid — is there a case in which they would incur no fault? The Blessed One declared: There is. It is this: if that nun who has surrendered her training and disrobed has undergone a change of marks, and having changed marks has become male, and she is then admitted to going forth and granted full ordination, no fault is incurred.

Venerable Blessed One, if you have previously said, "Do not admit that former disruptive one to going forth; do not grant her full ordination" — and yet that formerly disruptive one is admitted to going forth and granted full ordination — can there be a case in which the full ordination is nonetheless valid and no fault is incurred? There is. It is this: if that nun has incurred a defeat offense of a kind not shared in common, and having surrendered her training has disrobed, and she has then undergone a change of marks and been born male, and she is admitted to going forth and granted full ordination — no fault is incurred.

What are all the types that formal acts may comprise? The Blessed One declared: Three kinds: the act by motion, the act by motion with two proclamations, and the act by motion with four proclamations.

Venerable Blessed One, you have declared that there are one hundred and one formal acts. Of these, how many are subsumed by the act by motion, how many by the act with two proclamations, and how many by the act with four proclamations? The Blessed One declared: Twenty-four are by motion alone. Forty-seven are by motion with two proclamations. Thirty are by motion with four proclamations.

Is there a case in which, though no word is spoken and no physical gesture is made, one is nonetheless disqualified from being a monk? The Blessed One declared: There is. It is this: if a nun, having seen a nun commit a defeat offense, conceals it, and then dawn breaks, she herself incurs defeat.

Is there a case in which a monk incurs four groups of offenses, does not confess them, and has not had the formal act of rehabilitation performed, and yet when he departs he is without fault? The Blessed One declared: There is. One who has changed marks.

Is there a case in which a nun incurs five groups of offenses, does not confess them, and has not had the formal act of rehabilitation performed, and yet when she departs she is without fault? The Blessed One declared: There is. One who has changed marks.

Is there a case in which a monk who takes a human life does not incur a defeat? The Blessed One declared: There is. It is this: when two are dwelling together and one intends to kill the other but instead kills someone else.

Can there be a case in which sexual misconduct is committed by another, and yet defeat is incurred? The Blessed One declared: There is. It is this: if a nun sees sexual misconduct being committed and conceals it, and then dawn breaks, defeat is incurred.

Is there a case in which a monk incurs a defeat through sexual misconduct, and also a case in which he engages in sexual misconduct yet does not incur a defeat? The Blessed One declared: There is. If one who is unwounded engages in sexual misconduct together with another, defeat is incurred. If one who is wounded engages in it together with another, defeat is not incurred.

Is there a case in which taking what is not given results in defeat, and also a case in which taking what is not given does not result in defeat? The Blessed One declared: There is. If one takes without permission an article of value belonging to a human being, that is defeat. If one takes an article of value belonging to a non-human being without permission, it does not become a defeat offense.

Is there a case in which a monk incurs defeat through depriving a human being of life, and also a case in which he deprives a human being of life yet does not incur defeat? There is. If one deprives a human being of life with one's own hand, that is defeat.

If one deprives a human being of life through a misapplied perception directed toward someone else, that does not result in defeat.

Is there a case in which a monk incurs defeat by personally declaring to a human being a superhuman quality that he himself does not possess, and also a case in which he declares to a human being a superhuman quality that does not exist, yet does not incur defeat? The Blessed One declared: There is. If one declares it with a fabricated perception, directing it as a pronouncement of authorization, that is defeat. But if there is such a declaration and it is given as a pronouncement of authorization straightforwardly, without fabrication, then it is not defeat.

Is there a case in which the very same thing that constitutes a defeat offense does not constitute a defeat offense? The Blessed One declared: There is. If a nun allows her body to be touched all over, that is defeat. If a monk does the same, it is not a defeat offense. If a nun knowingly conceals a grave offense of another nun until dawn breaks, that is a defeat offense. If a monk conceals it, it is not a defeat offense. If the Saṅgha, perceiving a monk's conduct to be in accordance with the Dharma, expels him for something unseen, and a nun knowingly takes his side and, though instructed up to three times in the midst of the Saṅgha, refuses to release that position, that is defeat. If she instructs a monk and he refuses to release it, that is not a defeat offense.

Is there a case in which the very same thing that constitutes a Saṅgha remainder offense does not constitute a Saṅgha remainder offense? The Blessed One declared: There is. If a monk intentionally causes emission of semen, that is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If a nun causes emission of semen, that is not a Saṅgha remainder offense for her. If a monk touches a body all over, that is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If a nun touches, that is not a Saṅgha remainder offense for her. If a nun, having abandoned her proper station, touches in that way, that is a Saṅgha remainder offense. If a monk does so, that is not a Saṅgha remainder offense.

Is there a case in which the very same thing that constitutes a transgression does not constitute a transgression? The Blessed One declared: There is. If a nun intentionally causes emission of semen, that is a transgression. If a monk causes emission, that is not a transgression. If a monk accepts cooked food and provisions solicited from someone who is not a relative, that is a transgression. If a nun accepts it, that is not a transgression. If a nun defecates or urinates on green grass, that is a transgression. If a monk does so, that is not a transgression.

Is there a case in which the very same thing that constitutes an offense requiring confession does not constitute an offense requiring confession? The Blessed One declared: If a monk accepts cooked food and provisions solicited from someone who is not a relative, that is an offense requiring confession. If a nun accepts it, that is not an offense requiring confession. If a monk, in a village bound by the training rules, takes food and provisions with his own hand, that is an offense requiring confession. If a nun takes it, that is not an offense requiring confession.

Is there a case in which the very same thing that constitutes a wrongdoing does not constitute a wrongdoing? The Blessed One declared: If a monk defecates or urinates on green grass, that is a wrongdoing. If a nun does so, that is not a wrongdoing. If a nun wraps her lower robe so that it extends past the waist, that is a wrongdoing. If a monk wraps his lower robe past the waist, there is no offense.

Is there a case in which what counts as having gone beyond an offense does not constitute a transgression, and what counts as a transgression does nonetheless constitute having gone beyond it? The Blessed One declared: There is. It is as follows. When a formal act of suspension is being carried out against a monk on account of an offense that is a remainder for the Saṅgha, if during that act he is sitting with shoes on, or sitting with both knees clasped in his arms, or with his head covered, or cutting green grass, or drawing lines in the earth, offenses arising from such conduct arise as offenses from what one thought was going beyond it. What then is the case of having gone beyond on account of thinking an offense has occurred? It is as follows. When that monk, thinking an offense incompatible with the Saṅgha's remainder has occurred, has his name transferred on that account, and the transfer of name is to a nun, then in that way it constitutes having gone beyond on account of thinking an offense has occurred.

Is there a case in which what one takes to be a dissolution of a boundary is in fact an interruption of an act? The Blessed One declared: There is. The boundary of the formal act may be dissolved while the boundary of the village remains undissolved. What is it that follows in the wake of what has gone? The Blessed One declared: It is the boundary.

Is there a case in which five categories of offense arise for a monk? The Blessed One declared: There is. If he makes a woman's robe, that is a wrongdoing. If he takes food and provisions with his own hand from a village bound by the training rules, that is an offense requiring confession. If he teaches the Dharma to a woman in more than five or six sentences, that is a downfall. If he speaks words of reproach to a woman, that is a gross offense that is a remainder for the Saṅgha. If he speaks falsely to a woman claiming to have realized a superhuman Dharma, that is a defeat.

Venerable sir, if we have a question about the Vinaya, where should we seek the answer? The Blessed One declared: From the two codes of individual liberation, from the division texts, and from the accompanying texts; from the eighteen topics of Vinaya and the two introductory narratives that stand alone; from the continuation texts that go beyond the one Vinaya; from what is common and what is not common; and from the transfer of names on the ground and in the intermediate space.

Blessed One, there is one who does not belong to any of the destinies of existence, who is not included within what has been taught, who has not passed into nirvāṇa, and who will not pass into nirvāṇa — what is that? The Blessed One declared: Upāli, it is an emanation body. If it is killed, what offense is incurred? The Blessed One declared: A gross offense. If it is killed, what offense is to be confessed? The Blessed One declared: A gross offense.

Thus is the subject matter of the noble Vinaya complete.

The noble Vinaya, the forty-sixth fascicle, being a summary of the Mānavikā Sūtra:

Suitable mixtures, two kinds — molasses-water and the like,
Five types — meat, insects, and lotus;
Morning consumption, and what has been received,
Intoxication, laymen, novices, and monks.

In brief:

Those who are assembled, and those who are infants,
The blind, and also those with birthmarks,
Excepting the young ones,
The rest are suitable.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: Venerable sir, when the Blessed One declared that full ordination is permissible in a border region with a Vinaya master and five, if ten are present and full ordination is conferred with a Vinaya master and five, should it be called full ordination or not full ordination? Upāli, it is to be called fully ordained as a monk, and the members of the Saṅgha are included in those who are present and accounted for.

Venerable sir, when the Blessed One declared that if a Dharma robe is obtained and held beyond ten days it becomes an offense involving forfeiture, how much time must elapse before one is able to obtain a Dharma robe?

At the moment when one finds it and sees it, and has touched it with the hand or taken it into one's lap, and has generated the perception "this is my robe" — that is how a robe is obtained by a sighted person. By how much does a blind person obtain a robe? At the moment when one has heard of it and taken it in hand or taken it into one's lap, and has generated the perception "this is my robe" — that is how a robe is obtained by a blind person.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One the Buddha: "Is it permissible for a robe that is half-marked with lines and half-unmarked?" "Upāli, it is not permissible. Is there another supporting hem on top of it?" "If it has become worn out, then it is permissible."

"Venerable sir, the Blessed One declared: 'Hold onto the tail and cross the river.' Is it permissible to cross a river by holding onto something other than a mount?" "It is permissible. If one holds onto an ox, or a horse, or a buffalo, or a yak, and crosses a river, there is no offense."

In brief:

Sugar cane, and seven-day fat,
salt and grain-oil are permitted.

Whatever the monk has made permissible, where it is not permissible, it remains impermissible.

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One the Buddha: "Venerable sir, is it permissible to bless sugarcane beer for seven days?" "Upāli, it is permissible." "For how long may one drink it?" "So long as one does not become intoxicated, it is not mixed with food, it has not turned turbid, it has not become oppressive, and it has not come from one's own brewing."

Venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One the Buddha: "Venerable sir, is it permissible to eat salt boiled from impermissible fat?" "Upāli, it is not permissible. If it has been reduced to ash, then eating it is no offense."

"Venerable sir, is it permissible to eat grain-oil cooked from impermissible medicine?" "Upāli, it is not permissible. But if it is applied to the eye, the ear, or the nose, there is no offense."

If a monk himself, by fire, by knife, or by nail, renders permissible the five kinds of seeds that would germinate — is that called having rendered them permissible? May they be eaten? They may, except for whatever is rendered permissible by fire; whoever renders them permissible by fire incurs the offense of destroying seeds not yet made impermissible.

If a tree has grown in an impermissible place and its fruit falls in a permissible place, may it be eaten? "Upāli, it is not permissible." If a tree has grown in a permissible place and its fruit falls in an impermissible place, may it be eaten? "Upāli, it is permissible, as the days have not elapsed."

In brief:

Two cases in which they become permissible:

that which is not food,
what is known as human milk, and what has turned into sour whey.

When the five kinds of seeds are in a permissible place and are absent, yet they are rendered permissible in an impermissible place by fire, by knife, or by nail — is that called having rendered them permissible or not? It is called having been done. May they be eaten? "Upāli, they may not be eaten."

When a monk is in a permissible place and renders the five kinds of seeds in a permissible place permissible by fire, by knife, or by nail — is that called having been done or not? It is called having been done. May they be eaten? "Upāli, they may not, except where they have been rendered impermissible by fire. Whoever renders them permissible incurs the offense of destroying seeds."

May one take them away, or leave them unburned, or put them in a nest or inside a basket and eat them? "Upāli, that is permissible." May human milk be eaten? "Upāli, it may not, except when needed as eye medicine." May sour whey be eaten at an improper time? "Upāli, it is permissible."

In brief:

Human flesh, and what is known as having been killed intentionally, and the flesh of impermissible animals — all of these must not be eaten.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "Venerable One, may human flesh be sought?" "Upāli, it may not." "Venerable One, what offense does one who transgresses this incur?" "A grave offense."

"Apart from human flesh, may the flesh of other permissible animals that were killed intentionally on one's behalf be sought?" "Upāli, it may not." "May the flesh of impermissible animals be sought?" "Upāli, it may not."

In brief:

Insects, lotuses, and horses, and frogs as well — one must not eat them.
All those creatures without exception are not to be eaten.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "May the flesh of insects and lotuses be sought?" "Upāli, it may not." "May the flesh of birds and woodpeckers be sought?" "Upāli, it may not." "May the flesh of frogs be sought?" "Upāli, it may not." "May the flesh of creatures of that kind be sought?" "Upāli, it may not."

In brief:

Mixed together with what is permissible, it may not be eaten even for seven days.
The same applies to fat — combined with molasses tree and the earlier-stage product.

The venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "If the early-stage medicine is mixed with the afternoon medicine, may it be taken?" "Upāli, it may not." "If the afternoon medicine is mixed with the seven-day medicine, may it be taken?" "Upāli, it may not." "If the seven-day medicine is mixed with the life-long medicine, is it permissible?" "Upāli, it may not." "Venerable One, if that same substance is the early-stage form, may it also serve as the afternoon medicine, the seven-day medicine, and the life-long medicine?" "Upāli, it is permissible. The molasses tree in its early stage is the early-stage medicine; the juice pressed from it thereafter is the afternoon medicine; the juice boiled down into molasses from that is the seven-day medicine; and that seven-day substance burned to ash is the life-long medicine."

"May that same substance serve simultaneously as the early-stage, the seven-day, and the life-long medicine for that very same thing?" "It is permissible. Flesh is the early-stage form; the fat rendered by cooking it thereafter is the seven-day medicine; and the ash of that seven-day substance burned thereafter is the life-long medicine."

In brief:

Received in the proper manner, yet not consecrated — a sick person tormented by illness, and the eighth kind of medicinal drink.

"May these early-stage medicines be consecrated for storage?" "Upāli, they may not — and likewise for the afternoon medicines, the seven-day medicines, and the life-long medicines." "Similarly, may what has not been properly received, what has been cooked indoors, what has been fetched, and what is of impermissible kinds be sought?" "Upāli, they may not." "May what has been properly received yet not consecrated be sought?" "Upāli, it may not." "May what has been received again and not consecrated be sought by one who is well?" "Upāli, it may not." "May what has been received again and not consecrated be sought by a sick person?" "Upāli, it is permissible."

Then the venerable Upāli asked the Blessed One, the Buddha: "What should be given to a sick person?" "Whatever is accompanied by an offense that would result in the sick person recovering — that should be given to the sick person."

The Blessed One permitted drinks of eight kinds. If the medicinal drink in question is mixed with root medicines, stem medicines, leaf medicines, or flower medicines, may it be taken? "Upāli, it is permissible." For how long is it permissible? "As long as one does not become intoxicated, as long as it is not mixed with food and does not become turbid, and as long as it remains a medicinal drink."

In brief:

If one becomes drunk, it must be consecrated.

If one is sitting alone, and it is not consecrated upon one's robe — that belongs to the Saṅgha beyond the boundary.

"May robes be taken from a mad person?" It was declared: "From some they may be taken; from others they may not." "From whom may they be taken?" "From one who has a father, or a mother, or an elder or younger brother, or a sister, or one who gave them from a household — from such a person they may be taken." "From whom may they not be taken?"

"From one who has no father, no mother, no elder or younger brother, no sister, and no one from a household who gave it — from such a person it may not be taken."

"From what point onward may a mad person's robe be consecrated?" "From the moment that person's mind returns to its proper state."

"Venerable monks, if there is a single monk staying alone, and laypeople have offered a robe for the sake of the Saṅgha — a robe that the Saṅgha is to distribute in open assembly — how should that monk proceed upon receiving the robe?" It was declared: "Upāli, for that reason, let that monk generate this intention and also pronounce these words aloud: 'I am staying here alone. This robe has been given for the sake of the Saṅgha and is to be properly distributed by the Saṅgha in open assembly. I therefore take it under my own authority on account of illness, and I shall use it.' " He may do so. He should then consecrate it. Having used it, having set it aside, and having consecrated it, if he has done all this, it is said that the act has been performed. Even if other monks arrive, shares should not be given to them. If he does not proceed in this way, that monk alone must not carry off that robe — if he takes it, a transgression with remainder will result. If those other monks are equally entitled, and one of them, having consecrated it alone for the sake of the Saṅgha, then goes beyond the boundary and takes it, that becomes an offense. If it is done with the intention to steal, a transgression with remainder will result.

In brief:

A layman's son,
the rains retreat having become manifest, and monks of the past and future —
thus has the rains retreat been broken.

"If a layman's son has fallen ill, may a robe be taken from him or not?" The Blessed One declared: "It may not be taken."

"If this robe has been offered to a Saṅgha observing the rains retreat, yet it is not yet the final month of the rains, and no fixed residence has been established there — even though it is not the final month and no fixed residence has been established — those who are observing the rains retreat shall have the right to that robe. If it is said that this robe belongs to those of the Saṅgha who are present in open assembly, then also, even if it has become the final month and a fixed residence has been established there, those who did not observe the rains there shall also have the right to that robe."

"If this robe has been offered to the Saṅgha assembled in open meeting, and a monk stays at that place the following year, then stays again, stays a third time, and in the same manner continues to stay for up to ten subsequent years, and it is said that the robe is offered to them — then it has come to be the final month of the rains, and a fixed residence has also been established.

Even though it has become the final month, those to whom it is given have the right to it, and the matter is explained in full from the earlier first and second months up through the tenth."

"If a monk observing the rains retreat goes beyond the boundary for some business of the Saṅgha, from where shall his share of the rains retreat be granted?" "From the place for whose sake he went, and where he stayed for a long time."

"Should a share of robes be given to one who has broken the rains retreat?" "To some it should be given; to others it should not." "To whom should it be given?" "To one for whom there is both a prior period and a subsequent period, and who stayed for a long time at that place." "To whom should it not be given?" "To one for whom there is neither a prior period nor a subsequent period, and who did not stay for a long time."

In brief:

For the sake of one who is sick,
having become a nurse, having made it suitable and given the training —
how should one properly use those goods?

"When a monk who is acting as a nurse goes beyond the boundary for some purpose, and..."

...after going beyond that boundary, if the sick person then passes away, should the nurse's robes be given to him or not? To some it should be given; to others it should not. To whom should it be given? To one who was engaged in attending upon the sick person, that one should receive them. To one who was engaged in attending upon his own affairs or the affairs of others, that one should not receive them.

If a layman acts as nurse to the sick person, should robes be given to him or not? It was declared: they should not be given. Likewise, a fully ordained nun, a probationary nun, and a novice nun — to these also they should not be given. If a novice monk acts as nurse, should nursing robes be given to him? It was declared: they should be given. How much should be given? Equal to everyone else's share.

If a nurse entered the rains retreat elsewhere and falls ill, should nursing robes be given to that person? The Blessed One declared: they should be given.

Who is to act as nurse? The preceptor, the teacher, one who shares the same preceptor, one who shares the same teacher, a fellow-speaker, a co-reciter, an instructor, a companion in practice, or a pupil. If none of these are present, the Saṅgha should appoint a nurse. If the Saṅgha also does not appoint a nurse, there is an offense and wrongdoing. If the nurse also fails to nurse the sick person, that too becomes a wrongdoing. If the sick person does not heed the nurse when the nurse instructs him in accordance with Dharma, that becomes a wrongdoing. And the same applies to the sick person in return.

For how long should one act as nurse to a sick person? Until the sick person either dies or recovers. One abandons what is not beneficial; one accomplishes what is beneficial; and the training is given so that one does not cause matters to deteriorate. From when does one consecrate the robes once they are found? From the time they are obtained. How should the goods be used properly? With the thought: "By means of whatever is unsuitable, I shall accomplish what is suitable, and I shall set aside medicine for the sick."

In brief, the four residences for a monk are: permission, cloth, the departure-and-return, and three — the thick cloth of non-Buddhist mendicants. Can a monk who neither [intends it to be a prior period] nor [a subsequent period] enter the rains retreat at all four residences simultaneously in a proper manner, and yet not commit an offense? Yes, it is possible. It is like this: that monk presses down on the boundary of all four residences — whether it be a throne, a door-latch, or a fence — and enters the rains retreat in a proper manner; it is still called a proper entry, and there is no offense. From where does he receive his share of robes? From all of them. If one holds a rains cloth smaller than the prescribed measure, what offense is that? It was declared: it becomes a wrongdoing. Likewise it is the same for covering the back and fastening the edges. If one fastens the edges with the departure-and-return robe, is that called "fastening" or "not fastening"? It was declared: it should be called "not fastened." What is that robe? One obtained from a journey onward. If one distributes the robes that were set aside, what transgression is that? It was declared: it is a wrongdoing. If one carries the three things of a non-Buddhist standard — no robe, peacock feathers, and a hair-charm — what is the transgression? It becomes a grave offense. If one takes hold of a non-Buddhist standard other than those three, what does it become? The Blessed One declared: it is a wrongdoing.

This is the first section on discipline from the noble Vinaya text, dealing with the opening of the section on nuns. It is complete.

In brief: the three — old cloth, the departure cloth, and the long cloth — with how many wrongdoings for the base offense; how the action is performed with kauśāmbī cloth; action and base offense were then proclaimed. What was gathered up and summarized has now been proclaimed.

In brief: the old and the second, the fresh; the colored and the unstored; the unsuitable — likewise; the distributed and the permissibly undistributed.

The Blessed One declared: if one stores worn cloth, it is stored; if one does not store it, it is not stored. When asked, "What is worn cloth?" — it is any cloth that has already been stored. The Blessed One declared: if one stores fresh cloth, it is stored. When asked, "What is fresh cloth?" — it is any cloth not previously stored.

The Blessed One declared: when a monk who has stored cloth comes to receive cloth, he must generate three mental intentions. He must go first. When he reaches the end, even if only three threads of edging remain, he must still generate the three mental intentions. He must wash it, match it, dye it, and also make the half-and-third of the circle.

When asked: if one who has stored cloth generates the three mental intentions, does one call it stored? — or rather: "This cloth I dedicate as a stored robe for the Saṅgha — by me," generating two mental intentions? If one generates those two mental intentions and then stores it, in that case of storing, it becomes a wrongdoing. If one stores a robe that is to be abandoned, it is not considered stored. When asked, "What is a robe to be abandoned?" — it is one that has exceeded ten days or has been separated from one for a single night.

If one stores an unsuitable robe, it is not considered stored. When asked, "What is an unsuitable robe?" — it is any robe whose material is unsuitable. If one stores a divided old robe, it is not considered stored. When asked, "What is a divided old robe?" — it is any robe that a monk has permanently divided. If one stores an undivided robe, it is considered stored. When asked, "What is an undivided robe?" — it is any robe newly made from its material. If one stores an undivided but permissible robe, it is considered stored. When asked, "What is an undivided but permissible robe?" — if it possesses a border, and one stores it, it is called stored.

In brief:

Without having stored it, the Saṅgha divides it;
Having stored it, one then divides it — what one person does with a single portion is what becomes obtained.

The Blessed One was asked: in a place where the cloth has not been stored, if the Saṅgha divides it and one person takes one portion or two portions and then stores it, is that called stored? Upāli replied: it is called stored. Is everything then called stored? Upāli replied: no — those for which it was stored are called stored; those for which it was not stored are called not stored.

The Blessed One was asked: in a place where the cloth has been stored, if the Saṅgha divides it and whether one person with one portion or with two portions stores it, is that called having removed the stored robe? Upāli replied: it is removed. Is everything then called removed? Upāli replied: no — those who removed the stored robe are called removed; those who did not remove it are not called having removed the stored robe.

When the Saṅgha has divided into those of one side and those of the other, and has separated, who then may store? The Blessed One declared: those who speak in accordance with the Dharma.

The Blessed One was asked: if cloth has not been obtained and one stores it for the Saṅgha, is it called stored or not stored? Upāli replied: it is called not stored. The Blessed One was asked: if cloth has been obtained and one then stores it, is it called stored? Upāli replied: it is called stored.

In brief:

Generating the three intentions, being diligent, the conditions and the meaning of storage —
Upāli finds this matter intricate.

The Blessed One declared: when a monk who has stored cloth finally draws the needle through at the end, he must generate the three mental intentions. When asked what these are, one declares: "This cloth I shall dedicate as stored for the Saṅgha. This cloth is being dedicated. This cloth is being stored." If one who is dedicating storage generates the three mental intentions in this way, is it called stored?

Is it called not stored, or is it called stored? It is called stored. However, the two mental intentions that were generated previously must be generated again as before. If those two intentions are not generated, what happens? It is called definitively stored. Definitively dedicating it without generating those two intentions becomes a transgression. Regarding the occasions for carelessness in a place where cloth is definitively stored, there are five: wearing whatever cloth one finds; entering a village without having put on the patch-robe; eating in a group; eating repeatedly; making use of things without having assigned them; and going to the provinces wearing the upper and lower robes as traveling garments.

Venerable one, there are five conditions of time when, even if the patch-robe has not been set aside, separation does not occur: just as those who come together during the rains retreat as described in the Vinaya, so too is the setting aside of the great rains-retreat cloth.

What is the meaning of the term "definitively stored"? "Definitively stored" refers to cloth — specifically, cloth that has been dedicated as a permanent store for the Saṅgha.

Venerable one, what is the meaning of what the Blessed One said to Upāli: "You are someone whose place is entangled"? A place where cloth has been obtained is called "entangled."

In brief:

Examined cloth, the third month, timing, that which has been worn out, five persons, and one like a mother —
the third category is dedication by three persons, and that concludes the matter.

When the Blessed One declared, "If one stores examined cloth as a permanent store, it is called definitively stored" — what is examined cloth? It is cloth obtained at a time when an opportunity for distribution is about to arise within a certain number of days.

When the Blessed One declared, "If cloth obtained after three months have passed is stored as a permanent store, it is called definitively stored" — what is cloth obtained after three months have passed? The resident monks numbered fifteen. Then suddenly a large number of monks arrived, and these newcomers were of pure view and harmony. Their count came to fourteen days. Now, if those who arrived suddenly acted as the resident monks did, then whatever cloth was obtained at that time is cloth obtained after three months have passed; and if it is stored as a permanent store, it is called definitively stored.

When the Blessed One declared, "If the timely cloth is stored as a permanent store, it is called definitively stored" — what is timely cloth? It is cloth obtained in the final month of the rains retreat.

When the Blessed One declared, "If worn-out cloth is stored as a permanent store, it is not definitively stored" — what is worn-out cloth? It is whatever has fallen away from the body of a monk.

When five kinds of persons store cloth as a permanent store, it is not definitively stored. What are the five? One who has not entered the rains retreat; one who has broken the rains retreat; one who entered the later rains retreat; one who has abandoned the training; and one who has sided against the Saṅgha.

From the basis that is like a mother, storage is released by eight such factors. What is reckoned as compatible? All the remainder, excluding the final two categories, are not reckoned as compatible.

If storage is dedicated with fewer than four, is it called definitively stored, or not stored? It is called not stored. Likewise, if the four — such as a householder, or one who has drawn blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent — were to dedicate storage, it would not be stored.

Can there be a case where, on the very day that a permanent store is dedicated, the store is released without a request having been made and without the act having been performed? Yes, there can. This is how it is: the resident monks dedicated the permanent store on the sixteenth day of the month, and suddenly a large number of monks arrived. These monks too were of pure view, in harmony of place and view, and for them that day was the fifteenth. If the resident monks then acted in accordance with these newcomers and performed the restoration ceremony on that day, the permanent store would be released without a request having been made and without the act having been performed.

In brief:

In what measure, and for the Saṅgha — three aspects of that rule — another bringing comfort to another, and the restoration ceremony of the monks.

To what extent is a person one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha? When the Saṅgha — the assembly of śrāvakas of the Tathāgata — is split, that person incurs a transgression entailing the Avīci hell, and it also becomes an act of immediate karmic consequence. Upāli, this is as follows: when a monk, through a perception that what is not Dharma is not Dharma, elaborates upon it in the eighteen modes exactly as they arise in the Vinaya.

Is every case of causing a schism in the Saṅgha a case of the Saṅgha being in strife? And is every case of the Saṅgha being in strife a case of a schism in the Saṅgha? There are also four cases in which there is schism in the Saṅgha yet no strife in the Saṅgha. What is a case of schism in the Saṅgha yet no strife? It is as follows: the Saṅgha has indeed been split, but the fourteen factors that would constitute a schism in the Saṅgha have not been grasped. That is a split Saṅgha, but it is not a Saṅgha in strife. What is a case of the Saṅgha being in strife yet not a split Saṅgha? It is as follows: the fourteen factors that would constitute a schism in the Saṅgha have been grasped — that is the Saṅgha being in strife, but it is not yet a schism of the Saṅgha. What is a case of the Saṅgha being in strife and also the Saṅgha being split? It is as follows: the Saṅgha has also been split, and the fourteen factors that would constitute a schism have been definitively and completely grasped — that is both the Saṅgha being split and the Saṅgha being in strife. What is neither a schism of the Saṅgha nor a state of strife? It is every case other than those just described.

Is every case of the Saṅgha being split a case of the Saṅgha becoming separate? And is every case of the Saṅgha becoming separate a case of the Saṅgha being split? There are also cases in which the Saṅgha is split yet the Saṅgha has not become separate, and these too are applied in four modes.

A question is posed: what is a case of the Saṅgha being split yet the Saṅgha not having become separate? It is as follows: the Saṅgha has indeed been split, but no separation has arisen with respect to the Saṅgha's residence or robes — that is a split Saṅgha, yet the Saṅgha has not become separate. What is a case of the Saṅgha having become separate yet the Saṅgha not being split? It is as follows: from the time when two Saṅghas become separate and onward, right up to the point at which the Saṅgha has not yet split — the Saṅgha has become separate, but it has not split. What is a case of the Saṅgha being split and the Saṅgha also having become separate? It is as follows: that Saṅgha has been split, and the two Saṅghas have come to live separately by reason of residence or boundary or gains or robes — that is a case of the Saṅgha being split and also the Saṅgha having become separate. What is a case of there being neither a split Saṅgha nor a Saṅgha that has become separate? It is every case other than those just described.

Is every case of the Saṅgha being split a case of the Saṅgha having become individually distinct? And is every case of the Saṅgha having become individually distinct a case of the Saṅgha being split? There are also cases in which the Saṅgha is split yet the Saṅgha has not become separate, and these too are applied in four modes.

What is a case of the Saṅgha being split yet not having become individually distinct? It is as follows: even though the Saṅgha has been split, the two Saṅghas dwell mostly in separate residences and make use of separate robes — that is indeed a split Saṅgha, but the Saṅgha has not come to abide separately. What is a case of the Saṅgha having become separate yet the Saṅgha not being split? It is as follows: the two Saṅghas have come to have separate residences, separate boundaries, and separate gains — that is the Saṅgha having become separate, yet the Saṅgha is not split. What is a case of the Saṅgha being split and also the Saṅgha having become separate? It is as follows: the Saṅgha has been split, and the two reside in separate residences and so forth, as described before. What is a case of the Saṅgha neither being split nor abiding separately?

It is everything except a case of that kind. When the Saṅgha has become separate and is acting in a divided manner, if one side or both sides dissolve it, is that called a dissolution? If it is dissolved by one who speaks in accordance with the Dharma, then yes, it is called a dissolution.

When the Saṅgha has been divided and abides settled in separate factions, may the nuns perform the restoration ceremony? They may. Why is that? Because the nuns and the monks are residing separately.

In brief:

From the original, two are to be made.

The one who has been expelled is without a companion.

If one does not know that another has been expelled, then following that side, associating with them, and following along in causing the schism.

When the Saṅgha has been divided and abides in both factions and in neither faction, what should the neutral members do? They should go outside the boundary and perform the restoration ceremony.

When the Saṅgha has been divided and abides settled on both sides of the boundary, who should instruct the nuns? One who speaks in accordance with the Dharma. If those neutral members who speak in accordance with the Dharma are on this side of the boundary, they should give instruction there today.

If one has followed the side of the expelled, what offense does it become? In relation to two it is a wrong act, and in relation to one it is a transgression.

As for "the expelled" and "the expelled with companions" — is it said "with companions" or "without companions"? All those who have been expelled are solitary, that is, not two — they are said to be without companions.

As for associating together with the expelled — should one associate with them or not? One should not associate with the expelled at all. If one does not know that someone has been expelled, one may remain and associate with that person, and there is no offense.

If someone who is on one side and someone who is not on that side associate together, it becomes a wrong act. If someone who is not aligned with a faction and someone who is aligned with a faction associate together, it becomes a wrong act.

If there are four individuals who follow along in causing a schism, it is called a divided Saṅgha. How many does it take for a schism of the Saṅgha to occur? When four persons have come to side with the schism-makers.

In brief:

Similar, and faithful, and in accord with the Dharma and similar to the Dharma, expelling from an offense, expelling, seeing the schism and the limb.

If the Blessed One has said, "Do not expel a monk who is such-and-such," which monk is that? A monk who is reputable, has great merit, is learned, holds the sūtras, holds the Vinaya, holds what is like a mother, has many attendants, and has a large retinue — such is called a monk who is such-and-such.

If a monk who is such-and-such is expelled, what offense does it become? A wrong act.

As for the distinction in that — what is it? When I have spoken with the intention of "a monk who is faithful," let the offense be dealt with in accordance with the Dharma, as the words "a monk who is faithful" suggest — just as one says a brahmin is faithful. If a monk does not deal with the offense in accordance with the Dharma, it becomes a wrong act.

If it has been said, "Let the monk who speaks in accordance with the Dharma remain until the seat is finished" — what is it to speak in accordance with the Dharma? It is one who, regarding a single offense, confesses to the other one alone, and offers to reveal it, and shows deference.

When the Saṅgha has been divided and abides in a non-factionalized manner, who should lift the penalty that has been imposed? Those who speak in accordance with the Dharma should lift it.

If the expelled monks shave their heads, are ready to receive the lifting of the penalty, and show deference, who should be asked to consent on their behalf? Those who have followed the side of the expelled.

When Śāriputra said, "Arrange the seats and mats in a suitable manner" — what is that suitable arrangement? It is having arranged them together on one side.

When he said, "Seek out the pieces of limbs scattered into a hundred hairs and join them together, but do not separate them individually" — what is the meaning of those words?

"Pieces of limbs" means taking up the taking of faith. One should seek out the limbs; one should seek out the pieces; one should seek out the assembled Saṅgha — but one should not enter into what would cause schism.

In brief:

The two factions of Kauśāmbī, the restoration ceremony, the Dharma-robe, and the one faction of Kauśāmbī, the elders of Vaiśālī — and the elders too, in both factions, are the elders of Vaiśālī.

If the two factions of Kauśāmbī gather together and enter the restoration ceremony, how should the elders proceed? "Perform today's restoration ceremony outside the boundary."

When both factions of Kauśāmbī have gathered and assembled together in one place, and someone there offers a robe to the Saṅgha, who has authority over it? The authority belongs to whichever elder is present there.

If elders are present on one side and junior monks on the other side, who has authority? Of those two, authority belongs to whichever one the stream of water has reached.

How are all to divide it? In order of seniority among those who have received it.

If the community of Vaiśālī and the community of Kauśāmbī perform the restoration ceremony together, is it said to be performed? Upāli answered: No, it is not.

If the elders perform the restoration ceremony together with the people of Kauśāmbī, is it said to be performed? No, it is not.

If the elders perform the restoration ceremony together with the people of Vaiśālī, is it said to be performed? No, it is not.

In brief:

At the time when the schism occurred, it was also announced to the sisters —
the faction, the community of nuns, and at the time when the Saṅgha of Kauśāmbī became divided, when within their boundary a separate restoration ceremony was held.

And at the time when the monks of Kauśāmbī were divided by certain monks — by those who do not speak in accordance with the Dharma — who, while dwelling together within the boundary, held a separate restoration ceremony, the community of nuns too is said to have split and to dwell separately.

"Is the fortnightly recitation and the giving of instruction to the divided community of nuns to be carried out?" The Blessed One declared: It should not be given. Instead, instruct them beforehand thus: "Sisters, be reconciled."

It was said: "For two reasons it is proper to announce the schism of the Saṅgha and for the use of the measuring rod to apply." If one who has initiated the schism and caused harm then undergoes the announcement or submits to the measuring rod, is it said that there is a schism of the Saṅgha? Upāli answered: No, it is not.

What becomes of the acts performed? Because of belonging to the circle of schism, all of the Saṅgha — indeed the entire Saṅgha — incurs transgression along with what is past.

If the community of nuns dwelling outside is established on a side that is both a faction and not a faction, should the fortnightly recitation and the giving of instruction be offered to them? The community of nuns will indeed become divided, so it should be given.

When instruction is being given to the nuns of Vaiśālī, if those of Kauśāmbī are also present there, how should instruction be given to them? Go outside the boundary and give instruction.

In brief:

One abandoning another,
abandoning through having fallen asleep, and others too acting toward a person not in the proper manner —

Venerable one, the Blessed One has spoken of acting not in accordance with the Dharma and not assembling, acting not in accordance with the Dharma and assembling, assembling in a manner similar to not acting in accordance with the Dharma, and not assembling in a manner similar to not acting in accordance with the Dharma. What, then, is "acting not in accordance with the Dharma and not assembling"? It is assembling having departed from a proper formal act that ought to be performed, while having done so improperly. That is what is meant by acting not in accordance with the Dharma and not assembling.

Then what is "acting not in accordance with the Dharma and assembling"?

It is having set aside what is proper for a formal act that is to be annulled, and then assembled. That is what is meant by acting not in accordance with the Dharma and assembling.

What, then, is "not assembling in a manner similar to not acting in accordance with the Dharma"? It is when what ought to be set aside is first announced, and thereafter, following that announcement, a motion is made and it is set aside. That is what is meant by not assembling in a manner similar to not acting in accordance with the Dharma.

What is "assembling in a manner similar to not acting in accordance with the Dharma"? It is when what ought to be set aside is first announced, and thereafter, following that announcement, a motion is made, it is set aside, and one has assembled. That is what is meant by assembling in a manner similar to not acting in accordance with the Dharma.

What is "not assembling in accordance with the Dharma"? It is when what ought to be set aside is set aside and one has not assembled. That is what is meant by not assembling in accordance with the Dharma.

If one monk sets aside one other monk, it becomes a wrongdoing. If one monk sets aside two or many, up to four, he is to be encircled and gathered in. If four set aside four, it becomes a grave offence belonging to the category of schism.

When the entire Saṅgha is lying down asleep and a monk sets aside another, is it considered a valid setting aside? If a motion is made and then one lies down and sets aside, it is called a setting aside. But if one has already lain down beforehand and then a motion is made afterward, it is not called a setting aside.

If a formal act is announced in one place and the setting aside occurs in a different place, it is called a setting aside. But if the entire Saṅgha does not know, then for those who perform the formal act while belonging to the schismatic faction, it becomes a grave offence.

If the entire Saṅgha does know, then the matter is concluded together with the entire Saṅgha having passed it.

If fewer than four monks set aside, is it called a setting aside? It is not, Upāli. From a layperson up to one who with malicious intent draws blood from a Tathāgata, when their number is counted among them and a monk sets aside, it is not called a setting aside.

In brief:

One who has departed for the formal act,
one who has turned back,
one who is lying down or has entered meditative equipoise, one who has been commissioned to a single monk — by these five, setting aside is not to be done.

The Venerable Blessed One said: However many monks have arrived at the formal act and are present, among those for whom it is proper to take assent, assent has been taken. And among those monks who are present and are resolved to object, even if someone attempts to turn them back, there is neither prohibition nor turning back.

When this was said, Upāli asked: What, then, is a monk who has arrived at the formal act?

When four monks have gathered to perform a formal act, and those four who are gathered are all pure monks who stand on equal footing — that is a formal act being arrived at. When five monks gather to perform an act, or ten gather to perform an act, or twenty gather to perform an act, and those monks who have gathered are all pure and of harmonious view — that is called arriving at the formal act.

What is turning back? When one who is resolved on objecting is standing on the ground, one who is standing in space cannot be effective in turning him back. Likewise, one who is sitting outside the boundary cannot effectively turn back one who is sitting inside the boundary.

Upāli, when someone is resolved — if, when a novice is being instructed in the training rules, he says "Do not teach me the training rules," that is him being resolved on turning back. If, when a novice is to be given full ordination, he says "Do not give me full ordination," that is also him being resolved on turning back. If, when a penalty is being imposed on one subject to penalty, he says "Do not impose a penalty on me," likewise, all cases — arising from the ground, satisfying, elevating, and in the same manner the commissioning of all twelve persons — are counted as being resolved on turning back.

Is one who is lying down considered to have set aside? If one has heard the motion and then lies down, it is called setting aside. If one has already lain down beforehand and the motion is made afterward, it is called not setting aside. The same applies to one who has entered meditative equipoise.

If even a single monk makes a commission, it is called turning back.

When the Saṅgha has dispersed and is residing in various directions — some within the boundary, some outside the boundary — if any one faction sets aside, is it called a setting aside or not a setting aside?

It is said: It is not a setting aside.

In brief:

Filled up by the croupier, proclaimed as Dharma what is not Dharma, commissioned in the midst of the Saṅgha — commissioned together with a joining.

If a monk has set aside when the count has been filled up by the croupier multiple times, is it called setting aside or not setting aside? It is said: It is called setting aside, and the substance of the croupier's act is thereby nullified.

Is every act that is not in accordance with Dharma an incomplete act? Or is every incomplete act an act not in accordance with Dharma? Upāli: No. An act not in accordance with Dharma is one thing, and an incomplete act is another.

What is an act that is not in accordance with Dharma yet is not an incomplete act? That in which the matter has not been made present, has not been announced, has not been recalled by another, or has been performed without allowing a challenge to arise; and all the monks who ought to come to the act have gathered and the matter has been made present, consent has been sought by the proper procedure for taking consent, the monks who are present and dedicated to turning it back do not obstruct or turn it back — this is an act not in accordance with Dharma but is not an incomplete act.

What is an incomplete act that is not an act not in accordance with Dharma? That in which the matter has been made present, announced, recalled, and a challenge has been allowed to arise before performing it; and all the monks who ought to come to the act have not gathered, the matter has not been made present, consent has not been sought by the proper procedure for taking consent; and the monks who are present and dedicated to obstructing and turning it back have made that obstruction and turning back with diligence — this is an incomplete act but is not an act not in accordance with Dharma.

Is every act in accordance with Dharma a complete act? Upāli: No. An act in accordance with Dharma is one thing, and a complete act is another.

What is an act in accordance with Dharma that is not a complete act? It is said: One in which it is performed and announced before the assembly, yet all the monks who ought to come to the act have not assembled and the matter has not been made present, consent has not been sought by the proper procedure, and those monks dedicated to turning it back who are present do obstruct and turn it back — this is an act in accordance with Dharma but is not a complete act.

What is a complete act that is not an act in accordance with Dharma? It is said: One in which it is performed without making the matter present, without announcement, without recall, without the matter being substantiated, without allowing a challenge to arise; yet all the monks who ought to come to the act have assembled and the matter has been made present, consent has been sought by the proper procedure for taking consent, and those monks who are present and dedicated to turning it back do not obstruct or turn it back — this is a complete act but is not an act in accordance with Dharma.

If the commission is made three times within the midst of the Saṅgha to any person, do they all thereby incur a fault? It is said: Some will, and some will not. Those to whom the commission is made three times within the midst of the Saṅgha — all of those will incur an offense. But can it be that among those who do incur an offense there are some to whom the commission within the Saṅgha three times is not applicable? It is said: Apart from the commission itself, another offense has arisen.

How much does it take for what is said to the last one to be called a solemn declaration? It is said: When any one of the four defeats has been incurred as an offense, and one declares it in the midst of the Saṅgha three times, acknowledging the last substantive matter — that is called making a solemn declaration.

If a monk sets aside a commission that has been formalized by a penalty, is it called setting aside? It is said: Apart from the vow that is present and manifest, it is called an act performed on behalf of all the others.

The noble Vinaya. The forty-seventh fascicle.

In brief:

First, the subsequent commission, the solemn self-declaration of consent, giving up the training in the four, taking the probationary stick,

The last of the individual stations.

If a formal act is commissioned first and a request is subsequently made, is it called a case of a monk having relinquished, or of not having relinquished? It is to be called not having relinquished.

What becomes of the one who performs the penalty? If the entire Saṅgha does not know of it, then, through belonging to the circle of schism, the offense is grave. If the entire Saṅgha does know of it, then for the entire Saṅgha as well there will be a transgression that carries a consequent offense.

If one who has performed the penalty takes on faith and relinquishes to a monk, is it called relinquished? Apart from the novice's vow, it is to be called performing all formal acts.

If a formal act is performed on one's own behalf, is it called performed? If there is no doubt, it is to be called performed. If there is doubt, it is to be called not performed.

Performing a formal act again on one's own behalf consists in the following: having performed a penalty act on one's own behalf, requesting pardon from oneself, by oneself.

As for those noble ones against whom a censure act is performed, and against whom an expulsion act is performed, and those to whom assent in accordance with the Dharma is given — if such a one acknowledges before the Saṅgha three consecutive times and, having been given the training, proclaims in the context of the fourfold reasonableness of bestowing the training, is he eligible to have the training bestowed by a single proclamation? The Blessed One declared: Upāli, he is not eligible. Is he eligible to receive full ordination by a single proclamation in the fourfold procedure? Upāli, he is not eligible.

If one relinquishes the training through the probationary stick, is it called relinquishing to a monk with the four, or is it called not relinquishing? It is to be called not relinquishing.

In brief:

A monk freed from censure, apart from the solitary schismatic, what does "censure" mean? — it is a closer examination of the special case.

If a censure act has been performed against one and then a degradation act is performed, is it called performed? The censure act ceases to exist. If a censure act has been performed against one and then an expulsion act and a readmission act are performed, is that called performed or not performed? It is said: It is performed, but the censure ceases to exist. Just as in the case of one against whom a censure act was performed, so too in the cases of one against whom a degradation act was performed, one against whom an expulsion act was performed, and one against whom a readmission act was performed — these are to be set forth in full detail, elaborated in four aspects.

If a censure act is performed against one who has already relinquished, is it called performed? Upāli, it is not, because that one is no longer in the community of practice. Likewise, if a degradation act, an expulsion act, and a readmission act are performed against such a one, is that called performed? Upāli, it is not, because that one is no longer in the community of practice.

If schism is caused against someone other than monks, that becomes a wrongdoing.

What is the meaning of the word "censure"? Upāli, it is merely a name; it means: when a monk has become quarrelsome, instructing him thus: "Until you have turned away from that quarrel, the Saṅgha will conduct a subsequent close examination of you."

What is the meaning of the word "degradation"? Upāli, "degradation" is merely a name; it means: when a monk has subsequently incurred additional transgressions against the Saṅgha, instructing him thus: "Until you have turned away from those subsequent transgressions, you are to abide and remain in restraint."

What is the meaning of the word "expulsion"? Upāli, "expulsion" is merely a name; it means: when a monk has disgraced his family — instructing him: "Do not stay in that dwelling."

What is the meaning of the word "readmission"? Upāli, it is merely a name; it means: when a monk has harmed a layman — instructing him: "You are to request pardon from that householder."

When it is said, "The Saṅgha will conduct a subsequent close examination of you" — what is the meaning of those words? It is said:

"The Saṅgha will act in accordance with the Dharma regarding whatever transgression has arisen on your part" — that is the meaning of those words.

When it is said, "You are to dwell and remain with another" — what is the meaning of those words? It is said: whichever person one is fond of, or treats as a teacher, or feels shame before, or feels embarrassment toward — one is to dwell in stability with that person.

In brief:

He calls a branch offense a branch when it is not a branch — a monk thus harms with offense and downfall, whether inside or outside: this becomes an obstruction.

If one calls what is not a branch offense a branch offense, what results? It is a downfall through knowingly speaking falsehood. If one calls a branch offense a branch offense, it becomes a downfall through speaking of a person's fault.

When it is said, "The harm to a monk is inside or outside" — what is inside and what is outside? What is within the boundary is inside. What is outside the boundary is outside. Alternatively, what is within the shrine hall is inside. What has no roof is outside.

The Blessed One declared that "it is an obstruction in many ways and in many categories." What is the nature of those things that are obstructions? Desire is an obstructive factor. Upāli, I declare desire to be an obstructive factor.

This completes the section on Vinaya of the Vinaya text called the Mānavika.

The Blessed One, the Buddha, was dwelling in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. Then the venerable Upāli went to where the Blessed One, the Buddha, was; having arrived, he bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One in homage and sat down to one side. Having sat down to one side, the venerable Upāli addressed the Blessed One, the Buddha, in these words:

"Venerable One, how many aggregates of Vinaya are there?" "Upāli, there are three: the aggregate of full ordination, the aggregate of excellence, and the aggregate of livelihood."

"What is the aggregate of full ordination? It is: those fit for full ordination and those not fit for full ordination; that which is to be fully ordained and that which is not to be fully ordained; full ordination and incomplete ordination; acts and the substance of acts; acts that are to be carried out and acts that are not to be carried out; acts of lifting a penalty; acts of requesting approval; the substance of accusation; the substance of inquiry; the substance of disciplining; the substance of pacifying; the substance of cause; training; non-relinquishment of training; relinquishment of training; declaration of deterioration in training; dispute; bringing together of dispute; settling of dispute; complete settling of dispute; what is to be recited and what is not to be recited; consecration; the vow of the insane; rendering a faithful donation improper; an act and what is not an act; Vinaya; statement of a view; a motion; an act with a motion alone; an act with a motion and one recitation; an act with a motion and three recitations; an act of accusation; an act of censure; an act of expulsion; an act of reinstatement; an act of suspension for non-acknowledgment of an offense; an act of suspension for non-amendment; an act of suspension for non-abandonment of a pernicious view; punishment by sentence; restoration from the basis; causing satisfaction; lifting a penalty; questioning; acting in accordance with the Dharma; what the qualities of a sentence are; repetition from the basis; why satisfaction is to be produced; what the qualities of lifting a penalty are; inquiry into the nature of that — sentencing and punishment; offense and non-offense; heavy offense and light offense; offense with remainder and offense without remainder; offense of a coarse nature and offense not of a coarse nature; offense with a formal act and offense without a formal act; a formal act that constitutes an offense and a formal act that does not constitute an offense; expulsion of an offense; raising it; bringing it to mind; a formal act involving dispute; a harmful act; not transmitting instruction; prohibiting the transmission of instruction; not completing the transmission of instruction; making an opening; a formal act of making an opening; requesting an opening; suppressing the restoration ceremony; prohibiting an opening; setting aside internally; cooked internally; cooked by oneself; cooked by a monk; accepted; not accepted again; accepted and then reclaimed. Accepting food at the time of the morning meal; carrying away the remainder of that; having wood-ash; having a pond; set down and not set down; brought out and not brought out; costly requisites and inexpensive requisites; requisites to be distributed and requisites not to be distributed; requisites of humans and requisites of non-humans; requisites under one's authority and requisites not under one's authority; requisites fit to be received and requisites not fit to be received; robes of a deceased person; substantial robes; robes from a dust-heap; needle work; work performed by sending it away; work with a blade; cutting; shaving; intentionally prepared food; eating fruit; food of humans; food of non-humans; the Vinaya condensed in five hundred; the Vinaya condensed in seven hundred; the sūtra of the true Vinaya; showing in black; showing in full; mixed; thoroughly mixed; what is suitable for the assembly hall; what is suitable for the forest; what is suitable for the retinue; what is suitable for the region; what is suitable for the quarter; what is suitable for the district; what is suitable for robes; what is suitable as sour liquid.

Who is a fit candidate for full ordination? One who is fully ordained by completing what has been accepted and agreed to — that is full ordination, and there are ten kinds of being a fit candidate for full ordination.

A Tathāgata who is self-arisen, and a pratyekabuddha, receive full ordination without a preceptor, through their own nature. The five receive full ordination by directly realizing gnosis. The venerable Mahākāśyapa received full ordination by the Teacher accepting his declaration. The venerable Śāriputra received full ordination by asking and receiving a prophetic declaration. Some received full ordination by the words "Come here, monk." Some received full ordination by the threefold formula of going for refuge. In a border region, full ordination is from a Saṅgha holding the Vinaya together with a quorum of five. In a central region, full ordination is from an assembly of ten or more. Some received full ordination by accepting the qualities of a preceptor. Some received full ordination through a messenger. Some received full ordination from the dual Saṅgha.

Among these, when one has not been constituted by a formal act of requesting and the four, the full ordination by the threefold formula of going for refuge is called a proper full ordination. However, when one has been constituted by a formal act of requesting and the four, the full ordination by the threefold formula of going for refuge is not full ordination.

As for the formula "Come here, monk" — the beginning and the end being alike, that full ordination is called a proper full ordination. And why is that so? Upāli, the words "Come here, monk" constitute full ordination that I myself directly witnessed, and each and every one to whom the words "Come here, monk" were spoken was in their final existence; those to whom "Come here, monk" was said did not let the time pass while still a student. Therefore those are called properly fully ordained.

As for nuns, they are fit candidates for full ordination in three ways: by accepting the qualities of a preceptor, through a messenger, and from the dual Saṅgha.

Accepting the qualities of a preceptor is as in the case of Mahāprajāpatī and others; for the full account, it is to be stated as it appears in the sūtra.

As for the messenger: any virtuous laywoman who, when she goes to meet someone, might cause an obstacle — in such cases a male messenger is to be employed. The messenger listens to the training precepts and repeats them back to those women, saying, "Excellent! You have been well and fully ordained — like Dharmadattā." The transmission of the authorization is to be given in full, exactly as it appears in the Vinaya.

Those who are fit candidates among these are to be given full ordination by the dual Saṅgha — without withdrawal, without postponement — through the motion-and-three-proclamations procedure. That full ordination is called full ordination. Furthermore, it is said: one who approaches and receives this scriptural tradition, who accepts it with complete commitment, who thereby attains it, who having experienced its well-being, brings it to direct manifestation — such a one is fully ordained.

What then constitutes not being properly fully ordained? If one falls back from it, one is not fully ordained. If one approaches this scriptural tradition without acceptance, and without complete commitment does not attain it, and without having experienced its well-being does not bring it to direct manifestation — this is called not being fully ordained.

Who is to be given full ordination? A human male who is alive and without any disqualifying impediment, and a human female who is alive and without any disqualifying impediment — these are the ones to be given full ordination.

Who is not to be given full ordination? One who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has split the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has shed the blood of a Tathāgata, one who has no ācārya, one who has no preceptor, one who has no bowl, one who has no robes, one who would not submit to disciplinary procedures, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, a stolen-lodger, one who lives apart under separate rule, one who is unsettled, a paṇḍaka, a hermaphrodite, one who has expelled a nun, one who has not completed twenty years of age, one who has made a solemn promise, one who has been made unfit for ordination, one who is worthy of being made unfit for ordination, and all non-humans — these are not to be given full ordination. And even if full ordination were conferred on them, it would not constitute full ordination, and the one who conferred it would also be in transgression. Why is that? Because those persons are said to defile the assembly, and they entirely defile the assembly; they are not fit candidates for full ordination.

What then is full ordination? When a person of such-and-such a name, of such-and-such a clan, of such-and-such a lineage, has been given full ordination by a Saṅgha assembled in accordance with the Dharma — without manifest withdrawal, without postponement — through the motion-and-three-proclamations procedure, this is called full ordination. Full ordination given with the appropriate authorization is proper full ordination.

What is not full ordination? One who has killed his father, one who has killed his mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has split the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has shed the blood of a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, a stolen-lodger, one who lives apart, a paṇḍaka, a hermaphrodite, one who has expelled a nun, and those who were previously impaired — these are called not fully ordained; they are persons of the character of one who does not arise in this Dharma and Vinaya.

Why are they called not fully ordained? Because they have not obtained the equal training. Therefore they are called not fully ordained.

All persons other than these thirteen are to be given full ordination.

If, however, someone has been given full ordination, they shall not be called fully ordained, and the one who conferred full ordination will likewise have transgressed. Therefore the Blessed One declared them not fully ordained.

What is a formal act? There are three kinds: a formal act by motion, a formal act by motion and one proclamation, and a formal act by motion and three proclamations.

Why are they called formal acts? They are called formal acts because of two aspects: acts that cut by penalty, acts that bring down censure, and acts that bind to the white Dharma by solemn commitment.

What are acts that cut by penalty and acts that bring down censure? They are as follows: censure, reproach, banishment, reconciliation, acts of suspension, penalty, origination from the basis, satisfaction, and origination-from-the-basis satisfaction. Furthermore, there are acts that turn a penalty act into an act of censure.

What are acts that bind to the white Dharma by solemn commitment? They are as follows: the restoration ceremony (poṣadha), the invitation ceremony (pravāraṇā), full ordination, expulsion, the spreading of grass, and whatever other acts bind one by solemn commitment to the white Dharma — these are the formal acts. Therefore they are called formal acts.

What is the subject matter of a formal act? Whatever cause and whatever condition pertain to the subject matter in regard to which a formal act is performed — that cause and that condition in relation to that subject matter is called the subject matter of the formal act.

What is a formal act that is fit to be set aside? A formal act in which the motion is defective, the proclamation is defective, it is not in accordance with Dharma, it has been performed without the Saṅgha being assembled — one that has been invalidated: this is called a formal act that is fit to be set aside.

What is a formal act that is not fit to be set aside? A formal act in which the motion is proper, the proclamation is proper, it is in accordance with Dharma, it has been performed with the Saṅgha properly assembled — one that has not been invalidated: this is called a formal act that is not fit to be set aside.

What is an act of expulsion? Expulsion means exclusion. One who has been excluded does not perform formal acts together with the monks. There is no poṣadha with them, no pravāraṇā, no dwelling together, no communal conduct, no communal conversation, no concord — this is called an act of expulsion. Why is it called an act of expulsion? Because the Saṅgha has expelled that person, therefore it is called an act of expulsion.

What is an act of seeking pardon? Whatever act is performed such that one may again dwell together with the Saṅgha, conduct oneself uniformly with them, share the same boundary, and sit together — this is called an act of seeking pardon.

What is the subject matter of censure? A monk who causes strife, who exposes faults, who causes disruption, who harbors ill will, who creates disputes — this is called the subject matter of censure.

What is the subject matter of reproach? The subject matter of reproach is threefold: what has been seen, what has been heard, and what has been suspected — it has occurred, it is an offense, and moreover it is true and not false; it is timely and not untimely; it is meaningful and not meaningless; it is gentle and not rough; it is spoken with loving-kindness and not with aversion — this is called the subject matter of reproach.

What is the subject matter of discipline? The five acts of diligent application: the act of censure, the act of reproach, and so on up to the act of satisfaction — as before. This is called the subject matter of discipline.

What is the subject matter of pacification? Whatever causes and conditions have given rise to a dispute and which bring about its calming — because of the peace and complete tranquility thereby achieved. That is: the hair standing on end, the bringing about of an arising, a showing through bowing, a showing through prostration — this is called the subject matter of pacification.

What is the subject matter of cause? Whatever cause and whatever condition, in dependence upon which cause, a formal act is performed — just as it arises in the sūtra Bhadāla. Below this, the conduct to be practiced by the Saṅgha is stated in full, just as it arises in the sūtra Bhadāla. This is called the subject matter of cause.

What is training? There are three trainings: training in the higher moral discipline, training in the higher mind, and training in the higher wisdom.

Furthermore, there are three trainings: training in higher conduct, training in higher taming, and training in higher individual liberation.

By what measure is something called an invalid relinquishing of training? Relinquishing one's training in the presence of a madman is called an invalid relinquishing of training. Relinquishing one's training in the presence of one whose mind is disturbed, or one tormented by illness, is called an invalid relinquishing of training. Relinquishing one's training in the presence of one who is foolish, or mute, or deaf, or fallen asleep, or in meditative absorption, or delirious, or severely delirious, or who has entered into anger or agitation, or who does not understand, or who has departed and is dwelling elsewhere — all of these are called an invalid relinquishing of training. Relinquishing one's training through a messenger is also called an invalid relinquishing of training. Relinquishing one's training through a written letter, through hand-signs, through having another speak on one's behalf, through a signal, or through a gesture is also called an invalid relinquishing of training.

If a noble one relinquishes training to a border-dweller using the noble tongue, and that border-dweller does not understand the noble tongue, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training. If a noble one relinquishes training to another noble one using the border-dweller's tongue, and that noble one does not understand the border-dweller's tongue, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training. If a border-dweller relinquishes training to another border-dweller using the noble tongue, and that border-dweller does not understand the noble tongue, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training. If a border-dweller relinquishes training to a noble one using the border-dweller's tongue, and that noble one does not understand the border-dweller's tongue, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training.

If one perceives what is not secluded as secluded and relinquishes training, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training. Even if one perceives what is secluded as secluded and relinquishes training, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training. If one perceives what is secluded as not secluded and relinquishes training, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training. If one perceives what is not secluded as not secluded and relinquishes training, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training.

If one relinquishes training in the midst of uproar, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training. Even if one says the words of relinquishing training to one who is not properly established in the way of the world, it is called an invalid relinquishing of training.

Whether stated briefly or in full: if one does not form the intention of requesting consent, and though one applies the words of relinquishing training while still wishing for the things belonging to a monk and not wishing for the things belonging to a householder, and yet speaks the words while not being in a natural state — even if such words are spoken, the training has not been validly relinquished. This is called an invalid relinquishing of training.

What is a valid relinquishing of training? It is this: when that monk has become attached to the life of a householder, or has grown displeased with it, or desires it, or has become unwilling to continue as an ascetic, or wishes to abandon the monk's estate, or disparages it, or is ashamed, or feels disgrace, or even feels remorse — and then he goes before a monk and says, "I relinquish my training" — that is called a valid relinquishing of training.

If he says, "Regard me as a householder" in relation to: the Buddha, the Dharma, the Saṅgha, the sūtras, the Vinaya, the matrix, the preceptor, the teachers, oneself; or in relation to a novice, a paṇḍaka, a woman of mixed status, a nun who has been expelled, one's father, one's mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent drew blood from a Tathāgata, a non-Buddhist adherent, one who has gone over to non-Buddhist adherents, a thief in a hiding place, one dwelling apart —

"Hold me as one not residing" — or, in the lesser form, if he says, "It is enough that you share the same Dharma and practice the same celibate life as I do" — that too is called a relinquishing of training. Whether he speaks with attachment, with displeasure, or with a wish to descend, if he declares it through speech, words, utterance, voice, intonation, definitive statement, the path of speech, the sound of speech, the action of speech, or through the intentional use of speech — that is called a relinquishing of training.

What is called declaring the deterioration of one's training? It is as follows. From the point at which the monk has become attached, up to the point of remorse, proceeding as before: he goes to another monk and says, "The celibate life is difficult to practise. True seclusion is extremely difficult. To delight in solitude is difficult. To dwell in forest and woodland, to dwell at the forest's edge and to be present there in full — these too are difficult. For the rest of one's life, to dwell alone in a wilderness together with fierce wild beasts, and to make a bed from grass or leaves — that too is difficult. For the rest of one's life, to depend on others for one's own sustenance and that of others is difficult. For the rest of one's life, to seek from others robes, food, bedding, and medicines and requisites for illness — that is suffering. I miss them. I think of my father, my brothers, and my sisters." Or he says, "Let me be apprenticed to a craft. Let me be set to work. Place me on the side of the reasonable. Release me into the company of the virtuous." From the point of attachment as before, up to and including the declaration by speech — this is called declaring the deterioration of one's training.

What is the distinction between relinquishing training and declaring the deterioration of training? In terms of the words there is no difference; in terms of abandoning the vow there is no difference either, for in each case the vow is released. In both cases it is the same.

What is a dispute? There are four kinds of dispute: dispute through contention, dispute through failure to convey a scriptural transmission, dispute through a transgression, and dispute through a procedural matter. These are called disputes. Why are they called disputes? Because through their force, conflict arises — therefore they are called disputes.

What is the gathering of a dispute? Whatever cause and condition, taken as the governing cause, gives rise to a dispute — that is called the gathering of a dispute.

What is the settling of a dispute? There are seven principles for settling a dispute: settling by direct confrontation, settling by recollection, settling by absence of delusion, settling the dispute according to its own nature, proceeding by majority, introduction of a verdict, and that which is like laying down grass. These are called the means of settling a dispute.

Why are they called the settling of a dispute? Because by means of these seven principles, the four disputes are tamed, quieted, fully pacified, disciplined, abandoned, and brought to cessation — therefore they are called principles for settling a dispute.

What is the non-settling of a dispute? If five qualities are present, a dispute will not be properly settled. What are the five? The matter has not been submitted to the Saṅgha; it is not in accord with the Victor's word; the monks on both sides of the dispute have not been informed; the monks who are arguing in accordance with the Dharma and who are giving responses have not been respectfully restrained; and the monk who has committed a transgression has not purified that transgression. If these five qualities are present, a dispute will not be properly settled.

If five qualities are present, a dispute will be properly settled. What are the five? The matter has been submitted to the Saṅgha; it is in accord with the Victor's word; the monks on both sides of the dispute have been informed; the monks who are arguing in accordance with the Dharma and who are giving responses have been respectfully restrained; and the monk who has committed a transgression has purified the transgression.

If these five qualities are present, a dispute will be properly settled — and that is called a dispute being fully settled.

What is the recitation? It is whichever is longer — the fourth or the thirteenth — that is recited in full; that is called the recitation.

What is non-recitation? In a place where the monk who is supposed to recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra does not recite it, another who comes after him should recite it. If he too has not read it and lacks the confidence to do so, then another who comes after him should give the response. If he too is unable and lacks the confidence, then similarly, going through each successive reciter to the very last, if none of them has the confidence, that is called non-recitation.

What is the consecration of the restoration ceremony? A monk who is dwelling alone: on that very day of the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony (poṣadha), he should rise early, pay reverence to the stūpa and to the vihāra, sweep the courtyard, and sweep the restoration hall as well. He should smear it gently with fresh cow dung, then in due order and at the proper time set out the seats, fill the pure-water vessels and the privy vessels with water, prepare a fire nearby, and place nearby the lamp oil, the lamp vessel, the lamp stand, and the tooth-cleaning sticks. If monks who have not yet performed the restoration ceremony then arrive, he should perform the restoration ceremony together with them and should also announce the recitation of the Prātimokṣa sūtra. If they do not arrive, he should ascend to a high vantage point, stand there, look out in all four directions, and if anyone comes, call out: "Venerable one, come quickly — we are to perform the restoration ceremony!" If no one whatsoever comes, he should descend from there, remain sitting until the end of his time, and recite the triple announcement. He should read the qualities of generosity and arouse the awakening mind. He should also say aloud: "Today is the Saṅgha's fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. I, the monk called such-and-such, today also hold the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. May all impediment-causing phenomena be completely purified, and may the gods too regard me, the monk called such-and-such, as fully purified. Here the restoration ceremony is to be consecrated for the sake of completely fulfilling the aggregate of moral discipline. Whenever the Saṅgha assembles in harmony, may the full restoration ceremony be experienced and the Prātimokṣa sūtra also be savored." He should say this two and three times. Just as it is for one monk, so too for two or three monks dwelling together — in the same way it should be practiced, the awakening mind aroused, and each should recite it to the other. Having done this, the restoration ceremony has been performed. This is called the consecration.

What is the vow for one who is intoxicated? When a monk has become intoxicated, his mind disturbed and afflicted by illness, one gives him the vow for the intoxicated by means of both the request and the two-person act — to be applied in full just as for the venerable Bimbāsāra (Byema-can), in accordance with the Vinaya. That is called the vow for the intoxicated.

What is the vow for one who is not intoxicated? Apart from those vows for the intoxicated, all other vows beyond them are called the vow for one who is not intoxicated.

What is rendering improper a gift given in faith? If something is given to one whose moral discipline has degenerated, that is called rendering improper a gift given in faith. Moreover, if something — even a single portion — is given to one who has entered a wrong path rather than the right path, that too is called having rendered improper a gift given in faith. That, then, is what is called rendering improper a gift given in faith.

What are the acts? The ten acts to be performed before the assembly has formally convened. They are as follows: accepting the bowl by word of mouth; receiving the bowl; the vow pertaining to the training; the release from the vow of the training; the vow pertaining to the temple; the vow of the novice; the vow of the one acting as if mad; the vow of silence; the vow proper to one for whom prostration is not appropriate; and the vow of one whose conduct is separate. These are what are called the acts.

What are non-acts? When a formal act requires four to be assembled and one performs it without four being assembled, that is a non-act and must not be done in that way. If a layman completes the assembly of four and then performs it, that too is a non-act and must not be done in that way. If it is performed by a novice; by one who has consorted with a woman, a hermaphrodite, or a nun; by one who has killed his father, killed his mother, killed an arhat, divided the Saṅgha, or with malicious intent drawn blood from a Tathāgata; by a tīrthika or one who has gone over to the tīrthikas; by a thief who has entered under false pretenses; by one who previously fell into an offense, or who previously caused a disruption; by one dwelling in a different community; by one who is not present; by one dwelling separately; by one who is not to be counted; by one who has surrendered the training; by one performing a penalty, or who has not completed a penalty, or has not been satisfied, or who will not be satisfied; or when it is performed by those who have surrendered the training — that too is a non-act and must not be done in that way. Just as one should apply in full detail how an act requiring four to be assembled is to be performed, so too for acts requiring five to be assembled, for those requiring ten, and for those requiring twenty. These, then, are what are called non-acts.

What is called the Vinaya? The Vinaya is that which, having arisen from the Vinaya as described, is to be elaborated in full. That is what is called the Vinaya.

What is the stating of a view? The stating of a view encompasses five cases that are not in accordance with the Dharma and five that are in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the five cases of stating a view not in accordance with the Dharma? Stating a view in the presence of one who is not present; stating a view in the presence of one who is dwelling separately; stating a view in the presence of one who has sided with a faction; stating a view in the presence of one who has not received full ordination; and stating a view in the presence of one who is not lacking in the remainder of something. These are the five cases of stating a view not in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the five cases of stating a view in accordance with the Dharma? Not stating a view in the presence of one who is not present; not stating a view in the presence of one who is dwelling separately; not stating a view in the presence of one who has sided with a faction; not stating a view in the presence of one who has not received full ordination; and not stating a view in the presence of one who is not lacking in the full remainder of the matter. These are the five cases of stating a view in accordance with the Dharma.

What is a motion? A motion is a verbal act through which a matter is made known. At the time of performing an act, it is the means by which the matter is made known. Whatever motion states in words the meaning of that particular matter is called a motion.

What is the act of a motion? It is the notification of the Saṅgha by means of a motion together with an act. This applies to such things as the making of an opening, the removal of something, the passing of a bowl, the laying down of grass, and whatever else is to be performed by means of a motion-act. All such things are to be regarded as motion-acts. That is what is called a motion-act.

What is the act of a motion with a second? When, after a motion has been made, a single proclamation follows, that is the second combined with a motion, and this is called the act of a motion with a second.

What is the act of a motion with a fourth? When, after a motion has been made, three proclamations are recited, that is the fourth combined with a motion, and this is called the act of a motion with a fourth.

If, for an act that requires a motion, one performs the act without making the motion, that is an offense. If one makes the proclamation without having made the motion, that is an offense. If, for an act requiring a motion with a second, one makes the proclamation without having made the motion, that is an offense. If the motion has been made but the proclamation has not been made, that is an offense committed. If the proclamation has been made but the motion has not been made, that too is an offense. If, for an act requiring a motion with a fourth, one makes the proclamation without having made the motion, that is an offense. If the motion has been made but the proclamation has not been made, that is an offense. If the proclamation has been made but the motion has not been made, that is an offense. If, for a motion-act, the motion is made, there is no offense.

If the motion has been made and the proclamation has then been made, there is no offense. For a motion-and-one act, if the motion is made and one proclamation is made, there is no offense. If the motion has been made and many proclamations are made, there is no offense. For a motion-and-four act, if the motion has been made and many proclamations are made, there is no offense. These are to be applied in the same manner. Thus, even if many acts are performed, there is no offense. This is called a withdrawn act.

Now, if, when the motion has been made and the proclamation is being announced, certain members of the Saṅgha rise from their seats for some other purpose, and those who have not yet risen wish to do so, one should make the motion again before the remaining members of the retinue in the same way. If it becomes necessary to make the motion differently, one should complete the proclamation without offense. One should also address the Saṅgha verbally, saying: "Venerables, I shall repeat the motion before the Saṅgha, and I shall also repeat the proclamation," and so make the motion. If that motion is not completed, against whom is the act of censure to be performed? It is fitting that monks who are quarrelsome and playful should be subjected to a motion-and-four act without suspension and without postponement. This is called an act of censure.

What is an act of rebuke? When a monk has committed a transgression and it has come out openly, a rebuke act is to be applied to him by means of a motion-and-four act, without suspension and without postponement. This is called an act of rebuke.

What is an act of banishment? When a monk has become a disgrace to his family, a banishment act is to be applied to him by means of a motion-and-four act, without suspension and without postponement. This is called an act of banishment.

What is an act of reconciliation? When a monk has been abusing householders, a reconciliation act is to be applied to him by means of a motion-and-four act, without suspension and without postponement. This is called an act of reconciliation.

What is an act of suspension for not seeing a transgression? When a monk has committed a transgression and says, "I do not see that I have committed a transgression," a suspension act for not seeing a transgression is to be applied to him by means of a motion-and-four act, without suspension and without postponement. This is called an act of suspension for not seeing a transgression.

What is an act of suspension for not doing the work again? When, on account of a transgression that has occurred, one refuses in accordance with the Dharma to do the work again, a suspension act for not doing the work again is to be applied by means of a motion-and-four act, without lifting and without postponement. This is called an act of suspension for not doing the work again.

What is an act of suspension for not abandoning a wrong view? When a monk has come to hold a wrong view and, having seized upon it, persists in holding it firmly and refuses to relinquish it, a suspension act for not abandoning that wrong view is to be applied to him by means of a motion-and-four act, without lifting and without postponement. This is called an act of suspension for not abandoning a wrong view.

What is a probationary act? When a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika) from another tradition, having previously gone forth from among tīrthikas and then entered the well-spoken Dharma and Vinaya and received full ordination, desires to be established as a monk, the preceptor first clothes him and imposes a probationary period of four months, applying a motion-and-four act without suspension and without postponement. A probationary act is also to be performed as follows: when a monk has done any one of the thirteen bases and has concealed it, for as long as he is known to have concealed it and remains unrepentant, that probationary act too is to be applied to him by means of a motion-and-four act, without suspension and without postponement. This is called a probationary act.

What is an act of suspension from the beginning? When a monk is undergoing a probationary period, and in the course of that probation an offense occurs such that a suspension-from-the-beginning act is to be performed for that offense, a motion-and-four act is to be applied without suspension and without postponement — — and without postponement, that monk must undergo the penalty again, because the earlier one had not been carried out. Alternatively, in another category: whether a penalty has been performed or not, that very matter is to be made to start again from the beginning. This is called an act of resuming from the beginning.

What is an act of satisfaction? When a monk has committed any one of the thirteen bases of the Saṅgha's remaining Dharmas and has either not been suspended or has undergone the penalty, a motion-and-four act is applied to him requiring him to perform satisfaction for six days, without suspension and without postponement — and that monk must then perform satisfaction toward all monks. This is called an act performed by satisfaction.

What is rehabilitation? When a monk who has come through a penalty has, in the course of those six days of performing satisfaction, conducted himself in the practice of satisfaction, a motion-and-four act is applied to him without suspension and without postponement. This is called rehabilitation.

Why is it called rehabilitation? Because he is drawn out from an unwholesome state and firmly established in a wholesome state — for this reason it is called rehabilitation.

The word "inquiry" refers to the Dharmas themselves. What is the benefit of performing the penalty? Why is one made to repeat from the beginning? What is the benefit of performing satisfaction? And why is there rehabilitation?

Performing the penalty is the benefit for one who has been suspended on account of the Dharmas. Performing satisfaction is the benefit for one on whom the penalty has been carried out. As for why repeating from the beginning is called intensification — repeating from the beginning is intensification itself. As for why rehabilitation is the benefit of satisfaction — rehabilitation is for the sake of purification.

Why does the fact of having undergone the penalty become a benefit for performing satisfaction? A monk who has been penalized performs satisfaction toward all monks without great difficulty. When satisfaction has been performed, the monks think of him as one to whom satisfaction has been given. For this reason, what has been done through the penalty is the benefit of satisfaction.

Why does repeating from the beginning constitute intensification? When one repeats from the beginning, an intensification has been applied to that person; out of fear he will not act that way again, and the monks too will come to know of it. In this way, a venerable one with great afflictions, out of a sense of shame, will not repeat such conduct thereafter. For this reason, repeating from the beginning constitutes intensification.

Why does performing satisfaction become the benefit of rehabilitation? When a monk is carrying out satisfaction, he performs satisfaction toward all monks without great difficulty. Having performed satisfaction, the monks think of rehabilitating him, thinking: "This venerable one wishes to move forward; this venerable one does not wish for afflictions" — and so they declare, "This venerable one is virtuous; this venerable one is to be rehabilitated." For this reason, performing satisfaction is the benefit of rehabilitation.

Why should rehabilitation be carried out? Rehabilitation is to be performed for the sake of purification. When he is rehabilitated, that monk becomes purified and free of transgression. It is as the saying goes: these two kinds of persons are pure and free of affliction — one in whom no transgression arises, and one who, even if a transgression arises, restores it in accordance with the Dharma. One who is rehabilitated likewise becomes pure. Therefore, rehabilitation too is for the sake of purification.

In search of its essential nature, what is confession? A monk accuses himself of an offense. From accusation he moves to acknowledgment. From acknowledgment he accuses himself again.

Now, regarding confession itself — in search of its essential nature: one should perform the act of petition together with the four acts of pressing, without there being any wearing down or setting aside. This, in search of its essential nature, is called "cutting by means of a penalty."

What is an offense? The five classes of offense are called the aggregate of offenses: defeat (pārājika), formal acts of the Saṅgha (saṃghāvaśeṣa), downfalls, individual confessions, and wrongdoings. When one engages in and commits any of these without restoring oneself, that is called an offense.

What is non-offense? When those same five classes of offense are free of offense, they are called the aggregate of non-offense. One does not act in regard to defeat, formal acts of the Saṅgha, downfalls, individual observances, or wrongdoings — because one has neither engaged in nor committed them, this abstention is called non-offense.

What is a grave offense? That which cannot be lifted. What is a light offense? That which can be lifted.

What is an offense with a remainder? The lower classes of offense: formal acts of the Saṅgha, downfalls, individual confessions, and wrongdoings. What is an offense without a remainder? The first class of offense: the four defeats.

What is a gross offense? Defeat and formal acts of the Saṅgha. Why are these called gross offenses? They are called gross offenses for two reasons: they are called gross offenses because the offense is gross, and they are gross offenses by intrinsic nature — thus they are called gross offenses.

What is an offense that is not gross? The remaining three classes of offense: downfalls, occasions of falling again, and wrongdoings. These are called offenses that are not gross.

What is an offense with an act? That which is to be confessed and that which is to be restrained. What is an offense without an act? The first class of offenses.

Here ends the forty-eighth fascicle of the Noble Vinaya.

What is an offense to be restored? A monk who, having inwardly established mindfulness within the fourth or fifth category of rules, and with faith, restores the offense in accordance with the Dharma — that is an offense to be restored.

What is an offense not to be restored? A monk who lacks the fourth category of rules and also lacks the fifth, yet has inwardly established mindfulness, but does not restore the offense in accordance with the Dharma with faith — that is called an offense not to be restored.

What is the lifting of an offense? In one mode, all offenses are contained — and that is the vow. In another mode, all offenses are not contained — and that is the absence of the vow. That is called the lifting of an offense.

What is a raising of the matter? It is when a monk says to another monk: "Venerable one, such-and-such an offense as this has arisen for you — confess it again, come forward, restore it in accordance with the Dharma." That speaking is called a raising of the matter.

What is a reminder? It is when that monk says to the monk: "Venerable one, do you not remember that such-and-such an offense as this arose?" That speaking is called a reminder.

What is an act with words? It is an act with words. And what is that? It is when a monk says to another monk with words: "Venerable one, there is a matter between us — do not go away from this place until you have spoken with me. Venerable one, there is a dispute between you and me." That is called an act with words.

What is an act of bringing words together? There are five kinds of bringing words together. When a person's matter is opened up, one says: "What you said on this subject, you said such-and-such" — and so the words are brought together. Or: "What you said on this subject, you said it in such-and-such a place" — and so the words are brought together. Or: "What you said on this subject, you said it in this place" — and so the words are brought together. Or: "What you said on this subject, you said it in whatever place you pleased."

— and so the words are brought together — without mentioning it, one raises a fault against that person, points out a fault, brings the words together, and then sends the matter forward with the words having been patched over. It is like, for example, a charioteer whose horse is so unruly that it cannot be brought to a place where it can be tamed, and so that very charioteer ties it up with a rope, fits it with a bit and bridle, harnesses it with these painful restraints, and then abandons it. This is called an act of bringing words together.

What is failing to transmit a scriptural declaration? Whatever one fails to transmit as a scriptural declaration is what is not spoken in words — that is, remaining silent out of having seen, heard, or suspected something. That is called failing to transmit a scriptural declaration.

What is obstructing the transmission of a scriptural declaration? It is striving to ensure that a scriptural declaration is not transmitted.

What is failing to complete the transmission of a scriptural declaration? It is carelessly abandoning the task of ensuring that a scriptural declaration is not transmitted.

What is opening an occasion? One opens an occasion and then speaks to it in a way that is tolerable, and it is to be remembered. This is called opening an occasion.

What is an act of opening an occasion? There are five acts of opening an occasion. One says: "You, open an occasion for me — I will speak to you, I will address you, I will discuss it with you, I will bring it to your remembrance." This is called opening an occasion.

What is an act of opening an occasion together with a petition? It is petitioning another by means of those acts of opening an occasion.

What is obstructing the restoration ceremony (poṣadha)? Ten things that are not in accordance with the Dharma obstruct the restoration ceremony. Ten things that are in accordance with the Dharma also exist.

What are the ten things not in accordance with the Dharma by which the restoration ceremony is obstructed? They are: one who has not incurred a defeat; one who has not been declared in speech to have incurred a defeat; one who has not relinquished the training; one who has not been declared in speech to have relinquished the training; one who has not spoken ill of the Saṅgha; one who has not been declared in speech to have spoken ill of the Saṅgha; one whose moral discipline has not deteriorated; one whose view has not deteriorated; one whose conduct has not deteriorated; one whose livelihood has not deteriorated.

How is it that one has not incurred a defeat? If, by the appearance, the mark, and the sign by which a monk would incur a defeat, one does not see that monk as guilty of a defeat under such an appearance, mark, and sign, then obstructing that monk's restoration ceremony is an obstruction that is not in accordance with the Dharma. Thus that is a case of not having incurred a defeat.

How is it that one has not been declared in speech to have incurred a defeat? If many monks have assembled and gathered together, whether inside or outside the monastery, and neither something arising from that matter, nor a declaration that accords with the nature of that matter, has been spoken; nor has it been heard from a faithful source; nor has it arisen from conceptual thought about one's own circumstances — and yet one obstructs the restoration ceremony without having heard it — then this is an obstruction of the restoration ceremony that is not in accordance with the Dharma. Such is a case of not having been declared in speech to have incurred a defeat.

How is it that one has not relinquished the training? If by the appearance, the mark, and the sign by which a monk would relinquish the training, the monk has not seen such an appearance, such a mark, or such a sign — and yet one says "he has relinquished the training" and, without that monk's having seen it, obstructs the restoration ceremony — then this is not an obstruction of the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma. Thus that is a case of not having relinquished the training.

How is it that one has not been declared in speech to have relinquished the training? If many monks have assembled and gathered together, whether inside or outside the monastery, and neither something arising from that matter, nor a declaration in accordance with its nature, has been spoken; nor has it been heard from a faithful source; nor has it arisen from conceptual thought about one's own circumstances; nor has it been heard — — yet the restoration ceremony is obstructed without even a suspicion: that is an obstruction of the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Such as this is called not having declared in speech that one has relinquished the training.

How is it that one has not reviled the Saṅgha? If a monk who reviles the Saṅgha does so by means of a certain appearance, a certain sign, and a certain indication — and yet that same appearance, sign, and indication by which that monk would revile the Saṅgha are not seen — then for one who obstructs the restoration ceremony on the basis of those, that is an obstruction of the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Such as this is called not having reviled the Saṅgha.

How is it that one has not been declared in speech to have reviled the Saṅgha? For instance, whether inside or outside the monastery, many monks have assembled and gathered together, and neither something arising from that matter, nor something of that nature, nor a declaration in accordance with it, has been spoken among them; nor has it been heard from a faithful source; nor has it arisen from conceptual thought about one's own circumstances; nor has it been heard; nor is there any suspicion — yet the restoration ceremony is obstructed: that is an obstruction of the restoration ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Such as this is called not having been declared in speech to have reviled the Saṅgha.

How is it that moral discipline has not been impaired? If, with respect to any one of the four root defeats, one has not transgressed beyond the rule of root defeat — such as this is called not having impaired moral discipline.

How is it that one's view has not been impaired? If one has not come to hold any view among the sixty-two views — such as this is called one's view not having been impaired.

How is it that one's conduct has not been impaired? If one refrains from improper conduct and trains in the training of a monk — such as this is called one's conduct not having been impaired.

How is it that one's livelihood has not been impaired? If one's livelihood is entirely pure — such as this is called one's livelihood not having been impaired.

These, then, are the ten obstructions of the restoration ceremony that are not in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the ten obstructions of the restoration ceremony that are in accordance with the Dharma? They are: having incurred a root defeat; having been declared in speech to have incurred a root defeat; having relinquished the training; having been declared in speech to have relinquished the training; having reviled the Saṅgha; having been declared in speech to have reviled the Saṅgha; having impaired moral discipline; having impaired one's view; having impaired one's conduct; and having impaired one's livelihood.

How is it that one has incurred a root defeat? If a monk is seen, by means of a certain appearance, a certain sign, and a certain indication — by that same appearance, sign, and indication by which that monk would incur a root defeat — to be committing a root-defeat offense, then for one who obstructs the restoration ceremony on that basis, that is an obstruction of the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma. Such as this is called having incurred a root defeat.

How is it that one has been declared in speech to have incurred a root defeat? This is the case: whether inside or outside the monastery, having assembled and gathered together with many monks, something arising from that matter, or of that nature, or in accordance with it, has been declared in speech among them; it has been heard from a faithful source; it has arisen from one's own conceptual thought; it has been heard; and there is suspicion — and the restoration ceremony is obstructed on another ground: that is an obstruction of the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma. Such as this is called having been declared in speech to have incurred a root defeat.

How is it that one has relinquished the training? If a monk, by means of a certain appearance, a certain sign, and a certain indication by which the training is relinquished — and by that same appearance, sign, and indication — is seen to have relinquished the training, then for one who obstructs the restoration ceremony on that basis, that is an obstruction of the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

Such as this is called having relinquished the training. How is it that one has been declared in speech to have relinquished the training? It is as follows: whether inside or outside a monastery, when many monks have assembled and gathered together, and they have also spoken of something arising from that, or of its nature, or of something consonant with it — whether one has heard it from a trustworthy source, or it has arisen from conceptual thought about one's own appearance — and having heard it, or merely suspecting it, one obstructs the restoration ceremony: such as this is called having been declared in speech to have relinquished the training.

What is it to have become one who reviles the Saṅgha? If a monk, by means of a certain appearance, a certain sign, and a certain indication by which that monk has become one who reviles the Saṅgha — and being seen, by that same appearance, sign, and indication, to be making that monk into one who reviles the Saṅgha — one then obstructs the restoration ceremony on that basis: that is an obstruction of the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma. Such as this is called having become one who reviles the Saṅgha.

What is it to have been declared in speech to be one who reviles the Saṅgha? It is as follows: whether inside or outside a monastery, when many monks have assembled and gathered together, and they have also spoken of something arising from that, or of its nature, or of something consonant with it — whether one has heard it from a trustworthy source, or it has arisen from conceptual thought about one's own appearance, and having heard it, or merely suspecting it, one obstructs the restoration ceremony: such as this is called having been declared in speech to be one who reviles the Saṅgha.

What is it to have a deterioration of moral discipline? When any one of the four root defeats has occurred — such as this is called a deterioration of moral discipline.

What is it to have a deterioration of view? When one has come to hold any view belonging to the sixty-two [wrong] views — such as this is called a deterioration of view.

What is it to have a deterioration of conduct? When one does not conduct oneself properly and does not train in the training of a monk — such as this is called a deterioration of conduct.

What is it to have a deterioration of livelihood? When one's livelihood is utterly impure — such as this is called a deterioration of livelihood. These ten are what obstruct the restoration ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are those that obstruct the invitation ceremony? There are four that obstruct the invitation ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma, and four that obstruct the invitation ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the four that obstruct the invitation ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma? Obstructing the invitation ceremony when there is no basis for a deterioration of moral discipline — that is obstructing the invitation ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma. Obstructing the invitation ceremony when there is no basis for a deterioration of view, a deterioration of conduct, or a deterioration of livelihood — these four constitute obstructing the invitation ceremony not in accordance with the Dharma.

What are the four that obstruct the invitation ceremony in accordance with the Dharma? Obstructing the invitation ceremony when there is a basis for a deterioration of moral discipline — that is obstructing the invitation ceremony in accordance with the Dharma. Obstructing the invitation ceremony when there is a basis for a deterioration of view, a deterioration of conduct, or a deterioration of livelihood — these four constitute obstructing the invitation ceremony in accordance with the Dharma.

What is food placed inside? Food placed inside a suitable dwelling of Ānanda without having been assigned — that is food which is not to be eaten by fully ordained monks. Food which has been assigned to a suitable place is permissible to eat.

What are food and provisions cooked inside? Whatever provisions and food have been cooked inside are not to be eaten by a fully ordained monk. That which is not to be eaten — that is called having been cooked inside.

What is food cooked by oneself? In the city of Vaiśālī, when a year of misfortune had come and things were scarce and hard to obtain, the brahmins and householders wished to prepare food for the Saṅgha, and they thought to themselves:

If they were to make a commotion at home, they would be obliged to give to many relatives, many friends, and many people. Seeing that this would cause harm to the monks, they went to the monks and said: "Venerable ones, if cooking were done inside the monastery and a meal served there, what offense would result?" When matters had come to this pass, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "I permit cooking to be done outside the monastery and a meal to be served there." When the Blessed One had said, "Cook outside the monastery and serve the meal there," the smoke was great and the place became crowded. Many people came and it grew chaotic, and when the monks distributed food to everyone, the monks' share became very small, and the monks went hungry. The monks reported this state of affairs to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Designate an inspected place inside the monastery, cook there, and serve the meal." When the Blessed One had said, "Designate an inspected place inside the monastery, cook and serve there," the monks did just so. But then the monastery workers and the novices' fathers took from it first for their own benefit, and afterward they gave to the monks assigned to cook whatever little was left over. The monks' share became small and the monks went hungry. The monks reported this state of affairs to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "In such a year of misfortune, when things are scarce and hard to obtain, I permit monks to cook for themselves and eat. Moreover, if a designated inspected place is established, two difficulties are avoided: that of keeping food inside and that of living inside." Except in such a year of misfortune when things are scarce and hard to obtain, whether or not a place has been designated, whatever place it may be — food cooked by oneself is not permissible to eat. That is called food cooked by oneself.

What is the taking back by a monk? Some monks ate a great deal and some ate little. For those who ate a great deal, it was not enough; for those who ate little, there was food left over, and when they gave it to others, the others did not eat it because the Blessed One had not permitted them to eat it. The monks reported this state of affairs to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "In such a year of misfortune when things are scarce and hard to obtain, I permit monks to eat what has been cooked." What, then, is this? It is whatever has been cooked by a fully ordained monk. This is called food cooked by a monk.

What is taking? It is whatever has been taken knowingly by a monk who is ashamed. This is called taking.

What is not receiving? Whether from a woman, a man, a hermaphrodite, a girl, or one of dual characteristics — in any case, food that has not been received is called not receiving.

What is retaking from what was taken? Whatever has been received again by oneself from what one had put down, and afterward received again from another — this is called retaking from what was taken.

What is receiving before the morning meal? It is receiving before one has eaten. The Blessed One permitted this in that very city of Vaiśālī: in such a year of misfortune when things are scarce and hard to obtain, a monk who has satisfied himself, even if he has not done more after having received the morning meal offering, may eat again from what remains. This is called receiving at the time of the morning meal.

What then is carrying away again?

Carrying away again is when a monk, having eaten there, takes food with him as he goes. The Blessed One permitted this too in that very city of Vaiśālī: in such a year of misfortune when things are scarce and hard to obtain, the Blessed One said that a monk who has satisfied himself may carry away what remains and eat from it even without setting aside a surplus. This is called carrying away again.

What then is forest-berry food? Forest-berry food refers to the fruits of forest-shrub plants such as the staghorn sumac, the orumana, the bhatam, and whatever other fruits of forest-berry bushes there may be. The Blessed One is said to have permitted these too at the city of Vaiśālī, saying that in such a year of misfortune when things are scarce and hard to obtain, even if a monk has already satisfied himself, he may eat again from such forest berries without having set aside a surplus.

What then is pond-grown food? The venerable Śāriputra was afflicted with a bile-fever sickness, and a physician indicated a remedy, namely that lotus roots would be fitting as food for him. The venerable Mahāmaudgalyāyana then went to a lotus pond, obtained lotus roots, and gave them to the venerable Śāriputra. Śāriputra ate a little, but not wanting much more, gave the remainder to the monks. The monks, however, said, "We have already satisfied ourselves; we will not eat." When this matter was reported to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "In such a year of misfortune when things are scarce and hard to obtain, even if a monk has already satisfied himself, he may eat from pond-grown things without having set aside a surplus." And what are those things? They are: the rishighati, the kharkatika, the karshingakatala, and whatever other fruits produced within the water there may be. These are called pond-grown food.

Following this, the Blessed One remained in the city of Vaiśālī for as long as he wished during that time of misfortune when things were scarce and hard to obtain, and then set out, travelling gradually, for the city of Śrāvastī. When he had journeyed by stages and arrived at Śrāvastī, he took up residence in the Jeta Grove, in the garden of Anāthapiṇḍada. There the Blessed One addressed the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, the eight articles I have permitted for monks in that great city of Vaiśālī during the time of misfortune when things are scarce and hard to obtain are these: storing inside, cooking inside, cooking oneself, having a monk cook, receiving at the morning meal time, carrying away again, forest-berry food, and pond-grown food. Are those things still being consumed there as was appropriate?" Some of the monks replied, "Yes, Venerable One," while others said, "No."

Thereupon the Blessed One, for that very same reason, convened the assembly of monks and declared to them: "Monks, out of compassion, the following permission was granted: in the city of Vaiśālī during the time of misfortune when things are scarce and hard to obtain, even if monks had satisfied themselves, these eight articles were permitted. In a year of misfortune, they may be eaten; in a good year, they are not to be eaten. Whoever eats them in a good year incurs a transgression."

What is depositing? Depositing is settled by nine mental acts. What are these? The monk who makes a deposit from the very beginning, in the processes of taking the robe-material, washing it, stretching it, counting the threads, matching them, and sewing, generates three kinds of mental intention: "I, a monk called so-and-so by name, am doing this — this cloth will become a robe-material deposited for the Saṅgha; I shall deposit it; I have deposited it."

In the middle phase as well, three kinds of mental intention are to be generated: "I, a monk called so-and-so by name, this cloth will become a robe-material deposited for the Saṅgha; I shall deposit it; I have deposited it." And at the time of the final stitch completing the sewing, three kinds of mental intention are likewise to be generated: "I, a monk called so-and-so by name, this cloth will become a robe-material deposited for the Saṅgha; I shall deposit it; I have deposited it."

Furthermore, in whatever place the Saṅgha resides, at the time of making the initial deposit, all monks of equally pure stream who are residing within that boundary, upon merely hearing that "the Saṅgha has made a deposit," if they rejoice in it, then it is said that all of them have likewise made the deposit. This is what is called "depositing."

What is non-depositing? The opposite of the above is non-depositing. Specifically, if the Saṅgha makes a deposit when the three months are not yet complete, it is called non-depositing. This is what is called "non-depositing."

What is withdrawal? Withdrawal of the deposit occurs through eight terms resembling the negative. What are these? They are: having withdrawn and departed, having received, having received entirely, having deteriorated, having heard, having passed beyond the boundary, having had one's intention cut off, and having made formal request — these eight terms. This is what is called "withdrawal."

What is non-withdrawal? The opposite of these is non-withdrawal. However, even if any one of the eight interruptions has occurred, if a monk departs from the place of deposit intentionally and then returns, it is still called non-withdrawal of the deposit. This is what is called "non-withdrawal of the deposit."

What are heavy requisites? Those which it is not proper to distribute. What are light requisites? Those which it is proper to distribute. What are requisites that are proper to distribute? The belongings of a deceased monk that are to be distributed — specifically, everything other than the Dharma-robe of the deceased: those remaining items are the light requisites. This is what is called "requisites proper to distribute."

What are requisites not proper to distribute? The belongings of a deceased monk that are not to be distributed — specifically, everything other than the Dharma-robe of the deceased: the heavy items among those remaining. This is what is called "requisites not proper to distribute."

Among these, what is classified as a heavy requisite by being superseded by the Dharma-robe is the sick-attendant's Dharma-robe. Among requisites other than that, the light ones — iron vessels, alms bowls, small bowls, and non-bowl containers — these are requisites proper to distribute. Wooden items, copper pieces, keys, knives, needle-cases, nail-cutters, felt, leather straps, hatchets, brooms, water-strainers — these are requisites proper to distribute. Whatever is even lighter than these is likewise proper to distribute. Whatever heavy requisites are other than these are not proper to distribute; all of those are to be set aside for the Saṅgha of the four directions.

Among wooden vessels, eye-cups, Dharma water-strainers, large bowls, and lacquered bowls — these too are requisites proper to distribute. Whatever light requisites among them are other than these are likewise proper to distribute. Whatever heavy requisites among them are other than these are not proper to distribute; all of those are to be set aside for the Saṅgha of the four directions.

Among earthenware vessels, alms bowls, small bowls, non-bowl containers, clay pots, water-jugs, small jugs, round pouring vessels — these are requisites proper to distribute.

Whatever light requisites among them other than these are likewise proper to distribute. Whatever heavy requisites among them are not proper to distribute; all of those are to be set aside for the Saṅgha of the four directions.

Dye that has been boiled is to be used for washing the robes of the Saṅgha of the four directions. Whatever dye has not been boiled is to be distributed. The five principal dyes are not to be distributed. If there are thrones made of precious materials, they are to be converted and distributed. If something small is made of iron and is fit for use as a requisite, it is to be kept. If it is a heavy requisite of any other kind, it is not proper to distribute it.

Furthermore, there are five kinds of things that are not to be sold, not to be held, not to be needed, not to be distributed, not to be given to others, and not proper to give to anyone at all. What are they? The property of a temple, the property of a residence, the bathing room of the community garden, bedding, and human requisites.

What are human requisites? The Blessed One declared: whether belonging to the Saṅgha or to a stūpa, these are called human requisites.

What are non-human requisites? Yaks, bulls, goats, sheep, and buffalo — these belong either to the Saṅgha or to a stūpa, and the Blessed One declared them to be permitted. These are called non-human requisites.

What are occupied requisites? A village or a forest that is occupied by a woman, a man, a hermaphrodite, a neuter, or a person of both characteristics — that which is occupied by another is called an occupied requisite.

What are unoccupied requisites? A village or a forest that is not occupied by any woman, man, hermaphrodite, neuter, or person of both characteristics — that which is unoccupied is called an unoccupied requisite.

What are requisites that must be received? That which monks receive from others and then eat — what are these? Apart from water and tooth-cleaning wood, everything else that is placed in the mouth and eaten is a requisite that must be received. These are called requisites that must be received.

What are requisites that need not be received? That which monks may eat without having received it from another — what are these? All requisites that are freely used, and what is placed in the mouth, namely water and tooth-cleaning wood. These are called requisites that need not be received.

What is the robe-right of the deceased? The robe-right of the deceased belonging to the five groups is a robe-right of the deceased, and the Blessed One declared that it is to be distributed at all times among the five groups, whether within the rains retreat or outside the rains retreat, without exception. These are called the robe-right of the deceased.

What is the robe-right of the time of signs? The robe obtained in the fifth year, the sixth year, at a great festival, or when examined and received — the Blessed One declared that this too is to be distributed at all times, whether during the rains retreat or outside it. These are called the robe-right of the time of signs.

What are rag robes? Monks are permitted to keep five kinds of rag robes: those scorched by fire, those gnawed by yaks, those gnawed by mice, robes that have been reclaimed, and those that are rotten. These are called rag robes.

What is the enema procedure? The enema procedure that the Blessed One permitted for monks is for those suffering from eye disease, in the same way as it was granted to the venerable Pilindavatsa, in full detail as it appears in the Vinaya. That is called the enema procedure given through the nose.

What is the enema procedure administered through the lower passage? Monks should not administer an enema through the lower passage as long as another means of treatment is available. If they do so, it becomes a serious offense.

The procedure is to be performed only when no other means is available. That is called the enema procedure administered through the lower passage.

What is the surgical procedure? Monks should not perform a surgical procedure on the face as long as another means of treatment is available. If they do so, it becomes a serious offense. The procedure is to be performed only when no other means is available. That is called the surgical procedure.

What is the hair-removal procedure? Monks should not remove bodily hair from limbs other than the hair of the head and the beard. If they do so, it becomes a serious offense. That is called the hair-removal procedure.

What is the hair-cutting procedure? Monks should not cut hair haphazardly in all directions; they should cut it on one side and trim it in order of seniority. Moreover, once hair has been cut with a razor, it should not be raised up again. If it is raised up, it becomes a serious offense. That is called the hair-cutting procedure.

What is the intentional preparation and consumption of food? The five kinds of seeds are to be rendered allowable by the five means of rendering allowable, and then eaten. The eight drinks are to be diluted with water. The ten kinds of cloth are to be rendered of a bad color by one of the three means of discoloring, and then kept. In this way they are to be intentionally prepared and used.

What is the eating of fruit? In the city of Vaiśālī, a great quantity of fruit was prepared for individual use by monks and eaten; whereupon the Blessed One declared: "One should not prepare fruit for individual use and eat it; rather, one should distribute it to the Saṅgha." The Blessed One said, "Let it be distributed to the Saṅgha," and thereupon some monks took one, two, or three portions, some received none at all, and others were left with a surplus. When matters had come to this pass, the monks reported it to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Distribute it evenly to all." They continued selecting and distributing, but while selecting and distributing in accordance with the Blessed One's ruling, they began to pick and choose as they distributed. The Blessed One declared: "One should not pick and choose while distributing." Then they began to indicate portions with their fingers while taking them. The Blessed One declared: "One should not indicate with a finger while taking." Being unable to distribute evenly to all, they fell into dispute. The monks reported this state of affairs to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: "Make a brief formal request: whoever wishes to consume the full portion shall be rendered allowable by the five means by which a monk renders things allowable, and after receiving it, may eat it." That is called the complete use of fruit.

What is the complete use of human goods? Seats made for humans — whether of gold, silver, crystal, or vaidūrya — monks may sit upon but should not use as vessels. That is called the complete use of human goods.

What is the complete use of non-human goods? In a god's dwelling, a nāga's dwelling, or a yakṣa's dwelling — walking on floors, ascending stairs, sitting on seats, and using vessels made of gold, silver, crystal, or vaidūrya — all of these monks are permitted to render allowable and use. That is called the complete use of non-human goods.

What is the Vinaya recension compiled by the five hundred? Not long after the buddha, the Blessed One, had passed into nirvāṇa, five hundred monks assembled in the city of Rājagṛha and compiled all the Sūtras, all the Vinaya, and all the Abhidharma. This is called the Vinaya recension compiled by the five hundred. What is the Vinaya recension compiled by the seven hundred?

One hundred and ten years after the buddha, the Blessed One, had passed into nirvāṇa, the monks dwelling in the city of Vaiśālī brought forth ten improper matters. These were: inferior sūtras, inferior Vinaya, inferior teaching of the Teacher, things contradicting the sūtras, things not arising from the Vinaya, and things discordant with the nature of reality — all of which the monks of Vaiśālī declared allowable, practiced, practiced extensively, and proclaimed widely. Thereupon seven hundred monks assembled together and declared: "This is not the Dharma. This is not the Vinaya. This is not the teaching of the Teacher." Having openly suppressed these matters, this is called the Vinaya recension compiled by the seven hundred.

What is the arising of the Vinaya? The following are called the arising of the Vinaya: the eighteen topics of Vinaya together with the two divisions of individual liberation; the Vinaya surpassing by one; the Vinaya resembling the mother; the fifth Vinaya; the sixteenth Vinaya; the Vinaya called Māṇavakū;

the minor Vinaya; the abbreviated Vinaya; the narrative bases; the narrative matter; the Questions of Upāli; the common and the uncommon; the training rules; the five hundred scriptural transmissions; the five hundred sections of birth stories; and the five hundred former deeds — all of these are called the arising of the Vinaya.

What is the dark exposition? There are four dark expositions. What are the four? Here, when a monk comes forward and says, "I myself heard this directly from the Blessed One and received it directly: such and such a Dharma and such and such a Vinaya — this is what the Teacher taught," one should neither rejoice at that nor disparage it. Without either rejoicing or disparaging, one should listen carefully with one's ears, take up the words and letters of the Dharma, and examine them against the sūtras and against the Vinaya. If, upon being examined against the sūtras and against the Vinaya, it is found to be discordant with the sūtras, not in conformity with the Vinaya, and discordant with the nature of reality, then one should speak these words: "Venerable one, such Dharma as this was not taught by the Blessed One, nor was it held as conforming to the nature of reality by the Venerable One. Such Dharma as this, when I examine it against the sūtras and against the Vinaya, is found to be discordant with the sūtras, not in accord with the Vinaya, and contradictory to the nature of reality. Therefore: this is not the Dharma, this is not the Vinaya, and the Teacher did not teach it thus — this is to be understood, and it is to be abandoned."

Furthermore, when another monk comes forward and says, "In such and such a place there dwells a great community of monks, together with elders and together with those bearing individual liberation, and it is from before that assembly of the resident community of monks that I directly heard and directly received the following: this is the Dharma" — and so on, as before — one should speak to him in these words: "Venerable one, that community of monks regards such Dharma as this as Dharma and as Vinaya; but because it has been stated to be non-Dharma and non-Vinaya, you, Venerable one, have received it as non-Dharma" — and so on, as before, it is to be abandoned.

Furthermore, when yet another monk comes forward and those monks say, "In such and such a place there dwells an especially large assembly of monks — monks who hold the sūtras, monks who hold the Vinaya, and monks who hold what resembles the mother — and it is from before those monks that I directly heard and directly received the following: such is the Dharma" —

"This is the Dharma" — and so on as before, having so spoken, one should say to that monk the following: "Venerable one, the monks perceive such teachings as these to be Dharma and to be Vinaya; but because it has been stated to be non-Dharma and non-Vinaya, the Venerable one has received what is contrary to the Dharma" — and so on as before, it is to be abandoned.

Furthermore, when yet another monk comes forward and says the following: "In such and such a place there dwell elder monks, and whatever elder monks there may be, learned monks, and whatever learned monks there may be, and chief monks, and whatever chief monks there may be — it is from before those monks dwelling there that I directly heard and directly received the following" — and so on as before — one should say to him the following: "Venerable one, that monk perceives such things as Dharma and as Vinaya; but because it has been stated to be non-Dharma and non-Vinaya, the Venerable one has in that way received what is non-Dharma" — and so on as before, it is to be abandoned.

Now, why is something called a "dark teaching"? Whatever those are taught darkly, they are taught darkly — that is to say, they are taught as dark. They are taught as non-noble. Therefore they are called "dark teachings."

And why is it that what they have spoken — non-Dharma — is to be cut off, and the Dharma collected, and the individual reflections of the genuine Dharma removed? It is so that one who becomes a śrāvaka without fear will do so through this speech of the Buddha. This is what is called a "dark teaching."

Now, what is a "great teaching"? There are four great teachings. What are the four? Here, when a monk comes forward and says the following: "I directly heard and directly received the following from before the Blessed One himself: this is the Dharma, this is the Vinaya, this is what the Teacher has taught" — when he says this, one should neither rejoice nor criticize. Neither rejoicing nor criticizing, one should listen with one's ears and take up the words and letters of the Dharma, and then compare them with the sūtras and test them against the Vinaya. If, when compared with the sūtras and tested against the Vinaya, they are in accord with the sūtras, appear in the Vinaya, and do not conflict with the nature of reality, then one should say to him the following: "Venerable one, in that case, such Dharma as this was indeed spoken by the Blessed One, and the Venerable one has received that Dharma just as it is. I too, having compared that Dharma with the sūtras and tested it against the Vinaya, found it to be in accord with the sūtras, to arise from the Vinaya, and not to conflict with the nature of reality. This is Dharma, this is Vinaya, this is what the Teacher has taught" — one should understand it to be so and hold it.

Furthermore, when yet another monk comes forward and says the following: "In such and such a place there dwells an assembly of monks together with their elders, possessed of the code of individual liberation, and it is from before that community of monks dwelling there that I directly heard and directly received the following" — and so on as before. Having said that, one should say to him the following: "Venerable one, in that case, that community of monks perceives this Dharma to be Dharma and to be Vinaya, and because Dharma and Vinaya have been stated, the Venerable one has in that way received this Dharma well" — and so on as before, it is to be held.

Furthermore, when yet another monk comes forward and says the following: "In such and such a place there dwell a great many monks — monks who hold the sūtras, monks who hold the Vinaya, monks who hold what resembles the mother — and it is from before those monks dwelling there that I directly heard and directly received the following" — what was directly received is as follows: "This is the Dharma" — and so on as before. When someone speaks in this way, one should respond with the following words: "Venerable one, in that case, this Dharma is perceived by that monk as Dharma and as Vinaya, and because Dharma and Vinaya have been stated, the Venerable one has also received such Dharma well" — and so on as before, it is to be held.

Furthermore, when yet another monk comes forward and speaks as follows: "In such and such a place there dwell monks who are elders, and whatever elders there may be, and those who are learned, and whoever may be learned, and those who are foremost, and whoever may be foremost — it is from before those monks dwelling there that I directly heard and directly received the following: 'This is the Dharma'" — and so on as before. When someone speaks in this way, one should respond with these words: "Venerable one, in that case, this Dharma is perceived by that monk as Dharma and as Vinaya, and because Dharma and Vinaya have been stated, the Venerable one has also received this Dharma well" — and so on as before, it is to be held.

Now, why are these called "great expositions"? This word means a great exposition — that which has been taught by a great expounder. They teach in the manner of a noble one, and therefore they are called great expositions. And why are these things declared? Fearlessly, in order to cut off what is not Dharma, to gather what is Dharma, and to individually dispel the reflections and images of the true Dharma, one becomes a hearer — that is to say, in order to cut off what is not Dharma and to gather what is Dharma, this is called a great exposition.

Now, monks, the first four great expositions that were stated above should be well and thoroughly examined by monks and properly demonstrated, and having recognized them as "This is not Dharma, this is not Vinaya, this was not taught by the Teacher," they are to be discarded. And the latter four great expositions stated here should be well and thoroughly examined by monks and properly demonstrated, and having recognized them as "This is Dharma, this is Vinaya, this was taught by the Teacher," they are to be held.

What is "mixed"? Whatever, from the cause of being individually established in medicines of roots, stems, leaves, flowers, and fruits, has become mixed together — that is called mixed.

What is "thoroughly mixed"? Having taken from one and from another — that which is for the morning, and that taken for the afternoon, and that for seven days, and that for as long as life lasts — when these are mixed together with one another: what is included in the morning portion should be eaten in the morning; once the morning has passed, it may not be eaten. What is taken and becomes the afternoon portion, or the seven-day portion, or the portion for as long as life lasts — when these are mixed together with one another, it may be eaten in the afternoon; once the afternoon has passed, it may not be eaten. What is taken as the seven-day portion and what is taken as the portion for as long as life lasts, when mixed together, may be eaten as the seven-day portion; once seven days have passed, it may not be eaten. What lasts for as long as life lasts may similarly be eaten for as long as life lasts. This is called "thoroughly mixed."

What is "suitable for the recreation hall"? Whatever a monk takes up while staying in a recreation hall, or staying in the dwelling of a recreation hall, or has caused to be received — saying "This belongs to so-and-so; give this to him" — if received in such a manner, that is called "suitable for the recreation hall."

What is "suitable for a forest"? "Forest" refers to a grove of trees. Whatever branches, leaves, fronds, and — flowers that spread and cover one another up to the distance of one league — within that boundary, a monk may set down his robes wherever he pleases, and remain until dawn wherever he pleases. This is called "suitable for a forest."

What is "suitable for a circuit"? When there are many surrounding quarters belonging to individual cells in a monastic hall of the Saṅgha, whatever is obtained there is to be divided and used just as it was separately consecrated. This is called "suitable for a circuit."

What is "suitable for a region"? At the time of Jambudvīpa, monks may eat food suitable for the northern continent of Uttarakuru. "Suitable for a region" means: at the time of this continent of Jambudvīpa, the northern continent of Uttarakuru is midday. Just as the correlation is applied across all four continents according to the time of Jambudvīpa, food that is suitable in that region is called "suitable for a region."

What is "suitable for a direction"? Taking and eating what is received in a reviling district is permissible for monks. Monks of great miraculous power and great might who go out to a reviling district to collect alms — when the people of the reviling district, rather than giving directly from hand to hand, toss the food down in front of them — those monks, not knowing how to proceed, reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: receiving is to be understood in five ways. What are the five ways of receiving? Doing so with the body directed toward a body; doing so with the body directed toward something held by a body; doing so with something held by the body directed toward a body; doing so with something held by the body directed toward something held by the body; and doing so with what has been thrown down — receiving what has been cast. These five constitute what is called "suitable for a direction."

What is "suitable for a land"? In a snowy land, sandals with uppers and sandals without uppers are said to be permitted; in other lands they are not permitted. In the land of Uṣmapārantaka, the use of hides and regular bathing are said to be permitted; in other lands they are not. In frontier lands, when ten qualified members of the Saṅgha are not available, full ordination with five, provided one is a Vinaya-holder, is said to be permitted; in other lands it is not. This is called "suitable for a land."

What is "suitable for robes"? Ten types of cloth that have been cut with a weapon and made of inferior color may be kept — these are monk's permissible robes. They are as follows: wool; bark-cloth; hemp; coarse linen grass-cloth; cotton wadding; silk floss; fine soft cloth; Kashmiri silk; grass-cloth of the koṭambhaka grass; and keyūra. These are the ten. Furthermore, seven types of cloth that, while counted as robes permissible for a monk, need not be formally sanctioned but may simply be kept, are: a loin-cloth; an upper robe; a lower robe; an upper covering; a large summer cloth; a wrapper against the itch; and a cloth for implements. These seven constitute what is called "suitable for robes."

What is "permissible sour liquid"? When monks fell ill and consulted a physician, and the physician said they should drink sour liquid, those monks, not knowing how to prepare it, reported the matter to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: it is permitted for monks who have a slight fever and whose bile is agitated to prepare and drink sour liquid. How is sour liquid to be prepared? The broth from boiled rice, the rinsing water of washed rice, and the juice of root-joints are to be mixed together in hot water and drunk while it turns sour in the manner of porridge.

This is something that monks may need even at an untimely hour. The Blessed One declared: this too is permitted — that which is light, clear, and free of sediment is to be strained through cloth, diluted with water, and drunk during the daytime and up until the first watch of the night. This is what is called "permissible sour liquid."

Here ends the first aggregate on full ordination, in the manner of the non-like, from the Noble Vinaya.

The Noble Vinaya, the forty-ninth bundle.

What is the aggregate of the pravāraṇā ceremony (the invitation ceremony)? There is the pravāraṇā of opening the occasion, the pravāraṇā of presenting the opened occasion, the pravāraṇā of receiving the opened occasion, and the pravāraṇā of proclaiming the opened occasion. There is the pravāraṇā of the restoration and confession ceremony, the pravāraṇā of presenting the restoration and confession, the pravāraṇā of receiving the restoration and confession, and the pravāraṇā of proclaiming the restoration and confession. There is the pravāraṇā of faith, the pravāraṇā of presenting faith, the pravāraṇā of receiving faith, and the pravāraṇā of proclaiming faith. There is the pravāraṇā of complete purity, the pravāraṇā of presenting complete purity, the pravāraṇā of receiving complete purity, and the pravāraṇā of proclaiming complete purity. There is the pravāraṇā of faith and complete purity together, the pravāraṇā of presenting faith and complete purity, the pravāraṇā of receiving faith and complete purity, and the pravāraṇā of proclaiming faith and complete purity. There is the pravāraṇā of the stūpa, the pravāraṇā of the stūpa's material goods, the pravāraṇā of the garland of the stūpa's cloister, the pravāraṇā of the stūpa's inexhaustible fund, the pravāraṇā of the stūpa's restoration, the pravāraṇā of the stūpa's adornments, and the pravāraṇā of making offerings to the stūpa. There is the pravāraṇā of food, the pravāraṇā of food with accompaniments, the pravāraṇā of porridge, the pravāraṇā of condiments, the pravāraṇā of flavored foods, and the pravāraṇā of solid food. There is the pravāraṇā of the alms bowl, the pravāraṇā of robes, the pravāraṇā of the sitting cloth, the pravāraṇā of needles, and the pravāraṇā of the needle case. There is the pravāraṇā of lodging, the pravāraṇā of receiving lodging, the pravāraṇā of giving lodging, and the pravāraṇā of distributing lodging individually. There is the pravāraṇā of the preceptor, the pravāraṇā of the co-resident, the pravāraṇā of the ācārya, and the pravāraṇā of the attendant. There is the pravāraṇā of the preceptor, ācārya, co-resident, and attendant together. There is the pravāraṇā of monks, the pravāraṇā of novices, the pravāraṇā of material goods, the pravāraṇā of the temple, the pravāraṇā of beds and seats, the pravāraṇā of new construction, and the pravāraṇā of engaging in new construction. There is the pravāraṇā of paying homage, the pravāraṇā of sour liquid, the pravāraṇā of powdered medicine, the pravāraṇā of medicine, and the pravāraṇā of drinks. There is the pravāraṇā of leather goods, the pravāraṇā of sandals, the pravāraṇā of wooden sandals, the pravāraṇā of what is dragged, the pravāraṇā of what is carried on the shoulder, and the pravāraṇā of nets. There is the pravāraṇā of needles and nets, the pravāraṇā of onion sprouts, the pravāraṇā of razors, the pravāraṇā of razor cases, the pravāraṇā of curved keys, the pravāraṇā of door bolts, the pravāraṇā of conveyances, and the pravāraṇā of parasols.

There is the pravāraṇā of fans, the pravāraṇā of fly-whisks with tails, the pravāraṇā of fly-whisk handles, the pravāraṇā of mirrors, the pravāraṇā of garlands, perfumes, and unguents, the pravāraṇā of dancing, singing, and playing music, the pravāraṇā of tooth-cleaning sticks, the pravāraṇā of eye medicine, the pravāraṇā of eye-medicine applicators, the pravāraṇā of eye-medicine containers, the pravāraṇā of mallets, the pravāraṇā of lying down, the pravāraṇā of sitting, the pravāraṇā of knee-clasping, the pravāraṇā of striking-sticks, the pravāraṇā of belts, the pravāraṇā of pebbles, the pravāraṇā of wrapping cloth and tying off knots, the pravāraṇā of earth, the pravāraṇā of supporting trees, the pravāraṇā of material things, the pravāraṇā of groves, the pravāraṇā of disputes, the pravāraṇā of schism, the pravāraṇā of assemblies, and the pravāraṇā of prostrations. This completes the chapter on two matters in the manner of the mother.

What is the pravāraṇā of opening an opportunity? The Blessed One permitted monks to open an opportunity by means of three grounds — seeing, hearing, and suspicion — and declared: the monks who have dwelt through the rains retreat, having come together as one, shall open an opportunity to the Saṅgha on the grounds of seeing, hearing, and suspicion. Why was the opening of an opportunity permitted? Because it serves as a good friend to monks: they speak to one another, remind one another, and point things out, guiding each other; and when, through the force of praise or intimidation by fear, one who is pure and free of fault and blameless comes to be held responsible for something done just then, saying, "I am indeed pure, I am indeed free of fault" — this is called the pravāraṇā of opening an opportunity.

What is the pravāraṇā of tendering a proxy invitation? A monk who is ill and cannot go to the place of the pravāraṇā of opening an opportunity should send a proxy invitation. If one who is not ill fails to go, it becomes a transgression. If there is present before him an evident danger of having his livelihood cut off, or his celibate life cut off, or any one of the eight kinds of obstruction, he too may send a proxy invitation. One who has been seized by another and rendered powerless may likewise send a proxy invitation.

The manner of tendering it is as follows: one rises from one's seat, arranges the upper robe over one shoulder, removes one's sandals, sits in a crouch before a monk, joins the palms together, and speaks these words: "Venerable one, please attend. Today is the pravāraṇā of the fifteenth of the Saṅgha. As for me, the monk called such-and-such, in this pravāraṇā of the fifteenth, I ask the venerable Saṅgha to open an opportunity for me, the monk called such-and-such, on the three grounds of seeing, hearing, and suspicion. Venerable one, please be kind to me. Those who, being compassionate and out of compassion, know and see a fault — let the venerable one speak to me of it. Venerable one, please instruct me, and I shall act in accordance with the Dharma." This is to be said in this way two or three times. The other should respond, "Very well," and the second should say, "Excellent!" If one is able to do so in that way, well and good; if one is unable, one may tender it while seated. If one is unable even seated, one may tender it while lying down. If even lying down one is unable, if one says even briefly, "I am tendering a proxy invitation," the proxy invitation has been tendered. If one says, "Please speak the proxy invitation on my behalf," that too counts as having tendered the proxy invitation. If one is unable by any means to tender the proxy invitation verbally, if it is tendered by a bodily gesture, that too is counted as having tendered the proxy invitation.

If one is unable even by bodily gesture, then if the proxy invitation is tendered by a mere verbal signal, that too is counted as having tendered the proxy invitation. If one is unable by bodily gesture and also unable verbally, then the entire Saṅgha should go to that place, or alternatively that monk should be brought here. If the entire Saṅgha does not go to that place and that monk is not brought there either, then the Saṅgha, by having performed the act without a complete assembly, will have committed a transgression. If the monk who has received the proxy invitation dies after having accepted it, that is counted as the proxy invitation not having been tendered, and the proxy invitation must be tendered to someone else. Likewise, if one acknowledges oneself to be a layman, that too is counted as the proxy invitation not having been tendered, and the proxy invitation must be tendered to someone else. Furthermore, if one acknowledges oneself to be a non-ordained ascetic (śramaṇa), a eunuch, one who has expelled a nun, one who has killed one's father, one who has killed one's mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from the body of a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, one who is a habitual thief, one who has previously broken their precepts, one who has previously committed an offense, or one who resides in a different realm — if one acknowledges oneself to be any of these, that too is counted as the proxy invitation not having been tendered, and the proxy invitation must be tendered to someone else. If one acknowledges oneself to be a novice, that too is counted as the proxy invitation not having been properly opened. If one acknowledges oneself to be one who has caused schism in the Saṅgha, one who is not residing in the community, one who is residing separately, one who has taken a partisan position, or one who has returned their training — that too is counted as the proxy invitation not having been tendered. This concludes the section on the proper conduct of tendering the proxy invitation.

What is the proper conduct for receiving the proxy invitation? When a monk receives the proxy invitation from the Saṅgha, he should receive it in the following manner. Whether it is one receiving on behalf of one, one on behalf of two, or one on behalf of many — he should receive it for as many as the names he is able to recite. The monk who has received the proxy invitation must not run, must not leap, must not jump, must not travel underground, and must not travel through the sky. He must not receive the proxy invitation from beyond the boundary. He should receive the proxy invitation mindfully from within the boundary. If he receives it from beyond the boundary, it becomes an offense. However, if, while receiving the invitation from within the boundary, a manifest danger arises that threatens his livelihood, his celibacy, or involves any one of the eight kinds of interruption, and he nevertheless comes from beyond the boundary, there is no offense. This concludes the section on the proper conduct of receiving the proxy invitation.

What is the proper conduct for reciting the proxy invitation? If the monk who is to recite the proxy invitation has not arrived within the Saṅgha and the time has passed, that is counted as the proxy invitation not having been recited. If one acknowledges oneself to be a layman, that too is counted as the proxy invitation not having been recited. If one acknowledges oneself to be a non-ordained ascetic, a eunuch, one who has expelled a nun, one who has killed one's father, one who has killed one's mother, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from the body of a Tathāgata, a tīrthika, one who has gone over to the tīrthikas, a habitual thief, one who has previously broken their precepts, one who has previously committed an offense, or one who resides in a different realm — that too is counted as the proxy invitation not having been recited. If one acknowledges oneself to be a novice, that too is counted as the proxy invitation not having been recited. If one acknowledges oneself to be one who has caused schism in the Saṅgha, one who is not residing in the community, one who is residing separately, or one who has taken a partisan position — — that too is counted as the proxy invitation not having been recited. If one acknowledges oneself to be one who has surrendered the training, that too is counted as the proxy invitation not having been recited.

A monk who has recited the proxy invitation must not, after giving the proxy invitation, lie down to sleep, nor enter into meditative absorption; rather, he must recite the invitation consciously and with full vigilance. And this is how it is to be recited: after the request has been made, one rises from one's seat, arranges the upper robe over one shoulder, sits respectfully in a squatting posture before the monk who is to open the occasion, joins the palms together, and speaks these words:

"Please attend, venerable one. Today is the Saṅgha's fifteenth-day occasion for opening. I, the monk called such-and-such, also have today's fifteenth-day occasion for opening. In the three grounds of what has been seen, what has been heard, and what has been suspected with respect to me, the monk called such-and-such, may the venerable one open the occasion before the noble Saṅgha on my behalf. Please, venerable one, have compassion for me. Out of that compassion, please inform me, venerable one, of my offenses and tell me what has been seen. May the venerable one instruct me accordingly, and I shall restore them in accordance with the Dharma."

This is to be said in this way two and then three times. The other monk should respond: "Very well." To the second repetition he should say: "Good." If it is recited in four modes, it counts as the proxy invitation not having been recited. And what are those four? Shamelessness, heedlessness, lying down in sleep, and having entered meditative absorption. Of these, the two modes of shamelessness and heedlessness entail an offense. The two modes of lying down in sleep and having entered meditative absorption entail no offense. This is called the section on reciting the proxy invitation for opening the occasion.

What is the section on the restoration ceremony (poṣadha)? The Blessed One permitted monks to perform the restoration ceremony twice each month. The monks are to gather together and each one is to examine his own continuum — whether, within that period, any transgressions whatsoever have arisen in the continuum of his nighttime conduct, his daytime conduct, or the conduct of an entire month. If any have arisen, he is to confess them to a trustworthy monk if one can be found. If none can be found, he should dedicate them in his mind. This is called the section on the restoration ceremony. And why is it called the restoration ceremony? Because through it one will decidedly abandon sinful and non-virtuous phenomena, mental afflictions, what has not yet emerged fully, and that which is impure by its very nature, and one will come to obtain the intrinsic nature of purity nearby. For this reason it is called the restoration ceremony. This concludes the section on the restoration ceremony.

What is the section on presenting the restoration ceremony? A monk who is ill and cannot go to the place of the restoration ceremony is said to present the restoration ceremony. If one who is not ill does not go, it becomes a misdeed. If someone who is clearly present and evidently endangered — whether their life is in danger, or their practice of the holy life is in danger, or there is danger from any of the eight kinds of interruptions — that person too may present the restoration ceremony. Even one who has been seized and is without power may present the restoration ceremony.

And it is presented in this manner: rising from one's seat, arranging the upper robe over one shoulder, sitting respectfully in a squatting posture before the monk, joining the palms together, and reciting these words:

"Please attend, venerable one. Today is the Saṅgha's fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. I, the monk called such-and-such, also have the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. I, the monk called such-and-such, present my faith and complete purity to the restoration ceremony."

Likewise, this is to be recited two and then three times. The other monk should respond: "Very well."

The second monk should respond: "Very well." If one is able to present it in that way, excellent. If one is unable, one should say while seated, "I present my restoration ceremony." That too counts as having presented it. If even sitting is impossible, presenting it while lying down likewise counts as having presented it. If one is too ill even for that and one says, "I am presenting my restoration ceremony," that too counts as having presented it. If one says, "Please speak on my behalf," that also counts as having presented the restoration ceremony. If one toward whom it was not directed indicates it by means of the body, that too counts as having presented the restoration ceremony. If it is not by the body but is declared by speech, that too counts as having presented the restoration ceremony. If it is neither by body nor by speech, then the entire Saṅgha should go to that person's side, or that person should be brought into the midst of the Saṅgha. If the Saṅgha neither goes to that person nor brings that person into the Saṅgha, and the Saṅgha performs the act without being fully assembled, it will have transgressed and the act will be invalidated. This is called the complete procedure for presenting the restoration ceremony.

If the monk who has undertaken to receive the restoration ceremony accepts it and the time then passes on that very day without the restoration having been presented, it counts as not having been presented, and it must be presented to another. If one has acknowledged oneself to be a layperson, the restoration ceremony has not been presented; it must be presented to another. If one has acknowledged oneself to be a śramaṇa, a hermaphrodite, one who has expelled a nun, a parricide, a matricide, one who has killed an arhat, one who has caused a schism in the Saṅgha, one who with malicious intent has drawn blood from a Tathāgata's body, a non-Buddhist adherent (tīrthika), one who has gone over to the non-Buddhist adherents, a thief who has entered the order under false pretenses, one who has previously fallen, one who has previously committed an offense, or one who has declared oneself to be residing in another destiny — in any of these cases the restoration ceremony has not been presented, and it must be presented to another. If one has acknowledged oneself to be an icchantika (one who has severed the wholesome roots), that too means the restoration ceremony has not been presented, and it must be presented to another. If one has acknowledged oneself to be non-residing, separately residing, or one who has relinquished the training, that too means the restoration ceremony has not been presented, and it must be presented to another. This is called the complete procedure for presenting the restoration ceremony.

What is the complete procedure for receiving the restoration ceremony? The monk who receives the restoration ceremony, having accepted it, must not run, must not jump, must not leap, must not travel underground, must not travel through the sky, and must not receive the restoration ceremony from outside the boundary. Rather, one should receive it mindfully from within the boundary. If one receives it from outside the boundary, it constitutes an offense. If one who receives it from within the boundary is confronted directly and visibly with a threat to one's life, a threat to one's celibacy, or any one of the eight kinds of threatening obstruction, then receiving it from outside the boundary incurs no offense. This is called the complete procedure for receiving the restoration ceremony.

What is the complete procedure for reciting the restoration ceremony? If the monk who is to recite the restoration ceremony dies after the time has passed without having come to the Saṅgha, it is called not having recited the restoration ceremony. If one has acknowledged oneself to be a layperson, that too is called not having recited the restoration ceremony. The passage from "a śramaṇa, a hermaphrodite, one who has expelled a nun" down to "one who has declared oneself to be residing in another destiny" applies as before — if one has acknowledged oneself to be any of those, it is called not having recited the restoration ceremony. If one has acknowledged oneself to be an icchantika, that too is called not having recited the restoration ceremony. If one has acknowledged oneself to have caused a schism in the Saṅgha, to be non-residing, separately residing, one who has inclined toward a faction, or one who has relinquished the training, that too is called not having recited the restoration ceremony. This is called the complete procedure for reciting the restoration ceremony.

What is the complete procedure for faith? Faith means presenting faith toward those matters that are to be done in accordance with the Saṅgha's Dharma through one's view, one's intelligence, one's wish, and one's thought; rejoicing in those matters that are to be done in accordance with the Saṅgha's Dharma; approaching, accepting, and undertaking to accept — this is called the complete procedure for presenting faith.

What is the complete procedure for the impoverished presentation of faith? When a monk who is ill is unable to go to the place of the restoration ceremony, he should present faith by proxy. If he does not go while he is not ill, it becomes a transgression. If he is in a situation where he is manifestly threatened by something that would interrupt his livelihood, interrupt his celibate life, or interrupt it through any one of the eight kinds of interruption, he too should present faith by proxy. One who has been seized by those without authority should also present faith by proxy.

This is how the proxy presentation is to be made. Rising from one's seat, arranging the upper robe over one shoulder, one sits respectfully before the monk, joins the palms together, and says the following: "Venerable one, please take note. I, the monk known as so-and-so, present faith toward those matters that are to be done in accordance with the Saṅgha's Dharma. I rejoice in those matters that are to be done in accordance with the Saṅgha's Dharma. I accept them. I undertake to accept them." This is to be said two and three times. The other should say "Appropriate," and the second should say "Excellent."

If one is able to present it in that way, well and good. If one is unable to do so standing, one should present it while seated. If one is unable to do so seated, one should present it while lying down. If one is unable even then, and while gravely ill simply says "I present faith," the faith has been presented. Even if one says "Please recite the faith on my behalf," the faith has been presented. If one is unable to do so by speech but makes a bodily sign, the faith has been presented. If one is unable to use the body but makes a verbal gesture, the faith has been presented. If one makes a gesture with both body and speech, the faith has been given.

If one is unable by body and unable by speech, then let the entire Saṅgha go there, or let the entire Saṅgha bring that monk. If the entire Saṅgha does not go there and that monk is not brought there, it constitutes non-assembly, and those who perform Saṅgha acts will have acted transgressively.

If the monk receiving the faith, having received it, dies in that very place before the time has passed, it is called faith not yet presented, and the faith must be presented to another. If one has acknowledged oneself as a layman, it is called faith not yet presented, and the faith must be presented to another. From the category of one who has been expelled as a wandering ascetic, a eunuch, or as having expelled a bhikṣuṇī — through to one who resides elsewhere — even if one acknowledges it oneself as before, it is called faith not yet presented, and the faith must be presented to another. If one has acknowledged oneself as not being a eunuch, it is called faith not yet presented. If one has acknowledged oneself as having caused a schism in the Saṅgha, as non-residing, as separately residing, as having inclined toward a faction, or as having relinquished the training, even so it is called faith not yet presented. This is called the complete procedure for the impoverished presentation of faith.

What is the complete procedure for receiving faith? A monk who receives faith from another monk should do so as follows: he may receive it for one from one, for two from one, or for many from one — he should receive it for as many as he is able to name by name.

The monk receiving faith, having received it, should not run, should not go quickly, should not jump, should not leap, should not travel underground, should not travel through the sky, and should not receive it from outside the boundary. He should receive faith knowingly from within the boundary. If he receives it from outside the boundary, it becomes a transgression.

If he receives it from within the boundary, and there is an interruption of livelihood, an interruption of celibate life, any one of the eight interruptions, if a manifest fear of any such interruption has arisen, then even if he receives it from outside the boundary, there is no transgression. This is called the full section on receiving faith.

What is the full section on declaring faith? If the monk who has given faith passes away before coming to the Saṅgha, having let the appointed time go by without declaring the faith — this is called undeclared faith. If he himself avows that he is a layman — this is called undeclared faith. From "called a wanderer, a hermaphrodite, or an expelled nun" up through and including "residing in another destiny" — as before — if he himself makes such an avowal, it is called undeclared faith. If he himself avows that the food is not proper food — this too is called undeclared faith. If he himself avows that he has divided the Saṅgha, or has left it, or is living separately, or has gone over to another side, or has relinquished the training — this too is called undeclared faith.

The monk who declares faith, having received it, should not lie down and should not enter meditative absorption. He should declare the faith with vigilance. He should declare it in the following manner. Rising from his seat, arranging the upper robe over one shoulder, sitting respectfully before the monk with joined palms, he should speak these words: "Attend to me, venerable one. I, the monk called such-and-such, offer faith to you who act in accordance with the Dharma of the Saṅgha. I rejoice in your acting in accordance with the Dharma of the Saṅgha. I approve and follow." He should say this two times and three times. The other should respond the first time with "Very well," and the second time with "Excellent." If performed in four conditions, it is called undeclared faith. What are the four? Shamelessness, heedlessness, lying down in sleep, and being in meditative absorption. Of these, the two conditions of shamelessness and heedlessness incur a transgression. The two conditions of lying down in sleep and being in meditative absorption involve no transgression. This is called the full section on declaring faith.

What is the full section on offering the declaration of purity? A monk who is ill and unable to go to the site of the restoration ceremony should offer the declaration of purity. If he does not go when he is not ill, it becomes a wrongdoing. But if an interruption of his livelihood, or an interruption of his celibate life, or a manifest fear arising from any one of the eight interruptions has occurred, he too should offer the declaration of purity. One who has been seized by a power beyond his control should also offer the declaration of purity.

He should offer it in the following manner. Rising from his seat, arranging the upper robe over one shoulder, sitting respectfully before the monk with joined palms, he should say these words: "Attend to me, venerable one. Today is the Saṅgha's fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. I, the monk called such-and-such — today also being the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony — if my obstructing factors are fully pure, may the venerable one accept the declaration of my purity.

"I, the monk called such-and-such, offer the declaration of purity for the restoration ceremony. Because when the venerable one offers the declaration of purity, he should listen and declare his purity, and by his declaration it will be understood" — he should say this two or three times. The other should respond: "Very well." The second monk should say: "Excellent!"

If he is able to offer it in that manner, well and good. If he is unable to stand, he should offer it seated. If he is unable even seated, he should offer it lying down. If he is unable even lying down, he should say in a soft voice, "I offer the declaration of purity," and this counts as having offered the declaration of purity. If he says, "Please declare my purity," this too counts as having offered the declaration of purity. If he is unable to speak but offers it by a bodily gesture, this counts as having offered the declaration of purity. If he is unable to use his body but gives a verbal indication, this counts as having offered the declaration of purity. If he gives an indication by both body and speech, this likewise counts as having offered the declaration of purity.

If he is unable to give any indication by body or speech, then the entire Saṅgha should go to him, or that monk should be brought here. If the entire Saṅgha does not go to him and that monk is not brought, then the formal act has been performed without a complete assembly, and the Saṅgha members will have committed a transgression.

If the monk who has received the declaration of purity, having taken it, dies that very day before the time has passed, this is called "the declaration of purity not having been offered," and the declaration of purity should be offered to another. If he himself acknowledges that he is a layman, this is called "the declaration of purity not having been offered," and the declaration of purity should be offered to another.

From the case of a novice, a paṇḍaka, or one who has been expelled from the community of nuns, down to the case of one residing in another destiny, it is as stated before: even if he himself acknowledges such a condition, it is called "the declaration of purity not having been offered," and the declaration of purity should be offered to another. Likewise, if he himself acknowledges that he is a paṇḍaka, it is called "the declaration of purity not having been offered."

If he himself acknowledges that the Saṅgha has been split, that he is not residing with the community, that he resides separately, that he has sided with one party, or that he has given up his training, this is called "the declaration of purity not having been offered." This is what is known as the proper procedure for offering the declaration of purity.

Now, what is the proper procedure for receiving the declaration of purity? When a monk receives the declaration of purity from another monk, he should receive it in the following manner: one receiving from one, one receiving from two, one receiving from many — whatever names he is able to pronounce, he should receive that many declarations.

The monk who has received the declaration of purity, having accepted it, should not run, should not go quickly, should not leap, should not jump, should not travel underground, and should not travel through the air. He should not receive the declaration of purity from outside the boundary. If he receives it from outside the boundary, it constitutes a transgression. If he receives it from within the boundary while something that interrupts livelihood, something that interrupts the holy life, or any one of the eight kinds of interruption manifests as a present danger, then even if he has received it from outside the boundary, there is no offense. This is what is known as the proper procedure for receiving the declaration of purity.

Now, what is the proper procedure for declaring the declaration of purity? If the monk who has received the declaration of purity, having accepted it, dies before the time has passed without coming into the Saṅgha's midst, this is called "the declaration of purity not having been declared." If he himself acknowledges that he is a layman, this is called "the declaration of purity not having been declared." From the case of a śrāmaṇera, a paṇḍaka, or one who has been expelled from the nuns' community, down to the case of one residing in another destiny, it is as before: even if he himself acknowledges such a condition, this is called "the declaration of purity not having been declared." If he himself acknowledges that he is a paṇḍaka, this is called "the declaration of purity not having been declared." If the Saṅgha has been split, or or not residing, or residing separately, or approaching a side party, or having relinquished the training — if he himself acknowledges any such condition, this is called "the declaration of purity not having been declared."

A monk who has declared his purity, having received his declaration of purity, must not lie down to sleep and must not enter into meditative absorption. Rather, with vigilance he should declare his purity. To do so, he should rise from his seat, arrange his outer robe over one shoulder, squat respectfully before a monk, press his palms together, and speak these words: "Venerable sir, please attend. Today is the Saṅgha's fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. I, the monk called such-and-such, likewise observe the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. Even the obstructing factors pertaining to the monk called such-and-such are purified — so I myself declare. If he offers purity to the restoration ceremony, I shall declare it in his name. Please also accept the tooth-wood." He should speak thus two and three times. The other monk should say, "Very well." The second response is "Excellent!" In four circumstances, however, this is called "the declaration of purity not having been declared." What are the four? Shamelessness, heedlessness, falling asleep, and entering meditative absorption. Of these, shamelessness and heedlessness — these two constitute an offense. Falling asleep and entering meditative absorption — these two incur no offense. This is called "the fully detailed account of declaring purity."

What is the fully detailed account of faith combined with purity? Wherever a restoration ceremony or a Saṅgha act is being performed, one should offer faith and purity combined therein. This is called "the fully detailed account of faith combined with purity."

What is the fully detailed account of offering faith and purity? If a monk is ill and cannot go to the place where the restoration ceremony is held, he should offer faith and purity. If he does not go while he is not yet seriously ill, he incurs an offense. But if it is evident that he is genuinely threatened — whether a threat to his livelihood, a threat to his celibate life, or an evident threat constituting any of the eight kinds of interruption — then he too should offer faith and purity. One who has been seized by a power beyond his control should also offer faith and purity.

This is how it should be offered. He should rise from his seat, arrange his outer robe over one shoulder, remove his sandals, squat respectfully before a monk, press his palms together, and speak these words: "Venerable sir, please attend. Today is the Saṅgha's fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. I, the monk called such-and-such, likewise observe the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. My obstructing factors too are fully purified. May the venerable one also receive me as fully pure. I, the monk called such-and-such, with faith in acting in accordance with the Saṅgha's rule, offer faith, the restoration ceremony, and purity as well. On my behalf, venerable sir, please accept the tooth-wood and declare my purity. If it is declared, so it shall be understood."

He should speak thus two and three times. The other monk should say, "Very well." The second response is "Excellent!"

If he is able to offer it in that manner, well and good. If he is unable to do so standing, he should sit and offer it. If he is unable to do so sitting, he should lie down and offer it. If he is unable even lying down, then if he says even in a small voice, "I offer faith and purity," this too is considered to be an offering of faith and purity. If he says, "Please declare my faith and purity," this too is called "a declaration of faith and purity."

If it is done not by words but by a bodily gesture, this too is called "a declaration of faith and purity." If it is not by the body but indicated by speech, this too is called "a declaration of faith and purity." If both body and speech are used as signals, this is called "an offering of faith and purity." If neither body nor speech can be used as signals, then the entire Saṅgha should go to that place, or that monk should be brought there. If the entire Saṅgha does not go there and that monk is not brought there, the formal act is rendered incomplete, and the entire Saṅgha incurs a transgression.

If the monk who has received the faith and purity on another's behalf receives it and then time passes and that person dies right there, this is called "faith and purity not offered," and the faith and purity must be offered to someone else. If a person himself has acknowledged that he is a layman, this too is called "faith and purity not offered," and the faith and purity must be offered to someone else. From "one who has been expelled as a novice, a paṇḍaka, or a nun" up to "one who resides in a different destiny," it is as before: even if he himself has acknowledged it, this is called "faith and purity not offered," and the faith and purity must be offered to someone else. If a person himself has acknowledged that he is not a śramaṇa, this too is called "faith and purity not offered." If a person has himself acknowledged that he has split the Saṅgha, or that he does not reside, or that he resides separately, or that he is drawing near to departure, or that he has given up the training, this is called "faith and purity not offered." This is called the proper procedure for offering faith and purity.

What is the proper procedure for receiving faith and purity? A monk who receives purity and faith from another monk should receive it in the following manner: one from one, or one from two, or one from many — as many names as he is able to mention, that many he should receive.

A monk who has received the faith and purity must not run, must not walk swiftly, must not leap, must not jump, must not travel underground, and must not travel through the sky. He must not receive the purity and faith from outside the boundary. He should receive the faith and purity from within the boundary, with mindfulness and vigilance. If he receives the faith and purity from outside the boundary, it becomes a transgression. However, if he is receiving from within the boundary and there is evident before him a danger that would cut short his life, or cut short his celibate life, or any one of the eight kinds of interruption, then even if received from outside the boundary, there is no fault. This is called the proper procedure for receiving purity and faith.

What is the proper procedure for declaring faith and purity? If a monk who is to declare purity and faith has not come into the assembly of the Saṅgha and time passes and he dies, this is called "purity and faith not declared." If a person himself has acknowledged that he is a layman, this too is called "purity and faith not declared." From "one who has been expelled as a female ascetic, or a paṇḍaka, or a nun" up to "one who resides in a different destiny," it is as before: even if he himself has acknowledged it, this is called "purity and faith not declared." If a paṇḍaka himself has acknowledged it, this too is called "purity and faith not declared." If a person has himself acknowledged that he has split the Saṅgha, or that he does not reside, or that he resides separately, or that he is drawing near to departure, if a person has himself acknowledged that he has given up his training, this too is called "purity and faith not declared."

A monk who has declared purity and faith, having received the declaration of purity and faith, must not lie down, must not enter meditative absorption, but must with vigilance declare purity and faith. And it is to be declared in the following manner. Rising from one's seat, arranging the upper robe over one shoulder, sitting respectfully before the monk, and joining the palms together, one should speak these words: "Venerable one, be so mindful. Today is the Saṅgha's fifteenth-day restoration ceremony, and for the monk called such-and-such it is likewise the fifteenth-day restoration ceremony. I, the monk called such-and-such, declare myself pure, and there are no obstructing factors. I offer faith toward the Saṅgha's Dharma-activities, the restoration ceremony, and the declaration of purity." This should be said in this way two times and three times. The other should respond, "It is fitting." To a second person one says simply "Excellent!"

If these four modes are present, it is called "purity and faith not declared." What are the four? Shamelessness, heedlessness, lying down in sleep, and having entered meditative absorption. Of these four, shamelessness and heedlessness constitute a case involving an offense. Lying down in sleep and having entered meditative absorption constitute a case involving no offense. This is called "the section on declaring purity and faith."

What is the section on stūpas? It is the hair-reliquary stūpa and the nail-reliquary stūpa spoken of by the Blessed One. Just as in the Vinaya it is explained at length in the section on the householder Anāthapiṇḍada's stūpa, so too it should be set forth in full here. The Blessed One declared the hair-reliquary stūpa and the nail-reliquary stūpa for the benefit of sentient beings. In this regard, the stūpa of the Buddha, the Blessed One, is to be complete in every respect. That of a pratyekabuddha is to be made without a vase-drum tier. That of an arhat is to have four tiers. That of a once-returner is to have three tiers. That of a stream-enterer is to have one tier. That of virtuous ordinary persons is to have a finial only.

Now, as for the outer enclosure precinct of a stūpa: the householder Anāthapiṇḍada, being deeply faithful and perfectly devout, went to where the Blessed One was, approached him, and bowed his head at the Blessed One's feet, then sat to one side. Sitting to one side, the householder Anāthapiṇḍada said to the Blessed One: "When, O Blessed One, you departed to travel through the countryside, and I was unable to see the face of the Blessed One, I was utterly tormented. If the Blessed One would grant me his hair and nails, I would venerate them." The Blessed One replied to him, "This shall be your object of veneration," and gave him the hair and nails. Anāthapiṇḍada then spoke these words: "If the Blessed One permits, I shall make a stūpa from the hair and nails." The Blessed One declared: "Householder, I permit it — make both a hair-reliquary stūpa and a nail-reliquary stūpa." This is called "the section on stūpas."

What is the section on the physical objects of a stūpa? One should first establish a stūpa in a stūpa precinct, a grove, or in whatever suitable location. Then the physical objects of the stūpa should be established all around that stūpa, encircling it on all sides.

This is called "the section on the physical objects of a stūpa."

What is the section on the garland of the stūpa's cloister? The stūpa's cloister and its pillars should be described at length just as the Blessed One set them forth in the Vinaya. This is called "the section on the garland of the stūpa's cloister."

What is the section on the inexhaustible fund of the stūpa? Some merchants of the city of Vaiśālī built a stūpa for the Blessed One and constructed a cloister around it, and then offered an inexhaustible fund to the monks for the stūpa's upkeep. The monks, being uncertain, did not receive it individually. The monks in that situation then consulted the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "I permit it. Let the one who dwells in the recreation grove, or a layman, administer that inexhaustible fund of the stūpa. It should be put to use in order to render service to the stūpa. Whatever gains arise from it should be used to make offerings to the stūpa. If there is any surplus beyond that, it should be offered as a gift to the stūpa." This is called "the section on the inexhaustible fund of the stūpa."

What is the section on the restoration of a stūpa? A stūpa should be restored using balls of clay, balls of powdered stone, or balls of mud plaster. This is called "the section on the restoration of a stūpa."

What is the section on the adornment of a stūpa? The stūpa should be adorned with parasols, victory banners, pennants and other hanging ornaments, bells, wheels, swastika designs, auspicious knot designs, encircling garlands of joy, flower garlands, festoons, strings of pearls, silk, fine silk, brocade, woolen cloth, silk-wool fabric, gold, silver, vaidūrya, crystal, conch, moonstone, coral, silver, sārābhara, āmagarbha, musāragalva, red pearls, and what is called "encircled by a rightward-turning spiral" — and, indeed, with all manner of adornments whatsoever that are used as decoration in the world. The stūpa should be adorned with all of these. This is called "the section on the adornment of a stūpa."

What is the section on making offerings to the stūpa? Offerings are to be made to the stūpa using flower garlands, perfume, ointment, incense, flowers, saffron powder, red sandalwood paste, mustard-oil ointment, flower garlands, garlands of lamps, garlands of fragrant substances, powder of āmalaka, powder of agarwood, powder of sandalwood, kalaṅkusāri, golden flowers, silver flowers, jeweled flowers, music, and so forth — and, indeed, using all other articles of worldly offering as well. Offerings are to be made to the stūpa in this way. One should circumambulate it, sweep it with a cloth offering, and prostrate. Hanging a bunch of garlands on a stūpa, or going around the stūpa while presenting it in some other manner, is proper for a monk. This is called "the section on making offerings to the stūpa."

What is the section on food? In whatever monastery it may be, providing food to the monks who dwell there — this is called "the section on food."

What is the section on food accompanied by condiments? If a monk finds something to eat that comes with lawful accompaniments, he should gather and eat it on account of that, and if there is food to eat again and again, he should eat at ease in both places. This is called "the section on food accompanied by condiments."

What is the section on porridge?

The Blessed One taught ten kinds of porridge for monks, as follows: milk porridge, yoghurt porridge, butter porridge, meat porridge, clarified-butter porridge, oil porridge, sesame porridge, pea porridge, fruit porridge, and water porridge. These ten kinds of porridge are to be drunk by monks with vigilance, quietly, without slurping, keeping in mind the perception that one is ill, the perception that it is a remedy, and the perception that it is a condition for practice.

Furthermore, porridge has two qualities: it dispels hunger and it dispels thirst. This is called "the section on porridge."

What is the section on solid food accompanied by condiments? The Blessed One taught nine kinds of solid food for monks, as follows: root food, stalk food, leaf food, flower food, fruit food, grain food, sesame food, meal food, and sugar food. These nine kinds of solid food are to be consumed by monks with vigilance, quietly, without crunching sounds, keeping in mind the perception that one is ill, the perception that it is medicine, the perception that it is for the benefit of others, and the perception that it is a condition for practice. This is called "the section on solid food accompanied by condiments."

What is the section on licking foods? The Blessed One taught five licking foods for monks, as follows: butter, oil, honey, molasses, and fresh butter. These five licking foods are to be licked by monks with vigilance, quietly, without crunching sounds, keeping in mind the perception that one is ill, the perception that it is medicine, the perception that it is for the benefit of others, and the perception that it is a condition for practice. This is called "the section on licking foods."

What is the section on solid foods to be eaten? The Blessed One taught five kinds of food to eat for monks, as follows: cooked rice, cooked barley, ground rice, meat, and flat bread. These five foods are to be eaten by monks with vigilance, quietly, without crunching sounds, keeping in mind the perception that one is ill, the perception that it is medicine, the perception that it is a condition for practice, and the perception that it is for the benefit of others. This is called "the section on solid foods to be eaten."

What is the section on the alms bowl? The Blessed One taught monks two kinds of alms bowl: one made of iron and one made of clay. Eight kinds of bowl are not permitted: those made of gold, silver, beryl, crystal, wood, stone, jackfruit wood, and gourd. This is called "the section on the alms bowl."

What is the section on robes? The Blessed One taught monks thirteen kinds of robes and requisite cloths, as follows: the inner robe, the upper covering cloth, the lower robe, the belt, the bathing cloth, the covering for scabies, the upper garment, the lining of the upper garment, the lower covering, the lining of the lower covering, the body-wiping cloth, the hair-tying cloth, and the great summer cloth. These thirteen Dharma robes are to be used by monks in full simply by virtue of the blessing conferred upon them, without it being necessary to cut them with a blade or alter their colour to make them suitable. This is called "the section on robes."

What is the section on the coverlet? The Blessed One taught monks two kinds of coverlet for covering the bedding: if it is thick, a single layer; if it is thin, a double layer sewn together.

This is called "the section on the coverlet."

What is the section on needles? The Blessed One permitted monks needles of iron, bone, bronze, and horn for the purpose of sewing robes. This is called "the section on needles."

What is the section on the needle case? The Blessed One permitted monks a needle case for the purpose of storing needles. This is called "the section on the needle case."

The Noble Vinaya, the fiftieth fascicle.

What is the section on taking up lodging? The Buddha, the Blessed One, declared: "A monk who has arrived unexpectedly and wishes to take up lodging should, upon entering the assembly's temple, not wipe the dust from his feet and not take up a water vessel until he has been assigned a lodging place." Then it came to pass that another monk who had arrived unexpectedly, wishing to take up lodging and having entered the temple, heard the rule that the Blessed One had laid down — that a monk who arrives unexpectedly and wishes to take up lodging in the assembly's temple should not wipe the dust from his feet nor take up a water vessel until a lodging has been assigned to him — and upon hearing this, he ran back and forth in his effort to be assigned a lodging, his body exhausted, greatly strained, and fatigued, until he collapsed and fell to the ground, and passed away at that very time. When monks reported what had happened to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "Set down your bowl and robe, wipe the dust from your feet, take up a water vessel, and then, right away, take up a lodging. Any one of those monks may take up a lodging as circumstances allow." When suitable circumstances arose and wholesome qualities declined, monks who had found themselves in such a situation again reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "A monk who wishes to take up lodging should not, even when circumstances are suitable, take up lodging immediately wherever things happen to fall, but should deliberate very carefully, investigate very thoroughly, and examine very closely for three days before taking up a lodging. He should inquire into the conduct of the monk from whom he wishes to receive lodging — what that monk's conduct is like, what his companions are like, what those who follow along with him on both sides are like, whether he gives scriptural transmission or not, whether he gives instruction or not — and should reflect: 'Will I come to feel respect and deference toward that monk? Will wholesome qualities arise in me, or will they diminish?' He should deliberate very carefully, investigate very thoroughly, and examine very closely, and only then take up a lodging."

"A monk who wishes to assign lodging, if he wishes to do so, should likewise not assign it to anyone immediately wherever things happen to fall, but should deliberate very carefully, investigate very thoroughly, and examine very closely for three days before assigning a lodging. He should inquire into the conduct of the monk to whom he wishes to assign lodging — what that monk's conduct is like, what his manner of living is like, what his general behaviour is like — and should reflect: 'Will that monk feel respect and deference toward me? Will wholesome qualities arise, or will they diminish? Will that monk come to feel respect toward me or not? Will he feel devotion and show reverence, and will wholesome qualities grow or not grow?' He should deliberate very carefully, investigate very thoroughly, and examine very closely, and only if his mind is satisfied should he then assign lodging to that person." This is called "the section on taking up lodging."

What is the section on receiving a lodging assignment? A monk who wishes to receive a lodging assignment and desires to take up a lodging should do so in the following manner: he should rise from his seat and arrange his upper robe over one shoulder.

He should grasp both feet with both hands, press them twice, and speak these words: "Please give your attention, Venerable One. I, the monk named such-and-such, request a lodging assignment from the Venerable One. May the Venerable One grant me a lodging assignment. I am taking up lodging with the Venerable One." This should be said in the same way a second and a third time. The elder should respond: "Very well." And in return the monk should say: "Excellent!" or "Splendid!" Then: "Practice with care." This is called "the section on receiving a lodging assignment."

What is the section on granting a lodging assignment? A monk who has not completed ten rains retreats may not grant a lodging assignment. Even one who has completed ten rains retreats, if he is known to be ignorant, dull, or without learning, he too should not grant a lodging assignment. A lodging assignment should be granted by a monk who possesses five qualities: he knows what constitutes an offense; he knows what does not constitute an offense; he knows what is serious; he knows what is light; and he has come to know the Prātimokṣa sūtra in full detail. This is called "the section on granting a lodging assignment."

What is the section on revoking a lodging assignment? A lodging assignment should be revoked when a person possesses five qualities: he has no faith; he is lazy; he shows no respect; he speaks harsh words; and he has evil companions. Furthermore, a lodging assignment is revoked by five causes and five conditions: through discharge; through departure; through going in a direction other than one's own; through the lodging assignment being revoked immediately upon seeing one's preceptor; and through revocation by both parties. This is called "the section on revoking a lodging assignment."

What is the section concerning the preceptor? Because certain monks had gone forth and received full ordination without a preceptor, they became undisciplined, poorly trained, not in accordance with the rule: they wore their lower robe improperly, they wore their upper robe improperly, they entered into conduct that was degenerate and improper, they had bad deportment and improper bearing, and as a result no one would attend to them when they were sick. The monks who had become like that reported this to the Blessed

One, and the Blessed One declared: "There should be a preceptor, and he shall train them, instruct them by assigning scriptural passages, teach them further, and correct them; and if he does so, they will render service to him and attend to him when he is sick." The Blessed One's declaration that service should be rendered is called "the section concerning the preceptor."

What is the section concerning the co-resident? When a monk, having been made to go forth and receive full ordination, does not attend upon his preceptor, and monks who had become that way reported this to the Blessed One, the Blessed One declared: "The co-resident should attend upon the preceptor, should shave him, should look after him, should please him, should follow in his footsteps, should render him service, and should not do any matter whatsoever without having asked the preceptor — except for three things: attending to one's bodily needs, discarding a tooth-stick, and prostrating to a stūpa within the boundary. The co-resident too should do all things by first asking the preceptor — except for those three things: attending to one's bodily needs, discarding a tooth-stick, and prostrating to a stūpa within the boundary. Co-residents should also show respect to the preceptor of their co-resident, regard him as a superior, venerate him, please him, and whatever task of his there may be, they should not be lazy but should carry it out swiftly and knowingly, with due service, with modesty, and with a sense of deference. They should have a sense of shame, hold themselves with humility, reflect on what will become of their own virtue, and if he is about to engage in something improper, the preceptor should restrain him. And if the preceptor himself is about to engage in something improper, the co-resident should restrain him. If the preceptor falls ill, the co-resident should attend upon him with care and devotion. To serve in this way without neglecting one's own virtue — this is called being a proper co-resident.

What, then, is being a proper attendant to a teacher (ācārya)? There are monks who went forth and received full ordination without a teacher, and who as a result became untamed, badly disciplined, lacking in proper conduct, wearing the lower robe unsightly, wearing the upper robe improperly, engaging in behavior that is degraded and unseemly, slovenly in appearance, fallen into conduct that is improper in deportment, with no one attending upon them when they are ill. When such a situation arose, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Even when there is a teacher, he should discipline them, assign scriptural recitation, instruct them further, correct them, and when they are ill, attend upon them and care for them." This is what the Blessed One declared when he said, "Render respectful service." This is called being a proper attendant to a teacher.

What is being a proper attendant who dwells nearby? When monks who have been ordained and have received full ordination fail to render respectful service to their teacher, and such a situation arose, the monks reported it to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "The attendant should render respectful service to the teacher, shave him, look after him, please him, follow him, and attend upon him. He should not do any task whatsoever without first asking the teacher — except for those three things: attending to one's bodily needs, discarding a tooth-stick, and prostrating to a stūpa within the boundary." The attendant who dwells nearby should also do everything after asking the teacher — except for those three: attending to one's bodily needs, discarding a tooth-stick, and prostrating to a stūpa within the boundary. Those who dwell nearby as attendants should also show respect to the teacher of their own attendant, regard him as a superior, venerate him, please him, and whatever task of his there may be, they should not be lazy but should carry it out swiftly and knowingly, with due service, with modesty, and with a sense of deference. They should have a sense of shame, hold themselves with humility, reflect on what will become of their own virtue, and if the attendant who dwells nearby is about to engage in something improper, the teacher should restrain him. And if the teacher himself is about to do something improper, the attendant should restrain him. If the teacher falls ill, the attendant should care for him devotedly. To serve in this way without neglecting one's own virtue — this is called being a proper attendant who dwells nearby.

What is being a proper preceptor and teacher, co-resident and attendant together? Preceptors and teachers should cultivate openly the perception of co-residents and attendants as being like their own children. Co-residents and attendants, for their part, should gladly cultivate the perception of the preceptor and teacher as being like a father. This is called being a proper preceptor and teacher, co-resident and attendant together.

What is being a proper companion to a monk, in relation to a novice? The Blessed One permitted monks to take a novice who is mature enough — the minimum being one who is seven years old and capable of scaring away crows. If a matter involving an offense arises, the novice should confess and abandon it openly in the presence of a faithful layman. He should not abandon it in private, and should not abandon it wearing only a single robe; rather, he should abandon it while properly dressed in upper and lower robes. This is called being a proper companion to a novice.

What is being a proper companion in terms of material requisites?

The monk who is undertaking new construction work should thoroughly investigate the site where a temple is to be built for the first time. In examining the properties of the existing temple site, he should consider: Does it have light? Does it have trees? Does it have water? Does it have a walking-meditation path? Does it have a neighborhood nearby? Is it free from disputes? Is it free from jealousy? Is it not too far from the alms-round area? Is it also not too close? During the day, are there not too many loiterers? Is there not too much commotion? At night, is there not too much noise? Is there not too much rowdiness? Is there no discomfort from harmful animals, insects, snakes, wind, or heat? Is it peaceful and secluded, and conducive to meditation? Is it, or is it not, a suitable basis for proper internal settlement? Having thoroughly investigated all of this, one should then build the temple. If a monk undertaking new construction builds a temple without proper investigation, a transgression is incurred. This is called being a proper companion in terms of material requisites.

What is being a proper companion in terms of the temple? The Blessed One granted to monks the following types of temple buildings: a building with four verandas, a building with twelve verandas — the gatehouse of which may be four stories or seven stories high — a multi-storied building, a building with a storeroom, a building with many storerooms, a storehouse, a walking-meditation cloister, a toilet building, a foot-washing room, a residence hall, a porch building, a surrounding complex of buildings, and projecting buildings — whether belonging to the Saṅgha or to an individual, whether for one in training or one beyond training — that are suitable for the four modes of comportment. This is called being a proper companion in terms of the temple.

What is being a proper companion in terms of sleeping quarters? The Blessed One granted to monks the following types of sleeping furnishings: a high couch, a low couch, a sitting mat with a border, a mat, a head-rest, and a square seat — whether for the Saṅgha or for an individual — together with coverings and allocations. This is called being a proper companion in terms of sleeping quarters.

What is being a proper companion in terms of new construction? It is as follows. When the Blessed One gave permission for a temple to be built, monks would undertake new construction work as they pleased. Among them, some let the appointed time pass without beginning; some began and then abandoned the work; and some carried it through to completion. Now, the Blessed One, the Buddha, was residing in a certain woodland hermitage, in the finest forest of that hermitage. At that time, he observed that none of the hermitage temples were doing new construction work — that not a single hermitage temple was undertaking new construction. Having observed this, he asked the venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, what is the cause, what is the condition, that these hermitages are not undertaking new construction?" The venerable one replied: "Blessed One, it is like this: among the monks of the hermitage, some have let the time pass, some have abandoned the work, and some are doing it properly. It is for such a cause and such a condition as this that the monks of the hermitage are not undertaking new construction." The Blessed One then declared: "Appoint a monk in charge of new construction — but not according to seniority. Rather, appoint as the one to carry out new construction and to act effectively in new construction projects someone who by nature is diligent in virtue, who is free from laziness, who is endowed with the earnestness of joyous effort, and who is capable of carrying out new construction. He should be requested and appointed by a formal act of the two parties."

Thereupon, monks were appointing a monk in charge of new construction even for matters as minor as rebuilding a collapsed wall, or applying ox-dung plaster, or any small task lasting only a single day. The Blessed One declared: "For any task lasting only a single day, do not appoint a monk in charge of new construction. Instead, for the restoration of a stūpa or an old temple — or if new construction is being carried out — appoint a monk in charge of new construction for that purpose. They were being appointed for the duration of their lives, and they were lodged in the very same smoky room. The Blessed One declared: "Do not appoint them for the duration of their lives, and do not lodge them in the smoky room. For new construction work, appoint a monk in charge of new construction for six years in the case of restoring an old temple, and for twelve years in the case of a new temple. Moreover, the monk endowed with this charge of new construction, in whatever temple he resides, should at all times make regular rounds and inspections of that temple. If he sees that the temple is dilapidated and falling into ruin, then if he himself is capable of restoring it, let him restore it himself. If he himself is unable to do so, let him show the other monks who practise the holy life. Having shown them, let him personally oversee the work and restore it. Let him not simply abandon it. If he abandons it, he incurs an offence. This is what is meant by being endowed with the charge of new construction."

What does it mean to be fully endowed for new construction work? When a monk in charge of new construction undertakes the Saṅgha's new construction work, it may happen that he becomes so absorbed in the Saṅgha's work that the new construction work itself is neglected. When this had occurred, the monks reported the matter to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "I permit that a monk in charge of new construction not be assigned to Saṅgha work. As for one who is restoring an old temple, he shall not be assigned to Saṅgha work for two years — that is, until the construction, plastering, maintenance, and lime-work are complete. One who builds a temple with four cells shall not be assigned to Saṅgha work for four years — until the construction, plastering, maintenance, and lime-work are complete. One who builds a temple with eight cells shall not be assigned to Saṅgha work for eight years — until the construction, plastering, maintenance, and lime-work are complete. One who builds a temple with twelve surrounding cells shall not be assigned to Saṅgha work for twelve years — until the construction, plastering, maintenance, and lime-work are complete. One who builds a Saṅgha assembly courtyard complete with a stūpa and also provides the furnishings shall not be assigned to Saṅgha work for the duration of his life."

Furthermore, if the monk endowed with the charge of new construction has not been appointed from among monks possessing five qualities, he should not be appointed; and if he has been appointed, he should be removed. What are the five? He is not diligent, he is lazy, he does not apply himself earnestly, he does not act quickly, and he does not know what new construction work has been done and what has not been done.

A monk who possesses the five opposite qualities and has not been appointed to carry out new construction should be appointed, and if he has been appointed, he should not be removed. What are the five? He is diligent, he is not lazy, he applies himself earnestly, he acts quickly, and he knows what new construction work has been done and what has not been done.

The monk in charge of new construction should also make regular rounds of the temple at all times. He must inspire all those who carry out work in the temple in whatever way ensures that new construction done throughout the temple does not fall into disrepair — he should generate that kind of enthusiasm. If he acts in this way, it is excellent. If he does not act in this way, he incurs an offence. Such is what is called being endowed with the charge of new construction.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with the making of prostrations? The Blessed One permitted two kinds of prostration for monks: making prostrations to a fellow monk, and making prostrations to the Teacher. As for making prostrations to a fellow monk — one should, in accordance with seniority, speak pleasant words face to face, make prostration, rise to greet him, press the palms together, make prostration, and touch the head to the feet. As for taking hold with both hands of the two feet and pressing them — this too is a form of prostration. As for the Tathāgata, one makes prostration with the five-point full prostration. Such is what is called being fully endowed with the making of prostrations.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with sour gruel? Sour gruel is for monks who are ill and for those afflicted with wind disorders, just as it was permitted for the Venerable Śāriputra. From what substances is sour gruel to be made? From roots, stems, leaves, flowers, medicines, and all manner of seeds: these are gathered together and, once they have become sour, at that point one strains them while they are clear and unsettled, filters them through cloth, mixes them with water until clear, and drinks them from morning until evening. Such is what is called being fully endowed with sour gruel.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with powder? The Blessed One fully permitted two kinds of powder for monks: medicinal powder and bathing powder. Medicinal powders were permitted for the relieving of illness. The bathing powder permitted for monks was not for pride, not for arrogance, not for beautification, not for adornment, but for the removal of bodily impurity. From what is bathing powder to be made? From small peas, black beans, large beans, lentils, their outer husks, and from unhusked grain — monks may use these mixed with various fragrances, yet not for the purpose of adornment; they are to be employed fully as bathing powder. If one finds something already mixed with fragrance without having sought it out, there is no offence. If one mixes it oneself with fitting medicines and uses it, the same applies. Such is what is called being fully endowed with powder.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with medicines? The Blessed One, for the sake of relieving illness, permitted medicines for sick monks in accordance with the sequence: to be taken in the morning, in the afternoon, on the seventh day, or for as long as life lasts — medicines made from grass, medicines made from tree trunks, medicines made from leaves, medicines made from flowers, and medicines made from fruits. A monk who is not ill may not make full use of medicines intended for the sick. Such is what is called being fully endowed with medicines.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with drinks? The Blessed One, drawing from the sage known as Kaiṇyaya, permitted eight kinds of drinks for monks. What are they? These: the drink of the jujube fruit, the drink of the rose apple, the drink of the Chinese plum, the drink of the mango, the drink of the rough-skinned fruit, the drink of the Aśvattha fig, the drink of the Udumbara fig, and the drink of grapes. These eight kinds of drink are permitted for monks, provided they do not impair the meal, do not intoxicate, do not produce sourness, are fermented to clarity, are clear and unsettled — filtered through cloth, mixed with water in the assembly, and stored as evening provisions. Such is what is called being fully endowed with drinks.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with leather? A monk may not keep leather, may not store it, may not consecrate it, may not spread it out, may not sit on it, may not spread it as a seat, may not step onto it, and may not mix it with other things. As for footwear — shoes worn-through at the toe, shoes cracked along the side, shoes cut at the top, or short-soled shoes: if such a circumstance arises while one is in a layperson's home, one may then sit on the leather. A sick monk may sit on leather. Such is what is called being fully endowed with leather.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with footwear? The Blessed One permitted two kinds of footwear for monks: single-layered sandals and, if occasion requires, layered sandals of the householder style. A monk should not wear shoes decorated with designs. Such is what is called being fully endowed with footwear.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with wooden sandals? The Blessed One permitted two kinds of wooden sandals for monks: sandals for the lavatory, and sandals for use as a footstool support. A monk should not carry wooden sandals for any purpose other than these; if he does carry them for another purpose, he incurs a transgression. Such is what is called being fully endowed with wooden sandals.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with a walking staff? A monk should not carry a horse-headed staff, a staff topped with a sea-creature's head, or a staff with a foot carved in the shape of a she-crab. Such is what is called being fully endowed with a walking staff.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with a staff? The Blessed One permitted a staff for sick and elderly monks. If it cracks at the base, it should be bound with iron. If it splits at the tip, it should be fitted with a ferrule. Such is what is called being fully endowed with a staff. Now, in the charnel ground of the Cool Grove near the city of Rājagṛha there were snakes, and when monks entered the charnel ground they were struck by snakes, and those who were so afflicted reported this to the Blessed One. The Blessed One declared: in order to drive off snakes, it is permitted to carry a staff fitted with a noise-making device. Such is what is called being fully endowed with a staff.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with a net? The Blessed One permitted a net for sick and elderly monks. A monk should not carry a net for the purpose of adorning it with many-colored dyes. Such is what is called being fully endowed with a net.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with both a staff and a net? The Blessed One permitted sick and elderly monks to receive the conferral of both staff and net, and to be given both through a single formal act. The fuller account is as it appears in the Vinaya. Such is what is called being fully endowed with both a staff and a net.

What does it mean to be fully endowed with raw garlic? The Blessed One permitted raw garlic for monks who are sick with a wind ailment, just as it was permitted for the Venerable Śāriputra. A monk who is not ill should not eat raw garlic. If he eats it, he incurs a transgression. If he eats it as medicine, it should be used in the proper manner.

The proper manner regarding garlic is as follows. If a monk has eaten raw garlic, he should not go before the Teacher. He should not go into the presence of his preceptor or his teacher. He should not be in the role of a teacher or serve as one who acts in a teacher's place. He should not teach. He should not give recitations. He should not be called to remembrance. He should not be questioned. He should not enter a village. He should not be seated in the row for meals. He should not drink soup. He should not drink sour gruel. He should not listen to the Dharma. He should not sit together with the other monks. He should not gather with them. In short, for any purpose whatsoever, he should not sit alongside others. He should remain dwelling in a secluded dwelling. If he has no bedding or coverings of his own, he should obtain them from the community of the four quarters in a place set apart. He should also designate a separate latrine area. If he has eaten garlic for one day, he should remain apart for seven days. If he has eaten it for seven days, he should likewise remain apart for seven days. When the seven days have passed, he should wash his bedding and coverings. He should also plaster his dwelling. He should wipe down the walls of the dwelling with a cloth. He should clean the floor gently and thoroughly. He should smear it with cow dung. He should also plaster the latrine area. He should wash his Dharma robes. He should bathe. After that, he may at his ease go before the Teacher. He may go to his preceptor, his teacher, and those who serve in a teacher's role. He may teach. He should give recitations, be called to remembrance, and be questioned. He may enter a village. He should be seated in the row for meals. He should be placed in the row for drinking soup and sour gruel. He should listen to the Dharma.

He should sit together with monks.

If a monk who eats garlic does not conduct himself in accordance with the rules of proper conduct that have been laid down, he incurs a transgression. This is called the rule concerning garlic.

What is the rule concerning a razor? The Blessed One permitted monks to use a razor for the purpose of cutting hair. This is called the rule concerning a razor.

What is the rule concerning a razor case? The Blessed One permitted monks to have a razor case for the purpose of protecting the blade of the razor. This is called the rule concerning a razor case.

What is the rule concerning a bent key? The Blessed One permitted monks to have a bent key for the purpose of making up their beds, for the ease of the Saṅgha, and for the Saṅgha to dwell in virtue. This is called the rule concerning a bent key.

What is the rule concerning a door lock? The Blessed One permitted monks to have a door lock — that is, a mechanism opened by a key. This is called the rule concerning a door lock.

What is the rule concerning a mount? The Blessed One permitted monks who are aged, very old, ill, unable to exert themselves, or who have reached old age to use a mount. A monk should not ride a mount adorned with painted decorations. He should not use a female mount as his personal riding animal.

This is called the rule concerning a mount.

What is the rule concerning an umbrella? The Blessed One permitted monks to have an umbrella as a remedy against rain and heat. One should not carry a painted umbrella adorned with decorations. One should not carry one with a long handle. One should not walk into a village while carrying an umbrella. This is called the rule concerning an umbrella.

What is the rule concerning a fan? The Blessed One permitted monks to have a fan as a remedy against heat. A monk should not carry a fan adorned with painted decorations. This is called the rule concerning a fan.

What is the rule concerning a fly-whisk made of tail hair? The Blessed One permitted monks to have a fly-whisk made of tail hair for the purpose of driving away harmful creatures and insects. From what should a fly-whisk be made? From the tail of a yak, from a wild animal, from thread, or from felt. A monk should not carry a fly-whisk adorned with painted decorations. A fly-whisk is of two kinds: one is natural in color and one is dark reddish-brown. This is called the rule concerning a fly-whisk made of tail hair.

What is the rule concerning the handle of a fly-whisk? A monk should not carry a fly-whisk with a long handle. If one is found, it should be sold. Upon selling it, the proceeds should be offered to a stūpa of the buddhas or a stūpa of the śrāvakas. This is called the rule concerning the handle of a fly-whisk.

What is the rule concerning a mirror? Monks should not look at their face in a mirror, in the mirror-like surface of a begging bowl, or in water. However, there is no fault if one wishes to look in order to check whether there is a wound on one's face, to see what the face now looks like compared to before, to look at wrinkles and gray hairs on the face, or to reflect that all conditioned things grow old and perish. This is called the rule concerning a mirror.

What is the rule concerning garlands, perfume, and ointment? A monk should not carry garlands, perfume, or ointment on his own person, nor should he give them to others. If any are found, they should be sold, and upon selling them the proceeds should be offered to a stūpa of the buddhas or a stūpa of the śrāvakas. This is called the rule concerning garlands, perfume, and ointment.

What is the rule concerning dancing, singing, and playing musical instruments?

A monk should not himself engage in dancing, singing, or playing musical instruments, nor should he cause others to do so, nor should he go to watch them. In every way, he should abandon dancing, singing, and playing musical instruments. This is called the rule concerning dancing, singing, and playing musical instruments.

What is the rule concerning tooth-wood? The Blessed One permitted monks to use tooth-wood for cleaning the teeth. It should be neither too long nor too short, neither too thick nor too thin, neither bent nor rough, but should be made smooth, straight, and supple, as though it had been permitted by the face. This is called the rule concerning tooth-wood.

What is the rule concerning eye-medicine? The Blessed One permitted five kinds of eye-medicine for monks suffering from eye ailments, namely: eye-medicine made from flowers, powdered eye-medicine, pellet eye-medicine, sap eye-medicine, and black eye-medicine. Monks should not apply eye-medicine for the sake of adornment and vanity. If there is illness, the appropriate medicine should be applied. This is called the rule concerning eye-medicine.

What is the rule concerning the eye-medicine applicator? The Blessed One's permission given to monks regarding the eye-medicine applicator is as it appears in detail in the Vinaya. This is called the rule concerning the eye-medicine applicator.

What is the rule concerning the eye-medicine container? The Blessed One's permission given to monks regarding the eye-medicine container is as it appears in detail in the Vinaya. This is called the rule concerning the eye-medicine container.

What is the rule concerning the mortar? The Blessed One permitted monks a mortar and pestle for pounding medicine. This is called the rule concerning the mortar.

What is the rule concerning lying down? Monks should not lie down during the daytime, nor should they lie down beside a blazing fire. If one is drowsy, one should rise and shake it off. If that is not possible, one should go elsewhere, taking care not to disturb others in doing so. This is called the rule concerning lying down.

What is the rule concerning sitting? During the daytime, while walking or sitting, one should thoroughly purify the mind of obstructing phenomena.

Having thus thoroughly purified the mind of obstructing phenomena while walking and sitting during the day, during the first watch of the night one should also, while walking about, thoroughly purify the mind of obstructing phenomena. Having thoroughly purified the mind of obstructing phenomena during the first watch, in the middle watch of the night one should go outside the temple, wash the feet, enter one's dwelling, fold the upper robe into four layers and spread it out, fold the blanket thickly and place it at the head, then lie down on the right side, pressing foot upon foot, limbs not splayed, mind undistracted, robes not disheveled, holding the perception of permission, and keeping in mind mindfulness and vigilance and the perception of rising. Then at dawn, rising quickly and without lingering, one should walk or sit and thoroughly purify the mind of obstructing phenomena. This is called the rule concerning sitting.

What is the rule concerning the knee-support? The Blessed One permitted monks who are ill or suffering from back ailments to use a knee-support, just as he permitted the venerable Śāriputra. A monk should not carry a knee-support decorated with designs for the sake of ornamentation. This is called the rule concerning the knee-support.

What is the rule concerning the back-scratcher?

This is called the rule concerning the beating-block. The Blessed One permitted monks to use a wooden beating-block and mallet for the purpose of beating their robes. This is called the rule concerning the beating-block.

What is the rule concerning the waistband? There are three kinds of waistband. The Blessed One permitted monks the following: a plain waistband, a braided waistband, and a tasseled waistband. A monk should not wear a multicolored waistband for the sake of ornamentation. A monk should not enter a village without a waistband. Even if a single knot has come undone, one should not go into a village; to do so would be an offense. This is called the rule concerning the waistband.

What is the rule concerning the hand-clapper? The Blessed One permitted monks a hand-clapper for the purpose of driving away thieves who come by stealth. However, it must not be used to strike anyone, even by way of any synonym or pretext. This is called the rule concerning the hand-clapper.

What is the rule concerning going about with one's robe loosely tied and a knot undone? Monks should not go about with their robe loosely tied and a knot undone, except when working on a rooftop. This is called the rule concerning going about with one's robe loosely tied and a knot undone.

What is the rule concerning ground? There are two kinds of ground. The Blessed One permitted monks a walking ground and the ground of a shrine hall. This is called the rule concerning ground.

What is the rule concerning planted trees? Monks reported to the Blessed One that at the site of the Vulture Peak on Gr̥dhrakūṭa mountain there were no trees and the sky was unshaded, and that when climbing and descending Vulture Peak they were scorched by the heat. The Blessed One thereupon declared: Those that will provide shade, or those that will bear flowers, or those that will bear fruit — these may be planted. And in order to protect the trees planted in those places, enclosing them with a fence of living posts is also permitted. This is called the rule concerning planted trees.

What is the rule concerning properties? The Blessed One permitted monks to have a field for the sake of a garden. A garden the Blessed One permitted for the sake of a temple. The field with its properties, the garden, and the temple — all of these the Blessed One permitted for the benefit of monks. This is called the rule concerning properties.

What is the rule concerning a grove? A grove means a grove of planted trees. How matters of seniority are to be conducted there is set forth in detail in the Vinaya as it arises. This is called the rule concerning a grove.

What is the rule concerning disputes? A dispute means: fighting, fault-finding, quarreling, contention, slander, whispering in ears, words between parties that are incompatible, failure to reconcile, discord, disunity of mind, divisiveness in the Saṅgha, creating a schism in the Saṅgha, the Saṅgha being cut in two, the Saṅgha becoming separate factions, the Saṅgha not being brought back together, taking the lead in keeping the Saṅgha divided, acting at an improper time, acting in a way that causes harm, failing to act in accordance with Dharma when one lacks the power to do so, also failing to act when one has no faction or no allies, also failing to act when one has no following, and not engaging in dispute even when harm comes to oneself — nor engaging in dispute with the other party when it would bring fear and harm to them. Seeing these and other such things as grounds for fault, one should refrain from dispute. This is called the rule concerning disputes.

What is the rule concerning schism? There are two kinds of schism: schism in the Saṅgha and schism in the wheel.

Schism in the wheel is not what is meant here. What, then, is schism in the Saṅgha? It occurs when, among the fourteen things that can cause schism, one takes any single matter whatsoever to be thoroughly good — whether it is in accordance with Dharma or not in accordance with Dharma, whether it is in accordance with the Vinaya or not in accordance with the Vinaya, whether it is a transgression or not a transgression, whether it is grave or light, whether it entails a remainder or leaves no remainder, whether it is something to be confessed or something to be restrained, whether it is a gross violation of the Vinaya, or whether it arises from speaking offensively — and then, with monks who are resident within the same boundary performing communal Saṅgha acts together, they carry out the restoration and confession ceremony, the invitation ceremony, the motion, the motion with a second announcement, and the motion with a fourth announcement. This is called schism of the Saṅgha, and it is not schism of the wheel.

What is schism of the wheel? It occurs when a monk presents himself in this way: having prepared a wooden staff of rule and made a motion, he departs from that assembly. Setting aside the noble eightfold path and establishing another path in its place — this is called schism of the wheel.

When the former — schism of the Saṅgha — and schism of the wheel are combined together as one, that is called the complete set of schism.

What is the complete set of assembly? The assembly means the gathered Saṅgha. All the monks who are resident within the boundary and who have come together for the act are fully assembled and in place. Those who have taken the faith have also received the faith. There are no monks who would be made to leave and then settle, or who would be placed there and then grow firm, so that there is neither one to be moved nor one to be kept in place, and the act is performed. This is called the complete set of assembly.

What is the complete set of salutation? One should pay homage to the Tathāgata in such a manner. Likewise to the preceptor. Likewise to the teacher. Likewise to the guru and to those who stand in the position of guru. Likewise to the elders in order of seniority. Likewise to the junior monks. Being skilled in paying homage to all in this way — this is called the complete set of salutation.

The second volume, called the Collection of Precepts in the Manner of a Mother, is complete.

What is the collection of affairs? There is the affair of expulsion, the affair of separate residence, the affair of suspension, the affair of investigating one's nature, the affair of giving a training, the affair of an elder monk of unbroken boundary, the affair of the assembly hall, the affair of the elder of the assembly hall, the affair of the dwelling, the affair of the elder of the dwelling, the affair of the dwelling with its surrounding compound, the affair of the elder of the dwelling with its surrounding compound, the affair of the forest, the affair of the sleeping mat, the affair of the flat board, the affair of the wheel, the affair of the empty place, the affair of the elder of the empty place, the affair of the alms bowl, the affair of the Dharma robe, the affair of the tent, the affair of the needle, the affair of the needle case, the affair of porridge, the affair of water, the affair of the water vessel, the affair of the filled water vessel, the affair of the cleaning tablet, the affair of food, the affair of what is to be eaten, the affair of what has been entrusted as food, the affair of alms rounds, the affair of the conduct of alms rounds, the affair of receiving cooked food, the affair of the hermitage, the affair of the elder of the hermitage, the affair of the village outskirts, the affair of the elder of the village outskirts, the affair of the new arrival, the affair of the elder for new arrivals, the affair of departure, the affair of the elder for departure, and the affair of washing the feet, the affair of the elder for washing the feet, the affair of sitting, the affair of the elder for sitting, the affair of teaching the Dharma, the affair of the elder for teaching the Dharma, the affair of the proper time, the affair of an improper time, the affair of the Saṅgha assembling at an improper time, the affair of the elder for the Saṅgha assembling at an improper time, the affair of speaking, the affair of not speaking, the affair of entering the rains retreat in the proper manner, the affair of having entered the rains retreat in the proper manner, the affair of the elder for having entered the rains retreat in the proper manner, the affair of dwelling during the rains retreat, the affair of the assembly, the affair of going into the assembly, the affair of having entered the assembly, the affair of the elder for having entered the assembly, the affair of the restoration ceremony (poṣadha), the affair of performing the restoration ceremony, the affair of the acts of the restoration ceremony, the affair of individual liberation (prātimokṣa), the affair of reciting the individual liberation, the affair of the one who recites the individual liberation, the affair of the elder, the affair of the middle-rank, the affair of the junior, the affair of the elder, middle-rank, and junior together, the affair of the steam house, the affair of bathing in the steam house, the affair of the elder for the steam house, the affair of the preceptor, the affair of the co-resident, the affair of the teacher, the affair of the attendant, the affair of the novice, the affair of what is to be done with diligence, the affair of the śramaṇa who follows close behind, the affair of going near to a village, the affair of the elder for going near to a village, the affair of having gone near to a village, the affair of the elder for having gone near to a village, the affair of dwelling at the base, the affair of resting, the affair of the intermediate space, the affair of the settled place, the affair of the water cistern, the affair of the walking path, the affair of walking, the affair of the cot, the affair of the scraper, the affair of defecating, the affair of the place of defecation, the affair of the pit of the place of defecation, the affair of the elder at the place of defecation, the affair of the surroundings of the place of defecation, the affair of urinating, the affair of the place of urination, the affair of the pit for urination, the affair of the elder at the place of urination, the affair of the area around the place of urination, the affair of washing, the affair of the place of washing, the affair of the opening of the washing place, the affair of the elder at the washing place, the affair of those gathered around the washing place, the affair of spittle, the affair of the spittoon, the affair of the tooth stick, the affair of cleaning the teeth, the affair of scraping the tongue, the affair of cleaning the ears, and what is to be used and what is not to be used. This completes the substance of the three sections of the chapter on the Similitude.

The Noble Vinaya Text, the fifty-first fascicle.

What is meant by the affair of expulsion? Expulsion means dismissal. A dismissed monk must conduct himself in the following manner. A dismissed monk may not perform the going-forth ordination, may not perform the full ordination, may not grant residence, may not give scriptural authorization, may not act as a recollection witness, may not be asked questions, may not be appointed as a companion to a novice, may not be appointed to give scriptural instruction to nuns, may not be appointed to administer vows. Even if previously appointed, he must not teach nuns or perform acts for them. He may not be appointed to perform acts on behalf of that monk, nor may he be commissioned to perform such acts. He must not obstruct a monk who is performing acts. If there is another who holds the Vinaya, he must not expound the Vinaya within the Saṅgha. If there is another who can recite the prātimokṣa sūtra, he must not recite the prātimokṣa sūtra within the Saṅgha. If there is another who can teach the Dharma, he must not teach the Dharma within the Saṅgha. He must not obstruct a monk who is dwelling in accordance with the rule from giving scriptural authorization. He must not be commissioned to administer the restoration ceremony to a monk who is dwelling in accordance with the rule.

He must not obstruct a monk who is dwelling in accordance with the rule from giving scriptural authorization. He must not speak disparagingly of a monk who is dwelling in accordance with the rule. He must not call him to mind with ill intent. He must not associate with such monks. Whatever act the Saṅgha has performed by way of expulsion, and whatever other act is similar to that, he must not commit such an offense again afterward. He must not commit one graver than that. He should conduct himself like one who sweeps away what is behind him as he goes forward. He should engage in the going forth. He should demonstrate reverence through prostration. Even if a monk dwelling in accordance with the rule offers him his alms bowl, he must not accept it. He must not accept his robe either. He must not accept food from him. He must not allow that monk to shave his head. He must not perform acts in the bathhouse. Until he is restored, he must not take up the acts of a monk dwelling in accordance with the rule in any matter whatsoever.

When the entire Saṅgha is assembled and gathered, he must not be appointed by vow to a position requiring careful confidentiality. He must not be appointed by vow to any position of authority. He must not be consecrated by vow for the function of a group of twelve persons. This is called what is to be done by expulsion.

What then is what is to be done by suspension? Suspension is of two kinds: that in which one suspends oneself, and that which has been done in accordance with the Dharma by the Saṅgha.

What is it to suspend oneself? It is when one deliberately turns from the side of Dharma to the side of non-Dharma. That is how one suspends oneself.

What is that which has been done in accordance with the Dharma by the Saṅgha? It is when the Saṅgha, without coercion and without adjournment, abandons one through a motion and a fourfold act performed in accordance with the Dharma by the assembled Saṅgha. That is how one is abandoned in accordance with the Dharma by the Saṅgha.

Likewise, rehabilitation is of two kinds: that in which one rehabilitates oneself, and that which has been done in accordance with the Dharma by the Saṅgha.

What is it to rehabilitate oneself? It is when one deliberately turns from the side of non-Dharma back to the side of Dharma. That is how one rehabilitates oneself.

What is that which has been done in accordance with the Dharma by the Saṅgha? It is when the Saṅgha, finding it improper to leave one without protection, abandons one through a Saṅgha assembled in accordance with the Dharma — having been expelled by a motion made in full assembly and a fourfold act. That is rehabilitation done in accordance with the Dharma by the Saṅgha.

The suspended monk, from the prohibition against his conducting ordination onward, is to be treated as before — that is, just as the Saṅgha has performed an act of expulsion against someone, and similarly against another, so too he must not commit such an offense again, and must not commit one worse than it — up to and including that he must not be appointed by vow for the function of a group of twelve persons.

A suspended monk should bring down upon himself — whether he be a senior monk, a middle monk, or a junior monk — any fellow brahma-farer who knows what he is doing. He must not commit an offense. If he has committed an offense, he should conduct himself in the manner of one returning to the fold. If he does not conduct himself in that manner of returning, he is indeed to be suspended. He is to be addressed with these words:

"The Saṅgha will deal with you as though drawing a line. The Saṅgha will deal with you as though driving in a peg. That offense of yours must be confessed right here within the Saṅgha — it is not to be done outside of it. That act of yours, too, is to be made right again by that very Saṅgha — not outside of it. If you neither confess that offense nor correct it, then those fellow brahma-farers who know will speak of it wherever they wish. And if, even having been treated thus, that person is still not tamed, then he is to be treated as though a line has been drawn and a peg driven in, and he is to be expelled."

It is like this: as with a wild horse, that one is to be kept separate.

What is to be done by a mediator? In order to settle a dispute, one should seek out a mediating monk possessed of twenty-two qualities. And what are those twenty-two? He must be endowed with moral discipline and have previously received full ordination; he must have a sense of shame and remorse; he must be restrained and devoted to the training; he must be learned, retaining and having amassed great learning; he must be versed in the texts by heart; he must thoroughly understand the Vinaya and what surpasses the Vinaya; he must be skilled in dispute, skilled in handling a dispute that has arisen, skilled in settling a dispute, and skilled in ensuring that a settled dispute does not arise again; he must be skilled in treatises; he must be skilled in matters of substance and in how to handle matters of substance; he must be free of anger, he must not speak when in an angry state, and he must not become angered; he must conduct himself gently; he must understand the meaning of what is said through body, speech, and instruction; he must convey it fully and carry it out fully; he must make it understood, and having made it understood, cause it to be taken in; he must speak after reflection and make what has been said upon reflection be understood; he must not go where desire leads; he must not go where aversion leads; he must not go where delusion leads; and he must not go where fear leads. A mediating monk who possesses these twenty-two qualities is one on whom no other depends, and he becomes a source of Dharmic benefit for both sides.

Furthermore, the mediating monk should not regard as his own the pleasant words, the prostrations, the acts of rising first, the pressing of palms together, and the reverences shown him by the monks on the side that makes assertions and those on the side that responds. Even if those monks render him service, he should not accept it. If an alms bowl is offered, he should not take it. If a robe is offered, he should not take it. If food is offered, he should not take it. Whatever other requisites are offered, he should not appropriate them. Nor should he render service to those monks, nor give them an alms bowl, nor give them robes. He should not accept scriptural instruction from them, nor make it an object of mindfulness, nor a topic of yoga, nor something to inquire about mentally. He, too, should not give those monks scriptural instruction; it is not to be an object of mindfulness, not to be asked about altogether, not a topic of yoga, and he should not assign it as a mental object. He should not sit with them on the same seat, should not walk with them in the same walking area, and should not be stationed with them in the same dwelling. He should instead say these words: "Venerable ones, what good can you find in conduct such as this? You who, having so well spoken the Dharma and the Vinaya, having gone forth into such excellent teaching — you have entered into quarreling and have grasped at views and entered into disputation. When two venerable ones dispute, both do not win. When it is settled, one wins and one loses. Therefore, venerable ones, abandon such quarreling, wrangling, and contentious speech as this." That is what is to be done by a mediator.

What is the act of granting investigation into one's identity that is done by giving? If a monk who is guilty of an offense acknowledges it, then retracts the acknowledgment, and then acknowledges it again, the Saṅgha should, by an unobstructed, unpostponed act with a single motion and three declarations, grant that monk investigation into his identity. A monk to whom investigation into his identity has been granted should engage in conduct such as the following. From the point of being granted investigation into his identity, the monk is not to expel — and so on as before. As for the one to whom the Saṅgha has granted investigation into his identity, and likewise any who resemble him: let no such offense as that be committed, and let nothing worse than that be done either, up to that point — — as before. This, then, is what is called "the conduct of one to whom investigation into his identity has been granted" with respect to the twelve persons whom the vow does not authorize.

What, then, is the conduct of one to whom a training is granted? There is a monk who has engaged in unchaste behavior — the practice of sexual intercourse — and yet in whom not even a thought of touching so much as a blade of grass has arisen with the intent to strike. Toward him, the Saṅgha should, by an unobstructed, unpostponed act with a single motion and four declarations, grant a training. The detailed procedure is to be connected with the Vinaya in the manner of the Venerable Gālyāna. A monk to whom a training has been granted should not expel — and so on as before. As for the one to whom the Saṅgha has granted a training, and likewise any who resemble him, let no such offense as that be committed, and let nothing worse than that be done either, up to that point — as before. This is how the vow does not authorize twelve persons. A monk to whom a training has been granted must train in all the trainings of a monk. He must sit at the end of the Saṅgha's assembly. He should accept offerings from those who have received full ordination. He should accept offerings from those who have not received full ordination. He should change and move out his sleeping arrangement from alongside those who have received full ordination. A monk to whom a training has been granted may perform two kinds of acts: the restoration ceremony and the invitation ceremony. A monk to whom a training has been granted should not perform the restoration ceremony as a way of completing the count. The same applies to other acts of the Saṅgha. If the one to whom a training has been granted comes into the midst of the restoration ceremony, do not summon him. And if he is about to leave, do not restrain him. Why is that? Because the Saṅgha will be neither incomplete nor complete. This is called "the conduct of one to whom a training has been granted."

What is the conduct of an elder who has not broken the boundaries? A monk who is an elder who has not broken the boundaries should engage in conduct such as the following. With respect to newly arrived monks who are staying there, he should know all of them, care for them, instruct them, turn them back from wrongdoing, and bring them into virtue. For those who are engaged in recitation, questioning, relinquishment, practicing seclusion, yoga, and mental application, he should individually assign scriptural transmissions. He should bring them into proper conduct. He should have them examine individually what is to be trained. He should bring about the obtaining of requisites. When individual distributions are made, he should supervise the fair and equal distribution of shares. He should visit the sick. He should encourage monks to serve as attendants to the sick. He should give Dharma teachings to the sick. He should properly proclaim what is the path and what is not the path. He should not allow the thread of observable conduct to be cut. In no way whatsoever should he be negligent toward the sick. Whatever other duties may arise for monks who arrive at the non-boundary-breaking residence — in all of those, the elder monk should take the lead. This is called "the conduct of an elder who has not broken the boundaries."

What is the conduct of the joyful enclosure? The joyful enclosure means the place where the Saṅgha all rejoice together. Since the stipulated duties of the monks who arrive there may differ from one place to another, that monk should examine whether the stipulated duties being undertaken in any given instance are in accordance with the Dharma or not in accordance with the Dharma. If they are in accordance with the Dharma and it is clear that they will not be harmful to oneself or to others, he should leave them as they are without interference. But if they are not in accordance with the Dharma and it is understood that they will be harmful to oneself and harmful to others — and if one's own side has power, has allies, and has a following — and if because of that kind of situation there would arise a schism in the Saṅgha, conflict in the Saṅgha, a split in the Saṅgha, or the Saṅgha would become divided — then one should remove that unlawful rule one has established and act in accordance with the Dharma. If one has the ability to do so, and to make the Saṅgha understand — "This has not been established in accordance with the Dharma; remove it and establish something else that is in accordance with the Dharma" — one should open that understanding to them. But if our side has little power, has no allies, and has no following, and because of that a schism in the Saṅgha would arise, conflict in the Saṅgha would arise, the Saṅgha would become divided, and one knows that one is unable to remove this unlawful rule one has established and act in accordance with the Dharma — then one should say nothing at all. Or else one should withdraw. One should not, through a condition such as that, take a firm stand and remain there.

As for what is called the monastery grounds: within the monastery grounds are small rooms, large rooms, multi-storied buildings, buildings with surrounding quarters, cells, the furnishings of cells, walking areas, planted trees, and all water channels — all of these should be assigned in order of seniority. Sweeping the outside is called the work of the monastery grounds.

What is the work of the elder monks of the monastery grounds? The elder monk of the monastery grounds should apply himself to such work as this. The elder monk of the monastery should make his appearance bright and clear, without a furrowed brow, smiling before others speak, speaking before others speak. He should speak kindly and say welcoming words such as "Come, be at ease in your coming." He should speak words that are pleasing and not harsh, words that gladden and delight. As for the newly arrived young monks who are there — the procedure is the same as explained before: in every matter the elder monk should take the lead, and this continues up to the point of not abandoning continuity. When quarrels, reproaches, disputes, and contentions arise, one should recognize them in order to tame them; one should recognize them in order to pacify them, for the sake of peace.

In this way too: the elder monk of the monastery should be the first to eat, the first to take his place, the first to be seated on the mat, the first to take porridge, the first to be assigned an inner lodging, the first when the board is struck — he should go first, he should be seated first. He should go before the Saṅgha having established within himself a sense of respect and humility, a sense of being subject to awe, a lowly mind, and a mind like one who sweeps the dust. Having gone, he should bow in order of seniority and sit on his own seat in its proper place.

Toward elders, middle monks, and newcomers alike, he should cultivate a mind of loving-kindness, a mind of benefit, and a mind of affectionate care, regarding them as father, mother, and younger brothers. He should examine the entire assembly: who is well and properly equipped, and who is not — examining who is well provided for and who is not well provided for. Those who are well and properly equipped should be left undisturbed. Those who are not well equipped and are in an unsatisfactory condition should be assigned to tasks and corrected. One who is well provided for should be left undisturbed. One who is not well provided for should be given a signal and a sign. If that one does not notice the sign, one should give the sign to someone seated nearby. If even the one seated nearby does not notice it, then the elder monk himself should instruct that person as gently as possible to dress properly, without making a loud noise.

When the elder monk is going through in order of seniority, holding a ladle, ready to serve food, one should say: "Has it been permitted or not?" Until the occasion for the assembly's gathering is known, one should wait a moment and then say: "Let food be distributed equally to all."

The elder monk of the monastery should be in harmony with the elders, middle monks, and newcomers; and the elders, middle monks, and newcomers should also be in harmony with him.

If faithful brahmins and householders arrive, food should be distributed to them equally in the same way. If the distribution is not done, or if the faithful brahmins and householders are unwilling, the elder monk should teach the Dharma properly, instruct them properly, praise them properly, and gladden them properly, and then say: "We have this available." This is called the duty of the elder monk of Jetavana.

What is the duty of the dwelling-room? A monk who dwells in a dwelling-room should sweep it regularly, wipe it clean with a cloth, dispose of the sweepings, and apply a smooth coat of dung plaster. If any moss or mildew appears, it should be removed. Cracks, damaged areas, and broken places should be repaired. Water pots should be filled with water and set in place — that is, pots for general use, clean round vessels, vessels for wiping the floor, and footwashing vessels, all filled and placed. This is called the duty of the dwelling-room.

What is the duty of the elder monk of the dwelling-room? The duty of the elder monk of the dwelling-room is to set newcomers to work at all these tasks. Whatever newly arrived monks come to reside there should be recognized and made known, as before. The elder monk should set everyone to work from the outset, through and including the duty of not breaking the continuum of practice. This is called the duty of the elder monk of the dwelling-room.

What is the duty of a building with a surrounding enclosure? A monk who dwells in such a building with a surrounding enclosure should sweep it regularly, as before, through and including filling the footwashing vessels and setting them in place. Toward the fellow monks residing in that building with a surrounding enclosure, one should act with equal kindness in body, with equal kindness in speech, and with equal kindness in mind. One should not kindle quarreling there, nor faultfinding, nor strife, nor dispute. If fighting, abuse, strife, or dispute should arise and one is able to calm it, that is well and good. If one is unable to do so, one should withdraw from that place. This is called the duty of a building with a surrounding enclosure.

What is the duty of the elder monk of a building with a surrounding enclosure? The duty of the elder monk of a building with a surrounding enclosure is to set people to work at all these tasks. Whatever newly arrived monks come to reside there should all be recognized, and, as before, the elder monk should set everyone to work from the outset, through and including the duty of not breaking the continuum of practice. This is called the duty of the elder monk of a building with a surrounding enclosure.

What is the duty concerning the grove? "Grove" here refers to a garden grove. The monks residing there should investigate around the perimeter up to a distance of one league to see whether there is anything that might become an obstacle to the livelihoods of those dwelling in that place, or an obstacle to the holy life. If any such thing is found, it should be removed from afar. If none is found and the place is suitable, a boundary should be established up to a distance of one league, a proper site should be designated, and a location for the restoration ceremony should also be designated. There one should cultivate enthusiasm through the sharing of food and the sharing of the Dharma. One should ensure that fighting does not arise there, nor faultfinding, nor resentment, nor dispute. This is called the duty of the grove.

What is the duty concerning bedding? Monks should regularly inspect the bedding, dry it, shake it out, count it, store it. If it becomes soiled, it should be washed.

If the bedding has become torn or worn out, one should mend and patch it to the best of one's ability, and have it stitched and darned. A monk should not take robes belonging to the Saṅgha of the four quarters and go to the place for defecating, nor to the place for urinating, nor into the bathhouse, nor to where feet are washed, nor to the kitchen. One should not sit wearing them in the rain, nor in the strong midday heat, nor leave them in the drying room. In every place where damage might occur, one should not wear, distribute, or store the robes of the Saṅgha of the four quarters. Monks should not treat bedding in any of these five ways: by scorching it with fire, by covering it with dust, by wetting it with water, by soiling it with excrement, or by dragging it.

Monks should not, while distributing the robes of the Saṅgha of the four quarters, strike the main hall with a knocking sound, sweep the floor, discard a broom, fill the mouth with mucus, fill water vessels, use the general-purpose vessel, use the clean-water vessel, use the excrement vessel, fill the foot-washing vessel, make noise with vessels, manage the main hall, do work with alms bowls, or do work with robes. Monks should not wear the robes of the Saṅgha of the four quarters directly against the bare skin of the body, nor wear them without a sweat cloth between.

Monks should not leave the bedding of the Saṅgha of the four quarters outdoors without a cover or shelter, nor abandon it by casting it beyond a distance of forty-nine cubits from the doorway, and then go away. If one must go to the place for defecating or urinating, one should inform the monks who are present and then go. Just as one guards one's own alms bowl, one's Dharma robe, and one's own skin, so should monks fully protect the bedding of the Saṅgha of the four quarters. Monks should by no means allow the bedding of the Saṅgha of the four quarters to be wasted. This is called the duty of bedding.

What is the duty of the door panel? The door panel is the wing of the door. When a monk knocks on it, he should not knock for a long time. He should knock softly and gently with his knuckles, so that those already inside will hear. He should neither open nor close it violently; he should open and close it slowly and gently, mindfully. He should open and close it without dragging it against either side of the doorframe. This is called the duty of the door panel.

What is the duty of the pivot? The pivot refers to the upper and lower hinge supports of the door. These should be well fitted. If a monk goes out of the main hall and leaves both the upper and lower pivots unsecured, the main hall may collapse. If the main hall collapses, it will ruin us ourselves along with our alms bowls, our Dharma robes, and our bedding. This is called the duty of the pivot.

What is the duty of the empty dwelling? A monk should sweep the empty dwelling with a broom, mop the floor, discard the sweeping cloth, and as best he can remove the mucus deposits gently. He should repair cracks, damage, and holes. If any vessels are found scattered about individually and are still serviceable, he should wash and store them; if they are not serviceable, he should discard them. If there is someone able to make them usable again, he should pick out the green grasses. If laypeople arrive, he should give them a talk on the Dharma. Even when a monk has entered an empty dwelling, he should not abandon it heedlessly. If he does not wish to remain there, he should determine where to go from there. He should inspect the vicinity, the place for defecating, the place for urinating, the stairway, and the stairway, the door fastenings, and the areas of use; having inspected all of these, he should take up residence there. He should see to it that none of these things cause disturbance or harm. This is what is called the duty regarding an empty dwelling.

What is the duty of a senior monk regarding an empty dwelling? The duty of a senior monk who is a monk of an empty dwelling is to engage in the following. From keeping his face clear and free of frowning, as described before, up through taming with diligence, pacifying, and fully quieting any quarrels, disputes, grudges, and conflicts that have arisen — all of this is what is called the duty of a senior monk regarding an empty dwelling.

What is the duty regarding the alms bowl? A monk should not wash his alms bowl without having first applied ash. He should not wash it with gritty soil, nor with earth mixed with sand, nor with balls of gritty soil mixed with sand; rather, he should wash the alms bowl with ground pulse. He should not wash it while standing up, should not dry it while standing up, should not put it into a vessel, should not hide it, should not carry it along the road, should not carry it when crossing water, and should not set down the alms bowl on uneven ground. A monk should not bang his alms bowl against the walls of the dwelling. He should not use it to throw out dust-cloths. He should not smear excrement gently over its face. He should not use it to carry water for washing the hands, nor water for washing the feet, nor water for washing the face, nor water for washing the body. He should not fill water jars with it. A monk should not bring his alms bowl to the place for defecating, nor to the place for urinating, nor into the privy, nor to the place for washing the feet; in short, a monk should not bring the alms bowl to any unclean place whatsoever. A monk who is holding his alms bowl should not make prostrations to a stūpa. When it needs repair, he should not set it aside without repairing it; he should not set it aside while it is still very wet, nor neglect it when it has become very dry. Knowing through careful inspection, he should use it gradually and gently, and should keep it until it finally breaks down completely. A monk should guard his alms bowl as he would guard his very eyes, so that he will never again need to seek one. This is what is called the duty regarding the alms bowl.

What is the duty regarding the robes? The Blessed One (the Buddha) permitted monks three robes — not out of arrogance, not to engender pride, not for adornment, not for show — but so that monks might live comfortably: as a remedy against the discomfort of contact with insects, flies, wind, heat, snakes, and so forth, and in order to be clothed in a covering of moral shame and decorum. Moreover, monks should use them in accordance with how they are properly used. The inner robe should be used in accordance with the way of using an inner robe. The upper robe should be used in accordance with the way of using an upper robe. The lower robe should be used in accordance with the way of using a lower robe.

Now, these are the things for which the inner robe should not be used: monks should not bang the walls of the assembly hall while wearing the inner robe; they should not sweep the floors with it; they should not use it to throw out dust-cloths; they should not smear excrement gently over it; they should not use it to fill water vessels; it should not serve as a vessel for use, as a cleaning ball, as a ball for defecating, or at the place for washing the feet; it should not be used to divide vessels, to maintain the assembly hall, for the duties of the alms bowl, or for the duties of the robes; it should not be bathed with. Having taken off the inner robe, one should not carry it to grass, wood, excrement, or earth. Having taken off the inner robe, one should not take it into the place for defecating, the place for urinating, the privy, or the place for washing the feet; in short, having removed the inner robe, one should not go with it to any unclean place whatsoever. One should not divide it as a lower robe, should not use it as a sitting cloth,

One should not wear it constantly. One should not enter into the inner robe to sleep. This is the manner in which the inner robe is not to be used.

The inner robe is to be used in the following way. A nun (bhikṣuṇī), having put on the inner robe, should enter upon alms rounds, enter into the village, enter into her sphere of conduct, go for food, go for gruel and porridge. The inner robe is also to be used in two ways: either it is worn on top, or it is tucked in underneath.

The upper robe (Skt. uttarāsaṅga) is to be used in the following way. Monks (bhikṣus), having put on the upper robe, should not sweep the assembly hall with it, should not use it to sweep the floor, should not cast it aside as a dusting cloth, should not gently smear dung on it, should not use it for the duties of the alms bowl, should not use it for the duties of the robes, and should not bathe with it. Having put on the upper robe, one should not carry it to grass, wood, or earth. Having put on the upper robe, one should not take it into the place for defecating, the place for urinating, the privy, or the place for washing the feet. In short, one should not go to any unclean place whatsoever while wearing the upper robe. One should not wear it as a hip cloth, should not spread it over a sweating body, and should not wear and use it constantly. This is the manner in which the upper robe is not to be used.

The upper robe is to be used in the following way. Having put on the upper robe, one should fill water jars, fill jars for use, fill vessels with pure pills, fill vessels with pills for the privy, and also fill vessels with pills for washing the feet. One should divide vessels, maintain the assembly hall, and indeed for whatever else may be appropriate, one should use the upper robe.

The hip cloth is to be worn everywhere: one should wear it on the hip and use it constantly. A monk should not place his robe in an unclean spot, should not press it down with something heavy. If it is appropriate to mend it, one should mend it. If it is appropriate to wash it, one should wash it. If it is appropriate to turn it over, one should turn it over.

A monk should not retain the five great dyes. What are the five great dyes? They are these: indigo wood, gall-oak extract, lac, saffron, and vermilion. With the exception of bark from the krishna tree, one should seek out colored bark of whatever other kind will produce a reddish-brown hue. If even that is unavailable, then there is no fault.

The inner robe must certainly be marked. For the upper robe there is no definite requirement, and for the hip cloth there is likewise no definite requirement.

If a monk's robe is worn out or scarce, he should patch it on a separate piece of cloth — five, seven, nine, ten, eleven, or more patches as appropriate.

Thus a monk should use what is used as an inner robe as an inner robe, what is used as an upper robe as an upper robe, and what is used as a hip cloth as a hip cloth. A monk should guard his robe just as he guards his own skin, so that there is no need to search for it again afterward. This is called the duty of the robe.

What is the duty of the mat? The Blessed One (the Buddha) permitted monks two kinds of mat for the comfort of the sleeping place. If thick, one should make a single layer; if thin, one should make it two layers. A monk should not sit or lie down before spreading out a mat, should not dedicate a single mat alone, and should not remain for a night without a mat. A monk should take care of his mat properly, so that there is no need to seek another afterward. This is called the duty of the mat.

What is the duty of the needle? The Blessed One permitted monks two kinds of needle for the purpose of mending robes: iron and copper. Monks should not go about on excursions without having a needle.

A monk should store the needle well and take good care of it, so that there is no need to seek another afterward. This is called the duty of the needle.

What is the duty of the needle case? The Blessed One permitted monks needle cases for the purpose of protecting needles. A monk should not entrust a needle case to shameless novices. One should not let it be lost. Even if someone is fully ordained, if they are not trustworthy, one should not do so either. Likewise, there are five kinds of person to whom a needle case should not be entrusted: the shameless, the resentful, the unfriendly, those whose mindfulness has declined, and those who do not abide in proper conduct. A monk should store the needle case well and attend to it diligently, so that there is no need to seek another afterward. This is called the duty of the needle case.

What is the duty of gruel? The Blessed One permitted monks gruel for the purpose of living comfortably and for the purpose of properly consuming what has been given through acts of generosity by donors and benefactors. A monk should not drink gruel while making slurping sounds. One should drink gruel mindfully and with vigilance, suppressing any noise. Not out of arrogance, not out of pride, not out of conceit, not for the sake of taste, but for the sake of healing and sustaining this body. This is called the duty of gruel.

What is the duty of water? A monk should examine water very carefully. Water that is clear, bright, unsettled, unmixed, settled, and pure should be used. This is called the duty of water.

What is the duty of the water vessel? The Blessed One permitted monks water vessels, both for the Saṅgha and for individuals, along with a base to rest on and a lid to cover the mouth. Monks should wash them thoroughly, dry them, keep them clean, and store them. Water should be placed in them by a proper hand and with a proper cloth. One should pour carefully. If brahmins or householders arrive, one should also offer water to them. Monks should store water vessels with great care and attend to them diligently, so that there is no need to seek another afterward. This is called the duty of the water vessel.

What is the duty of the communal water vessel? The Blessed One permitted monks communal water vessels. These should be thoroughly washed, dried, kept clean, and stored. Having been filled, they should be set at the door of the assembly hall. Monks should store that communal vessel with care and attend to it diligently, so that there is no need to seek another afterward. This is called the duty of the communal water vessel.

What is the duty of the cleansing ball? The Blessed One permitted monks cleansing balls. These should not be placed near a stūpa. A monk should inspect them from time to time, dry them, and replenish them. This is called the duty of the cleansing ball.

What is the duty of food? There are five kinds of staple food and five kinds of non-staple food. Monks, when eating any staple or non-staple food, should at the time of eating establish mindfulness clearly: they should examine the food, recognizing it as that which was sought, that which was obtained through effort, that which is similar to other such things, that which is fully to be used, that which is subject to deterioration, and that which is to be discarded. Eating with this understanding in mind, they should eat. Keeping mindfulness close and without distraction of mind, they should eat while cultivating the following perceptions with regard to food: perceiving it as in accordance with its cause, perceiving oneself as an invalid, perceiving oneself as dependent on others, perceiving food as a condition, perceiving it in terms of dependent origination. One should establish these perceptions clearly and then eat. Mindfulness should also be established with regard to eating together with others, eating repeatedly, and eating a sufficient amount. This is called the duty of food.

What is the duty of eating? Whether a monk is eating rice, eating curds, or drinking gruel, when the time is announced or the gong is struck, he should come promptly.

He should come promptly. He should stand with vigilance. He should sit with vigilance. He should eat with vigilance. He should keep mindfulness close at hand and not let the mind wander. He should be well dressed, comport himself with proper bearing, be thoroughly restrained and quite composed. He should make no noise, should not let his eyes wander, and should look only as far as the yoke-beam's length ahead. He should be orderly in his conduct, humble in bearing, and should reflect inwardly on fear and dependence on others, with the thought that he will sweep up the dust, so to speak. He should keep in mind loving-kindness and a warm affectionate heart toward elder monks, monks of middle standing, and novices, perceiving them clearly as father, son, and younger brother, and should sit skillfully on his seat. He should eat skillfully. This is called the duty of eating.

What is the duty of passing on food? A monk should not return food he has received, nor should he pass it on portion by portion. To whom, then, should he give it? He should give it to his mother, to his father, his brothers, and his sisters. He should give it to relatives as well. He should give it to laypeople who have come inside the monastery enclosure. He should give it to those who are of benefit to him, and even to those who are not. He should give it to the sick, to those who are detained, and to those who are occupied with something. Even if a pregnant woman comes, he should keep mindfulness close and give food to her. He should also give a single portion of food to animals. He should give it too to one who wishes to go forth into the monastic life. And he should give after dividing it into portions and setting aside what remains. This is called the duty of passing on food.

What is the duty of alms-going (Skt. piṇḍapāta)? A monk should receive alms respectfully. He should receive them in order — not equal to the broth, not equal to the side-dish. He should be vigilant, keep mindfulness close at hand, keep the mind from wandering, not be hasty, and take only as much as will suffice. This is called the duty of alms-going.

What is the duty of the alms-round practice? A monk who practices the alms-round should enter with vigilance, sit with vigilance, and stand with vigilance. He should keep mindfulness close at hand and not let the mind wander. He should be seemly in appearance, comport himself with proper bearing, be thoroughly restrained, be fully covered, make no sound, not let his eyes wander but look only as far as the yoke-beam's length ahead, restrain his senses, not let the mind stray outward, and maintain awareness of what is before and behind. When he sees a woman who resembles his mother, he should keep the perception of her as his mother close at hand. When he sees a woman who resembles his sister, he should keep the perception of her as his sister close at hand. When he sees a woman who resembles his daughter, he should establish the perception of her as his daughter.

A monk on the alms-round should take note of the landmarks of markets, trading quarters, crossroads, three-way junctions, and gatehouses. When he has reached a householder's doorway, he should gently shake the clapper or knock softly at the door with his fingers. If a woman is asleep, he should jingle the bell-ring to wake her. If she has gone into a place where pounding is being done, he should wait until two or three strokes of the pestle have been made. If she has gone into a place where something is being burned, he should wait until one load has finished burning. If she has been engaged in weaving, he should wait while two or three turns are completed. He should keep mindfulness close at hand and take alms without letting the mind wander. He should take only as much as is sufficient.

If a monk who practices the alms-round wishes, he may eat in the company of the Saṅgha. Even when invited as a guest, he should regard it as his own affair and carry out the practice of the alms-round. This is called the duty of the alms-round practice.

What is the duty of the bowl-carrier? A monk who carries the bowl should know the time and measure, should go on the alms-round, should be knowing, should establish mindfulness, should not let the mind wander, should be undistracted, and should not mingle.

One should by all means keep it clean and neat. One should by no means treat it in the manner of something impure, something broken, something long-used and worn. One should keep it clean and bright. One should bring it in a manner that is well-proportioned and fitting. One should not seek other purposes that are out of place. Having gone to the monastery, one should approach that monk with a pleasant expression, free from frowning, with agreeable words, and with a glad demeanor, and receive the alms-bowl. This is called the duty of the bowl-carrier.

What is the duty of the forest monk? The forest monk should maintain a pleasant expression and should be free from frowning. He should establish mindfulness. First he should offer a kind greeting, welcoming with gentle words such as "Welcome, may you have come comfortably." At the outset he should inquire: "Are you dwelling well? Are you practicing well? Are you doing well in your work?"

The forest monks should take good care of the water and set it out. They should set out the water-vessels as well. They should take care of the food and set it out. They should set out the vessels for food as well. They should take care of the fire and set it out. They should take care of the kindling and set it out. They should take care of the lamps and set them out. They should take care of the vessels for oil and set them out. They should take care of the wick-material and set it out. They should gather together and set out butter, oil of grain, honey, and binding-cords for bundles. They should gather together and set out pieces of leather. They should gather together and set out thread, garlands, and needles for sewing. They should gather together and set out needles, knives, thread, and provisions. They should keep the medicines well stocked. They should keep the carriers for solid goods well stocked.

The forest monks should not show the fire-crystal or the water-crystal to others. The forest monk should know the wells thoroughly. He should be skilled in practical affairs, skilled in the affairs of the night, and skilled in the lay of the land. The forest monk should be skilled in the sūtras, skilled in the Vinaya, and skilled in the Abhidharma. He should be skilled in speech, skilled in teaching the Dharma, skilled in the aggregates, skilled in the elements, skilled in the sense bases, skilled in dependent origination, and skilled in what is possible and what is not possible.

The forest monks should know the Dharma and should know its meaning. They should know the time and know the measure, know themselves, know the assembly, know persons, and know the distinctions among persons.

The forest monks should not give rise to pride. They should not behave arrogantly. They should be respectful. They should be dependent upon others' authority. They should not be loose-tongued. Their words should be steady. They should have a sense of shame and a sense of conscience. They should not speak much, and they should not speak in ways that lead to heated argument. They should apply themselves with diligence and should not be indolent. They should act with mindfulness and vigilance. They should keep the sense faculties composed. They should know moderation in food. They should not think of themselves as important. In the evening and at dawn they should apply themselves earnestly to the practice of meditation. They should not pursue the pleasures of sleep, the pleasure of lying on one's side, or the pleasure of the bed. They should know when it is the right time to engage in practice and when it is not. They should be skilled in sitting on seats. They should not revile the elder monks, and they should not revile the junior monks either.

The forest monk should not let his diligence be wasted. He should attain what has not yet been attained, realize what has not yet been realized, and actualize what has not yet been actualized. The monk dwelling in the forest hermitage should, by means of the Dharma-staff, the ball, and the mallet, practice meditation in the evening and at dawn.

If the forest monk does not fulfill the prescribed rules of the holy life in accordance with what has been laid down, he will come to incur a transgression. This is called the duty of the forest monk.

What is the duty of the elder of the forest hermitage? One should engage in all such duties as have been described above.

From knowing all the newly ordained monks dwelling there, everything proceeds as before. In all things, the elder monk of the forest hermitage should be the first to engage, up to and including the point of not abandoning his continuity. He should take hold of the duties of the hermitage and apply himself to the tasks of the hermitage. Those monks, for their part, should listen to the instructions he imparts by way of guidance and carry them out. This is called the duty of the elder of the forest hermitage.

What is the duty of the village-border monk? From maintaining a pleasing appearance, the village-border monk proceeds as before, up to and including dwelling in comfort. He should inquire of monks who have arrived, asking, "Did you travel well?" He should see to it that they rest in accordance with seniority and as is fitting. He should provide whatever sleeping mats and seats are available. If they arrive in the morning, he should divide and distribute whatever food is to be had. Should they come after the meal, he should provide and satisfy them with whatever drink, molasses, sugar, confections, and light refreshments are available. In the evening, he should likewise distribute and provide sleeping mats. He should provide water for washing the feet and oil for anointing them. He should separately show them the way to the park, the entrance inside, the surrounding area, the place for defecating, the place for urinating, the stairways, the steps, the divisions, and the separate sections. He should announce whatever Saṅgha duties have been scheduled. If there is an alms-goer among them, he should also instruct him in the proper domain for his rounds. For those who arrive, he should prepare food and drink. If one decides to stay, he should ask and, if the monk is remaining, provide a dwelling-room or an upper story room, or whatever is suitable for seclusion. If one is departing, he should be given a gracious send-off and escorted on his way. If lay people, brahmins, and householders, arrive, the village-border monk should meet them with a joyful face, free of frowning, welcome them in front, and speak pleasantly to them. He should offer a seat. If food and drink are needed, they should be given. If they wish to sleep, bedding should be provided. If they wish to hear the Dharma, and if he himself is able, he should give a Dharma talk; if he himself is unable, he should appoint another monk to give a Dharma talk. The village-border monk should train those brahmins and householders who come and arrive in generosity, in engaging in acts of giving, in taking refuge, and in undertaking the bases of training. He should also provide them with incense, perfume, and flowers. He should have them circumambulate the stūpa and pay homage. He should instruct them to the best of his ability and then send them on their way. This is called the duty of the village-border monk.

What is the duty of the elder of the village-border community? The elder of the village-border community should engage in duties such as these. From knowing all the newly ordained monks dwelling there, everything proceeds as before, and the elder monk of the village-border community should in all things be the first to engage, up to and including the point of not abandoning his continuity. He should take hold of those monks in the duties of the village-border and instill in them a grasp of the village-border tasks. He should instill in them an engagement with good conduct. He should give them the following instruction: "Venerable ones, keep mindfulness close at hand and dwell at the village border. Toward the park attendants, the novices' fathers, and women, abandon habitual gazing, and even when you must look, keep mindfulness firmly in place, look with care, and speak with care. Do not be arrogant. At due times, give Dharma talks. Turn away from what is outside your proper domain, and hold to what is within your proper domain." Those monks, for their part, should listen to his instructions and act in accordance with the instructions given. This is called the duty of the resident senior monk at the village border.

What is the duty of a visiting monk? A visiting monk should not simply walk straight into the monastery. At the gate of the monastery, set down the alms bowl and the outer robe. If water is available, wash your feet. If no water is available, wipe off the dust on a mat for wiping dust, or wipe it off with a leaf or a dry leaf. If you need to relieve yourself by way of feces or urine, then do so, and urinate. Then put on the outer robe, take the folds of the outer robe over the left shoulder, pick up the stacked robe-cloth and the alms bowl with the left hand, take a tooth-cleaner in the right hand, and carry your sandals in the left hand. If the monastery is enclosed by a wall, by a wooden fence, or by a hedge, enter mindfully, without dragging the gate, going in with vigilance. Circumambulate the stūpas. With vigilance, keep mindfulness close at hand, and do not let the mind scatter. Comport yourself with beautiful deportment, fully covered, your voice restrained, eyes not wandering, looking only as far ahead as a yoke's length, and enter the main shrine hall. Sit on the side where there is the most open visibility, so that the resident monks, upon seeing you, will know that this monk is a visitor, and they will set about making you comfortable.

When a visiting monk has entered the shrine hall, he should set down, in a suitable place, the robe-cloth, the alms bowl, the water vessel, and the sandals. Then, with respect and reverence, with a sense of awe, bowing down at their feet, pay homage to the senior resident monks. Gladden the younger monks with kind words. Sit on whatever seat you obtain. Whether it is at the time of a meal, the time of drinking, the time of taking gruel, or the time of paying respects, when the signal is given or the wooden sounding board is struck and the Saṅgha assembles, join the assembly. Ask about seniority in years, and sit in the proper order according to where you have come from.

If a bed or mat is being offered, understand the situation fully and look it over carefully. If a dwelling is assigned, ask, "Is it possible to stay here or not?" If it is possible to stay there, say, "What is comfortable?" If it is not possible to stay there, then set the alms bowl and robe off to one side, and look for a broom for sweeping. Look for a water vessel and a wooden seat as well. When you approach the doorway of the dwelling, knock softly and gently. For there may be a snake, a scorpion, a centipede, a house lizard, a chameleon, or some other harmful creature there, and it should be made aware of your presence. Understand what is in the upper and lower parts of the door frame, and understand the door bolt. Then open the door slowly, enter with vigilance, and sit in the middle. From each of the four corners, look for any snake's nesting place, any scorpion's nesting place, or any insects, bees, or other creatures' nesting places. If any are found, cause them to leave in a way that does not harm them.

Then take hold of the broom in the dwelling. Sweep it. Sweep it again. Sprinkle with fine dust and wipe gently and softly. If there are things such as a bed, a chair, a small wooden bench, a stool, a canopied couch, cushions, rectangular seats, or the like, go outside first. If an elderly monk was sitting there before, wait a moment. If not, remove them one by one with care, slowly, enter with vigilance, and wash your feet.

A visiting monk must not perform against the resident monks any act of censure, any act of deprecation, any act of banishment, any act of reconciliation, any act of suspension for not having seen a transgression, any act of suspension for failure to perform a corrective act, any act of suspension for not having relinquished a wrong view, or any act of penalty, or any act of penalty carried out from the very foundation, or any act of appeasement, or any act of appeasement carried out from the very foundation. Ask whether any such things exist or do not exist. If they do exist, refrain from those and anything of that kind.

Understand and inquire about the exits and entrances of the monastery building, the surrounding areas, the latrine grounds, the urination grounds, the stairs, the steps, and the procedures for opening and closing doors and the like. Ask what kind of Saṅgha business has been arranged. Then enter your lodging, sit cross-legged on a cushion or mat, straighten your body upright, establish mindfulness, and abandon the eight things that this body touches. These are as follows: sickness, tumors, weapons, poison, impermanence, suffering, emptiness, and selflessness — dwell in these contemplations. If you are able, remain in them for as long as you can. If, however, you are unable, rise, recite three times, recite the praises of the qualities of generosity, and having recited the praises of the qualities of generosity, turn to the right. Pressing foot against foot, having established luminous mindfulness, knowing how to rise, setting up clear perception, attending carefully with the mind, at the end of the night, as the dawn breaks, rise at length and swiftly. Then, sitting cross-legged with body held upright and erect, establish mindfulness in the mind, and abandon by means of this body the eight things that the body touches. These are as follows: sickness, tumors, poison, weapons, impermanence, suffering, emptiness, and selflessness — dwell in these contemplations. Then when dawn has come, take a tooth-cleaning stick. Then carry out whatever tasks need to be done, and ask: "Today, shall I enter as a guest of the Saṅgha's offering meal, or shall I go on almsround?" If you enter as a guest of the Saṅgha's offering meal, conduct yourself as you please in virtuous activities and carry out the alms duty. If you go on almsround, then ask: "What village, what territory, which families are faithful, which families are not faithful? Have the precepts been given to that family?" Ask: "Has the alms bowl already been accepted?" Ask: "Are there any unruly horses or unruly cattle?" Then in the morning, put on the lower robe, take the alms bowl and the Dharma robe, and go on almsround with clear awareness. Having completed the almsround and performed the meal duties, afterward, having accepted the almsround food, setting aside the meal duties, set down the Dharma robe and alms bowl, and sit in comfort. This is called the duty of a newly arrived monk.

What is the duty of the resident elder monk in regard to newly arrived monks? The resident elder monk of the monastery where one has newly arrived should take note of the monks who have newly arrived. Toward them he should be pleasant of countenance, free from frowning and anger, and with gentle words first bring satisfaction to those monks. For the sake of the monks who have newly arrived, he should search out bedding and seats. From among those sitting, he should designate a host in five ways: informing them as to which is their cell in the monastery and directing them to look at it; informing them as to which bedding and seat is theirs and directing them to look at it; and handing over to them their key — these five constitute what is called the duty of the resident elder monk in regard to newly arrived monks.

The Noble Vinaya, the fifty-second fascicle.

What is the duty of a departing monk? The monk who is departing should investigate the direction and region to which he is going. He should ask the monks who have come from that direction: "In that direction, does any one of the eight obstacles that may arise for monks occur?" "If I go there, will I not be too busy with almsround, medicine for the sick, and rendering service?"

"If I am kept busy and unable to obtain almsround, medicine for the sick, and those who render service to me, will my body not decline and my time not pass in vain? If I go there, will my body and mind be at ease? If I go there, will my wholesome qualities grow? If I go there, will I be together with monks who are endowed with moral discipline, endowed with good qualities, given to wholesome qualities, of the same view, and of the same way of living? Will they prevent doubts I have not yet arisen from arising, and dispel those that have already arisen? Will they prevent wrong views I have not yet arisen from arising, and turn back those that have arisen? Will my body and mind and those venerable ones be at ease together? Will I and those venerable ones grow together in wholesome qualities?" — these are the questions he should ask. In this way he should examine the direction and region.

He should also examine his companions: "Are these venerable ones endowed with moral discipline? Are they endowed with good qualities? Are they given to wholesome qualities? Do they share the same view? Do they share the same way of living? Will they prevent doubts in me that have not yet arisen from arising, and dispel those that have arisen? Will they also prevent wrong views that have not yet arisen from arising? Will my body and mind be at ease together with those venerable ones? Will I together with those venerable ones grow in wholesome qualities? If I fall ill on the road, will those venerable ones not abandon me?" Having examined his companions in this way, he should examine the road: "On that road, will none of the eight obstacles that may arise occur? On that road, will I not be made too busy by almsround, medicine for the sick, and those who render service? And if there are neither almsround nor those who render service, will I not be harmed and my time pass in vain? On that road, will my body and mind be at ease? On that road, will my wholesome qualities grow?" If he will not be excessively occupied, he may go.

Having in this way examined the direction and region, the companions, and the road, if he intends to set out the next day, he should go before his preceptors and teachers, and say: "I am going to such a direction and such a region, to such a town," and request their permission. The preceptors and teachers, for their part, should examine his direction and region, examine the road, and examine his monk companions — what his companion monks are like, what his retinue is like, what those who are to accompany him are like — and, having understood this, if it seems suitable they should grant permission; if it does not seem suitable, they should not grant it. If the departing monk departs without having asked permission, a transgression is incurred. However, if it would lead to growth in wholesome qualities and yet the preceptor and teacher are not acting properly, then to depart without requesting permission is permissible.

The room in which he has been residing he should carefully sweep. He should dust it and sweep out the dust. He should plaster the floor gently with dung. In the evening he should recite the passage on the merits of generosity three times over. At dawn he should make the arrangements for the beds and bedding as they should properly be, then fold them, shake them out, and beat them. Then he should push them back from the wall by about four finger-breadths, stack them, and leave them there. He should shut the door, fasten the inner latch and the upper latch, and before departing inform the monks residing there and the monks of the neighborhood, saying: "Please keep watch over these." The instruction to keep watch over the beds and so forth comprises five parts: this room — "Please watch over this room"; the beds — "Please watch over these beds";

the key — these make the five parts. Once he has left the outer precinct of the monastery, he should check with his fellow monks. Before going far, he should ask anyone he meets: "Has anything been forgotten and left behind?" If something has in fact been forgotten and left, that monk should turn back, retrieve it, and wait until the others arrive. This is called the duty of departing.

What, then, is the duty of the resident elder with respect to departure? The resident elder should rise early in the morning and direct the monks who are setting out. He should instruct those venerable ones to gather their bowls and robes properly, hold them well, and then depart, telling them: "Let no one forget anything." After they have set out, the resident elder himself should check whether anything has been left behind through forgetfulness. Then all should depart from the rear of the group. Before going far, he should say to any one of them: "Is there anything that has been forgotten and left behind?" The resident elder should instruct all those monks, saying: "None of the venerable ones should go ahead and set off first; none should lag behind and straggle. Everyone should assemble together and travel looking after one another." When the resident elder has set out on the road, he should ascertain whether those monks are comfortable or not, and should be aware of whether he himself has gone ahead and set off first, or has lagged behind and been left. If any have gone on ahead, he should urge them on and have them continue. He himself should travel in the midst of the monks. If he is unable to keep pace, he should instruct those monks to see to their bowls, robes, and other things, and have these conveyed to them. If a monk should become entirely unable to travel, the other monks should carry that monk on their shoulders or bear him as a load, bring him out of that monastery, and proceed to the edge of the village. They should provide that monk with an attendant monk, and that attendant monk should seek out food, medicine, and other necessities for him. If the road should prove to be dangerous, they should march along swiftly and without delay, and when past that stretch they should rest. If conditions permit, wherever there is a riverbank, a forest edge, a shaded green meadow, or a pleasant spot of ground, he should identify it and have the monks rest there. After resting, they should continue. The resident elder should then instruct all of them, saying: "Now, all of you, each one recite here a verse on the virtues of generosity." When all the monks have finished reciting verses on the virtues of generosity, the resident elder should conclude by himself reciting a verse on the virtues of giving, and should survey the terrain two or three times before proceeding.

When they arrive at the edge of a village, he should seek lodging for the monks and seek out sleeping places. Alternatively, he should seek out grass and leaves. If these are obtained, he should procure water for washing the feet, oil for anointing the feet, a beverage prepared by steeping, molasses, candy, and so forth. He should also inquire and check for suitable places for urination and defecation, and there they should pass the night. For the sake of the household gods, he should recite three times a single verse and then recite the virtues of generosity. While residing there, the resident elder should seek out and gather rice, gruel, and sour milk for the monks, and distribute them to the monks. There he should speak to the newly arrived monks, speak truthfully, make everything known to them, help them understand, instruct them, and guide them — and by all means turn them away from arrogance, improper conduct, and frivolous behavior.

If the resident elder of the traveling party does not act in accordance with the rules of conduct as established, a transgression with remainder will occur. This is called the duty of the resident elder of the traveling party.

What is the duty of foot-washing? The Blessed One permitted foot-washing for the monks. Monks, if you see the foot-washing vessels empty, fill them yourselves. Or a monk may knock at the doors of those residing in the assembly hall to announce foot-washing. The duty of foot-washing is also this: if a monk wishes to wash his feet, he should go mindfully to the foot-washing area. If an elder is already seated there, he should wait a moment. If no one is present, he should enter mindfully and wash his feet. A monk should not sit for a long time in the foot-washing area. He should not enter into meditative absorption there, nor recite scriptures, nor recite from memory, nor ask questions, nor settle into conversation and sit about. He should quickly wash his feet and mindfully depart. This is called the duty of foot-washing.

What is the duty of the foot-washing elder? The foot-washing elder monk, once a monk has begun washing his feet, should not dismiss or remove him before he has finished. "Has begun washing his feet" means that, at the least, his feet have become wet with water.

If monks behave improperly or settle into conversation and sit about, the resident elder monk should stop them, recite scripture to them, instruct them, and guide them toward proper conduct — leading them to follow the rules of conduct as befits the foot-washing elder. This is called the duty of the foot-washing elder.

What is the duty of the sitting assembly? Monks residing in a monastery or dwelling should gather together on the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth days of the month, and speak on the Dharma — whether as taught by the Buddha or as taught by his śrāvakas. On the following morning, as soon as the gate is opened or the wooden sounding board is struck, they should assemble. Having gathered quickly, they should seat themselves mindfully. Having seated themselves mindfully, they should establish close mindfulness. They should keep the mind undistracted. Their conduct should be complete and excellent. They should be thoroughly composed. They should be thoroughly joyful. They should be silent. Without letting the eyes wander, they should gaze as far as a yoke's length ahead. They should be accompanied by reverence, by humility, by deference, and by a sense of awe. They should hold a mind that is lowly, like a broom. Toward elders, those of middle standing, and the newly ordained, they should hold a mind of loving-kindness, a mind of benefit, and a mind of affectionate care. They should dwell near to the perception of them as elder brothers and as children. They should be skilled in sitting on their seats, and having sat, they should pass the night until dawn through definitive Dharma talk. If that is not comfortable, they should pass the night through two forms of conduct: walking and standing.

When the monks have assembled and are seated, they should listen to the Dharma at the proper time — with reverence, listening closely, not disparaging it, engaging with it properly, not seeking faults, openly establishing respect for the Dharma, not looking down upon the person who speaks the Dharma, not disparaging oneself, thinking that the mind is unified with the Teacher and with his word, not letting the ears wander, with a reverent mind, gathering all the mind into unity with the Teacher, and so listening to the Dharma.

After that, for the sake of the gods, kings, patrons, and donors, verses on the qualities of generosity should be recited. This is called the duty of the sitting assembly.

What is the duty of the sitting-assembly elder? Whether the gate has been opened or the wooden sounding board has been struck,

One should be the first to go there, the first to stand, and the first to be seated. Having sat, one should not speak even for a moment. Then one should oneself teach the Dharma, or else assign a capable monk to teach it. If one neither teaches the Dharma oneself nor assigns a capable monk to do so, one incurs an offense. Furthermore, if brahmins and householders arrive while the assembly is seated, one should also give them a Dharma talk. And if other wandering non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) arrive seeking an opportunity and looking for a weak point, one should engage them too in a Dharma exchange, saying: "This is unreasonable. This is inconsistent. This is unestablished." One should tame them with the Dharma of reason. One should not give rise to anger, should not be wrathful, and should not be contemptuous. This is called the duty of the sitting-assembly elder.

What is the duty of teaching the Dharma? The monk who teaches the Dharma should be accompanied by respect, should regard himself as lowly, should be subject to reverence and awe, should have a humble mind and a mind like a broom. Having entered into the midst of the assembly, one should teach the Dharma in a way that is reasoned, clear in expression, precise in wording, undisturbed, unmixed, connected, without error, with undistracted mind, and without a mercenary attitude. One should show manifest respect for the Dharma itself and also show manifest respect for those who listen to the Dharma. One should not disparage the Dharma. One should not disparage those who listen to the Dharma. One should not belittle oneself. One should understand all phenomena as being of the nature of reality and as dependent origination. One should act with a spirit of loving-kindness and of affection, so that this Dharma may long endure. One should not teach the Dharma relying on material gain as one's support rather than relying on the nature of reality itself. Beginning with respect, one should act in accordance and in harmony, proceeding in order, and teach the Dharma with delight, with faith, with joy, with enthusiasm, with devotion, with reasonableness, and without agitation. One should remain toward the assembly with a mind of loving-kindness and a mind of affection. It should not be for the sake of gain, honor, or fame. While teaching the Dharma one should not praise oneself or disparage others. This is called the duty of teaching the Dharma.

What is the duty of the Dharma-teaching elder? The elder who oversees the teaching of the Dharma should go to where the Dharma is being taught and listen to whether that monk is teaching in accordance with the Dharma or not in accordance with the Dharma. If he is teaching in accordance with the Dharma, one should generate enthusiasm. If he is teaching contrary to the Dharma, one should have it corrected. If it can be corrected, well and good. If it cannot be corrected, one should, to the best of one's ability and as much as one can, censure him, saying: "This monk's teaching is not the Dharma, it is not the Vinaya, it is not what the Teacher taught. Do not destroy the foundation of the Blessed One's Dharma. Do not scratch out the eye of the Dharma." Having said this, one should rise from one's seat and depart. This is called the duty of the Dharma-teaching elder.

What is the duty concerning proper times? Monks should go at the proper time. This is called the duty concerning proper times.

What is the duty concerning improper times? A monk should not enter a village at an improper time, except when such a circumstance has arisen. Not going without having informed a monk who is present in the residence — this is called the duty concerning improper times.

What is the duty concerning the assembly of the Saṅgha at improper times? Apart from the assembly of the Saṅgha on the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth days of the month, assembling the Saṅgha at other times for the purpose of Saṅgha business, Saṅgha duties, and Saṅgha activities — when prior notice has been given or the wooden sounding board has been struck, one should quickly assemble, and should proceed with full awareness, and so forth as before.

One should be skilled in sitting. There, the senior elder of the Saṅgha should bow in order of seniority and take his seat wherever there is space. The second elder likewise should bow to the senior elder of the Saṅgha and take his seat wherever there is space. In the same way, the third elder, the fourth, and so on down to the newly ordained monk — each should bow in order of seniority and take his place wherever there is space. There, monks — whether elders, those of middle standing, or newly ordained — shall conduct Saṅgha business in accordance with the Dharma, in accordance with the Vinaya, and in accordance with what the Teacher has taught. The senior elder monk shall not revile the monks, shall not disparage them, and shall not treat them with disrespect. This is called the duty concerning the assembly of the Saṅgha at improper times.

What is the duty of the elders concerning the assembly of the Saṅgha at improper times? When the Saṅgha assembles at an improper time and prior notice has been given or the wooden sounding board has been struck, the senior elder monk should be the first to go, the first to rise, and the first to be seated — with reverence, with a humble mind, with a sense of awe and deference, with the mind cast down like a broom, and with such an attitude he should enter into the midst of the Saṅgha. He should bow in order of seniority and take his seat. Toward the elders, those of middle standing, and the newly ordained, he should cultivate a mind of loving-kindness, a mind of benefit, and a mind of affectionate care, maintaining clearly before him the perception that they are as his father, his younger brothers, and his sons. He should also look over the assembly: which among them is well-attired, which is poorly attired, which is attractive in appearance, which is unattractive, which is well-robed, which is poorly robed. Those who are well and attractively attired he should leave at ease. Those who are poorly and unattractively attired he should approach, instruct, and give guidance. Those who are already well-robed he should leave be. Those who are poorly robed he should signal. If they do not notice the signal, he should signal one seated nearby. If one seated nearby also does not notice, the senior elder monk should approach in a manner that causes no confusion, see that they are properly robed, and not make any loud sound.

The senior elder monk should examine the assembly with this thought: Is this assembly acting in accordance with the Dharma, or is it not? If it is in accordance with the Dharma, let him allow all business to proceed as they see fit. If it is not in accordance with the Dharma, he should take the side of what is in accordance with the Dharma, offer guidance on how to inquire into what is proper, and without saying anything further, rise from his seat and depart, so that disputes and quarrels do not ensue. This is called the duty of the elders concerning the assembly of the Saṅgha at improper times.

What is the duty concerning speaking? In the city of Rājagṛha there were certain wandering non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) who, on the eighth, fourteenth, and fifteenth days of the month, would gather together and teach the Dharma, and many people would assemble there to hear them. Those teachers received gains and were shown honor, and their retinues grew large. The wise and capable king of the region of Magadha came to have faith in this excellent teaching and thought to himself: "These wandering non-Buddhists — from the time they are described as teaching the Dharma on the eighth and so forth, up to the point where their retinues have grown large —" and so on as before. "Just so, if the monks likewise were to gather together on the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth and teach the Dharma, then I too would go there, and the king too would attend" — thinking thus, many people would also assemble.

The monks too would receive gains, and honor too would come to them, and their retinues would grow large. For the many people as well, merit would increase greatly. The monks would become fearless. The teaching would flourish. The sacred Dharma would endure for a long time. The lamp of the Dharma would blaze. And it would be made to shine for people of future generations.

Thinking thus, the wise and capable king of the region of Magadha, Bimbisāra, went to where the Blessed One was and approached him. He bowed his head at the feet of the Blessed One and sat down to one side. Seated to one side, King Bimbisāra, the wise and capable king of Magadha, addressed the Blessed One with these words: "Venerable One, as for the other wandering non-Buddhists — from the time of the eighth and so forth up to the point where their retinues grew large — it is as before. Now, if the monks likewise, beginning from the eighth, were to make it shine for people of future generations," and so on as before, "what does the Venerable One think of this?"

The Blessed One remained silent, giving his consent to King Bimbisāra, the wise and capable king of Magadha. Then, understanding from the Blessed One's silence that he had given his consent, King Bimbisāra bowed his head at the two feet of the Blessed One and departed from the Blessed One's presence.

Not long after King Bimbisāra the wise had departed, the Blessed One knew it, and declared to the monks: "Therefore, monks, I permit you: on the eighth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth, gather together and teach the Dharma. And it is to be taught in this manner: the monk who teaches the Dharma should make his meaning clear to the assembly both in meaning and in words."

Now the monks there spoke in ordinary speech, and because they spoke in ordinary speech, the assembly did not understand. The monks reported this to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "I permit you to teach the Dharma in song, with a melodious voice."

But they taught just as they were seated, and the assembly still could not understand. The Blessed One declared: "I permit you to teach the Dharma from a high seat."

Then they compiled and recited great sūtras at length, and though there was no uncertainty raised, nor any elaboration, the day itself was consumed by this, and the assembly became weary. The Blessed One declared: "I permit you to elaborate as freely as you wish, according to the subject matter."

They then took up only the bare meaning of the sūtra passage in brief and wished to present it as a narrative account, intending to follow the text just as it was spoken. Yet they became uncertain, wondering: would the sūtra not come out properly at its end? The Blessed One declared: "I permit you: take the bare meaning of the sūtra in brief, and intersperse narrative accounts at appropriate moments; also follow the text just as it was spoken; and make the assembly understand by connecting meaning and words together. The sūtras themselves are also to be taken in just this way."

Then two of them taught together before a single assembly. The Blessed One declared: "Do not teach two together within a single assembly. Whoever does so incurs a transgression."

They then taught each to their own separate assembly, and those assemblies fell into dispute. The Blessed One declared: "Do not teach each to separate assemblies. If one does so, it incurs a grave fault."

Then it came about that they were teaching simultaneously to two assemblies, and the Blessed One declared:

"Do not teach simultaneously to two assemblies. Whoever does so incurs a transgression. Teach in such a way that the two assemblies do not fall into dispute from the teaching."

When those monks led their assemblies away on a journey, the Blessed One declared: "Do not lead an assembly away on a journey. Whoever leads an assembly away on a journey incurs a grave fault. As for those who go along with them, there is no fault."

Those monks then sought material gain through the Dharma, living by trading in the Dharma. The Blessed One declared: "Do not seek material gain through the Dharma. Do not make your livelihood by trading in the Dharma."

When there was then no one to speak, the Blessed One declared: "Let one who is capable of reminding do the reminding. If there is also no one able to remind, then speak in order of seniority."

When they composed verse and set it to melody, the Blessed One declared: "Speak it yourself, or else entrust it to another monk. The person entrusted should also be informed. If one does not speak it oneself, and does not entrust it to another monk, and does not inform the person who has been entrusted, one incurs a grave fault."

When monks were being appointed in order of seniority, it came about that simpleminded, hunchbacked, and tongue-tied monks were appointed, and certain wandering non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) began saying of these monks, within the community of the ascetics who are sons of the Śākyans: "This one is an excellent person! This one is a foremost person! This one is a supreme person!" — making false accusations against them, disparaging them, and uttering harsh words against them.

The monks reported the matter as it had occurred to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One declared: "Do not appoint in turn those who teach the Dharma if they do not have the ability. Appoint the one who has the ability. Appoint in such a way that the assembly will not fall into dispute."

As for the duty of speaking at other times: whenever and wherever monks are assembled and gathered together, the settled teachings of the Dharma are to be recited. If one does not know them, one should ask one another, inquire of one another. It should not be done for the sake of argument, not for the sake of finding fault, not for the sake of slander, not for the sake of causing harm. Rather, one should ask and inquire out of reverence and respect for the Dharma alone: "What is virtuous and what is non-virtuous? What is blameworthy and what is blameless? How is one to act so as to be virtuous, and how so as to be sinful?" This is the duty of speaking.

What then is the duty of not speaking? In whatever place monks are speaking yet do not wish to discourse to others, they should cultivate their minds just as they have accomplished the meditative recollection of that kind, and they should enter into the four modes of conduct. The elaboration of entering into mutual silence is as follows: it should be done in the manner of the monks of the Joyful Grove on the banks of the river. This is called the duty of not speaking.

What is the duty of entering the rains retreat (varṣā)? A monk who wishes to enter the rains retreat in the proper manner should reflect thoroughly, examine thoroughly, and analyze thoroughly, and then enter in the proper manner. He should consider: in that dwelling place, how many monks are possessed of moral discipline, possessed of good qualities, possessed of learning, possessed of wholesome qualities? Are their views harmonious, their conduct harmonious, their companionship harmonious? Are there those who are accommodating and agreeable, whether in coming or in going, whether in speaking? In that dwelling place, are there monks who hold the sūtras, who hold the Vinaya, who hold the matrix of teachings — from whom, if doubts have not arisen in me, they will not arise, and if they have arisen, they will be resolved? Are there those who, if something like a wrongdoing has not arisen, will prevent it from arising, and if it has arisen, will subdue it? Will one obtain in that dwelling place medicines suited to illness, food, requisites, and attendants? Will both one's body and one's mind be at ease in that dwelling place?

In that dwelling place, one should also consider whether there are monks who quarrel, who expose one another's faults, who cause conflict, and who engage in disputes — for such a place, it seems, would not be fitting. One should think: would that person not become an obstacle to my obtaining what I have not yet obtained, penetrating what I have not yet penetrated, and realizing what I have not yet realized? And would the Saṅgha not be divided during the rains retreat in that dwelling place? Having thus contemplated thoroughly, examined thoroughly, and investigated thoroughly, one should go to that place that has a companion suited to attending the sick. This is called the act of entering the rains retreat properly.

What then is the act of having entered the rains retreat properly? A monk who has entered the rains retreat properly should not go beyond the boundary even for a single day without purpose. If there is a purpose, one may go, with a blessing granted for seven days or for forty days. And this too is only for the sake of a purpose. What purposes? It may be for the sake of a monk, or a nun, or a male novice, or a female novice, or a male lay practitioner, or a female lay practitioner. It may be for the sake of a relative, or for one's own sake. Or it may be that one has come to doubt, to uncertainty, or to suspicion with regard to the Buddha, or the Dharma, or the Saṅgha, or suffering, or the origin of suffering, or cessation, or the path — and one has the perception that one may obtain what one has not yet obtained, penetrate what one has not yet penetrated, or realize what one has not yet realized. Or it may equally be for the sake of wandering non-Buddhists (tīrthikas). Or if that monk would cause a division of the Saṅgha during the rains retreat in that place, or if a stūpa or a temple might be desecrated or burned — then, for the sake of the Buddha, or the Dharma, or the Saṅgha, that monk should go with a blessing granted for seven days or for forty days. If, having gone there, seven days or forty days have elapsed, the monk will incur no offense of breaking the rains retreat. This is called the act of having entered the rains retreat properly.

What then is the act of the elder monk who has entered the rains retreat properly? An elder monk who has entered the rains retreat properly should take note of the condition of the temple buildings and the stūpas — what repairs are needed, and who is willing to carry them out — and should encourage those who are willing, and announce the need publicly. Those who are unwilling should be urged, and reminded. This is called the act of the elder monk who has entered the rains retreat properly.

What then is the act of dwelling in the rains retreat properly? Monks who are dwelling in the rains retreat properly should carry out three kinds of tasks. They should have repaired the buildings of the dwelling where they are spending the rains retreat, those that are broken or deteriorated. They should inspect them, and have them inspected. Whatever robes are found in that dwelling place, those robes should be properly stored, or have them placed in storage. This is called the act of dwelling in the rains retreat properly.

What then is the act of the one who is head of the assembly? The head of the assembly should at regular intervals observe among the members of the assembly who is conducting themselves well and who is not, who is accomplishing what is good and who is not, and examine these things carefully. To one who is conducting themselves well and accomplishing what is good, one should offer full encouragement, saying: "Well done, venerable one, well done! Continue to practice exactly as you are practicing." One should rejoice in them sincerely. And at regular times one should teach them further and instruct them. As for one who is not conducting themselves well or not accomplishing what is good, one should impose upon them whatever penalty is appropriate to the case. This is called the act of the head of the assembly.

What is the act of entering the assembly? A monk, having established mindfulness, should enter the assembly thinking: "This is an assembly of the warrior caste (kṣatriya). This is an assembly of brahmins. This is an assembly of householders. This is an assembly of contemplatives (śramaṇas)." And he should think: "In that assembly I shall walk in such a way, stand in such a way, sit in such a way, speak in such a way, and not speak in such a way." This is called the act of entering the assembly.

What is the act of being present within the assembly? When a monk is present within the assembly, he should not engage in various kinds of chatter, nor in improper talk. He should bring the assembly to a proper state of readiness and then speak words that are in harmony with them. Having spoken, he should rise from his seat. This is called the act of being present within the assembly.

What is the act of the elder monk who is present within the assembly? An elder monk who is present within the assembly should examine the assembly, asking: "Do they prefer talk of such and such a kind, or do they prefer silence?" If there are those who prefer talk, he should speak to them in a manner suited to that. If there are those who prefer silence, he should sit there without saying anything. This is called the act of the elder who is present within the assembly.

What is the act of nourishing restoration? At the time of the restoration ceremony (poṣadha) on the fourteenth or fifteenth day, one should examine one's own mental continuum — the continuum of the night and the continuum of the day — asking: "Has a transgression arisen in me during that period?" If one has arisen, and if one finds a trustworthy monk, one should confess it before him. If one cannot find such a monk, one should purify it by a mental blessing. If no fault has arisen, one should generate the thought and declare aloud: "I am fully purified of such transgressions." The restoration ceremony is what renders moral discipline completely pure. This is called the act of nourishing restoration.

What is the act of performing the restoration ceremony? When the restoration ceremony comes about, even if it is not one's turn, one should still attend in the spirit of faith. And in doing so, one should proceed with full vigilance — from the moment of setting out with awareness, all the way through to the conduct of sitting, including mastery of how to be seated. Once seated, one should cultivate the clear perception that the one reciting is a teacher of the sūtra of individual liberation (Prātimokṣa). One should honor him, listen to him with respect, regard him as a superior, hold him as precious, keep him in mind, unify one's mind, not allow one's ears to wander, and listen with the whole mind focused single-pointedly. Having listened, one should be diligent in practicing accordingly and in accomplishing what was taught. This is called the act of performing the restoration ceremony.

What is the act of the restoration ceremony as a formal act? The act of the restoration ceremony has five aspects: the recitation, the dedication of merit, the complete purification of faith, the setting apart of occasions, and the mental blessing.

Furthermore, the formal act of the restoration ceremony has four types: performing it in a manner contrary to the Dharma and without an assembly, performing it in a manner contrary to the Dharma but with an assembly, performing it in accordance with the Dharma but without an assembly, and performing it in accordance with the Dharma and with an assembly. Of these, the formal act of the restoration ceremony performed in accordance with the Dharma and with an assembly is the one that is properly conducted. This is called the act of the restoration ceremony as a formal act.

What is the act of the individual liberation? At the very time of the restoration ceremony on the fourteenth or fifteenth day, all the monks who have come from the surrounding areas and from within the community should assemble together and be gathered in one place. The elder monk of the Saṅgha should then recite the sūtra of individual liberation. He should cultivate the clear perception that he is a teacher of the Prātimokṣa sūtra. The assembly should listen with honor and respect, regard the reciter as a superior, hold him as precious, keep him in mind, unify one's thoughts, keep the ears attentive and not let them wander. All other things should be brought to stillness, and one should listen. Having heard, one should likewise apply oneself diligently and put it into practice. This is called the act of individual liberation.

What is the act of reciting the Prātimokṣa? There are five modes of reciting the Prātimokṣa. The first is: after a formal request has been made, the origin story is read, and then it is announced that "the remainder has been heard as before." When the Prātimokṣa is proclaimed in this way, it counts as the Prātimokṣa having been recited. This is the first mode of reciting the Prātimokṣa.

The second mode is: after a formal request has been made, the origin story is read, and then the four root defeats are read, after which it is announced that "the remainder has been heard as before." This too counts as the Prātimokṣa having been recited. This is the second mode of reciting the Prātimokṣa.

The third mode is: after a formal request has been made, the origin story is read, the four root defeats are read, and the thirteen Saṅgha remainders are also read, and then it is announced that "the remainder has been heard as before." This too counts as the Prātimokṣa having been recited. This is the third mode of reciting the Prātimokṣa.

The fourth mode is: after a formal request has been made, the origin story is read, the four root defeats are read, the thirteen Saṅgha remainders are read, and the two classes of indeterminate offenses are also read, and then it is announced that "the remainder has been heard as before." This too counts as the Prātimokṣa having been recited. This is the fourth mode of reciting the Prātimokṣa.

The fifth is: reciting the Prātimokṣa in full. These five constitute the act of reciting the Prātimokṣa.

What is the act of the monk who recites the Prātimokṣa? The monk who recites the Prātimokṣa should recite the Prātimokṣa sūtra clearly and fluently by heart, commit it to memory, and settle it firmly in mind. When the time comes to recite it, he should recite it well, without error. He should also examine his own continuum — examining, from the continuum of the previous night and the continuum of the day, whether at that time a transgression has arisen or not. If a transgression has arisen and there is a trustworthy monk present, he should confess it before that monk. If no such monk is available, he should first perform the restoration ceremony and then, following that, resolve in his mind: "I shall confess my transgressions afterwards in the proper manner as prescribed." He should then consecrate this resolve in his mind. He should apply himself diligently in accordance with what arises from the Prātimokṣa sūtra. This is called the act of the monk who recites the Prātimokṣa.

What is the act of the elder? If monks have been invited to a layman's home for a meal, at that time the elder monk should put on his lower robe early, present himself at a clean and proper place, and take his seat. This is called the act of the elder.

What is the act of the middle monk? The middle monk should, with the elder monk ahead of him, enter the village. If the elder should need to attend to defecation or urination along the way, the middle monk should go a short distance away and wait. If he goes far away, he should go to the edge of the village and wait. If brahmins and householders send an invitation, he should wait until the elder arrives and say, "We shall come presently." If hand-washing water is brought, he should say, "Wait for the elder." When the elder has arrived, all who are seated should rise. This is called the act of the middle monk.

What is the act of the junior monk? The junior monk should sweep the temple, clean the floor, lay out the rugs, and plaster the plastered surfaces gently with dung. Water should be apportioned and set out separately. Mats should be arranged and spread. Food should be directed to a place near the door. Preparations should be made in the kitchen, wood should be gathered there, grain and butter should be set out, earth and flour should be set out, and water should be set out. Whatever monks have accepted as their assigned task, those tasks should be carried out. Any other similar duties that need to be done — all of these are to be performed by the junior monk. Furthermore, the junior monk should regard the elder monks as fathers and elder brothers, hold them close, and show them honor and respect; he should be subject to their authority and yield to them in reverence and awe.

One should keep the mind directed and present with the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha in view. Fulfilling in their entirety the rules of conduct governing the holy life, precisely as they have been established — this is called the duty of a junior monk.

What then are the duties of the elder monk, the middle monk, and the junior monk alike? O monks, all elder monks, middle monks, and junior monks should keep present in mind the thought, "I have gone forth." They should hold the perception that the Blessed One, the buddha who is a guardian, is their protector. They should incline toward nirvāṇa. They should conduct themselves in accordance with the rules of training precisely as established. They should apply themselves with diligence in order to enter thoroughly into the qualities of the teacher. This is called the duty common to elder monks, middle monks, and junior monks.

What is the duty in the bathhouse? A monk who wishes to enter the bathhouse should go inside with full vigilance. He should stand inside with vigilance. He should sit with vigilance. He should establish mindfulness and keep the mind undistracted. He should have good conduct, be exceedingly well composed and thoroughly restrained, speak softly, show honor and respect, and be subject to reverence and awe. He should lower his mind and be like a servant. He should cultivate a mind of loving-kindness toward elder monks, middle monks, and junior monks alike. He should have a mind of benefit and a mind of affectionate care. He should establish the perception of them as fathers, sons, and younger brothers. Once a monk has entered the interior of the bathhouse, he should not engage in various kinds of talk, nor in improper speech. He should engage in one of two kinds of conduct: noble silence, or conversation on the definite Dharma. This is called the duty in the bathhouse.

What is the duty of a monk who bathes in the bathhouse? The Blessed One has permitted monks the use of the bathhouse not for the sake of pride, not for the sake of arrogance, not for the sake of adornment, not for the sake of vanity, but solely for the sake of caring for this body. The bathhouse has five benefits: it washes away sweat and impurities; it brightens the skin and complexion; it draws out diseases present in the skin; it eliminates wind and phlegm; and it makes the bathhouse a place of freedom from illness.

There are also a further five benefits: it washes away sweat and impurities; it brightens the skin and complexion; it draws out diseases present in the skin; it eliminates wind and phlegm; and one should generate a sense of weariness in the bathhouse.

A monk who wishes to bathe in the bathhouse should first request permission from the preceptor and bear with the bathing time patiently. He should enter the interior of the bathhouse with vigilance. He should sit cross-legged and establish the perception that he is a patient in need of care. He should sit facing those who will bathe him and not act in a way that causes discomfort. He should establish mindfulness and do his work. He should also take upon himself the tasks of any monks who are working there. Without having asked his preceptor and teacher, he should not do service for his peers. And he should not appropriate the work as his own. If there is a grievance with either the preceptor or the teacher, he should not be sent around into their presence. If one wishes to pour water, mix it with cold water and pour it. If the water is hot, let him also warn his companion by saying, "It is hot."

Having bathed with vigilance, the small seat, the scrubbing stone, the fish-scraper, the bathing cloth, and all other bathing implements and vessels that are there should be thoroughly washed and placed each in its proper place. This is called the duty of bathing in the bathhouse.

What is the duty of the elder monk in the bathhouse? When an elder monk is in the bathhouse and junior monks are attending to him with the things required, he should not dismiss them. Even if something as small as a particle of dust has fallen from his body there in that bathhouse, he should not dismiss them. If it should happen that the monks there are sitting in postures that are unsightly or improper, or have fallen into conversation, the elder monk should turn them back, close the door, give them instruction, and lead them toward what is beautiful and good.

Just as the practice is conducted in that way, so those monks should be guided in it. Guiding them in Dharma talk — that is called the duty of the elder monk in the bathhouse.

What is the duty of the preceptor? The preceptor should train those who live alongside him, make things clear to them, commission them in their duties, instruct them, turn them back from wrongdoing, guide them toward virtue, remove them from the companionship of the wrongdoer, draw them close to a spiritual friend, gather them through the alms bowl, and set them to work with the robe, the strainer, the bowl, the belt, mindfulness, inquiry, transmission of scripture, and recitation — guiding them into mental application. He should raise them up from faults, attend to them when they are ill, lead them into abandonment, engage them in proper inner settling, and set them to conduct commensurate with coming to understand the distinctive qualities of the teacher. He should remove a co-resident from whatever situation in which he is dwelling in discomfort. That is called the duty of the preceptor.

The Sacred Vinaya Text, the fifty-third fascicle.

What is the duty of the co-resident? The co-resident should bring to mind clearly the thought that the preceptor is his teacher, show him reverence, rise quickly, go quickly, act with respect, and make requests. A co-resident should not perform any duty involving communal service without first asking the preceptor. He should not take his turn in caring for the temple, should not perform duties regarding the alms bowl, should not perform duties regarding the robe, should not do so every morning, every evening, or every month. He should not go to practice at the river, should not practice on a hill, should not practice in a charnel ground, should not wander through parks. He should not wash his feet, should not set out his bedding, should not heat water, should not enter a village, should not go outside the boundary, and should not draw close to an improper person. He should not treat sitting in such a person's presence as something to be appropriated for himself. He should not personally receive offerings made in such a person's presence, should not accept the alms bowl from such a person, should not accept robes, food, medicine, or any other requisite that may be given, and should not treat them as his own. Likewise he should not show reverence to such persons, should not give the alms bowl, should not give food, should not give medicine, and should not treat the giving of any requisite whatsoever as his own affair. He should not accept transmission of scripture from such a person, should not remember him for mindfulness, should not make full inquiry of him, should not ask him about mental application. Nor should he give transmission of scripture to such persons, nor be mindful of them, nor make full inquiry of them, nor instruct them in mental application. All actions whatsoever are not to be performed without first asking the preceptor — with the exception of three kinds of action: going to the toilet, disposing of a tooth-cleaning stick, and within the boundary, paying homage to a stūpa.

Now if it should happen that the preceptor's alms bowl has been washed or has been damaged by fire, the co-resident should quickly arouse enthusiasm, thinking, "By whatever means I shall myself perform the work of the preceptor's alms bowl" — or else thinking, "I shall have another do it." If it should happen that the preceptor's robe has worn out, needs washing, or has been turned inside out, the co-resident should quickly arouse enthusiasm, thinking, "I shall myself perform the work of the preceptor's robe" — or, "I shall have another do it." If it should happen that the preceptor falls ill, the co-resident should quickly arouse enthusiasm, thinking, "I myself shall nurse the preceptor through his illness" — or, "I shall have another nurse him." And if it should happen that a doubt has arisen for the preceptor — the co-resident should quickly arouse enthusiasm, thinking, "I myself shall dispel whatever doubt has arisen for the preceptor" — or, "I shall have another dispel the preceptor's doubt." If it should happen that the preceptor has come to look favourably upon wrongdoing, the co-resident should quickly arouse enthusiasm, thinking, "I myself shall turn the preceptor away from looking favourably upon wrongdoing" — or, "I shall have another turn him away." If it should happen that a formal act of censure is about to be carried out against the preceptor, or has already been carried out, the co-resident should quickly arouse enthusiasm, thinking, "I shall have the censure act against the preceptor either applied and then lifted, or lifted outright." If it should happen that a formal act of suspension is about to be carried out against the preceptor, or has already been carried out, the co-resident should quickly arouse enthusiasm, thinking, "Whether the suspension against the preceptor is being applied or has already been applied, I shall have it lifted." If it should happen that a Saṅgha penalty has been incurred by the preceptor, then if the co-resident arouses enthusiasm, thinking, "I shall have the preceptor given a probationary penalty — whether a formal one from the beginning or a penalty already imposed — and then reconciled; or I shall have him placed under probation from the beginning and then reconciled; or I shall have him, having been reconciled after undergoing probation, given rehabilitation," that is excellent. If he fails to arouse such enthusiasm, he will have committed an offence.

In this way, whatever duties there may be toward the preceptor, the co-resident should arouse enthusiasm for all of them without exception. Likewise, the preceptor too should arouse enthusiasm for whatever duties there may be toward the co-resident — except for the act of formal request.

The co-resident should prepare the preceptor's seat, set out water for washing the feet along with sandals, and place them to one side. He should wash the preceptor's feet, anoint them, and make the bed. He should set out the vessel for urine and the vessel for excrement. If a scriptural recitation needs to be prompted, he should prompt it. If a mental exercise needs to be prompted, he should prompt it. Then he should go apart, sit down, and meditate.

Rising in the morning, he should remove the vessels for urine and excrement. He should bow his head to the preceptor's feet and ask: "Venerable, did you rest comfortably? Did you sleep well? Have you been well?" If the preceptor is ill, the co-resident should arouse enthusiasm for medicine and for nursing. If he is not ill, he should let him rest in comfort.

If there is a Saṅgha meal, or if one has been invited as a guest, he should say to the preceptor: "Venerable preceptor, there is a Saṅgha meal today — please go and partake of it in comfort." If the food is alms food, he should urge the preceptor thus: "Venerable preceptor, please go for alms and receive the Dharma."

The co-resident should offer the preceptor a tooth-stick, water for rinsing, a comb, and tooth powder. When the preceptor has finished with these, the co-resident should wrap up the alms bowl and robe. If they are going for alms together with the Saṅgha, he should send the preceptor ahead and himself proceed from whatever rank has fallen to him. If they are going for the alms of a particular individual, he should offer the preceptor the outer robe, the alms bowl, and a rinsing vessel.

If it is windy, rainy, or cold, he should have the preceptor's outer robe worn beneath and his own worn on top. If the region is warm, he should have his own worn beneath and the preceptor's on top.

The co-resident should walk ahead of the preceptor and clear away mud and similar obstacles. If they are near a river or at some dangerous precipice, he should take the preceptor by the hand and steady him.

When they have come out from the lodgings to the edge of the village, the co-resident should offer the preceptor the outer robe, the alms bowl, and a rinsing vessel. Having offered them, he should send the preceptor ahead and then enter the village himself.

If there is a ladder or a staircase to ascend, the co-resident should go up first and steady the preceptor by the hand. If, in the proper manner, some acquisition is obtained there, the co-resident himself should take it. When the alms-round is complete and they have come back out beyond the edge of the village, he should take the preceptor's outer robe, alms bowl, and rinsing vessel, walk ahead of the preceptor, and set out for the monastery.

On arriving there, he should set down the alms bowl and the Dharma robe, offer water for washing the preceptor's feet together with sandals set out for him, and wash the preceptor's feet. When the appropriate time has come, he should wipe the base of the preceptor's alms bowl and offer it to him. Whatever food is good, tasty, and of the highest quality that he himself has, he should offer it to the preceptor. The preceptor too should be mindful of measure. When the business of eating is done, he should offer the preceptor water for rinsing, and wash the alms bowl with ash and flour, and then put away the alms bowl and the Dharma robe. He should bow to the preceptor and then ask: "Will the preceptor remain here, or does he intend to go on the daytime walk?"

If the preceptor is going on the daytime walk, the co-resident should take the preceptor's small seat, a mat, and a water flask, send the preceptor ahead, and then go wherever the preceptor is going for the daytime walk. On arriving, he should spread out the preceptor's seat. If a scriptural recitation is needed, he should recite it. If contemplation is needed, he should contemplate, and then go off to one side and meditate. When the appropriate time has come, he should take the small seat, the mat, and the water flask, walk ahead of the preceptor, and set out for home.

If the time for the restoration ceremony (poṣadha) has arrived and the assembly has gathered, he should unfold the preceptor's mat and spread it out; once spread, he should arrange it properly. Then, whether the time is announced by signal or by the sounding of the wooden gong, he should take the preceptor's hand with his own left hand, hold a lamp with his right, walk ahead of the preceptor, and proceed to the place of the restoration ceremony. When the individual liberation sūtra has been recited, he should go to the preceptor and ask: "Will the preceptor leave, or will he remain to hear the Dharma?" If the preceptor is leaving, he should hold the preceptor with his left hand, carry a lamp with his right, go ahead of the preceptor, and escort him back to the monastery.

If the preceptor is going to bathe in the bathhouse, the co-resident should rise early in the morning and announce: "Preceptor, today please come to bathe in the bathhouse." The co-resident should carry to the bathhouse on the preceptor's behalf a seat, a small chair, a water flask, a bathing cloth, and whatever other bathing supplies are needed, and should go to the bathhouse with the preceptor ahead of him. On arriving, he should set the Dharma robe to one side and sit neither too close nor too far from the preceptor. Whenever the preceptor perspires, the co-resident should then attend to him in due order, performing his services, and wash him. Having washed him, he should escort the preceptor ahead of him to the monastery. After that, he himself should bathe.

If, while living with a particular preceptor, the co-resident's virtuous qualities (kuśala-dharmas) are not growing, he should say to the preceptor: "Preceptor, I, the monk called such-and-such, request to be assigned to another." The preceptor, for his part, should consider that monk: how is that monk in following along behind and attending closely upon another? Does he teach him the scriptures? If he does not, will he teach them later? If he does not do that either, the matter should be investigated and examined. Having investigated and examined it in this way, if it seems fitting, the co-resident should be assigned to the other.

If it is not fitting, the novice should be assigned to another. If the preceptor himself is not fitting and lacks proper conduct, it is permissible to leave without asking permission. This is called the duty of the co-resident.

What is the duty of the instructor? The instructor should make the attendants understand, as explained before. If the attendant is dwelling in a place where he is afflicted and troubled, the instructor should summon him away from that place, and have him brought back. This is called the duty of the instructor.

What is the duty of the attendant? The attendant should attend upon the instructor with the clear perception that the instructor is the Teacher, and should render service accordingly, as explained before — up to and including the point of leaving without asking permission. This is called the duty of the attendant.

What is the duty of the novice (śrāmaṇera)? The novice should attend upon the preceptor and the instructor with the clear perception that they are the Teacher, and should render service accordingly, as explained before. If either the preceptor or the instructor has come to hold a wicked view, the novice should either dismiss that person himself or have him dismissed. If willingness to do so arises, all is well. If it does not arise, the novice will find himself together with downfall. And in such a case, just as the novice should generate willingness in the preceptor and instructor by saying, "Whatever has occurred with my father novice, please act accordingly," so too the preceptor and instructor should generate willingness in the father novice by saying, "Whatever has occurred with the preceptor and instructor, please act accordingly." Requests, however, are excepted from this. The father novice should arrange the seat for the preceptor and instructor, and so on, as explained before — up to and including washing himself last. In the same way, the father novice should remove green growth, pluck flowers, pick fruit, provide tooth-sticks, provide leaves for the base of the alms bowl, make things suitable, have them given to the monks as an offering, and attend to what is beautifying and what is conducive to care. If the virtuous qualities of the father novice are not growing in the presence of the preceptor and instructor, as explained before, it is permissible for him to leave without asking permission. This is called the duty of the father novice.

What is the duty of diligence? If harm should come to the pleasure grove (upavanaka) of the Saṅgha, a monk should consider how to prevent its loss and secure it. If by no means can it be secured, one should not speak loosely about it to others; rather, one should first inform those who have the king's permission, and after that inform the queen, the young princes, the ministers, the caravan leaders, the royal counselors, and the attendants. The duty of diligence is to ensure that the matter is resolved through verbal instruction alone, without secret acts arising in relation to it. This is called the duty of diligence.

What is the duty of the monk who follows behind? The monk who follows behind should neither walk too far from the monk ahead of him nor press too close. He should not go about with shoulders touching. Even when entering a house, he should not speak to that monk suddenly; he should speak from outside. He should carry out instructions, show respect, hold himself humbly, and become subject to awe and authority. If the elder monk speaks something contrary to the Dharma, he should refute it. If that monk speaks in accordance with the Dharma, he should rejoice. If lawfully obtained requisites come to that monk, he should accept them. This is called the duty of the monk who follows behind.

What is the duty of approaching a village? A monk who teaches by lineage should not be arrogant, should not generate pride, should not be unsteady, should not boast of victories, should not be careless, should know correctly, should be composed, should not let the mind wander, should be gladdened, should make his conduct graceful, should be thoroughly restrained, and should be thoroughly covered, should speak softly, and should not let the gaze wander beyond a yoke's width. He should be accompanied by respectfulness, should hold himself humbly, should be accompanied by a sense of awe, and should be under self-control. His mind should be humble, and his heart should be like a broom. He should not be desirous of gain and honor. This is called the duty of approaching a village.

What is the duty of going into a village? A monk who wishes to enter a village should go with vigilance, should establish mindfulness close at hand, should not let the mind wander, should restrain the sense faculties, should not let the mind stray, should have a sense of what comes before and after, and should apply attention to what is above and below. If a monk goes to a village with lapsing mindfulness, he should recognize five kinds of occasions for fault. These are: entering at an improper time without informing the resident monks; sitting down on a seat without examining it first; teaching more than five or six words of the Dharma to a woman without a man of understanding present; sitting alone in a secluded place together with just one woman, without a second person to witness; and stubbornly occupying a seat in a household where there is illness and medicine. If a monk goes to a village with lapsing mindfulness, he should further recognize five additional kinds of occasions for fault: repeatedly gazing at women; from gazing, making conversation; from conversation, becoming attached; from having become attached, not applying proper attention; and because of not applying proper attention rightly, engaging in unchaste conduct despite being without faith — and a fault arises, or he returns to the lower state having surrendered his training. If one enters into a village while maintaining mindfulness close at hand, such occasions for fault do not arise. This is called the duty of going into a village.

What is the duty of having gone into a village? A monk who has gone into a village should not speak various idle talk, should not engage in harmful speech, should speak words of Dharma, should not let the stream of discourse be interrupted. He should properly teach words of Dharma to the householders, instruct them, properly inspire them, and thoroughly delight them. He should establish them in the training rules of going for refuge. He should establish them in proper observance of the precepts, in dwelling in the holy life, in generosity, in taming the mind, in restraint, in listening to the Dharma in the company of noble persons, in proper attention, in diligent engagement with practice in accordance with the Dharma, and he should correctly and properly proclaim what is not the path to be not the path. He should purify wisdom and view. This is called the duty of having gone into a village.

What is the duty of the elder who has gone into a village? When a senior monk has gone into a village, he should give instruction to the younger monks there, and should guide them. He should ensure they do not act with arrogance, with conceit, with bodily agitation, or with playfulness. He should lead them to what brings joy, and should establish them in proper observance of conduct in accordance with the precepts. Those younger monks should listen to the words of instruction and guidance he gives. This is called the duty of the elder who has gone into a village.

What is the duty of one who dwells at the residence? A monk dwelling at the residence should have a pleasant expression and be free from frowning. Mindfulness should go first and speech should come first; he should speak pleasing words, agreeable words, and words that bring gladness, such as "Welcome — have you arrived comfortably?" When he sees monks who have arrived unexpectedly, he should come forward to greet them in a friendly manner, should gladden them with pleasant words, and should ask whether they have experienced comfort and whether they have arrived in ease. If that newcomer is an elder, one should pay homage to him, receive his alms bowl and robe, lead him inside the monastery, and have him seated on a seat.

His feet should be washed and anointed with butter. If he is thirsty, cool water should be poured for him. To the best of one's ability, one should act in accordance with whatever Dharma will bring him contentment. Bedding and seats should likewise be offered as is appropriate. For as long as he remains, one should openly regard him and hold him with the perception that he is like a father, a brother, or a son. Even when he is ill, one must not abandon him out of laziness. This is called the duty of the resident monk.

What is the duty of hosting? When a monk who has arrived unexpectedly comes to the monastery, he should not covet the bedding and furnishings of the resident monks or try to dislodge them from their places. He should sit in a visible spot, conduct himself well in his comportment, dress himself properly, and comport himself with proper restraint. This too is the duty of hosting. When the resident monks see a monk who has arrived unexpectedly, and if they recognize him, they should offer him rest. They should live together with him in the manner prescribed by the rules of communal life. If they do not recognize him, they should not simply offer him rest without more ado. They should ask the other monks: "With whom does this venerable one live? What is his conduct like?" If, upon inquiry, his conduct, his domain of practice, his moral discipline, his vows, and his observance of communal life are ascertained, then rest may be offered. One must not entrust the entire monastery to him alone. He must not be given control over the Saṅgha's treasury, storerooms, or beds. Only after one has come to know him thoroughly should one place one's confidence in him. This is called the duty of hosting.

What is the duty regarding open space? Not all open space is of the same boundary. Those who dwell there and those who dwell here cannot work together, nor can a valid act of restraint be effected. Those who dwell here and those who dwell there cannot perform acts together, nor can an act of restraint be valid. A monk must not go out into the open sky before dawn without his robe. If one has entered the rains retreat, one may not go up into the sky and remain there without having obtained authorization for seven days or for forty days. If one were to go and remain there, one would be severed from one's robe and the rains retreat would be broken. This is called the duty regarding open space.

What is the duty of a permanent dwelling? A permanent dwelling has five qualities: one is not separated from it for even a single day; one does not let ten days pass; one does not let a month pass; one may keep as many robes as needed even without having consecrated them; and one may roam about wearing an upper robe and an outer skirt. Furthermore, a permanent dwelling has another five qualities: there is no communal eating; there is no repeated eating; one does not go off without having informed the others; one may freely seek as many robes as needed; and from the last month of autumn through the first month of spring, whatever undivided gains of the Saṅgha remain set aside — accrued by monks who have entered the rains retreat — those who have established a permanent residence may not give them to others if those who have not contributed do not consent. This is called the duty of a permanent dwelling.

What is the duty regarding a water strainer? A monk must not set out and travel a road without a water strainer. If there is a flowing stream that is suitable, is unmixed with other water, or if there is a serviceable well, or if there are monasteries situated continuously at every half-league — except in those cases — this is called the duty regarding a water strainer.

What is the duty regarding a walking ground? The Blessed One (the Buddha) permitted two kinds of walking ground: one for entering into meditative concentration, and one for engaging in recitation. The walking ground for meditative concentration is eighteen cubits in length. The walking ground for recitation is twelve cubits in length. This is called the duty regarding a walking ground.

What is the duty of walking? When a monk wishes to walk, he should walk neither too quickly nor too slowly, but at a measured pace. He should walk with clear awareness and vigilance. He should maintain mindfulness close at hand. He should keep his senses inward. He should not let his mind wander outward. He should not stamp his feet. He should not sway from side to side.

One should walk in a straight line. If one is unable to walk in a straight line, a rope should be stretched taut. A ring should be threaded onto the stretched rope, and one should grasp that ring and walk. This is called the duty of walking.

What is the duty of evacuation? One should not relieve oneself in front of the Teacher, nor before a stūpa, nor before an abbot or preceptor, nor before a spiritual master, nor before those who are to be regarded as a spiritual master, nor in front of ordinary people inside a village. One should not relieve oneself openly outside. However, if one must go outside to relieve oneself, one should go to a secluded spot and do so there, and one must not cause discomfort to others by this means. This is called the duty of evacuation.

What is the duty of cleaning oneself? When a monk wishes to clean himself, he should not do so with a sharp implement, nor with a bundle of grass, nor with leaves, nor with a razor, but with something else that is soft. This is called the duty of cleaning oneself.

What is the duty of defecating? A monk should not defecate just anywhere at random. He should not do so at the foot of a wall, nor at the foot of a tree. With clear awareness and vigilance, he should defecate in a designated place. If one must defecate outside, a defecation vessel should be placed there, or a pit should be dug. This is called the duty of defecating.

What is the duty regarding the latrine? When a monk wishes to go to the latrine, in order to alert anyone who may already be sitting inside, he should snap his fingers. One who entered first should cough to signal his presence. With clear awareness one should enter. One's robe should be properly adjusted before sitting. Having carefully examined both footholds at the opening of the latrine pit, one should sit squarely in the center. When there is no need to defecate, one should not strain by forcing. When there is a need, one should not hold it back. This is called the duty regarding the latrine.

What is the duty regarding the latrine pit? When a monk wishes to defecate, he should do so slowly and deliberately, with clear awareness. He should not allow his robe to brush against and soil the rims of the latrine openings. This is called the duty regarding the latrine pit.

What is the duty of an elder monk regarding the latrine? An elder monk at the latrine should not drive away a younger monk who is sitting there. Not driving away one who is sitting at the latrine means that one should not turn back a younger person who has already entered the inner latrine. This is called the duty of an elder monk regarding the latrine.

What is the duty regarding the area around the latrine? A monk should not stand, sit, or walk in the immediate vicinity of the latrine. He should not recite scripture there, nor receive scriptural transmission there, nor memorize, nor ask questions, nor practice meditation or mental cultivation there, nor enter into conversation there. He should not perform tasks involving his alms bowl or his robes, nor clean his teeth there, nor wash his hands and feet there. Nothing whatsoever is to be done in any direction around the latrine, excepting only those things that are necessarily done in the latrine itself. This is called the duty regarding the area around the latrine.

What is the duty of urinating? A monk should not urinate just anywhere at random. He should not urinate at the foot of a wall, nor at the foot of a tree. With clear awareness and vigilance, he should urinate in a designated place. If urine spills over, a urine vessel should be placed there, or a pit should be dug. This is called the duty of urinating.

What is the duty regarding the place for urinating? When a monk wishes to enter a place for urinating, in order to alert anyone who may already be sitting inside, he should snap his fingers, just as before. He should neither strain when there is no urge, nor hold back when there is. This is called the duty regarding the place for urinating.

What is the duty regarding the urination pit? A monk should urinate at the opening of the urination pit slowly and deliberately, with clear awareness.

He should not scatter or splash at the opening of the urination pit. This is called the duty regarding the urination pit.

What is the duty of a senior monk regarding the urination place? A senior monk at the urination place should not rouse a junior monk who is sitting there urinating. As for not rousing one who is seated there — if a junior monk has entered the urination place, he should not be turned away either. This is called the duty of a senior monk regarding the urination place.

What is the duty regarding the vicinity of the urination place? A monk should not stand about in the vicinity of the urination place — and so forth, as before — up to and excluding what is called the duty regarding the vicinity of the urination place.

What is the duty of washing? A monk should not go before the Teacher without having washed, nor before a stūpa, nor before an abbot, nor before a master, nor before a preceptor, nor before one who acts as a preceptor. He should not pay respects, not recite texts, not transmit scripture, not receive anything, not perform recollection, not enquire of anyone, not enter a town, not sit down to eat food, not sit down to porridge, not sit down to gruel, not sit down to drink, not sit down to a Dharma teaching, and not sit upon the bedding and seats of the Saṅgha of the four directions — unless he is ill, in which case there is no fault. Or if what is available is sacred water, or if water is simply unavailable, or if a medicine that is unsuitable for washing has been applied — these are excepted. This is called the duty of washing.

What is the duty regarding the washing place? A monk going to the washing place should wrap his lower robe around himself and, as before, proceed to sit in the middle of the washing area — up to that point. This is called the duty regarding the washing place.

What is the duty regarding the place for positioning one's feet at the washing place? A monk wishing to bathe should, when washing, neither fill the washing place with saliva nor splash water about. This is called the duty regarding the place for positioning one's feet at the washing place.

What is the duty of a senior monk at the bathing place? A senior monk at the bathing place should not rouse a junior monk who is there. As for not rousing one who has entered the bathing place — if a junior monk has entered the bathing place, he should not be turned away either. This is called the duty of a senior monk at the bathing place.

What is the duty regarding the vicinity of the bathing place? A monk should not stand or sit about in the vicinity of the bathing place — and so forth, as before — up to and excluding what is called the duty regarding activities in the vicinity of the bathing place. This is called the duty regarding the vicinity of the bathing place.

What is the duty regarding spitting? A monk should not spit with a sound. He should not roll his tongue and press it against his teeth. He should not spit in the presence of the Teacher, nor before a stūpa, nor before an abbot or master, nor before a preceptor, nor before one who acts as a preceptor, nor while eating food, nor while drinking, nor in a place where work is being done. A monk should not spit hither and thither. Having spat, he should not leave it — rather, he should either rub it away with his foot or scrape it away with a stone. A monk should not spit outward away from himself. If he must spit outward, then, so that others may not be made uncomfortable by it, he should move to another location. This is called the duty regarding spitting.

What is the duty regarding a spittoon? The Blessed One (the Buddha) permitted monks two kinds of spittoon for the purpose of spitting: one made by a potter, and one made by oneself. A monk should inspect his spittoon at regular intervals, dry it out, set it in a secluded place, and wash it thoroughly, taking care that it not become a cause for searching about outside. This is called the duty regarding a spittoon.

What is the duty regarding a tooth-cleaning stick?

A monk should not fashion a tooth-cleaning stick that is too long, nor one that is too short, nor too thick, nor too thin. He should not use it for an extended period. He should not use it in the presence of the Teacher, nor in front of a stūpa, nor in front of an abbot or a preceptor, nor in front of a teacher, nor beside one who has become a teacher. He should not use it in a fire-room, in a storage area, in a walking-meditation area, in a latrine room, in a foot-washing area, in a residence hall, in a multi-storied building, in a gatehouse, in a toilet area, beside a wall, or beside a tree. He should not use it in the area surrounding a monastery where sweeping is done, nor should he discard a tooth-cleaning stick in any gathering-place of many people. A monk should withdraw to a secluded spot for three purposes: for defecating, for urinating, and for using the tooth-cleaning stick.

After using a tooth-cleaning stick, a monk should rinse it in the same manner with human-free water, or rub it with a lump of earth, and scrub it on the ground. This is called the duty regarding the tooth-cleaning stick.

What is the duty regarding cleaning the teeth? A monk should not clean his teeth with a sharp-ended stick. He should not insert it carelessly into his mouth. He should scrape slowly and with vigilance. He should not scrape the gums hard. This is called the duty regarding cleaning the teeth.

What is the duty regarding scraping the tongue? A monk should not scrape the tongue with a sharp-edged tongue-scraper. He should not insert it carelessly into his mouth. He should scrape slowly and with vigilance. He should not scrape the flesh of the tongue. This is called the duty regarding scraping the tongue.

What is the duty regarding cleaning the earwax? A monk should not clean earwax with a sharp-pointed implement. He should not insert it carelessly into the ear. He should clean it slowly and with vigilance. He should not scrape the flesh of the ear. This is called the duty regarding cleaning the earwax.

What is proper practice? Making use of all the requisites of a mendicant equally and appropriately is proper practice. What is improper practice? The reverse of that is improper practice.

The third aggregate, known as the aggregate of duties that serve as a model, is complete. The section serving as a model is complete.

Reverend one, what is the body of the Vinaya? What is its focus? What is its blessing? What are its characteristics? What is its narrative occasion? What is its essential nature? What is its fruit? Upāli, the body of the Vinaya is its focus. Its focus is diligence. Its blessing is body, speech, and mind. Its characteristic is action. Its narrative occasion is what has been proclaimed. Its essential nature is transgression. Its fruit is the higher realms and liberation.

The noble Vinaya text is complete. The questions of Upāli in their entirety are complete.

Homage to the Omniscient One.

This noble Vinaya text was requested by the noble Nyewa Khor, that the misunderstandings and confusions of future persons might be cleared away, and the Victor declared in response the authoritative scripture of definitive meaning, consisting of commentary on the grounds, the distinctions, and so forth.

What then are those contents? In brief summary:

One inquiry branching from a single source, groups of five and groups of sixteen, bare narrative occasions and narrative grounds, Māṇavikā and the mother,
the body and the rest, and the final Teacher, all are accepted as chapters in the proper order.

That which was first requested is accepted as establishing definitively the distinctions, the four classes of downfall, and the grounds of those arising spontaneously and so forth.
This is also proclaimed as the questions and answers.

Then come the Vinaya-establishing sections:
from the four root defeats down to the remaining downfalls up to the light transgressions, these establish all matters definitively.

Then come those that branch from one, ranging from one up to ten,
also proclaimed as "ascending from one."

Then comes the Vinaya in groups of five, so called because it teaches in sets of five.

Then comes the Vinaya in sixteen sections, so called because it teaches in sixteen sections. The section on the opening narrative has five divisions. In each of the first four, there are ten verses of the vow-formula; in the fifth there are six verses of the vow-formula. Because they rest on their respective narrative foundations, they are designated "openings" or narrative bases.

Each of the four sections on restoration likewise has ten verses each. Within these same passages, what are called "fragments" are the training bases that treat minor points of discordant categories. They are meaningful because they teach such subtle distinctions. The actual substance of the Vinaya narrative arises in the manner of an appendix, and is not subsumed under the vow-formula verses.

The term mūla, meaning "ground" and "root," also applies to the thing itself; since it is used in that way, it also becomes "the ground of the narrative." The first division of the Mānava-pīka contains ten verses; the second contains just over ten. Because it is exceedingly subtle and substantial, it bears the descriptive title "like a brahmin's daughter," a name that is apt to its content.

The Vinaya that is like a mother is to be understood as comprising three aggregates: the aggregate of full ordination, the aggregate of the supplementary, and the aggregate of the procedural. It is called "mother-like" because it resembles a mother. The body, the meditation object, the blessing, the defining characteristic, the narrative base, the essential nature, and the meaning of the result — these are the concluding topics. The questions asked by Upāli complete all of these. Since the sequence of the count of marks and the exposition of those marks is as stated, one should look at it by gathering it together in that way.

Thus it is that the subjects expounded in the sacred text constitute its very body of meaning, while the textual body that expounds them is, in some regions, described as being only around two thousand verses (*śloka*s) in length in the case of the incomplete petition-text, as commented upon by the Indian master who composed a commentary on the request-text of the noble Upāsaka Nārkaṇ. Although some regions report that the incomplete petition-text amounts to no more than two thousand *śloka*s, the Tibetan translation of the incomplete petition-text runs to three thousand six hundred *śloka*s in twelve bampos, while the complete petition-text amounts to fifteen thousand nine hundred *śloka*s in fifty-three bampos. The combined total therefore comes to nineteen thousand five hundred *śloka*s in sixty-five bampos.

This work was prepared under the supervision of the venerable Bodhisattvaṇi, a Vinaya-holder and great scholar of the Dharma-friend tradition, at the time when the great abbot Mchims was present together with his spiritual friend Rgya-'dul-ba-'dzin-pa. The twelve missing bampos of the ancillary scriptural transmission, the twelve bampas of the incomplete petition-text of the root master's tradition, and the twice-incomplete vow-formula texts were sought out from the temples of Ü and Tsang, including Samye Chimphu and others. The elder Dharmasinha then completed and established the full four sections of the scriptural transmission at the temple of La-stod 'Ol-rgod, and this was summoned to the temple of Narthang. A clean copy was made from that exemplar. Furthermore, it was compared with the Vinaya scriptural transmissions of the temples of Chumig Ringmo and Runglungshot Drog, and, after proper prior collation had been carried out, the work was completed. This is thus the four sections of the Vinaya scriptural transmission — the well-proclaimed sacred Dharma that is the very root of the Buddha's teaching.

The pure and refined exemplars of the Kangyur for that edition were then summoned from the glorious Narthang temple, the spring of all learning. Through the combined efforts of one descended in the line of Gar Tongtsen Yulzung — minister of the Dharma-king Songtsen Gampo, who was himself an emanation body of the noble Avalokiteśvara, lord of the world — and of a master of the two traditions of sacred learning, — one who was never negligent in service to the precious teaching, and who had become a true refuge and protector for countless beings — the glorious Victorious Assembly, for the sake of causing the precious teaching of the Victors, which is the source of all temporary and ultimate benefit and happiness for every single sentient being without exception, to long endure and to spread and flourish in every direction: relying upon the lordly sponsorship of the bodhisattvas who were the powerful aspiration-bearing divine kings of Tibet, together with exceptional and distinguished translators and paṇḍitas, all the sūtra and tantra translations made into Tibetan at various times earlier and later — virtuous from beginning to middle to end, free from the extremes of addition and subtraction, and unsullied by the stain of corrupt textual traditions — were, during the reign of the human sovereign Toghon Temür, at the time when the Tishi Kunga Gyeltsen Palsangpo was protecting the teaching, as the seven-hundred-and-fifth-century period of the Victor's teaching drew near its close and the teacher and guide of beings, the guru of wanderers, had shown the manner of passing peacefully into nirvāṇa: in the female Fire-Pig year, three thousand four hundred and eighty years having elapsed since then, begun in the auspicious new-year month on a day of favorable date and stellar conjunction. The Victor's son, the knowledge-holder

Changchub Palden, inspired by firm and unwavering faith grounded in understanding of the teaching, accomplished the concordant conditions by providing materials both excellent in quality and ample in quantity and entirely blameless, and properly established a great temple at the magnificent Gungthang monastic complex — the palace shrine of the emanation-king Sechen Gankyi — equal in its being a source of the teaching to the glorious Nālandā. The monk Kūnga Bum, a senior cleric of great standing who had turned his mind somewhat toward the way of the Tripiṭaka, undertook the initial preparation and the task of collation and correction. Moreover, numerous scholars — excellent monks of great faith and diligence, with brilliant intellects, widely learned and holders of the Tripiṭaka — purified those texts left in their original refined languages such as Sanskrit, relying upon the great individual commentaries composed by the great translators of old and upon the Sgra sbyor bam po gnyis pa and similar works. As for the Tibetan texts, they were purified without error in meaning and expression, unmixed with regional dialects and corrupt contemporary speech, following instead the ancient terminological conventions of the old Tibetan master translators of former times, the old and new terminology of the excellent translators who came at various periods, and the newly fixed orthographic standards — including the presence or absence of the final particles da drag, ma nya, sa, and the like — just as the scholars had established them. These were then written beautifully and in clean, even script on the smooth, firm, white pages of the royal southern palace — gleaming like a conch-shell ground — using ink imported from great China, dark and lustrous as a blue lotus, by scribes expert in the three scripts of raised, running, and upright, who had attained the rank of master in the scriptural art of calligraphy: the scribe Dpon Palsang Rinchen, Sangyé Drak, and other skilled and accomplished calligraphers from Ü and Tsang in central Tibet. These texts, after being written well, were collated and corrected three times over. They were completed in the auspicious new-year month of the female Earth-Ox year, at a time corresponding to the sixth five-hundred-year period of the era of fruition and practice, and to four hundred and eighty-two years having elapsed in the era of scripture and Abhidharma, with eighteen years of the Abhidharma period remaining, and three five-hundred-year periods for the eras of sūtra, Vinaya, and the mere holding of signs — making one thousand five hundred and eighteen years remaining of the teaching. Thus the Kangyur was excellently completed. Of those texts, these are the four sections of the scriptural transmission. Although in the greater part of the Vinaya scriptural transmission the individual liberation codes of monks and nuns, along with certain texts still awaiting collation, have not yet been prepared, nonetheless the two individual liberation texts together with their two analyses constitute the root,

The two analyses are commentaries on the two forms of individual liberation. The texts still awaiting collation, being those most in need of further editorial work, were established as the opening sections of each separate analysis within the scriptural transmission, and the incomplete portions of the Fundamental Treatise were likewise set down as opening sections. The order of the four sections of the scriptural transmission is as follows: first the Root Texts; then the Analyses; then the Fundamental Treatise, which settles through question and answer the difficult passages within those; and finally the Supplements, which fill in whatever is incomplete in those. Although that is the order according to subject matter, scholars have written the Root Texts and the Analyses first, then the Supplements, and then the Fundamental Treatise itself. The title catalogues composed by Kachok and others also present them in exactly that same order, and so here too the Fundamental Treatise has been written at the end. The number of fascicles in these texts, reckoned at three hundred ślokas per fascicle, is as follows: the Root Scriptural Text has one hundred and nine fascicles; the Analysis of the Monks has eighty-three fascicles and one third of a fascicle; the Analysis of the Nuns has twenty-eight fascicles; the Supplements have fifty-nine fascicles; the incomplete portions of the Fundamental Treatise have twelve fascicles; and the Fundamental Treatise in its completed portions has fifty-three fascicles — so that the total for the Fundamental Treatise comes to sixty-five fascicles. Thus, for the four scriptural sections taken together and complete, there are three hundred and forty-four fascicles and one third of a fascicle. The manner in which the previously incomplete texts were completed has already been written down at the end of the Supplements and the incomplete portions, and so one should look there for that account.

Ye dharmā hetuprabhavā hetuṃ teṣāṃ tathāgato hy avadat, teṣāṃ ca yo nirodha evaṃ vādī mahāśramaṇaḥ.

The Hundred-Thousand-Verse Section begins here.

Translator's Notes

- The opening verse is a mnemonic summary (uddāna) of the topics treated in the section that follows. Its terms are technical shorthand from the Vinaya commentarial tradition: "three of animal kind" refers to the three cases involving animal transformation; "three pathways" to the three bodily orifices; "what is entered and re-entered," "two modes," "what is taken hold of," "what is thrust in again," "the teeth," "what is not touched," and "like a sow" each flag a subsequent case-ruling. These mnemonic verses are intentionally compressed and do not parse as ordinary syntax.

The term rendered "defeat" throughout is the Tibetan mtha' 'gyur, literally "it becomes the end," which is the standard Vinaya idiom for a pārājika, a root downfall entailing expulsion from the monastic community. "Grave offense" renders nyes pa sbom po, a thullullaba or serious (but non-expelling) transgression.

The passage is from the Vinayottaragrantha, a canonical Vinaya text, and the interlocutor is the elder Upāli, the foremost among monks in knowledge of Vinaya. The rulings given here concern the boundaries of the first pārājika rule (the prohibition on sexual intercourse) and its application to extraordinary circumstances. The text is clinical and case-legal in character, which the translation preserves.

The final question — whether a single monk entering union alone for the purpose of unchaste conduct incurs a defeat — is left unanswered in this passage, as the Tibetan ends mid-dialogue.

- The "group of eighty" refers to a category within the pārājika analysis related to counting or classification of individuals in the Vinaya context. The precise technical meaning of "the eleven dice pieces" in the verse is not entirely transparent from this passage alone; it likely refers to an enumeration scheme in the surrounding Vinaya commentary. The verse is a mnemonic summary and its terms are technical shorthand whose full referents would be clarified in the surrounding commentary.

The final ruling — that stealing an object of no value constitutes a defeat — appears counterintuitive and may reflect a specific Vinaya position that the act itself (the intention and action of taking) rather than the monetary threshold determines the gravity; this is a genuine doctrinal point worth flagging for listeners.

- The passage distinguishes two senses of "object of no value": one that is intrinsically precious but cannot be given a price (perhaps unique or sacred objects), and one that is simply too small to be priced. The translation follows the Tibetan structure, which presents these as two separate definitions answering the same question, with different legal outcomes.

The dice-throwing section refers to the practice of smuggling goods past toll-checkpoints by throwing them over or around the barrier. The phrase "throws dice in the open sky" likely refers to tossing goods over a toll boundary rather than literal dice-playing; the term for toll-station checkpoint rendered here as "toll-station" is the literal Tibetan for a customs or boundary-check post. The supernatural-power exception reflects Vinaya reasoning that an act accomplished by miraculous means bypasses the ordinary conditions that constitute an offense.

- The verse summarizing the robe-rack case is a mnemonic stanza embedded in the Vinaya discussion. The line rendered "other continents do not apply to non-humans" reflects a standard Vinaya distinction that the pārājika for theft does not apply in the same way on other continents or with respect to non-human beings — a technical point preserved from the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition.

The currency units māṣa, nāṣaka, kākinī, and kārṣāpaṇa are ancient Indian monetary denominations preserved in the Vinaya as legal thresholds for the theft pārājika. Their exact historical values varied by region and period; the text itself supplies the relative equivalences: four kākinīs equal one māṣaka, and twenty māṣas equal one nāṣaka.

The phrase "Dharma-theft" refers to misappropriating Dharma teachings — for instance, claiming authorship of teachings one has merely heard — and is treated as categorically distinct from ordinary theft, hence excluded from those forms that incur a pārājika defeat.

- The verse summary in the middle of this passage is a mnemonic gāthā listing the categories of theft just discussed: stūpa, relics, scripture, Saṅgha-dedicated property, individual-to-individual passing, the two perceptions, and so on. The final phrase of the verse, rendered "the last is a household not yet found," is somewhat elliptical; it may indicate that the case of a monk alone entering a household and stealing is the final category about to be treated — serving as a transition into the next question. The rendering follows the most contextually plausible reading.

The phrase rendered "two perceptions" in the verse refers to the paired perception-cases just enumerated: perceiving a human as non-human, a non-human as human, and so forth.

- The verse summary enumerating cases ("Three animal rebirths, and existence through karma...") is a mnemonic condensation of the preceding casuistry; its terms are deliberately compressed and some correspondences require cross-referencing with the fuller Vinaya discussion. The rendering follows the most defensible structural reading.

The exchange about "father" as karmic existence and "mother" as craving reflects a well-known Mahāyāna Vinaya hermeneutic (paralleled in the Mahāparinirvāṇa-sūtra and Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya commentaries) whereby the killing of these in a spiritual sense — destroying defiled karmic existence and craving — is said not to entail a pārājika or ānantarika offense in the ordinary sense. The passage appears to be presenting this interpretive layer within a Vinaya legal frame.

- The verse summary near the end is a mnemonic gāthā cataloguing case-types treated in this Vinaya section; its terms are deliberately compressed headings rather than full sentences, and the translation renders them accordingly as a list-in-verse form.

The names in the final case — rendered here as Vipāśyin, Śikhin, Viśvabhū, Krakucchanda, Kanakamuni, and Kāśyapa — are the standard list of the six Buddhas preceding Śākyamuni. The Tibetan abbreviated forms correspond to these standard Sanskrit names.

The phrase rendered "announces a prophetic declaration regarding the former abodes" translates a reference to falsely claiming supernormal recollection of past lives associated with those ancient Buddhas, which constitutes a false claim of superhuman attainment and therefore incurs the pārājika defeat.

- The verse summary near the end is highly compressed and schematic, listing categories of cases discussed in the surrounding prose. The rendering follows the internal logic of the passage — each term in the verse corresponds to a type of case treated above — but the verse itself is formulaic and somewhat elliptical, as is typical of these Vinaya mnemonic summaries.

The phrase rendered "the final offense" translates a term indicating the gravest category of transgression (defeat, pārājika), while "grave offense" renders a distinct lesser category. The passage as a whole operates within Vinaya casuistry on the rule against falsely claiming superhuman attainments, systematically distinguishing which formulations constitute the gravest offense and which constitute a lesser but still serious one.

- The phrase rendered "noble language" throughout refers to Sanskrit or a prestige liturgical register, contrasted with "border dialect," which refers to vernacular or regional speech. The distinction is between an ārya-type speaker and a speaker of a peripheral dialect, and turns on whether the recipient actually comprehends what is said — this affects culpability.

The mountain names Gro-ba, Ri-dgu-pa, Vulture Peak (Grdhrakūṭa), and Öma are Tibetan renderings of specific Indian locations associated with the Buddha's teaching activity. Vulture Peak is identified with Rājagṛha. The others are less certainly identified and are here left in approximate transliteration rather than reconstructed Sanskrit, since the Sanskrit equivalents are uncertain.

The verse summarizing exemptions follows a formulaic Vinaya pattern listing conditions under which the full offense does not apply, and the phrase rendered "the last category" renders a technical Vinaya term indicating that these cases result only in the lesser grave offense, not the root defeat.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage lists mnemonic terms for case-types covered in this section of the Vinaya question-and-answer dialogue. The items enumerated — "not asleep, as when asleep, stirring, those without striving, the seventh," and the final verse's "body, doubt, tooth, wound, hair, nail, the fourth, the second, the seventh" — are compressed mnemonics that index specific case-categories discussed in the surrounding text. They resist full transparent rendering in English; the translation preserves their list-form while conveying their function as summaries.

The phrase rendered "change of sex" translates རྒྱུ་འགྱུར་, literally "the characteristic shifted/transferred," a technical Vinaya term for the phenomenon of sexual transformation, recognized as a distinct legal category in the monastic code.

- The verse summary presents condensed technical categories that are difficult to render with full precision in verse form. The term rendered "perceiving otherwise" covers the preceding matrix of mistaken perceptions. "A soft one" renders a term for something perceived as soft or pleasant to the touch, a category that in the commentarial tradition covers contact with inert but yielding objects. "Hermaphrodite" renders the term for a person of indeterminate or dual sex characteristics. "Father" and "mother's brother's wife" are interpretations of what the text presents as distinct person-categories in this enumeration; the precise referents of this verse may vary across Vinaya commentaries. The phrase "it is a remainder for the Saṅgha" renders the technical term indicating a saṃghāvaśeṣa offense, the second category of grave offense in the Vinaya, lighter than a root defeat.

- The term rendered "paṇḍaka" (Tib. ma ning) denotes a category of person with ambiguous or non-normative sexual characteristics; the Tibetan distinguishes "ma ning pho" (male paṇḍaka) and further subdivides them as virtuous and wicked, following standard Vinaya taxonomies.

The phrase "Saṅgha remainder offense" renders "dge 'dun gyi lhag ma," the standard Tibetan equivalent of Skt. saṃghāvaśeṣa, a grave offense requiring formal Saṅgha procedure for rehabilitation, as opposed to a root downfall (pārājika) which entails permanent expulsion.

The verse summary (beginning "In summary, by means of voice...") is condensed and somewhat elliptical in the original; the rendering follows the most doctrinally coherent reading within the Vinaya context.

- The verse summary "The fourth, combined with two, and different perceptions" is a mnemonic condensation of Vinaya case-analysis and its exact referents (which rule is "the fourth," which "two" are combined) depend on the surrounding Vinaya context. The phrase "for the sake of another" as the exception to the Saṅgha remainder offense likely refers to cases where the words are spoken on behalf of a third party rather than as a direct personal solicitation; this is a technical Vinaya distinction that the commentary tradition elaborates.

- The verse summary near the beginning is a mnemonic colophon-like stanza indexing the content of this section of the Vinaya. Its terse numerical references are difficult to parse without access to the surrounding structural context of the full text, so the translation renders it literally. The precise referents of "two dharmas with a fourth making six aspects," "two faculties to be procured," and so forth cannot be resolved from this passage alone.

The distinction between སྤྱོད་ཀྱི་ཡིད་ and སྤྱོད་ཀྱི་ཡིད་མེད་ is rendered "of sound mind" and "not of sound mind" respectively, following the context of a section that has just discussed madmen. These terms more literally mean "in control of oneself" and "not in control of oneself."

- The verse in the middle of this passage is difficult and may be a technical mnemonic summarizing categories relevant to the go-between offense. The phrase rendered "comparable to two of these marks" is compressed and somewhat opaque; it likely refers to the two marks or indicators (of male and female) used in Vinaya analysis to classify partners in the go-between rule. The terms "eunuch" (ma ning) and "hermaphrodite" or "female eunuch" (ma ning mo) reflect Vinaya categories of persons with ambiguous or absent sexual characteristics; the distinctions matter for determining offenses.

The repeated permutations concerning "fully ordained" and "not fully ordained" in the message-bearing section closely parallel earlier case matrices in this Vinaya passage; the translation follows the grammar of each case as distinct, though two consecutive cases appear textually very similar and may reflect scribal repetition or a fine legal distinction between agent (the one taking the message) and recipient (to whom it is delivered).

- The verse summary in the middle is a mnemonic condensing the preceding cases: "without permission," "the measure," "oneself and another," "uncovered," "fallen back after beginning," and "the characteristic being last" — referring to the gender-change scenarios. The verse is deliberately telegraphic.

The phrase rendered "remainder offense" throughout reflects the standard Tibetan Vinaya term for the saṃghāvaśeṣa class of offense, which requires the assembled Saṅgha to deal with the remaining matter — distinct from the pārājika root downfall and from the simple duṣkṛta misdeed. "Serious offense" renders the same term where the Tibetan phrasing indicates a different, heavier offense class distinct from saṃghāvaśeṣa; the two Tibetan terms are kept distinct throughout.

The gender-change scenarios in this passage reflect the classical Vinaya discussion of sexual transformation (Skt. ubhatobyañjanaka or related categories) and their effect on monastic status and culpability during the act of go-between messaging — a genuine doctrinal concern in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition.

- The verse summary employs a terse mnemonic style typical of Vinaya compendiums; the rendering follows the Tibetan closely, though the exact referent of "seven ways" in the verse is implicit from context and not spelled out in this passage. The distinction between "noble language" (the language of the central region, i.e. Sanskrit or Māgadhī) and "border dialect" reflects standard Vinaya sociolinguistic categorization of śīlasampanna geography. The term rendered "female trainee" (śikṣamāṇā) corresponds to རྒྱུ་མཁའ་ལྷན་པ་, a woman in the two-year probationary training between novice and full ordination.

- The term rendered "Saṅgha remainder" translates saṃghāvaśeṣa (Tib. dge 'dun gyi lhag ma), the second class of offense in the Vinaya, less grave than a root defeat but requiring formal Saṅgha procedure for rehabilitation. This is the standard technical Vinaya rendering and is used consistently throughout.

The verse summarizes the rules about borderland and intermediate cases, accusation by letter and by formal grounds, and elaboration of charges. The Tibetan is terse and formulaic; the rendering reflects the standard enumerative style of Vinaya verse summaries.

"Paṇḍaka" (Tib. ma ning) is a category recognized in Vinaya literature referring to persons of ambiguous or indeterminate sex; the term is left in transliterated Sanskrit as there is no neutral single English equivalent in this specialist context.

The repeated question about fully ordained persons perceiving them as fully ordained appears twice in close succession in the Tibetan source itself; this appears to be a textual redundancy in the original, not a translation error.

- The phrase rendered "a Dharma that is supreme over the human" corresponds to the Vinaya offense of falsely claiming superhuman attainments, one of the four root defeats; the Tibetan follows the standard formula for this pārājika.

The five actions without interval (ānantarya) are the most heinous acts in Buddhist ethics: killing one's mother, killing one's father, killing an arhat, drawing blood from a Tathāgata with malicious intent, and causing a schism in the Saṅgha. The passage discusses how falsely accusing someone of these is classified.

The closing verse is a mnemonic summary verse typical of Vinaya compilations; its compressed syntax makes some terms ambiguous in isolation. The rendering follows the most plausible contextual reading, treating each item as a parallel case for the principle of groundless accusation.

The final exchange about a motion-and-quorum-of-four act performed without prior instruction, and whether it "takes effect," uses technical Vinaya procedural language; "incurs a transgression along with the past" renders the Tibetan idiom indicating the act is invalid and the Saṅgha bears residual fault.

- The passage contains a repeated exchange that appears verbatim twice in the Tibetan regarding a monk who has raised the matter, taken note of it, and remains in verbal discomfort. This is likely a scribal dittography in the source text, but both instances have been faithfully rendered as they stand.

The term translated as "stations of abiding" renders a Tibetan expression for the four designated areas or zones associated with a boundary, a technical Vinaya concept whose precise referent varies by tradition. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end with a list of seating furnishings, reflecting an incomplete passage in the source.

- The verse summary that begins "In brief: the last offence, the royal caste..." is a mnemonic gāthā summarizing the topics covered. The terms "ཏཱ་ལའི་ལྷན་པོ་" literally mean "last" and here serve as a technical shorthand for the "last" or most serious offences (pārājikas), a standard Vinaya usage. The phrase "མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་མཐོང་" rendered as "what is not manifest" is a Vinaya technical term referring to offences or actions not openly visible; its precise reference here is determined by the surrounding commentary context.

- The Vinaya term rendered "Saṅgha-remainder" follows the standard rendering for saṃghāvaśeṣa, the second class of offenses (after pārājika defeats) in the Prātimokṣa, numbering thirteen for monks. The passage is detailing procedural distinctions based on which specific orifice is named in the accusation, with the legal consequence depending on whether the witness's testimony matches or diverges from the original claim. The phrase translated "let the monk be confronted" renders a technical Vinaya procedure term indicating formal challenge or arraignment before the assembly.

- The verse summary near the end is a mnemonic gāthā encoding categories of the preceding legal discussion. "Loss of the very thing itself, burning, mental agitation, not consecrated, improper, and past the time — these are the marks, the fourth, and the transmission of three" is a compressed technical enumeration; the precise referents of "the fourth" and "the transmission of three" depend on the broader commentary context and cannot be fully resolved from this passage alone.

The term rendered "fermented grain-mash" for ལྲོ་ལྲོ་ལྲོ་ is a traditional sour fermented beverage; the specific identity of ལྲོ་ལྲོ་ལྲོ་ལྲོ་ལྲོ་ ("medicinal water from boiled herbs") is uncertain at the level of the exact plant or preparation, though the legal contrast is clear: an intoxicating drink versus a permitted medicinal liquid.

The phrase "loses one year" in the robe-counting passage refers to the Vinaya rule that a robe held beyond the permitted period accumulates a forfeiture count; each night outside the boundary without the robe counts against the permissible robe-holding term.

- The verse near the end is terse and its precise referent in the larger Vinaya context is compressed; the four items listed appear to be conditions under which the standard robe rules apply, summarizing what has preceded. The phrase "four nights" in the verse renders a Tibetan that could also mean "four-continued nights" or "four successive nights," but in context it likely refers to the robe persisting across the boundary conditions enumerated.

The passage about the monk becoming a nun and vice versa refers to ordination-status change affecting whose robe regulations apply, a known Vinaya casuistic scenario.

- The phrase "placing it in the sky" is a recognized canonical formula for the robe being placed outdoors or above ground level, contrasted with the robe being laid on the ground; it is a standard Vinaya idiom and not a literal impossibility, likely indicating placement on an elevated surface such as a roof. The passage on "the night shifts and he becomes a nun" (and vice versa) refers to a scenario in which a person undergoes a change of sex between sunset and dawn, a case discussed in Vinaya literature regarding liminal identity and robe obligations. The brief summary verse indicated at the end was not included in the Tibetan supplied; the passage ends with "In brief:" without the verse following, so no verse has been rendered.

- The verse at the opening is a mnemonic summary verse listing the topics covered in the preceding and present section: distracted mind, time elapsed, permissible cases, impermissible cases, the established formal decision, the four complete cases, and the night. Such summary verses are standard in Vinaya literature and serve as memory aids rather than independent doctrinal statements.

The phrase rendered "a change of status" refers to a change in ordination gender, i.e., a monk becoming a nun or a nun becoming a monk — a recognized possibility in classical Vinaya literature when a physical transformation occurs.

- The term rendered "pandaka" (ma ning ma) refers to a person of indeterminate or third gender in Vinaya literature; it is kept untranslated as a technical category. The phrase "change of gender" (mtshan 'phos) means a literal change of biological sex, a recognized though rare category in Vinaya jurisprudence. The verse summary in the middle of the passage is a mnemonic condensing the case categories enumerated in the surrounding prose; the individual items in the verse correspond to the sub-topics treated in the detailed question-and-answer exchanges.

- The fourfold permutation concerning ordination status during the washing of the robe is slightly repetitive in the Tibetan, with one permutation appearing to be duplicated. This likely reflects a scribal or textual issue in the source; the translation renders each case as it appears without harmonizing them.

The verse summarizing exceptional cases uses the term rendered "hermaphrodites" for the Tibetan "ma ning," which in Vinaya contexts refers to persons of indeterminate or ambiguous sex. The term "one who has surrendered the training" refers to a monk who has formally renounced his vows.

- The verse summary enumerating the categories of ineligible persons is terse and elliptical in the Tibetan, following the compressed style typical of Vinaya mnemonic verses. The phrase rendered "the fourth and second of the kinds" and "the seventh" refers to numbered categories within the broader enumerative system of the surrounding Vinaya discussion; the exact referents depend on a specific numeration scheme from the broader text not reproduced here.

The distinctions between "not fully ordained," "fully ordained in training," and "fully ordained" reflect three stages of ordination status: the novice or unordained person, one who has received partial ordination or is in a probationary status, and one who has received full ordination. The Tibetan terms used are precise technical Vinaya designations and the distinctions in the matrix of permutations are rendered accordingly.

- The closing sentence is incomplete in the source text, ending mid-question before the answer is given; the translation reflects this break faithfully.

The verse summary in the middle of the passage lists categories of persons or circumstances that affect the ruling on robe-receipt; the identities of "the fourth of the improper ones," "the second," and "the seventh" are technical Vinaya references to enumerated lists that would be clear to a trained Vinaya specialist but are left as rendered, since inserting glosses in the verse body would interrupt the narration. This may warrant a separate doctrinal note in an annotated edition.

The term rendered "probationer" is the female ordinand in the two-year training period between novice and full ordination (Skt. śikṣamāṇā), consistent with the term dge slob ma used throughout.

- The verse at the close is a mnemonic summary listing the categories of persons exempt from or treated differently under this rule: those who are insane, mentally disturbed, ill, asleep, delirious, intoxicated, in meditative absorption, traveling, and non-Buddhists. This is a standard form of Vinaya verse summary.

The term rendered "hermaphrodite" for མཉམ་པ་མཉམ་པ་ and མཉམ་པ་མཉམ་པ་ reflects the Vinaya technical categories of sexually indeterminate persons; the distinction between the two forms likely marks a grammatical gender difference in the Tibetan rendering of what may originally be two distinct Sanskrit categories, though their precise differentiation in this context is not consequential to the legal ruling stated.

- The verse summary in the middle of the passage names several case-types by brief allusion — "the non-kinsman rule and the fourth," "the seventh," "the hermaphrodite" — which are shorthand cross-references to numbered training rules elsewhere in the Vinaya sequence. They are rendered as closely as the Tibetan allows; their precise referents depend on the surrounding Vinaya chapter structure and are not consequentially uncertain for the listener, only for a scholar.

The term rendered "hermaphrodite" or "pandaka" (Tibetan: ma ning) covers a range of meanings in Vinaya literature including persons of indeterminate or non-binary sex/gender. The rendering "hermaphrodite" follows traditional scholarly convention; "pandaka" would be the more technically precise Sanskrit.

- The verse summary midway through the passage is a mnemonic condensing the preceding case-by-case analysis. The terms "the fourth" and "the seventh" in the closing verse likely refer to specific numbered categories within the Vinaya's classificatory scheme for persons from whom robes may or may not be accepted; without the full surrounding numbered list, their precise referents are not entirely transparent, though the general sense is preserved.

The term rendered "neuter" for མཉམ་པ་ (and "female neuter" for མཉམ་པ་མཉམ་པ་) follows Vinaya commentarial convention for persons of indeterminate or absent gender characteristics, distinct from hermaphrodite (མཉམ་པ་མཉམ་པ་); the precise clinical or social meanings vary across traditions.

The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source text breaks off at that point.

- The final sentence — "those who perceive what is naturally black as naturally black are to be treated as four" — is elliptical in the Tibetan and appears to be the opening of a matrix of perception-combinations (a standard Vinaya fourfold grid) analogous to the human/non-human matrix given earlier in the passage. The text breaks off at this point, so the full fourfold analysis is not presented here. This is not translator uncertainty but a structural feature of the source.

The term rendered as "offense requiring confession" throughout corresponds to a lesser category of Vinaya transgression (Tibetan: རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་), and "relinquishment" (Tibetan: རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་) corresponds to the higher category requiring forfeiture and confession (Sanskrit: naihsargika-pāyattika). These distinctions are preserved consistently.

- The verse summary enumerating "the seventh of the Sugata" refers to a standard enumeration of cases related to this training rule, with the Sugata's seventh item being the final entry in a fixed list. The exact referent would be clarified by the surrounding commentarial context.

The phrase rendered "mixing partner" translates a term indicating a companion or co-participant in the mixing of wools; the underlying Tibetan is "spun" which in this Vinaya context refers to the companion animal-fiber or co-ingredient in the mixture.

- The phrase rendered "change of marks occurs" translates རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་, a technical Vinaya term referring to a physical sex change that results in a change of ordination status. This is a standard scenario in the Vinaya analysis of edge cases and is rendered here with minimal gloss to preserve the technical register.

The final incomplete sentence at the end of the passage is broken mid-question, exactly as the Tibetan is, as this is clearly a textual continuation marker rather than a complete thought.

- The phrase rendered as "his characteristic changes and he becomes a nun" translates རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་, referring to a change of biological sex characteristic (མཚན་, lit. "mark/sign"), a topic addressed in Vinaya literature concerning the juridical status of individuals whose sex changes during an ongoing offense. The asymmetry in outcomes — offense for the male-to-female case, transgression requiring relinquishment for the female-to-male case — follows Vinaya logic that the more serious penalty (relinquishment) attaches when the individual ends as a fully ordained monk committing an act classified as such for monks.

The "other three" in the verse summary (རྒྱུ་མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་གི་གསུམ་གྱི་མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་) refers contextually to the three items listed in the prose that follow the mantra case: sheering for another's benefit, sending it to another, and the cases of the invisible shearer — these are the standard abbreviated verse references to the casuistry just detailed.

- The phrase "changes status and becomes a nun" in the monk's case is noteworthy: the Tibetan literally says the monk changes gender-status and becomes a nun, which is a standard Vinaya scenario regarding sex-change. The repetition in the nun's case is likely parallel phrasing covering the case of a nun whose status changes to another nun (perhaps through re-ordination or a similar circumstance). This is a standard Vinaya classificatory device and the translation follows the Tibetan closely.

The final sentence is left as an open clause because the Tibetan passage ends mid-sentence at that point, indicating the passage cuts off before the question-and-answer response is given.

- The verse summary near the end is a mnemonic gāthā listing the various means or intermediary persons through which a transgression's severity is modified. The Tibetan term rendered "deaf-mute" (མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་) is ambiguous and could mean simply "deaf" rather than "deaf-mute"; the compound with "mute" (མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་) in the same list suggests they are distinct categories, so "deaf" and "mute" are kept separate, and "མཚན་མཁའ་ཁྲུག་" is rendered "dumb" in the sense of unable to speak. The ordination-status matrix (not yet ordained, in the process of ordination, fully ordained) follows the standard Vinaya analysis of how the identity of the agent at the moment of the act versus at the moment of inquiry affects the classification of the offense.

- The verse fragment listing recipients — "a close relative, a maternal kinsman, the fourth and the seventh, the eighth, and householders" — refers to a technical Vinaya enumeration of categories of persons from whom a monk may or may not receive gold and silver under specific conditions. The exact referents of "the fourth," "the seventh," and "the eighth" depend on a broader numbered list not fully present in this passage; this is a standard feature of Vinaya summary verses and no uncertainty flag is placed in the body.

The term rendered "fraction" for ṣaṣṭi is the Sanskrit māṣa, a small unit of weight or value. In Vinaya contexts it refers to a coin or weight of minimal value, and "taking even a fraction" is the standard doctrinal formulation for the offense applying even to the smallest amount. This is noted for doctrinal precision.

- The summary verse enumerates case-categories for the trading and barter rules; several items are terse mnemonics. "The marks, the fourth, the seventh" in the first summary verse refer to specific sub-cases within the trading rule enumeration as organized by the commentarial tradition. "Nearly fully ordained" renders the technical phrase for someone who has gone through the preparatory procedure but not yet formally received full ordination. "Like exchanges with like" renders the exception for equivalent barter, which in Vinaya commentary is treated as a non-transgressive exchange. "What has not been burned" and "what is white" in the final verse are mnemonic tags for almsbowl sub-cases to follow; their precise referents will be clarified in the subsequent passage.

- The phrase "change of marks" translates the Tibetan term for a spontaneous sex change as understood in the Vinaya tradition, wherein a person's physical sex changes and they accordingly change monastic status. This is a recognized category in classical Vinaya literature.

The phrase "without having been consecrated" renders the Tibetan meaning that the bowl has not been formally designated or blessed for use — a required ritual act in Vinaya procedure before a bowl is considered properly in one's possession.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, as this is a continuous Vinaya dialogue; the translation reflects that open ending faithfully.

- The verse summary near the end recapitulates the case-types covered in this and the preceding passage, condensing them into mnemonic form. The rendering follows the enumerative logic of the Vinaya scholastic style. The phrase rendered "those in common, and the fourth" in the earlier verse summary is elliptical; "the fourth" likely refers to the fourth gender category in Vinaya taxonomy, and "those in common" to shared or communal vessels, though precise referents are determined by the surrounding casuistry rather than stated explicitly in the verse itself. The final verse summary also recapitulates earlier case-types rather than introducing new ones, serving as a closing mnemonic. The term rendered "one of double characteristics" refers to the Vinaya category of a person displaying characteristics of more than one sex.

- The verse in the middle of this passage lists categories of weavers or persons for whom having a robe woven constitutes varying degrees of offense. The terms "neuter" and "hermaphrodite" render the Tibetan categories of sexually ambiguous or intermediate beings as classified in Vinaya literature; "common sex mark" renders the category of one whose biological characteristics are shared or indeterminate. These are standard Vinaya classifications.

The three phases distinguished throughout — "has not received full ordination," "is in the process of receiving full ordination," and "has fully received full ordination" — are technical Vinaya distinctions referring to stages of the ordination ceremony itself, particularly relevant to the moment of completion of the formal act.

- The verse summary "In brief: By messenger, by letter..." and the second verse "In brief: The same applies to laypeople..." are mnemonic gathas summarizing the preceding and following casuistic cases; they are rendered as verse accordingly.

The phrase rendered "deaf-mute" for "□□□□" could refer more specifically to one who is deaf, or deaf and dumb together; in Vinaya contexts it typically denotes one with impaired hearing and speech, so "deaf-mute" is the traditional rendering.

The reference to "the fourth and the seventh" in the verse is an internal enumeration pointing to specific items in the list being summarized; without the full numbered list visible in context, these remain opaque references and are translated literally.

- The passage presents a complex set of casuistic distinctions regarding the seizure of robes, distinguishing between "minor offense" and "offense requiring forfeiture" based on the status of recipient, the intermediary (direct seizure versus causing a layperson to seize), and perceptual error regarding ordination status. The phrase rendered "one who dwells separately" refers to a monk living in a separate residence under a form of ecclesiastical separation, and "one who is not resident" refers to one not currently domiciled in the community. The repeated formula concerning intention versus outcome in the final section involves subtleties in the Vinaya logic of perception and result that the text renders in a near-formulaic matrix; the translation preserves this repetitive structure faithfully as it appears in the original. The term rendered "offense requiring forfeiture" is the standard Vinaya category of pārājika-adjacent sanctions involving confiscation; in the Tibetan Vinaya tradition this is the category spang ba'i ltung ba, distinct from simple ltung ba (downfall) and dum bu'i ltung ba (minor offense).
- The verse summarizing the four "unfit cases" and the seventh factor (time and the nun) is terse and formulaic, functioning as a mnemonic. The rendering approximates the structure; precise identification of all four "unfit cases" referred to would require cross-reference with the surrounding Vinaya context.

The phrase rendered "the ordination status having changed, he becomes a nun" reflects a textual scenario involving gender transition or ordination reclassification that appears in Vinaya casuistry. The Tibetan is grammatically clear but the underlying legal situation is unusual.

- The verse summary near the middle is a mnemonic listing categories of cases; "sky-mark" renders □□□□□□□□, which is a technical shorthand likely referring to the "sky" as a mark indicating a temporal boundary or a specific case-category within the robe rules. Its precise referent in this mnemonic is not fully transparent from the verse alone, and a fuller commentary would be needed to gloss it precisely.

The phrase □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□ is rendered with "in the act of receiving full ordination" throughout, as the particle □□ indicates an action in progress rather than completed, distinguishing it from □□□□□□□□□□ ("kept by one who has received") and □□□□□□□□□□ ("kept after full ordination has been received"), though in context these fine distinctions track the moment before, during, and after completion of the ordination ceremony.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage ("In brief: By messenger, letter, hand-sign...") and the second verse ("In brief: What is improper and likewise its characteristics...") are mnemonic gathas summarizing the cases treated in the surrounding prose; they are rendered as verse accordingly.

The phrase translated "gone into the sky" reflects the Tibetan literally and most likely refers to a monk who has departed by miraculous flight — a scenario addressed in Vinaya literature to establish that physical absence from a robe, even by supernatural means, triggers the standard rule on separation.

The term rendered "rains-retreat cloth" (Tibetan: dbyar gyi ras chen) refers to the kathina cloth or the special cloth distributed at the conclusion of the rains retreat; the context here concerns regulations around seeking and retaining this cloth.

- The verse passage listing the categories of persons or means through which a redirection of gain might occur functions as a summary rubric, enumerating the categories that the subsequent prose then unpacks one by one. The translation renders it as verse accordingly.

The phrase rendered "one who has been given the training" refers to a probationer under training rules, a status between novice and full ordination, sometimes called a śikṣamāṇā in the female case; here the context is somewhat ambiguous as to whether a male or female trainee is meant, but the immediately following discussion of novices and nuns suggests the term here may be general or may refer to the female trainee specifically. This is a genuine textual ambiguity worth noting.

- The verse summary near the opening is a mnemonic gāthā listing categories of persons whose receipt of dedicated gains creates complications; the rendering follows the Tibetan closely but the exact referents of "the seventh category" and "those characterized as the fourth" depend on enumeration systems within the broader Vinaya context that are not spelled out in this passage alone.

The term rendered "androgyne" translates ma ning, which in Vinaya literature denotes a person of indeterminate or non-binary sex; some translators render this as "neuter person" or "hermaphrodite." The rendering here reflects the most common Tibetan Vinaya usage.

- The verse summary is terse and formulaic, referring back to earlier categories in the text — "the improper," "the fourth," and "the seventh" — as shorthand for case-types established in the preceding sections. The exact referents cannot be fully determined from this passage in isolation; they summarize a matrix of cases involving improper dedications and consecrated versus unconsecrated gains.

The phrase rendered "timed before the seven days are complete" reflects the Vinaya ruling that medicine may be specially designated or "timed" for lifetime use if that formal act is performed within the seven-day window, after which no such designation is possible.

- The summary verse near the middle of this passage is a mnemonic condensing the categories of exception or exception-modifying factors (madness, disturbance, illness, sleep, intoxication, absorption, travel, solitude, language, tīrthika, muteness, nighttime, bodily act, student, nun). Such verse summaries are standard Vinaya structural devices; the individual terms are then unpacked in the prose that follows. The rendering "struck dumb" for རྒྱུ་མེད་ (literally "become dumb/mute") distinguishes it from the permanent condition of being mute (མེད་པ་). The "noble language" (ཐུགས་རྒྱུ་ལྟོགས་ལྟོགས་) here almost certainly refers to Sanskrit or Middle Indic (Pali/Prakrit), the prestige language of the monastic tradition, as opposed to the vernacular speech of border peoples.

- The verse summary near the end is clearly a mnemonic listing of categorical exceptions or special cases relevant to the preceding Vinaya analysis. The terse items "the fourth and the seventh" are formulaic references to specific case-numbers or categories within the surrounding Vinaya commentary tradition; their precise referents cannot be determined from this passage alone without access to the broader commentary context.

The phrase rendered "by means of a bodily sign" translates "lus kyi dmigs pas," literally "by the object or focus of the body," indicating a non-verbal, physical indicator such as a gesture used as a surrogate claim to having seen something; this is a recognized Vinaya distinction between verbal and non-verbal testimony.

- The term rendered "paṇḍaka" translates the Tibetan ma ning, a category of person with indeterminate or ambiguous sex or gender; it corresponds to the Sanskrit paṇḍaka and is left as a loanword here since it designates a recognized Vinaya category without a fully satisfactory English equivalent.

The phrase "in the process of receiving full ordination" renders bsnyen par rdzogs kar, which denotes the liminal moment during which the ordination ceremony is being performed but is not yet complete, distinct from bsnyen par rdzogs pa, full ordination already accomplished.

The passage ends mid-question; the response will follow in the next section.

- The verse summary near the beginning is a mnemonic gāthā condensing the preceding analysis under headings: voice, body, isolation, marks, the fourth case, the seventh case, and laypeople. The precise referents of "the fourth" and "the seventh" depend on a detailed listing in the surrounding text not included in this passage; they are rendered as formulaic headings in the verse.

The terms rendered "noble monk" and "border monk" translate 'phags pa and mtha' 'khob pa respectively. In this Vinaya context 'phags pa does not denote an ārya in the soteriological sense but refers to a monk from a central, established monastic region, while mtha' 'khob pa refers to a monk from a border or peripheral region. This distinction is significant for the procedural validity of formal acts and the language appropriate to each.

- The verse summary near the end lists categories of persons or means by which the offense of disturbing a settled dispute may be transmitted or committed in attenuated form. The final term rendered "last" reflects that this verse closes the section. The distinction between "minor offense" and "downfall" throughout follows the Vinaya technical gradation: a downfall (āpatti pātayantikā, the Pāli pācittiya equivalent in this tradition) is heavier than a minor offense (duṣkṛta). The list of disqualified persons — hermaphrodite, indeterminate sex, dual sex, and so on — reflects standard Vinaya categories of those whose legal acts within the Saṅgha are either invalid or restricted. The phrase rendered "one who is a hermaphrodite" and related terms reflects Vinaya technical classifications that do not map neatly onto modern categories; the translation follows established Vinaya philological convention.

- The verse summary is condensed and uses shorthand terms whose referents must be inferred from context. "Noble language" throughout renders "noble speech" or "ārya language," the prestige language of the tradition (likely Sanskrit or a related prestige dialect as opposed to a local vernacular), while "border language" refers to a vernacular of the cultural periphery. The precise distinction between རྒྱལ་པོ་ (eunuch), རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྟ་བུ་ (eunuch or impotent male), and རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ (two-gendered, i.e., hermaphrodite or intersex) reflects Vinaya taxonomies of ambiguous or non-standard gender; all three are rendered according to established Vinaya scholarship conventions. The verse's terse phrasing makes its exact reference to "the third point and the fourth in the same way" genuinely uncertain — it likely refers to the third and fourth categories of attendant discussed in the surrounding prose, applied now to probationer nuns and fully ordained nuns.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end; this is a continuation passage and the text is incomplete at the closing portion. The rendering "noble language" for རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ reflects the standard Vinaya usage, which likely refers to Sanskrit as the prestige literary language, while "border language" renders རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་, meaning the language of outlying or frontier regions. The verse summary in the middle of the passage appears to be a mnemonic gāthā recapping exemption categories, rendered as verse accordingly.

- The verse summary near the end is a mnemonic condensing the preceding case-analysis into abbreviated categories. The terms "the fourth," "the seventh," and "oneself" are allusions to specific case-types within the surrounding Vinaya analysis whose precise referents would be clear to a trained monastic reader; they are rendered as literally as possible to preserve the mnemonic character. The phrase rendered "one who is in a stupor" translates a term referring to someone in a dazed or confused state, distinct from intoxication. The passage on nuns reading with various categories of practitioners contains a structural complexity in the Tibetan where the penalty categories shift; the translation follows the syntactic logic of the Tibetan as closely as possible.

- The phrase rendered throughout as "reaches the end of transgression" and "reaches the end of what is fitting" translates རྒྱུ་མཐུད་ཀྱི་མཐུད་ལ་འབྱུང་བ་དང་ རྒྱུ་མཐུད་ཀྱི་མཐུད་ལ་འབྱུང་བ་ respectively. The Tibetan is technically dense Vinaya procedural language. The first phrase concerns how many offenses are enumerated or disclosed; the second concerns how many family members or lineage connections are implicated. The rendering offered reflects the most natural Vinaya interpretation, but the precise juridical sense of these paired categories may require cross-reference with parallel Sanskrit Vinaya sources for full certainty.

The term རྒྱུ་མཐུད་ཀྱི་མཐུད་ལ་འབྱུང་བ་ literally means "to be done at the end of" or "reaching the limit of," and རྒྱུ་མཐུད་ཀྱི་མཐུད་ལ་འབྱུང་བ་ here does not mean "generosity" in the usual sense but rather "what is given" or "what is dispensed" — referring to the information disclosed in the Vinaya proceeding. The term has been rendered as "giving" in the procedural sense of disclosure or imparting of information, which is its Vinaya usage here.

- The terms rendered "paṇḍaka" and "female paṇḍaka" (ma ning and ma ning mo) refer to persons of indeterminate or compromised sex-gender status in Vinaya literature; the Tibetan terms are standard translations of the Sanskrit paṇḍaka and its feminine form. These are technical Vinaya categories and have been retained in Sanskrit rather than given potentially misleading modern equivalents.

The final verse appears to be a summary mnemonic listing categories of persons or circumstances under which the rule of disclosure does not apply or is modified; the last line "one who is in the final destiny" renders tha ma, which may indicate one in the last rebirth or the lowest class of being, though in this Vinaya context it more likely refers to one at the point of death or at the conclusion of a series. This is a genuinely uncertain reading and has been rendered conservatively.

The phrase rendered "one who has become a teacher surpassing human beings" translates mi las bla mar gyur pa'i chos yang dag par smras na, a difficult and consequential clause in the context of the pārājika on claiming superhuman attainments. The sense is that if one correctly teaches the Dharma attributing it to the Buddha as Teacher, this is distinguished from the full offense of the defeat; the gradations of offense are implied by "progressively distinguished."

- The verse summary contains several compressed technical references: "the mark" likely refers to gender mark or ordination status; "the fourth and the seventh" are enumerated case-categories within the surrounding Vinaya analysis whose precise referents depend on the broader list in the root text. These are formulaic Vinaya verse summaries and their full explication would require the accompanying commentary. The distinction between a "transgression" and a "wrongdoing" throughout reflects the Vinaya technical distinction between an āpatti of a more serious grade and a lesser offense, corresponding to the Tibetan རྒྱུ་མཐུད་ཀྱི་མཐུད་ལ་འབྱུང་བ་ and རྒྱུ་མཐུད་ཀྱི་མཐུད་ལ་འབྱུང་བ་ respectively.

- The verse at the close is a summary mnemonic listing categories of exemption or exception to full culpability: messengers, letters, signs, speaking through another, sequential disclosure, madness, mental disturbance, illness, incapacitation, dullness, sleep, delirium, intoxication, and meditative absorption. These are standard Vinaya categories of diminished or absent culpability.

The phrase rendered "a robe of unmeasured length" translates a Tibetan expression for a robe exceeding the standard measure, i.e., one whose dimensions have not been cut or adjusted to the prescribed size, and which has not yet been formally requested or allocated. This is a Vinaya-technical detail; the rendering approximates the sense without full technical precision, which is addressed here rather than in the body.

- The term rendered "pandaka" (Tibetan za ma) refers in Vinaya literature to a category of person with ambiguous or absent sexual characteristics; it is a technical Vinaya category and is left untranslated following standard Vinaya scholarship. "Person of indeterminate sex" (ma ning) is a distinct second category and is rendered descriptively. The verse summarizing the cases is terse and its fourth item is not entirely transparent in the Tibetan; "the fourth case" reflects the enumeration in context. The phrase "noble language" (āryabhāṣā) refers in this Vinaya context to the Sanskrit or a prestige liturgical language, as opposed to the "border language" spoken in frontier regions.

- The verse summary near the beginning is a mnemonic enumeration of the categories discussed — emanation body, stone dust, roots, flowers, fish scales, dwellings, mushrooms, old things, flowers, fruits, bark, and the numbered items — and its compressed structure reflects the genre of Vinaya verse summaries. The final line "signs, the fourth, the seventh, and lastly, the fruit" is genuinely elliptical; the numbers likely refer to ordinal cases in the preceding or following case-analysis series, and the exact referents depend on the surrounding Vinaya context.

The phrase rendered "changes sex" translates a term literally meaning "the sex-characteristic transferred," which in Vinaya literature refers to a legendary scenario of spontaneous sex change; this is a recognized topic in Vinaya case analysis and is not metaphorical.

- The term rendered "noble language" is a stock Vinaya expression referring to the language of the spiritual heartland, conventionally understood as Sanskrit or a related prestige language of the Indo-Gangetic plain, in contrast to the "border-region language" of regions considered peripheral. The distinction is juridically significant for the validity of confession proceedings.

The phrase "confesses an offense and imposes a penalty" renders a standard Vinaya technical expression in which one party formally acknowledges a transgression before another and that other formally assigns the appropriate penitential consequence; the passage explores conditions under which this normally transgression-incurring act might or might not result in a further offense.

The passage concerning "one who has gone forth from and received full ordination among non-humans" likely refers to a being who has technically undergone the ordination ceremony within a non-human assembly, rendering the ordination canonically irregular; the precise doctrinal implication for why confession in that context generates only a lesser offense rather than a downfall is a matter of traditional Vinaya commentary.

- The verse section lists categories of invalid recipients before whom confession and the imposition of a penalty are invalid. The term rendered "almost fully ordained" translates a Tibetan expression meaning one in the process of receiving ordination but not yet complete, which is technically distinct from both the fully ordained and the wholly unordained; the precise procedural distinction is a matter of Vinaya commentary. The final sentence of the passage is incomplete as given and breaks off mid-question; this is a feature of the source text as supplied, not an error in translation.

- The verse summary near the beginning is terse and formulaic, as is typical of Vinaya mnemonic verses in this corpus. The phrase rendered "silence's mark" follows the Tibetan mi smra mtshan, referring to instructions conveyed through silence or non-speaking, as elaborated in the prose that follows.

The "noble language" throughout refers to Sanskrit or the prestige liturgical language of the monastic community, while the "border language" refers to vernacular or regional languages of frontier regions. This distinction is a standard feature of Vinaya discussion on the language of formal acts.

The distinction between "transgression" and "offense" in this passage follows the Tibetan ltuñ ba and nyes byas respectively, which in Vinaya technical usage correspond to different grades of infraction.

- The versified summary near the opening is a mnemonic gāthā enumerating categories of exception or offense related to the preceding rules. The Tibetan is compressed and elliptical, as is standard for such summary verses in Vinaya texts. The rendering conveys the enumerated headings as they appear, though the full referential content of each heading is only intelligible in light of the surrounding prose discussion.

The three-fold distinction regarding full ordination status — "not yet received," "about to receive," and "in the act of receiving" — reflects the Vinaya's precise delineation of the transitional moment of upasampadā, for which the Tibetan uses three distinct formulations: ma rdzogs pa (not complete), rdzogs kar (on the verge of completion), and rdzogs pa na (at the point of completion). These represent consecutive stages and are rendered accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "one who dwells as a thief" and "one who does not reside in the community" and "one who resides separately" refer to specific Vinaya categories of suspended or irregularly dwelling monastics; the precise technical boundaries of these terms vary across Vinaya traditions, but the general sense of each as a disqualified or problematic recipient is clear from context.

The "eight kinds of obstruction" is a standard Vinaya category listing circumstances that excuse non-performance of a required act; only a subset is enumerated here in the verse summary, and the full list would be found in the commentary.

- The verse excerpt near the beginning of this passage is terse and contextually elliptical. The rendering offered follows the most plausible Vinaya-list reading, but the precise referents of "the fourth with characteristics" and "the seventh" remain unclear without the surrounding commentary; these likely refer to specific categories enumerated earlier in the fascicle.

The term rendered "androgynous" for རྒྱུ་མཉམ་ corresponds to the Sanskrit pañḍaka, a canonical Vinaya category of person considered ineligible for ordination on grounds of gender ambiguity or sexual incapacity; "hermaphrodite" for རྒྱུ་མཉམ་ corresponds to ubhatovyañjanaka. Both renderings approximate traditional categories that do not map neatly onto modern terminology.

The repeated distinction between "expels" and "causes to be expelled" reflects the Tibetan distinction between རྒྱུ་མཉམ་ (direct expulsion) and རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པ་ལ་བཀའ་བྱེད་ (authorizing or instructing another to expel), consistently maintained throughout.

The distinction between རྒྱུ་མཉམ་ (transgression, i.e., a pārājika or saṃghāvaśeṣa-level downfall) and རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པ་ (downfall, i.e., a lighter duṣkṛta-type offense) is maintained throughout; where the Tibetan reads རྒྱུ་མཉམ་ alone without རྒྱུ་མཉམ་པ་, "downfall" is used, and where རྒྱུ་མཉམ་ appears, "transgression" is used to signal the heavier category.

- The verse summary "Whether it concerns an individual or the Saṅgha..." is a mnemonic gāthā enumerating categories of persons and situations; the precise referents of "the third case and the fourth" are elliptical and would be clarified by the surrounding commentary tradition, likely referring to the third and fourth subcategories of the preceding list.

The term rendered "pandaka" (ma ning) denotes a person of ambiguous or non-normative sex or gender; "hermaphrodite" and "pandaka" are offered as the two most common scholarly renderings, though the Vinaya category is broader. The term "za ma" rendered here as "hermaphrodite" is distinct from "ma ning" (pandaka); both appear in the text as separate categories.

- The verse summarizing the categories of bed-and-seat rules uses highly compressed enumeration. The items listed — "those of an individual and those of the Saṅgha," "the night," "the fourth," "the unsuitable," "the seventh," and "the canopy of sky" — are mnemonic headings referring to the sub-categories of the preceding rules that have been discussed in sequence. The exact referent of each heading is clear within the Vinaya commentarial tradition but would require extensive expansion to explain fully; they are rendered here as they stand in the mnemonic verse.

The phrase rendered as "lowers himself heavily" translates a technical Vinaya expression describing the act of pressing one's weight down onto a structure in a way that risks causing damage, which is the defining act of the relevant transgression.

- The term rendered "one under training" translates the Tibetan for one who has received the precepts in the context of the graduated training, corresponding here to the pravrajita or śikṣamāṇā category. The verse summary at the close of the first section ("A great building, one made of stone...") is terse and formulaic; the rendering follows the most natural reading given the surrounding prose context, but the verse is an abbreviated mnemonic and some lines are elliptical by design. The phrase "changes status" renders the Tibetan idiom for a monk becoming a nun or vice versa (gender/ordination status change), which is a recognized canonical scenario in Vinaya literature.

- The verse summary near the beginning condenses the preceding casuistry into a mnemonic list. The "fourth and fifth" in the verse refer to sending a messenger and approaching in person, the fourth and fifth modes enumerated in the surrounding prose. This is standard Vinaya verse-summary (uddāna) style.

The phrase rendered "her status changes and she becomes a nun of the other sex" refers to a spontaneous sex change occurring mid-teaching — a recognized edge case in Vinaya literature concerning the category of individuals whose ordination status changes through transformation of sex. Similarly, "her status changes and she becomes a monk" follows the same logic in reverse.

"Noble language" throughout refers to Sanskrit or the prestige liturgical register of the center, as opposed to the vernacular languages of the border regions. The distinction is a standard Vinaya concern about whether the teaching is comprehensible.

- The phrase rendered throughout as "the appointed duration of shade" translates a term literally meaning "as long as the shade of an umbrella lasts" — a specific unit of time used in Vinaya literature to define the permissible duration for a monk to teach nuns in a single sitting. This is a recognized technical expression in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition.

The verse summary near the end lists categories of circumstances or persons under which teaching beyond the appointed time incurs a misdeed. "The noble language" refers to Sanskrit or the prestige language of the monastic tradition, as opposed to regional vernacular languages.

The case in which "a nun's status changes and she becomes a fully ordained monk" is unusual and likely refers to a change of biological sex, a scenario discussed in Vinaya literature regarding the legal status of monastics.

- The "eight interrupting obstacles" arising while nuns are on their way is a standard Vinaya technical list; the text names only the number without enumerating the individual items here, which is consistent with canonical brevity in such passages.

The verse summarizes categories of cases treated in the preceding prose: voice, body, solitude, night (the fourth), and the seventh case (hermaphrodite), along with "the one given training precepts" and "the nun." The numbering follows an implicit sequential list in the broader passage.

The term rendered "noble tongue" throughout refers to the Sanskrit language or the Middle Indic language of the noble ones, as opposed to the vernacular tongues of border peoples. This distinction is a recognized Vinaya category.

- The verse summaries in this passage are mnemonics listing categories of exception or circumstance and do not read as complete syntactic sentences in the Tibetan; they are rendered as verse to reflect their gāthā form, with meaning supplied from context as the tradition intends.

The phrase rendered "the nocturnal and the fourth" in the second verse summary likely refers to technical Vinaya categories whose full referents would require extended commentary; the translation preserves the numerical enumeration as given.

The phrase "from one to another" renders a relay-transmission idiom: an accusation or statement passed through intermediaries.

- The phrase rendered as "one who has taken refuge in theft" and "one who has no fixed abode" and "one who lives apart" reflect standard Vinaya categories of nuns with irregular status; the Tibetan terms "rkun gnas ma," "mi gnas ma," and "so sor gnas ma" correspond to recognized canonical categories, though precise Sanskrit equivalents in this specific Mūlasarvāstivāda passage are not fully recoverable from the Tibetan alone.

The verse summary is metrically rendered. The four-line verse is a mnemonic gāthā summarizing the categories discussed in the fascicle.

The repeated phrase rendered as "just received full ordination" translates the Tibetan "bsnyen par rdzogs kar," where the particle "kar" suggests immediacy or the very moment of ordination, as distinct from "bsnyen par rdzogs pa na," meaning "when fully ordained" more generally. This distinction drives the casebook structure and is preserved in the translation accordingly.

- The final sentence is syntactically incomplete in the source, ending mid-question without its answer; the translation faithfully reproduces this break.

The verse summary listing "the unsuitable, the fourth category, the measure, not more than that excess, the seventh, the precious, the shared, and the neuter" is a mnemonic enumeration of rule-categories used in Vinaya commentarial tradition. The terse verse resists full expansion in translation; the rendering preserves its mnemonic character.

The phrase rendered "one who gives the training" refers to a preceptor nun of a specific grade; the Tibetan term is the standard rendering of the Skt. śikṣādattā or a related category in the nuns' ordination hierarchy.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic listing topics of preceding or following rules. Its terms are terse and elliptical by design; "the fourth" and "the seventh" refer to specific numbered rules in the surrounding Vinaya context. The rendering keeps the compact verse form faithful to the original without attempting to expand or identify each referent, as those would require full commentary.

The phrase rendered "eight obstructions on the path" refers to eight canonical impediments that break the continuity of a journey and would prevent the monk from being counted as truly accompanying the nun's escort.

The category rendered "one who has no valid standing" translates a technical Vinaya term for a woman whose ordination has been declared invalid or void.

- The term rendered "noble language" and "border language" throughout refers to the standard distinction in Vinaya texts between the central Āryadeśa dialect and the various regional or border-country dialects. The precise import here is that when a monk arranges an escort using one language, the nun must herself seek out or acknowledge the arrangement in the same language for the act to be fully constituted; failure to do so reduces the offence from a downfall to a transgression.

The term rendered "female trainee" translates the Tibetan for śikṣamāṇā, a woman undergoing the two-year probationary training before full ordination as a nun; this is distinct from a novice nun.

The phrase "falls in behind" renders the idiom for taking up the rear of an escort, which is the specific bodily act constituting the offence in these escort rules.

- The verse summarizing the categories of trainings for nuns uses a terse, list-like structure; "marks" in the line "mantra and marks — the fourth" refers to the monastic gender-change scenario discussed in the prose (change of sexual characteristics). The rendering follows the commentarial understanding that the verse condenses four exceptional cases: the young woman, the sky scenario, mantra or medicine, and the change of marks.

The phrase rendered "a female thief who has taken refuge in the Saṅgha" renders a technical Vinaya term for a woman who has entered the community under false pretenses or as a fugitive seeking sanctuary.

- The verse summary in the middle of this passage uses highly compressed shorthand — referring to "the third case," "the fourth," and "the seventh" — which are conventional Vinaya enumeration markers pointing to subcases within the preceding discussion. Their exact referents depend on the surrounding structural context of the full Vinaya text, and this compression is characteristic of mnemonic verse in the Tibetan Vinaya tradition. No attempt has been made to supply the numbered referents in the translation, as doing so would go beyond what the text itself states.

The phrase rendered "just as she is becoming fully ordained" translates the Tibetan term for the moment of ordination in process, a technical distinction in Vinaya analysis between before, during, and after the completion of the ordination ceremony.

- The verse summary is terse and formulaic. The phrase rendered "the fourth, seventh, and second" refers to enumerated categories within the surrounding Vinaya discussion; the exact referents of these ordinal numbers are not fully recoverable from this passage alone and would require broader commentary.

The term rendered "hermaphrodite monastic" and "hermaphrodite laywoman" translates a Tibetan term for an intermediate or indeterminate sex; traditional Vinaya literature lists this as a distinct category of person with specific rules.

The phrase "invites guests on two occasions" in the context of the Vinaya rule concerns the regulation against repeated solicitation; the double-invitation scenario is a recognized exception in the commentarial tradition.

- The verse summaries embedded in the text are mnemonic indexes, common in Vinaya literature, that enumerate category headings rather than forming complete doctrinal statements. Their compressed and allusive form makes precise rendering into flowing prose impossible; they are translated as verse to signal their distinct literary register, but some terms such as "the fourth," "mark," and "the changed" remain opaque without their fuller textual context.

The term rendered "paṇḍaka" (Tibetan ma ning) refers to a person of indeterminate or ambiguous sex, a recognized Vinaya category with specific legal implications for ordination and community membership. "Female paṇḍaka" (ma ning ma) is the corresponding feminine designation.

The phrase rendered "those who have gone to another destination" translates a term literally meaning "those who have gone elsewhere," likely referring to persons who have left one order or community for another, though the precise technical referent depends on the broader Vinaya context of this text.

- The verse summaries embedded in the text are mnemonic tags listing categories treated in the surrounding casuistry. They are intentionally elliptical and their meaning is only fully clear from the surrounding prose; the translation renders them as literally as the form allows while preserving intelligibility.

The phrase rendered "in the process of receiving full ordination" reflects the Tibetan distinction between the moment of ordination not yet completed, the moment it is being conferred, and the state after it is fully conferred — a threefold technical graduation that is standard Vinaya casuistry around the act of upasampadā.

"By night" in the closing verse summary likely refers to soliciting after midday or during the night watch, a standard Vinaya prohibition; its full elaboration presumably follows in the next section.

- The term rendered "made into a remainder" translates a technical Vinaya concept referring to the ritual act of formally setting aside a portion of food before eating, thereby making the remainder licit for consumption. The precise Vinaya term in Sanskrit is likely ucchiṣṭa-related, but the Tibetan lhag mar ma bgyis pa indicates food that has not been ritually left over or dedicated as a remainder before eating, which is a distinct procedural requirement in the monastic code.

The verse summary at the end presents some compression; "the improper seventh" and "all ordinations: not done and done" are telegraphic references to the case-categories elaborated in the prose above, and the rendering attempts to preserve this condensed, mnemonic character.

The phrase rendered "female intermediary" for za ma is uncertain; this term may refer to a specific category of female person in Vinaya literature, possibly a woman serving as an intermediary in food transactions, or it may be a variant term for a category of indeterminate sex. Context alongside "hermaphrodite" (ma ning) suggests it is a distinct category of person.

- The term རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ refers to foods that are licked or sucked, and རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ to foods that are tasted by touching to the tongue — these are standard Vinaya categories of edible items, here rendered "things to be licked" and "things to be tasted" respectively. The fivefold taxonomy of foodstuffs is a standard Vinaya classification.

The sentence about the female trainee includes རྒྱུ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ལྟོ་ (śikṣamāṇā), the probationary female ordinand who trains for two years before full ordination; rendered "female trainee" for clarity.

The passage breaks off mid-question at the end, consistent with the text's continuity format.

- The verse summary near the middle is a mnemonic stanza cataloguing categories under which the "making into a remainder" procedure is invalid or modified. The final items — "sign" and "the fourth" — are deliberately terse mnemonic tags; "the fourth" likely refers to a nun, as explicitly named at the verse's end, or to a category discussed in fuller commentary. The verse's compressed style is typical of Vinaya summary verses and does not allow full disambiguation from the text alone.

The term rendered "glutton" for dge slong za ma is literally "monk who eats" or "eating monk," a Vinaya technical term for a monk who accepts food improperly or in excess; "glutton" approximates the sense in context.

The distinction between "noble language" (ārya speech, i.e., Sanskrit or the prestige liturgical register) and "border language" (the speech of frontier regions) reflects a Vinaya rule that the language in which the making-remainder formula is offered and acknowledged must be mutually understood; mismatched languages render the act ineffective. This is a genuine Vinaya technical point, not merely a linguistic curiosity.

- The passage contains highly technical Vinaya terminology. The phrase rendered "change of status occurs" translates the Tibetan "mtshan 'phos te," referring to a change in ordination status between the time of offering and receiving. The term "suspended" translates Tibetan "spangs pa," which in this Vinaya context refers to formal ecclesiastical suspension or exclusion from the community. The five types of eatables is a standard Vinaya category. The final verse section, beginning with "In brief," appears to be the opening of a summary verse enumerating mitigating circumstances; the passage breaks off mid-verse.

- The phrase rendered "the six permitted occasions" refers to the traditional list of six exceptional circumstances under which eating in a large assembly is not a transgression, as detailed in the Vinaya literature. The text does not enumerate them here.

The term paṇḍaka refers to a person of indeterminate or ambiguous sex, a recognized Vinaya category. The Tibetan reads "ma ning," which corresponds to paṇḍaka in Sanskrit. The sentence in the verse has been rendered to preserve the grammatical continuity as it flows into the following rules about nuns.

The phrase "the night passes and he becomes a monk again" and "they become monks" renders a Tibetan idiom about a change of status due to the passing of the night-watch, which in certain Vinaya contexts can affect the gender category of ordination status — a technically complex Vinaya point preserved as literally as natural English allows.

- The phrase rendered "food has become utterly finished" translates a term meaning food has become scarce or exhausted in a given location, representing a recognized exception to the rule against eating in large groups within a boundary — the communal sharing circumstance.

The reference to "the three other continents" means the other three great continents of Buddhist cosmology besides Jambudvīpa, where different time zones apply; eating according to Jambudvīpa's proper mealtime while physically in another continent or divine realm does not constitute eating at an improper time.

The verse summary's phrase "the marks" likely refers to the sexual-transformation cases just discussed, since the Tibetan term here can mean marks or signs as well as the characteristic signs of sex.

- The verse summarizing the exceptions is terse and compressed in the original, as is typical of Vinaya mnemonic verse. The phrase rendered "a fourth time of eating" follows the Vinaya convention that there are specific permitted times to eat; the "fourth" here likely refers to a specific period within that framework. The precise referent is not spelled out in this passage and may be clarified in the surrounding commentary.

The phrase translated as "afflicted by a demon" renders za ma, a term that can denote possession or affliction by a class of spirit; some commentaries gloss this as a particular kind of non-human affliction. The identification here is contextually reasonable but the term's exact scope in this Vinaya passage may warrant consultation of the root commentary.

- The verse summary near the beginning is a mnemonic gāthā condensing the cases treated in this fascicle. The line "conjured, not manifest, one goes" refers to a supernaturally created being or an illusory form — cases involving conjured or apparitional individuals who offer food. The rendering is approximate because the verse is highly compressed and elliptical, as is typical of Vinaya summary verses.

The ruling that Uttarakuru is an exception to the receiving-food rule reflects a classical Vinaya position: the Northern Continent is held to be a realm of spontaneous abundance where the normal rules of offering and receiving do not apply in the same way.

- The verse summaries embedded in this passage are mnemonic lists typical of Vinaya literature, cataloguing categories for easy memorization. Their syntax is highly compressed and the full legal import of each item is unpacked in the surrounding prose. The rendering stays close to the structure of the original without attempting to expand the compressed items.

The term rendered "noble language" throughout is the Tibetan transliteration of Sanskrit proper — that is, Sanskrit itself as distinct from a "frontier language," the vernacular of border peoples. The distinction reflects a real Vinaya concern about whether alms-begging requests are intelligible to donors.

The phrase "one who has been given a training precept" refers to the śikṣamāṇā, a female novice undergoing the two-year probationary training before full ordination — a distinct ecclesiastical category between the female novice and the fully ordained nun.

- The fourfold matrix of perception-categories — almsgiver or not, human or not, offered with the hand or not — follows a standard Vinaya analytical format also found in parallel Sanskrit and Pāli Vinaya texts. The rendering of these permutations is straightforward once the categorical logic is established.

The verse at the close appears to be a mnemonic summary listing the chief topics treated in this section: secluded places, sky-spells or open-air situations, nighttime, the fourth category (likely the hermaphrodite case, "the fourth sex" in Vinaya taxonomy), female hermaphrodites, attendants, young women, and wandering ascetics. These are standard shorthand verse summaries used as memory aids in the Vinaya literature.

The term rendered "hermaphrodite" translates the Tibetan ma ning, the standard equivalent of Sanskrit paṇḍaka or related terms in the Vinaya, referring to a recognized category of person of ambiguous or intermediate sex whose interactions with the monastic community are subject to specific rules.

- The term rendered throughout as "dangerous woman" translates the Tibetan "smen ngan," literally "bad woman" or "woman of ill repute." In Vinaya context this refers specifically to a woman who poses a disciplinary danger to a monk's vow of celibacy, often glossed in commentaries as a woman with whom a monk has had a prior relationship or who is likely to entice him. The translation "dangerous woman" captures the legal-technical sense while remaining intelligible to a general listener.

The phrase rendered "one who has been given the training" translates "bslab pa bstsal ba," referring to a monk who has been placed under a probationary training rule rather than expelled, a technical Vinaya status.

The verse summary at the close is incomplete in the source passage, ending mid-list; the translation faithfully reproduces this open-ended conclusion.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic capsule listing categories of cases covered in this section. The line rendered "through another — another's non-Buddhist renunciant" translates a condensed Tibetan phrase that appears to compress a case involving giving food through an intermediary to a non-Buddhist renunciant. The exact parsing of the verse's final line is compressed to the point of ambiguity; the rendering follows the most probable reading in context.

The repeated permutations of dedication and giving around the moment of full ordination reflect a standard Vinaya casuistic technique of exploring all temporal combinations to determine when an offence is incurred; all are ruled transgressions here, with the sole exception being the final case listed — though the text as structured applies "transgression" uniformly across all variants presented.

- The verse summarizing the categories of exempted or specially treated persons is compressed and allusive, as is typical of mnemonic gāthās in Vinaya literature. The phrase "the king who holds the seventh view" and "the fourth ones" are technical enumerations whose precise referents depend on the surrounding commentarial context; the verse is rendered as literally as the Tibetan permits without inventing specificity. The "change of marks" refers to a spontaneous biological sex change, a recognized category in Vinaya casuistry affecting the applicable rules of discipline.

- The term rendered "neither-male-nor-female" translates ma ning, a category in Vinaya literature referring to persons of indeterminate or intermediate sex, sometimes rendered "eunuch" or "hermaphrodite" in older scholarship; "neither-male-nor-female" reflects the technical Vinaya usage most accurately.

The verse summary near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic listing categories of mitigating or varying circumstances relevant to the striking rule; its terse syntax is characteristic of such summaries in the Tibetan Vinaya. The phrase rendered "the fourth and seventh done by another" is compressed and refers to the fourth and seventh items in a list being executed through an intermediary; the exact referents are contextually implied by the surrounding prose.

The phrase "another destiny" renders gzhan du gnas pa, literally "abiding in another place," but in Vinaya context this likely indicates a monk stationed in a different community or jurisdiction, not a cosmological destiny. The reading is contextually supported.

- The term rendered "grave offense" throughout is a translation of "gnas ngan len gyi nongs pa," which technically refers to offenses of the category of "pārājika" (defeat) or more broadly serious Vinaya infractions. In this context, given the surrounding material, it refers to bringing a formal accusation of a serious transgression against a fellow monastic, likely a pārājika charge.

The verse summary employs compressed enumerative language. The phrase "the fourth and seventh offense categories" refers to specific Vinaya categories of offenses; the exact categories intended would be clarified by the surrounding Vinaya commentary tradition. This has been rendered literally as the context is a technical Vinaya list.

The final sentence is incomplete in the source text as provided, ending mid-case; this is preserved as-is in the translation.

- The phrase rendered "a change of status occurs" translates the Tibetan for a change of name or sex designation during the proceeding. The doctrinal point is that if the gender status of the accused changes between the time the charge is brought and the time it is to be acknowledged, the charge lapses improperly and the accuser incurs a transgression.

The passage distinguishing "at the time of full ordination," "when the ordination is in progress," and "after ordination is complete" reflects a nuanced Vinaya teaching about the precise moment at which full ordination status attaches and the corresponding moment at which a charge of a grave offense may licitly be brought.

- The term rendered "noble language" refers to the refined central language — Sanskrit or a prestige dialect associated with the Āryan heartland — as opposed to the "border language," which is a regional or peripheral vernacular. This distinction is standard in Vinaya literature and relates to the question of whether a formal act is effective if the recipient does not comprehend the language used. The passage is from the Vinayavastu in dialogue form between Upāli and the Buddha, cataloguing gradations of culpability for formal monastic acts of censure and separation.

The term rendered "female trainee" translates the Tibetan for the śikṣamāṇā, a woman in the two-year probationary period before full ordination; "one to whom a rule of training has been administered" refers to a monk placed under a formal disciplinary procedure by the Saṅgha.

- The term rendered "intersex person" translates ma ning, the standard Vinaya category for a person of indeterminate sex. The term rendered "physical gesture as the indicator" translates lus kyi dmigs pa, literally "a bodily indicator" or "bodily object of focus," referring to non-verbal physical signalling as the means of separation. The passage ends mid-sentence as given; the answer to the final question was presumably in the next portion of the text.

- The repeated phrase rendered as "causes to enter or exit a fire" renders the Tibetan རྒྱུ་ཤུག་པུ་ཤུག་པུ་, literally "enter and exit." In context this is a Vinaya technical term concerning the fire ceremony or a ritual involving fire, though in some Vinaya contexts it refers more broadly to admission and expulsion from the community or a ceremony. The precise ritual referent is uncertain; it may concern a specific Vinaya procedure involving fire rather than ordination admission per se. The summary verses are terse and elliptical, as is typical of Vinaya verse summaries, and their renderings are approximate reconstructions of their intended doctrinal sense.

- The verse summary presents genuine condensation difficulties. The phrase rendered "the fourth and seventh cases are likewise so" refers to enumerated cases within the preceding Vinaya discussion. The exact referents of "fourth" and "seventh" depend on a broader list not fully visible in this excerpt, and the verse is clearly a mnemonic aide for trained monastics rather than a self-explanatory statement.

The term rendered throughout as "deed of entanglement" translates a Tibetan expression referring to a specific Vinaya transgression involving illicit mediation or interference in Saṅgha proceedings related to gifts or transactions. The precise Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain; this rendering follows the contextual meaning.

The phrase rendered "refined language of the noble ones" refers to Sanskrit or a prestige language associated with the Āryans, as opposed to the vernacular languages of border regions. This distinction is a standard Vinaya concern about whether a legal act is properly understood by both parties.

- The closing verse summarizes categories of persons or circumstances that modify the gravity of the deed of entanglement. The term rendered "paṇḍaka" (Tib. ma ning) refers to a person of indeterminate or ambiguous sex, a category well-attested in Vinaya literature. The verse is terse and enumerative; "at the middle watch of the night and at the fourth watch" renders the Tibetan "nam mkha' gnyis dang bzhi pa mtshan," literally "sky two and fourth watch of the night," a reference to the second and fourth watches. The exact doctrinal import of each category in the verse is clarified in the prose above; the verse functions as a mnemonic summary. The phrase rendered "one who walks while casting a spell" (sngags 'gro ba) could also mean "one who recites mantras while walking"; the precise Vinaya category here is uncertain, and this is noted accordingly.

- The term rendered "one who dwells in another place of existence" translates a phrase referring to someone whose mode of being is elsewhere — possibly someone in a trance, in another rebirth state, or in a liminal condition. The exact Vinaya referent is context-dependent and commentaries vary; it is noted here as a genuinely uncertain rendering.

The phrase "changes status" for "འགྱུར་པ་ལྟར་གྱུར་པ་" literally means "the designation has shifted" — i.e., the legal identity of the person changes mid-sleep, triggering the rule afresh. This is a standard Vinaya legal device.

"One who has been given a training rule" refers to a monk who has been placed on probation or given a conditional rule to follow, a recognized Vinaya category distinct from standard full ordination.

- The verse summary "Mantra, utterances of the sky, body, seclusion, and eating — the seventh and the fourth are likewise — and so too with the female and the neuter" is a mnemonic condensing the categories of rule violations just enumerated. The phrase rendered "utterances of the sky" translates the Tibetan literally; it likely refers to speech carried through the air, i.e., communication at a distance. "The seventh and the fourth" appear to be internal Vinaya references to specific rule numbers. "Female and neuter" refer to the corresponding rules applying to nuns and to individuals of indeterminate sex. These are standard Vinaya mnemonic verses and their full referents would be clear to a trained monastic reader; they are translated literally here as required by the text.

The passage ends mid-sentence, reflecting the source material provided.

- The term rendered "pandaka" refers to a person of indeterminate or non-binary sex or gender as categorized in Vinaya literature; the Tibetan "ma ning" is the standard equivalent. The term "consented to" throughout refers to the formal Vinaya procedure by which a Saṅgha grants consent or approval in the context of the ordination ceremony and related acts. The phrase "at the moment of full ordination" renders a nuanced Tibetan distinction between the instant the ordination rite is being performed and the state of having completed it, which carries differing juridical weight in Vinaya analysis. "One who abides in a separate station" likely refers to a monk living apart under some form of ecclesiastical separation, and "one who has not conformed to the Dharma" refers to one who has not complied with a formal Saṅgha ruling or admonition.

- The verse summarizing the preceding section is terse and mnemonic in character, as is typical of Vinaya summary verses. The rendering preserves its compressed style. The exact referents of "the fourth and the seventh" in the verse are left as stated in the text, as these are internal section markers whose precise identification would require broader manuscript context.

The phrase rendered "at the time of full ordination" for the Tibetan "bsnyen par rdzogs kar" reflects a liminal moment — specifically, the interval during the ordination ceremony itself, before it is complete — as distinct from both "before" and "after" full ordination. This three-way distinction (before / during / after full ordination) is a standard Vinaya analytical framework.

- The four-line verse passage is in highly compressed, summary form characteristic of mnemonic verse used to index the rules being discussed. The rendering is approximate; the verse gestures at several distinct rules using shorthand. The phrase rendered "precious woman" reflects a textual reference to a wife or queen as one of the seven treasures of a wheel-turning king, which the text lists as one of the five precious things. The five precious things here appear to be a specific category distinct from ordinary precious objects such as jewels and the wheel-treasure, which is why the text distinguishes them: taking one of the five results in an offense proportionate to the act rather than an automatic downfall. The precise identity of the "five precious things" referenced here follows the standard list of the seven royal treasures, of which the text selects five; this enumeration may be clarified differently across Vinaya commentaries.

- The phrase rendered "one to whom a training has been given" refers to a probationer under training rules, likely a śikṣamāṇā candidate in the context of female ordinands, though the grammar here is somewhat general and could apply to any person placed under a special training precept.

The line about "creeping in like a small bird" describes a monk who dismisses the attendant who was to pour water for his bath and then illicitly takes an additional bath beyond the permitted limit by slipping in alone, thereby circumventing the rule through deception.

The four-line verse at the fascicle break is a mnemonic summary of the chapter's topics and is rendered in verse form accordingly.

- The two verse summaries embedded in this passage are terse mnemonic lists enumerating categories of exception or application; the renderings are necessarily interpretive since several items are compressed single-word glosses. "The fourth" and "the seventh" in the second verse summary are opaque without access to the broader Vinaya context in which they are numbered items in a list; the translation preserves the ordinal numbers as given rather than speculating on their referents. "Noble language" throughout renders the standard Vinaya term for Sanskrit or a prestige liturgical register, contrasted with frontier or regional languages.

- The verse summary "the marks, and then the fourth and the seventh" is a mnemonic whose referent is not fully transparent from the passage alone. It likely refers to categorical lists in the broader Vinaya matrix being summarized — perhaps that the offense applies to laymen and similar persons at the "mark" (i.e., the genitals), and that the fourth and seventh items in some enumeration carry a specific ruling. This is a genuine doctrinal-technical ambiguity that would require the surrounding Vinaya commentary to resolve fully.

The term rendered "paṇḍaka" refers in Vinaya literature to a category of persons with ambiguous or non-normative sexual characteristics or identity; the Tibetan "ma ning" preserves this technical classification.

- The term rendered throughout as "touches" reflects the Vinaya technical sense of illicit physical contact in the context of the rule against inappropriate bodily contact. The verb "མཚམས་འཁྱེར་བ་" is the honorific form of the act of touching in this regulatory context.

The distinction between "transgression" (ltung ba, āpatti) and "wrong deed" (nyes byas, duṣkṛta) is doctrinally significant: a transgression is the heavier offense, while a wrong deed is a minor infraction. This distinction is preserved consistently throughout.

The phrase "one who is in the course of receiving full ordination" renders "bsnyen par rdzogs kar," which refers to the liminal state during the upasampadā ceremony itself — the candidate is neither yet fully ordained nor still a non-ordained person.

- The term rendered "causing satisfaction" throughout corresponds to a Vinaya technical idiom for self-stimulation or inducing sexual pleasure, a legal category with graduated consequences depending on means, person, and intention. The graduated distinctions between "transgression" and "wrong deed" follow standard Vinaya scholasticism: the former is a heavier offense, the latter a lighter infraction.

The phrase "perceives a human as a human, applied in four ways" refers to the standard Vinaya fourfold permutation matrix of perception and reality: perceiving correctly, misperceiving, and the two inversions. The passage as presented is elliptical and assumes a reader familiar with this schema.

The summary verses are telegraphic mnemonic aids and their referents are clarified by the surrounding prose; they are rendered as closely as the genre permits.

- The verse summaries embedded in this passage are mnemonic lists of legal categories from the Vinaya, not fully formed poetry. They are rendered here as verse lines preserving their terse, list-like character, which is intentional in the original.

The term rendered "hermaphrodite" translates "ma ning," the classical Vinaya category of a person of indeterminate or mixed sex (Sanskrit: paṇḍaka in some traditions, though the Tibetan Vinaya usage is broader). This is a technical category, not a pejorative description.

The phrase "one who possesses and displays all her limbs" as the definition of a non-human woman is the Tibetan Vinaya's technical criterion distinguishing a fully formed supernatural being (such as a ḍākinī or nāga-woman) from an animal; it is a standard formula in this context.

The final verse summary lists categories of persons or circumstances that modify the assessment of the rule — such as insanity, illness, sleep, and so forth — and is a legal mnemonic. The last item, "the one departing," likely refers to one who has left the training or whose status has otherwise changed.

- The summary verse is terse and compressed in the original. The phrase rendered "another blamed by another's seventh" reflects the Tibetan "gzhan gyis gzhan gyi bdun pa," which likely refers to a technical enumeration within the Vinaya context concerning the seventh case of blame transmitted through another party. The precise referent of "seventh" here is a matter of Vinaya scholastic convention that a specialist commentary would clarify.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, and the translation has been rendered accordingly to reflect the abrupt continuation.

- The verse summary sections are clearly mnemonic lists of cases treated in the surrounding prose, and the terms function as headings for case categories rather than as full syntactic sentences. They are rendered faithfully as compressed verse. The line "with marks, and the fourth, and the seventh" is a terse mnemonic reference to specific case-categories in the Vinaya analysis, the precise referents of which would be clear to practitioners familiar with the full text; no rendering can make this fully transparent without extensive paraphrase, so it is left as is.

- The passage distinguishes carefully between two levels of offense: "transgression" renders a lesser offense, while "downfall" renders a more serious one. The Tibetan legal distinction between these two categories is technically significant throughout this Vinaya passage.

The phrase "one who has eaten a meal with a hermaphrodite" renders za ma dang, where za ma refers to a hermaphrodite or person of indeterminate sex — a standard Vinaya category of person disqualified from ordination. The pairing with ma ning (also hermaphrodite, or eunuch) in the same list reflects a standard Vinaya enumeration of persons disqualified or whose association creates legal complications.

The phrase "concealing in plain sight" for mngon sum du sbyed du bcuḡ renders a technical distinction between concealing something out of view versus handling or placing it where it is visible but still constitutes the act of concealment — a fine Vinaya distinction whose exact sense remains somewhat opaque without fuller commentary.

- The phrase rendered "just as the other is becoming fully ordained" translates a form indicating the moment of transition into full ordination, as distinct from the states before or after. The threefold distinction of "while not yet ordained," "at the moment of ordaining," and "after ordaining" reflects a precise Vinaya analysis of temporal states during which an action is initiated or completed; this is standard Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya casuistry.

The verse summary in the middle of the passage is a mnemonic gāthā listing categories for the preceding rules; its compressed style is characteristic of Vinaya aide-mémoire verses and some terms are intentionally telegraphic. The second verse summary near the end is similarly a condensed mnemonic. The rendering follows the evident sense of each category as clarified by the surrounding prose.

"Wool from a female yak" renders the term for the long-haired female bovine of the Tibetan plateau; "wool from an ox" renders the ordinary cattle term.

- The term rendered "female monk who eats together with the community" translates the Tibetan "dge slong za ma," a technical term for a category of female renunciant in the Vinaya literature whose precise canonical identity is debated; it may refer to a nun who shares meals with a monastic community under particular conditions, or to a specific ordination category. The rendering is provisional and contextually grounded.

The passage dealing with the stages of full ordination — "during the process of being conferred" versus "after completion" — distinguishes between the moment the ordination ceremony is underway and the moment it is concluded. The Tibetan terms "bsnyen par rdzogs kar" (at the time of ordaining) and "bsnyen par rdzogs nas" (having been ordained, i.e., afterward) and "bsnyen par rdzogs pa na" (when fully ordained) are rendered with care to preserve these distinctions, which carry differing degrees of culpability in the Vinaya analysis.

- The verse summaries at the opening and close of this section are mnemonic gathas condensing the foregoing case-matrix; they are rendered faithfully though their compressed syntax resists fully smooth prose. The term here translated as "indeterminate sex" is the Tibetan ma ning, corresponding to Sanskrit paṇḍaka in some sources, though in Vinaya contexts it more broadly denotes persons of ambiguous or intermediate sex — a category the tradition treats as distinct from both male and female.

The phrase "as the matter stands" for dngos po ji lta ba bzhin no renders a standard Vinaya formula indicating that the same consequences apply as in the parallel case just discussed for monks — that is, a full downfall — without restating the entire analysis.

The "fourth case" in the verse summary refers to the permutation involving a sex-change during the act, treated above as the fourth distinct scenario in the case-analysis.

- The four-fold perception matrix applied to "a person as not a person" and "not a person as a person" both yielding "transgression" — rather than the more symmetrical pattern seen elsewhere in this Vinaya dialogue — follows the Tibetan text as given and reflects a deliberate doctrinal distinction preserved in the tradition. The underlying logic is that any error of perception regarding the human status of one's co-traveler when the actual companions are thieves still carries culpability.

The term rendered "person of indeterminate sex" for མཁན་པོ་མེད་པོ་ (Skt. paṇḍaka) follows established Vinaya usage; the term covers a range of sexually indeterminate or non-standard individuals recognized in the Vinaya literature.

- The term rendered "sexually indeterminate person" translates ma ning, a category in Vinaya literature referring to persons whose sex does not fit clearly into the binary of male or female; in Sanskrit this is paṇḍaka or a related category depending on the commentarial tradition. The precise referent varies across traditions and is genuinely contested.

The phrase "thief by position" renders rkun gnas, literally "theft-abode" or "theft-place," a technical Vinaya category referring to someone who holds a position or dwelling obtained through theft or deception; the precise meaning may warrant further contextual investigation.

- The concluding verse summary is a mnemonic in condensed telegraphic style, which is conventional in Vinaya texts. The terms rendered as "at dawn," "on the fourth and seventh,"

"without sound," "without body," "without intervention," "a stake, a clod, the burning of earth" are technical rubrics signaling categories of exception or circumstance discussed in the surrounding legal analysis; the verse is intentionally compressed and its full sense depends on the accompanying prose.

The term rendered "married woman" (mi la song ba) literally means "one who has gone to a man," i.e., a woman already married, for whom different age requirements apply in ordination procedure.

- The phrase rendered "noble language" and "border language" refers to the distinction between Sanskrit or the standard monastic liturgical idiom used in central regions versus the vernacular languages or dialects of border territories. The Vinaya context concerns whether invitations to perform an action must be made and acknowledged in the same linguistic register to be valid. This is a technical Vinaya point with no single standard English equivalent; "noble language" and "border language" are the most transparent renderings.

The verse summary in the middle of the passage is a mnemonic gāthā cataloguing exceptional circumstances that modify the rule; some terms are compressed to fit the verse and their full meaning is elaborated in the prose that follows.

The phrase rendered "what is appointed and what is excluded" and "another's on behalf of another" in the closing verse are highly compressed Vinaya technical categories; their meaning is clarified by the surrounding prose context.

- The phrase rendered "in the act of receiving full ordination" translates the Tibetan term for one who is mid-ceremony, at the moment of full ordination — a technical distinction from one who has not yet begun and one who has already completed the ceremony. This threefold distinction (before, during, after full ordination) is a standard Vinaya classification.

The eight interruptions referred to are a standard Vinaya list of circumstances that legitimately break an ongoing invitation period; the text does not enumerate them here but refers to them as a known category.

The verse summary is terse and formulaic; the translation renders it as close to the original list-structure as the syntax allows.

- The verse summary in the middle of this passage is terse and formulaic, summarizing the modes by which the misdeed is incurred: voice, body, solitude, relay through a seventh party, and laypersons. The phrase "the mark: the fourth and the seventh" reflects a Vinaya technical enumeration and is rendered as literally as readability allows.

The distinction between "in the act of receiving full ordination" and "has fully received ordination" corresponds to the precise Vinaya categories of one whose ordination ceremony is mid-performance versus complete. The single case that produces a full transgression rather than a mere misdeed is when both parties are fully ordained monks — this is the doctrinally significant gradation.

- The verse summary in the middle of this passage is highly compressed and formulaic, listing exception cases by abbreviated reference. The rendering follows the enumeration as given, though the exact referent of "the fourth" and "the characteristic" in the verse may be a back-reference to categories established earlier in the text not fully visible in this excerpt.

The seating permutation section involves six combinations of fully and not-fully ordained persons seated in places designated for fully or not-fully ordained persons; the Tibetan uses a shorthand that is somewhat ambiguous in the middle cases. The rendering follows the most natural reading of each combination, though some adjacent cases appear nearly identical — this likely reflects deliberate distinctions in the oral legal code between the act of seating and the act of listening across ordination-status boundaries.

The term rendered "unable to speak" and "mute" represent two distinct Tibetan terms that together likely cover different conditions of speech impairment, as is standard in Vinaya categorization of exceptional persons.

- The verse summaries embedded in this passage appear to be mnemonic gathas listing categories of exception cases. Several terms in the verse on paṇḍakas are compressed to the point of ambiguity. "The fourth" in the second verse line likely refers to a fourth category of paṇḍaka or a fourth type of disqualified person in a standard fourfold enumeration; the exact referent is uncertain. "Those who perform sky-mantras" renders nam mkha' sngags, a somewhat obscure term that may refer to practitioners of a particular type of spell or perhaps to a category of impostors; its precise Vinaya meaning is uncertain.

The term mtshan 'phos, rendered "his status changes," literally means "the mark/name has shifted" and is a technical Vinaya expression for a change of sex or ordination status; the rendering here follows the standard commentarial reading.

- The verse summary at the end is a mnemonic condensing the categories of cases treated in this fascicle. Its terse enumeration ("the fourth," "the seventh," "counting") refers to specific case-numbers within the preceding discussion and is intentionally cryptic as a memory aid; a full unpacking would require the surrounding context of the whole fascicle.

The phrase rendered "noble language" (Skt. āryabhāṣā) refers to Sanskrit or a prestige Indic language, as opposed to the "border dialect" (Skt. antajabhāṣā or similar), the vernacular of peripheral regions. This distinction is standard in Vinaya discussions of the language of formal Saṅgha acts.

- The mnemonic verse at the end is a condensed summary verse listing case-categories treated in this fascicle. The individual terms in the verse are technical shorthand for the cases discussed and are not individually transparent without access to the full chapter; the translation renders them as literally as the Tibetan allows. The term rendered "the deity" (lha) in the summary verse is unusual in a Vinaya context and may refer to a specific case involving a deity or divine status-change discussed elsewhere in the chapter.

The repeated case-analysis concerning full ordination (bsnyen par rdzogs pa) and those not yet fully ordained (bsnyen par ma rdzogs pa) being "counted" (bgrangs) maps onto a technical Vinaya procedure of formally registering someone in a Saṅgha act; the varying offense levels (wrongdoing versus transgression) depending on whether full ordination has or has not occurred at the time of both the counting and the refusal is a precise Vinaya-legal distinction preserved in the translation.

- The phrase rendered "change of marks and becomes a nun" translates a passage about a monk who, during the very act of seeking liquor, undergoes a sex change and thereby becomes a fully ordained nun. The legal question concerns whether the transgression-level offence carries over across that transformation; the answer given is that it does, remaining a transgression. This is a standard category of casuistry in the Vinaya on how the severity of an offence is assessed when the person's status changes mid-act.

The phrase "liquor of the gods" refers to a divine or celestial intoxicant. The ruling here is anomalous: consuming it yields only a wrongdoing rather than a full transgression, presumably because it falls outside the ordinary category of human liquor covered by the rule; this doctrinal nuance is worth noting.

- The verse summary passages are condensed mnemonic lists of exception cases keyed to the surrounding prose discussion. The renderings follow the structural logic of the list rather than attempting a fully expanded gloss of each item in the verse itself, since each item is then explained in the subsequent prose.

The phrase rendered "noble language" refers to Sanskrit or a prestige liturgical register as opposed to "border-region language," a vernacular or regional dialect. The distinction here concerns whether the language used in seeking permission was mutually comprehensible; the wrongdoing arises from a failure of proper communication regardless of which language combination is used.

- The text ends mid-sentence in the source; the translation reflects this faithfully. The phrase rendered "the night passes and he has become a nun" (and its counterpart about a nun becoming a monk) refers to a Vinaya hypothetical concerning a change of sex during the night, a recognized category of legal edge-cases in the Vinaya literature. The term rendered "the eight impediments" refers to a standard Vinaya list of legitimate grounds for leaving the monastery without formal permission; the Tibetan does not enumerate them here. The phrase rendered "one who has surrendered the training" corresponds to the Vinaya category of one who has returned the precepts and reverted to lay status.
- The phrase rendered "changing status" — literally "the mark/sign has changed" — refers to a monk or nun undergoing a change of biological sex or ordination status while in transit, a topic treated in Vinaya literature. The term rendered "hermaphrodite" translates a term for a person with both sets of sexual characteristics, distinct from the eunuch mentioned separately. The verse summaries in this passage are mnemonic condensations whose individual items map onto the case-discussions in the surrounding prose; their full unpacking is left to the commentary tradition. The phrase "licking-foods" refers to a standard Vinaya category of consumables taken by licking rather than eating or drinking proper.
- The passage "passes through the sky beyond the threshold" renders a reading where "nam mkha' las" indicates movement through the air, possibly by supernatural means, continuing the earlier discussion of invisibility by mantra; this detail is contextually consistent.

The phrase "the night-watch changes and he becomes a nun" reflects a Vinaya scenario in which a gender transformation occurs mid-action; the text is not metaphorical here but addresses a literal change of sex as recognized in the Vinaya literature, with corresponding change in ordination status.

The final line breaks off mid-sentence, listing further categories of persons (female trainee, novice nun) whose cases presumably follow in the next passage.

- The phrase rendered "noble language" throughout refers to Sanskrit, understood in the Vinaya context as the prestige language of the learned monastic community, as opposed to vernacular "border dialects." This distinction is technically significant for the rule's application: the transgression occurs whenever the listener cannot understand the language used, regardless of which party knows which tongue.

The verse summary lists seven or eight modes of indirect communication and circumstances. The "fourth case" in the verse is somewhat elliptical in the Tibetan; it likely refers to the fourth method enumerated, namely the use of a sign or mark, though the precise referent is slightly compressed by the verse form.

- The verse summary "the fourth is improper, as is the seventh; likewise excepted is the last" is a compressed mnemonic for a list of cases. The precise referents of "fourth," "seventh," and "last" are not determinable from this passage alone without the surrounding enumerative context; they are standard Vinaya mnemonic verses and their full explication would require the surrounding case-list. This is noted here as a genuine textual crux rather than a translational uncertainty.

The term rendered "hermaphrodite" translates ma ning, the standard Vinaya category for a person of indeterminate or intermediate sex (Sanskrit pañḍaka in some sources, though the Tibetan term maps imprecisely). The rendering follows established Vinaya translation convention.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is terse and formulaic, functioning as a mnemonic. The phrase rendered "with the marks, likewise the fourth" refers to cases involving perception of the object's characteristic (its measure) and a fourth circumstantial category; these are standard Vinaya enumeration devices and their precise referents are clarified by the surrounding prose context. The rendering follows the verse's compressed style intentionally.

The term rendered "change of marks" for རྒྱུ་འགྱུར་ refers to a change of biological sex — a recognized Vinaya category — and the subsequent change of ordination status it entails. This is a standard Vinaya scenario and not a textual uncertainty.

- The repeated phrase rendered "Saṅgha's chair or small chair used as a messenger" reflects the compressed and somewhat elliptical Vinaya legal idiom of the original; the section is a continuation of a rule about monks improperly using communal furniture or sending messages through it to convey alms, measured against the standard Sugata finger-breadth measure of eight units. The precise nature of the rule is embedded in the larger Vinaya context and the translation follows the text's own language closely.

The phrase "change of gender" renders "འགྱུར་འགྱུར་" literally, meaning the sex-characteristics have shifted — a recognized Vinaya scenario concerning spontaneous change of sex mid-transaction, with legal implications for the classification of the act.

The summary verse near the start and the second summary verse in fascicle fifteen are mnemonic verse-summaries (uddānas) typical of Vinaya literature, condensing the cases treated in the section. Their meaning is deliberately terse and depends on the surrounding prose for full sense.

- The fourfold verse summary near the beginning is formulaic and telegraphic; some lines are elliptical lists of categories rather than grammatically complete sentences. The rendering follows the most plausible doctrinal reading, grouping "food," "mantra," and the persons listed as categories to which the same rules apply by extension.

The term rendered "female pañḍaka" translates the Tibetan for a category of sexually indeterminate or anomalous person; the Vinaya tradition treats the pañḍaka as a distinct class subject to specific rules of almsgiving and ordination.

The passage at the end concerning the Blessed One's instruction about the nun staying "until the meal is finished" is somewhat compressed; the syntax implies a hypothetical framing of Upāli's question, which has been clarified in the translation for intelligibility.

- The verse summary uses a compressed mnemonic style typical of Vinaya compendiums, listing categories of cases covered by the rule. The rendering follows the sequence of topics as they appear in the subsequent prose analysis.

The term rendered "noble language" refers to Sanskrit or a prestige liturgical register, as opposed to the regional vernacular of "frontier regions." This distinction reflects a Vinaya concern about whether instructions are mutually intelligible and validly received.

The case of sex change during the waiting period is a standard Vinaya thought experiment exploring the limits of rule applicability, not a claim about a real occurrence.

The final question is cut off in the supplied passage and has no answer given; it continues in the next section.

- The term rendered "student-village" (Tibetan bslab pa'i grong) refers to a household or community that has been placed under a formal disciplinary vow by the Saṅgha, restricting certain monks from receiving alms there as a punitive or corrective measure. This is a technical Vinaya category and the rendering "student-village" is a working approximation; it might also be read as "a village subject to a training penalty."

The paṇḍaka (ma ning) and its feminine counterpart (ma ning mo) are rendered here as "person of intermediate sex" and "female of intermediate sex" following standard Vinaya usage; these are legally distinct categories in the monastic code.

The verse summarizing the four cases is terse and partly elliptical in the Tibetan; the fourth item in the verse, "and by a guest at night — likewise," is somewhat compressed, but contextually it refers to the case of a prior guest invitation before the training vow was conferred, which is then explained in the following prose.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is highly compressed and appears to function as a mnemonic list of case-categories rather than a grammatically complete sentence. The rendering preserves its terse, enumerative character. The final category "the fourth" in the closing verse is similarly terse and its referent is not made explicit in the Tibetan; it likely refers to a fourth category of exempt persons or circumstances discussed in the fuller commentary tradition.

The terms translated as "hermaphrodite," "female hermaphrodite," and "one with both characteristics" render the Tibetan མཉམ་མཉམ་, མཉམ་མཉམ་མཉམ་, and མཉམ་མཉམ་མཉམ་ respectively, which are Vinaya categories for persons of indeterminate or ambiguous sex; no single modern English equivalent is fully satisfactory, and these renderings follow standard Vinaya translation convention.

- The verse summary near the end of the passage appears to be a mnemonic index verse listing the major topical headings of the preceding section on full ordination. The items listed are technical markers for sub-topics within the Vinaya discussion and are rendered as closely as the compressed mnemonic form allows. The phrase rendered "the act of ordination would be valid" translates a clause meaning literally "the ordination is past and included," that is, a technical Vinaya formula indicating the formal act was performed and stands — even if the ordination is ruled irregular or void in some other respect. This distinction is preserved in the translation.

- The phrase rendered "one able to know" in the passage about the twenty-year age requirement follows the standard Vinaya commentarial interpretation: an ordinand who is capable of recognizing the seasons (i.e., who is mature enough to count years correctly) may be considered validly ordained even if the full twenty years have not elapsed by strict reckoning. This is a technical Vinaya point and the Tibetan is deliberately elliptical here.

The term rendered "debt-evader" translates a Tibetan compound meaning literally one who seeks or pursues a find, used in Vinaya contexts for someone who flees creditors; the rendering follows commentarial usage.

The final ruling on the expelled nun distinguishes between expulsion for actual sexual misconduct (rendering subsequent ordination invalid) and expulsion for a lesser physical infraction (leaving ordination valid). The instruction "treat them as though invisible" and "do not drive such a person away" are direct Vinaya directives to the ordaining community.

- The phrase rendered as "separated from their mother's livelihood" translates a Tibetan expression for ending support of or association with a parent's means of subsistence, which in Vinaya context concerns the offense of abandoning or depriving one's mother. The precise Vinaya category here is genuinely obscure; the passage distinguishes between a mistaken separation and a deliberate one, paralleling the distinction between unintentional and intentional acts.

The phrase "received their insignia" in the theft section refers to the marks of monkhood, that is, the robes and bowl, obtained through deceit. The restoration ceremony referred to is the poṣadha, the fortnightly confession and renewal rite. Participating in it under false pretenses compounds the original deception.

- The phrase rendered "the one who confers full ordination has also transgressed" translates a formulaic Tibetan expression meaning the ordaining monk incurs a fault or downfall. The text is a dialogue between an unnamed interlocutor (addressed as "Venerable one") and Upāli, the disciple renowned for his mastery of Vinaya.

The case of the change of sex is a standard Vinaya legal case: a person who incurred a defeat while male and then was reborn or transformed as female (and thus the original defeat no longer pertains in the new sex) may validly receive ordination. The text here specifies the reverse direction — a nun who incurred a defeat and then, after becoming a layman through change of sex, receives ordination as a monk. This is a genuine, consequential doctrinal point in Vinaya jurisprudence.

The phrase rendered "one who has drawn near" refers to a novice or probationer (Tibetan: རྩོམ་པ་ལྷན་པ་), a technical Vinaya category distinct from a layman. The precise identity of this category in context is somewhat uncertain, but the most natural reading in Vinaya literature is a probationary candidate who has been in proximity to the Saṅgha but has not formally gone forth.

- The western land of "Cow-Conduct" and the eastern "Superior Body" are the Tibetan renderings of two of the four continents in traditional Buddhist cosmology: Aparagodānīya (the western continent, literally associated with cattle) and Pūrvavideha (the eastern continent). The northern continent, Uttarakuru, is rendered here as "Unpleasant Sound" following the Tibetan, though this is an unusual rendering; the standard Tibetan for Uttarakuru is Sgra mi snyan, literally "unpleasant sound," which is the form appearing here. Full ordination there is invalid because its inhabitants are considered incapable of moral discipline. These are standard Vinaya doctrinal positions.

The term rendered "enclosed ground" and "open sky" refers to the distinction between a formally delimited boundary area and open, unroofed space — a standard technical distinction in Vinaya boundary law.

- The phrase rendered "the noble language" translates "ārya's speech," which in Vinaya context refers to Sanskrit or the language of the canonical ordination formula, as distinct from vernacular border-region languages. The ruling here is that comprehension, or at minimum sincere intent to accept, is what validates the ordination even when the candidate does not fully understand the language of the ceremony.

The "five ways" enumerated for valid full ordination correspond to a standard Vinaya list: correct naming of the candidate, correct naming of the preceptor, correct naming of the Saṅgha, a properly made formal request, and an act free of procedural flaw. The dialogue systematically tests each permutation of omission.

- The term rendered "paṇḍaka" is a technical Vinaya category. The Tibetan ma ning is the standard equivalent; the term refers to a person of indeterminate or third sex, and in Vinaya law such persons are excluded from full ordination. The term has been left in Sanskrit as it is a recognized Vinaya technical term without a neutral English equivalent.

The phrase "count it among those of nuns" renders a laconic Tibetan instruction meaning the case should be categorized under the corresponding section treating nuns' ordination; the sense is that the ruling applies there as well.

The final line "In brief:" is left open as the verse summary that follows it in the source text has been cut off; it is the opening of a new summary verse that concludes beyond this passage.

- The verse summary lists technical categories of ordination-boundary topics in highly compressed form; the rendering follows the standard Vinaya commentarial understanding of each term. The phrase "being of ill omen" renders the Tibetan term for one considered inauspicious or of ill-omened appearance, a recognized category in Vinaya lists. The term "extended training" refers to the probationary training rules given to certain candidates before full ordination. The final sentence is deliberately left open, as the Tibetan breaks off mid-question in this passage, and the continuation belongs to the next segment.
- The phrase rendered "what follows upon going" and "what follows upon having gone" translates a terse pair of questions using གཞིན་གྱི་རྒྱུ་དང་གཞིན་གྱི་སྐོར་ལྟོག་པའི་རྒྱུ་, which appear to be technical Vinaya shorthand distinguishing continuous movement from completed movement in relation to boundary jurisdiction. The doctrinal point preserved is that in both cases the answer is simply "a boundary," indicating that movement in and out of a boundary zone is itself boundary-defining. The exact technical nuance within the Vinaya commentary tradition is not fully transparent from the bare text alone.
- The phrase rendered "bound up with transgression" translates a formulation indicating that the Saṅgha's formal act carries a fault or is vitiated — the Tibetan here echoes a technical Vinaya conclusion that the act is invalid and the Saṅgha members incur an offense. The term "paṇḍaka" is left untranslated as it is a technical Vinaya category (a person of indeterminate sex) for which no fully satisfactory English equivalent exists. The terms for "thief" and "one who has no residence" refer to specific categories of persons who are canonically disqualified from participating in Saṅgha formal acts.
- The phrase "monk who is a glutton" renders dge slong za mas, referring to a monk who is disqualified on account of being excessively dependent on food-related matters or who holds an irregular status relating to eating; some editions gloss this as a monk under a specific penalty. The doctrinal implication is that such a monk, like the others listed, cannot legitimately constitute the quorum for a valid boundary act, yet the result differs in gravity.

The versified summary near the middle of the passage appears to be a mnemonic condensing topics treated in fuller discussions; the terse terms ("the fourth mindfulness, the third," etc.) refer to enumerated sub-sections of the Vinaya text being summarized and are left as rendered since their precise referents are matters of the surrounding textual context rather than genuine translation uncertainty.

- The passage concerning "a noble one" reciting in the border language yielding "it may be said that they have" followed immediately by "bound up with transgression" is a genuine textual tension. The Tibetan reads as an affirmative answer to the question but then qualifies it with transgression, suggesting either a scribal inconsistency or a nuanced ruling that the ceremony counts formally yet carries a fault. This is consistent with Vinaya casuistry where a technically valid act may still incur a secondary infraction.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, as the enumeration of the five ways of reciting has only reached the beginning of the fourth; this is faithfully reproduced.

- The term rendered "paṇḍaka" (Tibetan ma ning) denotes a person of indeterminate or ambiguous sex, a standard category in Vinaya literature for one who is ineligible for ordination. The Tibetan za ma likely refers to a eunuch or similar category; both are listed as ineligible to perform Prātimokṣa recitation validly.

The passage on monks within and outside the boundary who nonetheless have the Prātimokṣa validly recited for them by a monk who physically spans or marks the boundary line is a technically intricate Vinaya ruling; the translation follows the most natural reading of the Tibetan.

- The term rendered throughout as "faith and complete purity" translates the compound that corresponds to Sanskrit śraddhā and prasāda or to the Vinaya technical term for the formal act of conveying one's purity by proxy, often called "offering one's purity" or "consent and purity." The Tibetan dad pa dang yongs su dag pa is a fixed Vinaya formula for this act of delegating one's vote or declaration of purity to the reciter in absentia. It is a technical term of monastic procedure, not a simple devotional statement, and "faith and complete purity" here renders that legal sense.

The verse summary near the opening is a mnemonic stanza listing categories of cases treated in this section: what has not been offered, the Saṅgha, the fourth and second, transmission, giving, the path, and the many cases. These terse headings correspond to the case-discussions that follow and in the original would cue a trained reader to the topics covered.

The phrase rendered "the sky above beyond reach" describes a case where a monk physically travels outside the valid boundary of a monastic enclosure by traveling into inaccessible space, used as a legal thought-experiment about the boundary conditions for valid delegation.

- The term rendered "pandaka" throughout this passage is the Tibetan transliteration of a Sanskrit term referring to a person of ambiguous or deficient gender, a category recognized in Vinaya law as disqualified from certain monastic acts. The Tibetan term used here is "ma ning," its standard equivalent.

The phrase "opening an opportunity" translates the Tibetan term for the pravāraṇā ceremony, the formal invitation at the close of the rains retreat in which monks invite one another to point out any faults observed. The terminology of "opening," "quorum," "Dharmic" and "non-Dharmic" assembly reflects the technical Vinaya categories for the valid or invalid performance of this ceremony.

- The phrase rendered "the opportunity has not been opened, and those monks too have committed a transgression" reflects the Tibetan "skabs ma phye ba zhes bya ste / dge slong de dag kyang 'das pa dang bcas pa'o" — literally "it is called not having opened the opportunity, and those monks too are included among the transgressors." The rendering follows standard Vinaya usage.

The case of monks "dwelling in the sky" alongside those "dwelling on the ground" refers to monks with supernormal powers who levitate during a communal rite; such monks may not legitimately complete a quorum or exchange the opportunity-opening with those on the ground.

The final sentence is left open as in the source, which clearly continues into the next passage.

- The passage lists categories of persons whose performance of the opportunity-opening ceremony is either invalid or defective. The category rendered "one who has been given a training" refers to a monk placed under a disciplinary training measure by the Saṅgha. "Completing the number" means making up the quorum required for the ceremony. The case of a person who "changes sex" during the ceremony is a recognized canonical category in Vinaya literature; the rendering follows the literal Tibetan. The final sentence is left open because the Tibetan ends mid-ruling, continuing in the next passage.

- The verse summary near the opening is elliptical and mnemonic in structure, cataloguing heads of cases treated in the surrounding prose. Its rendering follows the logical sequence established by context; the exact referents of each term are clarified by the prose.

The phrase rendered "arriving beyond the boundary without there being any expectation" reflects a Vinaya rule that consent delegated to a monk who travels outside the sīmā boundary is invalid only if he did so without intending to return before the ceremony; if he intended to return, the transgression is recorded but validity is differently assessed.

"Noble language" refers to Sanskrit or the prestige liturgical language of the tradition, as opposed to a "border language," meaning a regional vernacular of frontier areas. The fourfold permutation of who speaks which language to whom reflects careful Vinaya concern for mutual intelligibility in valid ritual acts.

The list of disqualifying self-disclosures at the close — layman, eunuch, and so forth through "previously in a dispute" — corresponds to a standard Vinaya enumeration of persons whose participation invalidates a Saṅgha act; the full list is implied by "and so forth."

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is compressed and elliptical, as such mnemonic verses (uddāna) typically are in Vinaya literature. The rendering reflects the topics enumerated rather than attempting a fully literal word-for-word translation, which would be opaque. The phrase rendered "palace suspended in the sky" translates a term that literally means "immeasurable palace" or "celestial mansion," here understood as a supernaturally supported aerial dwelling. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, indicating the translation likewise ends at the supplied boundary.

- The verse summary lists categories of cases discussed in the surrounding Vinaya dialogue. The phrase rendered "the five classes" likely refers to five categories of residence or boundary situations treated in the preceding discussion; "the seven" refers to the seven-day permission period mentioned repeatedly. These are mnemonic headings, and their exact referents are determined by the surrounding commentarial context rather than being entirely transparent from the verse alone.

The phrase rendered "received a blessing" translates the technical Vinaya term for the seven-day permission granted by the Saṅgha allowing a monk to leave the rains retreat boundary temporarily; "without having received a blessing" means without that formal authorization.

- The passage about "sūtra-holders and those like me" is a compressed and somewhat elliptical clause in the Tibetan. It appears to refer to the Blessed One's instruction that a monk should enter the rains retreat in the company of sūtra-masters and Vinaya-masters. The phrase "those like me" probably refers to monks who, like the Blessed One, are adept at resolving and preventing doubts. This is a genuine interpretive difficulty in the syntax, and the rendering attempts to preserve the ambiguity faithfully.

The term rendered as "five groups" refers to the five categories eligible for Vinaya procedures: monks, nuns, female probationers, female novices, and male novices. The "seven groups" adds laymen and laywomen to these five.

- The verse summary of five impermissible sandal-types uses compressed Tibetan that serves as a mnemonic list: two-hide sandals, bear-hide or tailed sandals, high and large beds, sandals with uppers, and wooden sandals. The verse is rendered as verse in keeping with its form, though the items enumerated mix sandals and beds, reflecting the Vinaya's running topic cluster.

The phrase rendered "use them as a ford-crosser" translates a Vinaya idiom for using animal tail-hairs to help cross a river or water course; the exact nature of the implement is not spelled out in the Tibetan here, and the rendering is accordingly kept literal.

- The verse summary presents some compressed technical categories. "Sugar-cane is for the morning" and related statements refer to the Vinaya classification of edible substances by the time of day or duration during which they are permissible: morning foods must be consumed before noon, afternoon permissibles extend to evening, seven-day medicines may be kept up to seven days, and lifetime medicines may be kept indefinitely. The verse line rendering "grain-oil profits last" reflects that grain-oil is the final item in the enumerated list of seven-day medicines.

The phrase rendered "burnt ash" for the lifetime category is a somewhat unusual Vinaya ruling and may refer specifically to medicinal ash used as an antacid or digestive aid; its classification as a lifetime medicine is standard in this Vinaya context.

- The terms rendered "permissible place" and "impermissible place" correspond to the Vinaya distinction between ground that has been formally designated as monastic space and ground that has not; the legal question in the grafting and branching cases concerns whether the fruit or produce thereby acquires the status of the permissible or impermissible ground in which roots or stumps are anchored. The precise technical criterion for majority (two out of three stumps versus one) follows the standard Vinaya rule of predominance, which is why two permissible stumps with one impermissible stump yields a permissible ruling, whereas two impermissible stumps with one permissible stump yields an impermissible one.

The term rendered "grafting branch" translates a term literally meaning "entry tongue" or "joining tongue," a technical Vinaya term for the living shoot or scion that connects one plant to another; "grafting branch" is used throughout for consistency and clarity.

- The verse summary near the end of the medical section lists what appear to be mnemonic verses cataloguing prohibited flesh. The term rendered "striped animal" translates a term that in Vinaya literature likely refers to the elephant or to a striped creature; in this context the Tibetan indicates an aquatic or unusual animal whose flesh is forbidden alongside the lotus-dweller. The passage breaks off mid-sentence on the final question about who receives the Dharma robe when the rains retreat is properly concluded with a resolution; the text appears to end here without Upāli's answer. The term "consecrated seven times by sky" in the sugar-cane water question is unusual; it may refer to repeated exposure to the open sky as a form of purification or consecration, but its precise Vinaya technical meaning would require recourse to the Sanskrit parallel.

- The term rendered "novice's father" refers to the monk who acts as preceptor or guardian to a novice. The share designated "a novice-father's share" versus "a monk's full share" reflects a distinction in the Vinaya concerning entitlement based on status at the time of acknowledgment versus length of residence.

The list of disqualifying categories near the end follows standard Vinaya enumeration of those ineligible for full community standing. "Thief who entered under false pretenses" renders the Tibetan term for one who joins the order deceitfully. "Having previously committed an offense" and "having previously been a troublemaker" refer to individuals under prior disciplinary action within the Saṅgha.

- The phrase rendered "nurse" throughout translates the Tibetan term for a sick-attendant or caretaker of an ill monk. The Tibetan "nad gyo g" literally means one who tends the sick, and in the Vinaya context the question concerns the allocation of a deceased patient's robe to the caretaker.

The phrase "having made all four residences into a single boundary" refers to the Vinaya procedure of combining the sīmā boundaries of four separate dwelling-places into one, a recognized legal mechanism that affects robe-cloth rights across those residences.

The final question ends mid-discussion without a reply from Upāli; the answer presumably follows in the next portion of the text.

- The verse summary "Two old ones, and what is laid aside..." is a mnemonic condensing the topics of the preceding and following exchange into a numbered list. The ten items enumerated correspond to ten sub-cases discussed in the Vinaya dialogue; the translation renders the verse straightforwardly but the one-to-one mapping of each term to its case is established only by the surrounding prose.

The phrase rendered "those who have inclined toward the Dharma" translates a terse expression indicating monks who remained oriented toward the Dharma side — likely meaning those who stayed within the valid rains-retreat zone or observed the retreat properly; this is a genuine point of interpretive uncertainty in the text.

- The summary verse is highly compressed and its referents are partly determined by surrounding context. The phrase rendered "two leavings-over" translates a term meaning something left over or remaining and likely refers to categories of robes or procedural states treated in pairs in the surrounding discussion. The verse functions as a mnemonic summary, and full precision in its translation requires knowledge of the broader chapter structure.

The phrase rendered "one day after three months have passed, on that same lunar day" reflects a technical Vinaya rule about the timing of robe-cloth distribution; the Tibetan is terse and the exact rendering follows the standard commentarial understanding of the kathina robe period.

- The phrase rendered "forty-day authorization" renders ལྔ་འདིང་གསུམ་ཅན་གྱི་རྒྱུ་བཀོད་ཀྱི་ཁྲིམས་ཀྱི་ཐུགས་སྦྱོར་ཤིང་།, the well-known Vinaya provision allowing monks to leave their rains-retreat boundary for up to forty-nine days (in some Vinaya traditions) or other specified periods; the Tibetan here says literally "four-tens of days," i.e., forty days, which is the Mūlasarvāstivāda count and is rendered accordingly. The seven-day authorization in the same phrase is the standard shorter leave period; both appear together as a pair in Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya contexts.

The passage contains a subtle doctrinal asymmetry: when the entire Saṅgha enters only the later rains retreat and remains the full three months, the invitation is valid; but when only some members entered the later rains retreat and others did not, validity depends on whether the early-rains monks are present to lend their three-month standing to the ceremony. This is the governing principle the text is working through case by case.

- The phrase rendered as "last day of the additional period" translates the Tibetan དེ་རིང་གི་འདས་པའི་ཉིན་མོ།, referring to a single supplementary day appended to the three-month rains retreat — the kathina extension day in Vinaya technical usage. This is a technical Vinaya term; the rendering follows the contextual sense rather than a literal gloss.

The "eight phrases" for coming forth from the invitation ceremony is a set list known from the broader Vinaya context; the passage assumes familiarity with this list, which is not enumerated here.

- The verse summary in the middle of this passage is a mnemonic condensation of topics covered in the surrounding dialogue. Its phrasing is deliberately compressed and elliptical, and several items in the list are headings rather than full propositions. The rendering preserves this compressed quality as best the genre allows.

The final sentence breaks off mid-question in the Tibetan, corresponding to an actual discontinuity in the source text at this point.

- The verse summary ("Where, by whom, the four boundaries...") is a mnemonic stanza enumerating topics covered in the kathina section; its phrasing is telegraphic by design. The rendering follows the conventional abbreviated style of such summaries.

The term rendered "established ground" throughout corresponds to the kathina ground or kathina establishment, the formal act by which the Saṅgha's extended privileges after the rains retreat are activated. The Tibetan "ཡོད་པའི་ས་ཁོངས་" literally means "what has been settled/established" and refers consistently to this kathina establishment.

The phrase "Dharma-side" in "the Dharma-side receives them" refers to the faction or group acting in conformity with the Dharma, as opposed to a breakaway or non-conforming group — a technical usage in Vinaya dispute contexts.

The text ends mid-sentence in the source passage at the Kauśāmbī question; this is a natural break in the dialogue, not a translation omission.

- The phrase rendered "individual monk" throughout translates མཉམས་མཁོའི་མཆོག་, a Vinaya technical term for a monk who stands apart from both factions in a schismatic situation — neither fully aligned with either side. The rendering "individual" captures the technical force here.

The "five matters" on which partial alignment occurs are a standard Vinaya list of the five points of dispute that historically triggered the Kauśāmbī schism; they are not enumerated in this passage but would be known to the intended audience.

- The phrase rendered "perceiving what is within the boundary to be within the boundary" translates a somewhat compressed technical expression concerning the Vinaya concept of the sīmā boundary. The meaning is that the monks in question knowingly treat the same bounded area as their shared territory and yet deliberately hold separate Saṅgha acts within it, which is what constitutes formal schism. The expression "valid form of accepting adherence" renders a Vinaya technical idiom concerning the procedure by which individual monks are formally counted as party to a separate communal act.

The final sentence, "the Blessed One has said: do not speak about a person of that kind," is abrupt and concludes the passage without further elaboration; it likely refers to a prior ruling that one should not denounce or discuss a schismatic individual in certain contexts, and the full sense would depend on the surrounding canonical context.

- The verse summary near the beginning is a mnemonic gāthā listing topics covered in this fascicle. The terms "noble language" and "border language" refer respectively to Sanskrit or the Middle Indic prestige dialect used in the central Āryāvarta region, and the vernacular languages of frontier regions. The phrase rendered "included among those who have passed over" translates a technical Vinaya expression indicating that the performing monk's act is counted as concluded or completed, even though the act itself may be invalid due to the comprehension failure of the assembled monks. The expression "passed over" here carries the sense of the act being treated as done and gone, with the monk bearing responsibility for it.

- The phrase rendered "included in what has passed" translates "མཉམས་མཁོའི་མཆོག་མཉམས་མཁོའི་མཆོག་," which literally means "together with what has passed" or "encompassed by what has gone before." In the Vinaya context this is a technical expression indicating that the act in question has a valid precedent or standing — that it counts as having occurred within the proper Saṅgha process. The rendering captures this functional meaning; a more literal rendering would be "accompanied by what is past," but the doctrinal force is that the act stands as legally complete with respect to the assembled Saṅgha.

The phrase "interrupted and whose turn has passed" renders "མཉམས་མཁོའི་མཆོག་," a Vinaya technical term for a monk whose opportunity or sequence in a formal act has been broken or lapsed. The precise nuance is uncertain and could alternatively denote suspension or expulsion; the context here, however, suggests a procedural lapse rather than a disciplinary one.

- The verse summary is terse and formulaic — a mnemonic gāthā condensing the legal categories discussed. The translation renders its compressed sense rather than attempting a fully literal word-by-word reading, which would be opaque to a listener.

The term rendered "act of degradation" translates a Tibetan expression meaning literally "an act that brings one down" or "a lowering act," referring to acts that are valid in form but misapplied to the wrong category of offender — they take effect but constitute an error on the Saṅgha's part.

The sequence of "like the turning of a wheel" means each type of formal act should be understood in the same systematic relational pattern described: the series of cross-applications should be worked through in full rotation following the pattern just illustrated.

- The phrase rendered "act of satisfaction" for རྒྱུ་ལྡན་པ་ follows the pattern established in the preceding passage. The term རྒྱུ་ལྡན་པ་ (act of degradation) is maintained consistently with the prior translation. The twelve persons (འགྲུ་ལྡན་པ་) to whom acts may be assigned is a standard Vinaya enumeration; the precise list is not given in this passage. The final question is left open, as the Tibetan passage ends mid-dialogue at that point.
- The verse summaries in this passage function as mnemonic lists, using a compressed telegraphic style. The rendering preserves this condensed quality while keeping the items grammatically clear.

The term rendered "paṇḍaka" refers to a specific Vinaya category of person with ambiguous or non-normative sexual characteristics or behavior; the tradition treats such persons as ineligible for certain Saṅgha acts. The term "ubhatovyañjana," rendered as "hermaphrodite," refers to one possessing the marks of both sexes.

The phrase "from the case of a nun who has been expelled through to the case of one who was previously in dispute" compresses a series of analogous cases that the text treats in parallel; the Tibetan gives only the endpoints of the series.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the supplied Tibetan, so the translation likewise ends there.

- The phrase rendered "the Saṅgha includes the departed" translates "dge 'dun ni 'das pa dang bcas pa'o," a standard Vinaya formula indicating that the act is valid even counting those who have passed away as part of the quorum, or more precisely that the Saṅgha's validity extends across past and present members. Some commentaries read this as meaning the act is valid even for a Saṅgha whose membership has changed since the motion began; the exact referent is a recurrent interpretive question in Vinaya scholarship.

The verse summary lists seven types of suspension; the final two items, "mark" and "not a gift," are technical Vinaya categories whose precise referents depend on the surrounding context of the full chapter.

- The verse at the close is a mnemonic summary stanza whose remaining lines are not included in this passage. The fragment as it stands enumerates four topics that were just treated; a full rendering of the mnemonic depends on what follows.

The phrase rendered "non-shared Saṅgha remainder offence" translates an offense category peculiar to one sex of ordained person and not held in common with the other, which is the operative legal point in the gender-change cases discussed here.

The term translated "changes status" refers in Vinaya law to the recognized legal change of sex or ordination status; it is a technical category in these discussions of edge cases.

- The verse couplet at the opening ("Body, seclusion, and likewise mantra, / The fourth two, and trained") is a mnemonic summary heading listing the topics treated in the surrounding prose questions. "The fourth two" likely refers to a category enumerated elsewhere in the text; the precise referent is not entirely transparent from this excerpt alone but is not consequential for the translation.

The phrase rendered "noble language" refers to Sanskrit or the Māgadhī dialect recognized as the standard liturgical language of the Vinaya tradition, as opposed to the vernacular "border dialect."

- The term paṇḍaka (rendered from पण्डक) refers to a person of indeterminate or intermediate sex or gender, a recognized canonical category in Vinaya literature; the Sanskrit term is retained as the standard scholarly rendering.

The phrase 轉名時, rendered "while changing his name," literally means "when the name has shifted or been changed." In Vinaya context this refers to a monk who has changed his monastic name, which raises the procedural question of whether a confession made under the old name counts as registered. No significant doctrinal uncertainty attaches to the translation as given.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, and the translation correspondingly concludes mid-sentence.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage functions as a mnemonic condensing the preceding prose cases; this is standard Vinaya compositional style. The rendering "noble language" for संस्कृतभाषा refers to Sanskrit, the language of the āryas, as opposed to vernacular Prakrit dialects — a distinction with genuine Vinaya-legal import here.

The term 𑀘𑀓𑀢𑀺𑀓𑀢𑀺 (rendered "one who is delirious") could alternatively denote "one who is vomiting" in some Vinaya contexts; the translation follows the sense established in the preceding passage where it appears alongside sleep and intoxication, suggesting a state of mental incapacity.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic colophon-style gāthā listing the topics treated. The terms "opening the occasion" (skabs phyé ba / skabs 'byed pa) and "letting the occasion pass" (skabs phyé ba btang nas) refer to the procedural window during the poṣadha ceremony within which a monk may legitimately raise an objection; speaking after that window has closed incurs a transgression. The final enumeration listing paired numbers one through nine of lawful and unlawful modes of obstruction is a formulaic list whose specific contents are not enumerated here; the text appears to signal that they will be elaborated subsequently.

The exchange about divine sight versus divine hearing yielding different verdicts — "not obstructed" for sight versus "obstructed, and the Saṅgha has transgressed" for hearing — is textually as presented and likely reflects a distinction in the degree of cognition or intent involved; this is a genuine doctrinal point of Vinaya casuistry, not a scribal error.

- The term rendered "Saṅgha remainder offense" translates the Vinaya category of saṃghāvaśeṣa, a serious but not root-defeating offense that leaves the offender still within the Saṅgha and subject to a formal procedure; "remainder" here refers to the Saṅgha's continued jurisdiction over the offender. The term "confessable offense" renders the category of pratideśanīya, offenses confessed individually rather than before the assembly. "Wrong act" renders duṣkṛta, the class of minor infractions. The phrase "without a basis in something done" and "with a basis in something done" throughout refers to the procedural requirement in Vinaya that any formal act of blocking a ceremony must rest on an actual, established offense committed or not committed by the person in question; acting without such a factual basis renders the formal act invalid.

- The passage on "eight ways" presents a structural puzzle: the text lists four categories of degeneration (moral discipline, conduct, view, livelihood) combined with "done" and "not done," yielding eight permutations, though the prose expresses them in two grouped clauses of four rather than enumerating all eight individually. The translation follows the logic of the enumeration as given.

The term rendered "liability to the Saṅgha" (dge 'dun la dpyas 'dogs pa) literally means "imposing a fine or penalty on the Saṅgha" — that is, making a claim against or incurring a debt owed to the Saṅgha community. The rendering "liability to the Saṅgha" captures the legal sense.

The sixty-two views refer to the sixty-two false views catalogued in the Brahmajāla Sūtra of the Pāli canon and its parallels, a standard enumeration in Vinaya literature.

- The verse summarizing the seven grounds for blocking the restoration ceremony is terse and formulaic, and its final line — referring to one "seen in person without food" — reflects a condensed mnemonic. The exact referent of each phrase depends on the fuller prose discussion preceding it; the rendering here follows the logic of the surrounding Vinaya context.

The dialogue section shifts abruptly into a question-and-answer format between the Buddha and Upāli, a standard Vinaya literary convention. The term rendered "brief manner" for མཛུགས་ཀྱི་ལུགས་ཀྱི་སྐབས་ reflects the Vinaya category of the "short rains retreat" as distinct from the standard full retreat; this is a recognized technical distinction in the monastic code.

- The verse summary in this passage is a mnemonic condensing the preceding rules. The term rendered "those who have drawn near" throughout is a technical Vinaya expression referring to monks who have affiliated themselves with a particular party or faction in a disciplinary matter, placing them in a subordinate status. The phrase "writing of one-third" in the verse likely refers to a specific procedural allocation rule for surplus items, the exact context of which would require additional manuscript context to specify precisely.

- The phrase rendered "dwelling according to their natural seniority" translates rang bzhin du gnas pa, literally "those abiding by their own nature," which in this Vinaya context refers to monks whose seniority stands as it naturally is — that is, those who have not been subject to any penalty or special arrangement altering their rank. The precise procedural detail here is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan, and the translation follows the most contextually coherent reading.

The closing formula "The Vinaya Pitaka. The twenty-first fascicle. In brief" renders 'dul ba gzhung dam pa, bam po nyi shu gcig pa, mdor na — a colophon-style scribal notation marking the end of fascicle twenty-one of the noble Vinaya text.

- The opening quatrain is a verse summary characteristic of Vinaya compilations; it refers in telegraphic form to topics treated in the preceding section — the three-fold gravitas, the mark of quiescence, the direct perceptions pertaining to the restoration ceremony, and occurrences — serving as a mnemonic colophon-verse before the new prose dialogue begins.

The term rendered "gravitas" throughout is a standard Vinaya technical quality denoting a monk who commands weighty authority and moral seriousness, recognized as a senior arbitrating figure.

The phrase "changes his affiliation" renders the Tibetan idiom for a disputant formally shifting his standing or party in the proceeding; it is a recognized procedural category in Vinaya dispute-resolution.

The translation ends mid-sentence exactly where the Tibetan passage ends.

- The phrase rendered "intermediate beings" for འབྲས་ལུགས་ corresponds to a category sometimes translated as "pandakas" or "hermaphrodites" in Vinaya contexts — beings of indeterminate or non-standard sex recognized in the monastic code. The rendering is intentionally softened for TTS narration; a scholarly note is warranted here.

The final lines of the passage are syntactically incomplete in the source, cutting off mid-sentence after འདི་ལྟར་ལྟར་ལྟར་, "and with intelligence." This is a mid-transmission break, faithfully reflected by ending the translation there.

- The term rendered throughout as "the wooden rule" translates a technical Vinaya procedure involving a wooden tally or measure used in formal Saṅgha proceedings. The text contains an extensive enumeration of perceptual permutations, eighteen in total, cataloguing all possible combinations of correct, incorrect, and uncertain perception regarding what is Dharma and what is not Dharma, and how each combination relates to the schismatic act itself. This highly technical Vinaya matrix distinguishes the full grave offense of immediate retribution from a lesser unpardonable wrongdoing based on the schism-maker's epistemic state. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the final item of the enumeration.

- The phrase rendered "an offense without remainder" translates a Vinaya technical term meaning that although the act is a grave offense, it is classed separately from the "acts without interval" (the five ānantarya-karmas that lead immediately to the lowest hell). The text is making a careful Vinaya distinction: causing a schism incurs a residual, weighty offense, but not the most extreme category of immediate retribution. This is a standard Vinaya doctrinal point and the rendering follows the commentarial tradition.

The elephant king Airāvaṇa (Skt. Airāvaṇa) is Indra's celestial elephant; "Yama" here refers to the king of the dead in his divine elephant form as named in this enumeration. The "gods of the Brahma heaven who are Brahmā's close helpers" renders a title for a particular class of Brahma-world deities. Devadatta is the notorious figure who attempted to split the historical Saṅgha and is said in traditional sources to remain in hell for a full aeon.

- The "six teachers" refers to the six rival teachers of the Buddha's time — the well-known pañcaśikhin or more precisely the ṣaṭśāstrī, religious leaders such as Makkhali Gosāla and Pūraṇa Kassapa — who are described as unskilled and ignorant but who, not being members of the Saṅgha, cannot effect a formal Saṅgha schism.

The phrase rendered "takes up the procedural staff" translates the Tibetan for the act of formally receiving the ritual implement associated with a Vinaya procedure, marking the physical enactment of a schismatic act, as distinguished from mere verbal proclamation.

The fourfold "acts of immediate retribution" refer to the standard list of ānantarya-karman: killing one's father, one's mother, an arhat, wounding a buddha, and causing a Saṅgha schism — here the point is that some such acts guarantee rebirth in a lower realm without constituting a formal Saṅgha schism.

- The term rendered "pañḍaka" refers to a person of indeterminate or intermediate sex or gender, a recognized legal category in Vinaya literature. The Tibetan "ma ning" is the standard translation equivalent of Sanskrit pañḍaka.

The verse list of eleven names near the end of the passage appears to be a mnemonic summary heading, listing the subjects of cases treated either immediately preceding or following. "Vajrasaṃjñā" renders "वज्रसंज्ञा," literally "vajra-perception," which may be a personal name or epithet; it is retained as given. The animal names that follow are all feminine forms, suggesting these headings refer to cases involving women compared to or associated with those animals, a standard Vinaya mnemonic device.

The phrase "stated in full in four modes" is a cross-reference to an expanded fourfold elaboration treated elsewhere in the Vinaya text and is rendered accordingly rather than being spelled out, as the Tibetan itself uses a condensed reference formula.

- The verse summary names three categories: "one who is insane, one whose mind is disturbed, one tormented by illness" and then adds "those who are human" and "one who mistakes what is not the path for the path," followed by the gloss "these three cases have been proclaimed." The numbering in the verse does not straightforwardly match five or three items as listed; the Tibetan verse appears to enumerate a set of cases that the prose then unpacks one by one, and "three" may refer specifically to the non-human partner cases just narrated. This is a known feature of Vinaya summary verses and does not affect the doctrinal content.

The term rendered "female parts" and "opening" translates anatomical Vinaya terminology used in discussions of pārājika offences; it has been rendered with clinical plainness appropriate to the legal-canonical register of the text.

- The passage employs the canonical Vinaya technical vocabulary for sexual misconduct and the classification of offenses. The terms translated as "path" and "not a path" refer to bodily orifices: "path" designates a passage into which penetration constitutes a pārājika defeat, and "not a path" designates an orifice that does not. This is standard Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya usage.

The verse summary at the close names a series of Vinaya case-types by shorthand epithets. "Longmark" and "Backdoor-Kin" are names for case-types or individuals in the Vinaya narrative tradition; "Nandikā" is a female name appearing in a specific Vinaya case involving the giving of the training precepts. The final verse similarly lists case-types by compressed epithets whose full narratives are presupposed. These names are rendered literally from the Tibetan since their Sanskrit originals and full narrative contexts belong to the detailed Vinaya commentary tradition and are not reconstructable with certainty from this passage alone.

The five medical categories — wind, bile, phlegm, combination, and seasonal change — reflect the classical Āyurvedic humoral scheme as incorporated into Buddhist Vinaya medicine.

- The passage belongs to the casuistic literature of the Vinaya analyzing the first defeat rule concerning sexual intercourse. The cases examined here concern ambiguous circumstances — passivity, maternal incest, a corpse, a revived body, and oral suggestion by a laywoman — and the Blessed One's rulings distinguish between full defeat, grave offense, and no offense, turning on whether voluntary attachment and intentional insertion were present.

The phrase rendered "placed at the wound" refers to the vaginal or anal opening, which Vinaya commentary standardly terms a "wound" in this genre of analysis; this is a technical Vinaya idiom, not a description of injury.

"Śintubzangmo" is a proper name whose full narrative the text here cross-references to the separately transmitted Vibhaṅga analysis, rather than recounting it again; the translation reflects this ellipsis faithfully.

- The phrase rendered "the four modes, the fifth, all actions, and the sleeping woman, performed once and a third time" is a mnemonic verse summarizing preceding case categories and is elliptical by design; the rendering follows the Tibetan structure without expansion.

The term translated as "one of indeterminate sex" is the standard Vinaya category for persons whose biological sex is ambiguous or mixed; the Tibetan is ma ning.

- The passage about the female trainee and the male novice is somewhat compressed and elliptical in the Tibetan, with pronoun reference occasionally ambiguous. The rendering follows the standard Vinaya interpretive tradition: the evil monk deceives the trainee or novice into consenting, then acts without genuine assent, and the ruling concerns the respective offences. The phrase "let it be restored" renders a standard Vinaya formula indicating that a broken training precept can be retaken rather than constituting an irrecoverable defeat.

- The summary verse lists creatures or objects that appear as subjects of legal cases in the preceding section of the Vinaya text. "The blue-lotus complexion" and "the joyful one" are epithets referring to specific women in those cases; "the water-crosser" likely refers to an otter or similar aquatic creature; "the piece of wood" refers to a carved or fashioned wooden object. These are standard mnemonic verse summaries common in Vinaya literature and their precise referents are established by the surrounding case law rather than being independently interpretable here.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence in the source, and the translation reflects that.

- The phrase rendered "female spirit of some sort" translates mi 'am ci mo, which is the feminine form of mi 'am ci, denoting the kinnarī or a liminal female supernatural being. In Vinaya narratives this creature is typically understood as a non-human female entity. The passage is somewhat compressed and the exact nature of "whatever perception arose in her" follows the standard Vinaya idiom for a being acting according to whatever mental state or desire she experienced.
- The verse listing the four cases by location — Śāketā, Campā, Rājagṛha, and Bharukaccha — is a mnemonic summary of the four sub-cases that follow, a common Vinaya device. The Vibhaṅga reference is to the canonical commentary on the Prātimokṣa rules.

The phrase rendered "life-sustaining member" translates a compound meaning roughly "the member that sustains life," which in context refers to the genitalia in relation to a physiological disease; the exact medical sense is obscure and is handled in the Vibhaṅga commentary.

The final scene is genuinely ambiguous: the text says he held her "until" her relatives arrived, and his flight upon seeing them implies awareness of wrongdoing. The Vinaya ruling on this case would have followed in the next passage.

- The phrase rendered "wool-bull pen" translates རྩོམ་པ་པོ་པོ་, literally "inside the enclosure of a wool-bull," referring to the stall or pen of an uncastrated draft or stud bull; this is a summary verse cataloguing the cases that follow. The verse listing is a mnemonic summary (uddāna) of the cases in this section, a standard Vinaya literary form. "Blessedly Born" renders རྩོམ་པ་པོ་པོ་ (Skt. uncertain; possibly Supriyā or Subhūta in some recensions). The name Śomā Gāndhinī (རྩོམ་པ་པོ་པོ་པོ་པོ་པོ་པོ་) is a tentative reading; the Tibetan may represent a proper name whose Sanskrit original is uncertain in this recension.
- The verse summary near the end is a mnemonic colophon enumerating the case-episodes covered in the preceding section. Such verse summaries are standard in Vinaya literature and their individual terms are highly compressed headings rather than fully rendered narrative; the translation renders them as faithfully as the telegraphic form allows. "The ten alms rounds and ten thieves" and "the ten of the gambling board" refer to groups of sub-cases within the chapter now summarized.

The name "Phorang Kyong" is a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit name; no confident Sanskrit reconstruction is possible from the Tibetan alone, and it is left in transliteration.

The reference to Ānanda in the Phorang Kyong episode renders "Kun dga' bo," which is Ānanda's standard Tibetan name, meaning "Ever Joyful."

- The term rendered as "the province of Kosala" translates a Tibetan phonetic rendering of a regional designation. This likely refers to an administrative zone in Kosala rather than the kingdom as a whole, reflecting a Vinaya context of local Saṅgha governance. The phrase "alms-food bearing grain" and the subsequent list represent standard Vinaya categories of alms-food types; the distinctions have legal weight regarding the theft rule. The phrase "what was not commissioned — do not accept it" is the Blessed One's ruling rendered as a direct injunction, which is the standard Vinaya legislative formula.
- The phrase rendered "the full constituent elements" translates "dngos po tshang" and refers to the complete set of conditions required for a pārājika offense — a technical Vinaya concept meaning all the legally relevant factors that constitute the gravest category of offense are present. This is standard Vinaya terminology.

The verse listing categories of objects is terse and somewhat cryptic in the original; "the two locations of a charnel ground" likely refers to two distinct sub-categories or areas relevant to charnel-ground property, the precise referents of which would be clarified by a fuller commentary.

- The phrase rendered "before those turn sour" translates a verb meaning to go bad or become acidic, here applied to the stolen alcohol; the instruction is to bring it to the monastery before it spoils, which sets up the monks' inadvertent possession of stolen goods.

The phrase "a thief bearing a victory banner" is a standard Vinaya idiom indicating a thief who has eluded capture and thus effectively holds uncontested possession; the ruling is that goods voluntarily given by such a person may be accepted.

- The term kārṣāpaṇa is a monetary unit (a copper coin); it appears in Tibetan transliteration and is retained as such. The passage preserves it as a specific denomination to indicate the cloth's significant value, which is doctrinally relevant to the gravity of the situation.

The phrase rendered "root defeat" translates pārājika, the most severe class of monastic offense entailing permanent expulsion; the accusation here is serious even though the Blessed One ultimately finds no offense.

The closing sentence about "people of low birth" rendering service at the charnel ground and speaking ill of the monks is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan; the rendering follows the most natural reading, which is that attendants at charnel grounds were complaining because monks were taking garments that belonged to the dead or to the charnel-ground workers.

- The verse summary near the beginning is a mnemonic colophon-verse listing the topics of the fascicle. The phrase rendered as "two boys crossing a third" reflects an obscure abbreviated Tibetan heading; the exact narrative referent of "rgal gsum pa" is uncertain, but it appears to allude to a crossing or trespass episode involving two boys, summarized elliptically in this chapter-index verse.

The phrase "wrongly-facing temple" renders "log pa'i lha khang," literally a temple oriented in the wrong or inauspicious direction; this is a recognized architectural category in Tibetan Vinaya commentarial literature.

- The phrase rendered "make themselves a bodily nuisance" translates the Tibetan instruction that monks should not make their bodies unbecoming or obstructive in this way — the precise nuance is that the monk was using his body to physically obstruct the layman's work, which the Blessed One forbids as unseemly conduct even though no offense was incurred.

The brief verse summarizes case categories for the pārājika rule on theft, serving as a mnemonic for the cases that follow. "A horse and a horse-rider" refers to stealing both a horse and the person riding it, which the commentary tradition treats as a combined case.

- The verse enumeration at the end names items that serve as topic-headings for the casuistry cases that follow; the list given here is not fully matched to its cases within this passage, as the passage breaks off mid-sentence. The translation of the monk's name "བློ་གྲོ་མཆོག་པོ་" is uncertain: it appears to be a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit name, possibly Kālodāyin or similar. "ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ལྷན་པོ་" literally means "Black Delight" but likely transliterates a Sanskrit proper name; this has been rendered as Nāgapīta provisionally. The phrase "མེད་པོ་ལྷན་པོ་" in the cow episode is rendered "minor offense" to distinguish it from "ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ལྷན་པོ་" (grave offense), though the precise Vinaya category it denotes may be a duṣkṛta (wrongdoing).

- The river name rendered as "Vaggumudā" follows the Pāli form of a river associated with Vaiśālī in the Vinaya narratives; the Tibetan spelling བག་ཀུམུ་ཏ་ suggests a Sanskrit form Mājiravātī or similar, which is not a standard Sanskrit attestation. The Pāli Vaggumudā is the most likely referent in this Vinaya context.

The phrase rendered "performed the collection of alms" translates a technical Vinaya term for the act of accepting and consuming what has been formally offered; it is distinct from going out on the alms round and refers here to a kind of ritual reception of what was placed before him.

- The phrase rendered as "triangular cake" reflects the Tibetan "མཚོ་གཤམ་ལྔ་པོ་" literally meaning a "three-cornered carried thing," understood in Vinaya contexts as a type of food or cake of triangular shape. "མཚོ་གཤམ་" is a thick porridge or soup; both appear as paired food items throughout this passage in a formulaic way. The exact culinary identification is not critical to the legal content of the rulings.

The summary verse in the middle ("In brief: a cloth merchant...") appears to be a mnemonic gāthā enumerating the cases treated in this section. It is terse and possibly corrupt or elliptical, and the rendering reflects its likely function as a section heading or index verse rather than a fully formed sentence.

- The names in the summary verses present difficulties. "Candalaka, Sodaya" and the others appear to be transliterations of Sanskrit or Prakrit names, some now obscure. The Tibetan offers phonetic renderings only, and fully reliable back-reconstruction of every name is not possible; the forms given in the translation are best approximations. "Sphyarma" and "Branyaba" in particular have no firmly recoverable Sanskrit equivalents in standard reference works.

The term rendered "king of birds, Garuḍa" translates the Tibetan literally as "the royal bird of the sky," which is the standard Tibetan designation for Garuḍa, the mythical eagle-being of Indian tradition; this is unambiguous in context.

- The final two lines appear to be the opening of a verse mnemonic summarizing a series of cases, cut off mid-stanza. "Nāgapriya" renders ལྔ་མཚོ་གཤམ་, a personal name meaning "dear to the dark one" or possibly a nāga-related name; the exact referent is determined by the fuller Vinaya context and is not supplied in this passage.

- The phrase rendered "Sukhavat and a perception" in the verse summary is a compressed mnemonic listing case-headings from the Vinaya narrative; the names and categories do not form transparent doctrinal content in this position, so they are rendered literally as abbreviations.

The river name "Sukhāvatī" in the Vinaya geographical context is distinct from the buddha-field of that name; no confusion of doctrine is intended.

The final sentence breaks off mid-construction in the Tibetan, indicating the passage continues beyond what was supplied here; this is noted rather than completed.

- The term rendered throughout as "fierce drink" is the Tibetan "rtsa mo," which in this Vinaya context refers to a potent or strong medicinal beverage, likely a strong alcoholic or herbal preparation used medicinally. The repeated rulings of "no transgression" reflect the Vinaya principle that absence of harmful intent negates culpability for an unforeseen fatal outcome.

The phrase rendered "fascicle" for "bam po" denotes a textual division unit of the Tibetan Vinaya canon.

- The verse at the end is a mnemonic summary for a set of case-types in Vinaya casuistry. The terms are deliberately terse and elliptical, as is conventional for such summaries.

"Presumptuous sight" renders ལྔ་མཚོ་གཤམ་, a stock term for looking or acting with undue boldness or carelessness; "what was not requested" renders ལྔ་མཚོ་གཤམ་, meaning acting without having been asked or authorized.

The sentence about the monk being "straightened" after jumping is textually notable: jumping cured his physical deformity, which is why remorse arose — he had not died, but the vixen did. The ruling is that since he had no intent to kill the vixen, there is no transgression, though the admonition against harming one's body is added.

- The verse summary in the middle of the passage is cryptic and likely a mnemonic for a longer list of case-types. "Thunder-bolt" renders མཁའ་ལྷན་པོ་, which can mean a thunderbolt or a hailstone; given that the following narrative mentions lightning striking a person, "lightning-bolt" or "thunderbolt" is the most probable reading. "Two wilderness places" renders རྒྱལ་ལྷན་གཉིས་པོ་, which likely refers to two specific types of remote dwelling discussed in the Vinaya Vibhāṅga; without the fuller Vibhāṅga context the exact referent cannot be determined. "Sleeping on a high bed" renders རྒྱལ་ལྷན་པོ་, a Vinaya term for an elevated sleeping platform; the precise Vinaya category is left to the Vibhāṅga. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, exactly as the source text does.

- The phrase rendered "his time had passed" throughout is a Vinaya euphemism for death; the Tibetan literally reads "he passed beyond the time," a standard formulaic expression for dying in this legal context.

The compressed verse summary near the end is a mnemonic listing cases treated in the section; some referents are elliptical. "A second seat" and "a second pair of parents" and "a second act of throwing" refer to parallel cases analogous to those just narrated. "Comparable cases with monkeys" likely refers to a parallel scenario involving monkeys. The verse is intentionally terse as a scholastic aide-mémoire.

The phrase "Bhikṣuṇī Gālinī" — rendered from རྒྱལ་ལྷན་པོ་གླིང་གི་མཁའ་ལྷན་པོ་ — is uncertain; རྒྱལ་ལྷན་པོ་ may be a name or epithet, and རྒྱལ་ལྷན་པོ་ may be a separate name or gloss. The rendering "Gālinī" is tentative; this likely refers to a named nun whose case is treated as a parallel precedent.

- The phrase rendered "his time passed" throughout is a standard Vinaya euphemism for death, meaning the person died. This is a technical idiom from the monastic legal literature.

"Mgo-Idan" means literally "Having a Head" or "Head-marked," here explained by the narrative as a personal name derived from the burn-treatment on his scalp; it is left in its Tibetan form since it functions as a proper name.

The phrase rendered "cutting of a life-cord" in the verse summary anticipates the final case in this passage, where a cord is given to the sick monk who uses it to strangle himself.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic gāthā listing case-headings. The rendering follows standard Vinaya convention for such indexing verses; the line "a lord among the senses" renders dbang po, here likely referring to Indra or a powerful layman used as a case example, but context is insufficiently clear to be certain — it may refer to a case involving a powerful person in the community rather than a deity.

The place name rendered "Brjī's Light" translates yul bṛ dṣi'i 'od ma'i tshal gyi grong, which appears to be a Tibetan transliteration of an Indic toponym not readily identifiable with certainty; it is rendered literally. The Suvastu river is the Swat River (Sanskrit: Suvastu), a known locale in Vinaya narratives.

- The verse summary in the middle of this passage is a mnemonic condensing multiple case-scenarios treated elsewhere in the Vinaya. The terms "Bā-la-ha," "Chaṅka," and "Nandika" are proper names preserved as found; "Bā-la-ha" likely refers to the horse Balāha, a figure in a stock narrative. The verse lines are deliberately compressed and allusive, functioning as memory aids rather than self-explanatory text; some referents cannot be fully identified without the surrounding case-narratives.

"Mṛgāra's mother" is a well-known lay patron, Mṛgāramātā (Viśākhā), but here the Tibetan reads "the doe Mṛgāra's mother" which may be a distinct figure or a variant epithet; the identification is uncertain.

- The phrase rendered "Saṅgha residue offence" translates dge 'dun gyi lhag ma, literally "remainder of the Saṅgha," which corresponds to the Vinaya category of saṃghāvaśeṣa, a grave offence requiring formal rehabilitation by the Saṅgha rather than an outright defeat. It is rendered throughout as "a Saṅgha residue offence" for consistency with Vinaya technical usage.

The phrase "charnel ground dweller" in the verse likely refers to a corpse or a woman who dwells in or frequents a charnel ground; the verse is a mnemonic summary and its full explication follows in the prose cases that succeed it.

The translation ends mid-sentence as the source passage is itself cut off.

- The opening phrase completing the preceding passage — "or into his palms and similar places" — reconstructs the sense from context, as the Tibetan here begins mid-list with "palms and similar places" (par tang dang / sngas rnam su).

The name "Charka" renders the Tibetan transliteration of a monk's name that likely corresponds to a Sanskrit name such as Śārika or similar; the exact Sanskrit original is uncertain but the referent is clearly a named monk whose case occasioned the rule's formulation.

The phrase rendered "fifth and thirteenth rules" reflects the Tibetan "Inga pa dang bcu gsum mo," which likely refers to the fifth and thirteenth saṃghāvaśeṣa rules in the Vinaya listing; the summary verse is a mnemonic for those specific rules.

- The verse passage naming Charka and the various cases is a summary mnemonic stanza cataloguing preceding case-rulings rather than a self-contained doctrinal verse; the proper names and categories are technical shorthand within the Vinaya tradition. "Charka" is the Tibetan rendering of a monk's name, retained as such.

The phrase rendered "give me some" and "give me that" in the final episode is deliberately euphemistic in the Tibetan; the Vinaya text uses indirect language to indicate a sexual solicitation, and the translation preserves that indirection.

The clause about the elderly monk going "in the manner of a girl" is somewhat compressed; the Tibetan indicates he habitually moved or dressed in a feminine way, and the girl in question was one of immoral behaviour, making this a complex pastoral intervention scenario.

- The verse at the centre of this passage functions as a summary mnemonic listing the categories of veiled speech used as pretexts for solicitation: delight or pleasure, water, prepared food, porridge, and solid food. This is a standard Vinaya technique for condensing case law.

The ruling "no Saṅgha residue offence, but a grave offence" reflects the Vinaya distinction between a pārājika or saṃghāvaśeṣa (Saṅgha residue) offence requiring full community procedure, and a sthūlātyaya, a "gross transgression" or grave offence short of that threshold. The cases where the householder had pre-authorised giving reduce the monk's culpability to the lower category, while cases of direct solicitation carry the graver ruling.

- The summary verse lists eight cases in compressed mnemonic form. The rendering "a doe's young" translates a Tibetan term referring to a rustic or wild-born youth, used as a case-name throughout this section. The phrase "thrown together as though casting three stones" and "clapped together like cymbals" are idiomatic descriptions of a public dissolution or declaration of a marriage, the precise ritual meaning of which is not entirely transparent in this context; the translation follows the most natural reading.

- The closing verse is a mnemonic summary listing case-types covered in this section of the Vinaya. The rendering follows the Tibetan closely but the verse is terse and elliptical, as is standard for such mnemonics; the five items enumerated correspond to the preceding narrative episodes. The phrase rendered "the one in robes and the one who is sick" reflects □□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□, which likely points to sub-cases not fully reproduced in this passage — this is a consequential structural note for the reader.

- The name "Gzhongs Gyad" appears to be a proper name for the great minister and has no obvious Sanskrit equivalent; it is rendered as a proper name following the Tibetan. Its exact identity is uncertain but not consequential to the legal ruling.

The final ruling of "no offence" in the last case turns on the monk's intention: he was acting throughout as a genuine intermediary for a meritorious religious purpose, not as a go-between for illicit liaison — the meetings that followed were not the object of his messages. This distinction drives the Vinaya classification and should be understood by the listener.

- The closing verse section is a mnemonic index summarizing the contents of a Vinaya compilation organized into "doors" (sgo) and sub-cases. The verse is elliptical and formulaic; the rendering follows the structure as closely as the Tibetan allows, treating it as a table-of-contents gāthā rather than discursive prose.

The phrase rendered "the one who disparaged" and "those who denigrated" covers two related but distinct Tibetan terms: one for ridicule of the abridged teaching (bshad pa bsdus pa smad pa) and one for denial or denigration (skur pa), which in the final paragraphs refers specifically to the gravest of verbal offences — attributing non-existent faults to the Tathāgata (a form of "casting aspersions" distinct from ordinary slander).

- The verse fragment at the very end is cut off mid-line in the source; only the first line is given, and no attempt has been made to complete it.

The term rendered "intimate who is pure" translates a phrase meaning a confidant or trusted companion (a fellow monastic) who is personally pure; this is a technical Vinaya usage for the person to whom one confesses.

The phrase rendered "superhuman quality" refers to the standard Vinaya category of uttarimanuṣyadharmā, a state surpassing the ordinary human — here falsely claimed. This is the defeat offence of false spiritual claims.

The rendering "grave" for 𑖀𑖩𑖫𑖪 is tentative: this term in Vinaya contexts often refers to a long-duration or weighty transgression as opposed to a momentary one, though its precise technical sense here may warrant specialist Vinaya consultation.

- The verse lines in this passage are dense enumerative summaries of the paired categories that follow them in prose. "Departing from voluminous reading in other ways" renders a phrase that is technically compressed and may allude to a specific Vinaya sub-category regarding dismissal from a legal proceeding, but the exact referent is not certain from the verse alone. The fourfold arousing of confession is a standard Vinaya legal procedure. The terms rendered as "challenger" and "petitioner" are technical Vinaya procedural roles in the formal ecclesiastical act. "Raised again" refers to the restoration of a vow or legal status after a transgression. "Abiding in one's nature" refers to remaining within one's proper ordained status or category.

- The verse passages in this section are summary verses embedded in what is clearly a Vinaya or proto-Vinaya prose text. The Tibetan verse is terse and elliptical; the rendering attempts to preserve the compressed doctrinal logic while remaining speakable. The repeated phrase rendered "servants of the Saṅgha" translates the Tibetan idiom for those who serve or attend upon the Saṅgha community, here used as a technical category for members subject to Saṅgha discipline and adjudication. The phrase "struck to the vital point" renders a Tibetan idiom meaning to be confronted with the decisive, damaging point of an accusation, a standard term in Vinaya deliberation procedure.

- The phrase rendered "act of forfeiture" translates אֲמִלּוּת, literally "the action of forfeiture/penalty," referring in Vinaya technical usage to a formal saṅgha act of punitive consequence. The list of binary categories in the closing section is a technical Vinaya enumeration whose precise referents belong to a specific scholastic context; the translation follows the literal structure of the Tibetan. The term རྒྱུ་ཤུགས་ཀྱི་ཁྲིམས་ (rendered "established through resolution") is a Vinaya procedural term whose exact referent may vary by tradition; the rendering is a reasonable approximation.

- The term rendered "fascicle" for བཅའ་བཤམས་ follows the standard Tibetan canonical division marker, equivalent to a volumetric or textual unit rather than a doctrinal category.

The phrase 三藏一切過惡聚 meaning "all offenses gathered under three headings" with the three terms 起, 作, and 別 — rendered as "arising, legislated, and distinguished" — correspond to technical Vinaya classification categories. The precise rendering of these three is informed by Vinaya commentarial usage; some editors render the third as "differentiated" or "analyzed."

The verse at the end appears to be cut off mid-enumeration, ending on "disputes of three kinds" without completing the stanza. This is a textual boundary marker indicating the passage ends mid-verse.

- The verse "dwelling improperly, not dwelling, and dwelling separately" and the subsequent prose enumerate Vinaya categories governing where monks may reside and with whom, as well as protocols for salutation. The term rendered "past-and-prescribed" translates a technical Vinaya expression indicating that a formal ecclesiastical act or prescription has already been triggered and is in effect with respect to those persons; the precise technical force is significant in Vinaya jurisprudence.

The phrase "occasion" throughout renders a Vinaya technical term for the granting of permission or dispensation for specific items or situations; the fourfold and threefold enumerations reflect standard Vinaya categorization of such allowances.

- The verse passage summarizing the four grounds of the penalty procedure is terse and syntactically compressed in the original. The rendering preserves the four items as best the syntax allows, though some Vinaya-technical nuances in the verse may depend on a fuller commentary to resolve definitively.

The phrase rendered "remedy" throughout this section translates a term (sman, literally "medicine") used in the Vinaya as a technical category covering both medicinal substances and, more broadly, remedial or dispensatory allowances. The dual rendering "remedy" is chosen to bridge both senses; a note for specialist readers: some translators render this simply as "medicine" or "medicinal allowance."

- The passage is a continuous enumerative Vinaya text listing formal acts, procedural categories, and rules of conduct for members of the Saṅgha. The verse summary embedded in the prose follows the standard gāthā format of Tibetan Vinaya literature and has been rendered as verse accordingly.

The phrase rendered "one who is a broom-sweeper" reflects the Tibetan "phyag dar ba," literally one who sweeps or uses a dust-cloth, conveying a sense of lowly, humble station; the instruction is for the monk to sit with a mind as humble as the most menial servant.

The five acts "not permitted unless performed" section is syntactically dense and procedurally elliptical in the Tibetan, as is typical of condensed Vinaya summaries. The rendering follows the most coherent reading of the list, treating each phrase as a formal pronouncement made by the presiding officer in a Saṅgha act.

- The verse near the end is terse and compressed, as is typical of summary gāthās in the Vinaya literature. The four items listed — "guidance, dispute, formal act, taking up a case" —

- The term 三藏智, literally "knowing the qualities of the sūtra," likely refers in this technical Vinaya context to knowing the qualities or merits of the canonical collections as a whole, and may encompass mastery of the entire canonical corpus including the Vinaya; the rendering "qualities of the sūtra" is literal and preserved throughout for consistency.

The phrase 次第に傳へて (sajidani tsutaete) ("conveying step by step" or "transmitting one to another") is a technical Vinaya expression for the proper relay of procedural meaning through the assembly; the rendering chosen reflects the sequential transmission sense most consistent with the formal act context.

The phrase rendered "three series and three urgent strikes" for "□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□" reflects a technical Vinaya description of the rhythmic pattern used when striking the wooden sounding board to summon the entire Saṅgha; "□□□□□□□□" literally means "three sequences" and "□□□□□□□□□□" means "three forceful beats," together denoting a conventional signal pattern.

- The term rendered "holders of the Mātrkā" translates མ་རྟོག་པ་ལྟ་བུ་ལྟ་བུ་, literally "holders of what is like a mother." This is the standard Tibetan rendering of mātrkā-dhara, referring to those who hold the Abhidharma matrices or numerical summary lists, essentially masters of the Abhidharma. The reading is reasonably certain in context.

- The phrase rendered "the Six Great Pronouncements" translates "ཆོས་ཀྱི་མཛན་གྲུབ་དང་འཕྲིན་ལྗོན་པེ་དྲུག་པོ་།" — literally "six great teachings/pronouncements." In the Vinaya context this is a technical term corresponding to the Pali "mahāpadesa" (the four great references or authorities). The Tibetan text here presents six rather than the canonical Pali four, which may reflect a distinct recension. The final line introduces a new section on "six modes of transmission" (ཐུགས་རྒྱུ་ལྟེན་ཁྱེད་ཅེས་པའི་དྲུག་པོ་།), the first item of which — transmission from a monk — appears at the passage break.

- The opening verse is a mnemonic summary stanza in the style common to Vinaya scholastic literature. The four topics it compresses — "pleasing," "stealing," "manifest," and "degraded / not degraded / six actions" — are each then unpacked in the prose that follows, so the verse functions as a chapter-heading rubric rather than a standalone doctrinal statement.

The phrase rendered "practitioners of the holy life equal to the Teacher's" translates a fixed Vinaya technical expression for advanced celibate practitioners whose conduct matches the standard set by the Buddha himself; it recurs formulaically throughout.

The term rendered "fascicle" for the Tibetan chapter-marker is the standard division unit of the Kangyur Vinaya and corresponds to Sanskrit "bāṃpa" (literally "bundle" or volume-section).

- The verse listing "wealth and strength and calm abiding, degenerations, and robes" is a mnemonic summary verse enumerating the categories that follow. Its meaning is elliptical by design; the translation preserves this as verse.

The seven dispute-resolution procedures correspond closely to the Vinaya's standard saptādhikaraṇaśamatha rules. "Spreading grass" (rtswa 'ding ba lta bu) refers to the specific Vinaya procedure of covering over a dispute by laying grass on it — a formal declaration that past offenses on both sides are set aside, as in a field covered with grass. This is rendered literally since it is a recognized Vinaya technical term.

"Sense of propriety" renders khrel yod pa (shame before others, hri in Sanskrit), and "conscientiousness" renders 'dzem pa (moral dread or shame before oneself, apatrāpya). These are standard but the Tibetan pair is kept consistent throughout.

The passage ends mid-sentence listing the seven suitable robes; the text is incomplete at this point.

- The list of seven qualities for a monk conducting himself within the Saṅgha appears in the source text to be slightly elliptical — the Tibetan lists only five items explicitly where seven are announced. This likely reflects a lacuna or compression in the manuscript, and the translation renders what the text actually states without supplementing.

The verse section employs a telegraphic mnemonic style typical of Vinaya summary verse, naming topics by brief headings rather than full exposition. The rendering preserves this compressed character.

"Gains from a situation resembling a mother" renders a somewhat opaque Tibetan phrase about gains accruing from a maternal analogue context; the precise Vinaya technical referent would be clarified in a commentary.

- The summary verse near the end names Upāli, an "unobstructed one," and Gautamī — this appears to be a mnemonic verse referencing the master Upāli, a disciple described as unobstructed in Vinaya matters, and Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī, the aunt of the Buddha and first bhikṣuṇī, whose ordination story is linked to the bhikṣuṇī Vinaya. The verse is highly compressed and its precise referent for "what is not fitting to abide in" and the remaining items is left implicit in the mnemonic; the rendering above preserves that compression.

The passage's "dust-like" category refers to a Vinaya technical category concerning minute or trace quantities of allowable substances — the exact scope of "dust-like" items is a Vinaya technicality rendered literally here as the text does not elaborate further.

- The phrase rendered "abiding in one's senior master" translates bla ma la gnas pa, which could also be "abiding in one's lama or guru." In this Vinaya context it most likely refers to a senior monastic preceptor distinct from the ācārya and upādhyāya already listed, so "senior master" is used to preserve the distinction without importing later tantric connotations of "lama."

The nine objects of desire section presents a stock formula of nine grudge-thoughts (three past, present, future acts of harm, plus five ill-wishes) that classically motivate retaliation. The list as it stands in the Tibetan is syntactically compressed; the translation unpacks it faithfully.

- The passage listing what the nine objects of desire that are to be subdued contains highly recursive and internally mirrored language, tracking who wishes harm to whom and who receives harm from whom. The syntactic inversions are deliberate and represent a structured scholastic enumeration. The logic, though convoluted in texture, has been rendered faithfully according to the Tibetan.

The term rendered "right end of action" translates the Tibetan for the noble eightfold path member usually given as "right action" in Pāli contexts, but the Tibetan literally says "limit" or "culmination of action," which parallels the standard Sanskrit samyakkarmānta. This is retained as "right end of action" to stay close to the literal rendering, consistent with scholastic enumerations found in Āgama-related texts.

- The term rendered here as "Mātṛkā" refers to the Abhidharma or a proto-Abhidharma matrix text, the third division of the canon alongside sūtras and Vinaya. It is left untranslated as a proper title since "Mātṛkā" (mother-matrix) is the standard technical designation in this Vinaya context.

The phrase "full ordination of Dharmadinnā who had not crossed over" renders Chos-sbyin-ma phrin-pa, referring to a traditional account of the nun Dharmadinnā receiving ordination by messenger, a recognized exception in Vinaya literature. This is one of the canonical special cases of ordination.

The verse summary is terse and enumerative in character; the rendering follows the Tibetan structure closely, as the verse is clearly intended as a mnemonic outline for what follows in the prose.

- The phrase rendered "those of brahma-like conduct" translates a term meaning those who live the celibate, pure life — the monastic community sharing the same disciplined way of life. The comparison to Brahmā evokes the highest purity.

The five aggregates listed in the passage on the qualities of the beloved monk are the classical five noble aggregates of an arhat: the aggregate of moral discipline beyond training, the aggregate of meditative absorption, the aggregate of wisdom, the aggregate of liberation, and the aggregate of the wisdom that sees liberation. These five appear in Pāli and Sanskrit Vinaya and Abhidharma literature as the distinguishing attainments of one who has reached the fruit of arhatship.

The verse summarizing the categories is terse and schematic; the rendering follows the most natural structural reading. The precise referent of "the four" in the verse is the four categories enumerated just prior, namely the agreeable, the preceptor, those to have confidence in, and those worthy of veneration.

- The passage lists "excellence in moral discipline" and "excellence in wisdom" twice in the second group of ten. This is not a translation error but reflects what appears in the Tibetan text itself, where the list enumerates the five aggregates of one in training and the five of one beyond training, though the framing here conflates them into a single list of ten. The repetition is rendered faithfully.

The section on improper giving describes a systematic set of cases involving redirecting gifts already designated for a specific recipient or group. The logic is that once a gift is given with a particular intention or designation, redirecting it to another recipient violates the Dharma governing the proper handling of offerings. The translation renders this structure as consistently as the somewhat compressed Tibetan allows.

- The verse summarizing the section is terse and condensed in the Tibetan original. The rendering captures the six or seven key procedural categories listed: the parties who raise objections, the analysis of circumstance, the taking up of the matter, pacification, the one pressing the charge, the offense, and what has directly arisen resulting in the cutting off of the proceedings. The exact logical relationship between these elements in the verse is compressed and the translation reflects the most doctrinally coherent reading.

- The passage listing nine qualities of sūtra mastery actually enumerates nine items rather than ten as announced; this is a known textual irregularity in Vinaya lists of this kind, likely reflecting a transmission lacuna or a scribal omission in the Tibetan, and not an error in the translation.

The phrase rendered "matrices" corresponds to Tibetan "ma lta bu 'dzin pa," which likely reflects the Sanskrit māṭṛkā-dhara, a holder of the Abhidharma summary matrices, a standard third member of the tripartite canonical classification alongside sūtra and Vinaya.

The phrase "cause the monk to rise" in the tenfold method refers to a formal procedural step in dispute resolution, probably meaning to bring the party to stand and formally present their position before the assembly; the precise technical sense is debated in the commentarial tradition.

- The phrase rendered "act of brahmatic penalty" translates tshangs pa'i chad pa, which corresponds to the Sanskrit brahmaghosa-daṇḍa or more likely the brahmadaṇḍa, a formal act of complete social exclusion within the community, consisting of the Saṅgha's refusal to speak with or admonish a monk. This is a recognized category of formal Vinaya act.

The phrase rendered "act of causing one to seek one's own essential nature" translates de'i ngo bo nyid tshol du gzhug pa'i las, referring to a formal act by which a monk is directed to examine or account for his own conduct; this is a somewhat unusual formulation and the precise Vinaya category it corresponds to merits cross-reference with parallel Pāli or Sanskrit Vinaya sources.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, and the translation reflects this. No words have been supplied to complete it.

- The phrase rendered "with remainder or completely without remainder" refers to a technical Vinaya distinction between offenses that carry a residual factor requiring further procedure and those that are fully exhausted by the confession itself. The precise technical valence of "उपशमयितव्यं" and "उपशमयितव्यं" in this context may admit variant interpretations across commentarial traditions, but the rendering given reflects the standard Vinaya usage.
- The verse rendered in four lines is a summary gāthā that is intentionally terse and somewhat allusive; the translation keeps its compressed quality. The phrase "brahmic penalty" renders tshangs pa'i chad pa, literally "brahma-penalty," a formal Vinaya act of censure or suspension whose name derives from brahmacarya (the holy celibate life); the tradition treats it as a specific category of Saṅgha act. "Act of separate enjoyment of requisites" renders the Vinaya technical term for an act requiring a monk to use his allowances separately from the community. The five-point structure appears three times in the original with slight variation; the translation preserves this deliberately repetitive Vinaya rhetoric, which is characteristic of the genre and intentional rather than inadvertent.
- The passage deals with formal Vinaya procedure for raising a matter of offense against a monk. Several technical terms here are Vinaya-specific procedural categories with no single standard English equivalent; the renderings used follow the procedural logic of the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya context.

The "blades of grass" (Tibetan: བཟའ་ལྗང་རྒྱུ་ལྗང་རྒྱུ་) refers to a specific minor disciplinary procedure in which symbolic blades of grass are awarded or distributed as part of a settlement; this is a known Vinaya procedural term.

The verse summary in the middle of the passage is compressed and elliptical; the rendering reflects the compressed enumeration style typical of Vinaya mnemonic verses.

The final sentence is incomplete in the source text as given, ending mid-enumeration; the translation breaks off at the same point accordingly.

- The term rendered "the nāga" in the verse summary likely refers to a canonical narrative case involving a nāga who took ordination, used in the Vinaya to establish rules about who may be ordained; this is a standard Vinaya technical allusion. The term paṇḍaka (rendered as "paṇḍaka of male and female types," Tibetan ma ning pho and ma ning mo) refers to persons of indeterminate or intermediate sex, a standard Vinaya category; the Tibetan distinguishes a masculine-type and feminine-type paṇḍaka. The phrase "the two kinds of dust" in the verse summary is a Vinaya technical term whose precise referent in this summary verse is not entirely transparent from the immediate context and may refer to categories of impurity or defilement discussed in a surrounding passage not provided here.

- The term "pandaka" is a technical Vinaya category for individuals of ambiguous or intermediate sex or sexual function. The Tibetan "ma ning" renders the Sanskrit "paṇḍaka." Rather than translate with a modern clinical term — which would be both anachronistic and doctrinally imprecise — I retain "pandaka" throughout, as it is the standard scholarly rendering in Vinaya studies.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source; the translation has been rendered accordingly.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as it does in the source passage. The classification of "dust" (rdul) likely refers to categories of impure substances or particles relevant to Vinaya rules regarding contamination or offense — the precise Vinaya context is not fully specified in the passage itself, but the listing is faithful to the enumeration as given. The fifth restoration-ceremony impediment appears to be left implicit in the Tibetan as written (the list says "five" but the text as presented gives only four explicit items before the closing formula); this is a feature of the source text and has been rendered faithfully without invention.

- The term rendered "permanent robe" translates gtan pa, which in Vinaya context refers to the kaṭhina robe, the cloth formally offered to and distributed among monastics following the rains retreat. The enumeration of persons disqualified from administering or receiving a share of this follows standard Vinaya categories. The phrase "father of a novice monk" (dge tshul pha) is slightly unusual; it likely refers to a layman who is the biological father of a novice, and hence has no standing in the monastic distribution of gains.

- The passage on the five objects of fault for one who remains long in one place and the five for one who is constantly on the move appear to share identical fault-lists in the Tibetan. This may reflect a scribal error or intentional parallel structure in the source; the translation renders each as it stands.

The term rendered "thief-dweller" translates an expression referring to one who takes up residence in a monastic community under false pretenses, without valid ordination — a technical Vinaya category.

The term "kambala-hemp cloth" renders a compound that likely refers to a coarse hempen or plant-fiber cloth; the precise fiber is uncertain and may vary by regional Vinaya tradition.

- The phrase rendered "holding what resembles a mother" translates a term referring to the Mātrkā, the proto-Abhidharma matrices or summaries, which function as a "mother" of the Dharma. The rendering preserves the literal sense while alluding to this technical meaning.

The verse beginning "The wandering ascetic who eats in the prescribed manner" is compressed and elliptical in the original, functioning as a mnemonic summary of several categories treated in the surrounding prose; the rendering preserves its condensed character.

- The phrase rendered "what resembles a mother" follows the standard Vinaya term for the mātikā, the numerical summary-matrix of the Vinaya and Abhidharma. The Tibetan "ma lta bu" literally means "mother-like" and is the standard translation of mātikā in this context; it refers to the summary-matrix that serves as the organisational spine of both Vinaya and Abhidharma literature.

The passage enumerating the "five aggregates" of one in training and one beyond training corresponds to the classical set: the aggregate of moral discipline, meditative absorption, wisdom, liberation, and the gnosis that sees liberation — a standard fivefold schema found in both sūtra and Vinaya literature.

- The passage is a Vinaya scholastic text, almost certainly from the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya cycle as preserved in the Tibetan canon. The verse section near the beginning (listing the arrangement of the Vinaya collections by sūtra number, aggregates, arising, interruptions, offenses, and categories) is a mnemonic summary of the canon's structure and is rendered as closely as the terse Tibetan allows; the exact referents of each category remain a matter for specialist Vinaya scholars.

The phrase rendered "the Tathāgata's activity in that direction is lessened" is genuinely unusual: the Tibetan states that where a Vinaya-holder dwells, the Tathāgata's commissioned activity (phrin las) is reduced or diminished — meaning that the Vinaya-holder effectively performs the Tathāgata's function there, making direct intervention unnecessary. This reading follows the standard commentarial understanding.

The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the continuity format requested.

- The verse section near the middle of the passage appears to be a mnemonic summary verse listing several subjects treated in the surrounding prose. The connection between "the bath-house, moral discipline one cannot bear, many friends who are not of the true Dharma, the begging bowl, food, and clothing and alms-rounds" is that each of these topics is treated in groups of five in the surrounding text. The verse is terse and somewhat elliptical, and the rendering given is literal; a fuller commentary would be required to unpack each item's precise reference.

The phrase rendered "preparations" for the various lodging allowances follows the Vinaya technical sense of foods processed in specific ways that are permitted as medicines or tonics outside regular meal times.

- The phrase rendered as "lidded alms bowl" for རྒྱུ་མེད་ལྡན་གྱི་ལྗང་ལྡན་ is uncertain. The term རྒྱུ་མེད་ ordinarily means "superior" or "remaining," but in the Vinaya context of a list of prohibited bowl-types, "lidded" or "covered bowl" is a plausible interpretation found in some commentarial traditions; others read it as "a bowl with a surplus" or "an extra bowl." The precise referent may depend on the Sanskrit original, which is not available here for direct comparison.

The closing phrase, beginning with the five kinds of torn robes, is abruptly cut off mid-sentence and the translation necessarily ends there.

- The summary verse listing the sixteen Vinaya topics is a mnemonic gāthā; the rendering preserves its compressed, list-like character while making it readable aloud. The verse categories correspond to technical Vinaya procedural terms and their pairing is intentional in the original.

The phrase translated as "from a place of ill-will" and "from a place of good will" renders "འདྲི་བྱུང་གི་ཁོ་རྒྱུ་ལས་" and "བྱུང་གི་ཁོ་རྒྱུ་ལས་" respectively — the first with a negative qualifier, the second without — though the text's exact nuance here (whether this refers to a physical place, an emotional disposition, or an assembly setting) is genuinely ambiguous. The rendering follows the most common commentarial interpretation: disposition or motive.

- The list of five qualities for rejecting the reply-giver's words contains what appears textually to be six items, not five. This may reflect either a textual inconsistency in the source or a traditional counting that groups some items together. The translation renders the items as they appear in the Tibetan without forcing them into exactly five.

The phrase rendered "with a remainder or without a remainder" refers to a technical Vinaya distinction regarding whether a transgression was committed with an aggravating condition still present or already resolved; the precise referent depends on the specific legal context and commentarial tradition.

- The term rendered "monks who hold the summaries" translates a Tibetan phrase meaning those who hold a body of material resembling a matrix or compendium. In Indian Vinaya literature this refers to holders of the Māṭrkā, a summary or analytical framework of the Dharma, distinct from the Sūtra and Vinaya collections proper. The rendering "summaries" is approximate; "māṭrkā-holders" would be more precise but is avoided here for TTS fluency.

The phrase about the dispute being spread "among those of proper reasoning" renders a somewhat elliptical expression that may refer to legal or brahmanical assemblies competent to adjudicate. The meaning is that the dispute should be resolved within the Saṅgha rather than taken to outside authorities, whether royal or otherwise. The precise referent of the second category is uncertain.

- The phrase rendered as "seizes upon words spoken in confidence" translates 隱微語を執る, literally "grasping secret words." In the Vinaya commentarial tradition this refers to using private or confidential admissions as the basis for a formal charge, which is procedurally improper. The rendering reflects this technical sense.

The phrase "does not proceed to a formal charge up to the third time" renders [REDACTED]. The Vinaya procedure requires a formal motion put three times before a binding determination is made; failure to carry this through is the deficiency indicated here.

- The passage lists sixteen benefits but the enumeration as given in the Tibetan text reaches only thirteen distinct items before ending. This likely reflects either a scribal lacuna in the transmitted text or a compression in this particular version; the parallel Vinaya sources typically give a full sixteen. The translation faithfully renders what is present in the Tibetan without supplying the missing items.

The term rendered "formal declaration" throughout translates a Tibetan expression for a sworn or binding commitment made before the assembly, a technical step in Vinaya procedure; "formal charge" in the same context refers to the act of publicly pressing a case against another monk through the prescribed procedural stages.

- The phrase "the sūtra of a single direction" and "the sūtra that exists everywhere" are technically compressed formulas likely referring to canonical categories of sūtras by their regional or universal provenance; their precise referents remain debated in commentarial literature and the rendering follows the most natural reading of the Tibetan.

The phrase rendered "what is analogous" for 𑀧𑀺𑀢𑀺𑀓𑀺𑀢𑀺 reflects a standard Vinaya hermeneutical category meaning cases not directly legislated but handled by analogical reasoning; this is a technical term of Vinaya interpretation.

The term "fascicle" renders 部 (bun), a division unit of canonical texts, here marking the thirtieth such division of the Noble Vinaya.

- The term rendered "expel a transgression" reflects the Tibetan བཏུང་བྱིན་གཤོལ་སྒྲུབ་པ།, which in Vinaya technical context means lifting or clearing a monastic offense from its bearer through a formal procedure, distinct from merely identifying or announcing it.

The phrase རྒྱལ་བློན་གྲོས་པོ་དང་འཇིགས་རྒྱུ་ཡིན་པ་ is rendered "admonish with a punitive act," where རྒྱལ་བློན་ means a formal act of censure or punishment, and འཇིགས་རྒྱུ་ means to push down, subdue, or rebuke; together they describe the formal Vinaya procedure of imposing a disciplinary act. The exact mapping of each of the sixteen sub-categories of this section to known Vinaya technical terms involves some uncertainty, as the list in Tibetan is partially compressed and some terms have multiple plausible referents in the Sanskrit Vinaya tradition.

- The passage lists sixteen grounds for admonishment, then sixteen grounds for performing a formal Saṅgha act, then five Vinaya matters, then five types of formal acts (single-motion etc.), and finally begins a list of sixteen grounds that constitute a faulty settlement of a dispute. The last sentence is incomplete in the source passage provided and breaks off mid-list.

The term rendered "brahma-penalty" (ब्रह्मदण्ड) refers to the brahma-daṇḍa, a specific monastic sanction in which the community refuses all interaction with the offender — a silent shunning. This is a recognized Vinaya technical term and is retained in a descriptive English rendering here.

The term rendered "act of consecration" (उपसंक्रान्ति) is literally "the act of blessing/consecration" and in Vinaya context refers to a formally ratified or sanctioned act — one that has been properly validated. This rendering follows standard Vinaya interpretive tradition.

- The phrase rendered "the eye of the Dharma has been opened wide" translates chos kyi mig rgyas par gyur pa, literally "the eye of the Dharma has become extensive or expanded." This is a recognized idiom in Vinaya literature for the flourishing or promulgation of the Dharma and is rendered consistently throughout.

The phrase "one does not bring down a censure through a formal act of penalty" and its positive counterpart "one does not bring censure down through a formal act of penalty" render chad pa'i las kyis sma mi dbab pa and chad pa'i las kyis sma mi 'bebs pa respectively. The nuance is that a penalizing formal act of the Saṅgha is not used as an instrument to silence or suppress — this is a mark of faulty procedure when absent in the right way and present in the wrong context. The exact procedural sense is preserved as closely as the Tibetan permits.

- The verse summary section in the middle of this passage is a colophon-like index of chapter topics in highly compressed form. Several terms in these summary verses, such as "the flat door" and "the crow," are technical Vinaya shorthand referring to specific procedural topics whose full context lies in other chapters of this Vinaya collection. "The flat door" likely refers to a specific case or procedural category involving ordination, and "the crow" similarly refers to a Vinaya case, possibly concerning a boundary-determination matter. Their precise referents are established by the surrounding Vinaya commentarial tradition rather than by the verse itself. The note that full ordination "count it among the nuns" in the name-change case is a technical ruling: the ordination is legally valid but is reclassified as a nun's ordination.

- The verse summary in this passage is a mnemonic condensing the preceding question-and-answer material about age requirements and date-counting. The exact referent of each item in the verse list, particularly "brahmins," "remainder," "making six," and "fourteen," reflects technical Vinaya enumerations of categories of candidates for going forth and their respective age thresholds. The verse is intentionally compressed and formulaic; a fully expanded commentary would be required to unpack each item, but the rendering here preserves the structure as given.

- The term rendered "keeper of the monastery" translates a compound meaning literally "one who guards or maintains the assembly hall or temple." The phrase "discs of felt" renders a term that could also mean thin pieces of leather or matted fiber; the precise material is uncertain but the function — a counting device on a string — is clear. The passage about "taking hold of the fortnight" refers to the monastic practice of formally registering or declaring which half of the lunar month is in progress, a prerequisite for correctly tracking the lunar calendar.

- The calendrical arithmetic in this passage reflects an ancient Indian luni-solar intercalation system. The statement "six times six is thirty" is somewhat opaque; it appears to refer to the accumulated discrepancy over thirty years when an intercalary month is added every six years (five intercalations in thirty years), which is the standard Indian cycle for reconciling lunar and solar years. The Tibetan figure as transmitted may reflect a rounded or variant calculation, and the exact arithmetic logic is not spelled out in the text itself.
- The four hell names at the end of the passage appear in truncated form in the Tibetan and the list is incomplete, as the passage breaks off mid-enumeration. The Tibetan terms rendered as hell names are: རྒྱུ་མཚོ་ལྷོ་ཁྱེད་ཀྱི་ (naraka in general), རྒྱུ་མཚོ་ལྷོ་ཁྱེད་ (Arbuda, literally "black dot" or "blister," a cold hell), འཕྱི་ཁྱེད་ (Avīci or a general hell designation), and རྒྱུ་མཚོ་ལྷོ་ཁྱེད་ (Raurava, "the Screaming"). The identification of རྒྱུ་མཚོ་ལྷོ་ཁྱེད་ with Arbuda follows standard Vinaya commentarial lists but the Tibetan here is unusual and could denote a different cold hell; this is noted as a genuinely uncertain point.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཚོ་ལྷོ་ཁྱེད་ rendered as "go back and look again" is an idiomatic expression of mild rebuke or reconsideration directed at Upāli; some traditions read it as "consider it from the beginning."

- The list of cold hells follows the standard canonical enumeration; "Blue-Lotus-like," "Lotus-like," and "Great-Lotus-like" render the Tibetan comparative forms literally, corresponding to the Sanskrit Utpala, Padma, and Mahāpadma cold hells. The description of the rays vanishing into different parts of the Blessed One's body as indicators of the type of prophecy to be given is a well-attested formulaic passage in Vinaya and sūtra literature. The term rendered "crown protrusion" is the uṣṇīṣa, one of the thirty-two major marks of a great being. The phrase "wheel-turning king of power" renders a distinction in the Tibetan between a lesser wheel-turning king and a full cakravartin monarch.
- The phrase rendered "after the Victor has been counted among the number" translates a Vinaya technical idiom meaning after the Buddha has been formally included in the quorum or tally of the Saṅgha for the purpose of a legal act. The doctrinal point being established is that the Buddha, as a distinct Jewel, cannot be counted among the Saṅgha membership for Vinaya procedural purposes, and any act so conducted would be invalid.

The three categories at the close — maṇḍala boundary, water-encircled boundary, and interior of an existing boundary — are standard Vinaya categories for sīmā (boundary) law; the Tibetan is compressed and technical, and the rendering follows the standard commentarial understanding of these three prohibited configurations for new boundary establishment.

- The phrase rendered "those on the ground performing an act together with those on the ground" and the reply "it is not permitted" followed by "giving consent is permitted" reflects the Vinaya principle that monks in different physical locations or on different levels cannot jointly perform a valid saṅghakamma unless they are within the same boundary and in each other's sight; the exception allowing transmission of consent covers the case where a valid quorum exists in the primary location and absent members formally delegate their agreement. The final incomplete exchange about those on a tree and those on the ground ends without the consent clause, likely because the passage breaks off; this asymmetry is in the source and has not been smoothed over.
- The opening of the translation continues directly from the preceding rendered passage; the first line beginning "giving consent is permitted" picks up mid-sentence as established in the continuity block.

The verse summary near the end is terse and somewhat elliptical in the Tibetan. The phrase rendered "a Saṅgha of ten million — at dawn, blessed within the boundary" reflects the literal sense: ten million monks (bye ba, koṭi), at dawn (skya rengs), and the boundary being consecrated or blessed (byin gyis brlabs). This appears to be a mnemonic gāthā summarizing the preceding section's key cases rather than a narrative description.

The term rendered "formal declaration of purity" translates yongs su dag pa len pa, which in Vinaya context refers to the pārisuddhi, the formal declaration of one's purity given by a proxy on behalf of an absent monk. "Received again from the beginning" renders gdod blang dgos, literally "must be taken from the beginning."

- The term rendered "female probationer" is རྒྱུ་མཁའ་མཁའ་མཁའ་, which corresponds to Sanskrit śikṣamāṇā, a woman in the two-year probationary period between novice and full ordination. The house glossary does not list this term explicitly; it has been rendered by its standard English equivalent rather than given a Sanskrit gloss in the body, since it appears in a simple list alongside other well-known ordination categories.

The phrase "confident in his view" renders རྒྱུ་མཁའ་མཁའ་མཁའ་, literally "having faith/confidence in the view," meaning he genuinely believed he was going to the correct side. The contrast with "not confident" determines whether the breach of the rains retreat is culpable.

- The phrase rendered "unfit animals" translates a term that in the Vinaya context means animals whose hides monks are prohibited from using for footwear, typically because they are fierce, powerful, or spiritually inauspicious. The Tibetan "mi srun" literally means "inappropriate" or "incompatible."

The verse summary in the middle of the passage functions as a mnemonic gāthā recapitulating the preceding topics; its terseness is characteristic of Vinaya mnemonic verse and has been rendered as faithfully as possible while preserving natural English cadence.

- The verse summary near the opening is a mnemonic gāthā that encapsulates the topics of the section just concluded; the phrase rendered "feces and abscesses must not be treated" reflects a Vinaya regulation about not handling excrement or lancing sores in a temple or monastic hall context, which is the standard commentarial reading. The phrase "arrow-shaft pigment" for the colour standard of properly prepared sour whey follows the Tibetan རྒྱུ་མཁའ་མཁའ་མཁའ་, literally "the colour of an arrow-shaft" — this likely refers to the pale yellowish or light brownish hue of a bamboo or wood arrow-shaft, used as a practical visual test for correct dilution.

- The Śākya border-town name rendered as "Merchant Gourd-Leaf" follows the literal Tibetan tshong pa sbu bu can, a place-name whose Sanskrit original is uncertain; it may represent something like Vaṇijagāma. The rendering is kept literal as a place-name throughout for consistency.

The term gzhongs spyod, here rendered "place of resort" or "using as a place of resort," refers to a monk's using a dwelling as his base for alms-rounds and daily practice — essentially making free use of it as his residence-station. The nuance is that Śāraṇa was not permanently residing there but using it as a roving base, which is doctrinally significant for questions of Saṅgha property.

- The town name rendered "Merchant-of-Gourds" translates the Tibetan རྒྱུ་མཁའ་མཁའ་མཁའ་, a descriptive toponym that likely corresponds to a Sanskrit place-name such as Tumba-vaṇika or similar; the exact Sanskrit is uncertain. The passage's legal doctrine concerns the Vinaya rule that a gift designated for a specific recipient or category cannot be redirected to a different recipient or category without violating Dharma — a standard principle of Buddhist monastic law governing donations.

- The phrase "cutting off by cutting the wall" in the verse summary is a compressed Vinaya reference, likely referring to a case involving physical separation or enclosure as a disciplinary act; without the full corresponding sūtra this cannot be resolved with certainty.

- The phrase rendered "the monastery-keeper cause an appraisal to be made within the Saṅgha" (𑀧𑁆𑀭𑀸𑀓𑀲𑀢𑀺𑀣𑀤𑀡𑀳𑀼𑀩𑀻𑀱𑀾𑀇𑀫𑀽𑀔𑀶𑀯𑀮𑀴𑀥𑀬𑀸𑀰𑀵𑀃𑀷𑀚𑀿𑀘𑀂𑀄𑀪𑀉𑀛𑀜𑀟𑀐𑀌𑀏𑀒𑀕𑀗𑀙𑀞𑀦𑀭𑀸𑀨𑀊𑀋𑀉𑀝𑀎𑀠𑀓𑀈) carries technical Vinaya weight: the "appraisal" or "valuation" (𑀧𑀸𑀓𑀲𑀢𑀺𑀣𑀤𑀡𑀳𑀼𑀩𑀻𑀱𑀾𑀇𑀫𑀽𑀔𑀶𑀯𑀮𑀴𑀥𑀬𑀸𑀰𑀵𑀃𑀷𑀚𑀿𑀘𑀂𑀄𑀪𑀉𑀛𑀜𑀟𑀐𑀌𑀏𑀒𑀕𑀗𑀙𑀞𑀦𑀭𑀸𑀨𑀊𑀋𑀉𑀝𑀎𑀠𑀓𑀈) refers to the formal process of assigning monetary or exchange value to the deceased monk's requisites so they may be distributed equitably among the Saṅgha — a standard procedure in Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya contexts.

- The phrase rendered "whoever is on that side" translates a terse Tibetan idiom meaning whichever community is geographically on that side of the boundary; the intent is that in border zones the Saṅgha whose territory the death occurred in has the right to the belongings.

- The phrase "of bad doctrine and bad discipline" translates a stock compound describing certain non-Buddhist groups; the terms rendered "doctrine" and "discipline" could also be understood as "scripture" and "conduct," but the traditional commentarial rendering as "doctrine and discipline" is preserved here.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as the source text itself is incomplete at that point. The eighteen kinds of trainees follow a standard Abhidharma enumeration from the fourfold path-and-fruit schema, expanded with additional categories such as "one who follows through faith" and "one who follows through the Dharma" drawn from canonical classifications. The nine kinds of those beyond training similarly reflect a standard Pāli and Sanskrit Abhidharma list of arhat types, including distinctions such as "Dharma-faded" (one whose liberation can regress), "protected through subsequent mindfulness," "immovable," "liberated through wisdom alone," and "liberated on both sides" (through both meditative absorption and wisdom). These technical enumerations are rendered according to their established doctrinal meaning in the commentarial tradition.
- The phrase rendered as "upend their bowls" reflects the Tibetan idiom for the Saṅgha's formal act of refusing to receive alms or interact with a layperson — a grave ecclesiastical sanction. Anāthapiṇḍada fears he has somehow provoked this response against himself, which is why he is so distressed.

The expression "those who still had the remainder of fetters" refers to monks who are stream-enterers, once-returners, or non-returners — those who have entered the noble path but have not yet achieved full arhatship and thus still retain some afflictive bonds. "Those bound by every kind of bondage" refers to ordinary monks who have not yet attained any of the noble fruits.

- The phrase "ཡོད་པ་ལྟར་ཡོད་པ་ལྟར་" refers to the formal act of casting or proceeding with a Saṅgha resolution or vote. The term "ཡོད་པ་ལྟར་ཡོད་པ་ལྟར་" is rendered as "fully present" or "having fully experienced," but in this Vinaya context it clearly means being present and fully conscious during the proceedings; the contrast with absence or sleep makes this reading secure. The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the text's continuation beyond this excerpt.
- The verse summaries embedded in the text are mnemonic colophons in sūtra style, listing topics covered in the preceding sūtra section. The term rendered "ceremonial wood" refers to the ritual slab or wooden implement associated with certain Vinaya acts; the precise referent of "ཡོད་པ་ལྟར་" (tshul shing) as a Vinaya technical term — possibly the boundary marker-wood or vote-stick — is not entirely transparent from the Tibetan alone, but "ceremonial wood" is the conventional rendering in this context. The term "paṇḍaka" (ma ning) refers to a person of indeterminate or non-normative sex, a Vinaya category of persons excluded from ordination. "Sending by proxy" in the final verse summary renders "ཡོད་པ་ལྟར་ཡོད་པ་ལྟར་" and refers to the rule against delegating the performance of certain Vinaya acts to a messenger.
- The verse summary lists five topics in paired form — requesting forbearance, the boundary, hair-shaving, overturning the latrine-stand with threats, rebuking, and condemning the lineage — which serve as mnemonic headers for the dialogue units that follow, a standard Vinaya compositional device.

The phrase rendered "condemning the lineage" translates a term referring to a monk who disparages or speaks against the royal or noble clan, a Vinaya offense that triggers formal banishment proceedings; the exact social context is a lineage of noble patronage rather than a monastic lineage.

- The phrase rendered "the one who performed the ordination has acted in a manner that is past and done" renders a somewhat compressed Tibetan formulation about the validity of ordination when a censure act is outstanding; the meaning is that the ordination ceremony is technically complete and valid, but the officiating monk's action (having ordained someone under censure) is a past transgression. This is a genuinely technical Vinaya point and the rendering follows the most natural reading.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, corresponding to a fascicle break; no text has been omitted beyond what the source provides.

- The phrase rendered "suspension by days" versus "suspension by intention" reflects a Vinaya distinction between a transgression that is provisionally deferred for a set number of days versus one that is held in abeyance by deliberate mental resolve. The former counts as technically unsuspended in the full doctrinal sense.

The phrase "remainder offense with the Saṅgha" renders the Vinaya category saṃghāvaśeṣa, a class of offense that requires formal Saṅgha procedure rather than simple individual confession.

The technical sequence at the end — penalty, penalty raised from the basis, restoration, appeasement, appeasement raised from the basis, and restoration with appeasement — reflects a standard set of Vinaya formal acts associated with the rehabilitation of a penalized monk; the precise Tibetan terms for these acts have been rendered as faithfully as possible in their procedural sense.

- The phrase rendered "drinking smoke" in the summary verse refers to the practice of fumigating or smoking items — likely alms-bowls or implements — for purification or preservation, a recognized Vinaya topic. The summary verse is an aide-mémoire listing the topics treated in the chapter, and its items do not form a continuous narrative.

The dialogue involving Upāli presents a slightly compressed exchange in the Tibetan; the second speaker in "Upāli replied" is Upāli himself, answering his own formal question in the traditional catechetical style of Vinaya dialogue.

- The phrase rendered "food offerings" translates རྒྱུ་ལྷན་པ་, which in later tantric usage specifically denotes a ritual cake offering, but in this Vinaya context it simply refers to food offerings or oblations set out for local protective deities associated with the monastery. The rendering reflects this earlier, more general sense.

The maṇḍala throughout this passage is not a tantric meditation maṇḍala but a ritual ground or demarcated area prepared for washing alms-bowls — a specifically Vinaya usage of the term.

The verse lines "through gaining such ones, one will be honored; through making offerings, one becomes worthy of offering" are syntactically compressed in the Tibetan; the rendering follows the most natural doctrinal reading.

- The "group of six monks" refers to the notorious Chaddasaggiya, a recurring stock group in Vinaya narratives known for repeated transgressions that occasion the Buddha's rulings. Their name is rendered here by sense.

The term rendered "snapping sound with the fingers" translates "se gol gyi sgra phyung," literally "producing the sound of a finger-snap," which is a standard gesture of respectful greeting or announcement before a deity shrine in the Vinaya context.

The venerable Ānanda appears here under his Tibetan epithet "Nye dga' bo," meaning "dear kinsman" or "beloved," which is one of the standard Tibetan renderings of the Sanskrit name Ānanda.

- The phrase "skilled in all eighteen scripts" reflects a canonical literary convention appearing in Vinaya narratives, not a literal historical claim. The list of eighteen scripts is a standard formulaic enumeration in Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya literature.

- The term rendered "carry by the strap" translates a verb meaning to make someone carry something suspended or slung; the precise implement is a carrying strap or sling for the bowl, a standard Vinaya technical usage.

The name Cundaka is a well-known disciple of Śāriputra in Vinaya literature; the Tibetan spelling is preserved as given.

- The phrase rendered "sky-blue color" translates a term for a particular fired glaze or color that the bowl is to take on as a sign of proper firing; some commentators describe this as a deep blue-grey or slate hue characteristic of well-fired clay. The precise shade is a matter of traditional craft knowledge rather than textual ambiguity.

The verse-summary line "the first narrative, the bath house, the third concerning the layman" is a mnemonic condensing multiple origin stories. The syntax is elliptical in the original, as is conventional for such summary verses in the Vinaya.

- The phrase rendered "comes to be one who has transgressed" translates a Vinaya technical expression indicating that performing such a service constitutes a formal infraction. The precise category of downfall is not specified in this passage.

The simile of the lion performing the service of a jackal is a pointed Vinaya image: an arhat of supreme attainment should not be placed in a subordinate, servile role toward one who has broken his vows entirely, as this inverts the proper order of the community and implicates the arhat in the fallen monk's continued pretense.

- The passage contains the canonical teaching on repaying one's parents by establishing them in the five qualities of faith, moral discipline, generosity, wisdom, and the training, which parallels the Aṅguttara Nikāya teaching on the impossibility of repaying parents by material means alone. The list of precious substances includes "asmāgarbha" rendered as agate, though this gem-name is debated; it may refer to a specific semi-precious stone. The dialogue near the end reverses the lion-and-jackal metaphor deliberately: the son, a monk with moral discipline, is the lion; the father, though a layman, is being compared favorably by the son — which causes the father's puzzled response and sets up the next section of the teaching. The final sentence ends mid-discourse and is rendered accordingly.

- The four divine names invoked by the caravan-leader — rendered here as Agulāṅg, Varuṇa, Vaiśravaṇa, and Vāsava — are transliterations of Tibetan phonetic renderings of Sanskrit divine names. Vāsava is a standard epithet of Indra. Varuṇa and Vaiśravaṇa (the god of wealth, also called Kubera) are well-known Vedic and Indian deities. The first name (Tibetan: འགུལ་ལྷ་) is less certain; it may correspond to a local or variant divine name not easily identified with a standard Sanskrit original.

- The name given to the boy is rendered as "Priyā" following the feminine Sanskrit name implied by the Tibetan "bu mo mdza' mo" (dear/beloved girl). The Tibetan is functioning as a calque of a Sanskrit feminine name, likely Priyā, which fits the narrative logic of giving a boy a girl's name for auspicious longevity. The kārṣāpaṇa is a standard ancient Indian copper or silver coin; it is left in Sanskrit as a proper monetary term. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, so the translation follows accordingly.

- The city names — Joyful, Ever Joyous, Full of Joy — render three progressively named cities in what appears to be a standard formulaic avadāna sequence. The Tibetan names are Dga' ba, Rtag tu ra ro ba, and Dga' ba can respectively; the middle name's literal sense is closer to "ever-resounding" or "ever-melodious" but "Ever Joyous" fits the obvious triadic pattern and the positive valence of the term.

The phrase rendered "a plank of wood" is literally "a grove of the boat" or "a section of the boat," meaning a piece of the wrecked vessel used as a floatation device; this reading is consistent with parallel avadāna narratives.

- The phrase rendered "fetched by karma accumulated over a long time" and the subsequent lines condense a compressed Tibetan verse structure where karma is personified as the agent that summons beings to their place of retribution; the translation preserves this sense faithfully. The verse attribution pattern — alternating between the wandering young man and the maiden — reflects the standard Tibetan sūtra dialogue verse format. The city of iron is a conventional hell-realm motif (an iron city whose gates close automatically), well attested in Avadāna and Vinaya literature.

- The phrase rendered "noble utterance" translates a term meaning, more literally, "a word that is prized" or "a distinguished word" — the sense is that each element of the simile is praised speech or a worthy designation of the category it represents. The rendering captures the honorific and laudatory sense intended in context.

The phrase "ascetic practice" for the term referring to a monk living on alms alone and using a specific mode of conduct reflects a standard set of dhuta practices in the Vinaya; the Tibetan indicates he is using someone else's bowl or following a strict alms discipline.

- The term rendered "mat" throughout is gdingba, a woven or plaited mat used for sitting. The context makes clear it is a portable sitting mat on which the monk was seated during the haircut, not a fixed furnishing.

The phrase rendered "refuse cloths" refers to scraps of discarded cloth used by the Saṅgha for cleaning purposes; the hair is to be disposed of there rather than left scattered about.

- The compound term rendered as "compound medicine" translates a term that likely refers to a medicated preparation involving multiple ingredients combined and processed together; the exact pharmaceutical identity is uncertain but the general sense of a combined medicinal compound is clear.

The verse at the close is a mnemonic summarizing a series of medical items permitted by the Buddha. The "Great Sage" is a standard epithet of the Buddha in such enumerative verses.

The creature called "she-bear" (dred mo) is invoked as a precedent: because a bear's partially chewed and digested meat exits her body in a form that could be used, this serves as the canonical rationale for permitting meat broth outside the normal meal time rules — a characteristic Vinaya style of reasoning from natural precedent.

- The seven thread materials listed present some identification challenges. The terms རྩྭ་ལྷུང་ (śaṇaka, a hemp or cannabis-like plant), རྩྭ་ལྷུང་ (nettle fibre, Girardinia), རྩྭ་ལྷུང་ (a coarse grass fibre, possibly kusa-related), རྩྭ་ལྷུང་ (kautamba or jute-type fibre), and རྩྭ་ལྷུང་ (silk, literally "worm-wool") are rendered by their most plausible botanical identifications in the Vinaya commentarial tradition; the exact botanical referents of some of these remain debated in scholarship.

The term རྩྭ་ལྷུང་ in the verse summary could mean either a "footrest" or a "foot-stand"; the context of the prose that follows suggests a support for the feet or legs of a sick person, and it has been rendered accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "offense with remainder" translates a technical Vinaya term for a class of transgression that is serious but not a root defeat; the Tibetan here is "das pa dang bcas par 'gyur ro," literally "it will become accompanied by an offense," corresponding to the Sanskrit saṃghāvaśeṣa class of offenses. Alternatively, some editors read this as a more general expression for incurring a transgression; the precise category may depend on broader Vinaya context.

The "group of six monks" is a well-known Vinaya stock character, a recurring band of monks associated with misbehavior in the canonical narratives.

- The passage contains a complex Vinaya narrative dealing with consecration of the three monastic robes from unconventional materials. The items "par thang," "la ba," and "be'u ras" refer to the three parts of the monk's triple robe set: roughly a rectangular under-sheet, a shoulder cloth, and a small piece of cloth. The exact identification of these as technical Vinaya garment terms is secure enough, but the precise names vary across Vinaya traditions; I have rendered them functionally. The phrase rendered "combined robe" for "sbyar ma" reflects the sense of a stitched or pieced-together garment.

The "Group of Six" refers to the well-known group of misbehaving monks frequently mentioned in Vinaya narratives as a narrative foil.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic listing the topics of the narrative sections that follow; "a noble lady" renders རྩྭ་ལྷུང་ and "a horse-race" renders རྩྭ་ལྷུང་ — the latter could alternatively mean "a horse-procession" or "a cavalry display," but context in comparable Vinaya literature favors some kind of horse-related event. The precise referent will become clear in the subsequent narrative sections.

- The phrase rendered "set out to travel toward Rājagṛha" translates a formulaic expression indicating the Blessed One departed traveling by stages (རྩྭ་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་ལྷུང་), a standard Vinaya idiom for traveling by graduated stages or on tour. The same formula appears twice in close succession, likely due to a scribal repetition in the Tibetan source text. The translation absorbs the second occurrence naturally into the narrative without reproducing the apparent dittography as a separate sentence.

- The "twenty peaks of the mountain of the view of the transitory collection" is a standard Abhidharma-derived image: the satkāyadr̥ṣṭi, the view of the transitory collection as a self, is analyzed into twenty sub-views (five aggregates taken in four ways), and stream-entry shatters all of them.

The weapon hurled at Śrīmatibuddhi is described as a wheel, probably a discus-weapon (cakra), consistent with the royal arsenal of the period as depicted in Buddhist narrative literature.

- The passage includes a standard doctrinal moment: the "three thoughts" that arise spontaneously for a newly born deity in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, a canonical topos found in Pāli and Sanskrit sources. The Tibetan "བཞུགས་པའི་ལོ་རྒྱུས་ལོ་རྒྱུས་ལོ་རྒྱུས་" is a somewhat unusual idiom; I have rendered it as "when I have only just been born" in the sense of the newborn deity period, though it could also mean something like "when I have taken on the days," i.e., settled into the new birth. The doctrinal sense is the same either way.

The verse at the end is cut off in the source; the translation preserves this as an incomplete verse accordingly.

- The name "Rūpasāraṃ" (Tib. རུཔ་སྤྲུལ་པ་) is the king's name meaning "essence of form"; it is kept in translation as a proper name. The text ends mid-sentence with the enumeration of the seven precious things about to begin; the translation reflects this open ending faithfully.
- The phrase rendered "seven aeons of formation and dissolution" translates a term referring to cosmic cycles of destruction and reformation. The verse section shifts registers abruptly into first-person recollection, consistent with the preceding prose, and the pronoun "I" refers throughout to the narrator (the Blessed One recounting past lives).

The brief summary verse near the end — describing a house with foundation, stairway, bride with terrace, plastered pillars, and painted walls — appears to be an architectural summary verse or mnemonic of a building specification, likely a colophon-style verse delimiting the narrative section. Its exact structural function within the larger text is not always transparent, but it reads as a formulaic description of the structure Anāthapiṇḍada is to build.

- The verse summary near the beginning appears to be a mnemonic colophon listing the topics covered in the sūtra section just concluded. The individual items — "tooth of a bull, thread, garland, one adorned with precious garlands, attendant, essence, gate of the essence" — are keyword headings for the narrative episodes treated in this passage and the one preceding it. They are left in their compressed mnemonic form as the text intends them.

The term rendered "rim of the water-spout trough" translates a compound referring to the projecting drainage element on a stūpa structure, here used as an anchor point for hanging garlands.

- The term རྩ་མོ་ rendered as "copper" follows standard Tibetan lexical usage where རྩ་མོ་ can denote copper or bronze. In the context of a hierarchy of reliquary shrine materials ascending from base to precious, copper is the most natural reading.

The term རྩ་མོ་མཛུགས་པ་, literally "applying seals" or "affixing stamps," refers to the decorative practice of impressing designs made from grain mixed with butter onto the shrine surface; this is a standard ritual embellishment known from Vinaya commentaries.

The final verse fragment ending with རྩ་མོ་མཛུགས་པ་ (knee-embrace or clasping at the knee) is the opening of the next section's summary verse and is cut off mid-sequence; no further context is available in this passage.

- The phrase rendered "the master's son Legs" reflects the Tibetan "jo bo'i sras legs," which appears to be a conventional simile for a dutiful, honest person doing exactly as told — perhaps a reference to a known stock figure. The precise identification is uncertain, but the meaning in context is clearly an ironical comparison: the wife promised obedience in exactly the words an honest person would use, while intending the opposite.

The seven types of cord include several plant-fiber terms that resist certain identification. "Flax stalk fiber" (sha na ka) and "koṭāmbaka" are rendered from Indic loanwords; the exact botanical referents are debated in the commentarial tradition.

The phrase rendered "knee-embrace" (bu'i 'khyud) in the verse summary and question-and-answer section refers to a type of woven or corded structural element — likely a banding or lashing used in construction. The precise carpentry or architectural function is not fully transparent from context alone.

- [illegible]

- The term rendered "grain-oil" for 香油 is literally "grain fat" or "sesame oil" — the precise substance is uncertain, but it refers to a vegetable or seed-based oil used both as a food additive and for practical purposes such as waterproofing or treating materials. The building-maintenance context here supports both interpretations; the rendering "grain-oil" preserves the ambiguity.

- The phrase rendered "alms-bowl maintenance work" translates a term for work done with the alms-bowl, likely referring to the curing or seasoning of alms-bowls, a standard Vinaya task. The translation reflects this technical sense.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, consistent with the excerpt's cutoff; the translation preserves this.

- The term rendered "face-scraper" refers to a small implement used to scrape the face during washing, functionally similar to a strigil. The verse summary in the middle of the passage is a mnemonic gāthā listing the various locations and implements governed by the rules that follow, a standard Vinaya device for organizing rule clusters. The phrase "transgression with expiation" renders a Vinaya technical category equivalent to the Pali pācittiya, a lesser offense requiring confession and expiation rather than a root defeat.
- The summarizing verse appears to be a mnemonic colophon listing the items treated in the preceding cluster of rules: water pot, wash-basin, black iron bowl, drinking cup, razor-sharpening, nail-cutting, medicinal thorns, and foot-stand. The phrase rendered "medicinal thorns" translates 醫針 (i-jin), which likely refers to a lancet or similar pointed medical instrument used in the monastic medical context; the exact implement is not entirely certain, but "medicinal thorns" reflects the literal reading and the commentarial tradition's understanding of a pointed therapeutic tool.
- The verse summary lists items in abbreviated form following the same pattern as the preceding passage; "the permanent thread, the second" refers to the continuing thread of cases, and "the taking away" summarizes the category of offenses covered in this section. The exact referents of the verse's condensed list are conventional mnemonic shorthand for the series of cases just described.

- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic gāthā in highly compressed, telegraphic style. The rendering "one bearing a name but not giving the self at death" and "five to be received with trust" and "a nun who is a keeper, for the sake of the allowance" follows the Tibetan literally but the precise referents depend on the surrounding Vinaya context that is not fully present here. The verse is a section-heading mnemonic and its terms are technical markers for subsections, so the rendering is necessarily approximate.

The king's name rendered as "Rūpasāra" (Tib. རུཔ་སཱ་ར་) is a Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit name meaning "one whose essence is form" or "having bodily essence"; no standard Sanskrit reconstruction is certain, so it is given in translation.

The phrase rendered "sūtra likened to falling silk" (Tib. སུ་ཏྲ་ལྟོ་བཞུག་སྐྱོ་བུ་ལྟོ་བཞུག་) is an idiomatic comparison; "silk falling" may indicate a text of particular refinement or suitability, but the exact reference is not established from the text alone.

- The phrase rendered "prostrated at his feet" translates a term literally meaning "touched his feet" — a standard gesture of obeisance before royalty in Indian narrative literature.

The passage contains a narratively compressed and somewhat elliptical sequence involving the tīrthikas, monks, and the disputed goods. The Tibetan is ambiguous in places as to exactly who is accusing whom and who has taken what from whom. The translation follows the most coherent reading of the syntax, in which a tīrthika conceals goods in his own bundle including items belonging to monks, then when the monks notice and a dispute erupts, the tīrthikas go to the king first and make the accusation against the monks. This reading is consistent with the narrative logic of the broader context.

- The phrase rendered as "corner tab" refers to a small loop or tab of cloth attached at the corner of a monastic robe as a distinguishing marker; the precise form is not entirely certain from the term alone, but this is the standard Vinaya identification.

The verse spoken by the dying householder closely parallels a well-known canonical formula on impermanence found across Pāli and Sanskrit sources; it is rendered here as verse in keeping with its form in the Tibetan.

- The passage ends mid-sentence in the source Tibetan as provided. The declaration of the Blessed One is cut off after "together with a companion, and —"; this appears to be a passage break rather than a textual lacuna, and the continuation will follow in the next segment.

- The term rendered throughout as "the vow of associating together with a companion" translates a Vinaya technical term for a special dispensation allowing a nun to visit a lay patron's home alone — or here, in the company of a single companion — when circumstances such as famine make normal practice impossible. The formal ecclesiastical act (kamma) structure follows standard Vinaya procedure: motion plus one proclamation.

The final prose passage introduces a new narrative section. The kārṣāpaṇa is a standard Indian coin unit frequently mentioned in Vinaya debt-and-inheritance narratives. The somewhat compressed final sentence, in which the householder appears to be proposing a transaction — the monks distribute the deceased monk's possessions and he will recover his debt from the charnel ground — follows a recognizable Vinaya plot pattern.

- The phrase rendered "men of good family" translates a conventional honorific expression indicating respected lay community members who might serve as trusted mediators or witnesses. The Blessed One's instruction is that if the householder remains unconvinced, the matter should be referred to such respected laypeople rather than engaging further community resources with a recalcitrant creditor.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as it leads into the next episode; the translation preserves this open ending faithfully. The name "Nandaka" renders Tibetan རྒྱལ་མཁའ་, which is the standard Tibetan for the monk Nandaka. The term རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ in the opening refers to fine or lightweight cloth, contrasted with རྒྱལ་མཁའ་, coarser or heavier cloth; the merchant's claim is that he substituted a coarser piece for the finer one the monk had ordered. The phrase རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ལྟར་འཇུག་པའི་ལཱ་ལྟར་ ("behaved in a manner befitting a scoundrel") is a conventional Vinaya expression of strong lay reproach.
- The phrase rendered as "the determined word" translates a technical Vinaya expression meaning the fixed or established statement one makes to indicate a desired price or object without actively negotiating — speaking it up to two or three times is permitted, but going beyond into direct price-bargaining is the offense.

The "group of six" refers to the notorious six monks who recur throughout the Vinaya as habitual troublemakers.

The closing verse and narrative mark a transition to a new section of the Vinaya text concerning monastic duties in gardens or groves donated to the Saṅgha.

- The term rendered "father-novice" translates dge tshul pha, literally a novice who acts in a parental or senior supervisory role — a specific Vinaya institutional role. The precise nuance of "father" here is as a senior novice with a supervisory function; this is a recognized Vinaya term and the rendering follows that tradition.

The phrase "noble silence" renders 'phags pa'i mi smra ba, literally "the noble one's non-speaking," which in Vinaya usage is the technical term for the meditative silence of a noble one during formal community procedures (Skt. āryatūṣṇīmbhāva).

The verse summary in the middle of the passage appears to be a mnemonic gāthā listing key legal categories discussed in the episode; its compressed telegraphic style is intentional.

- The phrase rendered "making-fit-for-use had not been equalized" reflects the Tibetan technical concept of the ritual act of making food allowable for monastic consumption; the distribution was uneven, leaving some monks without a proper share, hence the discontent. The Vinaya procedure of "establishing a boundary" refers to the formal demarcation of a sīmā, the canonical boundary within which communal Vinaya acts are legally valid; the dispute turns on which sīmā takes legal precedence.
- The phrase rendered "taking sides in a lawsuit" translates རྒྱལ་མཁའ་ལྟར་, literally "making a great four" or "making a major case," which in Vinaya legal context refers to formally pressing or supporting a legal claim before royal authority. The rendering follows the contextual sense.

The summary verse at the head of the fifth-group section is an abbreviated mnemonic list of the topics that follow; several items in it are rendered according to their narrative development in the sūtra body that follows, rather than strictly term by term.

The passage ends mid-sentence with the bodhisattva image being carried through the town on foot, indicating the text continues in the next passage.

- The phrase rendered "garland-vessels" translates a term referring to containers or receptacles for flower garlands used as part of the processional and festival decoration; the precise form is not entirely certain but the general sense of a vessel or tray used in garland-offerings is clear. The verse summary in the middle of the passage appears to be an editorial colophon marking the close of a canonical section, followed immediately by a fresh narrative opening that recapitulates the setting at Śrāvastī — this abrupt structural shift is a feature of the Vinaya text itself, not an error in translation. The phrase "those who arrange the lodgings" refers to the monk designated as lodging-assigner (Skt. śayanāśana-paññāpaka), a recognized Vinaya office.

- The phrase rendered "warming of the face" translates the Tibetan "zhalbsro," literally a warming or refreshing of the face, referring to a specific ritual or festive offering connected with bathing or anointing the face, likely a spring ceremony tied to the Buddha's birth month. The exact nature of this ceremony is not entirely transparent from the text alone; it appears to be a customary offering or ablution rite performed at a residence.

The opening verse and sentence ("If one observes them, one incurs a transgression along with the corresponding offence. This concludes the third set of verses...") belong to the framing apparatus of the Vinaya text and mark the close of the preceding section before a new narrative begins.

- The phrase rendered "the shadow of the rose-apple tree of Jambudvīpa" is a poetic epithet describing the Blessed One as the presiding figure over Jambudvīpa. This is a standard honorific image in Buddhist literature, though its precise ceremonial significance here may relate to a festival tied to the Buddha's awakening or birth. The Tibetan "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" is the wooden sounding-board or plank (Sanskrit: gaṇḍī) used in monasteries to summon the community, here consistently rendered "wooden plank." The phrase "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" literally means "send out a cart or vehicle," indicating that litters or conveyances were dispatched to transport those unable to walk; this is rendered "send out a vehicle" for clarity.

- The closing summary verse and its colophon appear to be a standard Vinaya structural marker, cataloguing the topics covered under a heading called "the section on individual matters." The items listed, including salutation, the strainer, vessels, the drinking bowl, sugarcane, butter, roots, and tree-trunks, are case topics treated individually in the preceding sūtras. The verse is formulaic and its rendering follows the structural logic of the Vinaya rather than any single narrative thread.

The phrase rendered "the dog" in the summary verse is puzzling in context; it likely refers to a specific ruled case involving a dog that appeared earlier in the text and is here being catalogued by a single-word mnemonic, which is standard Vinaya practice.

- The long sequence of epithets for the buddhas — "five limbs abandoned," "six limbs," "always abiding in the six," "three aspects of those to be tamed," and so on — are formulaic enumerations whose precise referents vary by commentarial tradition and context. The translation renders them literally, as any specific doctrinal unpacking would require a commentary. The phrase rendered "thousand hundreds" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ translates literally as "ten hundreds," i.e., one thousand; the idiom here indicates supreme lordship over a thousandfold world-system.

The closing list of hell realms — reviving, black-line, crushing, crying, great crying, burning, great burning, without-mercy, blister — corresponds to the standard Abhidharma enumeration of the eight hot hells and their sub-divisions; the passage breaks off mid-enumeration.

- The list of cold hells follows the standard Abhidharma enumeration: Aṭaṭa, Hahava, Huhuva, Utpala ("Blue Lotus"), Padma ("Lotus"), and Mahāpadma ("Great Lotus") are preserved in their Sanskrit forms as they are proper names of those realms, not descriptive Tibetan phrases.

The passage ends mid-verse; the translation reflects this exactly as the supplied Tibetan breaks off incomplete.

The phrase rendered "wheel-turning monarch of power" translates a distinction between two slightly different Tibetan phrases in close succession: "stobs kyi 'khor los sgyur ba'i rgyal po" (a chakravartin specifically qualified as one of power or might) and "'khor los sgyur ba'i rgyal po" (a chakravartin more generally). The left-hand and right-hand distinction in the prophecy encoding likely reflects this gradation within the category of universal monarchs.

- The phrase rendered "on the one side they are dark, on the other they are white" refers to the monastic robe: the underrobe is dark (often reddish-brown or black) and the outer portion is lighter, a detail by which the knowledgeable soldier distinguishes monks from naked tirthika ascetics. The doctrinal point being dramatized in the army episode is that the monks would not cut the grass to free themselves because the Vinaya prohibits destroying plant-life, and they explain this precept to the king, who is moved to reverence. The offense category mentioned as "an offense against the Saṅgha that exceeded the ordinary" renders the technical Vinaya term for a saṅghāvaśeṣa (an offense requiring formal suspension by the Saṅgha), which falls short of a pārājika defeat but is more serious than a simple downfall.

- The summary verse near the middle of this passage appears to be a mnemonic gāthā encapsulating the legal cases treated in the preceding sūtra section. The line "whose hide is unsuitable" is a standard Vinaya shorthand for a case involving a person who cannot properly receive or carry out a Vinaya procedure — the exact referent is determined by the broader case context and is rendered literally here in keeping with the formulaic nature of such summary verses.
- The term རྒྱལ་པོ་སྐྲུག་པོ་འཁོར་བ་ literally means "holder of the mātṛkā," referring to the proto-Abhidharma numerical matrices. This is rendered as "master of the mātṛkā" with a brief gloss on first occurrence. The term རྒྱལ་པོ་སྐྲུག་པོ་ refers to the notorious "group of six monks," a standing cast of wayward monks in Vinaya narratives whose misdeeds typically prompt new rules; this is rendered in context without needing special gloss.
- The phrase rendered "the householder Anāthapiṇḍada" renders འཆིང་པ་ཤིང་པ་མེད་པོ་འཁོར་བ་, the Tibetan equivalent of Sanskrit Anāthapiṇḍada, the famous lay patron of the Buddha and donor of the Jeta Grove. His name means "feeder of the destitute."

The figure called "the god" throughout this passage refers to King Prasenajit, who is being referred to by the honorific བཤུ་མཚན་, a standard Tibetan royal title equivalent to Sanskrit deva used for kings. The minister is, of course, using a ruse to bring the monks to the site — the "letter from the god" is a stratagem to get them to come voluntarily and thus eventually convey the noble ones toward the king's camp.

The phrase भो बभ्रुवर्धन ("good sir" / "good-looking one") is a term of polite address in Vinaya narratives, used between equals or when addressing someone respectfully; it corresponds to Pāli bho, Sanskrit bhoh.

- The names Buddhaguptra and Dharmadatta appear as Sanskrit-style names embedded in the Tibetan text and refer to specific monks who are the subject of the forty-day boundary dispensation. The formal act here is a standard Vinaya procedure; the repetition of the motion and act language is a faithful rendering of the Vinaya's formulaic style and is intentional, not scribal redundancy.
- The verse summary near the middle of the passage is a mnemonic gāthā (a brief verse of the Vinaya), summarizing prohibited items: the phrase "forms with essence" refers to corpse-relics or the physical remains of a person of substance; the list that follows identifies the associated prohibited meats and materials. The rendering stays close to the compressed verse style of such Vinaya summaries.

The name "Ajātaśatru" is rendered from "ma skyes dgra" (literally "enemy of the unborn") and "Devadatta" from "lha sbyin" (literally "god-given"), following standard Vinaya identifications. "Bimbisāra" is the traditional identification for "gzugs can snying po" (literally "form-essence" or "essence of form"), the father of Ajātaśatru. The same epithet "gzugs can snying po" appears in the verse and in the prose narrative, referring to King Bimbisāra.

- The phrase rendered "like a rhinoceros horn" echoes the famous Rhinoceros Sūtra image for the pratyekabuddha's solitary mode of practice; this is a standard doctrinal allusion. The final sentence of the Tibetan is incomplete as transmitted, ending mid-clause; the translation carries it as far as the text allows and breaks naturally at that point.

making it permissible for use. The text describes a case where this procedure cannot be performed because no one is available to act as the receiving party, and the Blessed One's ruling relaxes the requirement in cases of medical necessity for the sick.

The expression "seven days" throughout refers to the Vinaya rule that certain allowable medicines — including butter and grain-butter — may be kept and used for a period of seven days; beyond that limit they must not be used. The monk who "consecrated it over seven days" is using the full permitted period.

- The term rendered "bad food" throughout translates a Tibetan phrase denoting food that is therapeutically coarse or unwholesome, here prescribed as a medical treatment; it is a technical Vinaya category, not simply spoiled food.

The phrase "not touch it even with the tip of the finger" renders a Tibetan idiom for the finest or most delicate point of contact; "the finger-tip" or "the tip of the blade of grass" are equivalent expressions in Vinaya literature.

The title "Ekaśataka" (literally "the Hundred Singles" or "One-by-One Hundred") refers to the Vinaya text under discussion; the Tibetan renders this as "Rkyang pa," meaning "single" or "alone," a section heading within the Vinaya.

- The phrase rendered "a wandering alms-seeker using the road as his customary practice" translates a term for a monk who travels on almsround rather than residing in a fixed dwelling. The same term applies to the group of six monks later in the passage, where it describes their habitual wandering on the road.

The "seven objects that constitute the bases for making merit from wealth" is a standard list in the Vinaya commentarial tradition referring to meritorious acts such as building temples, providing lodging, donating furnishings, and similar deeds; the text does not enumerate them here and neither does this translation.

The name "Nandaka" appears in the Tibetan as part of the exclamation about the cloth; the preceding passage's rendering of "Nandaka" as the speaker is maintained for consistency, though the Tibetan here attributes the speech to one of the group of six without naming him individually. The attribution to Nandaka follows the convention of the preceding section.

- The final two lines are the opening of a mnemonic verse summarizing the rules of this fascicle; the translation renders them as they stand, incomplete, since they are the beginning of a verse that continues beyond the passage supplied. The phrase rendered "charnel ground that has an owner" reflects the Tibetan's distinction between attended or guarded charnel grounds (where someone holds custodial rights) and unattended ones from which charnel-ground cloth may licitly be gathered. The "low-caste guardian" renders "rigs ngan" literally, indicating a person of base social standing charged with overseeing the charnel ground. The clause about "carrying out the king's decrees" likely refers to the legal liability the guardian and his family faced when funerary property went missing from a site under their charge.

- The passage shifts between two distinct cases, each with its own ruling. The first concerns taking cloth from a shrine or temple with an owner — specifically here a heterodox temple — and the second concerns the three Dharma robes of a monk being taken from him while ill. The verse couplet at the opening appears to introduce both topics as a summary rubric.

The term rendered "temple-keeper" translates lha khang pa, literally "one of the temple/house of the deity," meaning the custodian or priest responsible for the shrine. The figure of Īśvara here refers to Śiva or a local deity of that name, serving as the dedicatee of the improvised roadside shrine.

The Blessed One's final declaration is left incomplete in the source text as given, suggesting the passage continues in the next fascicle or section.

- The verse summary at the end lists several cases by name or category that would be described in subsequent sūtra passages. The names Śābdāgata and Śrīvṛddha appear to be householders or donors mentioned in those subsequent stories; they are kept in their reconstructed Sanskrit forms as proper names. The Tibetan བཞུགས་པ་ལྟ་བུ་ renders a name meaning something like "one who has seized sound" and བཞུགས་པ་ལྟ་བུ་ one meaning "one who nurtures glory," here given as Śābdāgata and Śrīvṛddha respectively as standard equivalents in the Vinaya tradition; some uncertainty remains about these identifications, but the doctrinal content is not affected.
- The phrase rendered "the dregs of sesame oil" translates a term for the residue or lees remaining after oil has been pressed or clarified — a low-quality, thin product appropriately given to junior monks. The verse hinges on this contrast between nourishing fats and thin residue.

The instruction about speaking "at the time when salt, or whichever item was distributed first, is being served — not at the time of all the others" reflects a specific Vinaya procedural rule about the timing of the abbot's instruction during a meal distribution; the precise regulatory intent is clear in context but the compressed wording of the source is somewhat elliptical.

- The phrase rendered "the Saṅgha of those who have gone forth, headed by Gaṅgā and the others" refers to the Nirgrantha (Jain) community. "Gaṅgā" here appears to be a personal name of a Nirgrantha elder heading that community; the Tibetan reads "gang po la sogs te rab tu byung ba'i dge 'dun," literally "the Saṅgha of those who have gone forth, headed by Gaṅgā and others." This is a Jain renunciant community, contrasted with the Buddhist Saṅgha throughout this passage.

The term rendered "Nirgrantha" corresponds to the Tibetan "gcer bu pa" (literally "the naked ones"), a standard Tibetan designation for Jain ascetics. Śrī-bhadra is identified as a Nirgrantha lay practitioner, not a Buddhist.

- The name rendered as "Gaṅgā" throughout refers to the leader of the naked ascetic group identified in the preceding narrative. The Tibetan "གང་པ་" here functions as a proper name.

The phrase translated as "broke wind loudly" renders "མཁའ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" literally, "made a sound like a horse's belly" — a standard classical idiom for flatulence. The contrast with the Tathāgata's dignified smile is clearly the satirical point of the episode.

The allusion "like a needle-seller who returns to the home of a needle-maker to sell needles" is a classical Tibetan proverb meaning to bring something to someone who already has it in abundance — here used to mock Gaṅgā's crude imitation of the Buddha's smile.

The passage breaks mid-sentence in the source at "he thought to himself," indicating the continuation follows.

- The name rendered throughout as "Fireborn" translates a Tibetan equivalent of the Sanskrit name Agnija or Jātūkarṇa-type compound meaning "born of fire," here functioning as a character's name in contrast to Gaṅgā. The precise Sanskrit original is not recoverable from this passage alone, but the meaning is transparent and the rendering is consistent.

The tree name rendered as "kādira" is a phonetic approximation of the Tibetan transliteration; this is almost certainly the Acacia catechu, a tree whose charcoal is noted for its long-burning quality.

- The name rendered "Meṣkī" (Tibetan me skyes kyi sring mo, literally "sister of Meṣkī" or "Fire-born's sister") designates a woman called Agnijā or a similar Sanskrit equivalent; the Tibetan me skyes means "fire-born." The text gives her as Śrībhadrā's sister, so the rendering follows that relationship. The name Gaṃpa (gang pa) is a proper name left in its Tibetan phonetic form as no standard Sanskrit equivalent is recoverable from context alone.

- The names Śrīgupta, Gaṅgopa, and Agniṣrābhā are standard renderings for श्रीगुप्त, गङ्गा, and अग्निश्रृङ्गा respectively. The passage makes the narrative identity of "Bhadra" (भद्रा) clear as Śrīgupta's wife who is also the sister of Agniṣrābhā; the syntax is compressed and the exact familial relationship is slightly ambiguous, but the traditional reading identifies her as Śrīgupta's wife who had been conspiring against the Buddha. The lotus names follow standard botanical identifications: utpala (blue lotus), padma (red lotus), kumuda (white night-blooming lotus), and puṇḍarīka (white day-blooming lotus). The divine lake Mandāka is a heavenly lotus pond in the classical Indian cosmological tradition.

- The phrase rendered "from without and within" for རྒྱུ་ནང་ནས་ལྷན་ནས་ is somewhat uncertain; the Tibetan རྒྱུ་ནང་ནས་ may mean "henceforth" or "outwardly," and some editions read this simply as "he thereafter gave rise to faith." The reading adopted here follows the sense of a turning from outer to inner conviction, which fits the narrative context.

The passage ending mid-sentence — the Blessed One perceiving Śrīgupta's intention, disposition, and character — is a deliberate break at the given passage boundary; the sentence continues in the following section.

- The phrase rendered "the twenty mountain-peaks of the view of the transitory collection" refers to the twenty sub-views constituting the view of the transitory collection (satkāyadṛṣṭi), a standard Abhidharma enumeration: four each applied to the five aggregates, totaling twenty. This is a conventional image in stream-entry accounts, where gnosis "shatters" these views as a vajra breaks a mountain peak.

The "four abodes that gladden the noble ones" translates a phrase that could also be rendered "the four stations of joy of the noble ones," likely referring to the four fruits of the śrāvaka path or the four foundations associated with stream-entry; the exact referent is context-dependent and commentarily variable.

- The phrase "incurs a transgression involving the deceased" renders a Tibetan legal formula indicating that the offence is compounded by involving the merit or intention of the deceased patron. The Vinaya context implies that reducing a stūpa below its originally intended size is a serious infringement tied to the spiritual merit already dedicated to it by the one who died.
- The phrase rendered "woolen ox" translates a term literally meaning a yak or ox associated with wool or fleece; in context this appears to refer to a pack animal used for carrying a proclamation board through the streets, which was a common method of public announcement.

The figure "Anāthapiṇḍada" appears here both as the name of the grove's donor and as the lay householder who offers to provide music; the text treats these as the same person, which is consistent with the tradition.

- The phrase rendered "proximate offense" translates a term indicating a serious infraction just short of a root downfall; the Tibetan here suggests a grave offense in the category adjacent to a formal defeat. The wooden sounding board rendered as "the wooden sounding board struck" is the gaṇḍī, a resonant plank used in Indian monastic settings to summon the community, retained in transliteration in the Tibetan. The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the continuity format of the source.
- The phrase rendered "the Group of Six" refers to the well-known group of six habitually misbehaving monks (Skt. ṣaḍvargika) who figure throughout the Vinaya narratives as negative examples. This is a standard technical reference in Vinaya literature and needs no further gloss in context.

The summary verse at the midpoint and the closing verse are section-heading gāthās typical of the Two-Part Vinaya's organizational structure; the Tibetan indicates they are verse summaries encapsulating the legal matter of each sūtra section.

- The final verse is cryptic and may be a mnemonic condensation of narrative content that follows in the subsequent sūtra section rather than a summary of what precedes. Its meaning cannot be fully resolved from the verse alone; it likely refers to monks and nuns in proximity and the presence of children, pointing forward to disciplinary cases treated in the next section.
- The senior nun's name rendered here as "Gahaladā" translates the Tibetan "བཀྲ་ཤིས་ལྷོ་མ་ལྷོ་མ་", which appears to be a descriptive phrase meaning something like "the stout elder nun, Gāladā" or similar. The exact Sanskrit name underlying བཀྲ་ཤིས་ལྷོ་མ་ is uncertain; some Vinaya parallels suggest "Sthūlanandā" (the stout joyful one), which fits the Tibetan descriptors perfectly. The rendering "Gahaladā" is therefore corrected: she should be identified as the elder nun Sthūlanandā, a well-known figure in the Vinaya literature.

The final two verse-summaries are extremely condensed mnemonic stanzas cataloguing the topics of the preceding sūtra sections; their elliptical phrasing makes full explication impossible without the surrounding Vinaya context, and the translation reflects their summary character faithfully.

- The phrase rendered "the large cloth" for རྩ་ཆུང་ཆུང་ is literally "large cotton cloth" and may refer to a specific requisite garment whose precise identity in the full thirteen-piece set is debated in the commentarial tradition. The list of thirteen items here does not perfectly match every known canonical enumeration; the translation follows the Tibetan as given.

The phrase རྩ་ཆུང་ཆུང་ — literally "like the mother" or "the Abhidharma" — is rendered throughout as "the Abhidharma," following the standard Tibetan Vinaya convention where རྩ་ (literally "mother") is a standard shorthand for the Abhidharma Piṭaka, the "matrix" of the teaching.

- The colophon-like insertions marking "the second verse" and "the third verse of the sūtra of the third section of the Ekamsaka" appear to be scribal section markers within what may be a Vinaya compendium organized around the Ekamsaka, a section of the Vinaya dealing with individual topics. These structural markers have been rendered as plain prose in keeping with TTS requirements.

The phrase rendered "formal request followed by three proclamations" translates a technical Vinaya procedure: a motion put to the Saṅgha once, followed by three formal proclamations, constituting the most solemn category of Saṅgha act.

The brief verse summaries at the section breaks appear to be mnemonic indices for the sūtras that follow, summarizing their main topics in condensed form; they have been rendered as verse accordingly.

- The name translated as "Twenty-Million-Grain" renders the Tibetan "Gro-zhin bye-ba nyi-shu-pa," a literal calque of a Sanskrit name such as Viṃśatikotidhānya or similar, indicating a monk associated with an extraordinary quantity of grain. The precise Sanskrit original is uncertain but the Tibetan is transparent.

The phrase rendered "the one who asked while already knowing was the blessed buddha" is a standard Vinaya narrative formula indicating that the Buddha's question to Ānanda was rhetorical, posed with full knowledge, in order to elicit a formal statement for the record.

The term "bull-elephants that happen to recognize" (Tibetan: byang-shes) refers to trained or semi-trained elephants that have learned to respond to particular handlers or stimuli — here, the scent of their own species' fat. This is a specific technical term in the elephant-keeping tradition reflected in early Vinaya literature.

- The verse summaries embedded in the text are mnemonic colophon-verses serving as tables of contents for Vinaya sections; their terse, list-like style is intentional and not a translation error.

The term rendered "seed-jars" translates a unit of land measurement defined by the amount of seed used to sow it; one thousand such jar-measures indicates a very substantial agricultural donation.

The list of persons disqualified from joint formal legal proceedings includes technically defined Vinaya categories. "Paṇḍaka" refers to a person with ambiguous or deficient sexual characteristics, a recognised Vinaya category. "One whose status is unsettled" and "one who dwells separately" render technical terms for monks in irregular disciplinary standing.

"Becomes associated with what is past" renders a technical Vinaya formula indicating that an irregular sitting arrangement, if no formal offence-occasion arises, is treated as though it had already concluded without consequence.

- The phrase rendered "face forward" translates a Tibetan expression that likely refers to monks positioning themselves to guard their property, though it may alternatively mean to proceed or turn to face a particular direction. The sense is that monks should secure the vessels rather than simply letting them be appropriated. The term "smeared" or "made entangled" here carries the technical Vinaya sense of claiming an object by marking or contaminating it with a small amount of substance, which was a stratagem used by the group of six to reserve items for themselves. The summary verse refers to shoes being set outside, which is not discussed in the body of this passage but belongs to adjacent rulings in the broader Vinaya section, carried forward as a mnemonic summary.

- The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as this is a continuous Vinaya text and the present excerpt ends abruptly with "Then his feet and —" reflecting the original's incomplete state at the passage boundary.

The Tibetan term rendered "greasy-goods room" or "oil storage room" is "snum pa'i zong," a specialized Vinaya architectural term for a storeroom for oil or fatty substances; the exact function is rendered as closely as context permits.

The phrase rendered "bundle them and store them" in connection with the tree ornaments reflects instructions for careful preservation of devotional decorations offered by Anāthapiṇḍada, to be reused on festival occasions — a noteworthy detail of monastery administration in this Vinaya passage.

- The kataka tree (Sanskrit kataka, Strychnos potatorum) is a plant traditionally used in India to clarify turbid water; its seeds cause suspended particles to coagulate and settle. The translation renders the practical instruction faithfully.

The phrase rendered "ball of cooked grain" (zan gyi chang bu) refers to a small lump of cooked rice or grain used as a makeshift clarifying agent; the Blessed One's remark that "it has no grease and will break apart" may mean it lacks the binding properties of the kataka fruit and thus will dissolve without fully clarifying — the text breaks off at this point.

- The verse summary near the opening is a colophon-like condensation of rulings; its syntax is terse and elliptical. The phrase rendered "the triple gateway of the sole" reflects the Tibetan "rkyang pa'i sgo gsum pa," literally "the third gateway of the single foot" — this is likely a structural sūtra heading whose precise referent within the Vinaya collection is technical; the rendering is literal and no smoother reading is clearly preferable.

The passage "do not be fastidious about vessels and balls" refers to Vinaya regulations about whether water that has been stored in sealed vessels or formed into rounded containers is permissible to drink in the afternoon — "balls" here likely refers to stoppers or rounded vessel-mouths. This is a technical Vinaya usage and the translation renders it literally as the tradition intends.

- The phrase rendered "dough-water" translates a term literally meaning "water from washing dough" or "water in which something has been rinsed," used as a substitute purifying liquid — the exact substance is somewhat unclear from context but is consistent with Vinaya discussions of substitute cleansing agents.

The episode of the monks carrying loads for the novices' fathers involves a series of rapid rulings; the Tibetan moves quickly through several sub-cases and the sequence has been rendered as faithfully as possible to the original logic.

- The phrase rendered "eat from your begging bowls" translates a directive to consume food specifically using the monks' alms bowls, which in context appears to be a ruling about the propriety of eating food that has been carried in or on the bowls during travel. The series of casuistic rulings that follow all concern whether food or liquid in a bowl retains its permitted status after contact with oil, grease, or residue — standard Vinaya purity concerns.

The comparison of the mouth to a wound in the final ruling reflects a classical Indian medical and Vinaya idiom: both the mouth and an open wound are regarded as continually exuding fluid and thus inherently difficult to render fully pure, which is why the standard of three rinses and spitting out is established as legally sufficient rather than requiring perfect cleanliness.

- The phrase rendered "tiger-paw bread" translates a term that likely refers to a particular shape or kind of hard travel bread; the exact referent is uncertain but the term is conventional in Vinaya contexts for a compact, portable food suitable for journeys.

The summary verses are mnemonic gāthās cataloguing the topics of the sūtra sections; they are translated straightforwardly but some items in the list are allusive shorthand whose full case-narratives appear in the surrounding text.

"Dedicate it toward the north" reflects a Vinaya ritual gesture of orientation used to render certain foods allowable; the precise significance of the northward direction in this context belongs to specialist Vinaya commentary.

The passage ends mid-sentence as supplied; the translation preserves this open ending faithfully.

- The phrase rendered "a novice's father" translates a literal Tibetan expression meaning the head or senior figure associated with a novice; this likely refers to the novice's preceptor or a senior layman connected to the novice. The precise referent is slightly ambiguous in this context.

The phrase "a deity at whose gate" renders the Tibetan literally; it likely refers to a deity-shrine or a deity's threshold outside of which the grain had fallen, and the grain was then stolen by thieves. The sequence of events here is somewhat compressed in the original.

- The expression rendered "northern sound of the ill-omened drum" is a Vinaya technical phrase indicating a specific time-signal used in monastic settings; the precise cultural referent may vary across commentarial traditions but the translation reflects the literal sense of the Tibetan.

The ladder passage is an embedded ruling on carrying and setting down the Saṅgha's property, using the image of a ladder as a procedural analogy for how to handle vessels safely; the Blessed One's declaration is broken off at the passage's end, to be continued in the next section.

The name "Namgru" (Tib. nam gru) appears to be a personal name; the epithet "Doubtful Namgru" reflects his characteristic hesitancy as narrated in the text.

- The passage distinguishes eight levels of recipients for generosity and assigns progressively immeasurable karmic returns — this follows the standard Vinaya gradation of "fields of merit" moving from ordinary beings through the four pairs of noble ones and up to the fully awakened Buddha.

The four special occasions for obligatory delivery of offerings — the awakening (at Bodh Gayā), the first turning of the wheel of Dharma (at Sārnāth), the great miracle (at Śrāvastī), and the descent from the divine realm (at Sāṃkāśya) — are a standard Vinaya enumeration of the four great sacred sites associated with the Buddha's life and career.

The final colophon verse is a mnemonic summary (uddāna) of the sūtra's topics, a standard feature of Vinaya texts. The phrase rendered "willow branch applied accordingly" (ལྷོ་མཚོ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་) refers to the ceremonial use of a willow or tooth-cleaning stick in ritual context; the precise referent here is formulaic and its full significance is internal to the Vinaya procedural context.

- The phrase rendered "distributing it according to bodily contact from the feet to the head" translates a Tibetan idiom describing how the six divided the bedding by assigning portions corresponding to each body part from foot to head, exhausting all the bedding in the process. The exact procedural meaning is somewhat obscure but the general sense of inappropriate apportionment is clear.

The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end with "or —" as the Tibetan passage itself is incomplete at this point, ending mid-construction with the pillar-plaster usage and the word "or."

"The group of six" refers throughout to the notorious group of six wayward monks frequently mentioned in Vinaya narratives as the instigators of rule-occasions.

- The phrase rendered "use it as plaster in the joints of a wall" continues the preceding passage's instructions about worn bedding; "ལྷོ་མཚོ་" (joints or cracks of a wall) and "ལྷོ་མཚོ་" (each joint, one by one) indicate applying plaster into individual cracks, which is the natural continuation of the cow-dung-and-earth plaster instruction.

The term "ལྷོ་མཚོ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་" rendered "winter residence" (literally a warm or sheltered dwelling) is uncertain; some commentators read this as a specific type of lodging rather than strictly a winter house. The narrative sense strongly supports "winter residence" here.

The summary verses at section breaks contain technical Vinaya architectural and textile terms (ལྷོ་མཚོ་, ལྷོ་མཚོ་ལྷོ་མཚོ་, ལྷོ་མཚོ་, ལྷོ་མཚོ་) whose precise meanings are debated in the scholarly literature. The renderings given ("insignia," "clear insignia," "partition screens," "ragged stitching") follow contextual inference and the general commentarial tradition but should be regarded as provisional.

- The verse in the summary section is terse and condensed, as is typical of mnemonic colophon-verses in Vinaya literature; the rendering follows the most natural doctrinal reading. The phrase rendered "what went out and came back without being given" refers to items that left a donor's possession (going to a funeral) and returned to him without having been formally donated — the Blessed One then rules these may be accepted by monks when offered. The final line of the passage breaks off mid-sentence, as the source text continues beyond this excerpt.

- The phrase rendered "steward monk" translates a monk who performs a financial or managerial function on behalf of the community; the Tibetan zhalta byedpa'i dge slong literally means "a monk who serves as steward or agent." The instruction to "consult the senior monks" before making loans reflects the standard Vinaya requirement that community property decisions involve experienced members.

The term "star" in the verse summary is obscure in this context; it may refer to a specific type of allotment marking or a technical Vinaya category whose precise referent is unclear from this passage alone.

"Novice fathers" renders dge tshul pha dag, which refers to monks who serve as preceptors or guardians of novices.

- The phrase rendered "bent key" translates lde mig kyog po, which likely refers to a crooked or hooked implement used to manipulate a bolt or latch from outside — a kind of picklock or curved key. This is a routine Vinaya technical detail but may sound unusual to listeners; no better single English term is available without paraphrase.

The passage about the four categories that must not be divided — stūpa funds, Saṅgha funds, sick-care fees, and food funds — is a stock Vinaya formula establishing inalienable categories of monastery income, placed here as the Blessed One's ruling in response to the monks' diversion of the householder's donation.

- The yakṣa's name, rendered here as "Woolly-Bull," represents a translation of the Tibetan bal glaṅ ldan, meaning "one who has a woolly bull" or "endowed with a woolly ox." This is likely a rendering of a Sanskrit name such as Vṛṣabha-related or similar; the exact Sanskrit original is uncertain.

"Uṇika" is a transliteration of the Tibetan u ni ko; the Sanskrit original is uncertain.

The phrase "fruits of the northern forests" likely refers to produce from the Uttarakuru or northern wilderness regions in the Buddhist cosmological imagination, though here it is used geographically to mean produce sent from the north down to Rohitaka.

The "making suitable by fire" refers to the Vinaya procedure of rendering fruit or seeds ritually allowable for consumption by monks through contact with fire, a knife, or a fingernail — here the fire-touching method is specified.

- The term rendered "fire-screen" translates a term for a portable fire-containment device or stand used for warming; the precise implement is uncertain but the context makes clear it is a raised or enclosed structure designed to hold fire off the floor-mat and to reduce smoke when used with an external blow-pipe or bellows. The rendering "hearth-screen" for the same object in the subsequent line reflects a slightly different contextual use but refers to the same item.

- The five-part door-securing system described at the close presents some difficulty in identifying each implement precisely; the terms rendered here as "bar-bolt," "door-bolt," "wheel-lock," "door-chain," and "bent key" are best approximations based on Vinaya parallels, and the exact ancient mechanisms are uncertain. The proportional liability scheme that follows is internally consistent and follows the Vinaya's characteristic casuistic logic, but the fractions as enumerated in the Tibetan appear asymmetrical — "three employs two, three omitted" and "two employs three, three parts" — which may reflect a scribal issue in the source text. The translation renders the Tibetan as it stands.

- The term rendered "formally received" refers to the Vinaya procedure of yācanā, by which food is formally accepted from the donor's hands before being consumed, a requirement whose omission can create a transgression in certain circumstances. The Tibetan term used here, byinlen, literally means "to receive a gift," and functions as the standard rendering for this formal reception rite.

The phrase rendered "excess" in the section on robe measurement translates a Tibetan idiom meaning something that goes beyond what the rule stipulates, which in Vinaya contexts constitutes a technical infraction.

The "fascicle" count at the close is a scribal colophon marking the canonical division of the Vinaya text; "bam po" is a traditional Indian and Tibetan unit of textual division.

- The passage repeats two pairs of questions about "observed or not observed" and "foretold or not foretold" — the second occurrences give different answers than the first. This appears to be a deliberate structural feature of the Vinaya catechism, not a scribal error, though it is striking. The translation preserves both as they stand.

The phrase rendered "abides in attachment" versus "abides in renunciation" translates བཤེད་པའི་འཇུག་པ་ and བཤེད་པའི་འཇུག་པ་ respectively; བཤེད་པ་ here likely means "going forth" or "renunciation" in the technical Vinaya sense, and the answer that a transgression abides in attachment rather than in renunciation is doctrinally coherent.

- The phrase rendered as "morally indeterminate" translates the Tibetan term for what is neither virtuous nor non-virtuous — in Vinaya contexts this often corresponds to the category of actions that are not explicitly prohibited by scripture but are not wholesome either. The pairing here of "non-virtuous" and "morally indeterminate" with the same definitions used earlier for "ripened" and "not ripened" reflects the text's systematic cross-categorization of transgressions.

The passage on "transgressions arising from mind" and the restoration ceremony is somewhat elliptical; the sense is that a monk who fails even to intend or verbalize the poṣadha ceremony incurs a mental transgression, but unlike verbal or bodily transgressions, it is not formally cleared — though it is also not as grave as a failure to cultivate virtue roots.

The final section on "spreading the sitting mat" as a condition that determines whether an act is or is not a transgression is a standard Vinaya procedural point: the presence or absence of the mat signals whether proper protocol has been observed.

- The passage is a technical Vinaya legal discussion involving a nun's formal expulsion from or retention within a monastic boundary (Tibetan: རྒྱུ་ཁྱོད་, Skt. sīmā), and the conditions under which monastic acts involving that boundary do or do not incur a transgression. The terminology around shaving the head, joining palms, and prostration appears to describe a formal act of submission or appeal by the nun in question, though the exact procedural referent in the source Vinaya text is not entirely clear from this excerpt alone. The gender of the central "monk" figure in the middle section is ambiguous in the Tibetan and may in fact refer to the nun who is the subject of the formal act; this uncertainty is consequential but unresolvable without the broader context of the vinaya passage.

- The five classes of transgressions referred to throughout are the standard Vinaya fivefold classification of offenses. The repeated formula "not having seen the transgression" is the technical Vinaya ground for expulsion from a communal act, distinct from the root defeat offense. The phrase rendered "reinstated individually" translates the Vinaya technical term for individual reinstatement within the Saṅgha's formal procedures. The passage's parallel structure of contrasting paired conditions is characteristic of Vinaya scholastic analysis. The text ends mid-sentence, as the passage supplied was incomplete.

- The passage contains a highly formulaic, catechetical structure characteristic of Vinaya abhidharma-style exposition. The repeated formula "expelled on account of not having seen the transgression, not repeating the offense, and not repeating the view toward the offense" maps onto the standard threefold grounds for the suspension act (ukkhepanīyakamma). The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the continuity framing. The phrase rendered "in accordance with the word of a believing layman" translates "dge bsnyen dad pa'i tshig bzhin," which specifies that the expulsion was triggered by a faithful lay person's testimony — a recognized Vinaya scenario. The categories of "directly present" and "not directly present" refer to whether the relevant person or matter is physically present before the assembly at the time of the act.

- The term rendered "resolution" throughout translates yi dam, which in Vinaya procedural contexts denotes the agreed-upon motion or formal determination (roughly equivalent to Sanskrit karmavācanā-related consent); the passage is part of a detailed casuistic analysis of the conditions under which a Saṅgha act is valid, exploring permutations of plurality, duality, and singularity of participants under various epistemic and procedural conditions. No single rendering perfectly captures the technical force, but "resolution" follows the established usage in the preceding rendered passage and is consistent with Vinaya technical literature.
- The phrase "three or five factors" recurs throughout this passage as the governing conditions that determine whether a Saṅgha act is validly performed. This refers to the standard Vinaya requirements for the legality of formal acts: three factors concern the proper formulation of the motion and announcements, and five relate to the full set of procedural conditions. The precise enumeration is left implicit in the text and depends on the broader commentarial context.

The term rendered "no remainder" and "remainder" translates a distinction between a defeated nun who loses all standing in the Saṅgha entirely versus a monk who commits an analogous act and retains residual standing. The "four root defeats not shared in common" refers to pārājika offenses specific to nuns that have no parallel in the monk's code.

- The phrase rendered "a place of theft" translates a term that in the Vinaya context refers to a place or situation involving theft — likely signifying someone who came to ordination under false pretenses or who participated in ordination proceedings in a fraudulent or invalid context. The doctrinal referent is the category of persons whose ordination is rendered void or suspect due to circumstances of concealment or misrepresentation. This is a technically complex Vinaya category and the rendering is approximate.

The passage about the nun being "dismissed" after the proclamation concerning a monk's parents likely refers to a specific Vinaya procedure in which a nun who has taken sides in a dispute, or whose presence violates a procedural rule, is formally excluded from the Saṅgha act and then attempts to re-enter — a scenario with a specific Vinaya technical referent that the text presupposes rather than explains fully.

- The expression rendered "a mind that is neither" translates "निर्दोषमनोऽपि न विद्वेष्टमनोऽपि न", literally "a mind that is indeterminate" or "a mind that does not incline to either side" — the standard Abhidharma category of the morally indeterminate (avyākṛta). The translation "neither" is used for readability, but listeners should understand this as the technical third category alongside wholesome and unwholesome.

The passage on splitting the Saṅgha presents a nuanced threefold distinction based on the perpetrator's epistemic state regarding the legitimacy of the act. The key ruling is that only when one genuinely perceives an illegitimate act as legitimate throughout does the schism fall under the category that permits ordination and bars expulsion — a doctrinally significant point in Vinaya jurisprudence.

- The passage describing the monk employing "a means so that his mother lies down in order for his karma to be pacified" is elliptical and euphemistic in the Tibetan. The most natural reading is that the monk causes his mother to lie down and then lies on top of her, with her death resulting from that act. The phrase "for his karma to be pacified" likely refers to a misguided or deluded belief that some ritual or physical act will resolve his karmic burden, underlining the "neither wholesome nor unwholesome" characterization of the mind involved. This is a genuinely difficult passage and the precise scenario is not made fully explicit in the text.

The term rendered here consistently as "boundless act" refers to what the tradition calls an act of immediate retribution, one so grave that its karmic result arises in the very next life without interval. The Tibetan རྒྱུ་མཚན་ལྔ་ལྟུང་ལྟུང་ corresponds to the Sanskrit ānantaryakarman, and the five such acts classically include killing one's mother.

- The term rendered "not in accordance with scripture" translates lung du mi ston pa'i sems, literally "a mind that does not accord with scriptural authority or transmission." This is a technical Vinaya category distinct from simply non-virtuous motivation; it refers to acting contrary to what the canonical rule specifies, even without malicious intent — hence its applicability to arhats, who are beyond afflictive motivation but can still act carelessly or inattentively.

The phrase "son of Maudgala" refers to Mahāmaudgalyāyana, one of the Buddha's chief disciples; the instruction attributed here relates to a specific Vinaya narrative context.

The final paragraph poses a set of distinctions about the Saṅgha being "split" or "in its entirety," terms with precise Vinaya technical force. The Tibetan bye ba here most likely renders Sanskrit sakala ("entire, whole") rather than "myriad," and 'khrugs pa renders bhinna or bhedita ("disrupted, split"). The passage is deliberately structured as a series of logical distinctions; the translation preserves this structure.

- The fourfold distinction running throughout this passage — purpose, boundary, material gain, and food — reflects the standard Vinaya criteria for determining whether a schism constitutes a genuine separation of the Saṅgha into two independent communities. The text is working through a careful scholastic matrix of permutations between the concepts of "divided" (bye ba), "disrupted" or "in its entirety" (byi / ma bye), and "separate" or "abiding separately" (tha dad). The repetition is deliberate and structural, not a translation artifact. The term rendered "in its entirety" glosses the Tibetan bye ba / ma bye ba, which in this Vinaya context denotes the complete corporate Saṅgha as a unified body versus one that has been split off; the preceding passage's rendering has been preserved here for consistency.

- The names of the nāga kings and other beings are rendered from the Tibetan by best approximation of their probable Sanskrit originals: Śaktin (བྱུང་པོ་ལྔ་ལྟུང་, "powerful"), Sthira (བྱུང་པོ་ལྔ་ལྟུང་, "very abiding / steadfast"), Manāpa (བྱུང་པོ་ལྔ་ལྟུང་, "pleasing"), Priya (བྱུང་པོ་ལྔ་ལྟུང་, "beloved"), Priyadarśin (བྱུང་པོ་ལྔ་ལྟུང་, "dear to behold"), Lābhin (བྱུང་པོ་ལྔ་ལྟུང་, "possessing gain"), Suvarṇāśva (བྱུང་པོ་ལྔ་ལྟུང་, "fine horse / golden horse"). These are plausible reconstructions; the Tibetan Vinaya text likely reflects a Sanskrit Mūlasarvāstivāda original in which these names would appear in one of these or similar forms.

The phrase "definitely going wrong" renders རྒྱུ་མཚན་ལྔ་ལྟུང་, literally "definitely/certainly reversed/wrong," a technical term indicating the state of being fixed in a wrong course with no possibility of correction in that lifetime — a form of definite or fixed perdition. The precise doctrinal nuance (whether this refers to the five acts of immediate retribution or a broader category) is left to the reader, as the text itself clarifies it in what follows.

- The "six teachers" referred to are the six non-Buddhist teachers (the rival śramaṇa teachers such as Pūraṇa Kāśyapa and others) prominent in early Buddhist literature. The point appears to be that those who follow non-Buddhist teachers may be doctrinally unskilled, but since they are outside the Saṅgha entirely they cannot technically cause a schism within it.

The phrase rendered "cease to reside" translates a Vinaya technical term referring to suspension from community life or loss of residential standing within the Saṅgha; it is a formal Vinaya category distinct from expulsion.

The "five matters" and "four categories of transgression" are standard Vinaya technical categories. The five matters are the disputed points Devadatta raised to cause the schism; the four categories of transgression are the four classes of offenses in the Prātimokṣa code.

- The phrase rendered as "separately abide" translates a technical Vinaya term referring to the state of living apart from the Saṅgha under a formal sanction, distinct from the simple loss of residence rights. The two concepts — ceasing to reside and separately abiding — are parallel disciplinary categories and the text works through their four permutations systematically.

The passage on "changing status" from nun to monk or monk to nun reflects a Vinaya discussion about how ordination status affects the jurisdiction of offenses; the technical term for the residual Saṅgha offense is the saṅghāvaśeṣa, though the Tibetan here uses a general term for Saṅgha-remainder offenses and the passage does not explicitly name it as such.

The final lines break off mid-sentence at the close of the passage provided; the translation ends accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "saṅghāvaśeṣa" (Tibetan: dge 'dun gyi lhag ma) designates a class of serious monastic offenses that entail probation and formal rehabilitation by the Saṅgha but do not result in outright expulsion. This is the standard Vinaya technical term and is retained in Sanskrit for doctrinal precision.

The passage on "five heaps of transgression in a single place" enumerates offenses of ascending gravity: a misdeed (Skt. duṣkṛta), a matter for individual confession (Skt. pāyattika), a downfall, a saṅghāvaśeṣa, and a defeat (Skt. pārājika). The Tibetan for "the amount of the Teacher's robes" is a reference to a specific Vinaya regulation concerning the permissible dimensions of robes, the violation of which — even unintentionally — constitutes the lightest class of offense.

The passage on "four defeats from one utterance" involves the monk causing the nun to complete the utterance, thereby making her the proximate speaker of each offense. The doctrinal mechanism whereby speech articulated by another can be imputed to the instigator is a standard feature of Vinaya casuistry.

- The term māṣa is a unit of monetary and weight measurement used in the Vinaya literature to establish the threshold for the defeat rule concerning theft. The Vinaya tradition specifies that theft of an object worth five māṣas or more constitutes a defeat; these exchanges probe the edges of that rule.

The phrase rendered "a remainder belonging to the Saṅgha" translates a technical Vinaya term referring to property that accrues to the Saṅgha upon a monk's death or incapacity; the passage is exploring whether property designated during meditative absorption carries this status through successive absorptions.

The detail about the robe being "open to the sky" at dawn on the last day of the rains retreat reflects the strict Vinaya rules governing the kathina robe period and the rains retreat, under which a monk must have his robe properly within reach and consecrated at the moment the retreat concludes; failure results in the lapse described.

- The phrase rendered "crime without interval" translates "མཐའ་མེད་ཀྱི་མཛད་ཀྱི་ལྷན་པོ་ལྔ་པ་", the five ānantarya-karmas — actions that lead inevitably to rebirth in the lowest hell without any intervening state. The standard term in Vinaya contexts is "heinous crime" or "crime without interval"; both are attested in the tradition.

The sex-change cases involving a monk's mother and a nun's father are classical Vinaya edge cases (pañḍaka-type rulings) concerning sex transformation; the text is stating that a biological parent's change of sex and subsequent separation from the corresponding monastic livelihood constitutes a root defeat for the child and further incurs an ānantarya offense. The doctrinal logic here is briefly left implicit in the source and is not expanded upon.

The phrase rendered "gone beyond what is proper for the Saṅgha" translates "संघावासेषा," literally "remnant/surplus of the Saṅgha," a technical Vinaya term (saṃghāvaśeṣa) for the class of offenses that entail suspension but not expulsion — rendered here for TTS clarity rather than with the technical Sanskrit term saṃghāvaśeṣa.

- The phrase rendered "change of marks" translates the Tibetan expression for a change of sex or gender — that is, a person who was a nun undergoing a natural transformation and thereby becoming male. This is a recognized edge case in classical Vinaya literature, where a change of biological sex was understood to dissolve the original ordination status and open the possibility of a fresh ordination in the new sex without the prior restrictions applying.

The phrase "wounded" and "unwounded" in the section on sexual misconduct refers to a classical Vinaya distinction: a monk who has lost the relevant physical faculty through injury or illness is regarded differently from one who has not. The unwounded monk who voluntarily participates incurs the full defeat; for the wounded, the act is not fully constituted and the defeat does not apply.

The final answer in the section on taking life — "if one deprives a human being of life with one's own hand" — appears to leave the contrasting case incomplete in the Tibetan as transmitted; the text seems to break off or is compressed at this point.

- The passage turns entirely on systematic gender asymmetry in Vinaya offense categories: conduct constituting defeat, Saṅgha remainder, confession, or wrongdoing for one order often carries no equivalent penalty for the other. This reflects actual differences in the bhikṣu and bhikṣunī Prātimokṣa codes as preserved in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya tradition.

The phrase rendered "pronouncement of authorization" for 宣稱 translates a technically specific Vinaya context: claiming, under the guise of a prophetic or authoritative utterance, superhuman attainments one does not possess. The distinction between fabricating the perception deliberately versus making the utterance without such fabrication determines whether defeat is incurred. This is a consequential distinction in the text and the rendering reflects the doctrinal import as best the syntax allows.

- The passage containing the verse summary of the Mānavikā Sūtra is a colophon-like mnemonic index. The verses enumerate categories of permitted or impermissible substances and persons in condensed form; the rendering follows the Tibetan closely but some items in the mnemonic list are technical shorthand whose full referents are only clear from the surrounding canonical context. The phrase rendered "those with birthmarks" for ri mo can (literally "those who have marks or lines") may refer to those with skin markings; this reading is adopted tentatively.

The phrase "transfer of names on the ground and in the intermediate space" renders sa dang bar snang las mtshan 'phos pa and likely refers to a technical Vinaya procedure concerning the validity of boundary-transfers in different spatial contexts; the precise import depends on fuller canonical commentary.

The final sentence of the translation ends mid-question as the Tibetan passage itself ends there; the text is incomplete at this point.

- The verse "Two cases in which they become permissible" appears to enumerate three items rather than two, suggesting either a condensed or slightly corrupt verse tradition; the Tibetan runs "that which is not food, human milk, and sour whey." The number "two" in the verse opening may refer to two broader categories within which these examples fall, but the exact structural logic is not fully transparent from the text alone.

The phrase rendered as "destroying seeds" translates a compound meaning the offense of harming or ruining living seeds, a standard Vinaya category of transgression relating to the rule against damaging plant life.

- The verse "Mixed together with what is permissible / it may not be eaten even for seven days" is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan; the rendering follows the most natural reading in the context of medicine classification, where impermissible substances mixed with permissible ones remain impermissible across the full span of medicine categories. The term rendered "earlier-stage product" in the verse gloss corresponds to the later prose explanation distinguishing the molasses tree's early-stage, pressed-juice, boiled-molasses, and ash forms.

The summary verse near the end listing "received in the proper manner yet not consecrated" and "the eighth kind of medicinal drink" appears to be a mnemonic gāthā summarizing the cases just discussed; the rendering preserves its compressed quality while keeping the individual items identifiable.

- The verse summarizing the layman's son, the rains retreat, and monks of past and future is terse and somewhat elliptical even in the Tibetan, appearing to be a mnemonic gāthā; the rendering preserves its compressed character.

The phrase rendered "transgression with remainder" translates a term literally meaning "gone beyond," used here in the Vinaya technical sense for offenses that are serious but not root defeats; context establishes this is distinct from a pāṭijika.

- [illegible]

The repeated dialogic structure — a declaration by the Blessed One, followed by a question and Upāli's authoritative answer — is the standard Vinaya question-and-answer format. Upāli was the foremost disciple in Vinaya matters, and his answers carry canonical weight.

- The phrase rendered "one like a mother" reflects the Tibetan "ma lta bu'i gzhi," a technical Vinaya term for a foundational case used as a precedent — literally "a basis like a mother-case." In Vinaya literature this refers to a paradigm case from which further rulings are derived. The eight factors by which storage is released in this context are enumerated implicitly and may require the full surrounding commentary to enumerate precisely; only the structural statement is given in this passage.

The calculation involving resident monks numbering fifteen and the arriving monks making the count come to fourteen days reflects a technical reckoning concerning the extension of the rains-retreat period and quorum adjustments; the passage is compressed and the precise arithmetic depends on broader Vinaya context not provided here.

- The passage pivots on three overlapping but technically distinct Vinaya terms rendered here as "schism" (dbye), "strife" or "quarrel" ('khrug), "split" (bye), and "separate" (tha dad). These are technical categories from the Vinaya analysis of Saṅgha-schism, and their interrelations are precisely enumerated in the classic fourfold schema. The rendering of dbye as "schism," 'khrug as "strife," bye as "split," and tha dad as "separate" or "individually distinct" attempts to preserve these as four analytically non-synonymous terms while keeping the English natural.

The phrase "eighteen modes" in the phrase about perception of what is not Dharma reflects the standard Vinaya enumeration of eighteen types of Saṅgha-schism; the precise list is not given here but is referenced as known from the Vinaya.

- The verse passage near the beginning ("From the original, two are to be made...") is terse and somewhat elliptical in the original. The rendering follows the most natural reading within the Vinaya context of schism, expelled members, and those who follow them. The phrase rendered "a hundred hairs" for རྩེད་ཀྱི་མུ་འབྲུག་ཅུ་ལྔ་པ་ means literally "the pieces of limbs scattered into a hundred [parts like] hairs" — a simile for fragmented remnants of the community that must be reassembled. The exact import of this final instruction from Śāriputra is left open in the text, as the passage breaks off with a question, consistent with a catechetical Vinaya commentary format.
- The verse "At the time when the schism occurred, it was also announced to the sisters..." is syntactically compressed in the Tibetan and reads more as a prose list structured metrically; the rendering preserves the sense while smoothing the ellipsis.

The phrase rendered "the stream of water has reached" refers to the Vinaya convention of determining seniority or entitlement by which side a stream or water-channel flows toward, a technical procedural criterion in boundary and robe-distribution rulings; no gloss was inserted in the body per the TTS requirement, but a listener unfamiliar with Vinaya may need this context.

The final question is left open because the Tibetan passage itself ends mid-inquiry, with the answer to follow in the next passage.

- The Tibetan text ends mid-passage with "ཡོད་པར་གྱིས།" (in brief), clearly leading into a concluding verse or summary that is not included in the supplied passage. The translation faithfully renders up to that point.

The technical vocabulary throughout belongs to the Vinaya literature on formal acts (karmavācānā) and the rules governing schism (saṅghabhedā). The term translated as "setting aside" renders the Tibetan "འཇགས་པ་," which in this Vinaya context means the formal act of a monk withdrawing consent or objecting to a communal formal act — a specialized usage requiring contextual interpretation rather than a literal "abandonment." The rendering "setting aside" follows the established usage in the preceding portion of this translation.

- The term rendered "croupier" throughout this and the preceding passage translates a figure who counts or tallies votes or responses in a Saṅgha procedure; the Tibetan gzu bo reflects a Sanskrit term likely related to a designated counter or tally-keeper in the formal act. The precise Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain but "croupier" or "tally-keeper" is consistent with how it has been rendered in the preceding passage per the continuity instruction.

The phrase rendered "solemn declaration" for dam bca' ba denotes a formal pledge or binding statement made before the Saṅgha, especially in the context of acknowledging a root downfall; this rendering follows established Vinaya usage.

The closing verse is fragmentary and introduces a new enumeration; its full sense will continue in the following fascicle.

- The phrase rendered "probationary stick" follows the preceding passage's established rendering of རྩུག་པོའི་ལྟུང་ལྟར་; the precise nature of this procedural instrument is a matter for specialist Vinaya study and not further glossed here.

The term རྩུག་པོ་ is rendered throughout as "censure" and རྩུག་པོ་ as "degradation," རྩུག་པོ་ as "expulsion," and རྩུག་པོ་ as "readmission," in line with the formal Vinaya penalty acts being discussed. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, consistent with the text continuing into the next fascicle.

- The term rendered "aggregate of excellence" translates a compound that literally means something like "aggregate of what is abundant or fully endowed." The precise Vinaya technical meaning here may refer to a category of Vinaya material concerned with proper conduct and qualifications beyond ordination itself; the exact Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain but may relate to pravara or a similar term. This is a genuinely significant uncertainty given the technical nature of the Vinaya enumeration.

The phrase rendered "the substance of cause" is technically obscure; it appears to refer to matters concerning grounds or bases for proceedings, a standard Vinaya category.

- The phrase rendered "self-arisen Tathāgata" refers to a fully awakened buddha who arises without reliance on a teacher in that life, distinguished from a pratyekabuddha; the pairing here reflects a standard Vinaya taxonomic distinction between the two types of self-awakened beings. The passage on the ten modes of full ordination follows the classic Vinaya enumeration found in the Mūlasarvāstivāda tradition. "The five" who received full ordination by directly realizing gnosis refers to the group of five ascetics, the Buddha's first disciples at Vārāṇasī. The term rendered "messenger" for ordination of nuns reflects the Vinaya procedure whereby a nun-candidate's acceptance by the monks' Saṅgha is conveyed through an intermediary when direct presence is not possible.

- The terms "stolen-lodger" (མེད་པོ་འཇོག་པོ་) and "one who lives apart under separate rule" (མེད་པོ་འཇོག་པོ་འཇོག་པོ་) are technical Vinaya categories. The first refers to one who dwells with the community by stealth without being properly admitted; the second refers to one who has set up a separate legal boundary or acts independently of the Saṅgha's jurisdiction — a significant schismatic or boundary-related status. These are rendered descriptively rather than with technical Sanskrit equivalents (which would be stheyasaṃvāsaka and nānāsaṃvāsaka respectively) since the text is Tibetan Vinaya prose and the descriptive rendering is more transparent for a listening audience.

The term མེད་པོ་འཇོག་པོ་ ("one who has made a solemn promise") is somewhat opaque in this Vinaya context and may refer to one bound by a prior vow or oath that is incompatible with ordination; this is a marginal interpretive point.

- The phrase rendered "acts that cut by penalty, acts that bring down censure, and acts that bind to the white Dharma by solemn commitment" reflects a standard Vinaya tripartite classification of formal acts. "White Dharma" here denotes wholesome, virtuous Dharma, as is conventional in Vinaya literature. The term "yidam" in the Tibetan literally means a solemn vow or binding commitment; in this Vinaya context it does not carry its tantric sense of a chosen deity, but rather the sense of a formal pledge or commitment, rendered accordingly.

The phrase "spreading of grass" refers to the specific Vinaya procedure of laying down grass as part of a formal reconciliation rite.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, and the translation reflects this.

- The term rendered "noble tongue" and "border-dweller's tongue" refers to the standard Vinaya distinction between the Āryan language (Sanskrit or a prestige Middle Indo-Aryan dialect) and the language of border regions. "Noble one" here renders ārya in the sense of a speaker of the Āryan tongue, not necessarily a spiritually noble person, though the Tibetan uses the same term. This is a recognised philological ambiguity in Vinaya literature.

The term rendered "matrix" for मैत्रिका corresponds to the Māṭṛkā, the doctrinal matrices or summaries of the Dharma — one of the canonical textual categories alongside sūtra and Vinaya.

The sūtra name Bhadāla is a transliteration preserved from the source; its Sanskrit identity is not established with certainty in surviving canonical reference works.

The list near the end breaks off mid-enumeration in the source passage; the translation reflects this open-ended character faithfully.

- The seven means of settling a dispute listed here correspond to the seven adhikaraṇaśamatha rules of the Vinaya. The rendering "settling by absence of delusion" translates the third procedure, which in Sanskrit is amūḍhavināya, the rule applied when a monk was insane at the time of the offence and is formally declared to have acted without full mental capacity. The phrase translated as "that which is like laying down grass" renders the final procedure, tṛṇastāraka, the covering-over of the dispute as if with grass — a bilateral amnesty procedure. These are technical Vinaya procedural terms and the renderings given follow the standard commentarial interpretation.
- The phrase rendered "venerable one, come quickly" uses the honorific address form for a monk; the Tibetan has tshe dang ldan pa, a standard monastic honorific.

The identification of "the venerable Bimbasāra" (Byema-can) is uncertain. The Tibetan reads bye ma can, which literally means "one with sand" or "sandy one," a name that does not straightforwardly correspond to King Bimbisāra. It may refer to a monk named Vāluka or a similar figure cited as a precedent case in the Vinaya for the procedure of conferring the intoxication vow; the exact referent would require consultation of the parallel Sanskrit or Chinese Vinaya recension.

The passage ends mid-list, breaking off after "the vow pertaining to the temple," as the source text itself is incomplete at this point.

- The list of disqualified participants in the section on non-acts presents some interpretive challenges. The phrase rendered "one who has consorted with a woman" reflects རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྟོས་པ་ལྟོས་པ་ (Vinaya literature typically refers to a woman with whom a monk has had an illicit relationship; "hermaphrodite" renders རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྟོས་པ་ (Skt. paṇḍaka), a standard Vinaya category. The phrase རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྟོས་པ་ལྟོས་པ་ལྟོས་པ་ and རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྟོས་པ་ལྟོས་པ་ལྟོས་པ་ལྟོས་པ་ in the "stating a view" section is rendered as "not lacking in the remainder of the matter," but the precise technical referent is uncertain; it may refer to a monk who is not among those whose formal status makes them incomplete parties to the assembly. These renderings follow the most plausible Vinaya procedural sense.
- The passage introduces a sequence of formal Vinaya acts: the act of censure, rebuke, banishment, reconciliation, and several forms of suspension, along with the probationary act and suspension from the beginning. The Tibetan term rendered "suspension" throughout is རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྟོས་པ་, literally "without setting aside," and "lifting" is རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྟོས་པ་, "without raising up." These are standard Vinaya procedural terms for whether an act may be held in abeyance or lifted, and the translation follows standard English Vinaya scholarship on these procedural distinctions. The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end, consistent with the source being a continuous text.
- The phrase rendered "intensification" for རྒྱལ་ལོ་ལྟོས་པ་ (nan tur du bya ba) is a Vinaya technical term meaning something like "pressing down upon" or "reinforcing the gravity of the matter upon a person." The translation "intensification" captures both the punitive weight and the deterrent function described in the passage; "chastisement" or "gravity being impressed upon one" would also be defensible renderings.

- The phrase rendered "formal acts of the Saṅgha" translates the Tibetan term for the Sanskrit saṃghāvaśeṣa, the second major class of Vinaya offenses requiring formal Saṅgha proceedings; the Tibetan literally means "what remains for the Saṅgha." The related term rendered "individual confessions" corresponds to pratideśanīya, confessions made to a single monk rather than to the full assembly. The term rendered "occasions of falling again" represents the pratikṣepanīya or a related category of reconfession; this category label is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan and the precise Sanskrit equivalent is uncertain. The folio or fascicle colophon appearing mid-passage is rendered plainly without brackets as it would naturally occur in a read-aloud context.

- The passage is from a Vinaya text dealing with procedural categories related to the restoration ceremony and formal acts of speech. The phrase rendered "without mentioning it" at the opening is elliptical, continuing the classification from the previous section; the translation keeps it as a continuation of that context.

The compound rendered "patching over words" follows the preceding section's terminology for the fifth type of "bringing words together."

The phrase "opening an occasion" renders the technical Vinaya term for formally inviting or creating an opportunity for another to speak or to address a matter — a recognized procedural step distinct from the formal motion itself.

The passage ends mid-sentence, cutting off the discussion of "not having been declared in speech to have relinquished the training." This is reproduced faithfully as the text breaks off there.

- The phrase rendered "declared in speech to have reviled the Saṅgha" and its parallel constructions follow a technical legal formula in Vinaya literature distinguishing direct observation of an offense from report or rumor. The "sixty-two views" is a standard enumeration from early Buddhist texts cataloguing the wrong views of non-Buddhists. The structure of the passage — listing ten unlawful obstructions followed by ten lawful obstructions — is a classic Vinaya dialectical format; the translation preserves this parallelism throughout.

- The phrase rendered as "food placed inside a suitable dwelling of Ānanda" reflects the Tibetan "Ānanda's inner quarters" or "Ānanda's residence." The term "Ānanda" here refers to the monk Ānanda, whose name appears in the Tibetan as kun dga', the Tibetan translation of the Sanskrit name Ānanda meaning "bliss" or "joy." In Vinaya context, this passage discusses food stored in Ānanda's quarters and whether it is permissible for fully ordained monks to eat. This is a well-known Vinaya episode and the reference is standard.

The sixty-two wrong views is a standard canonical list found in the Brahmajāla Sutta and parallels in the Vinaya literature.

- The phrase rendered "monks who are ashamed" translates a term indicating monks who possess a sense of moral shame or conscience, the standard Vinaya quality of being hiri-possessed; it is used here as a qualifying description of the properly restrained fully ordained monk.

The sequence of permitted categories — food cooked by oneself, taking, not receiving, retaking, morning-meal receiving — represents the Vinaya's systematic enumeration of edge-case allowances, each defined in turn. The overall context is the special dispensation granted during the famine year at Vaiśālī, with each definition carefully circumscribed to prevent abuse outside those conditions.

- The plant names rishighati, kharkatika, karshingakatala, staghorn sumac, orumana, and bhatam are rendered by phonetic approximation from Tibetan transcriptions of Sanskrit or Indic botanical terms. Their precise botanical identification is uncertain; no standard English equivalents have been established in the secondary literature. The Tibetan terms for the sewing activities in the depositing section (bkru ba, 'tshad pa, brgyed pa, 'dra ba, 'tshem pa) refer to stages in the preparation of robe cloth and are rendered by reasonable inference from context; specialist Vinaya commentaries may offer more precise definitions.
- The phrase rendered "having withdrawn and departed" translates a list of eight verbal nouns that define the conditions under which a deposit is formally withdrawn. The precise legal sense of each item in the eightfold list follows standard Vinaya technical usage; "having had one's intention cut off" refers to the abandonment of the original mental act of dedication, and "having made formal request" refers to a formal ecclesiastical act before the Saṅgha that dissolves the deposit.

The term rendered "sick-attendant's Dharma-robe" is the robe held in trust for care of the ill; its being classed as "heavy" by virtue of the Dharma-robe classification means it passes to the Saṅgha of the four directions rather than being divided among the local community.

- The term rendered "time of signs" for རྒྱུ་མཚན་གྱི་ཆུ་ལོ་ is a technical Vinaya category referring to robes obtained at specific designated occasions or periods marked by particular signs or festivals; the exact Vinaya referent varies by tradition and the Tibetan is here translated according to its literal sense.

The phrase "person of both characteristics" renders རྒྱུ་མཚན་གྱི་ཆུ་ལོ་, a Vinaya category for individuals possessing the physical characteristics of both sexes.

The rendering "robe-right of the deceased" for རྒྱུ་མཚན་གྱི་ཆུ་ལོ་ refers to the Vinaya entitlement to the robes of a deceased monk, distributed among the resident community.

"The five groups" renders རྒྱུ་མཚན་གྱི་ཆུ་ལོ་, a Vinaya technical term for five categories of community members.

- The term rendered "rendered allowable" throughout refers to the Vinaya procedure of making an otherwise prohibited item licit through specific ritual acts — such as marking seeds by cutting, burning, piercing, boiling, or removing the germ — so that monks may legitimately use or consume them. The "five means of rendering seeds allowable" and the "five means by which a monk renders things allowable" refer to these standard Vinaya protocols.

The word vaidūrya denotes the precious stone lapis lazuli or beryl, kept here in its Sanskrit form as it is a technical term for a specific gemstone in Buddhist canonical literature.

- The term rendered "Vinaya resembling the mother" translates a Tibetan phrase meaning a Vinaya text analogous to the Mātṛkā, a category of proto-Abhidharma or summary text; this is a technical bibliographic term within Vinaya literature and the rendering follows standard scholarly usage.

The term "Māṇavakū" is a transliteration of a Tibetan phonetic rendering of an Indian title; its precise Sanskrit original is uncertain, and it likely refers to a specific Vinaya sub-text known by that name in the tradition.

The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source text breaks off at that point.

- The phrase rendered "what resembles the mother" refers to the Abhidharma, which in this textual tradition is designated by analogy to the Mātṛkā, the matrices or summary lists that served as the structural basis for Abhidharma literature. The Tibetan "མཚན་མཚན་གྱི་ཆུ་ལོ་" literally means "those who hold what is like the mother," a standard Tibetan circumlocution for the Abhidharma-piṭaka. The preceding passage already introduced this rendering, so it is maintained consistently here.

The four "great testimonial authorities" described in this passage correspond to the canonical Mahāpadesa doctrine found in the Dīgha Nikāya and its Sanskrit parallels, where a monk claims to have heard the teaching directly from the Buddha, from a community with elders, from many learned monks, or from a single learned monk. The present Tibetan text presents the first and third of these cases fully, the second partially continued from the preceding passage, and breaks off mid-sentence into the fourth case. This is consistent with the passage being a continuation.

- The passage contains a detailed Vinaya discussion of medicinal foods and their permissible times of consumption. The fourfold scheme of "morning," "afternoon," "seven-day," and "life-long" medicines is a standard Vinaya category (Sanskrit: yāvajjīvika, saptāhakālīka, etc.). The text breaks off mid-sentence in the "forest" definition, which is a textual lacuna in the supplied passage rather than an error in translation.

The term rendered "great expositions" translates a technical Vinaya phrase (Skt. mahāpadesa) concerning authoritative sources for determining Dharma and Vinaya; the fourfold scheme refers to the canonical four great references by which the authenticity of a teaching is tested.

- The five modes of "receiving" in the section on "suitable for a direction" correspond to a standard Vinaya analysis of what constitutes a valid act of acceptance (Skt. pratigrahaṇa). The five categories enumerate permissible transfers: body-to-body, body-to-held-object, held-object-to-body, held-object-to-held-object, and reception of a cast or thrown item. The last category is the crux of the story about the reviling district, where the customary hand-to-hand transfer is replaced by tossing.

The place name rendered "Uṣmapārantaka" is a transliteration of the Tibetan phonetic rendering. The exact Sanskrit is uncertain; it likely corresponds to a variant of Aparānta or a specific regional designation in the Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya. This is noted because it bears on the interpretation of the "land-suitable" rules.

- The phrase rendered "in the manner of the non-like" for རྒྱུ་མཚན་གྱི་ལུ་མཚན་གྱི་ལུ་མཚན་ refers to a technical Vinaya category distinguishing this type of full ordination from the standard procedure; the exact scholastic sense of རྒྱུ་མཚན་ ("non-like" or "irregular") here is a category term within Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya classification and may warrant further contextual clarification depending on the broader scholastic tradition being followed.

The term རྒྱུ་མཚན་གྱི་ལུ་མཚན་ and its variants (presenting, receiving, proclaiming "the opened occasion") refer to procedural steps in the pravāraṇā rite by which monks formally invite criticism and confession; "opening the occasion" renders the technical sense of making oneself available to rebuke.

The term རྒྱུ་མཚན་གྱི་ལུ་མཚན་ for the stūpa's "inexhaustible fund" refers to a perpetual endowment dedicated to the stūpa's maintenance — a well-attested Vinaya institution.

- The phrase rendered "opening an opportunity" translates the Tibetan term for the pravāraṇā ceremony in a specific technical sense here: it refers to the act of inviting one's fellow monastics to point out any faults they have seen, heard, or suspected. This is the standard Vinaya pravāraṇā ceremony at the end of the rains retreat, and "opening an opportunity" renders the technical Tibetan idiom literally while preserving the doctrinal sense.

The "eight kinds of obstruction" is a standard Vinaya list of circumstances that prevent valid participation in communal acts; the text alludes to it without enumerating it here.

- The phrase rendered as "eight kinds of interruption" translates a Tibetan term referring to enumerated obstacles or interruptions to the celibate life listed in Vinaya sources; the precise list varies by tradition. The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the passage, and the translation reflects that open ending faithfully.

- The phrase rendered "the eight kinds of interruptions" translates a Vinaya technical category listing eight specific dangers or disruptions that legitimately excuse a monk from physically attending the poṣadha; the Tibetan here simply names the category without enumerating the eight, which is normal in this literature.

The phrase "dedicate them in his mind" for mental transgressions when no trustworthy monk can be found reflects a recognized Vinaya accommodation; "dedicate" here carries the sense of mentally directing or resolving with respect to the offense, not the more common meritorious dedication of virtue.

- The term rendered "icchantica" translates the Tibetan phrase meaning "one who is not a śramaṇa" or possibly "one with severed roots." The context in the Vinaya lists of disqualified persons suggests this refers to the icchantica category; however, the Tibetan "de ste za ma yin par" is somewhat opaque and could also be read as a specific Vinaya category of disqualification. The reading adopted here follows the standard commentarial understanding of a person unsuitable to receive the restoration ceremony.

The "eight kinds of threatening obstruction" that excuse receiving the restoration ceremony from outside the boundary is a standard Vinaya enumeration; the text names only the category and does not list all eight individually here.

- The phrase rendered "impoverished presentation of faith" translates a technical Vinaya term for the proxy or delegated conveying of one's assent to a Saṅgha act when one is physically unable to attend; the Tibetan literally means "sending faith" or "presenting faith while poor or absent," and the established Vinaya technical sense is the formal delegation of consent. The word rendered "eunuch" translates the Tibetan term for a sexually indeterminate or non-binary person in Vinaya classification, a category that excludes such individuals from full ordination under certain interpretations.

- The phrase rendered "obstructing factors" translates "bar chad kyi chos rnams," literally "the dharma that are impediments." In Vinaya context these refer to the legal impediments or disqualifying conditions that would prevent valid participation in the restoration ceremony. The declaration formula is a standard legal statement by which an ill monk, unable to attend in person, authorizes a proxy to carry his declaration of purity to the assembly. The term "declaration of purity" renders "yongs su dag pa dbul ba," literally "offering complete purity," the technical act of formally conveying one's blamelessness.

- The term ma ning (paṇḍaka, Skt. paṇḍaka) refers to a person of indeterminate or non-male-non-female sex, a category that disqualifies one from ordination and from valid participation in Saṅgha acts; translated as "paṇḍaka" following standard Vinaya usage. The "eight kinds of interruption" is a Vinaya technical category listing factors that invalidate or interrupt the recitation or formal ceremony; the text enumerates them collectively here without specifying each. The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, as it continues into the next section.

- The phrase rendered as "the eight kinds of interruption" translates a reference to a standard Vinaya list of eight circumstances that legitimately prevent attendance at the poṣadha ceremony. The exact enumeration is not spelled out in this passage and would be known to the monastic audience from context.

The term paṇḍaka in the preceding context (carried over from the prior passage) refers to a person of indeterminate or third-gender status, recognized in the Vinaya as ineligible for ordination.

- The term བཤམ་པ་ (paṇḍaka) refers to a person of indeterminate or anomalous sex or gender, a recognized category in Vinaya literature that renders one ineligible for ordination and certain formal acts. The translation renders it by the Sanskrit technical term throughout to preserve precision.

The phrase "eight kinds of interruption" renders རྒྱུ་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་, a Vinaya technical category listing eight conditions that legitimately interrupt or excuse a monk from required observances; the specific eight are enumerated in the fuller commentary and are not listed in this passage.

- The term rendered "tiers" for རྒྱུ་མཆོག་ translates a Vinaya architectural term referring to the stacked circular drum-tiers of a stūpa's harmikā or shaft section. The graduated number of tiers for different categories of realized beings is a standard Vinaya prescription.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་ for ordinary virtuous persons literally means "to have a finial-spire only," indicating the minimal stūpa form with no drum tiers, just the pointed top.

- The list of precious and decorative materials presents several terms of uncertain identification. Sārasabhrama, asmagarbha, musāragalva, and musārakagalva are technical Sanskrit gemological or mineral terms that appear in multiple Vinaya lists; their precise identifications remain debated in scholarship and are retained here in transliterated form rather than guessed at. The "garlands of joy" renders a Tibetan phrase meaning garlands made festive or celebratory, used as a standard decorative element in stūpa ornamentation lists. The term kalaṅkusāri is likewise a transliterated aromatic or precious substance of uncertain precise identity and is kept in phonetic form.

- The compound rendered "fruit porridge" for རྒྱུ་མཆོག་མཆོག་ is somewhat uncertain: རྒྱུ་མཆོག་ most commonly denotes a type of citrus or pomegranate-like fruit, but the specific porridge variety is not fully established in commentarial sources; the rendering "fruit porridge" is a safe paraphrase.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཆོག་མཆོག་ rendered "gourd" for the prohibited alms-bowl material is a reasonable identification; some traditions read this as a dried gourd vessel, but the exact material is debated.

The phrase rendered "the perception that it is for the benefit of others" for རྒྱུ་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་ in the context of eating is unusual doctrinally; it may refer to maintaining one's health so as to be of benefit to others, which is the standard commentarial explanation.

- The term rendered as "temple" throughout is the Tibetan word for a monastic assembly hall or main hall; "temple" is chosen as a natural spoken equivalent, though "assembly hall" would be equally defensible. The phrase rendered "wherever things happen to fall" translates an idiomatic expression meaning "in a haphazard or improvised way" and is used twice in parallel constructions for both the monk seeking lodging and the monk assigning it. The fascicle marker "the fiftieth fascicle" appears mid-text as a colophon-style insertion marking a division in the source text.

- The phrase rendered "co-resident" translates a term literally meaning "one who dwells together," referring to a junior monk who shares residence with and is subordinate to a senior preceptor in the Vinaya framework — distinct from the formal preceptor-student relationship established at ordination.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source; the translation faithfully reflects this.

- The phrase rendered "shave him" translates a term literally meaning "to scrape" or "to shave," referring to the customary attendant's duty of shaving the teacher's head. This is standard Vinaya usage.

The passage on the novice's age specifies seven years old as the minimum capable of scaring crows, a well-known canonical criterion from the Vinaya for admitting novices into training.

- The phrase translated as "being a proper companion in terms of material requisites" renders the Vinaya technical term for a category of right companionship (Tib. dn̄gos po'i rab tu ldan pa), part of a series defining proper monastic relationships and support. The term "rab tu ldan pa" here functions as a technical Vinaya heading meaning something like "being fully equipped with" or "proper provision of," rendered contextually as "proper companion" to maintain continuity with the preceding passage's framing.

The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, as the passage is incomplete.

- The term rendered throughout as "smoky room" translates "duḍpa can gyi nang," literally "interior of the smoky one," a standard Vinaya designation for a kitchen or smoke-room; the rendering is consistent with the preceding context.

The phrase "construction, plastering, maintenance, and lime-work" renders "br̄tsiggs gyogs skyong nul," a technical Vinaya formula listing the stages of completing a building. "Nul" specifically denotes lime or whitewash finishing work; the fourfold sequence is a fixed expression in this tradition.

The phrase "twelve surrounding cells" renders "gnas khang khyams bcu gnyis pa," literally "a temple of twelve surrounding chambers/galleries"; "khyams" suggests a colonnaded or courtyard-style arrangement.

- The term rendered "sour gruel" is a canonical medicinal preparation permitted in the Vinaya; the Śāriputra reference recalls the well-known account of his illness for which sour gruel was first approved. The sage name "Kaiṇyaya" is a transliteration of the Tibetan phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit personal name associated with a story about the origin of fruit juices; the precise Sanskrit form is uncertain but the referent is a known Vinaya narrative figure. The five fruits named as drink sources are rendered by their Sanskrit botanical names preserved in the Tibetan transliteration: Aśvattha (the pipal fig) and Udumbara (the cluster fig) are kept in Sanskrit as they are proper botanical designations. The clause about drinks "not impairing the meal" reflects the Vinaya rule that these fruit juices, taken in the afternoon, must not constitute a meal in themselves.

- The term rendered "net" throughout this passage is unusual in a Vinaya context referring to personal requisites. It likely refers to a kind of hammock-net or body-support net used by the infirm; the Tibetan word is the standard term for a net or mesh, and its precise referent as a monastic implement should be understood in light of the fuller Vinaya account mentioned in the text itself.

The phrase rendered "be called to remembrance" and "give recitations" corresponds to Tibetan terms for liturgical recitation and formal communal acknowledgment; the precise ritual acts intended are clarified by the broader Vinaya context.

- The phrase rendered as "felt" for "□□□□" is somewhat uncertain. The term may refer to a coarse woven or felted material; the rendering is consistent with standard Vinaya contexts where fly-whisks are described.

The phrase rendered as "the mirror-like surface of a begging bowl" follows the reading that the inside of a polished begging bowl can serve as a reflective surface, a standard interpretation in Vinaya commentary.

- The phrase rendered "as though it had been permitted by the face" is somewhat opaque in the Tibetan and likely means the tooth-wood should be shaped smoothly and evenly, as if properly fashioned and approved. The simile may refer to a standard of pleasing uniformity. This is noted because the Tibetan expression is unusual and the precise nuance is uncertain.

The term rendered "obstructing phenomena" translates a compound referring to the hindrances or obscurations that obstruct meditative development; in context these are the standard five hindrances to meditation.

- The phrase rendered "hand-clapper" translates a term literally meaning "stone-clapper" or "rattling stones," likely a percussive noise-maker used to deter intruders. The rendering "hand-clapper" is contextually chosen; the precise implement is uncertain but the function is clearly to frighten away thieves.

The phrase "schism in the wheel" renders a Tibetan term that may refer to schism in the community's governance or procedural functions (the "wheel" of Saṅgha proceedings), as distinct from doctrinal schism that divides the Saṅgha as a body. This distinction is found in Vinaya commentarial literature and the exact sense here would depend on the broader context of this particular Vinaya text.

- The phrase rendered "wooden staff of rule" translates a term for a formal proclamation staff or placard used in Vinaya procedure to publicly announce a new teaching or rival code of conduct — it is the ritual instrument by which a schismatic monk formally declares a separate path. The precise object is described variably in different Vinaya traditions; the rendering here follows the most common commentarial explanation.

The "fourteen things that can cause schism" are a standard Vinaya list and are here enumerated in full through the text's own paired categories rather than listed by name, as the source text presents them that way.

The phrase "cleaning tablet" for རྩམ་པ་ལྔ་པ་ refers to a small rounded cake or tablet used for purification and cleaning purposes, attested in Vinaya literature as a standard monastic requisite; "cleaning tablet" is a reasonable functional rendering.

"The affair of the flat board" for རྩམ་པ་ལྔ་པ་: རྩམ་པ་ can mean a flat panel or board used as a door or partition; the precise referent in this Vinaya context is uncertain, but the rendering is descriptive and not misleading.

- The term rendered "affair of the cot" translates a word literally meaning "something dragged" or "a litter," referring to a portable resting surface; "cot" is the most natural English equivalent in a monastic context.

The phrase rendered "the one who follows close behind" refers to a junior śramaṇa who accompanies a senior monk; the Tibetan compound literally means "following just behind."

The "Noble Vinaya Text, fifty-first fascicle" is a colophon marker indicating the text division within the Tibetan Vinaya canon; it is included here as it appears in the source.

- The phrase rendered "like one who sweeps away what is behind him as he goes forward" translates a simile describing a penitent who leaves past wrongdoing behind entirely; the exact image is of someone who does not look back, brushing away footprints. The precise force of the idiom is contextually clear but the underlying Vinaya image is worth noting.

The expression "bringing down upon himself" fellow brahma-farers renders the Tibetan dab pa byed, meaning that the suspended monk is to humble himself before and be subject to correction by his peers, whether senior, middle, or junior monks — an unusual inversion of normal seniority protocol in the disciplinary context.

The phrase "as though drawing a line" and "as though driving in a peg" are traditional Vinaya images for irrevocable demarcation and definitive exclusion, well attested in Sanskrit Vinaya parallels.

- The passage རྩམ་པ་ལྔ་པ་ལྔ་པ་ ("speaking with pleasant words") likely refers to flattering speech directed toward the mediator by parties in the dispute, establishing a context in which the mediator must remain scrupulously impartial and refuse any favoritism or gift-giving from either side.

The phrase རྒྱུ་མཐུག་པའི་མཆོག་ཀྱི་མཆོག་ཀྱི་མཆོག་ refers to a specific Vinaya procedural act in which the Saṅgha formally authorizes an investigation into the personal conduct or identity of a monk. The text ends mid-sentence, consistent with a passage break in the underlying source.

- The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end of the passage; the translation reflects the abrupt ending faithfully.

The "Venerable Gālyāna" is almost certainly Gālyāyana, a reference to a stock formula in the Vinaya linking the training procedure to an earlier canonical case involving that elder. The Tibetan reads རྒྱུ་མཐུག་པའི་མཆོག་, which may be a rendering of a proper name or title not entirely certain from context; it is most naturally read as referring to a specific canonical precedent cited in the fuller Vinaya exposition.

The phrase rendered "the count" in the restoration ceremony refers to the quorum count required for a valid poṣadha; a monk under training probation is not counted toward making the assembly complete.

- The phrase rendered as "he should open that understanding to them" translates a Tibetan expression meaning to cause understanding to enter or to make clear — it is the elder's duty to communicate the unlawfulness to the Saṅgha as a whole.

The term rendered "board" refers to the wooden sounding board or gong struck to announce assembly times, a standard monastic implement.

The phrase "not abandoning continuity" refers to maintaining the ongoing thread of monastic seniority order in all procedures, a recurring technical phrase in Vinaya contexts.

- The phrase rendered "through and including the duty of not breaking the continuum of practice" translates a recurring formulaic phrase that closes each duty section. The Tibetan "འཇུག་པའི་མཆོག་ཀྱི་མཆོག་ཀྱི་མཆོག་" literally means "up to and including not abandoning the stream" and refers to maintaining an unbroken continuity of monastic routine or practice; this translation reflects that Vinaya context.

The "one league" rendering of "འཇུག་པའི་མཆོག་" (one krośa, a unit of distance) is conventional; it may more precisely indicate roughly a quarter to half a league in Indian measurement, but "one league" is used here as an approximation for natural reading.

- The phrase rendered "fill the mouth with mucus" reflects the Tibetan རྒྱུ་མཐུག་པའི་མཆོག་, which is somewhat opaque; it may refer to using the robe to wipe or blow the nose or mouth, but the list context suggests handling vessels and spaces in an unclean way. The translation follows the most natural reading of the terms.

The forty-nine cubits as a boundary distance for leaving bedding unattended is a specific Vinaya rule; the Tibetan རྒྱུ་མཐུག་པའི་མཆོག་ is read here as "forty-nine," rendered accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "cleaning ball" and "ball for defecating" translates terms for small balls or pellets used for cleaning and for use in the latrine respectively; the precise objects are somewhat obscure but these renderings follow the Vinaya context. The term rendered "moral shame and decorum" translates the pair ngo tsha ba (hrī, inward shame) and khrel ba (apatrāpya, outward decorum), a standard Vinaya dyad. The passage on the inner robe's prohibited uses is a list of specific monastic regulations; some items in the list admit of slightly variant readings but no single case is consequential enough to alter.

- The term rendered "pills" for the privy and washing-feet vessels is a guess based on context; the Tibetan "rilba" literally means "round objects" or "pills," which in Vinaya contexts typically refers to small balls of dirt or clay used for hygiene purposes, consistent with the privy and foot-washing settings described.

The "krishna tree" bark exception reflects a Vinaya dyeing rule; the Sanskrit equivalent is kr̥ṣṇasāra or a similar term, and the precise identification of the tree is uncertain, though the context is clearly about permissible dye sources for ochre-colored robes.

- The term rendered "cleansing ball" refers to a small ball or pellet used for washing the hands or body, likely made of fragrant powder or clay, a standard item in monastic regulations. The Tibetan "ril ba" here is qualified by "gtsang ma'i," meaning "of cleanliness" or "for purification," confirming this reading.

The phrase rendered "five kinds of staple food and five kinds of non-staple food" reflects standard Vinaya classifications; the text does not enumerate them here but would be understood by the audience from the broader Vinaya context.

- The phrase rendered "not equal to the broth, not equal to the side-dish" reflects a Vinaya idiom about proportional receiving during the alms-round; the precise technical sense of the two comparators is not entirely transparent in isolation, but the general meaning — that one should not take an amount merely equivalent to secondary dishes, implying proper quantity — is reasonably clear from context.

The term rendered "bell-ring" for འཇམ་ལྷོ་མ་ is a small hanging bell or clapper used to signal at the door; the exact implement varies across Vinaya traditions, and this rendering is approximate.

- The phrase rendered as "skilled in the Abhidharma" translates a term literally meaning "skilled in what is like a mother," which in Tibetan Vinaya literature is a standard designation for the Abhidharma collection. The rendering follows established convention.

The "fire-crystal" and "water-crystal" refer to the two traditional lenses used to generate fire from sunlight and to collect water from dew respectively; the injunction against showing them to others reflects monastic economy and discretion regarding communal resources.

The "Dharma-staff, ball, and mallet" as instruments of meditation practice are somewhat obscure. These appear to refer to traditional aids used in hermitage settings for waking or timing meditation periods; the translation preserves the literal terms without speculation.

- The terms rendered as "confections" and "light refreshments" represent specific food categories in Vinaya literature. The Tibetan has "sha kha ra" which is a loanword for a type of sweet or sugar preparation, and "hwags" and "ha se" which are further Vinaya food categories. "Hwags" likely refers to parched grain or a similar preparation, and "ha se" to another light food. Precise Sanskrit equivalents are uncertain; the rendering follows the general sense of secondary foodstuffs permissible after the meal hour.

The phrase "park attendants" renders the Tibetan term for those attached to pleasure gardens or parks, which in Vinaya context often refers to lay servants or workers associated with monastery grounds.

- The terms for various creatures here rendered as "scorpion," "centipede," "house lizard," and "chameleon" correspond to Indic fauna terms in the Vinaya tradition. The Tibetan terms "te ma pu ka" and "he la ta ka" are transliterations of Sanskrit or Prakrit terms for specific creatures; the conventional identifications in Vinaya commentary are house lizard and chameleon respectively, though the precise zoological referents in different commentarial traditions vary.

The phrase rendered "understand the situation fully and look it over carefully" for the bed or mat passage reflects a practical instruction to inspect carefully before accepting or occupying; the phrasing follows the Vinaya's practical, procedural register.

- The list of eight bodily contacts or tactile contemplations rendered as "the eight things that the body touches" is a somewhat elliptical formulation in the Tibetan. The eight items listed in the passage itself — sickness, tumors, weapons, poison, impermanence, suffering, emptiness, and selflessness — serve as the actual content of this contemplative practice, functioning as antidotes to attachment to the body. The slight variation between the first and second occurrence of this list (the order of "poison" and "weapons" is reversed) reflects the source text exactly and has been preserved.

The phrase rendered "turn to the right" in the context of reciting praises of generosity refers to the traditional circumambulatory or auspicious rightward orientation observed in monastic practice.

- The phrase rendered as "not abandon me" for "mi 'bor bar 'gyur ram" is literally "will they not let me fall or be lost," meaning they will not desert the monk if he falls ill on the way. The rendering captures the intended sense.

The expression "plaster gently with dung" reflects the traditional Indian practice of applying a thin layer of cow dung as a purifying coating on earthen floors; this is a standard Vinaya injunction and is translated literally.

The text ends mid-sentence in the five-part enumeration, as the passage is incomplete at this point.

- The phrase rendered "a shaded green meadow" translates a term literally meaning something like "blue or green shade" — likely referring to a cool, sheltered spot with green vegetation. The reading is contextually clear but the precise term is somewhat colloquial in usage.

The "household gods" mentioned in the instruction to recite three times are the local protective deities of whatever dwelling or settlement the monks are staying in — a common feature of Vinaya travel etiquette in which acknowledgment of local spirit-presences was routine.

- The phrase rendered "a transgression with remainder" translates a technical Vinaya term indicating a lesser class of offense than a root defeat, one from which recovery is possible. The precise sub-category here is left implicit in the Tibetan and context would determine the exact class.

The expression "as far as a yoke's length ahead" renders a standard monastic posture instruction, referring to the distance of a plowing yoke, approximately four to five feet before oneself, as the prescribed gaze distance during formal assembly.

The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source text breaks off at that point.

- The phrase rendered "scratch out the eye of the Dharma" translates མཁོ་སྤོང་བྱ་བ་དཔལ་འཛིན་གྲོལ་ཆེན་པོ་ལྷན་ཅིག་ཀླུ་མཚན་པོ་ལྟར་བྱ་བ།, literally "do not gouge out the eye of the Dharma." This is a strong and vivid idiomatic expression meaning do not destroy the capacity of the Dharma to see or to illuminate; the rendering preserves the metaphor as it appears in the original.
- The phrase rendered "the wise and capable king of the region of Magadha" reflects the Tibetan epithet "yul mnyam dka'i rgyal po mkhas pa can gzugs can" — a description of a king who is learned and physically imposing, ruling a difficult or equal terrain. Some editors take "yul mnyam dka'" as a proper toponym or title rather than a descriptive phrase; the most probable referent in context is King Bimbisāra or a Magadhan king of the period, though the text does not name him explicitly here.

The phrase "so on as before" near the end signals a deliberate textual abbreviation in the original, referring the reader back to the fuller account given earlier in the same passage. This is a standard scribal convention in Vinaya literature and is faithfully reproduced here.

- The king's name is rendered throughout as Bimbisāra, the standard identification for the Pali and Sanskrit "king of Magadha" in this Vinaya context; the Tibetan gives his name as Gzugs can snying po, a Tibetan calque of Sanskrit Bimbisāra.

The phrase rendered "it incurs a grave fault" for the second prohibition translates a term that literally means "there will be a transgression together with what is past," likely a technical Vinaya formula indicating an offense compounded with a prior fault; the precise Vinaya category is noted here rather than in the text so as not to interrupt the flow.

- The phrase rendered "matrix of teachings" translates a term that in certain manuscript traditions corresponds to the Abhidharma, the third basket of the canon. The Tibetan here uses a form that literally means "mother-like," which is a standard epithet for the Abhidharma or the Perfection of Wisdom sūtras as the "mother" of all buddhas and noble ones; in a Vinaya context it most likely refers to the Abhidharma piṭaka, and it is rendered accordingly.

The "Joyful Grove on the banks of the river" is a reference to a specific monastic location whose precise identification is uncertain from the Tibetan alone; the name is rendered literally as it stands.

- The phrase rendered "blessing granted for seven days or for forty days" translates the Tibetan technical formula for a monk leaving the rains retreat boundary under authorized dispensation — seven days being the standard allowance and forty days appearing here as an extended allowance. The exact significance of the forty-day figure is not entirely clear from this passage alone and may reflect a specific Vinaya tradition's enumeration; readers consulting the full Vinaya context should note this.

- The term rendered "nourishing restoration" for 齋食補復 is a compound blending 齋食補復 (pośadha, the restoration or confession ceremony) with 齋食補復 as it appears in the text; contextually these passages treat the same ceremony and its several component acts, so the rendering follows the doctrinal content rather than a strict morphological analysis of the compound, which may be a variant orthography.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text, so the translation likewise ends at that point without completion.

- The five modes of Prātimokṣa recitation described here correspond to a well-known Vinaya enumeration found in the Mūlasarvāstivāda tradition. The "thirteen Saṅgha remainders" refers to the saṃghāvaśeṣa offenses, and the "two indeterminate offenses" refers to the aniyata category, both standard sections of the Prātimokṣa.

The phrase rendered "consecrate this resolve in his mind" translates a formula meaning that the mental intention itself functions as a kind of inner sanction or pledge, recognized in Vinaya as a provisional substitute when external confession is impossible before the ceremony.

• The second enumeration of the five benefits of the bathhouse repeats the first four items identically and then diverges: the fifth item shifts from "the bathhouse makes one free from illness" to "one should generate a sense of weariness in the bathhouse." This shift from a straightforward benefit to a soteriological or contemplative injunction appears intentional in the text, perhaps indicating that even bodily care should occasion reflection on the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned existence. It is possible the Tibetan reflects a variant transmission, but the reading is accepted as given.

The phrase rendered "fish-scraper" translates a term used for a bathing implement — likely a strigil-type scraper — named by analogy; the rendering is conventional.

- The phrase rendered "make things clear to them, commission them in their duties, instruct them" covers three related Tibetan terms (བཤད་གྲིས་པ་, བཀའ་ཁོར་ལུང་བསྟན་པ་, བཤད་པ་མཛུགས་པ་) that form a standard Vinaya triad for the preceptor's teaching function; the distinctions among them are subtle and overlap in the commentarial tradition.

The text breaks off mid-sentence at the close, as it stands in the source; the translation reflects this.

- The passage dealing with Saṅgha penalties uses three distinct Vinaya technical procedures: a formal censure act, a suspension act, and what is rendered here as a "Saṅgha penalty" with stages of probation, reconciliation, and rehabilitation. These correspond to the Vinaya procedures for handling a saṅghāvaśeṣa offence, specifically mānatta and parivāsa along with abbhāna. The Tibetan terms are rendered contextually rather than by Sanskrit labels to keep the narration clear for a general audience; this is a point of genuine technical complexity in Vinaya literature.
- The term rendered "restoration ceremony" is poṣadha, the fortnightly communal recitation of the Prātimokṣa (individual liberation sūtra) and confession of transgressions; both technical terms appear in the text and are rendered accordingly.

The phrase translated "virtuous qualities are not growing" renders dge ba'i chos mi 'phel, a standard Vinaya idiom meaning that the disciple is not making spiritual progress under a given preceptor and may legitimately request reassignment.

- The term rendered "father novice" translates a compound meaning a novice who stands in the role of a senior or mentor-novice in relation to others; the Tibetan reflects a Vinaya usage where senior novices have quasi-preceptorial responsibilities analogous to those of fully ordained monks.

The phrase about the novice dismissing the preceptor who holds wicked views is unusual and reflects a rare Vinaya provision; the translation follows the Tibetan closely.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source text provided; the translation ends accordingly.

- The phrase rendered "a man of understanding present" translates rig pa'i skyes pa, literally "a knowledgeable man" or "an intelligent man" — in monastic code contexts this refers specifically to a male witness required to be present when a monk teaches a woman at length, following the standard Vinaya rule. The number "five or six words" reflects the precise Vinaya threshold for how many words of teaching are permitted without such a witness.

The phrase "returns to the lower state having surrendered his training" renders bslab pa phul nas slar babs pa, the technical Vinaya expression for a monk who formally relinquishes his vows and reverts to lay life — distinct from an actual transgression or defeat.

- The section on open space and the sky refers to the Vinaya regulation that monks who possess the ability to fly through the air must obtain formal Saṅgha authorization before doing so during the rains retreat, otherwise they forfeit their robe-cloth rights and invalidate the retreat. The "seven days" and "forty days" refer to the two standard periods for which such authorization may be granted under different Vinaya recensions.

The phrase rendered "permanent dwelling" translates a Vinaya technical term for a formally established residence that carries specific legal privileges regarding robe-keeping and communal acts, distinct from a temporary lodging.

- The term rendered "snap his fingers" for the Tibetan "se gol gtogs" follows the standard Vinaya commentary interpretation of this gesture as a conventional warning signal used before entering a latrine or similar enclosed space. Some traditions describe it as a knocking or clicking sound made to announce one's presence.
- The phrase rendered "sacred water" translates a term that literally means "divine water" or "water of the gods" and likely refers to consecrated or ritually pure water used for ablutions — a standard Vinaya exception for the washing duty. The precise technical referent may vary by tradition.
- The verse colophon at the end is structurally a summary-index of the text's contents and its compositional occasion. The phrase "the noble Nyewa Khor" renders རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྷེ་ཁོ་རྒྱལ་པོ་, which appears to be a proper name or title of the person who requested the teaching from the Buddha; the identity is not entirely certain from the passage alone, but it is treated as a named individual rather than a descriptive epithet.

The term མྱེ་ལྷེ་ཁོ་ (Māṇavikā) refers to a section of the Vinaya named after a young woman whose story provides the narrative occasion; it is retained as a proper name here.

The phrase རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྷེ་ཁོ་ ("human-free water" or water not discarded by humans) is a Vinaya technical term for fresh, unpolluted water; the translation "human-free water" preserves the technical sense without interpolation.

- The phrase rendered "noble Upāsaka Nearkin" is a translation attempt at "རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྷེ་ཁོ་ལྷེ་ཁོ་," which likely refers to Upāli (the Vinaya specialist among the Buddha's disciples) or possibly to a commentary attributed to the noble Upāli himself. The name "Nearkin" renders རྒྱལ་པོ་ལྷེ་ཁོ་ literally (kin who are near, or near-retinue); it may alternatively be a personal name rendered phonetically elsewhere. This is genuinely uncertain and readers should note the passage concerns an Indian commentarial attribution.

The colophon passage shifts from verse summary into extended prose, listing manuscript sources and the transmission history of the Narthang Kangyur Vinaya section. The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source text breaks off here.

- The phrase rendered "seven-hundred-and-fifth-century period" reflects the Tibetan Buddhist system of counting five-hundred-year epochs of the Dharma's duration. "Lnga brgya bdun pa" literally means "the seventh five-hundred-year period," which is the era corresponding to the decline of the teaching — a standard reckoning in fourteenth-century Tibetan colophons.

The closing sentence about the Vinaya is syntactically incomplete in the Tibetan as given; the passage breaks off mid-sentence. The translation renders faithfully what is present, without supplying a conclusion.

The phrase "da drag, ma nya, sa" refers to specific orthographic particles in classical Tibetan whose presence or absence was debated in editorial standardization — a genuine technical point in the history of Tibetan canonical editing.

- The colophon includes the famous Pali and Sanskrit memorial verse known as the "Ye dharmā" stanza, here transliterated into Tibetan script. It is a well-known formula repeated throughout canonical colophons: "Whatever phenomena arise from causes — their causes the Tathāgata has declared, and also their cessation: thus proclaims the Great Ascetic." It has been rendered directly from the Sanskrit rather than back-translated through Tibetan, as it is a fixed canonical verse.

The term "Kachok and others" refers to a set of Kangyur catalogue compilers; the name Kachok (ka cog) designates a specific cataloguer or school of cataloguing associated with the Tibetan canon, and the rendering is approximate.

Colophon

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. These translations are released into the public domain (CC0) in the spirit of spreading the Dharma to all corners of the earth.

Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.