Śīcatuḥpīṭhākhyāta Tantra Rāja Mantrāṃśa Nāma · Toh 429 · Derge Kangyur

དཔལ་གདན་བཞུགས་པའི་བཤད་པའི་རིམ་གྱི་ལྷ་པོ་སྐྱེས་ཀྱི་ཞེས་བུ

Toh 429 in the Kangyur is a tantric text known in Sanskrit as the Śīcatuḥpīṭhākhyāta Tantra Rāja Mantrāṃśa Nāma and in Tibetan as the Dpal gdan bzhi pa'i bshad pa'i rgyud kyi rgyal po sngags kyi cha, rendered in English as "The Glorious Tantra King of Exposition of the Four Seats, Called 'The Mantra Section.'" It belongs to the class of Buddhist tantric literature, specifically presenting itself as a mantra section — the third part of the first tantra — associated with the tradition of the Four Seats, a cluster of sacred sites and related esoteric teachings connected with the Yoginī or Highest Yoga Tantra corpus. The text opens with homage to the Blessed One as the Glorious Yoga of Space and to the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, along with the vajra ḍākinīs, before proceeding in verse to expound on the secret and supremely condensed suchness of mantra practice. As Toh 429 in the Kangyur, it is preserved among the canonical tantric scriptures of the Tibetan Buddhist tradition.

In the language of India: Śīcatuḥ Pīṭhākhyāta Tantra Rāja Mantrāṃśa Nāma. In the language of Tibet: The Glorious Tantra King of Exposition of the Four Seats, Called "The Mantra Section."

Homage to the Blessed One, the Glorious Yoga of Space. Homage to the bodhisattva, the great being endowed with great compassion, the noble Avalokiteśvara, Lord of the World. Respectful homage to the vajra ḍākinīs and vajra ḍākinīs who abide in sacred commitment.

Of the tantra of the fourth seat,
this is the first of the third.
Having found its method of application,
the distinctive suchness of mantra,
the Dharma of the essence of essences, supremely joined, secret within the secret —
the supreme that is suchness of suchnesses, this is the condensed suchness of the essence.

The two neuters taken by the guru are to be rotated at the root and pressed down.

At the crown there is light and the moon.
In accordance with the sequence of generating the seed, white like the moon and the color of jasmine —
these are to be applied prior to the chief.
The recitation of the mantra is to be completed, and the vowel letters are to be clearly perceived.
Prior to the three actions,
the letters of the guru come first.
White, yellow, and red —
the fourth is to be recited as pure.
The place of the sprout is the chief itself,
the supreme liberation of craving.
The meditation on the vowels as vowels is to be expressed by the yogin.
By one who recites with the desire to accomplish aims,
like the flower of the bindu, into the vajra staff always it dissolves as that suchness itself.
The white one pressed down by the moon — both are to be purified by being meditated upon.
Lotus, vajra, moon,
and nectar — it possesses the cleansing.
By the first seed, the chief,
it pervades all the vowel letters.
The light, white and pure and equal — the seed of the action of the third is never the fourth.
Just as the first abides at the end,
the distinctive vowel letter itself as seed, the seed itself prior to the limit — likewise, it becomes twice the prior.
The fourth, as the element of evenness, is to be applied in the place of evenness.
The seed of the third within the fourth is the body understood as having the head recited first.
The body of the three letters itself is by nature the very vowel letters.

The letters of the body and so forth are to be pressed down by the iron hook.
The seeds that are red and black and so forth are the distinctive feature for the yogin.
The fifth and sixth seeds are all the letters of sound.
White and yellow are declared weighty, red and blue likewise — pacifying, enriching, magnetizing, and so forth, all are the ten million of sonic syllables.
For all actions, by sound,
the four colors are supremely renowned.
The seventh and eighth seeds perform the actions according to the practitioner's own wish.
The body is certainly to be bound,
and pressed down by the second seed.
Further, it is applied to red and black.
As the distinctive feature of the yogin, the action of cutting off and pressing at the boundary —
the second is the letter of the iron hook.
The letter by nature, the letter by name —
from that very suchness, the drawing of actions, and this seed is the distinction.
The light of supreme red color,
the seed of all mixed together, the seed that generates the vowel letters —
this performs all actions.
The seed generated by the neuter is the seed that is stable and permanent.
Whether woman or man,
this very one is to be applied in all respects.
The fourth of the fourth group —
the final four are abandoned.
White and the color of jasmine and moon, the letter of the sun, consciousness — the final four together with the fifth and the sixth group are perfectly possessed.

Throughout the empty space of the night,
one is to know it with particular distinction.
The seed of the nectar-water has light that is white and clear and equal.
That suchness of all suchnesses is the accomplishment of nectar throughout.

Through the accomplishment of asuras, summoning is achieved, and the accomplishment of all actions for gods, humans, and yakṣas — this seed is itself the very distinction.

Applied face to face, like iron shackles,
by both the stout one and the neuter,
it becomes light twofold at the root.
At the crown, nectar is perfectly arrayed;
above, the supreme blazing bindu —
the nature-body of the five buddhas, the essential nature of the five seeds.
Split fourfold, and by that splitting,
what is taught at the tip of the tongue-root:
the color red, with equal radiance —
in the particulars of peace and water, the form of Hūṃ is to be applied at the foot.
At the root, free of sound and light,
it is taught as the vowel of the middle.
If one desires the body of a god,
and especially for peaceful action,
what is taught at the root of the heart:
the color yellow, with equal radiance —
the sound of the stout one, bindu, enriching, and action of fire.
At the navel, sound and conquest:
the color red, with equal radiance — radiance endowed with the sound of the stout one — is to be excellently applied for the action of subjugation.
At the tip of the nose, the third intoxication:
the color blue, with equal radiance.
In the light of the sound of lightness, endow it and urge with mind endowed.

Banishing, concealing, binding, suppressing, harmful actions such as banishing, torma offerings and the like — dark actions — apply the form of Hūṃ to the intoxicating.

That very suchness, in the fourth suchness,
the form of Hūṃ is the proximate indicator.
The form of Hūṃ is the supreme lord that brings forth all seeds.

By virtue of the nature that brings forth all,
the letter Hūṃ is the supreme deity.
Because the emptiness-letter has become Hūṃ,
I bow in praise to the form of Hūṃ.
Supremely endowed with the form of emptiness, bringing forth both the real and the unreal,
with the hue resembling refined gold, possessed of genuine sound and bindu —
Mount Meru, ocean, mountain — thus it is renowned.
Endowed with what is stable and what moves,
the accomplishment of gods and asuras, humans, yakṣas, and yogins, and the swaying of all the gods —
by the taught seed, summoning is performed.

The seed of the first group:
at the root, the pressing ra-vowel-sign,
with the hook-letter arrayed at the top,
above it with the light of the moon —
the color red, with equal radiance.
The hook-letter accomplishes the essence;
the hook-letter acts as the seed.
By the hook-letter, all are summoned.

The seed of wind in empty space,
the first of the eighth group:
at the root it is to be wound with sound;
at the crown, with the lunar-day bindu,
and through the intense color of wind,

all embodied beings are to be urged.
By the seed of the urging action, that very seed is to be applied throughout.

The fifth, of the second group:
taking up the third letter,
one is to suppress with the third letter.
The ra-vowel-sign applied at the root, and above, a drop of nectar —
the color white, with equal radiance.
By seeds such as joy and the rest,
all assemblies of gods are thoroughly pleased.

The third of the first group:
the secret sound is at the root;
above, the bindu of nectar,
white, lovely, and blazing intensely.
For the time of the mantra of offering, and for torma, fire-offering, mudrā, and so forth —
for all actions of enrichment, it is renowned as the seed of enrichment.

For the fourth of the first group,
the ra-vowel-sign and sound are at the root, blazing above the crown —
the color red, with equal radiance.
Excluding peaceful action,
it is the forerunner of all actions.
Because it bewilders and causes all bodies to be bewildered, it is renowned as the seed of bewilderment.

Taking up the third and the second seed of the fifth group,
at the end, by the two upper ones.
The color white, with equal radiance —
for the secrets of gods and asuras and so forth, one places them in one's own desired location.
For the action of placing, the yogin places with this wise letter.

One applies it to the group of emptiness.

The fourth of these is to be taken up: at the root, the neuter thick one, and above, the drop of nectar. For the very action of protection against fear, the color white, with equal radiance — the yogin who desires this very thing protects with this very seed.

The fire-letters, which are the mantras of burning, are explained as being of three kinds. White, yellow, and red and so forth are the limits of the three actions. Taking the end of the seventh, the seat of the second of the eighth — the seat of nectar, water as the seat. The color white, with equal radiance. Generated by the neuter group, red as fire, with equal radiance. Separately, the stroke of the vowel letter. At the end of burning for the peaceful action, the seed of nectar is the color yellow. The white seat of the water seed. Separately, the stroke of the vowel letter.

The last of the eight blazes on all sides — fire blazing like the light of a vajra, the seed blazing like light. The burning is by the stroke of the vowel letter. It is the final end of the fire-offering of enrichment. On that, the blazing nectar — the stroke is set apart on the outer side of the eight. All around, red and reddish — at the end, the stroke is a hook. With a mind that goes straight to the center, one recites by the breath of the stroke.

For the yogin performing the action of attraction, the fire-letters are of three kinds. Of those who seek the aim from the four aspects, know the wrathful letters to be two. For straightening, slaying, separation, suppression, and reversal, the second of the emptiness-group is applied with the stroke set in the lung position. From the third group of the sun-group, it is the lung position of the first and second. The color black, with great terribleness, fully possessing rays like fire. Together with the seed blazing like the light of the vajra, one breathes it into the center of the body. For slaying, driving away harmful ones, and all wrathful actions, the yogin who desires attainment places the wrathful letter at the end.

The one possessing that seed, having entirely abandoned the previous collection of strokes — first, above the head, sharp and blue in color, one drives away killing, separation, and harmful ones by means of wrathful deities. At the end of the wrathful letter, one is to join with this seed.

Taking the first of the first of the white group and its subgroup — on all sides, with the vajra seed, the seed-letter half-and-two. As the prior time of joining for the transference, it is the rousing of consciousness upward. From the side of the root at the navel, one draws upward with the letter half-and-two. The end of the eighth comes before. At the time of joining for Malata, coming before by means of transference-joining. Prior to the time of transference, the yogin practices fully. U, la, pa, li, ta — seeds. The letter half-and-two to be practiced. From the seeds, material and immaterial, one applies hair and drop. At the place of the root of the wind, it is shown by sound and sound. Abiding at the center of the water-tree flower, one is to transform with this seed. Bound by the meditative concentration of prior application and the mind of meditative equipoise — the seed at the end of the seventh: by means of the nectar-seed with seed reversed, made into an enrichment location, do so like a water-tree flower.

Just as with the third group, taking the third letter, with the stroke, preceded by the final seed and wound around below — that very suchness with everything, seed upon seed, the supreme chief. Purifying the three vehicles, the seed of ālī is supremely renowned. On the second of the eighth subgroup, one presses with a hook upon the crown. On the crown, the drop of the moon's day, the color red, supreme radiance — it bewilders all sentient beings. One applies it fully to the separation of the mind. The seed of total bewilderment — this is that seed.

One applies it fully to the rites of bewilderment.

The seed of the end of the eighth subgroup,
with a hook drawn upon the crown, and at the root the seed of repha — blazing in the color blue, it swallows scent, flowers, taste, and the rest.
By its rite it seizes all from everywhere.
By the seed whose name is "the seizer," one applies it fully to the rite of seizure.

The seventh, the white seed, radiant as conch and kunda blossom — it is the seed of nectar water, the letter named "water."

The seed possessing an eastern stroke, yellow in color, its radiance matching, blazing and blazing like fire —

it is renowned as the fire letter.

At the first of the eighth subgroup, that very suchness, the empty substance,
the red seed of wind —
this is renowned as the wind seed.

The seed of the end of the eighth subgroup,
matching the radiance of the blue color — upon the heart is the earth seed; that very thing is the earth seed.

For all these seeds upon seeds,
the drop-letter is at the root.
At the root, the second modification is repha, and the wind seed is the third.
Sound is the fourth at the root.
Joined with a drop above — that very thing is the fourth seed, and the sixth letter of the fourth.

The bewilderment-water seed,
the wavering wind seed, and earth become the afflictive — livestock one applies fully to fire.

The seed of the eighth letter, together with the eight yoginīs and their minds, itself the very chief of suchness, cutting through all of cyclic existence, dwelling altogether at the crown and coming entirely from the letters — this seed is to be grasped throughout.
"The seed of wisdom" is its name.
One presses it at the eternal root and joins it with the sound and the drop.

White as kunda and the supreme moon, the very seed of gnosis-consciousness — the seed of the passing form — is supreme above seed upon seed.

"Gnosis" is the name by which it is known.

One applies it fully to every rite.

The peaceful bodhisattva, peaceful in form, of great miraculous power,

at the end bearing the long Svāhā —

the mantra practitioner, having previously performed approach practice, meditates on both with respect to the body,

and by this one applies it to the goddess.

The mantra practitioner who burns with mantras is without a staff beforehand.

For the goddess, or again, for the goddess, at the end one places the subjugating letter of the wrathful form, and the like,

and one recites and performs the approach, and so forth.

Through form and form-possessing substance,

the wrathful male and wrathful female are distinguished.

The seeds of burning and subjugating are distinguished and possessed of distinction.

Through that very suchness, entirely,

one practices and regards.

A mantra practitioner without that suchness is shown to be far from accomplishment.

At the time of accomplishing, one recites the seed with the end of the deity.

For the supreme peaceful suchness, the vowel letter comes at the end first.

For the deity of the wrathful female,

the vajra seed comes at the end.

For the suchness of all goddesses, the nectar letter comes at the end.

The first seed of the mantra — setting aside one prostration —

the seed of one's own name, and both as the cause of utter completion;

the seed of emptiness and emptiness is the deity of the intermediate accomplishment.

The first letter of the day, the very name of the object of accomplishment and the accomplishment — the rites of its accomplishment are exemplified by the form of the yoginī.
The mantra practitioner, in the earlier time, should look carefully and practice.

Accomplishing for a thousand days — even of death there is no doubt.
Day by day by day one accomplishes, thousand by thousand is the intermediate.

The seed of reversal
is reckoned as the superior letter.
Whatever remains of the object of accomplishment for the day is a debt owed to the accomplisher.
If the object of accomplishment lacks an emptiness surplus, since it is pure, there is no corresponding result.
By looking carefully and practicing,
one knows the accomplishment of the mantra.

Beforehand, the seed of the neuter, and likewise the very neuter of the object of accomplishment —

The middle, the neuter letter, is described as empty of accomplishment.
By that very seed of this one accomplishes the desired deity itself.
At the beginning, at the end, and distinctively, in the center is the very name of the object of accomplishment.
High, low, and middle,
and the distinctive is itself the distinction.

For pacification, enrichment, and so forth,
the distinctive is itself endowed with the seed.
In the second division of the empty class,
at the root is the very sound of the consonant pha, and above it the lunar-digit drop,
all radiant in yellow color.
All the yoginīs of the goddess apply the supreme essence of the heart-essence.

Above it, with the homage letter and while reciting, the name is in the center.
The extremities and the extremities — burning and so forth — are present everywhere and on all sides.

In the second division of the empty class,
one is marked on the crown of the head by the form of the letter E.
At the root, together with nāda and the drop (bindu),
the color is white with the radiance of equanimity.
By the seed of the action that brings delight, all the yoginīs are delighted.
That very seed of all
is abundantly employed by all the yoginīs.

Then, medicines and so forth in sequence are to be applied in a distinctive manner.
Again and again, one by one, incense and fumigation, combining and so forth —
by the ritual of mantra and mudrā, the torma of the ḍākinīs is consecrated.
Beforehand it is endowed with the non-dual torma.
A square maṇḍala of fragrance, written in the center by the yogi, possessing the very fine fragrance of saffron, a grid of twenty-five squares —
the intelligent one draws the square.
From the grid of sense faculties and so forth,
the intelligent one places the letters.
Endowed with substance and non-substance,
the seed thereof is placed at the periphery and center.

All the letters of the day — in the eighth division of the remainder group — one places the seeds in meditative equipoise.
Perfectly endowed with sound and the drop,
the color is red with matching radiance.

Guggula (bdellium resin), the hand of the lord of the senses — the giving hand — and likewise the sound that causes bewilderment and the sound that causes numbness.

Sattva, siṃha, campaka, kuturu, koliki,

soṃcika, pāla,

guggula, ruṭa, dūrvā, kara,

fire, fragrance, and saffron, and civet, perfectly combined.

Sugar-candy and cloves, priyangu and kesara,

the western portion of the makaras' claws — across all the grids and in all places, the medicines starting with sense faculties, in order,

each substance one by one:

for each part, the seed is to be recited.

For the first homage, burning at the extremity — recite in sets of eight and eight.

The seed endowed with parts and so forth,

if also endowed with medicine, is superior to that.

Perfectly combined with the five nectars and with guggula and so forth, having mixed them, a skilled one, by giving these to the queen of a king and to a sovereign, brings them under control.

Having mixed the five of the five identities together with śadava and so forth, and having meditated upon the substance of the supplicant, just as before, as it was previously:

to one of noble lineage, brahmin, or common class,

whether male or female,

it is universally renowned that by giving edible substances

they are brought under control.

The five forms such as that which causes weariness are mixed with a portion of soṃcika.

Those of low vow-observance and low caste are brought under control by the self itself.

Medicines in sequence beginning with medā, perfectly combined with human fat —

the skilled one examines and analyzes, then makes equal portions without crushing.

If the drop is given,
one goes among the royal lineage and is victorious in wordly commerce, and brings beings into complete bewilderment.

First, sugar-candy and so forth combined with sandalwood separately — one part of the single division and one part of sandalwood:
in the place of the beloved, the yogi applies it to limbs, major and minor.
By just a slight whiff of the fragrance at the nose,
it certainly brings under control.

At the joints and junctions, sugar-candy mixed with a portion of honey —

Supremely cultivated and fumigated, it brings everything completely under control.
All that is gathered at the junctions is mixed with a portion of sugar-candy, then fumigated and thoroughly censed —
it brings all people into utter confusion.

Dwelling in the center of the lunar maṇḍala,
the wisdom ḍākinī manifests, and the very seeds of the individual seed-syllables — all of them, a hundredfold as one.

In the same way, for the red rite, following that, at the gathering at the junctions, one views one's own nature as wisdom.

The substances of the hand of the sun, with their equally radiant red color — by reciting the very seed-syllable of that,
one causes agitation and downfall.

Dwelling in the center of the heart's maṇḍala, one visualizes the solar disc, and in its center, the seed-syllable — generated as a bindu filled with longing.
By reciting it ten thousand times,
it causes the two to fall or be agitated.

By means of the outer tormā rite,
one accomplishes both agitation and non-agitation.

With myrrh and the like — five insects — combined with eight roots, if one consumes even the slightest, a bite as small as an egg, one dies swiftly in that very moment.

The insect of śatapatī and the like, prepared in milk seven times —
if one eats it more than seven days, death is certain, without doubt.

The five insects of son-rtsi and kāra and the like,
the five that cause madness in honey — administered in food and drink, they cause grief and intoxication.

The five insects of med and the like, recited over a snake's egg,
if one eats even a bindu of it,
in that very instant one is seized by leprosy.

The class of insects of the kharakha group, possessing eggs upon the head —
when a person eats their powder, that person is stripped of voice.

All that is gathered at the junction's edge is combined with a portion of honey and butter.
If one eats the powder of that,
in that very moment one is seized by stabbing pain.

What is correctly gathered within the junctions, ground together with honey —
if one eats even the most minute portion,

in that very moment one is tormented by fever.

This very excellent preparation, the essence — the meaning of a secret and most secret scripture.

One who possesses wisdom and intelligence should examine the order of the body with care.

One who commits harm against the Three Jewels, or slanders the master or the secret teachings — that person will not be tainted by this evil deed.
So declare all the ḍākinīs.

This completes the teaching called "The Fifth or the Sequence of the Fifth."

Then, the sequence of the other:

The distinction among the medicines themselves — that very thing becomes the supreme of all, the essence of essences.

Endowed with its former defining characteristics, in accordance with the rite, the medicine and mantra — that very thing, together with the torma rite and the grid of fragrances, should be arranged.

One sets up a square grid of nineteen and thirty.
On the daytime, the empty seed-syllable and the final group are to be placed.

In the places such as the sense faculties and so forth, first, the vowels in proper sequence — the seed-syllable of every cell is to be set down in accordance with the medicine and so forth.

Nāgabhala, bilinga,
ruta, sugar, bhāsaka,
kasala and the like — a sevenfold group — are placed in the locations of the sense faculties and so forth.

The hand of the Lord of the Sense Faculties, shudag, the bewildering one, sandalwood, sandalwood, and saffron —
these are to be placed in the location of the seventh.
The second is of equal portions.

Camphor, sāli, shudag, saffron, black cumin, gīvanga, honey — one seventh part:
that is the group for the third grid-cell.

Sarjara, guggul, ruta, gandhikha, ra, kunduru,
a garland of seven flowers — that is the location of the fourth grid-cell.

Kakola, śatā,
flower-stamens, tooth-plant, lac, patra — a seventh portion:
these are renowned for the work of the fifth.

Fragrance, extract, kṣāra, myrobalan, and kharata, kṣaudrī, vibīlinga's portion — that is the sixth grid-cell, which is the eye.

Danta, danta-kusuma —
rāma, garasmā, vetaki — their portions are one seventh each:
that is the seventh rank of medicines.

With one hundred and fifty completing the grid, every cell and all the medicines alike —
for each one this mantra is praised a hundred times exceedingly.

The first group, such as the makara group and the rest, whose own nature is the seventh of seven:
at the end, having made a powder blended, it is tied by a skilled one who is supremely calming.
Present it combined with food and drink to the assembled king, the sovereign of sovereigns, and all beings, just as each desires, shall come under dominion from every side.

The first group and so on are to be made into a fine and subtle powder.
Taking all the powder,

mix it in that same way with one's own saliva — seven times —
and as food, at a feast, according to the rite, placed in perfect equanimity, it is to be done.
Whether man or woman,
all shall become radiant from every side.

First, the crystal group:
that portion is to be made into equal halves.
Mix it thoroughly with human fat,
and dry it in the shadow of a shadow.
Introduce it into a wheel ceremony with joy, and if in the morning a drop is given,
those who approach the royal lineage shall swiftly become persons of fortune.

Blue pottery and the rest are applied to the sense organs.
Having made the powder fine, blend it with an equal portion of honey and kharatā, and mix it thoroughly with incense-water as desired.
Whatever is displeasing shall become pleasing,
and one becomes the very leader of speech.
The body fumigated with that fumigation shall cause all beings to be bewildered.

With kakola and the rest combined, make the powder in equal, rain-like parts.
Sandalwood first — all of it — is to be made into three portions.
The one who does not love, yet wishes to be medically treated and honored, the one of fortune who desires to be made beautiful — anoint the limbs with this,
and it brings bewilderment to all beings.

For the seventh, the fragrance group, combined with kakola and the rest,
mixed together with butter and milk, blended with an equal part of all,
it is to be dried in the shadow of a shadow.
All those of low caste, barbarians, and the like,

who are unwilling and disagreeable, shall become loving.
Having given this preparation, one acts according to one's own desire.

Dantī in equal portions, and lākṣā and the rest — all parts — mix it thoroughly over fire.

Just one seed of Karañja:
place that in the mouth of the unwilling one,
and saying three words as words,
one brings them under dominion just as desired.

The Dantī at the boundary junctures and so on,
the five madness-causing waters, bound with oneself, the one possessing the prior — having meditated supremely, one is to remain seated.
When fumigation is done with this fumigation, if the practitioner merely smells it at the nose,
it is universally known that whoever it is directed toward shall come under dominion.

Taking at the junctures rā and the rest, having made it into fine powder, and making it equal in all portions with the five personal fragrances — a perfect fine powder complete:
whoever possesses this medicine and touches with it the body of the one to be accomplished, shall certainly bring them under dominion.

The distinctions of portions and sub-portions are to be made skillfully and artfully.
This particular work of the medicines is to be viewed according to the rite.

For the practice of Vajrasattva (the bodhisattva of vajra mind), one abides on a lotus seat.
A refined essence completely perfected on all sides, like gold in its radiance —
at the solar disc in the heart,

the syllable A with a genuine drop, blazing and exceedingly blazing:
this stirs the mind of the one to be accomplished.

The unchanging drop of the letter, joined with sound at the root —
the name of the syllable of nectar called Māthāna — is fully accomplished through one hundred thousand recitations.
The preparation endowed with medicine is to be performed throughout within a lunar disc.
That very torma (ritual cake), having been blessed,
is to be approached in hundreds of thousands.

At the outset, endowed throughout with the limbs of Dantī and the hundredfold drop,
if given through edible substances,
in an instant the person is completely eliminated.

Dantī mixed with insects and goat's milk — whoever merely eats it will certainly die within seven days.

Three Ku, seven insects, and five varieties of maddening water:
whoever merely eats and consumes these will become utterly and progressively mad.

The Ram's-path and related groupings, combined with insects and whitened, then given as an edible substance — all who receive it will fall into strife on every side.

Kami, a group of insects, combined with human butter-fat:
if the powder touches a limb,
those of ill fortune will be rendered unloving.

The seventh grouping, Cīte, recited over an egg-containing gem, then a mere drop consumed — unbearable sensation arises in the fool.

Sāyal and related groupings, soaked for twenty days in goat's water:
whoever eats even a small amount will die within twenty days.

Dantī's boundary insects, combined with butter and honey, then eaten and drunk —
the limbs are tormented by leprosy.

The insects of Mtsams and related hot-water preparations, given in food and drink —
the person becomes utterly bewildered, mindfulness impaired, suchness absent, and meditative equipoise lost.

The very heart of the complete preparation,
the condensed essence of the mantra-application sequence, accomplished through the secret made most secret: through this application, even sentient beings who are bewildered and dull come to possess enjoyment and wealth, are not tainted by the sin of despising the Three Jewels, by reviling the teacher or secret matters, or by any wrongdoing —
so all the yoginīs have declared.

For those whose afflictions, delusion, and habitual tendencies persist, whose wisdom is weak and minds unstable, who are not vessels for mantra, who lack compassion —
it is these who engage in the work of medicine.

Through the tantra of the fourth seat, this is the third of the third.
Having seen that application, it is condensed in the language of symbols.

Chapter Four is complete.

The meaning of the root-essence thereof, the sequence of mantra application —
this is the condensed accomplishment of that suchness.

That very suchness: the physician, taking bodily affliction as the basis of wisdom and skillful means, is to accomplish it according to one's own wish.

Wisdom and gnosis are luminous.

Skillful means is the very manner of reasoning.

This yoga of wisdom is the root;
skillful means is its companion.

Whoever is endowed with skillful means and wisdom
is victorious over the afflicted body.

Though the many faults of conditioned existence abound, conditioned existence itself and delusion are the ground.

Since the abiding of things is impermanent, wisdom is therefore to be wholly relinquished.

Neither non-thing nor thing, without arising and without cessation,
things have no ultimate abiding,
and have no aspect of fearfulness.

The extremes of thing and non-thing and the like, pure and impure — in the middle:
knowing in advance the characteristic marks thereof, take hold of the view of equality.

Freed from the duality of apprehended and apprehender, relinquish the perception of things.

From the treatises realized by the buddhas, having thoroughly examined them, take up the essence.

Non-thing is to be apprehended as thing;
the intrinsic nature of things is thoroughly relinquished.

Having equalized thing and non-thing,
just as butter is extracted from churning milk, take up the genuine supreme essence.

It is equanimity of view alone.

If the treatise has been taught and fully understood, its characteristic mark is the absence of things.

Through focusing on the genuine path,
the supreme thing and the supremely real are accomplished.

Relying on the sequence of authentic abiding, primordial wisdom advances ever higher.
Sovereignty launched from another's station —
by authority, let authority be increased.
Proceed ever higher and so forth.
Take up things genuinely according to one's own wish.
Be victorious over the enemy of the seventh.
The very battle against the enemy of cyclic wandering:

Whoever is endowed with skillful means and wisdom —
wherever the substance of the enemy abides — sloth, sleep, and desire, anger, delusion, torpor, and the like —

With anger the limbs are tormented.
By skillful means, māra is thoroughly expelled.
Sloth is the abode of every fault and flaw.
Sleep utterly destroys virtue.
With anger, one is dragged along by craving.
With desire, mindfulness is thoroughly ruined.
With delusion, one is crushed by both.
With conceit, one enters into cyclic wandering.
With hunger for base and hateful things,
these seven māras are wholly driven away.
Pierced through on all sides by māra,
the body is the dwelling place of affliction and suffering.
With a mind set on one's own wish,
it should be tamed, kneaded, and pressed down.

Whatever path and in whatever manner, through the effort of a mind set on its own aim, gathering all into the essential heart,
one should undertake the supreme yoga.

Binding the fists in the vajra gesture,
with the unsurpassed aspiration as its cause:

Om svabhāvaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ svabhāvaśuddho'ham.
Yogaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmā yogaśuddho'ham.
Vajraśuddhāḥ sarvadharmā vajraśuddho'ham.

For the sake of all supreme aspirations, by visualizing oneself as the deity, consciousness is made to accord with one's wish;
craving and delusion are thoroughly abandoned.

Abiding at the center of the lunar maṇḍala, one's own body is adorned in full.
Crowned with the crown of the five buddhas, radiant with the brightness of conch and jasmine, oneself seated in the cross-legged posture of a bodhisattva, holding vajra and bell in hand,
the body adorned with all its ornaments, blazing forth with brilliant vajra firelight — without fear and without harm, meditate on things as things.

Through the full joining of the vowel and consonant series (āli and kāli), from seed arising upon seed, homage and fire-offering set at the end — recite these with a mind set on one's own wish.

Dissolving cessation in sequence from without,
settle in utterly even equipoise on selflessness.
Having breathed through all forms,
do not conceptualize the three realms.
Recognize that the moon and the like have no self, knowing that everything is emptied throughout.
Through meditating on emptiness, the empty, great emptiness, and on the non-existent as existent, having so meditated, at the final extremity, consciousness blazes like a lamp.
By the light of its radiance, the darkness of the three realms is dispelled — it blazes and is supremely subtle.

Consciousness is the shining of primordial wisdom itself, situated between the existent and the non-existent, between form and the formless, between perception and the absence of perception.
Know it by a mere instant of looking.

The middle between form and emptiness and so forth — that which illuminates these very characteristics — through the sequence of the preparation for cessation, meditate by settling in utterly even equipoise.

Without tormenting the limbs, without tiring the mind, proceeding step by measured step, cyclic wandering is cut through and through.
With a mind of constant intrinsic awareness,
the sequence of perfect awakening is revealed.
Having cut through and examined with great thoroughness, this yoga is to be taken up.

Om bhaṭali bṭatali petamukhi hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

Through the yoga of the vajra ḍākinī,
this is to be recited eight hundred times.

With all form complete and beautiful,
a radiance like refined and purified gold,
seated upon a lotus throne,
vajra rays blazing forth on all sides —
with a mind joined to primordial wisdom, if the mantra practitioner recites three hundred thousand times, thereafter the vast activities of desire and liberation are to be undertaken.

Taking charnel-ground ash and the like,
draw the maṇḍala upon a vessel.
With the powder from its crumbling, and wherever the maṇḍala is displayed —
a square form with four gates, adorned with four arched entrances — in its center draw a lotus, adorned with eight skulls.
Incense, fragrant substances, lamps,
the reality of the tormas offerings,
and with fish scales on all sides,
a vast and various array of offerings.
To summon the primordial wisdom ḍākinī, attended throughout by four messengers — lion, tigress, she-wolf, and —

— and owlets on all four sides.

From every direction and throughout, worship with a mind of equanimity.

In the eastern quarter of that place the fire rite is to be performed.

With the remnants of charnel-ground wood and three banners of that same wood — or else with the fire of an outcaste — ignite the fire with vigorous effort.

A great vajra-hook,
mixed with butter and honey:
recite the supreme mantra and, by burning it, the goddess will be satisfied.

When terrifying forms of every kind and unbearable shrieks and howls arise from all directions and all quarters, do not be overcome by fear.

When the four-limbed host of spirits and the king approach swiftly, offer them a pledge.

When Mount Meru and the other mountains tremble, when the earth quakes with a rumbling roar, when various unbearable odors arise —
do not let the mind that draws them be shaken.

If the great-being yogi burns ten thousand,
the seven vajra ḍākinīs will assuredly be accomplished — of this there is no doubt.

Through the activity of mantra and mudrā, through the rite of tormā and the rite itself,
and through freedom from dependence on the body, accomplishment will come — of this there is no doubt.

Then from outside, the wisdom goddess is revealed in the midst of fire.
Endowed with the five nectars, offer the torma and the arghya water.

Proclaiming it with depth and amplitude, address the goddess in words:
"O great sentient being, what shall be accomplished?
Speak plainly of whatever siddhi you desire."

Then the sādḥaka speaks:
"I have the great siddhi within reach.
If the supreme siddhi is what I seek,
petition for the eight accomplishments."

If, through māra, mental afflictions, planetary spirits, and the like, doubt should arise in the mind, perform a fire offering with a great iron hook laden with abundant sesame oil.
As Vajrasattva (Skt. Vajrasattva) has declared, accomplishment will come — of this there is no doubt.

The supreme goddess who grants all siddhis is to be accomplished by the skilled practitioner without regard for body or life.

Then that very gnosis, the supreme — exceedingly subtle and perfectly peaceful, having abandoned the apprehended and the apprehender, pervading all elements —
the person who abides in the nature of light, who cuts through ignorance and mental afflictions:
the afflictions of existence and all the rest arise in the form of poison from their source.
Reflecting on and contemplating the body, it abides in the station of the twelve moments of time as the enjoyment of the formless mind.

In the station of delusion and in every station, make offering to the essential nature of existence.
The yogi who cuts through delusion and the like, and crosses what is difficult to cross — the swamp of existence and so on — through the lamp of pure Dharma that destroys the marks of obscurations, by the method of pure phenomena,

the pure body is without fault.

Endowed with the existent and the non-existent, perceiving virtue and non-virtue,
the afflictions such as attachment and the rest are as fathomless as the ocean.
Possessing the nature of the twelve in the body, delusion and gnosis abide as distinct.
With the water of pure Dharma, wash away the stains of co-dwelling.
Through the classification of the natural lotus, cut through the torment of the afflictions and the like.

The great terror of conceptual thought is the cause of existence — it is like fire.
Therefore abandon conceptual thought far and wide.
Understand the wandering of the yogi.
Having aroused the mind of equanimity, look upon everything everywhere as equal.
In that which bears a name but does not truly abide,
there is no action and no defining mark of action.

The nature of the five nectars — satisfy the body with nectar.
Always make offering with nectar.
If it is not present in actuality, visualize it.

Having drawn the five forms of the hook, make offering in sequence from every direction.
Through this practice, ḍākinīs and the like will swiftly come under one's power.

Always consume that very thing;
if it is not available, visualize it from another source.
Consuming the poured nectar entirely — whether as a beverage or as flesh itself — always in a nature of joy:

Having abandoned signs and conceptual thought,
the hero of pure intrinsic nature will assuredly dwell in the pure body.
Always having abandoned the yogin, having abandoned both going and not-going:

The cause of leaves and petals — in the vessel, entirely as a sprout — that lotus of his which opens and blooms:
this is taught as the first mark of purity.

Bad in color and foul in scent, having abandoned a warm drink — that which cuts through the essence of purity:
this is shown as the second mark.

Delighting in all, with loving-kindness, never causing harm,
with tender compassion for all sentient beings:
this is shown as the very third mark.

Always possessed of a mind of emptiness, with a mind vast and profound,
all is empty to its very root:
this is shown as the very fourth mark.

Pure and stable in essential nature, utterly relaxed within a single body, always eating the secret substances and so forth:
this is declared as the fifth mark.

Endowed throughout with diligence, relying on generosity, moral discipline, patience,
and the supreme meditative concentration:
examine these as the sixth mark.

Craft and artistry, listening, always an equanimous mind, always striving for the welfare of sentient beings:
these are shown as the seventh mark.

Comprehending the minds of all sentient beings sunk in the mire of ignorance,

the genuine path of existence to awakening:
this is shown as the eighth mark.

One who never denigrates anyone, along with conceptual thought about substances and non-substances, falls into existence through conceptuality toward malevolent māras and obstructing spirits and the like.

Through unbearable austerities and suffering, the accomplishment of the approach practice will not be achieved;
by subjecting the body to hardship,
one wanders at the limit of conditioned existence.

Without conceptual thought, one should rest in equanimity.
Together with a mind oriented toward characteristics of things, for the sake of accomplishing the practice, consume with a mind that is free from conceptuality.

The essential core of what has been accomplished in accordance with one's own wish —

serene and unmoving, the cause of accomplishment.

The essence of the Dharma, quintessential — the mind endowed with the intrinsic nature of primordial wisdom.

This very treatise on practice in its entirety is what distinguishes suchness from suchness.

Through practice and through meditation having been performed, always apply the mind.

Yoga, post-yoga,

and the great state that transcends yoga — with the four activities and fully endowed primordial wisdom, one liberates the retinue.

First, engaging in the generation stage, together with the sequence of breath practice and so forth, directing the mind toward activities and attending to them:
these are the defining marks of the initial practice.

Consuming like fire,
beholding like the sun of equanimity,
the faculty of hearing in the nature of wind —
the ear possessed of the offering of sound.

The intrinsic nature of all things is the offering of reflections and the like.
With tormas-offerings as they have been declared:
this is the second, the intense practice.

Having equalized the material and the immaterial, one perfectly joins to the awakening of buddhahood.
The method of the Great Seal (mahāmudrā) — this very thing transcends practice.

If one naturally practices well,
all arises from selflessness.
Realizing the body and all else to be empty:
this is the fourth, the Great Yoga.

These, endowed with their defining marks,
are the vow of the great awakening mind.
By always engaging in that activity,
one is born and is liberated from saṃsāra.

The eyes wide like lotuses,
the face like a flower in full bloom, drawing near to the five sensual pleasures, moving in bliss and touching in bliss, endowed with all desires —
one should accomplish this with a mind of bliss.
A yogin with conceptual thought wanders and enters into conditioned existence.

In a delightful place,
having settled upon a comfortable seat,
through activity endowed with natural qualities,
a skilled one should meditate.

Having joined moon and sun together, having interlaced the fingers, they are kindled with the three unstained substances and with smoke.
The feminine mind, supremely renowned as vajra, the stake of the commitment, the peg and its foundation — all of that is this very activity.

The equal light of the blazing garland —

This is to be shown as a mudrā.

The other direction of the kha-ga,
the controlling of the wind at the root,
the hope of blazing at the crown, adorned by the lord of signs — ever peaceful, supreme abiding.

The equal light of the blazing garland:
in this way the seed, made brief,
is to be accomplished from all activities.

Fill the body everywhere with sound;
cause form and the rest to be exhausted.
The essential nature of the body as seed — contemplate the remainder of the seed.
Free from the protection of armor,
all is the activity of the six limbs.

The essence of the suchness of emptiness possesses the true characteristics of the primordial.
There is neither blame nor praise.
Whatever food is available, pure, and the senses, their objects, and enjoyments —
these are to be made equal by the mind.

Having first understood with awareness, the aspirations, the objects to be accomplished, and the fruits of accomplishment are discerned.

Whatever is desired and enjoyed in the mind —
the method of that is the vajra.

Having bound together the two vajra fists, having held them at the level of the hips, filling everything with the melody of HŪṂ, make it even with the song of accomplishment.

JA JA JA JA.

You, the lord in whom abide the siddhis of the vajra being —
HA HA HA HA.

I bow to you, the protector of the HŪṂ syllable, the master of the commitment.
BA BA BA BA.

You who hold the body arisen from the secret of the vajra chain —
A A A A.

Aho — the vajra of Māgupa, may it dissolve into the one āli. HŪṂ.

Thus the great secret song, satisfying all the yoginīs, is to be sung by one with one-pointed yoga mind with a sound as sweet as the call of the cuckoo.
Reaching to the boundless expanse of the sky,
in the center of the essence of the three realms, purified like the sky of wind, mind itself is expressed in the sky like the wind.

In the center of the maṇḍala of wind,
one should meditate on a lunar maṇḍala.
In its center, supremely beautiful, the āli seed endowed with light — contemplate by placing it in meditative equipoise as the color of the karma seed.

She who draws out, gathers in, and cuts — the seed of āli, supremely renowned.
As the third letter of the third group, having taken the third letter, bind it with a vajra staff at the chest and with the lower cloth.

Thus meditating on the supreme yoga severs all of saṃsāra.
On the outside, one's own body becomes the great hero Vajradhara.
Filled entirely with water, equal in the eight directions.

In its center, a supremely beautiful, pleasing white lotus — abiding in the center of the maṇḍala of wind, it holds the nature of the moon in milk.
Covered manifestly by a white parasol, blazing rays of light in great number —

born from that seed,
the essential nature of the vajra being is entirely white, the color of the moon.
Two-armed, with a beautiful breast, with a crown ornament that is the very substance of the five buddhas, seated in the bodhisattva cross-legged posture.
The vajra held at the heart's edge,
the left arm resting on the hip bearing the bell, with a nature of grace and delight, adorned with all ornaments.
The blazing rays of light in great number — let them be saturated with the colors of things.
Radiant with the great clouds of buddhas, from which stream rays of the sharp vajra —
without fear and without harm, meditate on things by means of things.

The yogin who wishes to recite should meditate evenly with a joyous mind.
The supreme seed in the center and the āli placed at the end in homage — the great mantra of the six syllables is spoken by all the buddhas.
By a yogin who recites and meditates, whatever is desired will be manifestly accomplished.
By performing the approach practice three hundred thousand times,
from then on that will be manifestly accomplished.
Then the essence of all —

Birth, cessation, and complete freedom — the yogin of non-dual wisdom finds the dwelling of wisdom as desired.

The vajra and bell, that very suchness, and the wisdom body — the form of the two.
With the vajra extended to the right from its place, press down with the foot that presses the bell.
Having joined the lotus and vajra, strive supremely at binding the seal.

With both hands hold the bell at the throat;
with a single vajra touch the breast.
The left hand goes to the end of the central joint.
With the teeth, purse the lips,
and with both, strive for the supreme of mind.
Meditate on things by means of things.

and throughout the boundless expanse of space — that suchness of universal emptiness is to be thoroughly practiced by the mind.
At the end, the form of a lamp.
In the center, the seed of the āli —
its blazing garland radiates brilliantly.
Together with every aspect of the three realms, thereafter, form itself is perfectly complete.
Both are delightful, of beautiful form.

Dbyig pa Vajra, the gentle protector, the ground of wisdom immeasurable as light —
by the perfect union of vajra and bell,
the supreme station is to be accomplished.

Named by the secret of the vajra, embrace both and recite.
Having placed the homage-fire at the end,
in the center, the seed of the āli — permanently, supremely subtle — is to be accomplished with a mind of bliss.

By the rite of mental offering, accomplish all things through mind.

Here ends the chapter on the perfect union of wisdom and vajra.

Now, the essence of all — the supreme chief, the condensed.
Following in accord with the tantra of union,
it is to be held with devotion.
With a crystal-like mind, partake of it as a pure substance.

Endowed with the characteristics of what came before, meditate on it as the essence of purity.
Thereupon, conceptuality and non-conceptuality, eating and non-eating as equal,
drinking and non-drinking — as one desires.

By those who wish to cross to the other shore of saṃsāra, the heroes, first having received empowerment, must strive diligently to hold the observance.
In sequence, by month,
by the sun, or by the year,
the observance has four characteristics.
Partake fully of those qualities.
On the fifteenth, on the fourteenth, and especially on the eighth day —
this very sequence of the observance, with diligence, offer the torma.
All the activities of that,
whose fruit is the very nature of wisdom and so forth — thus, by all the mantras of truth, accomplishment here is beyond doubt.

The yogin of feasting on food and the rest should take hold of the sun at the last month.
If one thoroughly examines phenomena as one desires,
all mantras will be accomplished.

The practitioner of the observance, day by day — or even if that is not available, at the end of the middle month of summer, take hold of the day of the year.
Just as the characteristics have been taught, having offered with flawless mantra,
by that, at all times,
splendor and prosperity stand before one.

Delighting in yoga, Dharma, and the rest, endowed with the supreme non-dual companion, relying thereby upon the Dharma,

the supreme station is to be accomplished.

By emptiness, form is dissolved and phenomena that have been taken up are exhausted.
Contemplate the universal vow as sky, placed in perfect equipoise.
In the place of universal space, meditate on the seed as the moon of milk.
Many blazing rays of light — white, the color of the kunda flower and the moon — the supreme chief seed of the āli, meditate with breath unmoving.
By instantaneous perfect union,
one becomes the wisdom dākinī herself:
three faces, six hands,
of blue color, with the light of equanimity, seated in the heroic cross-legged posture,
adorned with a solar maṇḍala,
with a vajra crown above,
the head adorned by the five buddhas.

Adorned with the three eyes expressing ferocity, wrath, and passion, the lower garment of great elephant hide and human skin donned completely, bedecked with all the bone ornaments of five human limbs,
the tips of the hair supremely soft,
with a radiance equal to blazing fire.

In the first right hand, the khaṭvāṅga staff, in the second, an enemy's severed head held aloft,
in the third, the vajra.

The left hand: the threatening gesture with a lasso,
the second holds a skull-cup filled with blood, and the uppermost hand bears a sword.

The vajra's rays of light, unstained, blazing forth like clouds of buddhas, sport in the midst of the earth:

meditate thing by thing upon this form.

To the directions, visualize owls, jackals, and lions, and tigers.

Place ravens, jackals, and vultures at the boundary corners.

Let the terrifying cry ring out, the fangs bared, and with hā and hūṃ, strike utter dread.

Thus the sovereign queen among the ḍākinīs — meditate on her as your very own nature.

Drawing her forth from your own breath, place her in the image and so on.

The practitioner's painted image and the rest — contemplate her as present in that place.

She abides in the state of desire and liberation, the very deity of the non-dual torma (gtor ma) offering.
Through the approach of union, the practitioner now explains the rite of worship for this one.

With food, with feast, with that very same offering,
and with the secret offering, worship completely.
In the center of the heart-maṇḍala she dwells:
with the mind, from the seed-syllable hūṃ, generate her form and the rest,
and establish the nature of Vajrasattva.

Meditating on food and so on as distinctly pure substance, through perfectly stable equipoise in the accomplishment, in just a moment, through the union:

Oṃ ha ho hrīḥ svāhā.

Reflect that oṃ blazes, ha discriminates each in its aspect,
the seed ho causes appearance,
hrīḥ in its aspect purifies defilements, and a in its aspect is to be understood for satisfying the deity of the body.

Through the five seeds the very deity is absorbed into the five buddhas themselves.

Oṃ jaṃ ghraṃ trāṃ hūṃ a svāhā.

With this mantra, hold the food and so on in their distinctive excellence:
in the aspect of oṃ, the body itself;
in the aspect of jaṃ, the holding;
in the aspect of ghraṃ, the stomach;
in the aspect of trāṃ, the unstained body;
with hūṃ in its aspect, put it to use.
With the mind, the syllable a at the heart —
if one always makes offering in this way, the practitioner is to purify misdeeds.

With incense, butter lamps, flowers,
food offerings and torma,
at the time of song, with melodious voice, joined with vīṇā, flute, and the rest, always worship with these offerings and proclaim oneself as Vajrasattva.

In going, in lying down, in sitting, in walking — at all times, always — with mindful and attentive thought, meditate on Vajrasattva.

Oṃ a mu hūṃ svāhā.

With the practice of union with the wisdom image (jñāna-reflection), if one recites this seed-syllable,
all misdeeds are drawn out and stretched thin,
and whatever one desires will come to be accomplished.

Even the misdeed born of the five elements, even one who has disclosed a secret —
if one always meditates and recites, one will be freed from all misdeeds.

Oṃ kara kara pra jvāla mahā tīkṣṇa pañca oṃ buddhe ha, oṃ krodha hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ,
a a a mu mu mu svāhā.

This seed of the great mantra is the mind of the buddhas in brief.
The practitioner of faultless union —
at the very end of the night, at the time of the first red dawn, with a vessel of water afterward,
two seers' weights of māgadhi,
the lunar maṇḍala visualized all around,
perfectly present in the nectar's center —
by the method of contemplating nectar, the practitioner in deepest meditative equipoise:

having praised it seven times, one then drinks that water —
all misdeeds are destroyed, and wisdom-nectar, the wisdom body,
a supple mind and keen discernment, vitality, splendor, and glory increase;
from every direction, fortune, purity, learning and wisdom, wealth,
and ailments of wind, bile, poison, and phlegm, chest disease, lung complaints and the like, with their stabbing pains, pain in the eyes and limbs — all sickness is driven away by this water.

Oṃ ra ta a bṛta ni, sarva phā phaṃ ha rantu maṃ hūṃ, bi kṛta krodha hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

This mantra of theirs is the great mantra,
the supreme of all protections.
Having been established in former times, it guards the body of the yogin.

Praised seven times,
and then three times at the five places, contemplating the five buddhas, one pours it upon the crown of the head — kings, lions, enemies, and the like, thieves, and fire and water, wind, bile, and kindred sicknesses,

all terrors and fears it destroys.

Oṃ vi mo ha ni saṃ mo ha ni, sarva pri ye ti hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ svāhā.

This, it is taught, is the great mantra that confounds all beings;
it makes those who are unloved become loved,
and all become endeared.

If one rinses the mouth in the early morning with water held in the left hand, the yogin who desires accomplishment — all aims and wishes will be fulfilled.

Then is taught the supreme practice:
from the essence, the highest essence.
Vajra and the rest are to be meditated upon, merged without duality into evenness.
Through this limb, meditate on them as distinct.
Even what is without poison is pierced by poison.
By bewilderment utterly unbearable,
the yogin who is bewilderment itself is stricken with fear.
By effort, through the method of the Dharma,
the pure body is made wholly pure.
By gazing at the lamp of purity,
the darkness of afflictions and the rest is overcome.

Sky-vajra — into the vajra, mind and mind itself fully dissolve.
Meditating on the singular and other things —
this is the defining characteristic of this yoga.

The residue of fire and so forth arises;
at center and within center it blazes.
With its light, the expanse of space —
one gazes in perfect meditative equipoise.

From the sprout of this seed,
the vowels and consonants emerge.
Seed after seed scatters and spreads, residing perfectly in the expanse of space.

Dwelling at the center of the solar maṇḍala, at the center of the Mother who rises from the dead — so contemplate.
Seated perfectly on a lotus throne, covered above with a white parasol, with two hands in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture, her complexion red, her radiance even,
adorned with hook, lasso, threatening finger,
and three eyes;
her gaze graced with an alluring expression, draped in red garments —
upon her supreme mind and thought, contemplate the syllables of nectar.
At the tip of the hook, the syllable kṣuṃ:
reciting, one draws her in with it.
Her reflection stirs the mind,
and with one's own breath one delights her.

Oṃ rāga ta rāga ta bha ti hūṃ kṣuṃ svāhā.

With the mantra and mudrā of the hook,
the yogin draws whomever is desired.
The greatly bewildered, the utterly bewildered — placing them in equanimity, one accomplishes fully.

From the tantra of the fourth seat,
the third of the seats of practice:
the essence of accomplishment, condensed — here it is gathered together in brief.

Then, upon the wisdom body,
the yogin in deepest meditative equipoise, through the intention of what is eaten and the act of eating, should practice purification and realization.

One does not disparage actual things,
and one should not examine anything whatsoever.
High caste, low caste, and the rest — equanimity is the fifth divinity.

Whoever — a creator and so forth — one should not harm with the mind.

If one harbors the intention to harm,
the yogin's vow grows distant.
Whoever takes another's property — whether great or small — making it one's own:
the mind of theft must not arise.
To be far from the yogin's vow is this alone.
Lies, harsh words, slander,
and idle speech — abandon all these far away.
Harming the mind of another is itself to be far from the yogin's vow.
Through the supreme union of meaning and the seed-syllable āli, this is the very heart of the Dharma of union.
Using confused and wrongly twisted speech and the like, applying it in that way is itself degradation.

Through action well performed, through a body that generates bliss, taking on the happiness of sentient beings as one's own concern — this is training well in the Great Vehicle.
If sentient beings are harmed or the like,
do not speak words of displeasure.
Do not engage in sinful action,
and do not disparage the sacred learning of the yogin.
The yogin is not one of sensual pleasure alone,
and must not become intoxicated with delusion.
Through the supreme union of binding the mudrā,
let it be attended to according to one's own wish.
Through the union of attending and being attended,
let the deity be satisfied and accomplishment be achieved.
By the very nature of the welfare of sentient beings,
one brings benefit through the happiness of sentient beings.
The great fruit of the Great Vehicle — through this, it is to be attended to by the path.
In whatever and wherever one enters into union,
there and thereby one brings happiness through benefit.
The minds of sentient beings who hold vows and so on —

do not harm those minds.

At the time of birth in cyclic existence, endowed with genuine skillful means and wisdom, turning the existent and the non-existent and the welfare of sentient beings into āli — the seal endowed with the four mudrās, bound with the secret of secrets:
within that very center, the nectar arises and a sprout comes forth.

The supreme āli, endowed with everything including the three petals, is without boundary.

Furthermore, the very supreme nectar is the essential core of all that is outer.

The nectar is delightful, is fortunate, and is praised sweetly to sentient beings.

The body of all five buddhas, refined and blazing like gold.

A crown is bound and uplifted, adorned completely with four hands,
with an expression of laughter and coquetry, and ornamented with all ornaments.

In the upper right hand, a vajra hook, and the second, a vajra lasso;
the left hand, a vajra bell, and the third, binding with an iron chain —
the mudrā of these four hands, binding with the secret and so forth,
the body and its color blazing:
one rests in equanimity as Amitābha, the boundless lord.

The seed of the form of ha causes joy in the supreme syllable.

Through the form of ho, body upon body —
the deity is Vairocana, sovereign lord.

Through meditating on mind and mental factors,
one is fully renowned as the deity itself.

All bodies and embodied beings —

it is the seizing of life and mind.

The seed of the form of hrīḥ is Vajrapāṇi, the greatly powerful.

From the form of oṃ, radiating with clarity,

it is that which realizes the minds of all.

The form of a satisfies by its very nature;

let it be fully attended to by one who possesses intelligence.

The goddess of the water of nectar —

this is the realization of what is to be known thereby.

Through the one by whom the nectar is tasted,

the fruit of the nectar is obtained.

The goddess who delights the Tathāgata is supremely beautiful, the most attractive of forms.

Through the aspect of all the buddhas, let the fourth mudrā be bound.

If the yogin wishes to accomplish,

let the two be meditated upon as non-dual.

The two, through the existent and the non-existent, are made fully clear by one endowed with gnosis.

Bound by great pride,

bound together with a mind of conceptual elaboration, through the manner of coquetry and wrath —

one dissolves into the very essence of the goddess.

On the seat of the hand of the sun, touched by the hand of the moon,

having embraced and through that embrace,

one dissolves into the very gnosis of the goddess.

The deity of fire, the gnosis of the belly —

One should be satisfied in that abode.

Through wisdom dissolving into method, satisfaction itself through non-dual union.

Oṃ ha ho hrīḥ a.

The seed of the great seed —

by this let the seed be contemplated.

The offering through this sequence is not for the purpose of medicine.

The goddess seizes hunger and suffering, speaks with coquetry and sweetness, makes pride without [ordinary] pride,
and has diligence without [ordinary] diligence.
The fortunate goddess, from all sides, bewilders, strikes with fear, and draws one in.
The unsettled mind and shame's fear —
the goddess destroys with pleasant words.
Thus endowed with qualities, the goddess, delightful and sweet as nectar, abides at the station of desire and liberation's rank.
Whoever follows the path of this goddess:
the water-mixture, the cuckoo's call,
coquetry and dance — these are the five she possesses.
The sixth is the diligence of the asuras (demigods), and the seventh is she who causes mindfulness to fade.
The work of the eight messenger goddesses is to swiftly steal away the mind.
For the nature-mind of the yogin, she produces the form of a mind of desire.
With the characteristics as taught,
with effort let variegated thangkas be painted.

Seated upon a lotus throne,
adorned with a solar maṇḍala,
the eight messengers all around — in the form of women, each in her manner, colored with the color of her direction.
Beautiful in form and endowed with qualities, holding great conch-shells and so forth in their hands,
in their respective places, water of nectar, vessels of the five meats and so forth, adorned beautifully with food and with feasting:
before the image of this goddess
the skilled one should perform the accomplishment.

Flowers, incense, perfume, and so forth, the non-dual tormā (ritual cake) perfectly complete — first, for a time, the pledge mudrā and the rest should be bound.

Extending fully the hand of the moon, utterly present in performing consciousness:
Om̐ hi li hi li hūm̐ phaṭ.

With the pledge mantra and mudrā, one engages fully in the activity of offering.
Om̐ amṛtakunḍali ha ho hrīḥ a svāhā.
This is the mantra and mudrā of close engagement.

Upon the seat of the hand of the sun, fully joining the hand of the moon,
with the heart-essence (dhāraṇī) and mudrā,
one performs according to one's own wish.
The yogin having recited one hundred thousand times, should first perform the approach and the rest.
Afterwards, activities such as those of fire, through the activity of the non-dual torma.

In a three-sided fire-hearth,
one should kindle the illuminating wood;
flowers fully bloomed from gods and humans, anointed and combined with honey, mixed thoroughly with nectar-water — holding firmly the name of whoever it may be:
if one burns eight hundred times,
that one will certainly come under one's power.

If the ashes of the fire deity and so forth are mixed five times with one's own seminal fluid and offered in the midst of the nectar, it brings under one's power whomever one desires.

The fifth, the maddening serpent, and the wood of the ujā tree in equal measure —
if these are offered infused with nectar, one quickly causes madness.

With the tips of neem and so forth,
the skilled one should perform the accomplishment.
With flowers, incense, fragrance and so forth, and through the activity of the non-dual torma, from the root of the white argha plant one should diligently kindle fire.

Fine lotus powder,
anointed with milk and with nectar —
after being burned eight hundred times, the remaining ash is applied.

Washed seven times with the root-water of citraka and dried in shadow —
at the time of the offering, the yogin, applying that ash swiftly with nectar-water in the snow-white kunda milk:
the body takes on a form of bewilderment, becomes thoroughly confused, and carries the scent of confusion.
The goddess of the eight messengers is then devoid of power and majesty.
For sentient beings confused in conceptual thought,
one engages them through this activity.

The yogin who has abandoned bewilderment swiftly comes to comprehend all beings.
Taking the ash of this substance, discard three parts in jātī oil.
At the time of the nectar-offering,
mix it together with the ash,
and by licking a drop of it with the tongue,
one comes to be held by the eight messengers.
The fully complete characteristics of the messenger:
she is wild, proud, and arrogant.

Take the wood that causes wildness, and with effort kindle fire vigorously.
With flowers, honey, and nectar present, burn it a hundred upon a hundred times.
Take that ash
and apply it in the preparation and so forth.
When that ash is applied in the place where nectar is produced, the color of the water changes and its taste likewise changes.

With honey and milk present, that form returns to its former state.

Take that ash
and mix it with three parts of the three bodies.
Seven parts of nectar
and eight parts of maruci — at the time of offering, pour that ash into the beer,
and whoever is merely given it knows of their own accord what they desire from the nectar.
Whatever bewilderments belong to whomever, let those be cleared through that method.
For the sake of clearing the bewilderment of sentient beings, always teach the path.
Strive for the benefit of others —
this concludes one's own aims.

The applications of medicine and mantra are lesser for those of lesser wisdom and so forth.
From the tantra of the Fourth Seat,
the third, the rite of torma —
the essence of accomplishment (siddhi) has been extracted:
this is its summary of substance.

For the purpose of accomplishing mantra,
an image is to be fashioned and employed.
By employing the supreme image,
one accomplishes it step by step through blessing.
Pacification, enrichment, magnetization, killing, expulsion, and separation —
all are accomplished through the image.
The image is to be made with its proper characteristics.

First, the characteristics of cloth;
second, the characteristics of palm-leaf;
third, the sequence of colors;

fourth, torma and fire-offering.

Having generated the basis and one's wish,
it possesses equal, unblemished edges.

Top, bottom, and so forth are fully extensive — on the cloth, draw the image for pacification.

A pretas's garment that has not fallen and has not deteriorated — with blemished edges removed — the portion untouched by dye:
that is the characteristic of enrichment.

A red cloth of a female preta, employed without falling into ruin, prepared untouched by dye:
this is universally known as magnetization.

Black goat hide,
and other substances such as ox and horse —
dark, fierce, and such:
that is the characteristic of the fierce activity.

In the place where it is pressed, apply the characteristic lines.
Apportion it into three parts:
one part is to be discarded below,
two parts are placed above the fifth.
The third, the lines that are stated —
the Brahmā lines, the rod:
the fifth part is taken as seven.

The body is understood to be three parts in measure, with limbs in peaceful proportion.

The face is twelve parts in measure.

The neck is four finger-widths.

The head and hair are the same measure.

The ear also has that measure.

The face is a third of that.

Forehead, side, and nose are equal.

The tip of the brow reaches to the top of the ear.

The eye is the measure of two finger-widths.

The socket is four finger-widths — that is the characteristic of the eye.

From the middle of the edge of the neck,
the chest is defined by two presses.
At the place of the heart and at the navel,
there is a press, and a full press.
At the end of the breast is a press.
Two breasts pressed upon the chest, and pressing with both hands — both hands pressing fully.
Possessing four finger-widths, the thigh and shin are uniformly defined.
For both knees, four finger-widths;
the measure of the foot is likewise the same.

Twelve tālas is the measure for painting the form of a god in a diagram.
The remaining four finger-widths serve as the seat for the eight gods.
The seat of the ninth
is said to be two finger-widths.
The maṇḍala of the central moon-disc, together with the radiance of the garment all around,
and the profoundly deep vajra deity —
the measure of twelve tālas:
the lower portions, the sections, and the like,
along with what is near and beautiful, are to be painted.
For the upper remaining portion,
the fifth family is to be shown.

With the color of the activity, and such colors,
one accomplishes the deity according to one's wish.
The full arrangement of the image is the form of the twelve tālas.

At this tāla measure,
both hands drawn in fully,
with two finger-widths set aside —

this is the form of the peaceful deity.

At that tāla, the face is rendered accordingly.

The belly region is large and fully so.

At every joint and joint-interval, two finger-widths are to be removed.

Wrathful males, wrathful females, powerful goddesses, male servants, female servants dispatched — forms fierce and terrifying:
these are painted at ten tālas.

For one who wishes to accomplish the maṇḍala, fully endowed with goddesses of offering — an eighth portion of cloth is to be set aside above the tāla.

The sequence of the maṇḍala goddesses is to be arranged in order, each in its place.

At the center, the lord vajra deity — paint the defining marks of the principal figure distinctly.

If the neck, the knees, and the feet are the three that are long, it is a fault.
The mantra practitioner will assuredly be driven out, and his abode destroyed.

If the shoulders, the ears, and the fingers — those three being short — the fault is this:
siddhis will assuredly be destroyed, and that one's glory will be far removed.

If the cheeks, the feet, and the hips are the three that are thick, the fault is great:
the accomplisher himself will assuredly be afflicted by māras and obstructing spirits, and glory will recede.

If the cheeks, the chest, and the sides
are the three that are low, the fault is great:
wealth will quickly,
without long delay, be destroyed.

If the breasts, the ears, and the forehead — those three are uneven, the fault is great:
strife and harm from enemies will quickly befall the accomplisher.

If the chest, the body, and both thighs
are the three that are low, the fault is great:
one will be terrified by enemies,
and death too is beyond doubt.

A flattened nose, a crooked eye, uneven ears, lips, and forehead —
one will be terrified by obstructing spirits, māras, and fire, and attainments will be far removed.

A head that looks upward,
a seat that is uneven and irregular, the chest, neck, and limbs — these are said to carry faults without number.

Rays of light that are uneven and irregular, mudrās and hand-emblems that are wrong — afflicted by grief and sorrow,
the image will be a fault for the accomplisher.

If the backrest, the parasol, and the banner — those three are askew, the fault is this:
death, decline and loss of glory,
and the destruction of friends and loved ones.

Thus, with great faults and flaws, with restraint, patience toward what is to be endured,
and with the mind placed in very even equipoise, examine thoroughly and investigate carefully.
With all defining marks fully complete and presented in beautiful form as an offering — for the purpose of accomplishing mantras, for empowerment and for the deity of invocation,
the peaceful in peaceful form,
the fierce in fierce and terrifying form,
with boldness and the pride of the courageous, laughing, or wrathful, or elegant,

in the form and manner of the wrathful, or appearing in the forms of male and female servants —
at the place and occasion of the activity, transform one's own color accordingly.

Thus, with defining marks fully indicated, siddhis are swiftly perfected,
and in accordance with the wishes of the yogin,
the mantra practitioner paints the painted scroll.

Homage to all the buddhas. Saṃbodhi. Viśuddha.

Namaḥ sarva-bhigahare namḥ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

With this mantra the mantra practitioner washes the canvas and the thread.
Through all activities and through mantra, may it be blessed by the five buddhas. By properly applying the images one by one, the practitioner completes the painted scroll.

As the cause for the images to be accomplished, perform the fire offering (homa), mudrā, and mantra. Taking the cloth purchased by a hungry ghost and the rest, with a torma and so forth, diligently draw the eight painted scrolls with a measuring-thread and line.

Seated upon a lotus throne, dwelling at the center of a lunar maṇḍala, the bodhisattva sits in the cross-legged posture. In two hands the painted scroll is beautiful. A vajra crown and the peak of a diadem, adorned by the five buddhas, a form adorned with all ornaments, bound and streaming with silk, pressing the vajra hand to the heart with supreme diligence, the left hand holding a bell, pressing it prominently at the waist — the color of refined gold, a face charming and supremely smiling, resting upon the vajra maṇḍala, radiating wrathful rays of light. White as the moon, the color of the kunda flower, the goddess serving as the secret vessel, clasped at the legs with palms joined, embraced at the throat by two hands, pressing lip to lip with a kiss, intoxicated and supremely wrathful, a form adorned with all ornaments, draped in white cloth of longing, vajras blazing from every hair, covered and sheltered by a white parasol — thus is Vajreśvara the Victorious (the lord of vajra, a wrathful deity), the lotus-bodied vajra-holder.

In the eastern quarter of the vajra, the female form painted in the image, with all forms and the rest fully complete — this sovereign's yakṣiṇī, seated upon a jeweled throne, adorned with all ornaments, holding in the hand a vessel for torma and so forth, should be rendered in the color of the direction. The goddess who grants all siddhis is the sister of Lūṇan. Bowing in the manner of homage is the defining characteristic for completing the goddess.

In the northern quarter of the vajra, the goddess who speaks sweetly — thus is Vajreśvara the Victorious, the lotus-bodied holder of wisdom. The color of sweet refined gold, seated upon an excellent throne, adorned with all ornaments, holding in both hands a vessel of amṛta, with a gaze of charming quality — so should the skilled one paint her.

In the western quarter of wisdom, the goddess Śrīmatī, the sovereign lady, the color of refined gold, adorned with all ornaments — a completely accomplished, youthful goddess perfect in all defining marks, her second hands adorned with a vessel of five hooks and so forth.

In the southern quarter of the vajra, the elemental spirit called Karāgavatī, her body blue and of beautiful form, adorned with all ornaments, holding in both hands a vessel of amṛta, with other charming limbs — she is the sister of Yama, the goddess who grants all siddhis. With all forms made beautiful, paint her with careful reflection.

The vajra, bell, and so forth, set in sequence, the sovereign and the rest arranged in order. Both hands in bodhisattva cross-legged posture, the hands bearing the characteristic mudrā signs and so forth. Thus should one contemplate the wheel of the play of Vajreśvara the Victorious. The deities, together with their visualization objects, are worshiped with mantra, mudrā, and torma.

Oṃ sarva-siddhi kuru hūṃ. This is the mantra of approach.

Oṃ vajra hūṃ phaṭ. Stretching out the hand of the sun, one presses upon the lotus of wisdom. The samaya mantra and mudrā. With its mantra and mudrā —

One should guard through the six branches. The two fists of wisdom are bound, and with the white one a parasol is raised. The coiled one embraces a silk parasol, and with a white iron hook the invitation is made.

Oṃ vajra aṃkuśa jaḥ.

Those two mudrās being firmly bound, white and civet are joined together. Through the samaya mudrā of the lasso, the goddess is made to abide everywhere present.

Oṃ vajra pāśa hūṃ.

That very mudrā being bound, back to back they are joined. Through the secret and most secret iron fetters, all the gods are made fully delighted. Those very fists being bound, back to back they are perfectly united. Earth-parasol and lotus are linked together, and the very deity is thereby made fully satisfied.

The two hands of incense being perfectly present, both fingers are raised erect. The moon is made to rest upon the sun. This is the mudrā of great compassion.

Oṃ surata vajra hūṃ jaḥ.

The two fists are bound and brought face to face upon the sun. This is the heart mantra and mudrā of the goddess of the eastern direction.

Oṃ śrīye vatī hūṃ phu svāhā.

That very mudrā being bound, wisdom and consciousness are raised erect.

Oṃ sukriye hūṃ phu svāhā.

This is the heart mantra and mudrā of the goddess of the northern direction. That very mudrā being bound, white and civet are raised erect.

Oṃ suru suru madur hūṃ phu svāhā.

This is the heart mantra and mudrā of the goddess of the western direction. That very mudrā being bound, earth-parasol and lotus are brought face to face.

Oṃ priyaṃ me khāla hūṃ phu svāhā.

This is the heart mantra and mudrā of the goddess of the southern direction, sovereign of the victors. With the mantra of the non-dual rite, the skilled one performs worship. Incense, flowers, and the rest, together with song — the skilled one worships with the twenty offerings. The field of virtue for desire and liberation, the accomplisher of all activities, the bliss-play of the vajra Dharma — one accomplishes this through the mantra yoga of practice.

Next, the very heart of all: the wrathful male who causes harm, and the wrathful female — three-fold in their division, their bodies by intrinsic nature; the four branches of buddha awakening. From the supreme wrathful one in wrath, three kinds of vehicles are terrified. Through the gaze of the goddess they are made to tremble. Māras and spirits are cut down; māras and the malevolent are withered, suppressed and driven from the land, and the rank of desire and liberation is achieved. Brahmā is pressed down and afflicted; Cāmuṇḍī is fiercely summoned. Whatever is fully accomplished through all who cause terror — let the skilled one accomplish it.

First, the drawn image — exactly as the characteristics have been taught — together with an assembly of one hundred and forty million, various forms, wicked in countenance. The goddess of averting misfortune, upon her throne, is completely pressed down from behind. In the center of the solar maṇḍala, the vajra ḍākinī fully manifests: with three faces and six hands, faces blazing with blue rays of light, upon a throne cast forth in sport. With her feet she presses upon the head of Brahmā. Three-eyed, wrathful, and proud, she bears reddish-red eyes. Her hair, coiled and fully spread, is beautifully adorned with a red crown. With a garland of skulls and bones — the intolerable crown of the buddhas. Her mind adorned with the heads of obstructors, she is embellished on all sides by two nāgas. Exceedingly wild, with gnashing fangs, the three faces are of three colors. She bears an elephant hide and is fully clad in human skin. In the very place of the eight ornaments, white and blazing bones. With a garland of buddha heads, sharp fangs, and blazing fingers: in the upper direction, an arrow; in the second hand, a khaṭvāṅga staff; in the third, a refined vajra. The right hand bears a threatening gesture and a lasso; in the second, a skull-cup; the third is fully equipped with a bow. A powerful hag, terrifying —

Bound with a lasso and fully adorned, she is fierce, gnashing her fangs. Dripping blood and in a state of stupor — these, one by one, are arrayed in the center of their respective formations. The messenger of each is to be fully accomplished. Dyed in seven colors, the garment streams forth without ceasing, always unfolding. A wrathful being with a body of gnashing fangs, bearing a vajra of blazing rays of light, clothed all about with human bones and bones, and covered with a white parasol. Lord and master, wrathful one of primordial wisdom — he who is fierce tames the exceedingly fierce, and subdues all māras. Because exceedingly malevolent sentient beings cannot be tamed by peaceful means, through the union of skillful means and wisdom the wrathful form and so forth are displayed.

Crow, owl, vulture, jackal, rākṣasa, dog, and the like — the terrifying cry of wailing resounds, and the form is filled with human bones. By thus perfectly establishing such an image, those who seek desire, liberation, or benefit shall all be terrified by the wrathful one. The mantra practitioner is to accomplish the image.

Oṃ ta hūṃ ma tha ma tha duṣṭāna ghātaya hūṃ phaṭ svāhā.

With three banners and the like, through mudrās, all activities are fully performed. With incense, fumigation, and similar fragrances, and with offerings complete and extensive, offerings to heroes and so forth duly performed, and the maṇḍala ritual witnessed — the fire-offering branch of the ritual ceremony is there, but the torma activity is what is especially distinguished. With uninspected flesh and with blood, one likewise accomplishes from the very same base. Whatever siddhi (Skt. siddhi, spiritual attainment) one desires, one is to be satisfied with the aspect appropriate to it.

Oṃ viṭṛti nāma mahākrodha hūṃ phaṭ.

Stretch out the moon and the sun, and join them back to back. Take white musk of the civet, and bind it together with an earth-parasol and a lotus. Apply to that very essence-mudrā the self-same mantra. A peg roughly the size of a span, together with nets, armor, and weapons — placing these in the seat of the activity is what this mudrā is renowned for. Binding this very mudrā to the heart, join it with primordial wisdom and consciousness.

Oṃ krodhani hūṃ a.

Perform the activity with the seed-syllable of the supreme essence and that very mudrā. Without regard for body or life, accomplish it with a great mind. The fierce and sharp goddess is to be accomplished with a sharp mind. The somewhat peaceful goddess is characterized by a single method. At a place by the bank of a water course, first perform approach recitation and the like. Recite five hundred thousand times, and afterward one hundred thousand times. Offer the peaceful offering, and then perform the fire activity and so forth.

In black, mix fat with blood, and in front of the image — whether painted or otherwise — perform the fire-offering with the complete ritual. Satisfy with torma and fire-offering; all activities will be accomplished: pacifying, enriching, magnetizing, subjugating, and wrathful activities and so forth will be accomplished.

Filling a large vase with fragrant water and offering it abundantly — for the affliction of the limbs of illness, first confer empowerment as a bestowal, and one will be freed from all diseases. Likewise, harm caused by planetary spirits, misfortune, and ill will — all will be pacified.

From yellow pigment and monkey bile, draw the image of the deity who leads astray. Seated on an even throne with palms joined together, adorned with four arms, with fangs gnashing and limbs fully developed, dwelling in a lotus vessel — with a three-pronged implement and a vessel for food, with a hand thrust into the enemy's lair, four fingers in measure, adorned with all ornaments. In front of the painted image, draw this yantra (Skt. yantra, mechanical diagram).

On bark or on tree skin, with musk and saffron, draw the image of the practitioner — complete with form and all features. Write his name at the heart. Possessing movement, falling, and life-drawing force, fully equipped with iron hooks — draw it up to the forehead and place it there.

Press it down upon the seat of the obstruction-spirit's power, placing it at the heart. Offer worship with flowers, incense, and the like. Then, with full earnest attention, perform the ritual of the torma offering. The practitioner who seeks an aim and desires its fruit recites the mantra syllables:

Om tram tha tha tha hum dza svāhā.

While reciting, strike each white flower one by one. When one hundred and eight have been completed in full, there is no doubt that accomplishment will follow. Through the application of this mantra, the mind of the practitioner is stirred, and swiftly he draws the other toward himself, causing them to lean in. Kings supreme in sovereignty, Śiva and the like, kings and royal ministers, children of the wealthy, and those with bodies of surpassing beauty — Śaci, Śakra (Indra, lord of the gods), and their kind — if one so desires, all of them come under the practitioner's power. For as long as the body lives, they bow at all times without ceasing. Through the chief limb of pride, accomplishment is won by means of pride. By displaying the wrathful body, the work and all its tasks are swiftly accomplished.

This concludes "Displaying the Wrathful Body."

All the qualities of conduct gathered together — this is the teaching on the defining marks of observance. Those who desire wisdom, enjoyment, and their fruit should come to know the defining marks of conduct. The terror of unbearable cyclic existence is falling into further existence through attachment. One whose body has relinquished attachment continually resumes and holds the observance. Through profound meditative equipoise in solitude, all things are comprehended in brief summary. Attachment causes one to fall into further existence, and clinging sets one moving through cyclic existence. Having abandoned far off the nature of bewilderment, and in order to teach the Dharma for the benefit of sentient beings — one who acts for the benefit of sentient beings nevertheless accomplishes this through unbearable austerity of observance and practice, and through application in solitude. The fault of attachment swirls like an ocean. In order to overcome one's own afflictions, let the sole intention be the benefit of sentient beings. When the time comes to act for the benefit of sentient beings, one demonstrates conduct and the vow together.

Free from crowds and commotion, in solitude, protect the body joyfully. At first, the practitioner receives the words of the treatise, then, fully endowed with all vows, practices the Dharma with utmost sharpness. Neither settled in any place nor clinging anywhere, one never grasps at location. Regarding what is edible or inedible — distinctions of lower and so forth — one should not fixate. With joyful and constant effort, one should always solicit alms from gods, masters, fishermen, butchers, brahmins, commoners, and those of the royal class alike, moving along the path of an equal-minded heart. If, while practicing as described above, someone has offered food at a feast, bedding, cloth, and shoes as well — pleasing enjoyments and resources — then through merely abiding in that observance, the practitioner's vow is kept at a great distance. The practitioner who practices the ninefold conduct should take merit into hand. Even when all has been solicited, there is no fault, nor does one grasp at things. With a completely pure mind, one eats all food and takes what is edible. With purity, reverence, and pride, one thoroughly abandons any fixed abode.

With faith, when drawing a maṇḍala or performing the tormā ritual, whatever substances and materials have been accumulated should be offered at that place. Whatever remains from the three Dharma robes is received again with reverence. On the crown of the head, the ochre-colored mark; the branches of buddha-awakening; the old patched robe and the three Dharma robes; on top of these, the vajra staff, the alms bowl, the auxiliary pouch, and the water strainer — for the body that holds these, there is nothing else additional, such as a book or the like. The cord of the tail — praised as a means of sweeping away ants and the like. The branches of buddha-awakening, the root of Dharma's meaning, compassion itself — after that, what is to be trained in is the vow of the guru's word.

The buddha's wisdom, the miraculous power so great — to the supreme I go for refuge, I go as refuge.
The supreme body of Vajreśvara (the Lord of Vajra beings) — to Vajrasattva I bow down in homage.
The goddess, wisdom and union, intrinsic nature — to the five ḍākinīs I bow down in homage.

Oṃ amuka samayo hūṃ samaya. Amuka samayo. Oṃ amuka samayo. Hūṃ samaya. Oṃ vajra vajra. Mahāvajra vajra. Kāya supar. Hi hi hi. Ho ho ho. Hūṃ nanibatadaṃ.

By this, the student is to be thoroughly taken hold of. The vow of the vajra, the one who is vajra-natured — it is to be accomplished through the activity of the second. Through the practice of union and the secret mantra and vidyā, at all times and in the very instant, these two verses are to be recited:

Whatever is father, and whatever is mother, whatever is beloved — that too is impermanent.
The body of a buddha is like an illusion;
forever protect it fully with Dharma.

Alas! By the power of emptiness, all things are utterly vanquished.
The one who gives forth the fruit of buddhahood — by the wise one it is to be grasped and held.

For the sake of cutting through bewilderment,
at the three times the verses are to be recited.
In walking, lying down, moving about, sitting, and in all activities,
having made firm the practice of mantra, let the mind rest in mind itself.

The sin of the body of the five elements, carried on through birth after birth —
by the conduct of both day and night, the impurity of the body becomes purity.
Having practiced thus for six months,
one accomplishes the deity of one's own wish.

The yogin who practices the conduct of vows attains gnosis even without knowing.

Thus the field of intrinsic qualities —
the cause of the conduct of vows.
By engaging in the application of vows,
all bewilderment is entirely abandoned.

By illuminating the characteristic of skillful means,
and having perfected the view of equality,
there is only the view of pure vision.
Through the taste of equality, empty in all respects,
all phenomena are without defining marks.
At the limit of emptiness in all respects, conceptual thought of whatever kind — that which the deluded have examined and conceptually fabricated, along with the pure mind and the act of cognizing —

The body of the ocean of bewilderment and affliction, that ground of desire and wrath:
bewilderment, by the sharp mind,
is the distinction of the body endowed with gnosis.

Oily food and soft garments, contact through the various sense faculties —
by the reversal of delusion through attachment, it becomes the karma that causes falling into existence.
Karma becomes the master of what is to be done.
Bewilderment and gnosis are impermanent.
The subduer of desire, wrath, and pride —
it is the food that binds in existence.

To a being (bhūta) arising, show affection,
and do not at all examine evil in others.
For one destitute with suffering and without protector, afflicted by error as if fallen into Avīci —
in this world, wounding and exposing faults is the supremely foremost thing.

Having trained well in the Great Vehicle, one is not even a thing of the lower realms.
By eating well and eating in all ways, protect the body with genuine joy.

By a bad feast of old food,
one is definitely to make oneself joyful.

The prior training and the other trainings, and beforehand the complete restraint of all — through the meditative equipoise of vow-conduct, Avīci is without object.

By illuminating the prior defining marks, the prior trainings and the other trainings are to be trained in.
Through the meditative equipoise of vow-conduct,
the training is to be trained in with reverence.

A woman of terrifying and fierce form,
her hair tangled and coiled, wearing the soft red ochre robe covered with fine dust — adorned also with ornaments of human bones, the woman is adorned as a decoration.
An old red top-garment
is to be wrapped in human skin.

In the second, the great vessel is to be taken hold of, and the five sense faculties grasped.
On top, the vajra staff (khaṭvāṅga) is adorned with the bones of human limbs.
The banner, the bell, and the garland —
the staff is to be held in the left hand.
With a body thus assembled and gathered —

One is to practice the observance with effort. In this way, substances and other material things are not to be touched, as they blaze like fire. Food, drink, and other such things are not to be gathered in the first instance. With a mind of compassion and beneficence, one is to eat joyfully and fully. Since all harm is without purpose, one is to thoroughly purify oneself of all material things. Sustaining the body only to the extent necessary, one is to accept the food of a beggar.

One is to dwell in empty houses, in charnel grounds, at the edge of forests, and in solitary retreats. Throughout the night one is to move about, striving supremely in recitation and meditative concentration. Whether walking, lying down, or sitting — with a mind clear as crystal and a nature thoroughly pure — recitation and meditative concentration alone. By this, all will be accomplished: so have all the buddhas declared. By conduct that abandons wrongdoing, one does not remain in saṃsāra.

Always viewing all things and non-things with the mind, oneself thereby becomes the cause of buddhahood. After this, two verses are to be recited. One verse is to be given for protecting generosity with the Dharma.

Alas! By the power of delusion, all embodied beings are brought under its sway. Desire and the rest, Dharma and the rest — these unbearable things are thoroughly abandoned by the wise. It is neither non-thing nor thing; because apprehended and apprehender are not conceived, one crosses beyond the wilderness of existence and attains the bliss that is without reference point.

The enjoyments and so on examined by others — lying down and walking, in the three times — through a single verse on yoga, one cuts through the yogin's delusion.

By gathering the worn-out cloth of the mind of the great mind, one thoroughly divides it as that one's garment. Taking up a staff made of all skeletal limbs, intricately joined, one strikes it in the manner of the paṭaha drum and takes up the vajra song — as the cause for liberating sentient beings, one wanders from village to village. Through the observance practice of objectless intrinsic nature, one settles in meditative equipoise. The pure mind, being without reference point, is to be guarded with joy. Because the conduct has become a cause, it is the true cause of the yogic practice. All wrongdoing is thoroughly removed, and all faults are thoroughly abandoned. By practicing the observance for six months, one's own desired gnosis will be accomplished.

Thus concludes the chapter entitled the Presentation of the Conduct of Observance.

Then the quintessence of all — a condensed gathering of the meaning of all suchness — is perfectly applied as the quintessence of all in saṃsāra, both the stable and the moving.

First of all, the yogin is to sit on a comfortable seat in a pleasant location and begin by performing approach and so forth. Through vajra recitation or the yoga of wisdom, having recited three hundred thousand times, there is no doubt that the desired activity will afterward be accomplished.

One is to make an image from monkey fat, anoint it with warm butter oil, place the name upon the heart, and fill joint after joint with thorns. Sour substances, salt, and maruṭa — along with the image, properly combined, one places them exactly in a vessel. With the gnosis-body, one presses down upon the body with the right foot. Reciting with a sharp mind, by the end of a single night there is no doubt it will be accomplished. If it is placed in a ripening fire, a king will quickly be consumed. For those who harm the Three Jewels, this rite is to be applied.

Hrīḥ, amoghasi sidaha daha grhṇa hūṃ hrīḥ phaṭ.

At the time of dawn when the sun rises, with a maṇḍala of white flowers, and through the rite of incense and butter lamps, one is to perform the pacifying activity completely. A substance mixed with water and milk — with that, having prepared the torma offering, one recites the mantra one hundred and eight times.

The king will be freed from illness.

Oṃ amṛtabhare dehūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. A a a.

Having gathered everything together, cast it into the current of a great river. This concludes the chapter called "Completely Pacifying Epidemic Disease."

Then this essential heart of the rite of perfect union — one is to practice it thoroughly with mantra. From white mustard seed, make an effigy. Upon the chest, set down the name. At the navel, place a stone and a thorn. Press it down with the foot and recite.

Sutīkṣaṇā śūla hūṃ ja phaṭ hrīḥ.

Heat it in fire and torment it, and recite the mantra repeatedly while holding it so. By the characteristic marks of this so depicted, instantly the nailing action holds. From within the pacifying offering rite, wash with milk and honey, then cast into the current of a river — and thereby one will be freed from piercing and the sickness of being pierced.

Oṃ sarva kari hūṃ ja svāhā.

This is the mantra for completely pacifying piercing pain.

Then, through this all-encompassing essence, regarding the characteristics of the rite of subjugating another — having previously performed the approach practice and subsequent stages, all activities will be accomplished. At the very end of the dark fortnight, from the dung of a dry cow, make the name and form of the one to be worked upon, and anoint it with red sandalwood. Set the name of the one to be worked upon all around. With an acacia spike, press it upon the eyes. Then, having pressed it with the left foot, recite one hundred and eight times, fumigate it in fire — and by the fumigation, the eyes will be seized with piercing pain.

Oṃ cakṣumālīṇī hūṃ phaṭ.

By this mantra and the practice of mantra, there is no doubt that this will be accomplished. Having made pacifying offerings, recite:

Oṃ vajratikṣaṇāya hūṃ svāhā.

Having recited this seven times with full praise, wash in its stream of milk, and thereby dispel the illness and harm of the one to be worked upon — the pupils of the eyes will become sharp and clear. This is the rite called "Completely Pacifying Eye Disease."

For accomplishing results through the thorn of a wild date palm — the skilled practitioner writes with blood. With poison and the ashes of a charnel ground, anoint the pupils of the eyes. Having pressed with the left foot, recite one hundred and eight times.

Oṃ kṛṣṇapiṅgalī hūṃ khaṃ phaṭ.

By this mantra and the practice of mantra, anoint oneself with the dung. Thus, one who is fully endowed with all the characteristics will quickly render the target blind. Anoint with honey and butter, and thereby dispel the illness and harm of the one to be worked upon. Recite one hundred and eight times with full utterance.

Oṃ amṛtalocane a svāhā.

This is the mantra for completely pacifying blindness.

Furthermore, the practitioner who is to accomplish results should apply the activity thoroughly. One who harms the Three Jewels will not become tainted by that evil. From dough, form the shape of a lotus. The name of the one to be worked upon goes in the center. Fill the hollow with dog's hair and anoint it with warm butter. Having pressed with the left foot, recite one hundred and eight times.

Oṃ vajravake hūṃ phu phaṭ.

Heat it in fire, and through the heating, the bhaga will quickly be repelled. An exceedingly malicious woman — bind her through this activity. Having recited with full praise seven times, wash in a stream of honey and milk.

Oṃ sukobhavi hūṃ he svāhā.

This is the mantra for pacifying.

Take a vessel of clay and shape it in the form of a lotus. Fill the hollow with sharp sesame oil and white mustard seed and apply. Having pressed with the left foot, beat it with an acacia spike. If the mantra is recited fully eight hundred times, the bhaga will be seized with piercing pain.

Hrī bila ta hūṃ phaṭ.

By this mantra and the practice of mantra, this is precisely the activity of piercing the bhaga. Wash with water and milk, and apply the mantra openly.

Oṃ sarvaśodhani svāhā.

By this mantra and the practice of mantra, the bhaga is liberated from piercing and the like. Furthermore, the characteristic marks of the activity are practiced by the most accomplished yogin. Take dust from a royal road, or else from the dust of a crossroads. The characteristic mark of the lotus, the characteristic mark, is the essence of the bhaga together with blood and the mudrā of the hungry ghost (preta). Having recited openly one hundred and eight times:

Hrī prī phaṭ.

By this mantra and the practice of mantra, it becomes the activity of binding the lotus.

Oṃ amṛtavati svāhā.

One is not defiled by the evil of harming the Three Jewels, reviling one's guru and master, or mocking the practice of the sacred commitment. Yet if one acts continually in a state of confusion and anger, in that the Buddhas have declared with certainty and without doubt that this constitutes a downfall.

Thus concludes the chapter entitled The Classification of Activities.

The secret and most secret meaning of suchness, the supreme essence briefly gathered, the suchness of liberation's eminence taught through treatises on music and song. From the essential nature of non-dual being, how can apprehended and apprehender arise? Since both are not self, the being of both is without being. With the mind of the view of equality looking upon what is being, non-being, and no-being, there is neither the supporter nor the supported. The one who conceptualizes and is deluded by conceptual thought exhausts form and what possesses form. Contemplate in meditative concentration the nature of intrinsic existence that is without intrinsic existence, in the stable resting place of the mind, and let it be contemplated. The very nature without object of reference dissolves all things into the basic space. Emptiness is empty, and all such empties have the character of reaching to the bounds of the space element — pure and subtle, subtler than the subtle. Mind together with mental factors: throughout, since being is non-being, all is like sky pervaded. The meaning of the permanent, permanently permanent — with mind stable like the space element, sparks, dust-motes, and shooting limbs of flame, examined as if they were water-bubbles: the residue of consciousness and gnosis blazes through space and shines forth. Just as the afflictions (kleśas) and likewise darkness are struck by the vajra of gnosis, consciousness blazes forth together with it and one attains the light of gnosis and the like. Through mind, mental factors, and mentation, examine and practice thoroughly. Without fear and without harm, cultivate being through being. Illuminating all things entirely, gathering all rays of light, the seed of the essence — the seed — is white in color, the hue of the kunda flower and the moon. Through the thorough union of the vowels and consonants (āli-kāli), the supreme seed that has been extracted is the cause of the accomplishment of the union. The yogin of equality meditates. Through the emission of the seed into space, the three worlds are made luminous. Without remainder, like a cloud, one emits. In an instant one emits and gathers. Afterwards, with no object of reference according to one's own wish, and being without letters, reflect again. Form examined as empty — with equanimity, through mind and mind, having looked upon all things without remainder, the three realms are made luminous. By having thus contemplated with the mind, the successive stages of awakening come to be seen. In an instant, form and formness, in an instant the aspects of the aggregates, in an instant all shapes — they are therefore the abode of impermanence. What is named good action and bad action is not to be blamed on account of wrongness. The center of form, emptiness, and so forth, indicated by mind and mental factors: the residue of being, being without being — the residue of that is without form. The blazing picture of gnosis — the very abiding of light-rays in equality — the yogin thoroughly practices its defining characteristic mark. Always peaceful and supremely active, it is the permanent perfect awakening. Having sat upon a comfortable seat in a pleasant place, having first begun the approach practice, all activities and aims are perfectly accomplished.

Visualizing everything at the summit of Mount Meru —

The great palace of self-desired victory,
Of supreme nature, various precious jewels,
Adorned manifestly with nets of bells,
With white parasols and victory banners,
And manifestly adorned with various offerings.

The very nature of Vajrasattva
Is white as kunda flowers and moonlight.
He is adorned with every ornament
And arrayed with the five buddhas.
Wearing garments of supreme beauty,
In his two hands he holds vajra and bell.
Rays of light radiate in many forms,
And from all sides vajra light-rays blaze forth.
The aspects of all three realms
Are to be meditated upon by mind and with the mind.

At the center of the maṇḍala resting in his heart,
A red HŪM blazes intensely.
At the crown, a bindu like a mountain of fire,
Radiating from each pore of the body.

In the east, placing the vajra;
In the south, arranging the arrow in its form;
In the west, indicating the sword;
In the north, perfectly bearing the bow.
The vajra lasso and the remaining three
Are to be placed at each of the intermediate directions.
Thus, endowed with these defining characteristics,
One meditates in very deep equipoise.

The primary seed-syllable of the vowel family —
Abiding in suchness, one recites the mantra again.
Completed at the end with prostrations and burnt offerings,
By performing the approach practice three hundred thousand times,
One's body itself becomes a vajra body,
And one becomes equal to Vajrasattva.
The hidden essence and the essence,
The vajra Dharma and the supreme Dharma.

Vajrasattva, as the subsequent offering,
Is enacted in the form of a song of HŪṢ.
With the beautiful and auspicious sound
One takes it up in meditative equipoise.

Tribhuvana-jālita-mūrti-anurāyana-vati, raśmi-sahasra-tīkṣṇā-dhasa-suparasravati, bāhu-vidaru-vapeśa-anurāyana-tata-tavati, nata-i-vajra-sabarve-saraliṃ-lavati svāhā.

From the vast tantra of the Four Seats,
Condensed briefly from twelve thousand,
This is further condensed from the substance of that,
And thus the essence itself is briefly summarized.
There is no meter, no sound, no discursive thought and so forth;
Meaning and meaning are perfectly gathered.
The meaning of the practice of yoga is itself hidden —
And is expressed in the language of signs.

Correctly extracted from the Fourth Seat, this is the Tantra of the Praising Section called "The Maṇḍala of Practice," completed.

The seventh chapter, called "The Stalk of the Reason of Explanation."

Translated, revised, and established by the Indian paṇḍita Gayadhara together with the great translator and revision editor Gö Khukpa Lhetsé.

Translator's Notes

- The Sanskrit title transliterated in the Tibetan opening corresponds to a Caturpīṭha tantra text, specifically a section called the "Mantra Portion" of the Tantra King of the Four Seats exposition. The Sanskrit reconstruction is approximate, as the Tibetan phonetic transcription is irregular.

The term "neuter" (ma ning) throughout this passage is a technical tantric category referring to a class of being considered neither male nor female, used here in the context of seed-syllable generation and mantra practice. It should not be taken in a purely grammatical sense.

The term "bindu" (Tibetan bandu ka, here rendered as "bindu") is left in Sanskrit as it is a technical term from tantric physiology and mantra practice referring to the luminous drop or point of concentrated essence.

The passage as a whole is highly technical tantric instruction concerning seed-syllables, their colors, their placement, and their correspondences with the four activities of pacifying, enriching, magnetizing, and wrathful action. Much of the syntax is intentionally condensed and esoteric, and any complete interpretive rendering would require access to an authorized commentary. The translation follows the literal structure as closely as possible.

- The passage belongs to a tantric ritual-technical text describing the arrangement and application of seed-syllables, particularly the syllable Hūṃ and related mantra components, for the five types of ritual action: peaceful, enriching, magnetizing, wrathful or fierce, and destructive. Several terms are highly technical and their translation draws on standard Vajrayāna ritual categories rather than on unambiguous grammatical parsing alone.

The compound "ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" rendered as "the stout one and the neuter" refers to a phonological classification of Sanskrit syllables (heavy syllable and neuter or indeterminate syllable), a usage attested in Tibetan grammatical and tantric phonological literature.

"ལྷོ་" is a Tibetan grammatical term for the ra-vowel-sign or subscript ra, used in the placement of mantra letters; it is rendered descriptively as "ra-vowel-sign" throughout.

"ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་" rendered as "intoxication" carries the sense of a bewildering, stupefying, or fascination-inducing ritual action, one of the subsidiary wrathful rites; this is the most consistent rendering with the Tibetan ritual context.

- This passage is a highly technical tantric instruction on the arrangement, coloring, and application of seed-syllables and fire-offering letters for specific ritual actions, namely protection, enrichment, attraction, and wrathful practices including slaying and separation. The terminology is specialized and the syntax elliptical throughout; the translation follows the syntactic units as faithfully as possible while rendering them in readable English.

The term rendered "lung position" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is literally "rib" or "side," referring to a positional placement of a letter in the syllabic arrangement; this is a technical convention of Tibetan syllabic writing used in mantra composition.

The sequence "U, la, pa, li, ta" renders the syllables ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ as individual seed-syllable components rather than a single word, following the tantric reading convention.

The phrase "letter half-and-two" for ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ལྷོ་ is a standard tantric notation referring to a specific syllabic configuration; its precise referent would depend on the larger syllabary context of this tantra.

- The passage is a highly technical tantric syllabary text enumerating seed syllables for the elements, ritual functions, and deity classes, with instructions for mantra construction and rites. Several key interpretive choices follow.

"Repha" is the superscript vowel-carrier stroke used in Sanskrit syllabic notation; it is preserved as a technical term here, consistent with the preceding passage.

"Kunda" is a white-flowering jasmine, Jasminum sambac, used throughout Indo-Tibetan texts as a simile for whiteness; it is retained untranslated as a recognized botanical reference.

"The eighth subgroup" and related structural terms refer to the classification of Sanskrit letters into groups in tantric phonemic cosmology; these are preserved literally since no more specific identification is possible without a specific commentarial tradition.

The compound translated as "passing form" for the seed associated with gnosis-consciousness is uncertain; the Tibetan may intend a transitional or moving image, possibly referring to rūpa in an intermediate-state or illusory-body sense.

The line translated as "without a staff beforehand" is difficult; it may mean the practitioner performs the ritual without preliminary weapons or implements, or it may refer to a preliminary absence of a certain ritual instrument. The precise meaning is unclear without commentary.

The final couplet is syntactically incomplete as given; the passage appears to break off mid-sentence.

- The passage is a technical tantric sādhaṇa text describing ritual procedures involving mantra-seeds, maṇḍala diagrams, and materia medica for subjugation and other rites. Many of the substance names appear to be Indic loan-words or transliterations whose precise botanical or ritual identifications are uncertain; I have rendered them phonetically where a standard identification is not established. "Guggula" is a standard resin identified as bdellium or Commiphora mukul. "Civet" renders gi wang, a standard fragrant substance from the musk-civet. "Medā" and "dūrvā" are standard Āyurvedic and ritual plant names. The phrase "the hand of the lord of the senses — the giving hand" is obscure; it may refer to a specific ritual gesture or to a material ingredient whose name contains the word for "lord of senses," and a different reading is possible. The "drop" (thig le / bindu) throughout carries both the cosmological sense of the seed-syllable drop and the bodily sense of regenerative essence, as is standard in this genre.
- Several substance names in this passage are technical terms from Indic materia medica traditions and appear transliterated from Sanskrit. Where these cannot be identified with certainty from the Tibetan phonological rendering alone, they have been rendered as close transliterations. "Shudag" (ཤུདག་) may correspond to a specific plant name not definitively identifiable from context. "Son-rtsi" and "med" in the insect-poison section may be Tibetan plant or mineral names rather than Sanskrit borrowings. The passage's ritual context is an inner tantric rite involving harmful substances — the closing verse makes clear this is a restricted esoteric transmission and contextualizes the destructive rites within a framework where only those who harm the Three Jewels or the master would be affected.
- The compound rendered as "the seventh of seven" reflects a recurrent grid-based formulaic structure in this text, where preparations are assigned to specific cells of a ritual diagram; the literal sense is preserved.

The term translated as "wheel ceremony" reflects the ritual use of a chakra or circular diagram in the procedure.

"Madness-causing waters" is a literal rendering of a technical pharmacological expression in this genre of ritual-medical tantra; the five substances so designated are not individually named here.

"Māthāna" as the name of a syllable or mantra-syllable is a phonetic reconstruction from the Tibetan; it may correspond to a Sanskrit term not fully recoverable from context alone.

The final line, "in an instant the person is completely eliminated," is an unusually stark expression; in the tradition of subjugation rituals this can mean either literal harm or the destruction of an enemy's power — the text does not disambiguate.

- Several plant and substance names in this passage are highly compressed technical terms of uncertain identification. "Dantī" is a well-known Ayurvedic plant used in prior context and kept consistent. "Ku," "Ram," "Kami," "Cīte," "Sāyal," and "Mtsams" appear to be abbreviated Tibetan transliterations of Sanskrit medicinal or ritual substance names whose full Sanskrit forms are not recoverable with certainty from the Tibetan alone; they are rendered as-is to preserve accuracy rather than invent identifications.

The phrase rendered "human butter-fat" is a literal rendering of mi yi mar khu, which denotes a substance derived from human fat, consistent with tantric ritual pharmacopoeia.

The passage ending with "sloth, sleep, and desire, anger, delusion, torpor, and the like" breaks off mid-sentence, which reflects the Tibetan text as given; this is not a translation error.

- The three-line Sanskrit mantra in the Tibetan is a well-known purification formula ("All phenomena are pure in their inherent nature; I am pure in my inherent nature"), followed by yoga-purity and vajra-purity variants. The rendering keeps the Sanskrit as it appears in the ritual tradition.

The phrase rendered "vowel and consonant series" refers to the standard tantric pairing of the āli series (the vowels, a ā i ī u ū etc.) and kāli series (the consonants), used in seed-syllable meditation and fire-offering contexts.

The final line breaks off mid-enumeration in the Tibetan source itself, ending at the third animal in what is evidently a list of four animal-headed or animal-form ḍākinī attendants; the translation reflects this incompleteness faithfully.

- The phrase "ten thousand" for འུགས་ཀྱི་མཚན་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ renders the standard numeral (one unit of ten thousand), referring to the number of fire-offering oblations.

The passage "འུགས་ཀྱི་མཚན་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་ལྔ་" is genuinely difficult; "the twelve moments of time" is a provisional rendering for what may refer to a technical Vajrayāna enumeration of twelve temporal stations or aspects of mind. The exact referent is uncertain without a commentary.

The final line is fragmentary as given and the translation trails off accordingly; the Tibetan itself appears to be mid-sentence at the passage's end.

- The passage contains a series of numbered "marks" or signs of purity, running from first through eighth, interspersed with prescriptions for practice. The Tibetan term rendered "the hero of pure intrinsic nature" reflects the tantric sense of a vīra-type practitioner. The phrase "having abandoned the yogin" is syntactically unusual and may indicate a non-dual dissolution of the practitioner's ordinary identity. The lines "this distinguishes suchness from suchness" render a deliberately paradoxical formulation in the original. The final incomplete verse ending with "the equal light of the blazing garland" trails off at the passage boundary and has been rendered accordingly. The "three unstained substances" likely refers to three ritually pure substances used in tantric practice, whose precise identity may vary by tradition.

- The syllables JA JA JA JA, HA HA HA HA, BA BA BA BA, A A A A are ritual vocables from the song of accomplishment, followed by what reads as a liturgical verse. The phrase rendered "Māgupa" corresponds to a name or epithet in the original Tibetan that is not a standard Sanskrit Buddhist term; it may be a tantric deity name, a corruption, or a secret name specific to this lineage, and its precise identity is uncertain.

The phrase translated "the third letter of the third group" refers to the practice of identifying a specific syllable within the āli vowel series by counting groups and positions — a standard tantric syllable-selection method — but the precise syllable intended depends on the enumeration system used by this text's tradition.

The line "holds the nature of the moon in milk" renders a compound suggesting the moon-disc's essence as white as milk; the construction is somewhat compressed in the Tibetan.

- The chapter colophon "Here ends the chapter on the perfect union of wisdom and vajra" translates a section-closing formula in the Tibetan and marks the end of the preceding unit, consistent with the preceding passage's content about vajra and wisdom union.

"Dbyig pa Vajra" renders the Tibetan personal name dbyig pa rdo rje, likely a form of the Sanskrit Daṇḍavajra or a related epithet; it is retained as a proper name since no standard Sanskrit equivalent is certain.

"Kunda flower" is a white jasmine (Jasminum multiflorum), retained here as a color descriptor for the brilliant whiteness of the visualization.

- The text contains several metrically compressed tantric instruction sequences interspersed with seed-syllable mantras whose precise referents depend on the specific lineage commentary. The five seeds oṃ jaṃ ghraṃ trāṃ hūṃ correspond to a standard Vajrayāna assignment of syllables to bodily functions and stages of consumption; the translation follows this functional sequence as given in the verse without interpolating a specific scholastic system.

The term māgadhi (rendered from "ma gdha ni srang gnyis") in the closing instruction is a medicinal herb measure known in Indo-Tibetan pharmacological contexts; "two seers' weights" renders "srang gnyis," a standard weight unit. Genuine uncertainty exists regarding whether "rohita" (ro hi ta) in the penultimate stanza refers to the reddish dawn light, a specific astrological moment, or a plant ingredient; the translation renders it as "first red dawn," which fits the temporal instruction context most naturally.

- The passage draws on the vocabulary of an inner-tantric sādhana. The phrase rendered "the Mother who rises from the dead" translates a term literally meaning "zombie-mother" or "vetāla-mother," a specific tantric visualization figure; the rendering is chosen to convey this to a general listener without interrupting the verse flow.

The expression "vowels and consonants" renders ā li kā li, the standard Indic mnemonic pair for the Sanskrit vowel and consonant series, used in tantric seed-syllable meditation.

"Sky-vajra" is a compound name for a specific visualization deity or mind-essence; the exact referent depends on the larger tantra from which this passage derives.

The phrase "the fourth seat" and "third of the seats of practice" refer to pīṭha classifications in the tantric geography of sacred sites; their precise identification would require the root tantra.

- The passage is a tantric text of the inner yogic tradition, likely from a cycle related to the Hevajra or Cakrasaṃvara corpus. Several points merit brief notice.

The term āli throughout denotes the series of Sanskrit vowels used as seed-syllables in tantric practice; it is a technical term with no fully transparent English equivalent and has been kept as āli.

The seed-syllables ha, ho, hrīḥ, oṃ, and a are left in their Sanskrit forms as they function as bīja-mantras identifying specific buddhas or deities; Vairocana is glossed from the Tibetan rnam par snang mdzad and Vajrapāṇi from phyag na rdo rje per the house glossary.

The phrase rendered "the deity is Vairocana, sovereign lord" reads literally "Vairocana, the sovereign deity," with mnga' bdag functioning as a royal epithet meaning lord or sovereign.

The final half-verse is syntactically incomplete in the source and trails off, which is preserved in the translation as a deliberate open ending indicating the passage continues beyond this excerpt.

- The mantra syllables Oṃ ha ho hrīḥ a, Oṃ hi li hi li hūṃ phaṭ, and Oṃ amṛtakuṇḍali ha ho hrīḥ a svāhā are rendered phonetically as they stand; they are ritual mantras and not translatable as lexical Tibetan.

The term "the maddening serpent" (འགྲོ་བཞིའི་སྲེག་པ་ལྷ་མོ་) likely refers to a specific plant or ingredient known in Tantric medical-ritual tradition by this name, not a literal serpent; the exact identification is uncertain.

The phrase "the five she possesses" lists five characteristic features of the goddess: water-mixture, the cuckoo's call, coquetry, and dance together count as the elements of the list; the precise delineation of the five within the verse is compressed and the exact enumeration is not fully transparent from the text alone.

- The passage contains a highly technical set of ritual instructions that blend pharmacological compounding, iconometric proportioning, and tantric ritual procedure. The iconometric section in particular follows a system of proportional measurement for drawing or painting a deity image. The term rendered as "Brahmā lines" follows from "བླ་མ་གྱི་རྒྱ་ཁྲི།," which appears to refer to a specific iconometric grid system known from later Tibetan art-treatises; the exact technical import of "rod" here is uncertain and may refer to a unit of measure. The phrase "སྤྱད་པའི་རྒྱ་ཁྲི་ལྟར་བོད་པ་བྲི་བཤིང་།" rendered as "apply the characteristic lines" refers to the grid-line system used in Tibetan thangka painting for proportional layout. The section on the "three bodies" mixed with ash likely refers to three bodily fluids or ritual substances rather than the trikāya in a doctrinal sense; this is a feature of tantric substance-compounding terminology. The "Fourth Seat" tantra reference situates this text within a cycle of four piṭha tantras, a classification system in the higher tantras.

- The closing line preserves the Sanskrit seed-syllable invocation as it appears in the Tibetan: "Namas samantabuddhānāṃ. Saṃbodhi. Viśuddha." These are not translated but rendered as they stand, as they function as a mantra-formula or colophon invocation.

The term tāla (Tibetan: ཐོལ་ལྷོ) is a standard iconometric unit of measurement used in Indo-Tibetan painting traditions, corresponding to the length of the face. The twelve-tāla system governs the proportions of divine images. This is retained untranslated throughout as a technical art term.

The phrase rendered as "the fifth family" refers to the fifth buddha family in the standard Vajrayāna fivefold maṇḍala schema, the family whose deity is assigned to the uppermost portion of the image in this proportional scheme.

- The opening dhāraṇī syllables "sarva-bhigahare naṃ" are phonetically transcribed Sanskrit of uncertain exact reconstruction; "bhigahare" may represent an Indic term not straightforwardly legible from the Tibetan alone.

The phrase rendered "sister of Lūṇan" (𐎵𐎠𐎺𐎡𐏁𐎧𐎫𐎶𐎥𐎢𐎽) literally means "sister of the Ugly Body" or "sister of the Evil Body," which may be an epithet for a specific yakṣinī or underworld deity rather than a proper name; the translation preserves it descriptively.

"Karāgavatī" is a reconstruction of कण्ठकण्ठक, literally "one who has a girdle or cord," and the Sanskrit equivalent is tentative.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, indicating this is a continuous excerpt.

- The mantra syllables throughout are rendered phonetically as they appear in the Tibetan, following standard tantric practice; their precise Sanskrit normalization may vary across transmission lineages.

The term rendered as "civet" (gi wang, Skt. gorochana) is a ritual substance, yellow cow-bile bezoar, used in tantric contexts. It appears paired with "white" likely referring to white mustard seed, a common pairing in ritual mudrā descriptions.

The count "one hundred and forty million" (bye ba bcu bzhi, literally "fourteen ten-millions") follows the standard Tibetan enumeration and refers to a vast retinue assembly in the visualization.

Cāmuṇḍī is a fierce goddess-form; the Tibetan tsa mu ṇḍi is a direct phonetic rendering of the Sanskrit name.

- The mantra syllables "Om ta hūṃ ma tha ma tha duṣṭāna ghātaya hūṃ phaṭ svāhā" and "Om vīrti nāma mahākrodha hūṃ phaṭ" and "Om krodhani hūṃ a" are rendered phonetically as they appear in the Tibetan transliteration, without normalization, as is standard for ritual mantra passages in this genre.

The term translated as "yantra" for རྩམ་པ་ལྷ་མོ་ is literally "machine" or "mechanism" but in this tantric ritual context consistently denotes a drawn or constructed ritual diagram, for which "yantra" is the standard Sanskrit equivalent.

The phrase rendered "uninspected flesh" for རྩམ་པ་ལྷ་མོ་ refers to meat not ritually examined beforehand — a technical term in tantric ritual prescription indicating spontaneously obtained or unchecked offering substances.

- The phrase rendered "the chief limb of pride" translates nga rgyal yan lag gtso bo, which in its tantric context refers to divine pride, the meditative identification with the deity as one's principal practice limb, rather than ordinary arrogance. This is a standard Vajrayāna technical usage.

The "ninefold conduct" renders spyod pa spyod dgur, literally "practicing the nine conducts," a classification of behavioral modes found in tantric manuals; the precise enumeration is not spelled out here.

The "cord of the tail" and its praise for sweeping ants is a reference to the fly-whisk or tail-tuft traditionally carried by ascetics, here listed among the permitted implements of the wandering practitioner.

- The mantra passage "Om amuka samayo hūṃ samaya..." is a samaya (commitment/pledge) mantra formula. The term "amuka" is a Sanskrit placeholder meaning "so-and-so" or "such a one," used in ritual contexts where a specific name would be inserted. The string "hūṃ nanibatadaṃ" toward the end is difficult to parse precisely from the Tibetan transliteration and may be corrupt; it is rendered phonetically as it stands.

The final line of the passage is syntactically incomplete, ending mid-construction, indicating the text continues in the next passage.

- The passage contains a wrathful subjugation rite that includes what appears to be a hostile ritual against a king and those who harm the Three Jewels. The transliterated mantra Hrīḥ amoghasi sidaha daha gr̥hṇa hūṃ hrīḥ phaṭ is rendered phonetically from the Tibetan since it represents a dhāraṇī seed-syllable sequence; the Sanskrit reconstruction is approximate. The term maruṭa rendered as "maruṭa" is a plant substance; the Tibetan ma ru tse typically refers to Marrubium vulgare or a similar bitter herb used in ritual preparations. The phrase rendered "the mind of the great mind" for sems chen po yi sems is somewhat elliptical; it may refer to the bodhicitta or the mind of a great being, and the context of gathering old cloth as a garment suggests a cremation-ground or charnel-ground ascetic practice.

- The term "bhaga" appears repeatedly in this passage. It is a Sanskrit term referring to the female genitalia, used here in the context of subjugation rites targeting a woman. The text presents this within a ritual-magical framework typical of certain Vajrayāna dhāraṇī and tantra literature. The term is left untranslated as it is a technical ritual designation throughout this genre.

The phrase rendered "rite of perfect union" translates "rab sbyor snying po," which could also be read as "the heart essence of the praxis of conjunction." The reading adopted fits the tantra-ritual context.

The "dark fortnight" refers to the waning half of the lunar month, a standard timing designation in Indian ritual literature for fierce or subjugating rites.

- The phrase rendered "treatises on music and song" translates rolmo bstan bcos sogs glu, which may refer to a specific tantric text genre associated with melody and instruction; the exact referent is unclear from context alone. The section on āli-kāli refers to the standard tantric system of vowels and consonants used as seed syllables in visualization practice. The passage as a whole is a dense philosophical and meditative instruction combining Madhyamaka language about non-duality with tantric visualization practice; individual verses sometimes shift register abruptly, and the translation follows the text closely even where English idiom becomes strained.
- The long mantra passage is in Indic (Sanskrit-derived) syllables transliterated into Tibetan and is reproduced phonetically as closely as the script permits; its Sanskrit original is fragmentary and likely corrupt in transmission, so the reconstruction above reflects best phonetic rendering rather than a critical Sanskrit edition.

The phrase rendered "vowel family" for ཨ་ལི་ཨོ་ཨུ་ཨྱ་ refers to the standard Vajrayāna classification of Sanskrit vowels as the ā-li series, as distinct from the ka-li consonant series; this is a technical tantric term for the vowel seed-syllables.

The colophon names Gayadhara, a well-known eleventh-century Bengali paṇḍita who worked extensively in Tibet, and Gö Khukpa Lhetsé, his Tibetan collaborator; these are standard historical identifications.
