

The Glorious King of Tantras Called the Explanation of the Four Seats

Śrī Caturvīṭhābhikhyā Tantra Rāja Nāma · Toh 430 · Derge Kangyur

དཔལ་གདན་བཞུགས་པའི་རིམ་པར་བཤད་པའི་རྩ་ཀླུ་པ་ཞེས་བ་བྱ

Toh 430 in the Kangyur is a tantric scripture known in English as The Glorious King of Tantras Called the Explanation of the Four Seats, in Sanskrit as the Śrī Caturvīṭhābhikhyā Tantra Rāja, and in Tibetan as the Dpal gdan bzhi pa'i rnam par bshad pa'i rgyud kyi rgyal po. It belongs to the class of Yoginī or Highest Yoga Tantras and centers on teachings delivered by an omniscient buddha figure — identified with the Yogi of Space and associated with Vajrayoga and the Vajrayoginīs — in response to questions posed by Vajrapāṇi among a vast assembly of yoga lords. The text opens with homages to key figures of the Vajrayāna pantheon, including Avalokiteśvara and Vajrasattva, before presenting the tantra's doctrinal and ritual content concerning the "four seats," a framework of sacred bodily or geographical locations that plays an important role in certain tantric systems. As Toh 430 in the Kangyur, it is preserved among the canonical scriptures of Tibetan Buddhism and represents the type of esoteric tantra concerned with advanced yogic practice, subtle-body teachings, and the transformative methods associated with the Vajrayoginī cycle.

In the language of India: Śrī Caturvīṭhābhikhyā Tantra Rāja Nāma. In the language of Tibet: The Glorious King of Tantras Called the Explanation of the Four Seats.

I bow with reverence to the Blessed One, the Yogi of Space, to Vajrayoga, and to all the assemblies of Vajrayoginīs — equal in number to the grains of sand of the Ganges River.

I bow with reverence to the great bodhisattva, endowed with great compassion, the noble Avalokiteśvara, Lord of Vision.

I bow to the glorious Vajrasattva.

The sovereign of yoga,
likewise the supreme among yogis,
the lord of gnosis of the sages,
the supreme bliss-web of the yoginīs —
dwelling in the pure abode,
the omniscient one spoke thus.

From among eighty million lords of yoga, Vajrapāṇi pressed his palms together and addressed the Blessed One in these words:

The particular union of the secret,
how I myself am the deity in that reality,
what water is and what fire is,
how the sky is supremely beautiful,
how gnosis is to be sought —
I wish to hear the lord of gnosis.
The defining marks of liberation from saṃsāra:
hear them, O glorious Vajradhara.

First is the defining mark of empowerment,
second is the single syllable,
third is the eightfold seed,
fourth is the deity of the channel itself.

The fire of gnosis of one's own body —
so it is to be known by the intelligent yogi.
In the fire-pit of the belly's fire,
into that fire the burnt offering is to be made.
Above, below, and in the middle,
the channel of consciousness is to be contemplated.
At the very beginning, within one's own belly,
the deity of the channel is to be fully visualized.
When the fire of the belly blazes forth,
the particular colors to be visualized are as follows:
the fire of the navel is white;
the fire on the left is likewise yellow;
the south bears the name of blue;
the remainder is to be purified as red;
the center there is renowned
as the color sky-blue, as the smoke of fire.

In the midst of the fire is a lotus,
adorned by the disk of the sun.
In its center is the deity of gnosis,
who liberates from all of saṃsāra —
seated on a throne of the union of two hands, beautifully adorned with vajra and bell.

In the right hand a vajra,
with ornaments reaching to the crown of the head, laughing and wrathful, proclaiming Hūṃ —
this is the deity renowned as the sovereign lord of gnosis.

In its center:
to the east, the goddess Tārā;
to the north, likewise White-Robed Lady (Pāṇḍaravāsīnī);
to the west, the goddess Māmakī;
and Buddhhalocanā is in the south.

The form is only a thumb's measure in size — oneself is the very deity of deities.
On the tongue the lips are to be joined.
Space is for the ears and the nose.
For the eyes, this earth is consciousness;
likewise for Brahmā, blazing fire;
at the throat is the element of delusion;
at the heart dwells the element of movement.
All afflictions are at the chest,
and the two limbs root at the navel.
Arranged in eight members,
this itself is to be known as the deity.

From the channel of consciousness thus drawn forth,
likewise the nine nectars:
from the channel of the two upper fangs,
all flow down like dissolving salt.
Accordingly, water bears the name of milk.
Resting upon the surface of the tongue,
with the blazing solar drop,
it is like a wheel ground to dust.

Above, space into space
dissolves into the nature of burning.
The left breath is the feminine,
the right is likewise the masculine.
The lower and upper are the channels of this;
the lower is renowned as what comes first.

With breath and fragrance evenly drawn forth,
upon the five of the full expansion,
draw from the root of the two consciousnesses,
and into that nectar it fully dissolves.
Upon that sovereign lord of gnosis,
that one is to be bathed with nectar.
Having thus swallowed everything throughout,
meditate with the breath unmoving.

In the palm, meditate on the moon and the sun.
Through the gnosis syllable, that is the centre.
By the mudrā of the deer's head,
the five elements are themselves burned up as oblation.

Previously, having made the seed syllable Hūṃ,
likewise the second; and with the third,
by patience it is consumed.
Likewise not-breath is the fourth,
and by the fifth, the innate seed syllable —
the wise one performs the fire-offering of the five elements.
My own suchness into that fire:
oneself is burned by the union of burning.
Just as that fire of gnosis is famed as the very identity of burning — the chapter called "The Practice of the Fire Offering" is hereby completed.

By virtue possessed of the identity of emptiness,
through the utter destruction of the net of birth,
one who does not abide in saṃsāra —
to the Blessed One I wish to listen.

The suchness of emptiness by its intrinsic nature —
hear this, O King Vajradhara.
Meditate throughout on the other continents, and likewise Mount Meru,
and the earth, spread into space.
The ocean has the shape of water,
adorned with the arising of a beautiful lotus.
With the characteristic of emptiness as the preliminary,
meditate on the identity of fire.

In the east is the goddess Tārā;
likewise in the north is White-Robed One.
Māmakī is in the western direction;
in the south is the goddess Buddhalocanā.

Water dissolves into Tārā altogether.
Fire dissolves into White-Robed One.
Māmakī from the west dissolves into earth.
Wind dissolves into Buddhalocanā.

This water-born flower, this lotus —
it is the throne of egg-born gnosis.
The gnosis queen sovereign of that,
she who opens below the egg-born,
has the form of a formless coil —
she dissolves into the king of gnosis.

Thus the self-identity of emptiness, suchness itself, suchness of emptiness —
free from fear, free from harm, meditate on entity by means of entity.

Having thus meditated on that emptiness,
cleanse the body's impurities thoroughly.
Then meditate in the form of water —
red, with eight petals,
adorned at the centre by a lotus,
with stamens and a hub —
on the eight petals, adorned
by the eight seed syllables of the goddesses.

In the east is what is called Sikā,
in the north, the seed syllable of patience likewise.
In the west, it is said, the seed syllable of wind;
in the south, the lord of Hūṃ.

In the region of lordship, the vowel of the sense powers;
in the direction of fire, sound and consciousness.
The eighth vowel letter is without truth,
and the fifth vowel letter belongs to wind.

In the centre, this king of gnosis —
the egg-born gnosis lord, encircled by a solar maṇḍala —
blazes as the seed syllable of nectar.

This fire of the seventh hue
is to be meditated upon with supreme excellence.
The bodhisattva whose breath is unmoving,
having meditated on entity by means of entity,
then makes the channels themselves the divine throne.

From the eye, the seed syllable of Yi;
space belongs to nose and ear.
On the tongue, this seed syllable of nectar;
at the heart, what is named Hūṃ.
By the seed syllable that holds the six limbs,
the body of the yogin is fully protected.

Having known this body of gnosis —
why then is there the name of a common person?
Gnosis without form, yet possessed of form;
without colour, yet fully manifest as colour;
without abiding, yet possessed of the form of abiding;
without caste, yet suchness is reason itself.

The chapter on emptiness, the second, is hereby completed.

I wish to listen to the Blessed One regarding the distinctions of the five self-identities.
Hear this, O King Vajradhara.

Relying on duality and non-duality,
one hundred excellent aeons ago,
dwelling entirely in a pure abode —
on Mount Meru, the goddess Buddhalocanā; Māmakī abides in the southern direction;
the goddess Tārā is on the western continent;
likewise in the north is White-Robed One;
in the east is this goddess called the Pleasant One.
These are the abodes of the five goddesses.

Thus the heart is Mount Meru,
and likewise the head is Māmakī.

Tārā is the abode of the south,
and likewise to the left is White-Robed One;
this Pleasant One is my own abode.
May the five goddesses bestow their blessing.

In the center of the lotus is the vajra,
and in the center of the vajra is the lotus.
The vajra-nectar pervades everything,
encircling the entire body throughout.

At the very root of the eight limbs,
the waters of nectar fully permeate.
The abode of the deity is space itself —
know this perfectly as the seed of the vajra.

This, cultivated as the self-identity of the body,
is renowned as the vajra-channel.
The blood of that body
dwells together with the body as one.

Through the union of blood and vital fluid,
it flows from the eight limbs for the wise.
Just as I contemplate the five seeds,
so too must one cultivate the lotus.

Just as this body of mine is that which the space-vajra pervades —
feet entwining feet,
lips pressing lips,
the hands of both forming a mudrā —
contemplate the three-pointed vajra.

By nature, through the cultivation of teeth, firmness, and the consciousness of the heart,
this body bearing the form of wisdom's king —
when the practitioner utters Hūṃ with wrathful force —
thus this vajra-lotus
is to be moved through the gathered yoga.
With the delight and satisfaction of both,

all the deities are to be honored.

From the arising out of blood and vital fluid,
the seed-sprout goes forth to beings;
the bodies of the gods arise perfectly.
Yet it is not for the sake of desire and pleasure alone,
nor should one remain there for the sake of enjoyment.
It is for the sake of sentient beings and out of desire that one abides in the union of non-duality, offering the torma as a preliminary —
the perfectly complete, delightful body.

The third chapter, called The Chapter on Union, is hereby completed.

Hear this, O King Vajradhara.
As for the very distinctions of the ten realities,
one should prefix the ten syllables
and understand them as the five self-identities.

The fifth — the self-identity of the five —
is the five that fully protect the body.
What are the ten syllables?
How are they to be applied to the self-identity?
How does one purify and cultivate?
What are the seed-sprouts?
And how does one abide in liberation?
I wish to hear from the wondrous deity.

The Secret Secret — hear this, O King, exactly as it is.

First, in that which is empty — suchness itself —
one is to conceive of water as empty.
The lotus of seven colors,
lovely with its anthers,
with a spread of about one hundred thousand,
its form as the lotus abides with its inner essence.
The lotus, vast and supremely beautiful,
is adorned with the seven precious substances.
Garlands of hanging bell-nets,
silks and garments hang visibly.
Visualize the lion throne,

and above it the solar disc.

This very nature of the lotus-vajra —
with rays of ten million suns,
through the seeds of the five buddhas —
clearly visualize the vajra-tip.

In the center, Vairocana in bliss;
in the east, likewise Akṣobhya;
the jewel-seed in the south;
likewise in the west, Amitābha;
in the north, Amoghasiddhi.
Clearly cultivate the five seeds.

The lotus of awakening with its eight limbs —
examine it precisely on the ground.
In the center, into the egg of the inner essence,
the self-identity of consciousness dissolves.
At the tip of the eighth lotus,
the sovereign lord, Vairocana likewise.
In the east, the goddess Tārā;
in the north, the goddess Buddhalocanā;
in the west, contemplate White-Robed One;
likewise in the south, Māmākī.

With blazing rays in manifold forms,
one should cultivate this fearlessly.
From the vajra, the body of the deity
is to be conceived as dwelling there.
Three eyes, six hands,
supremely beautiful and deep blue in color,
wearing a vajra crown,
bound with silk and with streamers flowing.
Fierce, wrathful, and alluring,
seated in the heroic cross-legged posture.

On the upper right hand, a brandished sword;
on the second, likewise a bow;
on the third, a vajra held aloft and poised.
On the upper left hand, a khaṭvāṅga;

with the second, squeezing the goddess's breast;
with the third, sounding the ringing of a bell.
Clothed in supremely beautiful garments,
wearing a skirt of tiger's skin,
adorned with all ornaments complete,
and excellently decorated with garlands of flowers.

To the left, the goddess Tārā:
with one hand she embraces,
and in the other hand she holds a vessel
fully filled with the water of ambrosia.

Māmakī likewise:
with one hand she clearly embraces,
and in her other hand, in a skull cup,
is what is filled with blood and flesh.

Behind, contemplate Paṇḍaravāsinī in every direction.
Her hand is adorned with a rosary,
and her second hand scatters offerings;
facing forward, she gazes into the vessel.

Thus the five-natured body
abides completely throughout the body.
In the east, the goddess of flowers;
in the south, she who is endowed with incense;
in the west, she of the lamp-bearing hands;
in the north, the goddess of perfume.
In the powerful direction, the coquette herself;
likewise in the direction of fire, the garland-bearer;
in the direction of the void, Vāsinī;
and in the direction of wind, the eighth, the dancer.

With the hue of rays of light in manifold forms,
like hundreds of thousands of millions of suns,
radiating like clouds of buddhas,
most earnestly striving to liberate sentient beings.

As for oneself as the deity and other deities, oneself as the deity is supreme.
Since one cannot be rendered in physical form,

one should meditate upon a reflected image and so forth.
Afterward, directly before it,
the skilled one should make offerings.
That very lotus is to be contemplated,
and that very celestial palace is to be contemplated.
Upon the seat described previously,
one covers it with the sun disc.
Various jewel offerings,
and various silks are to be spread out.
Joining the two palms together,
opening them in the manner of a lotus:
Om kamala udbhave śrī svāhā.
This is the mantra and mudrā of the lotus.

Drawing it forth upon one's own breath,
one vividly contemplates it before the vajra.
Holding both hands in fists,
one coils the left little finger around the index finger —
this is the form of the iron hook.
Om vajra aṃkuśa jaḥ.
This is the mantra and mudrā of the vajra iron hook.

Making both hands into vajra fists,
with both index fingers coiled —
this is the form of the lasso.
Om vajra pāśa hūṃ.
This is the mantra and mudrā of the lasso.

Just as one is oneself like a reflected image,
so too should one vividly contemplate the same before oneself.
The eight goddesses being entirely complete,
this is the fourth: the kings of the wrathful ones.

In the east, Yamāntaka himself;
in the south, likewise the obstacle-slayer;
in the west, the Lotus-Terminator;
in the north, the Wrathful Protector.

Both hands are bound in vajra fists
and are to be joined back to back.

Oṃ vajra sphoṭa bhaṃ.

This is the mantra and mudrā of the vajra iron chain.

Both hands are held in vajra fists
and both little fingers are to be joined.

Oṃ vajra ghaṇṭe hoḥ.

This is the mantra and mudrā of the vajra bell.

From the mudrā of the iron chain,
extending the middle fingers outward:

Namo ratnatrayāya. Oṃ vairocana samādhi viśvaye ghuyapaja bhiṣai svāhā.

Oṃ hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ. Ho ho ho ho ho ho. Hrī hrī hrī hrī svāhā.

This is the mantra and mudrā of the Blessed One, the yoga of space.

Oṃ tāre tuttāre sa takṣitā hūṃ svāhā.

This is the mantra of the goddess Tārā.

Oṃ hili hili bali svāhā.

This is the mantra of the White-Robed One.

Oṃ tara sarva tana hūṃ phaṭ.

This is the mantra of Māmākī.

Oṃ buddha vibuddhaya hūṃ.

This is the mantra of Buddhalocanā.

The two index fingers and the middle fingers
are to be joined center to center,
and placed touching on the sides of the thumbs —
this is the mudrā of the four goddesses.

The hermaphrodite's four syllables
pertain to the flower goddess and the rest.

This itself is the mantra of the Alluring One. Standing with the right leg extended in the proper stance, one places the index finger at the heart, then extends the forearm forward, and combines this with the appearance of a bell and the syllable Hūṃ together — this is the mudrā of the wrathful one.

Oṃ āyuhpāla pratīrakṣa dukṣa bandhaya hūṃ phaṭ.

This is the pacifying one at the eastern gate.

Oṃ ākarṣaya sattvadhātunāṃ kro svāhā.

This is the enriching one at the northern gate.

Oṃ mohaya mohaya sarvasattvānāṃ śrī svāhā.
This is the magnetizing one at the western gate.

Oṃ śakṣa sarvaduṣṭa kṣātaya hrī phaṭ.
This is the wrathful activity at the southern gate.

Oṃ suganadha hūṃ haṃ svāhā.
The right hand extended — this is the mudrā of the incense.

Oṃ susobhid puṣpebhyaḥ svāhā.
The index finger and thumb joined — this is the mantra and mudrā of the flower.

Oṃ dhūpamālakula svāhā.
The middle finger raised upright — this is the mantra and mudrā of the incense offering.

Oṃ tīkṣṇadīpe pratigṛhṇa svāhā.
The fist clenched with the thumb raised — this is the mantra and mudrā of the lamp.

Oṃ kuru kuru vijaya svāhā.
Both hands extended and joined in the center — this is the mantra and mudrā of the torma.

As taught by the way they are combined,
the wise one is to make offerings.
With the appearance of the song of Hūṃ,
all buddhas are to be delighted.

With both hands formed into vajra fists,
held at the sides of the waist,
one plays in the manner of a lute,
and blows in the manner of a flute,
and sounds in the manner of a pleasant cymbal,
and strikes in the manner of a drum,
and moves in the manner of a dance,
and fans in the manner of a fan,
and raises in the manner of a victory banner,
and sprinkles in the manner of a ladle,
and waves in the manner of a pennant,
and purifies in the manner of an umbrella,
and jingles in the manner of ankle bells,

and beats in the manner of a hand drum,
and smiles in the manner of laughter,
and moves the limbs in the wrathful posture.

Thus the yogin, in just this way,
performs the distinctive offering of song.
Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ.

Having meditated on the yoga of selflessness,
one holds the seed of emanation.
This reveals the general yoga.

The great offering of the supreme sense faculty,
the great place of great liberation,
secret and the secret of suchness —
the lord of secrets, great bliss —
to Vairocana I bow and pay homage.

From the five channels of the body,
gods and asuras are directly emanated.
Called "the accomplishment of bliss,"
to the body of union I bow and pay homage.

Having made close offerings with song and praise,
just as one delights in the activity,
one recites upon the rosary
with the syllables of one's own mantra.
Having made offerings to the best of one's ability,
one again requests the departure.

Filling one's own body with breath,
one is to conceive that all dissolves together.
Just as the yoga is the very nature of space,
so Vairocana is oneself.
Just as the deity Vairocana
is so, just so is the channel of the back.
Just as from the channel at the front,
so arises this gnosis.

Water is explained as Tārā.
Fire is truly endowed with the White-Robed One.

Wind is the goddess buddha — likewise the supremely beautiful Māmakī.

The white channel is that of water,

and smoke is the station of fire.

This conch channel is that of wind.

Likewise the lotus

and the channel that draws forth gnosis —

the distinctive identity of the five cannot be heard by the four thrones.

What is taught here is the brief summary.

This concludes the fourth chapter, called the Chapter on the Yoga of Reflected Images.

How is the vajra water? How does the nectar water arise? What is its distinction, and how is it tasted? How does one seek it and what manner does one seek it in? What need is there for this? I humbly request to hear this from the wondrous god.

Hear this, O King, O Vajradhara —

Having abandoned duality and non-duality, secret and supremely concealed —

the very suchness that is the fruit for all beings,

through ten trillion aeons,

urged on by the wisdom of buddhas,

is the path of buddhas that is seen.

The illuminations of wisdom are those seven themselves.

Just as fire burns in perfect equanimity, demonstrating that manner of activity; just as the sun teaches the manner of perceiving in perfect equanimity; just as the wind receives in perfect equanimity — so too the yogin who gathers the ocean of conceptuality and delusion:

The lord of lotuses, his body the color of gold,

the essential nature of fragrant water, supremely luminous, and the taste — Vajradhara, lord of vajras with the vajra hand:

one must come to know the rite of these three deities.

With the syllable HA, color is seized.

With the syllable HO, one becomes stainless.

With the syllable HRĪḤ, the hero is vanquished.

These should be understood in sequence.

Always meditate on the lotus throne in equanimity.

With thumb, vajra finger, and both remaining fingers fully present, with the three mantras and three syllables, maintain and guard the rite.
Whoever tastes this taste is the wise yoginī.

Now hear the distinction of the vajra water,
O Blessed Vajradhara (Vajradhara — the Vajra-Holder, a form of Vajrapāṇi in union):

The water of the body, which flows as a drip,
is consecrated by the fivefold selfhood.
The warm nature is to be seen as fire,
the peaceful is to be thoroughly examined as water,
the wind is wind, and wind is smoke,
and earth appears as form.

Whoever tastes that very suchness —
a defiled body becomes stainless.
O noble joyful yogin, Ratnasundara,
of Vajrabhairava who has been purified through training:
pure and impure are equally substance —
this is the defining characteristic of the first yoga.

Affliction — that darkness itself —
appears alongside consciousness.
Having struck it with the vajra of wisdom,
it appears to the yogin in that.

One who desires to rely upon the nectar, embodied,
should join in non-dual union.

The great practitioner of mahāyoga
should first contemplate ālī and kālī.
What is called ālī is declared to be the male bees.
Kālī itself is the Tathāgatī.
By the sound of wisdom in union,
both are to be contemplated as embracing.

Just as holding the third syllable
of the third group of letters,

with merely a vajra enclosure,
one should encircle Amitābha.
The third goddess herself,
with merely a staff, holds the vajra.
In the center, with the lasso of sacred commitment,
one should strive supremely at the head of the kunda flower.

Thus the mantra-reciting yogin
is stirred by the lotus vajra bearer.
Naturally, with a hissing sound,
mixed with the nectar water —
tasting that very suchness here,
the yogin is abundantly auspicious in the Dharma.
The Dharma of truth is supremely true.
The Dharma of the yogin is thoroughly praised.

Yet with a mind of inferior conceptuality,
how will the union be accomplished?

The eighty million yoginīs
of this very tantra of the fourth throne —
a learned one should examine it with discernment.
With the eighty yoginīs of union,
one offers the tormā cake through the Dharma of union.

This concludes the fifth chapter, called the Brief Summary of the Five Nectars.

Now, the doubt concerning the breath of the elements — one should ask the fully awakened buddha directly. How does one seek the signs of death, and having come to know them, how does one engage with the practice? The Blessed One declared:

For the benefit of embodied beings and sentient beings throughout all destinies, the complete deception of the lord of death — hear this, O King, O Vajra-Self.

Whoever, through mere consciousness,
dwells in the body of the lord of death —
first, at the time of the early morning,
the manner in which the breath is distributed is explained.

That an embodied being dies within six months:
this is taught with certainty, beyond all doubt.

If the time has come,
the breath will be cut and will cease.
Likewise, when one sees a slight fright,
the joints of the jaw will tremble.
Having recognized the signs of the body,
the yogin should bring it to peace.

If the inner cavity of the ear is severed,
one will not last beyond five hours.

If the vessel-vein of the eye is severed, likewise five days.
If the nasal channel is cut, seven days is certain beyond doubt.
If the upper and lower teeth lock together, three days without question.
If the tongue bears a black streak, in two days the embodied one will die.
If the outer vein of the throat and lungs fails, one will not last beyond half a month.
If the lower joint beneath the chest collapses, a physician may attempt a cure within half a month.
If there is no blood under the fingernails, one will not last beyond five hours.

These are the death omens of the eight messengers — setting aside death-wounds and the like.

The essential nature of the sound arising in the ear: attend to it through the distinction of yoga.

If the vessel of the eye's sphere is severed, the wise one should recite the seed-syllable of Ghaṇṭā.

At the nasal channel, restrain the breath — it is the smoke-channel of the human being.

At the vein of the locked teeth, wrest it away by reciting the conch-bone syllable.

Upon the black streak of the tongue, press upon it by engaging one's own nature.

At the outer vein of the throat and lungs, stimulate it with the lotus seed-syllable.

At the collapsed joint of the chest, meditate upon the gnosis born from the egg.

Where there is no blood under the fingernails, gather the hands together and recite.

At the nine gates of the nine openings, stimulate with nine seed-syllables.

At the nine channels, nine seed-syllables; bind the nine gates with nine seed-syllables.

By mere binding in this way, consciousness will not depart.

Take two unburnt vessels; with saffron and musk, correctly inscribe twelve sections. Encircle them with the vowel seed-syllables. These seed-syllables of the eight goddesses — at the borders, the seed of the neutral one (māning), and at the center, the seed of gnosis — let the wise one encircle them. Likewise, write the name in the center, abiding itself within the core of Hūṃ. Having joined both together, bind them with red thread. Visualize Māmakī at the petal, and likewise above, the lord of the vajra. With the non-dual torma, worship with manifest power. Bind the two vajra-fists together, and bring tip to tip. Recite the seed-syllable of consciousness-gnosis eight hundred times. By the substance that binds consciousness, and by the distinguishing feature of the yogin's protection, hungry ghosts (pretas), rākṣasas, elemental spirits, and untimely death — by the mere protection of the yogin, liberation from these is here beyond all doubt. One whose life-force is exhausted will come to abide for six months.

This concludes the sixth chapter, entitled "Complete Examination of the Signs of Death."

The Yoga Treatise — the sequence of the ritual. Then, spoken through the power of gnosis: from resort to the act of union, blood and semen will arise. Through the arising of gnosis in its essential nature, direct the mind to the vein of extraction. On the seventh, having become semen, thoroughly activate the white vein. With blood, on the eight watches of the night, directly restore the smoke-vein. By union at the middle and fourth watch of the night, consecrate the conch-vein. Earlier, through the twelve watches of the night, thoroughly engage the lotus vein. By this count of sixty days, the wise one — through the vein of musk — what is called "the nine that become firm": this generates the three stainless veins. Through the taste of sixteen nights, thoroughly generate the vein of opening. One who possesses gnosis, consciousness, and the earth-canopy in full is an embodied being made complete. Through the full eighteen earth-canopies, the wise one abides universally through nine months. Birth comes with hair, eyebrows, and the like: fingernails, chest hair accumulating, sweat and parasites, urination, excrement, phlegm, tears, and so forth — these eight are victorious within the womb. This is called the eighth of the veins. Especially through summoning the deity itself, the self is the deity, and the other is supreme; the self-deity itself is supreme. This white goddess Tārā abides in white garments at the smoke-vein. The goddess Buddha-Woman abides at the lotus as Māmakī. The goddess Pleasant Lady at the musk-vein; the Vajra-Charming One at the stainless-vein; the one who opens — the Jewel-Delightful —

At the earth-canopy, the lotus vein. Thus the wisdom-vein of conceptual elaboration: it draws forth and gathers all. Just as the Victor Vairocana — so too it is renowned at the back. Having made it the portion of equality, the form of equality, replete with light — from each of nine thousand, that very number, it is divided. Seventy-two thousand are precisely the veins of the body. By the ninth it draws forth and gathers; the nine veins are the ground of permanence. With nine and five, together with joy, these five deities proceed. One draws forth and gathers; one is the deity possessed of wisdom, the intrinsic nature of the dharmadhātu. The one: body and embodied, formless wisdom and formed, non-empty and empty, neither long nor short, nor other — not without substance, nor a mere substantial thing; without color, yet all hues are substantial. The yogin who possesses the wisdom-body: the second path is the fault of existence. The yogin of the single path, having abandoned all conceptual thought, should know the single path itself. Knowing thus, on the pure body's pure path one travels fully.

This concludes the seventh chapter, entitled "The Chapter on Generating the Veins."

The very essence of the sūtra of union. One wishes to hear from the Blessed One. Vajrapāṇi, listen now: the practitioner of the treatise on union, drawing from the fourth seat, possessing the full twelve thousand — that is the condensed meaning thereof. Through fear of the extensive text, the condensed wording of that very thing is spoken accessibly to those of union. Then, having set it forth excellently for the yogin, peace is rightly explained.

First, the act of emptiness: in the midst of emptiness, a lotus; the lotus bearing a seed and a sprout, of the seventh color, vast and great. In the words of the fourth section, above, together with the syllable māṇiṃ and the drop. Having meditated evenly on that seed, then generate the wrathful one with the frowning brow. In the abode of the lunar maṇḍala, fully covered by a white parasol, with a pure body and three eyes, adorned with four arms — holding the supreme gift and the staff, the rosary, the ball, and the vase-vessel. The body adorned with all ornaments, clothed in supremely beautiful garments. Through the practice of recitation and meditation, the single syllable of the supreme sage, the syllable of the supreme wrathful one — having been recited one hundred thousand times by the mantra-holder, the yogin, by the mere act of undertaking it, it is renowned that life increases greatly. Having focused on the deity herself, then hear this rite of increase.

At the peak of Kailāsa (Tisé), the snowy mountain, and on the face of the golden mountain, in a palace adorned and magnificent, abiding in the place of the natural presence of the seven precious substances, seated upon a lion throne, resting within the solar maṇḍala, beautifully adorned with a white parasol, silk pennants, and a net of bells. Having taken the seventh to its limit, it is joined by the third; at the top, by the limit of the fourth section. The one possessed of wisdom: a single seed, motionless in breath, with rays of light, is meditated upon in a yellow hue. Afterward, meditate on the form of the goddess called Norgyün — Stream of Wealth — with six arms, in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture, adorned with all ornaments; meditate with colors blazing. A jewel tree and a basket — these proliferate greatly in the second. The third holds an offering hand and above it the wisdom hand; in the second, a rosary; in the third, a ball and a vase-vessel. Through the practice of meditation and recitation, it is the very element of drawing in the breath.

This concludes the eighth chapter, entitled "The Chapter on Increase."

Then, further, what is to be explained: the particular features of the red activity. Having fully possessed the characteristics of the earlier signs, and having focused on the characteristics of emptiness, a lotus is rightly explained within emptiness, depending upon the solar maṇḍala —

Adorned with a white parasol, a single letter — the first vowel sign — above it the final consonant group, and through meditative equipoise, a red seed-syllable. These blazing red rays of light are the very substance that draws sentient beings in. Having contemplated this image of the goddess, the Blessed One, appearing in a color like gold, Māmakī arises perfectly in mind. Her two hands are beautifully adorned with ornaments; one holds an iron hook, the left rings a bell aloud. Her body is adorned with all ornaments and she wears most beautiful garments. Through meditation and recitation alone, sentient beings come under one's sway.

Then, further, this dark activity: depending upon the maṇḍala of wind, within the wind, one is to meditate upon the wind's seed-syllable, the wind within wind. Smoke upon smoke, blazing brilliantly, adorned with sound and with bindu-drops. A fierce black seat, abiding entirely upon a seat of hungry ghosts. Contemplate the form of the single-braided goddess: her complexion dark blue, with the light of equanimity. Her great hair raised upward, she is a great goddess, and by her fierce and wild laughter she causes terror. Her single face has three eyes, and she is arrayed with four hands. One hand holds a sword; in the second a vajra is honed; the right holds a spear, and likewise in the second, the threatening gesture. She abides in the posture of casting forth, her light equal to blazing fire. She binds by casting a noose, and she terrifies with the sound Hūṃ. In the center of the seed-syllable comes the name, and likewise at the end, the form of Phaṭ. Those who harm the Three Jewels and those who destroy the teaching of yoga — it is said this one-braided wrathful goddess destroys them with her power. Taking the mantra and tantra together, one draws with the seed-syllable of the light-bearing goddess, mixed with poison and with blood, the image of Vajravārāhī. At her lips the name, and at her crown the syllabic seed-syllable, above that the letter of fire, and at her mouth likewise the two wind-letters. By this it is said one performs driving away. This concludes the ninth chapter, entitled "The Chapter on the Activity Maṇḍalas."

She who bestows benefit on all sentient beings then spoke, moved by the power of wisdom: "Listen, O King, O Vajradhara. By one who directly approaches the boundless practice of liberation from the path of saṃsāra, the name 'Boundless Gateway' is given. One's very body is of the nature of emptiness. Just as emptiness itself is empty both outwardly and inwardly, so too in the element of space, in the form of the waters of the ocean, and within it, filled to the brim, visualize from every side a palatial mansion as one wishes. Seated upon a lion throne, adorned with a solar maṇḍala, with varied silks hanging down: the seed-syllable of a single letter is the very substance of blazing rays of light in color. Taking all the vowel letters together, above them a bindhu of nectar. Contemplate the goddess herself together with her own nature and outwardly, the form, in equanimity. Her two hands rest in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture; she is adorned by the five buddhas. Her body is adorned with every ornament and she wears supremely beautiful garments. One hand holds a vajra; the left rings a bell aloud. The essential nature of the eight letters — activity and non-activity, secret, water, fire, and likewise wind, earth — is the letter of the eye. The four gates and the four aggregates, abiding like an egg-born creature. The fourth is the fire of the fourth affliction, and likewise the fourth letter. Through bewilderment and affliction, and cattle in equality going before, the aquatic flower, the lotus — this is its egg-born seat. Above the cow's hoof, distinguished by the eight nectars, is the pure one, like crystal — the supreme essence of all essences. Water on the tongue is this very one; space for the ear, and for all the nostrils. Earth is to be applied to the eye; and at the Brahmā-place, fire blazes likewise.

The ground of bewilderment is at the throat. The unstable dwells at the heart, and the afflicted sentient being at the chest, and cattle at the root of the navel. By placing on the eight limbs — water on the tongue, as said before, space for the ears and all the nostrils — by this one correctly knows the divine. This mantra of eight letters is widely renowned as the eight mudrās.

White, yellow, and likewise red, dark and blazing — these are the activities. The goddess of the four activities, the skilled one recites three hundred thousand times. The very essence born of primordial wisdom is supremely permanent and peaceful. All beings, subtle and gross — the activities and their distinctions, all of them — are shaped like water, and equally like blazing fire. Just as the permanent winds and the object of faith, the faculty of earth — what arises from the accumulated remainder — the fourth is the sixth letter. For the benefit of beings, the eight letters are widely known as the eight deities. By reciting and meditating in meditative equipoise, there is no doubt that this will be accomplished.

By the mudrā of the third banner, touching and being touched in advance — in this world, happiness and constant offerings will be found. At the time of death, primordial wisdom abides supremely in the formless realm of existence. If one's own understanding of reality is inferior, how will the mantra be accomplished? Therefore, with every diligence, one must understand this treatise on the practice.

Fragrant and renowned flowers abiding on all sides, black aloe-wood and bdellium, butter-lamps — with a single torma free of duality, with pure and attentive mind, worship fully the goddess Māmakī and all the other goddesses.

Above, visualize Vairocana. At the lips, Vajrapāṇi. With the mind, apply Ākāśagarbha to both ears. At the tongue, the Protector of the World, and at the throat, the son of Mañjughoṣa. To the north, perfectly place Maitreya. At the heart abides Samantabhadra. At the navel, the king of wrathful ones, widely renowned as Yamāntaka the Destroyer. Meditate on that very specificity of forms as the very seat of the goddess. At the heart, mind and primordial wisdom are to be contemplated by the skilled one. Many countless rays of light, clouds of buddhas, fully radiate. By resting in meditative equipoise and cultivating, accomplishment will occur — of this there is no doubt.

This concludes the tenth chapter, called "The Dhāraṇī Chapter of the Goddess of the Gate of the Boundless."

Vajrasattva, Tathāgata, the Blessed One, declared by Vajradhara: The practitioner, in a charnel ground inhabited by rākṣasīs and female zombies, uses the mantra: Oṃ Bhici Vata Hūṃ Phaṭ Svāhā. This is the conduct mantra.

With the threatening finger placed at the heart, the right hand formed into a vajra fist, held at the side of the waist — this is the seal of menace and the supreme seal.

On the hide of a black goat, with charnel-ground cotton thread — three-faced, six-handed, blue in color, with three eyes, with red hair wildly disheveled, adorned with all ornaments, laughing and gnashing the fangs, adorned with blazing fire. The first right hand holds a spear, the second likewise holds a human head. The third holds an upraised vajra. The upper left raises the threatening finger, the second holds a skull, and the third rings a bell aloud. The garment is a tiger-skin skirt, and an elephant hide is thrown on as an upper robe. Seated in an attitude of sport upon a preta throne, with a body of blazing red nature, with a white parasol hanging overhead. Within the form of the single-braided rākṣasī, distinctly draw the vajra messenger. With nails vividly drenched in blood — this, it is declared, is to be done at the navel of the goddess.

With that one's flesh, make the burnt offering. Likewise, let it be surrounded by charnel grounds. On the crown, OM; on the eyes, HŪṂ; on the nose, HA; on the ears, HRĪ; on the tongue, HRA; on the heart, HRĪḤ. Bring the two vajra-fists together evenly, then fully extend the two middle fingers. This is the mantra and mudrā of the six-limbed practice. With the threatening finger placed at the heart, fully extend the right shoulder. In the form of HŪṂ, together with the discus, joining them simultaneously, press down with the right-extended foot. OM MATHA MATHA PUṢṬA HŪṂ PHAṬ. This is the root mantra and mudrā of the goddess.

Taking goat flesh mixed with milk, one should offer it eight hundred times to the goddess who dwells in the charnel ground, and having satisfied her with various offerings, one may thereafter undertake the various activities.

Make an image in rice grains, place the name at the center, and with a śleṣmātaka-wood peg of eight finger-widths, strike it together with the actual object. If a vajra is placed there as well, the urine will become supremely bound.

Make an image from wax, fill it with dog's hair, apply the name in the form of HŪṂ, recite eight hundred times, strike with the vajra-lotus, and it will harm the wicked one accordingly.

From an enemy of the gods, make a lotus, insert the seed-syllable of the name, and whatever women one has in mind will thereby certainly come under one's power.

Vajrasattva, the Tathāgata, spoke again through Vajradhara. "Moreover, regarding the specifics of the activities, hear this, Vajrapāṇi: From earth dug up by a living creature, the wise one should make an image, surround it with the seed-syllable of the goddess, apply the name at the heart, then press it down with the left foot, and the wise one should recite eight hundred times. If it is filled with snakeskin, it will be filled completely with snakes. If it is filled with frog-skin, it will be filled completely with frogs. If it is filled with black sesame oil, it will be filled completely with insects. If it is filled with fingernail clippings, it will be manifestly filled with worms. If it is filled thoroughly with flesh, it will be seized at once by stabbing pains.

"For causing destruction through the practice of conjunction, and for extremely malicious beings who are enemies of the teacher or who utter secret curses — these should be bound by this same method. One will not be tainted by wrongdoing.

"The goddess messenger and Vajradhara spoke this for the purpose of the essence of the practice. Now hear the specific distinctions of this activity, O king, Vajradhara. Having the quality of the fourth seat, for the sake of comprehension by one whose mind is not steadied, this is the practice presented in brief."

Having been understood by the disciple, let the lion who speaks the ultimate truth, in order to cut the host of yogins afflicted by afflictions, destroying the root of birth — the fault of craving through affliction — may one be accomplished as the very king of the ultimate yoga.

The eleventh chapter, called "The Chapter on the Words of the Practice," is complete.

The glorious Prajñāpati, hidden like the sun whose rays illuminate the world-realm, whose power destroys the fog of cataracts accumulated through the distinctions of many things — ever engaged in battle at the right time and wrong time against the hostile enemy of pride that pervades throughout — through the single great seed of equanimity, the mountain of wisdom free of attachment, equal and even: I bow to the root wheel, said to be submerged in saṃsāra.

In order to know the nature of the secret as the same, the yogin who meditates upon the secret, the very one who gives rise to the form of HŪṂ, the supreme deity in the form of HŪṂ, the form of HŪṂ that has become empty — to the syllable HŪṂ I bow and offer praise.

First, all the roots are combined together; afterward, the seed-syllable manifests in transformations.

At the navel is the noose of cattle,
freed by the cattle and thoroughly free.

In the eastern direction is the victorious bow,
the very maṇḍala of the lotus.

The moist and also the western direction —
consciousness is drawn out together with them.

In the middle of space make it the self;
the self at the center is space itself.

Having come to know the middle of both,
there is no doubt that it is liberation itself.

In the middle of emptiness, the self —
the self reveals its own sign.

Drawing out the identity of the sign
through meditation: this is drawing out the ground.

From the bow, victorious and moist — from drawing out the dry lotus — seventy-two together are drawn out:

this is the very name of the nine channels.

The ground of the nine channels is made permanent;
the three are drawn out and properly gathered.

What is called the moist and the dry:
the root is the very victorious one of the bow.
With the characteristic mark of what truly exists,
through this one draws out and properly gathers.
The nine lotuses are explained as equal;
consciousness abides together with them.
Above, below, and in all directions — emptiness itself.
The middle way as emptiness:
always meditating on the three emptinesses —
whoever knows this is the wise one.

In the left lung reside the yellow-grey,
and in the right resides the great black.
From the five channels equally drawing out,
these five are to be applied as the five.
Water, fire, space,
and earth itself — four: the equal seat.
Like a water-plant in bloom,
it abides fully in the center of the navel.
Its face is always perfectly round;
the skilled one should cause it to expand.
It is always made into eight petals,
said to be endowed with stamens.
In its center, it is said that meditating on consciousness together with it —
like the form of the subtlest atom — consciousness is to be indicated.
Abiding motionless, a ray of light,
like a hundredth part of the tip of a hair,
it is bound by the third complete engagement.
The characteristic of what is bound resembles a wheel.
It revolves like a potter's wheel;
its reversal to the place of abiding is gnosis.

Through the division of the eight intrinsic natures,
the meaning of applying them to the person at the center —
the middle draws out and properly gathers,
and destroys all views.

The eight channels are fully and manifestly present:
white, smoky, lotus, and conch;
camphor, stainless, and opening —
this is the division of the eight ground-parasols.
Perfectly joining with the Dharma of no-self,
wrapped thoroughly in selflessness,
exhausting birth in the three realms,
it conquers through the power of gnosis.

First, meditate perfectly on white.
Second, meditate on yellow.
Third, meditate entirely on red.
Fourth is black itself.
This is meditating on the channel-wheel.

This concludes what is called the first chapter: meditating on the channel-wheel.

Then again, the further excellent exposition:
meditating on the seed-syllables of the maṇḍala.
A seed-syllable, when ascertained, is the Tathāgata —
it bears the characteristic mark of a vowel letter.
Conceptual thought is a great bewilderment;
it crosses to the far shore of the ocean of saṃsāra.
Through the essential nature of the pure body,
the wisdom-body is the reality of purity.
Pure, and purely so — just that reality —
is the characteristic mark of the first yoga.

Likewise, the darkness of affliction appears together with consciousness.
Having been struck by the vajra of gnosis,
luminosity and the rest are attained.
Through pure body and mind,
the wise one is to indicate the maṇḍala.

Separated from the master, through this one never attains accomplishment on the face of the earth.
The qualities of the master are to be grasped;
faults there are never at any time.

The characteristic of the maṇḍala ritual
is to be examined and applied equally just so.
Four-cornered, with four gates,
adorned with four archways —
in its center, draw a lotus equally.
In the center place the supreme letter.
In the form and shape of the letter,
consciousness is to be made the letter.
In the east, reflect upon white throughout.
In the west, like a smoky seed-syllable.
In the south is the seed-syllable of conch,
and in the north is the seed-syllable of lotus.
At the directions of the powerful one is Rocanā.

From fire, from the stainless, the three arise.
One must know how to distinguish them as free from truth-claims.
In all things, it is simply the wind.
Thus should the maṇḍala be known as equal.
Always meditate upon the maṇḍala.
By the mere contemplation of the maṇḍala,
wrongdoing is abandoned and one is utterly liberated.
By the mere yoga practice,
the yogin should examine the food.
By satisfying the five sense faculties,
one becomes deathless and beautiful.

First is the purification of oneself;
second, always the maṇḍala itself;
third, one's own seat;
and fourth, the seat of practice.

This concludes the second chapter, entitled "The Excellent Method for Meditating upon the Seed-Syllable Maṇḍala."

Then, further, is the excellent exposition entitled "The Characteristics of Letters."

The meaning of letters arises correctly from vowels.
Consciousness is to be understood as the letter.
Throat, lips, palate —

letters are fully formed through the tongue.

The ka-group arises from smoke;

the ca-group is truly like white.

The ṭa-group arises truly from conch;

the ta-group is gathered from the lotus itself.

In the perception of the four vowels,

each individual vowel arises.

All arises from two letters.

The letter of the vowels is itself the lower.

Without colour, yet colour arises from it;

without form, it is the very nature of form.

Long — yet the mother is not flat.

It is both the rational and the irrational.

Not empty, yet the very true substance of emptiness —

whoever knows this is wise.

Form and emptiness — likewise the middle.

One endowed with intelligence should grasp this.

Together with the life-bearing letter,

just as the beauty of the object of form,

the letter of pleasing and lovely radiance —

that which has transcended time, I bow down and pay homage.

Emptiness and the lotus-king,

the letter of the white lotus —

likewise, whatever the yogin knows,

that is the very name of the seat of practice.

Having purified the body through emptiness,

one creates it together as emptiness itself.

By the mere creation of the seed-syllable,

the characteristics of the letter arise together.

This concludes the third chapter, entitled "The Excellent Method for the Characteristics of Letters."

One should not speak false words.

Through habitual practice of lying,

all trainings are utterly suppressed,

and it becomes the abode of every fault.
By the nature of the rope of attachment,
one is firmly fastened to the stake of saṃsāra.
Like oil in an impure vessel,
always abandon this entirely.

The three aspects of body,
the four aspects of speech,
and the three aspects of mind —
the wise should always restrain these.
The verbal offering is perfectly complete.
For the practitioner of the inferior level,
the aim to be accomplished will not be accomplished.
Therefore, by the characteristics of yoga practice,
one rests in equipoise upon that very reality.

Know that one must rely upon and honour the teacher.
Whatever materials are available,
or else exchange knowledge for knowledge.
The fourth will not be obtained nearby.

On the fourteenth, the fifteenth,
and especially on the eighth day of the month,
the yogin who desires spiritual attainments must offer the torma (ritual cake-offering) with earnest effort.

The group of seven: Cāmuṇḍā.
Twenty-five to the wrathful-browed one.
The eighth group: Māmakī.
Tārā is said to be in the fifth group.
The ḍākinī is also said to be in the fifth.
The gatherer of elements is the sixth.
The mountain-dwelling yoginī is said to be in the ninth.
The buddha-eyed one is the eighteenth.
The yoginī is a full eighty.
They are equal to outer offerings.

In the center is said to be great bliss,
surrounded by eight yoginīs.
The form of the syllable HA steals away color;

the form of the syllable HO is stainless.

The hero is gathered by HRĪḤ.

The sequence is to be known thus.

Some are of the nature of fragrance,

some of the nature of flowers,

some of the nature of incense,

and some of the nature of torma.

Likewise the eight bodhisattvas abide as outer offerings.

This completes the fourth chapter, on samaya, torma, and offering.

Then, furthermore, let there be a further self-explanation. The defining characteristics of the syllables in terms of karma are to be set forth as an explanation of the nature of equality, and are to be applied in a distinctly specified way.

OM fully pervades the navel center.

OM is the state of being without intrinsic nature.

OM is freedom from subject-object duality.

OM is said to be emptiness.

OM comprises eighty syllables.

KA is hooking. KHA is devouring. GA is smelling. GHA is crushing. ṆA is protecting. CA is moving. CHA is burning away words. JA is hooking. JHA is trembling. ÑA is knowing. ṬA is white. ṬHA is blazing. ḌA is bestowing. ḌHA is thoroughly scattering. ṆA is frightening. TA is blazing. THA is pacifying. DA is creating. DHA is expanding. NA is the one who frightens. PA is measuring. PHA is the eye. BA is blazing. BHA is that which brings about fear completely. MA is devouring. A is destroying the maṇḍala. VA is quarreling. RA is drying out. LA is bringing under control. SA is destroying enemies. ṢA is harming. ŚA is falling. HA is fierce. KṢA is setting in motion. Ī is sovereign lordship. SVĀHĀ is expanding in all modes. PHAṬ destroys by all modes, and MAḌA destroys by its mode. GAHA brings under control. POṢAHRI causes expansion. REṬA is pacifying. GHATA is cutting. The mantra syllables are to be applied in mantra-mode: the names of the karmas are to be applied together with their respective purposes, and the karmas are explained accordingly.

This completes the fifth chapter, on mantras.

Then, furthermore, let there be a full explanation. Going for refuge to the buddha, going for refuge to the sacred Dharma, and also going for refuge to the Saṅgha — by this one does not fall into lower states. Rejoicing in merit, confessing non-virtue, the unlimited limbs of moral discipline, likewise the very limbs of conduct, and the treatise on yoga — these are to be constantly abandoned when seen to be of such a kind.

In this manner, twice and three times, having taken awakening as the heart, one who is endowed with supreme compassion is said to be close to the wheel of the six destinies. The mind that clings to the faults of conditioned existence — that very kind of mind — is to be thoroughly abandoned. By this, one's non-virtues will be pacified and merit will abundantly increase.

OM MAHĀDEVI MAHĀSULE MAHĀTEJA MAHĀPOTA MAHĀBALE MAHĀYAJÑE. OM SETĀBHIJA GR̥HṆĀNI. OM SITIBHIJAYA DHĀRAYĀMI. OM DHŪMABIJA JAḤ. OM DHŪMABIJABHYO BTTANA.

Be gracious to me today. Killing, stealing, desire, likewise lying, garlands, perfume, dancing and the like, and excessive eating — these are to be restrained. One who delights in possessions does not find the Dharma.

SVABHĀVAŚUDDHYAḤ SARVADHARMĀḤ SVABHĀVAŚUDDHO'HAM.
VAJRAŚUDDHYAḤ SARVADHARMĀ VAJRAŚUDDHO'HAM. YOGAŚUDDHYAḤ
SARVADHARMĀ YOGAŚUDDHO'HAM.

Be gracious to me today. Grant me the supreme of yogas. I generate the king of consciousnesses. I know the emanation of consciousness. Today, the ultimate reality itself, the student — may the king himself, as king, bestow the empowerment. For the purpose of making auspiciousness manifest, by showing the signs arisen from hell, turning away completely from all the wheels of wandering beings — may the ultimate king of yoga be supremely accomplished.

This completes the sixth chapter, on training.

Then, furthermore, let there be a full explanation. In brief, the three forms of the iron hook are not to be given as gifts. From relying on the substance of sexual union, blood and semen truly arise. On account of ignorance in the primordial ground, the form is wrapped in signs. At seven days, consciousness arises shaking with the seminal fluid. At twelve days it is to be known. At eight days it becomes continually firm. The flesh is at sixteen days. The arbuda stage is at five days.

Examining the three directions, it is like a reflection:
the face, limbs, and extremities of that form,
the body hair and fingers undergo transformation.

At three months, the feet and ears.

At six months, half the body takes shape.

The five consciousnesses and the mind arise.

The ten stages are fully explained —

the one who is born, born from the womb.

Through the application of yogic awareness,
the stages of the womb are fully expounded.

Hair, body hair, and nails; teeth;

dust and likewise impure flesh;

bone, the head, and the abdomen;

urine, excrement, and sweat;

saliva, mucus, and vomit;

and whatever forms of oozing filth —

these arise through the rite of formations (saṃskāra).

The yogin, knowing all of this,

draws forth the karma of former lives.

Through the condition of ignorance, formations arise.

Through the condition of formations, consciousness.

Through the condition of consciousness, name and form.

Through the condition of name and form, the six sense bases.

Through the condition of the six sense bases, contact.

Through the condition of contact, feeling.

Through the condition of feeling, craving.

Through the condition of craving, grasping.

Through the condition of grasping, existence.

Through the condition of existence, birth.

Through the condition of birth, aging and death,

grief, lamentation, suffering,

unhappiness, and disturbance —

nothing but this entire mass of suffering arises and comes to be.

This completes the seventh chapter, called the full exposition of abiding in the womb.

Then, furthermore, let there be a full explanation. From virtue, virtue is born. The essential nature of consciousness and form is the radiance of seven colors — the rays of the five sense faculties. From the eye, the ear, the nose, and the tongue, these emerge from the nine channels. Form and the sense faculties assemble together, emitting and drawing in rays of light. Breath too is to be applied in union with this. Just as a mere thumb's width, form moves centrally. The nine nāgas always abide on the lotus. In a single day, eightfold — form and color become qualities. That form always moves onward. In the midst of the second application, peace is to be simultaneously undertaken. Birth into sixty-four is to be grasped at the tip of the application. The eighth, the one abiding in equanimity in the sense of mastery, is equal to the application of the central channel. In the eighth, one engages fully in the dark. The application is to be taken up beforehand. Pressing down the seat of the nine channels entirely with the coils of the nāga, wrapped and encircled by the channel, one draws all out and is decisively victorious. What is called "the white one in the north" — its smoke similarly to the south — breath, in brief, is explained. The left breath, the three stainless ones. By the substances of day and night, transference is explained as eightfold. Through that application, transference is to be grasped by the application of transference. Drawing out is even as the form of the lotus. The wheel of channels abides in its arrangement. If a person should die in the right manner, it is not to be released. Thus the continuum and assemblage of winds abides entirely and correctly as smoke. Even as the form of the lotus, the wheel of channels abides in its arrangement. The white ones are said to be the five sense faculties, and likewise the bones. Worms and insects are the lotus. Residing at the joints of the bones is what becomes the smoke. Rocanā is likened to wind. The three stainless ones are at the tips of the hands. The distinction is between the knee and the throat. With the earth-parasol bound at the waist, it draws out that which has no inherent nature. Whoever abides at the time of death with nothing but bare consciousness — when the due time merely arrives, the breath will cease and be cut off. Likewise, when one sees the terrifying water, the cheeks will tremble at the seam. In twelve days, ten thousand — the breath is cut off moment by hour. Whatever is the characteristic of the night-sign is correctly described as journeying southward. What is described as journeying northward is like the luminous appearance of day.

At just the measure of six finger-widths, the inner consciousness transfers. It is secret, the secret great mystery — the practice is equal to the secret. The yogin who knows yoga therefore rests in equal union with the secret. Thus the chapter called "The Inner Chapter," the eighth, is complete.

Then, furthermore, is excellently taught the characteristic mark of the vajra-union: grasping the very form of the lotus, bringing the supreme and the vajra-supreme into equality, and equalizing the lotus, the coupling is the union of nectar. The intrinsic nature of the seminal essence — the yogin's seminal essence is secret. In the measure of seven tips of kusha grass, one offers this to the eight yoginīs. Taking up the churning of the nectar, one offers it to the lungs like a seminal essence. Afflictions arise at every moment, like the poison of arsenic. Having consulted the yogin's treatise, this Vinaya, by constant recitation, beings attain passage beyond the world. The mire of defilement from evil conduct — whoever is intelligent, having cleansed it with this virtue, this defilement — by the path along which one travels, through what has been done, one becomes the Sugata. Thus the chapter called "The Wheel of Channels," the ninth, is complete.

With the form of a substantial thing that is emptiness, one should meditate upon it together in the center. Washed by the very suchness of emptiness — like the seed of emptiness within emptiness, described as the water of the empty direction — there the lotus has a form. In the center of the lotus, that lotus arises together, delightfully. Consciousness is as a single seat. That suchness, together with the seat, and likewise the seminal essence above is taught — as consciousness abides together in the center. The ground, as having the form of light-rays, is to be meditated upon at the measure of half a cubit. Consciousness is to be meditated upon as white. Whatever appears, knowing the practice is luminous. Thus the chapter called "The Chapter of Luminous Appearance," the tenth, is complete.

Then, furthermore, is to be taught: the gnosis of another being, moving supreme and white, is described as being in front. Smoke is outside, to the west. Having grasped its left side, consciousness together in the center — consciousness is to be meditated upon as yellow. Its name is called Rohita. The name is likewise described as empty. By rotating it outside a conch shell, one also meditates upon that mind. The intelligent one, through knowing another's mind, sets the mind of another constantly as a syllable and, merely by resting in equipoise and meditating, comes to know the mind of another. Thus the chapter called "The Chapter on the Mind of Another," the eleventh, is complete.

Then, furthermore, is to be taught: by equalizing together with the inhalation, the nine channels are to be sealed. By the identity of inhaling and filling, one thoroughly purifies oneself through the union. The movement that causes the breath to go out — the intelligent one who seals the door should apply the syllable of movement. By applying it at the end of the breath, the arising elements are not reversed. By the arising elements at the end of the breath, the intelligent one fills and empties. Upon filling, there are the syllables of the nine channels of the divine. The intelligent one, by inhaling together, draws in form as a single act. By inhaling, exhaling, and filling, the union for consciousness-transference abides together. When by reason the due time arrives, one begins the practice of consciousness-transference together. Thus the chapter called "The Chapter on the Training of Consciousness-Transference," the twelfth, is complete.

Then, furthermore, is excellently taught: one extracts from the nine joints. Likewise the nine joints, as described above — one should rely on the transference together. Being stirred by the seed of smoke, one likewise proceeds to omniscience. Through the meditation of the dark union, one fully emerges from the Brahmā-aperture. This is called the true union of consciousness. As the seat, the maṇḍala of wind and the seed of wind are described as equal.

From it, like a crown, one transfers. Likewise, from above the nine joints, it is equal to the Brahmā-aperture. From the Brahmā-aperture arising, it is the very nature of instantaneous transference. Thus the chapter called "The Chapter on Instantaneous Transference," the thirteenth, is complete.

Then, furthermore, is excellently taught: that very suchness, endowed with true characteristics, through meditation on that suchness together as one, the seat becomes perfectly white. This is taught under the name "the name of emptiness." By applying everything at the time of pacification, one should begin the practice of peace together. Thus the chapter called "The Chapter on Pacification," the fourteenth, is complete.

Then, furthermore, is excellently taught: just as one purifies the sign of selfhood, one purifies, and purifies into great selfhood. One should purify together with emptiness. In the center of the maṇḍala of wind is the equal maṇḍala of fire. In the center of the maṇḍala of fire is the equal maṇḍala of the sun. In the center of the maṇḍala of the sun is the equal maṇḍala of the moon. What is taught to be in the center of that is the characteristic of the co-emergent sprout. The great secret of what is secret within the secret — through the great essence, the very essence — one should purify together the consciousness of all those who do not know suchness. Thus the chapter called "The Seventh of the Seventh of the Fifteens" is complete.

Then, furthermore, is excellently to be taught: one sees the eighth white seed. The nine-edged seed is like the seed of smoke. The conch seed has six limbs. The first is the lotus-seed of the syllable of sound. Its head likewise has the vowel-syllable at the end. The first portion is the three stainless ones. The category of distinction is the last. The syllabic seed at the outer edge is the canopy of earth. The seed of the syllable is to be known as the ge. From what is dear arise sorrow and from what is dear arises fear. Being wholly separated from what is dear, there is no sorrow and no fear. From longing arises sorrow and from longing arises fear. Being wholly separated from longing, there is no sorrow and no fear. Endowed with the previously described characteristics, on the seat of suchness together, endowed with that great selfhood, that suchness is the seventh ray of light. In the center of the maṇḍala of wind is the likeness of the maṇḍala of the moon. The lotus nature and the palace together give rise to consciousness. Even the yellow rephā in front, together with the color category, is like the mind. What is to be meditated at the boundary of the earth, together with the seed of one's own body — the name of the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture, and in the intellect the two secret Merus. The eyes should look directly at the tip of the nose, and the breath is directed to just before the navel. Through the nature of the union of meditative equipoise, one mounts evenly upon the secret seat. Through attachment one is liberated from sinful action. By the mere act of mounting the seat entirely, a king comes under one's power. Or else through the recitation of mantra, this is to be begun as an empowerment. Or else through the possession of medicine, the mantra is the seat itself of another. This is the first chapter.

Then, furthermore, is excellently taught: the one who extracts from the nine joints is described as equal to extracting from emptiness. The joint itself is the very waist, and the joint together with the navel is white. Wrapped in white around the trunk, the hollow of the heart is of the nature of smoke. Even after death one becomes smoke. At the heart too is the very conch, and it resides at the joint of the conch. Above the heart is the lotus nature; the lotus is described at the chest. Likewise at the throat is the gi-wang, and the gi-wang is described at the five sense faculties. The three stainless ones are at the border of the teeth. The canopy of earth is near the messenger. The dark and the left side is the opening — at the root of the canopy of earth, the root of the messenger. The extraction is the Brahmā-aperture. If one seals all the gates with this, what is consciousness to be called? This is the second chapter.

Then, furthermore, is to be taught: by beginning with this rite, by applying this syllable, and by the mere meditation on this — what yoga is brought into connection as a valid cognition, and what valid cognition of the syllable, and what valid cognition endowed with the divine —

The fever of wandering beings, whichever it may be —
by meditating just once upon it,
one goes to the end of the enemy.

Likewise, the name of the enemy is to be recited;
it is to be applied together with the black one.

This is the third chapter.

Then, furthermore, is to be excellently taught: the words of the supreme rite. By the essence of the deity itself together, one summons with the seed of smoke: Om dhūma dhūma piṭa yakṣa ra dhuma bhyo mantra bālayam svāhā. Make joyful the supreme syllable endowed with the syllables of the boundary. By meditating on the yellow samaya (sacred pledge-seal): Om samaya ākarṣaya ākarṣaya dhuma bīja svāhā. This is the fourth chapter.

Then, furthermore, is to be taught: the distinguishing characteristics of the four types of birth. The conch-woman and the lotus-woman, likewise the one marked with the form of an elephant — the lotus-woman moves with the gait of an intoxicated elephant, together with a good fragrance; she always speaks pleasantly, and is capable for the lesser and middling. All her limbs are praised: her eyes are like lotus petals, her hair curls in just that way as long as it grows; her face and teeth are refined, her fingers are slender and her limbs are fine, her fingers are red and small. She is said to be of the middle type, bearing a form of peace. By means of the lotus-woman, one accomplishes splendor and is well-suited to the enjoyments of peace. This is the fifth chapter.

Then, furthermore, is to be taught: the elephant-woman has the smell of fermented drink, with effort suited to the lower and middle; her lips hang, her limbs are thick, and she moves with the gait of an intoxicated elephant. Her body is tall, her nails are long, her breasts are pendulous and her hair is coarse. Her desire is small and her limbs are thick; likewise her shoulders are raised. Her eyes and nails are slender; she delights in honey and speaks pleasantly. Her face is very much inclined to laugh; she is addicted to pleasant sounds and desirable things. Her secret place is wide and spreading, and the soles of her feet rest evenly on the ground. She is perpetually fond of drink; the elephant-woman, too, is intent on her object. She is to be applied to the rite of expansion. This is the sixth chapter.

Then, furthermore, is to be excellently taught: the conch-woman delights in conch-like things; her face and complexion are like that of a conch, her limbs are long. She has a crow's cry and a crow's smell; her fingers are thick and long. Her hair is coarse yet her limbs are soft; she moves with the swift gait of a great donkey or a mountain deer. Her neck is long and she has a gap between her teeth; her nose is high, her armpits are hollow, and her lips are like the shape of a parasol. A woman with such characteristics is to be abandoned by one of intelligence together; she is a woman applied to the rite of subjugation. This is the seventh chapter.

Then, furthermore, is to be excellently taught: the spotted-woman delights in spotted things; her form and complexion accord with spots. Her breasts are small and her fingers slender; her voice is small and her limbs small; her body is small, her hair too is small. Her nature is like a crow and her cry is like a crow's; she delights in quarreling and speaks harshly. These are the characteristics of the boundary-type woman. She is to be applied to the black woman's purpose. With her left eye and her lower eye, a body resplendent like a jackal's face — her hair and teeth are always standing up; her desire is fierce and she falls upon it fiercely. Her complexion is gray, she is stooped and short; her breasts are high and her shoulders are high. Her eyebrows are merely slightly frowning. This one devours and destroys all servants, or else kills the master. A woman of this kind is to be entirely avoided.

The lotus-woman is of the lineage of gods; the elephant-woman is of the lineage of yakṣas (gnod sbyin); the conch-woman is of the lineage of humans; the spotted-woman partakes of the nature of mountain animals. This is the eighth chapter.

As for those born human: by means of all applications, first the share of the lineage — the bāḍavā is described as the elephant type; the preta-woman (hungry ghost type) is of the root lineage. The pārāpa is of the divine lineage. With shoulders like a parasol and a long neck, with sharp teeth, and moist lips — or else she is of the lotus or red lineage. Her forehead and eyebrows are broad and wide; her hair is soft and golden-pale. Her form is harmonious and slightly frowning; her nose is high, the bridge of her nose is arched; her limbs are soft and her shoulders are long. Her gait is like a swan's, her voice is like a swan's; she delights in fragrances and flowers. She delights in milk, she gives gifts, and is endowed with great merit and elegance.

She who is endowed with the glory of sovereignty gives abundantly; her mind is steady, and she lives on little food.

This is called the First Chapter.

Then, furthermore, it is well explained: she of the elephant type has the legs of an elephant; her arms are long and her face is broad; her eyes are narrow, her ears hang down; her hair is coarse, and she has prominent shoulders; her lips hang down, and her limbs are fully developed. She eats with great voracity. She of the fine-faced type has hanging ears; her desires are few, and she delights in gatherings; her shoulder-tops have drooping folds, and her limbs are slender; her hair is long, her teeth are wide-set; her nails are small and her feet are soft; her nose and belly are long; her voice is like a bee's, and her body is rough. She delights in desire and is genuinely deluded. She is wealthy and mistress of all.

This is called the Second Chapter.

Then, furthermore, it is well explained: she of the deer type has the legs of a deer; her gaze is long, and her body is large; her hair is fine, her teeth are small; her lips are thin, and her body is beautiful; her complexion is like sesame, and her skin is delicate. She delights in crowds and speaks at length. Her voice is like a crow's, and her gait is unsteady. She is perpetually poor and unstable, and by nature she bears a malicious mind. She is one who commits misdeeds and utters harsh words. She is of the animal or hungry ghost lineage.

This is called the Third Chapter.

Then, furthermore, it is well explained: she is learned, her diligence is steady; her wisdom and her discipline are firm; her courage is stable, and she is like an empty vessel in her stillness; her neck is like a pot; her body is proportionate and her limbs are slender; her skin is firm and her nails are red; she speaks pleasingly and is greatly compassionate. She takes constant delight in the nature of giving; she delights in garlands of flowers; she delights in yogic union and in wisdom; her mind is by nature inclined toward compassion. She is distinctly superior to ordinary women.

This is called the Fourth Chapter.

She who takes open delight in fermented drink, who constantly delights in craving — she who constantly engages in low conduct upon the ground — such a one is to be avoided.

This is called the Fifth Chapter.

Then, furthermore, it is well explained: fire-pit by fire-pit is to be understood as equivalent. The kurume fire is to be examined in every respect. The root cakra (saṃskāra) is to be understood as equivalent to a lotus. Smoke and fire are to be thoroughly examined. With white seeds, wood; like conch seeds, flowers. The torma and incense are said to correspond to the lotus. The five elements are to be employed in close conjunction. The three aspects of civet fragrance are performed. Just as ground-seeds extract the toxin from the ground — joining the ring-finger, thumb, and middle finger together into a mudrā, one performs the fire-offering to oneself, the worship and oblation, by means of the character of the nectar syllable. The substance burned in the fire is milk to drink. On the fifth and fourteenth days, and especially on the eighth day, relinquishing distinctions through full union, one performs the fire-offering to the guru just as to oneself. Likewise — just as in the subjugation of the gods, or the destroying of a secret, or the pleasing of the guru — similarly, upon taking a guru, and upon receiving the rite in its entirety, one unites oneself with the fire. By this, the yogin will undoubtedly destroy misdeeds; of this there is no doubt.

This is called the Sixth Chapter.

Then, furthermore, it is well explained: the supreme rite of the mudrā — pressing down with the right outstretched foot, one fully extends the index finger to the heart. By this, the yogin will undoubtedly destroy misdeeds; of this there is no doubt. Having combined the form of the syllable hūṃ with a brass hook together, it causes the nāgas to tremble with fear, makes misguiding spirits shake, opens locked doors, slays elemental beings, tames flesh-eaters, and drives away hungry ghosts. This is the mantra and mudrā of the rite of Tsam-ngam. Furthermore, with the mantra and mudrā of the vajra Tsam-ngam, so as not to let things be destroyed, and for hurling upward and for subjugating elemental beings, smoke-seeds are to be applied. To invite a bodhisattva who has transcended the world, one should use the mudrā of the vajra iron hook. One offers a lotus throne.

This is called the Sixth Chapter.

For worldly dwelling — the mere Tsam — one invites with the conch iron hook, binds with the vajra lasso, gladdens with the vajra iron chain, and makes offering with the vajra bell. With the finger-mudrā of flowers, the finger-mudrā of perfume, the finger-mudrā of incense, the finger-mudrā of butter-lamps, and the finger-mudrā of torma, one equalizes the five offerings and makes offering. One seals with the mudrā of the enclosure, the mudrā of the net, the mudrā of the phurba, the mudrā of the utpala, the mudrā of the śakaṭi, and the mudrā of the lotus. One performs the mudrā of the water fire-offering, the mudrā of the lotus in fire, cutting with the vajra curved knife, slaying with the reversed curved knife, driving away with the sow mudrā, gathering into the heart, and requesting departure. This is called the Chapter on Mudrās, the Seventh Chapter.

Alas, all formations are impermanent,
bearing the nature of arising and ceasing.

Therefore abandon, in just the same way, all desires.

Desires are boundless in their harm, like poison —
they cause one to fall into the hells and to be born in the realm of hungry ghosts.

The qualities of desire, which do not remain even for an instant,
are like a mirage, without essence, like a bubble on water.

Clinging to the finest form of the prime of youth — lovely and pleasing — belongs to the time of childhood.

A beautiful form becomes an unlovely form.

Without a companion, it comes to resemble death.

The beings of this world are impoverished, going about begging.

Therefore, with effort, the yogin
should restrain the body in all circumstances and should restrain food and drink.

At the time of conduct, let this be the restraint.

This is the Eighth Chapter. The Fourth Treatise is complete.

From beyond eight finger-widths,
up to the measure of one thousand cubits —
at eight it subdues enemies,
and at ten it ever increases.

At twelve it is perfectly endowed with power.

At fourteen it is equally pacifying.
At sixteen one digs everywhere.
At the third carrying in the mouth it acts manifestly.
For pacification it is square.
It is endowed with power for lavish giving,
or it may be used for increase as well.
First one should purify the ground.
Vajra sphoṭa mahāteja hūṃ phaṭ.
For the vajra phurba: hrīḥ ha ha.
For the vajra excellence: ha.
For the vajra rite: he he.
For purifying the tongue: sa.
For purifying the hands: āḥ hūṃ.
With the self-nature of the vajra mudrā, one sets it out.

In the midst of fire is the lotus itself;
in the midst of that is the fire deity.
One inserts with the smoke iron hook
and binds with the vajra lasso.
Three faces and six hands precisely,
three eyes likewise, and a belly,
hair perfectly red-yellow,
the color of molasses, pendulous cheeks.
Granting refuge, and a staff,
the threatening finger, and the three-pointed form.
Oṃ sa svāhā — this is the heart of fire.
Oṃ tu ta hūṃ tabṭa te sa svāhā.
One makes offering with the mudrā of wealth.
Likewise one burns with the five substances.
One makes offering with three, according to what is available,
for the purpose of requesting that one to depart.
Likewise with five transformed as lotus:
Oṃ kamala utpalo hrīḥ.
As the deity together with its root,
one draws up the view by means of sound.
For pacification, perfectly white;
for increase, visualize as yellow;

for power, perfectly red;
black itself is wrathful.

One should visualize the form of the deity.

With the yoga of the union seat:

Hūṃ hūṃ sa yam — purification of wood.

Purification of the hūṃ syllable.

Oṃ — purification of o ma.

Hrī ti yi.

Oṃ śusu pita buṣpe bhyo svāhā.

Oṃ dhuva māla kule svāhā.

Oṃ tikṣaṇā dīpe svāhā.

Oṃ kuru kuru vijaya svāhā.

Together with the deity, in the center,
one gathers with a single recitation.

The great hero, of blazing nature,
upon the seat of union with two hands —

Into that deity's mouth one pours the oblation,
so that the deity is satisfied on all sides.

The offering of the eight substances
is made through the form of the hūṃ song,
so that all the buddhas are pleased.

Making the vajra fist with both hands,
one holds it at the side of the hip.

In the manner of flowers, one scatters;
in the manner of a flute, one breathes;
in the manner of cymbals, one resounds;
in the manner of dance, one stirs the limbs;
in the manner of blowing, one blows;
in the manner of a victory banner, one raises up;
in the manner of a canopy, one spreads;
in the manner of a pennant, one hoists;
in the manner of a fan, one fans —

and to the deity itself, for the sake of offering, one bows supremely.

For pacification, one prostrates and bows, and this pacifies.

For increase, one prostrates and bows with reverence.

For accomplishing the yoga of selflessness, one draws forth the hūṃ and holds the seed syllable.

Joined to selflessness, one prostrates and bows to Vairocana in actuality.

In particular, one should make offering to the fire with song and offerings, and enter by means of sound.

Likewise, afterward, at the pouring of the fire oblation, at the half and at the quarter, one should make offering to the fire deity.

This concludes the first chapter.

Now there is something further to be explained.

Again, the examination of the fire:

When it burns high, it is pacification.

When it burns low, it is increase.

When it burns in circles, it has power.

When it burns with crackling, it destroys the self.

Likewise, the very nature of the fire —
a wise yogin should know this.

For pacification with power, it moves together with glory in the east.

In the direction of fire, it is increase;

to the south, wealth is destroyed.

It is a messenger of death, devoid of truth.

To the west, one should undertake power.

In the wind direction, wealth declines;

to the north, the lineage fully flourishes.

This concludes the second chapter.

Now there is something further to be explained.

The examination of the fire-sticks:

The specifics of the fire-sticks:

For pacification, ten finger-widths;

for increase, a man's measure;

for fierce activity, the eighth measure;

for power, the twelfth measure.

Likewise, in that same way, the milk-wood,
and also the lotus priyangu —

in particular, for pacification,

this fire-stick is the supreme rite.

The tāñ-wood and its like,

and milk-dripping wood in the proper manner —
the fire-stick rite, supreme,

is to be applied to increase.

The marking-nut tree and the crooked wood,
and the wood of the crow's nest likewise —
the fire-stick rite, supreme,
is applied to the black activities.

Drinks containing milk,
and likewise equal portions of fruit and grain —
these are taught to be applied to pacification
as the supreme rite of fire offering.

Ox-bile and saffron,
combined with equal portions of grain —
this likewise is the fire offering for increase.

Or alternatively, golden deity substances,
white lotus, saffron,
and one hundred flowers of the myrobalan —
these are exactly suited for power.

The marking-nut with its husk,
poison, and likewise blood,
hot butter oil and also hair —
these are applied to the wrathful direction.

This concludes the third chapter.

Now there is something further to be explained.

Elemental spirits (bhūtas), yakṣas, and likewise nāgas,
gods, garuḍas,

demons that cause madness and tormenting yakṣas,
and the beings who are the goddesses (mātṛkās) —
having made manifest a maṇḍala of nine divisions,
with nine squares and nine portions,
in the center is one's own deity,
and in the direction of power, the rank of gods.

In the east, the portion of nāgas;
in the direction of fire, the yakṣas;
to the south, the elemental spirits.

Likewise the madness-causing ones are in the devoid-of-truth direction.

To the west, the garuḍas;
in the wind direction, the tormas is analogous;

to the north, the tormenting yakṣas.

One should make offering with one's own corresponding portion.

This concludes the fourth chapter.

The tongue is the adept of the supreme, unendurable white light blazing forth, the secret play. The fluid produced by the two upper fangs is called the water of milk. The two fangs, whose color resembles the color of the flowing water, are like roots. The water that dispels the torment of the tongue is the five nectars of the white nectar. Applied to the five expansions in the manner of the taste of nectar, it is not known to the unskilled. Likewise, on the tongue, that white seed is drawn by the iron hook of smoke. At the nose, the nectar of the laughing taste is drawn by the iron hook of wind. Just as awareness perceives awareness, the nectar of that one is thoroughly dissolved. As long as one lives and practices the Dharma, the stream of virtue increases greatly. The wind releases, and the mind is manifest pride. One should constantly practice with the seed of wind.

One pillar, nine syllables, five doors, and the third aperture — this subtle wheel of channels, with the moving, the unmoving, and the secret — is gathered into a single form. By the intrinsic nature of the channels it is impermanent. Having explained this at the first seat, one should first explain one's own nature. Like a tree in bloom, it abides in the center of the navel. The center of that, likewise, has been spoken of thus: wisdom, consciousness, and mentation.

This concludes the fifth chapter, called the Chapter on the Practice of Nectar.

Then again, another thorough explanation is given. One who has obtained a birth endowed with a tongue — in that saṃsāra there is a great wheel, one possessed of the wheel of the wheel. Moving like the common folk and livestock, there are seventy-two thousand channels of the body. Four hundred and fifty are blood and bone without remainder. The water is a half-dre measure. Likewise there are ten thousand insects, and thirty-one thousand body hairs of a man. Sixty each of flesh and blood make the medium person. Three hundred and likewise sixty hours of breath and other channels. Growing in balanced portions: balanced form and balanced light. The channels are turned like a wheel. Like eight wheels, the eightfold — vitality, the five winds, and exhaustion, and rightly heedful of oneself. In the center is the mass of fire itself. The seed of emission in that center, stainless, ever balanced and low. On the outside it becomes twelve. Circling, with the seed in balance, and the breath circling in balance. For the sevenfold purpose of fire and wind, one should meditate on the seed of smoke. Replete with sound and bindu, this has been described as a stream of rain.

This concludes the sixth chapter, called the Chapter on the Wheel.

Then again, what is to be explained: OM is the complete bindu of hope. One should examine all in the syllable of the lama. During the day, the breath is cut in balance — likewise this is the syllable of the deity. When the five great nights are cut, it is like the season of the water-tree being balanced. Six months is night itself; six months of day one should thoroughly examine. An hour, and a half-month, and twelve days of one's nature, in the sixty-fourth portion — the supreme white one, and that is the intrinsic nature of the white ground. Above the head and the feet, and likewise the eyes and nose, and the tongue and ears, the forehead, the aperture of Brahmā — these are possessed of the ground of the white bindu.

The prior portion of the winter direction, and the self-benefit of space, the supreme of birds, the firstborn, the karka, the human and the water-creature pervading the thighs — that is the substantial entity of the smoky ground. In the middle of winter, as before — the palm of the hand, the collection of nails, and certainly likewise the armpit, the throat, the lips, and the group of the chest radiate equally at the kīla point. The awareness of worldly emanation and delight — likewise giving half the world. The wheel of the southern direction turns — that is the temporal ground. The center of the first tooth,

The palm of the hand, the collection of nails, and likewise the armpit and earth, the throat and water, and the border of the chest — likewise, these are the beings endowed with mind. This is called the Seventh Chapter.

Now, further, there is more to be explained. The center of the first tooth and the top of the breast, the heart and the heart most especially — that is the natural abode of the lotus, the very eight parts of consciousness. The center of the first tooth, like the eighth winter month, is camphor that is fine and light, purified to match the color of water — the ground equal to Bhṛdhipāla. The planet governed by the vase, the surface of the main joint, and the top of the breast, the heart and the heart most especially — that is the natural abode of camphor. Successively: a half moon; turtle, turtle, equal turtle; junction and junction equally; lotus, lotus, equal as lotus — dwelling on the ground of the three unstained. The creature born of worms is eaten equally. At the junction of the flank and the bone, at the waist too, lotus and lotus dwell by equal portion. Now this is the ground of the three unstained, where consciousness dwells together. This is called the Eighth Chapter.

Each rounded pha on this side and that side equally; above and below the womb, like the gnosis of gods and goddesses; the thigh and the knee, the knee equal to the thigh; above and below, the very class; at the junction of the fingers and also to the side, the root of division dwells distinctly — that is the natural abode of distinction. One endowed with mind should know this. Pha, pha, equal in roundness; above and below the ten; equal on the thigh and at the knee; above and below in the very class; at the joints of the fingers and also to the side, the root of the canopy of the earth abides as before — those are the natural abode of the earth-canopy. One endowed with mind should know them as dwelling there. This is called the Ninth Chapter.

Now, further, there is more to be explained. Above, at the time-measure of breath, if gnosis should arise, three hundred and likewise thirty — for as long as seven are blended together, the breath at the time-measure of two, one, ten, and half cuts off. That transformation of gnosis is called consciousness. This, in accordance with the general treatise for those endowed with mind, is taught from the treatise for the benefit of the time of practice. By the equality of sixty-four breaths, the ground should always be guarded. This is called the Tenth Chapter.

Now, further, there is more to be explained. Mind is the phenomenon that goes before. Because the mind is pure and mind is what moves, therefore, in regard to mind, the manifest, in all cases, one endowed with mind should apply the mind. The distinction of the seed cannot be subdued by mantras. What fully possesses mudrā (Skt. mudrā) is without play and without manifest sport. For that, ritual bathing is not required; supreme fasting is without tolerance; it is not to be done from a stūpa, and there are no words of a volume. The mudrā of the hands is not bound, and the syllables of mantras are not recited. One should observe the yoga of the instant, and setting out in migration by the practice of yoga — the supreme practice of purity, pure as crystal, possessing gnosis and consciousness. By gnosis, one sets out to the abode. This is called the Eleventh Chapter.

Now, further, there is more to be explained. Pure as crystal, the maṇḍala of the stainless moon, like water of snow and ice, like the color of consciousness — on a white lotus seat, it is pressed down by the lunar maṇḍala. With the eight kinds of offering and the seeds of the eight mantras, begin with white amṛta as food and pure water. On the lotus seat and seat, pressed down by the lunar maṇḍala. Camphor is spoken of as supreme: Vairocana is the deity of gnosis — the white one is Akṣobhya (the Unmoving). Amoghasiddhi is spoken of as smoky; Amitābha is the conch itself; lotus is the precious one.

Civet is the goddess Māmakī. The three unstained ones are Tārā. White garment will become the liberator. The earth-umbrella is Buddha-Eye. This is called the twelfth chapter.

Homage to omniscience.

The four elements in perfect equanimity, ranging forth as the four elements — fire and water are explained here; space itself is emptiness; solidity is the earth element; the entity of warmth is fire. Oṃ is Vairocana in essence. At the crown, the white seed. In the east, Akṣobhya himself — the deity whose form is the syllable A. Hūṃ becomes Amoghasiddhi. Begin in the southern direction. Trāṃ's form is the lord deity. That very one is the deity of boundless light. The crown ornament is in the western direction. That very offering of equanimity, and by Trāṃ's form the lord deity — in the north is Ratnasambhava. The five deities beginning from the crown: arrange them by mind and awareness. By Trāṃ's form the lord deity. The forehead bears the wrathful hand-emblem. The syllable Ka's form is the gnosis deity, like the immovable protector of the earth. By Hrīḥ's form the lord deity — likewise the moon at the two eyes. This is called the first chapter.

Then, furthermore, what is to be explained: by Jaṃ's form the lord deity at the ears is Maitreya himself. By Kṣaṃ's form the lord deity at the cheekbones is the guardian of hungry ghosts. By Sa's form the lord deity, at the tongue also is Māmakī. By Hūṃ's form the lord deity at the throat, like the wrathful Hayagrīva. By Śrīṃ's form the lord deity — the gnosis deity is supremely principal; at the heart, the supreme gnosis. The deity equal to the five fingers — the five are the buddhas themselves. By A, the ambrosia goddess, like a vajra-beauty at the palm. By Śrīṃ's form the lord deity at the navel is the purifier itself. By Cuṃ's form the lord deity — likewise oneself is Heruka. By Laṃ's form the lord deity — likewise the two thighs are the earth's essence. By Yuṃ's form the lord deity at the knees is the hungry-ghost goddess. By Trāṃbi's form the hungry-ghost deity below is the chief of elementals. This is called the second chapter.

Then, furthermore, excellently explained: Oṃ hrī he ha ha ha hūṃ phaṭ — this is the mantra of the proximate rite. A blue-bodied form with a frowning face, three-eyed countenance, with a belt and a diadem at the crown. Seven union-seats, the mudrā of manifest mastery, with power; adorned with silk-filled pendants and ear-ornaments; endowed with serpent-offerings held aloft as ornament. Wearing red garments and carrying a serpent-skin. In the left hand, a vessel full and beautiful. In the second hand, a staff; in the third, a battle-axe; upward, a banner and bell in the right. Vajra-grinder, iron hook, and bell — hand-emblems of the solar-seat lotus-holder, the fire-centered Heruka, the glorious protector, utterly terrifying. In the eastern retinue is Māmakī, holding a skull in her hand. In the southern retinue is Buddha-Eye, in the manner of an embracing gesture. In the west is Tārā, spoken of by fragrance; likewise holding a garland of flowers in her hand. White torma fully present — place her in the northern direction. The empowered vajra-beauty, and the Meru-wood hand-goddess, the song-goddess of untethered truth, and the dance-goddess moving like wind. This is called the third chapter.

Then, furthermore, excellently explained: Sa śrī svāhā — for the east. Sa hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ svāhā — for the south. Sa kṣuṃ saha — for the west. Sa kṣuṃ kṣuṃ kṣuṃ svāhā — for the north. Hūṃ — for the empowered one. He — for the Meru-one. He — for the truth-free one. Hrī — for the wind-one. Oṃ vajra aṅkuśa jaḥ. Oṃ vajra pāśa hūṃ. Oṃ vajra sphoṭa vaṃ. Oṃ vajra ghaṇṭe hoḥ. Oṃ padma udbhāvaya svāhā — for the seat. Oṃ puṣpaṃ bhyo sa. Oṃ dhūpe bhyo śa. Oṃ dīpaṃ bhyo hrī. Ghacchante svāhā. Bhāvena sura āgamanāya svāhā.

This is called the fourth chapter.

The lord of the lotus, whose body is the color of gold,
the nature of scented water, supremely luminous,
whose taste is the essential nature of nectar-water —
with the thumb, cast it upon the ground.

With the central Mount Meru, churn the nectar.
Scatter and offer the eight portions as they are.

By the form of Ha, seize the color.
By the syllable Ho, make it stainless.
The hero, by the form of Hrīḥ, destroys.
Know the sequence in just this way.

With the hook, draw all the gods near from every direction.
Satisfy them with the syllable of nectar.
The hook moves from all directions,

and the identity of the yogin is the defining mark.

Glorious Vajradhara himself — purify with the seed-syllable of smoke.
The torma has been purified.
Purify it with that seed-syllable.

Separately, make three offerings of the mouth.
The messenger is invoked by the yoginī.

Kaḍa kaḍa bandha bandha nahṛi kha kha kha śatruṃ ja ja śatruṃ māraṇa bali batali dhevati śesva.

This is called the fifth chapter.

Then, furthermore, to be correctly explained:

From clay, fashion an image —
three faces, three eyes, three legs, three hands, terrifyingly laughing,
with elephant eyes, a zombie-woman,
always holding a sword and a lasso,
clothed in red, wrapped in red skin.
Both feet instantly pressing the ground,
the zombie mudrā visibly thrust against the heart.
By reciting the seed-syllable of the sound Hūṃ, protecting the teaching and causing it to wither —
the great messenger of light is made manifest.

Kārya kārya bandha bandhe,
nāda nāda hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ.

This is the mantra of the supreme messenger.
In the same way, for empowerment and dispatch,
mixed together with poison,
write it visibly in blood.
Visibly press it with the foot,
and the wise one recites it in sequence.
Recite once and not again —
once, press the mudrā.

The names, three hundred times.
With black, yellow, and sandalwood,

and the seeds of red flowers,
write the three maṇḍalas.
The incense fragrance of black bdellium.
With the torma belonging to it, offer accordingly.
This is called the yellow messenger-woman.

This is called the sixth chapter.

Then, what is to be correctly explained:

Pervaded by the darkness of ignorance and by swarms of insects and worms, human beings enact the particular forms of wrongdoing every single day.
From the great paths of virtue, persons are born in the middling birth.
Through hearing, being gladdened, inspired, and viewing correctly, human wisdom becomes supreme and supremely transforming.
The Victor's liberation is supremely known in ultimate truth.
Subtle, supremely subtle, and utterly refined — without thing-ness, and free from thing-ness.
The object of yogic engagement is understood as bliss.
Through meditation cultivated by wisdom and made pure,
equanimously purified, it is the Middle Way.
Always utterly pure of self,
it is not defiled by desire.

This is called the seventh chapter.

Perpetually adorned upon the crown with the essences of the five buddhas,
at the seat of the non-dual mudrā —
meditate there on the nature of ocean water.
Satisfy the consciousness at the crown of the head.
To the left is Akṣobhya.
Amoghasiddhi dwells to the right.
Ratnasambhava also adorns the left.
Place Amitābha behind.
Hold the five buddhas.
Never taught elsewhere,
it is taught as the buddha's treatise.
In the morning, afternoon, and at midday —
hold it always throughout the three times.

Washed by this seed-syllable,
the scattered offering is thoroughly purified.
The fifth is offered in proper combination.
Purify the drop of the chiling-ga.
By mere meditation on the orb,
consciousness together with it becomes white.

This is called the eighth chapter.

How wondrous — this is supreme among all actions.
How wondrous — this yoga is astounding.
How wondrous — the Dharma is pinnacle and summit.
Sages arose together in amazement.
This teaching of supreme wisdom —

The bodhisattvas assembled and spoke. The phenomenon that is the mind of gnosis — this is explained to you in words. The supreme gnosis-mudrā is the true arising of the root of gnosis. Pure as crystal, it is the sign of purity, of non-duality. The one who makes offering through the divine limbs is perfectly endowed with non-dual establishment. Through the essential nature of non-dual consciousness, the wise should know the nectar. By offering the water of nectar, the outer yoginī is worshipped. This vajra of the non-dual mudrā, like the non-dual mudrā of the three roots — by riding together on lotus and foot, union is the application of nectar. The reality of the equal vajra and lotus: the male emits the sound of HŪM, and by intrinsic nature the sound is released; like the white gnosis of both, by its intrinsic nature the particle is to be applied with the seed of smoke. The sensory organ, the rutabila, equally — together with khara, honey, and bīla flesh, and nectar-water, perfectly combined — offered to the asterism, the moon, and the deity, it accomplishes great aims and brings them under control. This is called the first chapter.

Then there is yet more to be explained. In the manner of the essential nature of emptiness, it is both outer and inner. From the practice of gnosis and Dharma, the supreme practice of gnosis: all that abides in the body is not known at all through delusion. Therefore, having fully abandoned delusion, one should cultivate the abiding of gnosis alone. Delusion arises through the mode of agitation and bustle; therefore, fully abandon agitation and bustle. Through the practice of solitude, accomplished by solitariness, one should begin the journey alone. As seen by childish persons, therefore that very solitariness — know its abiding as the abiding without fixed place; and in the essential nature where things have no existence, having the identity of non-duality, dispel the knowledge of the two. That very reality is supremely subtle; the practice too is supremely subtle. Recite it above the throat, at the level of the knee, at the center of the brow, and at the very corner of the eye. At the door, the drop becoming subtle — like particles of a subtle wheel — is perfectly united with the supreme and primary. It is to be known from what the master teaches. That particle of gnosis is suchness itself; therefore the wise should know it. This is called the second chapter.

Then there is yet more to be explained. Abandon the things that are faults and the things that are virtues. Seal the door of the palate as it truly is. From the nine orifices and the palate itself, exhalation arises from the nine openings. At the upper door of the male, there, like a white lotus, place it upon the entire body. Meditate on each deity individually. With that very seed of the deity, just as one places the vajra-mudrā, in the center of the maṇḍala of the wind, it resembles the maṇḍala of the moon. Direct gnosis-consciousness supremely. The suchness of the coarse and the subtle coarse is like being equally and closely connected to the coarse. Name the supreme essence abiding in the heart. From the root of the mind, likewise hika. Above, below, and likewise above — purify with the making of the syllable and with both. With the seed for reversal, purify together with the wise mind. This is called the third chapter.

Then there is yet more to be explained. The supreme gnosis of gnosis that abides in the entire body — having fully set aside earth, mountain, trees, hollows, water, worms, and insects, gnosis abides in the body, which is without mind. Insects and worms are the dulled gnosis; set them aside as distinctly other. In three categories: gods, yakṣas, asuras, hungry ghosts, ḍākinīs, form and gnosis, and likewise the wrathful — just as gnosis is peaceful and pacified, all that abides in the body: let the wise know the distinction. This is called the fourth chapter.

Then there is yet more to be explained. The wondrous birth of the sage: one pillar, nine gates, three openings, and the gnosis deity. Consciousness, gnosis, in the body — how is the dharmadhātu known? At the time of attaining liberation, the gnosis body is as it truly is. How the dharmadhātu itself, gnosis, and the aspect of form are — how gnosis is seen, and what the gnosis form is: that very form is without mind. Examine it in the syllables of the nectar (amṛta). The gnosis deity is equal to reality itself — just as with the characteristics described before. This is called the fifth chapter.

Then there is yet more to be explained. The very distinction of mantra and tantra: at the end of tīla tīla, endowed with the sound of emptiness and authenticity, above, grant the drop of nectar. Know it perfectly in the supreme syllable. One thousand three hundred and eight — that is the characteristic of recitation. Placing oneself in the body: in that same way, generate and create the deity. Equal to the eight actions, it is the distinction of the eight squares. For one who has intelligence in the four actions, similarly, first approach and attend to the seed. Oṃ āgacchatu de-sam ye ākarṣaya hūṃ phaṭ — this is the mantra of invitation. This is called the sixth chapter.

Then there is yet more to be explained. The invitation by one who possesses gnosis:

Oṃ akṣonityaṃ mahānāgata kṣa ka wa sa wa ta na hūṃ ga hūṃ ga svāhā —
this is the mantra of the nāgas.

Oṃ dhanādhipiṃ ājñāna yakṣaṇo māgaccha samaya udabhāpa krum krum
krum hrīḥ svāhā —

this is the mantra of the yakṣas.

Oṃ bhātakrodhena-bhe āgaccha samaya ud-mahe phu phu phum jaḥ —
this is the mantra of elemental spirits.

Oṃ ghuru ghuru ākarṣaya hūṃ hri jaḥ —

this is the samaya mantra for drawing in elemental spirits. This is called the seventh chapter.

Then there is yet more to be explained. Whoever knows the supreme Dharma, whoever knows non-conceptuality, whoever fully recognizes the nature of deity in consciousness — that one is a yogin. Whoever does not know the secret, the supreme Dharma, the most subtle and supreme, the supreme that abides throughout the entire body: by venerating one's own body, one venerates the other shore. If it is done otherwise, the nature of the deity is ruined. That very nature of veneration is the veneration of suchness. Since everything is to be known from the body, everything is the satisfaction of the nature of deity. Through having that very gnosis become the deity, from one's own nature comes everything — having always fully abandoned afflictions, one becomes the body of gnosis. Its name is likewise pure. The intelligent one who engages in the practice of yoga: the non-virtues committed in other lifetimes are cut through simply by reading. This is the eighth.

These are proclaimed by the Sugata in eighteen expositions. The analysis of the sixty-four divisions of what is called the Root Wheel, from among the eighteen, is now complete.

Homage to omniscience. Yoga, the very sovereign of yoga — likewise a treatise on practice, and the domain of gnosis of the sages: dwelling in a pure abode, omniscience spoke thus. The full explanation of the Root Wheel: strive supremely toward emptiness, possess the sovereign of gnosis authentically, rest steadfast in non-duality, non-duality. The nature of the four elements, the divisions of the nine channels, and likewise the superiority of the nine deities — through mantras and the three actions, the king comes under one's control. The realm of objects, sense bases, and the body itself as sovereign: draw them in through the five gates. Water, fire, space, and wind — these abide in the body. Water is the great sovereign lord, and likewise the channel of the white nectar. Fire blazes fiercely as smoke, and likewise burns as grief. The great sovereign, the channel whose nature is a conch shell, abides rightly through impermanence. Space — the channel of space itself:

The lotus channel is likewise stable and permanent. The musk-deer channel is one of complete delusion. It generates the body and is the abode of suffering. The three stainless ones are the wavering channels. Sound is white in its accomplishment. The dividing channel is that of affliction itself. It is the channel of sin and the abode of sin — it is non-knowing, it is the animal realm itself. The earth-canopy channel is the supreme sovereign. The white sprout, the excellent division, and likewise the unbearable through valour — earth is declared as a conch shell. Space stirs and moves. It is a thing that, through delusion, craves and fears. Likewise it is the abode of affliction and sin. The mind that stirs and is given to wavering — in the very channel of ignorance and the animal realm, what are the nine deities called? Through division, the eighteen aspects are thus the noble sovereign of gnosis. The basis of merit and sin of beings — likewise the karma of sentient beings in existence — likewise afflictions are declared as hell. Existence is the very substance of father and mother; otherwise it is the manifold of consciousness itself. What is called "the king" — what does it mean? The domain of the sense faculties is the king. Through mutual reliance, one upon another, the mechanism of the body arises diversely. The body of afflictions, body hair, and so forth — this is the very foundation of the body. As an elephant struck at its vital point by a lasso that binds to cyclic existence, so too a yogin of little strength from previous lives delights in emptiness.

This concludes the first chapter, called "The Exposition."

Then, moreover, another excellent teaching: the deities of the channels, in likewise sequential order — the twelfth is drawn out conspicuously. Of the white elemental form, by the reasoning of the four parts of the arm, the intrinsic nature of the white abode at the crown — above the five expanded ones, the blazing tip is on top. At the center of the forehead likewise a drop, and the eye too is that which is bound. The ear is the channel of listening. The left breath is of the female; likewise the right is of the male. The blue is the breath of the previous moment, and it is the very channel of the tongue and taste. The nectar is described as having nine aspects and is universally known at the white channel. The prior characteristic being that of smoke, the great channel of blazing smoke abides precisely on the face of the shoulder. At the junction between the chest and the turtle it is the channel in the middle of the junction. Like the shape of the fingers of the hand — the fingers and the backs of the nails — the channel of the remaining smoke is universally known as the chest itself. Of the sides and likewise what is near them, and likewise joint by joint, saliva, bad odor, and the armpit together, the base of the chest and the arm's root, and the channel at the back of the waist — these are universally known as the conch. The first joint and the waist itself, the thigh and near to the thigh are indicated. The channel of the belly of beings: the foot, the fire of time, the lotus-foot — the sovereign itself. At the channel, one who possesses intelligence will know. The musk-deer: the abode within the abode of desire, always described as marked by heaviness. The channel beyond the teacher — beings moving there — likewise, parasites arise. The musk-deer at the location of the flank — in the domain of the principal it is universally known. Footless, it abides on the left foot, at the vital point of the foot and the tip of the nose, traveling in the wake of the knee. The hungry ghost (preta) is said to be like an ascetic aflame; it is universally known as the channel itself. The left channel of the principal's portion — the armpit and just next to the armpit. The channel likewise of the fierce assembly; abiding in the network is likewise so. By the count of the openings of the nipple, it is likewise declared to be one part in a thousand. Through the channels that are the intrinsic nature of those divisions, it is universally known throughout the body. The earth-canopy, the left shoulder, and likewise it abides precisely in the chest. The extremity of the channels at junctions and joints, likewise the arms of beings, through the division of the six sense bases — by their intrinsic nature, quadrilateral —

The place of natural downflow arises in oneself and in the person as well. In ultimate reality it is without inherent existence, yet through compassion and love for the benefit of the world, its arising is without fault.

The supreme and excellent gnosis of the abode of beings — pure, without inherent existence, of ultimate Madhyamaka — sovereign lord of the twelve links beginning from ignorance: the hope placed in R̥ṣabha and the rest does not arise through the union of nectar. The union that is correct abides in the center, utterly abandoning the faults of existence. The yogi of knowledge understands through the skilled that this is the station of the union of the twelve. This is the chapter called "The Wheel of Channels," the second.

Then again, what further is to be explained: the divisions of arising from every source, the separate abiding of individual persons, the separate channels and breaths — when another's limb is cut, the sovereign wind arises in many forms, and the arising wind is severed. Below the chest and above the waist, surrounded by the maṇḍala of wind, the non-existent and the existent abide truly. Without color, yet all phenomena are material. Formless gnosis together with what has form — the abode of the matter of emptiness and non-emptiness. The great king, sovereign of gnosis, resting upon the maṇḍala of wind, itself performs the activity of consciousness. The master that transforms the twelve real factors — three hundred and likewise sixty: the hours of breath are like the channels. From the flowing of the white in the morning one knows day and night. The identity of the twelve transferences is likewise the same for day and night. Through the cutting off at the ground of the twelve, it is the sign of traveling northward. In the southern direction, as before, the wind of the day is severed. The food applied as far as Viṣṇu is precisely renowned in sequence. This sequence of the union of breaths is applied to action by one who possesses gnosis. The rotating master of the border region and its surrounding districts follows in sequence. Rohita, Mohita, Bhadra, Prabhūta, Guru, Kūrma, Makaranda — likewise the dreamer, the mute, confusion, fear, and desire: these are the twelve grounds, the faults of existence.

To Rohita one should make offerings to the gods. Through Mohita wealth is found. Through Bhadra one eats beautifully. Bheṣava produces much anger. Kūrma is supremely given to mental anxiety. Makara is the basis of speech. Guru is the object of accomplishment. Through Randhra comes a mind of wickedness. Byākulī brings its own nature. Through Svapna comes the mode of dreaming. Delusion brings supreme mental anxiety. One becomes skilled in singing, reciting, and learning. Desire is explained as copulation. These are the twelve faults and defects of existence.

By one as if crystal, the chief is single; in the extended form, by seven pigments. The consciousness of that is the real thing of existence; its object abides without inherent existence. This is the chapter called "Gnosis," the third.

Then again, what further is to be explained: how the three bodies are empty — this is to be grasped with a focused object of observation. Not devoid of intrinsic nature, one should examine space in phenomena. By abandoning the faults of phenomena, one does not abide in form and it is exhausted. The yogi who abides on the path causes form not to abide and brings it to exhaustion. The outer emptiness, the lower as well, is emptiness — the faultless center is empty. The emptiness of everything, and beings too, is emptiness — the fifth. The five sense objects too are emptiness, and likewise the sense faculties and so forth: one abides truly without examining them as empty. Therefore the mode of emptiness is without dust.

Just as a farmer skillfully purifies his field again and again, and by releasing the plow turns everything completely over, thereby clearing away on a vast scale the grass and trees that harm the field — and so it is thus called pure and clean —

In just the same way, the master of supreme union too should be established as the second. Likewise, in that same way, the outer is also washed. Therefore the wise should purify by the mode of the three through emptiness.

Just as form and emptiness are so, in the center is the seed of consciousness. Seed, seed, and sprout — form, the sense faculties, and the root ground. The characteristic of each part, in the manner of intrinsic nature, abides truly in the flawless vajra-nature. From the six sense faculties six rites arise truly. The twelve divine abodes, the ground sarva, and the supreme syllables of mantra are to be accomplished through the magical display of mind. Alas, how bewildered are sentient beings! The mantra ugu ugu, and the contemplation of the equal image of deteriorated form — these are abandoned entirely by the very essence. Therefore the mind follows the supreme syllables of mantra. The mantra that arouses and stirs and generates all sentient beings is to be understood with certainty by one possessed of intelligence. Those who accept that mantras without suchness can lead beings are fools. The image and mind of those who speak wrongly, and by the ultimate supreme syllable that is the very identity of mantra — the four activities and their rites are fully renowned.

This is called the chapter on emptiness, the fourth.

Then, moreover, what is to be taught: faults and qualities are abandoned. The position of the Middle Way is free from fault. The body arising from mind, pure by intrinsic nature, is to be engaged with the mind of the single yoga of selflessness. Just as water in an unfired vessel destroys, so too, you destroy many inner yogas. Just as a potter fills everything fully with fire, bringing the many to exhaustion in the center, it becomes like one's own form. By the blazing fire of the sovereign inner gnosis, through that destruction, form here is liberated. By the purity of intrinsic nature, the phenomena of purity — the great path of the pure melody — abandon the ocean of impure bewilderment along with conceptuality. The phenomena of purity are supremely peaceful. The phenomena of purity are without fault. In order to attain awakening through purity, the phenomena of purity are supremely taught.

First, the Victor himself from the bow, striving supremely in the west with moisture. The mother of the three bodies abides together — let the one possessed of intelligence plant the seed. The vital force is said to abide there. In the morning one truly abides as a being. When the breath transfers in proper sequence, apply the twelve in order. At the navel is the lasso of cattle — its seed is said to be cattle. The water-tree and flower abide at the navel; they abide standing erect at the heart. The mouth is rounded below — let the wise one elaborate this. With the sound of the syllable of nectar, let it be drawn together pleasantly. The sovereign of that, the gnosis-king, is the sovereign of the thirteen born of the egg. In the seventh color there are many forms. Likewise, a hundred rays of sunlight — by gnosis, examine what is to be known; by what is known, examine beings. Just as in the surge of a silk eye, the mindless undergoes distinct transformations. Just as the ignorant who are bewildered — gnosis cuts through the afflictions. By an ocean of lamps those who possess gnosis travel their own desired path. Then the intrinsic nature of all sentient beings, pressed by branch winds, freedom itself, and wind — likewise these pores of the hair: without a body equal to wind, and absent too from the mind of wind. Even in the very shape of the body, emptiness abides in all the limbs. Everything has the nature of water. The body, too, in the mind — all flesh has the nature of water. Water pervades everything. Earth and water are equal — they are examined as pervading outwardly. Likewise the water of the body truly abides pervading everything. In the body, fire accompanied by warmth blazes through everything in the shape. Earth, through everything everywhere, adorns form through the power of the faculties. Therefore the body of the four elements is pervaded by constituents and channels.

The channels are the very substance of the equal aspect. In the shape of equality, the yogin meditates on the deity. This is called the chapter on meditating on the deity, the fifth.

Then there is yet more to be explained. Where do the five deities dwell? In the three cavities and the nine gates — likewise the abiding place of the deity's own nature. With the wind restrained, dwelling with the fire of the body, it abides in the hollow of the heart, born like an egg. Just as the form of a subtle atom, so it is indicated through the gate. The very shape of the nine gates is correctly known as eight-petalled. Like the form of a subtle atom — in that way the deity is ever more subtle and subtle. The fifth of the five, the lord of five — by its own intrinsic nature (svabhāva) pervading, it utterly abandons. Sotike is the one, and likewise water and non-water make two. Likewise, just as the cavity itself, it is correctly known as nine joints, nine gates, and nine channels. First, the very substance of emptiness — the abiding place above, in the center, and in the equal state. Form and feeling, the subdued — these too are of the nature of that which has no substance, which is empty. The shape of the ocean's water, with a pistil at its center. Water is to be applied in the nine. Likewise the lotus born of water. The gnosis-lord deity of that — dwelling in the householder's egg-born state with equanimity, seeds upon the eight petals, in order, just as the deity of the channels. At the back of that, in the channels too, the gate of one's own nature, subtle as it is — having opened, adorning one's own nature, supremely adorned everywhere by the deity. Having trained one's own nature in that deity, the shape of the engagement body and so forth itself — if without engagement one performs the engagement, it will become as splendid as before. In the body of vajra-essence, it is supremely adorned by deity upon deity. Just as when a spread-out house is burned by fire, one who is virtuous, of proper lineage, and learned dwells in the abode of deities and the like. Likewise the deluded ocean is the ground of the deity. This is called the chapter on the egg-born, the sixth.

Then there is yet more to be explained. What the yogin must certainly inhale — what is the very nature of that inhalation: the gate is to be sealed with the seed syllables. Sealed by the nine seed syllables, that is the nature of the nine yogas. Just as the gate of Brahmā is sealed, and likewise the nine gates of the stūpa — through the substance of unmoving breath, seal with the syllables of nectar. At the far end of what is gathered and abides, it is movement by its own intrinsic nature. Furthermore, the two names of the fierce one — the tip, by means of the seed syllables of smoke. Thus the inhalation is the state of equality: half a syllable and a double are to be trained. The moving shape of the form of HŪṂ — the blazing of equal inhalation itself. Through playing without harm, one should resort to the terror of saṃsāra. The twelve — the sovereign ladies of the earth. Likewise, through having inhaled the breath, the misdeeds of former lives, the sense-objects and faculties in proximity — through the ocean of blissful-union inhalation, one who possesses gnosis severs the misdeeds. Having led equally before in accordance with what is proper, and having grasped one at the edge, by grasping one seed syllable, thereby the eight gates are made equal. Through the meditation of abandoning the twelve, the eight gates are utterly perfected. Just as a king, through training, excellently transforms — warmth and the nature of cattle are actions of the body. The childish one rides the vast waves of self-will — likewise the body is chief among the weapons of self-will. This is called the chapter on training in transference, the seventh.

Then there is yet more to be explained. The host that draws out is itself the ninth — explained as the subtle form, encircled by the maṇḍala of wind. The sequence of the twelve and the nine is firmly established in the nine engagements. Just as the nine winds of this — in the maṇḍala of the wind of consciousness, the shape of fire in the center of the wind, likewise the syllable of the smoke of fire — U, endowed with Re in the right direction.

Speech is explained as an ocean.

Likewise the gnosis-drop (bindu) abides there — meditate upon sound and through sound.

Through the gate of excretion, just so,
one transfers perfectly from the faults of existence.

From nose, ear, and eye — not these —
one becomes the sovereign of human beings.

The navel drop, and likewise what is above —
the abiding places higher up are to be known.

Like the root of mind,
one purifies likewise at the heart center.

The seed of the wind that causes lifting up
is to be known as the place of equanimity.

Thus have I explained the characteristics;

otherwise the teacher, the guru, will instruct.

Above, this gate of Brahmā

is at once explained by the name "transference."

Just as a bee, drawn into the dance of a flower, grows drunk on its nectar and the mind dissolves —
likewise the lord of gnosis, abiding at the gate, is destroyed by the pressing of Uttrantra.

How wondrous! — this is the supreme path of Dharma.

How wondrous! — it is the cutter of cyclic existence.

How wondrous! — it is the abiding rank of liberation.

How wondrous! — gnosis is a thing of great wonder.

This is called the chapter on the practice of transference, the eighth.

Then there is yet more to be explained. Possessing the characteristics spoken of before, one must first purify the body. One rests directly in front of oneself. Oneself is a deity, and likewise others — those beings deluded about a different consciousness — one draws them straight in with the syllables of their names. The lord of gnosis of this one dissolves into the center of the egg-born. Having meditated upon the gnosis body, the body of the wise one transfers completely. By first inhaling and exhaling, one transfers together simultaneously, just as before.

The very absence of sinful conduct — this is being free from sin.

Dwelling rightly through conduct that abandons sin,
one purifies sin in the ocean of afflictions.

Abandoning sin, and likewise delusion —
through the practice one purifies sin.

Through the absence of conduct, sin is purified.

Always abiding on the path of purifying sin,
the body of the practice is without fault.

By abiding at the boundary of the breath,
through this one abides in a deviation upward.

By directing the breath to the navel,
the mind is in the formless state of existence.

Sin does not abide anywhere at all.

The stain of all transgressions —

by applying the practice of transference, one is freed.

Father and mother are to be slain,
and likewise the king and the two priests.
If one destroys the country together with its circle,
that person is said to be pure.
When the time arrives, one must transfer —
at the wrong time one would slay the gods.

So long as one lives and practices the Dharma,
the stream of virtue increases throughout.
Just as a skilled potter fills many vessels year by month —
the eye, and the formless wheel that does not tremble — examine consciousness and gnosis in all aspects.

This is called the chapter on the complete transference of the body, the ninth.
Then there is yet more to be explained. The practitioner of the treatise on practice — in classifying the natures of the inhalation: from the breadth of four finger-widths, space; from space, stars and a mass of blazing fire; in the center of the fire, the syllable A; this space and moon — in the center, drops of nectar. The wheel bearing the net of the sun draws out drops of nectar. As the seed blazes and blazes, in the center is the syllable of nectar. In the center is the syllable A, blue in color. The five rays likewise extend in their directions. At the center of Mount Meru as it blazes, it appears as the gate of the drop. The nectar-water of the form of the syllable A — it is the deity of the second color.
Just as a hollow is emptiness itself, it is always the deity of the empty. Just as the nostrils take in, this too is nectar of the tongue. The three syllables are to be joined. The deluded one joins a vowel at the throat. U is supreme in its successive forms; it clears all afflictions completely. The syllable HŪṂ is the supreme lord; previously the lotus was equanimity itself. The egg-born was previously forbearance.

That deity is supremely complete. With its countless rays of light, the lord of wisdom, sovereign of that state, is to be meditated upon with the breath held still. Bearing a staff of power and terror, the form of HŪṂ — the sovereign lord.
Just as the navel is primacy itself, the form of E is a body of signs, explained as utterly joyful throughout. The deity of oneself and other deities: the deity of oneself is supreme. Through what is known as the seat of the self, the deity of the self is to be worshipped.

This concludes the tenth chapter, called "The Chapter on the Seat of the Self."

Now, further, what is to be explained: the defining characteristics of light rays — with the mudrā (Skt. mudrā) of the iron-chain vajra, the ground is to be purified. With the form of HŪṂ, the lotus is turned. Upon the foundation of the solar maṇḍala a crown is to be placed. If one desires to become the deity of the self, the deity is to be drawn out from the breath. With form complete and pleasing, the supreme state is to be meditated upon. To each of the eight abodes, the eight mudrās are to be shown. For karma and its distinctions, the mantra practitioner recites the seed-syllable of this. The four aspects of the ground itself — likewise expanded through the form of KṢA. For empowerment, the syllable YAṂ is auspicious. The form of HA enacts the manifest. That the offering is complete and all-sufficient is to be understood by looking further. Afterward one fully engages in the activity, and it is to be dissolved into one's own body.

This concludes the eleventh chapter, called "The Chapter on the Seat of Another."

Now, further, what is excellently explained: seventy-two thousand precisely — definitively established as the channels of the body. From the count of nine thousand, a hundred million and more dwell in joy. With the form of emptiness as the preliminary, the one endowed with intelligence generates the seed. Even having broken through the defiled body, at its heart is the lotus itself — the egg-born, the ground of emptiness. By joining in equipoise to that abiding state, it is to be known as the abode of that. With the light rays of the rising sun, abiding like the finest dust particles — the roots of the lotus are each to be bound. Likewise with blazing light rays, a fully complete body arises. The fully complete divine body is to be observed throughout by the yogin. With form in the desire realm and its states of existence, and so forth — through continuous reliance on yoga, the gnosis of the support is thereby seen. At the center of the maṇḍala of wind, it resembles the maṇḍala of fire. At the center of the maṇḍala of fire, it resembles the maṇḍala of the sun. At the center of the maṇḍala of the sun, it resembles the maṇḍala of the moon. At that center, as has been taught, lies what bears the name "the seat of union." Through meditating on phenomena without movement, the ocean of afflictive existence is exhausted. Since gnosis is obscured by afflictions, that gnosis is sovereign.

Just as a child at play in the presence of its parents, with the bindu and with the body blazing and trembling — from without, that gnosis of this is to be strenuously applied. Even though the yoga guru has taught this pleasantly, this concludes the twelfth chapter, called "The Chapter on the Seat of Union."

Now, further, what is to be explained: the supreme union is taught as equanimity. The word of action is to be without intrinsic nature. The body is released into the higher abode. The subtle object is unclothed. The gate of expansion is to be sealed. Likewise, the stūpa is sovereign. The breath rises upward from the lower region; likewise the belly is filled with wind. The gnosis drop remains in its place. Consciousness is certainly dissolved. Without destruction and without harm, meditate in the nature of meditative equipoise. Through drawing in the maṇḍala of wind, gnosis at the center is without flaw. Through the path that the guru has explained, it is always and certainly to be observed.

Just as a young girl, bewildered by words, with both of them drawn together, strings bound, speaks with words — though the path is shown, she is unable to grasp it —

So too the yogin is like one shown a wrong path.

This concludes the thirteenth chapter, called "The Secret Seat."

Then, moreover, what is to be explained: those not yet liberated are to be liberated; those not yet freed, I myself shall free. With such compassionate intent, one should practice the meditative concentration of union. The body has three aspects; speech likewise has four aspects; the mind has three aspects — guard these through the body and thoroughly restrain them. The ground of duality is to be fully abandoned. One who possesses gnosis should resort to liberation. Momentary enjoyment is likewise suffering; the non-dual is to be shown together. For sentient beings in this very life, in one moment excellence, in the next moment ruin — likewise, the enjoyment of the deluded is not to be regarded by the yogin. Therefore the place of fault, the fault of beings, the reality of conditioned existence — the desire for the fruit of a single place of superior enjoyment is reversed. The place of enjoyment is called the ground of the craving that beings have in giving. Therefore, having abandoned the path of duality, the yogin in the same way centers himself. Through the practice of union with equal-minded focus, the Dharma of conduct is peaceful and without flaw. The selfless body is authentically established; one rests in equipoise upon selflessness.

This concludes the fourteenth chapter, called "Understanding the Trainings."

Then, moreover, what is to be explained: at the heart, a moon disk is placed; at its center, the syllables of nectar — in every aspect the nectar mantra, with blazing rays of light, is to be meditated upon. Through application to the place of peace, this is renowned among yogins. Just as that very moon is adorned with the syllable of the cit sound — its form pleasing like the color of gold — through meditating on rays of light of many kinds, the yogin who desires the goal thus practices the union of buddha. The form of Hūṃ is the substance of empowerment; resting upon the maṇḍala of the sun, the very rite of the many rays of light is renowned as empowerment itself. At the center of the maṇḍala of wind, the maṇḍala of wind is the ground of equanimity; as it truly is, blue rays of light blaze forth — this is renowned as manifest activity.

This concludes the fifteenth chapter, called "Karma."

Then, moreover, what is to be explained: there is what is called the food-medicine of union. Petals, flowing milk, and likewise the flower ajagā — its scent is distinguished as a beautiful fragrance; its color is green and yellow; it has the power of a single root, and it blazes like fire. Through meditating on the syllables of nectar, it is joined to the fire of offering and recitation. Mixed equally with butter and honey, one eats it measure by measure — one hundred and likewise eighty — this the wise one should eat. Should the yogin dwell for one hundred years on a solitary mountain, one who possesses gnosis will certainly see his gnosis body fully flourish. The craving of the faculties, hunger and the like, will disappear. The abode is the supreme certainty; it is grounded in root-yoga joined with union. Thus, possessing the quality of great hearing, this treatise on union is without flaw. One who is certain to be an ordinary migrating being, holding the status of the Sugata (the Well-Gone One, the Buddha) — such a yogin, recovered and renewed, is one who possesses gnosis and contemplates gnosis.

This completes the sixteenth chapter, the fifth of the five.

Homage to the ḍākinī. Glorious hidden Prajñendriya (the Lord of Wisdom), by the light of the sun, illuminates the realm of the world. Through whose power the cataract accumulated from the distinguishing features of many things is destroyed — who at every time and always engages in battle with the hostile enemy of pride that thoroughly imbibes — with one great seed of equanimity, the mountain of non-attached gnosis is made equal. The form of Hūṃ is that which extracts. The form of Hūṃ is the supreme deity. The form of Hūṃ has become empty. Homage and praise to the syllable Hūṃ! The essential nature of the eight syllables — with conduct and without conduct, secret —

Water, fire, and likewise wind —
earth is the syllable of the eye.

The four doors and the four aggregates,
egg-born, dwelling in a net.

The four afflictions, name, and
the fourth syllable likewise.

Through delusion: earth and affliction,
and when preceded by cattle, equanimity,
the water-tree, the flower, the lotus —
by this, the thousand-born becomes the seat itself.

Upon the top of a cow's hoof,
distinguish by means of nectar's adornment.

Pure as crystal,
the supreme essence of essences.

Water on the tongue is this very thing,
and space is for the ear and all the nostrils.

Earth is to be applied to the eye;
fire blazes likewise in the Brahma-realm.

Through delusion it is at the throat.

Dwelling in the wavering heart,
and all afflictions at the chest,
cattle are at the root of the navel.

By placing upon the eight limbs,
the deity himself thereby knows the speech.

This mantra of the eight syllables
is renowned as the eight mudrās.

White, yellow, and likewise red,
black and blazing — for the activities:
for the four activities, the goddess,
with skill, recites three hundred thousand times.

The very essence of wisdom's lordship,
supremely constant and at peace,
all beings subtle and coarse — freed from karma and karma's forms.

All things with the shape of water,
and equally fire that destroys,

and as wind that is constant —
the lord of the faculty, the pure meaning of faith, built up like a remainder,
the fourth is the sixth syllable.
For the benefit of beings, the eight syllables
are fully renowned as the eight deities.
By the nature of recitation in meditative equipoise,
there is no doubt that this is accomplished.
By the mudrā of the third banner,
touching first and the touching itself —
in this world, happiness
and constant offerings will be found.
At the time of death, gnosis
abides supremely in the formless existence.
By pressing upon this very suchness of self,
how this mantra will be accomplished —
therefore with all diligence
the treatise of practice is to be understood.

All fragrant renowned flowers dwelling everywhere,
black agaru and bdellium with a butter lamp,
with one non-dual torma, with one-pointed mind,
worship the goddess, the māmō, in every way.

This concludes the first chapter, called "The Chapter of the Eight Syllables."

Then, to the bindu (Skt. bindu) of the secret limb I pay homage.
Having exhausted the births of the three realms,
abiding as the actual entity of gnosis,
inseparable from the entity of the deity —
above, below, and in the middle,
everywhere and utterly empty.
Making Mount Meru and the other continents blissful, contemplate the yoga of equanimity throughout.
By the division that encompasses all,
thereby in the center of the flower-bindu
shines luminously.
The gnosis-drop dissolves completely.
Known by one endowed with gnosis-mind,

without color yet making all things vivid — formless gnosis is like form.
Neither long nor short,
lacking and possessed alike —
the suchness-middle of form and emptiness:
gnosis is to be grasped simultaneously.
Afflictions likewise are darkness;
together with consciousness, there is luminosity.
Having shattered the vajra of gnosis,
the siddhi of luminosity will be attained.
In the center of the maṇḍala of wind
is something like the maṇḍala of fire.
In the center of the maṇḍala of fire
is something like the maṇḍala of the sun.
In the center of the maṇḍala of the sun,
the maṇḍala of the moon is to be meditated upon.
In its center, as has been taught,
gnosis and consciousness and mind —
without destruction and without harm,
entity is to be meditated upon by entity.

This concludes the second chapter, called "The Chapter on the Yoga of the Gnosis-Bindu."

With one kappa and through the three gates, dissolving into the center of gnosis itself —
the very seed of what is to be reversed,
the syllable to be purified: one and a half and two.
By the third, the edge of eight is drawn straight.
This seed is the fire of ferocity,
supported by the maṇḍala of wind,
endowed with the characteristics taught previously.

By means of meditating upon them together beforehand,
the body is to be sealed with the white.
By blazing in the place of equanimity,
the wind spoken of previously —
the stūpa in the center is to be purified.
In the object before wind and fire,

having meditated on the vajra seed,
adorned throughout with sound and with the bindu —
this has been taught as a stream of rain.
At the very door of the five expansions,
white in color is to be meditated upon.
The clear showing of the two doors
is likewise these two: water and non-water.
The drop of the syllable that changes to two,
at the root, sound is to be applied.
By this the body is to be sealed,
and the fire is to be made fit as a door.
By this mind, let there be a focusing.
Above, this door of Brahmā —
the supreme seat of nine joints —
by the entity of the bodiless mind,
entity is to be meditated upon by entity.
When the time is come, transference is to be performed:
at the untimely moment, it is indeed the slaying of the gods.
Not defiled in any way by non-virtue,
it liberates supremely beyond saṃsāra.

This concludes the third chapter, called "The Chapter on the Practice of Transference."

With the defining marks spoken of before,
preceded first by the defining mark of emptiness,
that one's body is to be purified.
The embodied one who meditates through this practice —
the object of meditating upon the absence of entity, whoever meditates through the seed of the entity that conceptualizes entity —
is to be meditated upon in the center of what is empty above.
The syllables of what is to be contemplated, arrayed,
are adorned perfectly by the five buddhas.
By Śākyamuni, lord of the world,
at the foot, Vajrapāṇi;
the body is a bell, the voice of Mañjuśrī;
likewise the head is Maitreya,

and the form of the mother, blazing above —
they accomplish liberation from saṃsāra.
In the many radiantly blazing rays of light,
contemplate throughout in the center of emptiness.
By the seed of consciousness and gnosis, wound about in the center and at the center —
through recitation and supreme striving in meditation, contemplate above the wind.
First, envision all as white;
second, as yellow like a lotus;
third, whoever is red;
and fourth is blue itself.
In the nature of equipoise recitation,
there is no doubt that accomplishment comes here.

The name "seat of the practice" —
secret, and secret, and utterly secret —
this is called my own chapter on the seat.

This concludes the fourth chapter, called "The Chapter on My Own Seat."

Now, furthermore, what remains to be explained:
the particular seed of heat —
this fire of the stove-pit in the belly is to be understood as the fire of the belly.

The eastern aspect is white;
the northern is likewise yellow;
the western direction is red;
the southern direction is known as black;
at the center is the color of equanimity.

Contemplate these as five fires.

The one known as the Vajra Ḍākinī — examine her thoroughly in the fire of the east.

The one called the Fierce Ḍākinī — examine her thoroughly in the northern direction.

The one called the Zombie Mother (vetālinī) — place her in the western direction.

The name called the Ḍākinī of Ferocity —
the name of the fire in the southern direction.

At the center, this wisdom fire —
its name is the Wisdom Ḍākinī.
She abides upon a lotus seat,
adorned by a solar maṇḍala,
with a vajra and a khaṭvāṅga in hand,
blazing fire and equal light.
The form is the mere shape of a thumb — meditate upon her as a wrathful form.
Eight syllables from the nāḍī
dissolve into the door of the one who hangs.
Afterward, the skilled one, through the five identities,
performs the fire offering (homa) in five places.
Having fully restrained the breath with the mind,
entity is to be meditated upon by entity.
Whatever small things are eaten and drunk,
let them be eaten, regarded as the fire offering.
The first is the syllable of sound;
likewise the second is two with two changes;
the third is ra and pha in the lungs;
the fourth above, with a bindu;
the fifth above is blazing itself.
The five seeds are to be recited and burned.
Having thus meditated in this manner,
it is renowned as the full practice of expansion.

This concludes the first chapter, on the fire offering (homa).

Then the threefold purification is to be performed. Svabhāvaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ svabhāvaśuddho'ham. Vajraśuddhāḥ sarvadharmā vajraśuddho'ham. Yogaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmā yogaśuddho'ham.

By the preparation of such practice and conduct,
the mind is thereby purified.
Through emptiness pervading everything throughout,
this water is to be contemplated there.
Pervading all, the form of water,
and in its midst a lotus — vast, arising as the mind desires,
a city of gold appearing,

adorned completely with the seven precious things,
with a lion throne as seat,
adorned by the disk of the sun.

In the midst, the one to be contemplated as wisdom —
she whose very name is the Wisdom ḍākinī:
with a khaṭvāṅga and a yogin's skull-cup,
terrifying with great laughter,
clad in red garments, tight and close,
with hair bristling in scattered strands —
she who bears the name Wisdom ḍākinī,
seated in the heroic cross-legged posture.

On her outer aspect, as has been declared,
on both sides of her form,
just as the colors of the directions are —
so let the families of her mudrās encompass all.
Having meditated upon the identity of the fifth,
always offer worship and present the torma.

Those whose natures are of water and of fish —
water and fire, and likewise movement —
just as smoke is held in the breath,
those encircled by the wisdom vajra:
arising as the deity of the fifth,
are to be meditated upon as that very fifth.

Two bezoars are Māmakī;
one of those two is the nectar.
By conjoining through the āli-kāli,
make the true reality of the two fully manifest.
Āli, it is said, is the vowels;
kāli is likewise the Tathāgatī.
Just as in the third group,
taking up the third syllable,
with a vajra club
it is to be encircled above the pubic region and the rest.
The seed — that is the supreme contemplation;
the yogin thereby cuts through evil.

The lord of the lotus, whose body is the color of gold,
extremely luminous by nature through fragrance —
taste is the vajra lord, holding the vajra —
know the sufficiency of these three deities.

The syllable ha carries away the color;
the syllable ho is that which is without stain;
the hero by means of hrīḥ vanquishes.

This sequence is to be understood accordingly.

This concludes the second chapter, on the preparation of the union of method and wisdom.

Then further: another seat.

First, for a moment, through the defining characteristic,
one is to unite oneself fully.

Just as fire burns everything equally,
just as the sun is shown to arise pervading all,
just as the wind carries fragrance uniformly in all directions —
so the yogin who has long abandoned conceptual thought,
endowed with the defining characteristics spoken before:
in the midst of the sun, a water maṇḍala;
in the midst of the water, a lotus —
let a fully desired lotus be contemplated.

The palace, a beautiful and real thing,
adorned completely with the seven precious things,
upon a lion throne as seat,
adorned by the disk of the sun.

Colorful garments hanging freely,
covered by a white parasol,
with syllables of laughter arranged and displayed.
In the center of the solar disk as well,
in the center: the wisdom-consciousness,
adorned in form with the sovereign of qualities.

The first syllable of sound is the first;
likewise the second has two modifications;
the third has ra and pha on its side;
the fourth above is with a bindu;
arranged in the color of the direction —

many blazing rays of light.

At the corners, on the hungry-ghost throne,
the neuter one, the very fourth syllable,
called the sovereign lion.

Likewise fire, and the tigress,
the owl — devoid of truth, roaring huṃ —
and the jackal: these are to be placed in the wind.

Through the breath, all entities
and their mudrās as well are to be examined.

By meditating on entity through entity,
one is encompassed by the eight ḍākinīs.
On the sides, the identity of the fifth is placed,
and in the center too, wisdom is arrayed.

One who is embodied — a being with a body in one's own person — is to be worshipped with non-dual worship.

With flowers of the mind one strews offerings,
with incense of the mind one perfumes,
with ointment of the mind one anoints,
with lamps of the mind one makes light.

First, the fifth substance
is consecrated by the five buddhas.
The nectar spoken of beforehand
is to be received upon the body of the hero.

With the iron hook, all the gods
are to be satisfied by the syllable of nectar.
Through the union of the vowel series and consonant series,
one is consecrated in the midst of the hero.

By the vowel series is known Māmakī;
the man is Vajrabhairava.
Relying on the goddess at the left,
the foot of the hero is made huṃ.

By the full display of that substance,
all heroes are consecrated.
Into the body of the fivefold self,

the five ḍākinīs dissolve completely.

It is not mere delight in desire,
nor is enjoyment to be sought again and again.
With the non-dual ritual cake (torma),
one is to perform worship at all times.

This is the third chapter, entitled "The Seat of Another."

Then the outer torma is explained.
At the heart, the central position: a ḍākinī.
Likewise, to the north: the Blazing One.
The Moistening One is said to be in the west.
The Seizer of Speech: a yoginī to the south.
The four male messenger heroes
are to be meditated upon in wrathful form.
The five nectars are to be bestowed,
and worship is to be performed with sacred conduct.
With the wisdom of the view of equality,
a skilled one is to offer the torma.

Forming the two vajra fists
and joining them back to back,
linking the two little fingers,
and raising the two index fingers:
this is the secret mudrā
of all five ḍākinīs.
It is offered to the heart of the third banner,
with all fists above.
This is the mudrā of the messenger.

The seed syllable of the first at the eighth corner
and the ninth corner arise to the north.
The seed syllables of east and west,
and the third to the south, are to be taken hold of clearly.
These seed syllables of the four messengers
are to be conjoined with sound and drop.
To the east, the seed of the fierce nectar
is to be placed at the center.

Just as actions and the like are conjoined, accomplishment fully arises through three hundred thousand recitations.
There is no count of days, no lunar mansion,
and no fasting is required.

In a pleasant and agreeable place,
one accomplishes the supreme through constant effort.

The great hero who abides in sacred commitment,
who has conquered the afflictions such as attachment:
the pure melody aimed at pure phenomena
is a great and open road.

The great Dharma has arrived in full glory —
the supreme taste, supremely sweet.

The great protector of existence, the vast one —
the buddha to whom I pay homage.
This verse is to be offered.

I bow and pay homage to the deity who is the essence of the union seat.
I pay homage to the one who, in this very life, severs cyclic existence.
This verse is to be received,
and by this verse one is to excel completely.

On the seat transformed into a lotus,
above it, the vajra is to be displayed.
At the center, having anointed with the mountain of nectar (Mount Meru), one offers and partakes by raising the two thumbs.
At the five fully expanded stūpas, the taste, five times in turn — the nectar water is to be imagined at the center of the stūpa.

This is the fourth chapter, entitled "The Differentiation of Self Through the Seat of Another."

Furthermore, the rite of the tormā is explained.
Separately, a triangular form is to be made —
a rite performed with blood and the like.

The left hand is bound in a fist,
and the middle wrathful one is to be extended.

The third finger of the middle
is to be bent and conjoined.

An invitation is to be performed with the smoke-hook mudrā:

Oṃ ākarṣaya ākarṣaya mahāpūjā bhakṣa bhakṣa hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ svāhā.

These are the mantra and mudrā of invitation.

Having completed the torma in every aspect,
it is to be conjoined with the fifth substance.

Oṃ — a single tree, a charnel ground,
a mountain, a cliff, a cave,
the crossroads of a region, a path, and a field —
in particular, an empty house,
a great tree and the lord of trees,
in particular, a river that does not sleep,
a vessel, a plain, and a vacant ground,
in particular, dwelling in a charnel house upon the earth —
the Black One (Kālī), the fierce one, the supremely fierce, Devadatta attended together,
the black one who bares teeth, the terrifying one,
the king of obstacles who has passed beyond joy, Gāndhārī and the fierce one,
the terrifying one praised by Umā,
the queen, the all-victorious queen,
the great mighty one not subdued by others,
the black good one, the great black one,
the black one, the black one, the yoginī,
the sovereign one and the moon-woman,
the fierce one, the path-keeper of awesome dread,
the seizing one and the flame-woman,
the yoginī who dwells in the lands and brings forth floods,
the fierce form and the great form,
the one who bares fangs, the skull-bearing one,
the skull-garlanded one, wearing a garland of skulls,
the khaṭvāṅga-bearer of great miraculous power,
the sword, the hands of the enemy-throne,
the vajra likewise, the bow-hand,
the supreme reality of the five ḍākinīs,
she who accomplishes all activities in succession —
the great sovereign maṇḍala of union, Vajreśvara likewise the chief,

the great body of the Tathāgata,
the goddess-maker joined without garment.

By Vajreśvarī and Ka,
all and all are invoked.

Oṃ ākarṣaya ākarṣaya sarva deva lokinī nakakka kaḍani khakkhakha khaḍani babba bandhani hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

Joined with the syllables śa da da nya,
the torma is invited by oṃ and bestowed.

According to the commencement of the rite and the like —
on the fifteenth, on the fourteenth,
and especially on the eighth day —
the yogin who desires attainment should diligently offer the torma.
One who desires the splendour of wisdom
should offer the remaining torma.

Oṃ hili hili vajrī matha matha yoginī hūṃ jaḥ.

This is the fifth chapter, called "The Chapter of Another's Seat."

The syllables of the mantra
are to be accomplished through mental emanation.
Having completely abandoned the mind of the essence,
one meditates fully on the reflection of impairment.
The mantra is to be recited as a murmuring.
How wondrous — sentient beings are so afflicted!
Therefore, whatever is mentally desired —
the supreme syllables of the mantra —
beings deluded by that reality: mantras without it,
speaking wrongly, and a reflection devoid of mind.
The nature of mantra is to be known by the intelligent.
It is itself perfectly renowned as the four activities.
Taking birth in many forms and various appearances,
with all the characteristics of power and potency,
it moves and strives — subtle, without impurity.
It is the supreme syllable that is the very nature of mantra and tantra.

Since form and all the rest are destroyed,
everything is the object of meditation on space.
The six elements and the six sense faculties —
the very element of the middle being destroyed —
the wise one meditates on the eighteen emptinesses.
The meditation-object of meditating on sentient beings
destroys everything through emptiness.

To the east, the colour is white;
to the north it is yellow;
with the blazing light of a jewel-sun,
to the south it is blue;
and in the centre, in the state of equanimity,
the wise one is to meditate.

Joining the vowel series with the consonant series,
one is to extract the seed-syllable therefrom.
Supremely, in the middle of space,
wherever there is the moon at the centre,
and at the centre of the moon a seed-syllable —
one meditates on blazing rays of light.
Seven brilliant colours, varied,
rays blazing, light of equanimity.
Above, the syllable of the guru,
at the bottom, the syllable of fire,
and having placed the seed-syllable in the centre —
as one comes to recite in meditative equipoise,
the wise one recites three hundred thousand times.

This is the first chapter of "The Seat of Union," called "The Perfection of Wisdom in Union."

With the characteristics stated before,
the previously taught basis of emptiness —
one with wisdom, through meditative equipoise, should destroy form and all the rest.
In the midst of total emptiness —
the wise one should look upon it.
Like a wheel like the sun,
rays of light perfectly abiding —

in all ten directions, in every world-realm,
it should be placed immeasurably.
The abode of subtle drop upon drop,
world upon world, encompassing all knowing —
in the centre of the maṇḍala of wind,
it is like the maṇḍala of fire.
In the centre of the maṇḍala of fire,
it is like the maṇḍala of the sun.
In the centre of the maṇḍala of the sun,
one should contemplate the maṇḍala of the moon.
In that centre, as has been taught,
is the bodhisattva of consciousness and gnosis.
Contemplate all of this at the crown — syllable upon syllable placed above.
All the seeds of speech —
these are called the King.
The forms of gnosis and consciousness:
in the centre of the wind, one should draw them in.
The application of that seed —
the sound rises upward, ever upward.
Thus, contemplating the supreme seed,
it is the very name of gnosis and consciousness.
Rays of light blazing, deep red in colour —
meditate upon them in the centre of the moon.
Perfectly take up the boundary of the seventh.
That which, like the nectar-seed,
is wrapped about by recitation — visualise it as white in colour.
Taking up the first sound-syllable,
it is wrapped in the maṇḍala of the sun.
The seed-syllable at the ninth boundary —
elsewhere, join it with fire.
In another place, with the seed of wind,
clearly visualise it on the face of wind.
Meditating upon all of this completely —
this is what is called the gnosis-drop.
Sentient beings of sinful and foolish mind

are to be purified by this practice.
From the seed, the vajra is generated;
likewise, know the defining marks of the vajra.
In the centre, the body of Vairocana, adorned with the most beautiful garments —
by merely meditating on this,
meditative absorption perfectly abides.
Visualise this form in the centre:
a drop of hopeful longing at the throat,
pierced by blazing jewels —
meditate upon it before the object of accomplishment.
The opening by means of the seventh application:
visualise the seed at the tip of an arrow,
white in colour as cotton.
By the drawing of the arrow, by its striking,
the mantra-practitioner should recite the seed.
Binding the forms of the mudrā,
recite the seed with the mind.
The yogin who recites one hundred thousand times thereby quickly summons the presence.
The two syllables becoming a drop — join it with the natural taste of the root.
That is called the name "delightful nectar."
It is accomplished by one hundred thousand recitations.
Like spirits (bhūtas), gandharvas, ḍākinīs, and yakṣas — not to be named — yakṣas, hungry ghosts, the vessel-spirit,
vajra-goddesses, and yoginīs:
if one desires them, without trivial effort,
through this practice they are swiftly summoned.

This is the second chapter of "The Seat of Union," the chapter on meditative absorption called "Completely Bewildered by the Great Red One from the Net of Practice."

Having caused all form to be exhausted,
form does not abide — it too is exhausted.
In the shape and form of a star,

first, clearly visualise emptiness.
Having generated the view of equanimity,
in the centre of the maṇḍala of wind:
the staff — the lord and protector of the world —
bdellium resin — Vajrapāṇi —
the limb — Mañjuśrī, the supreme bell —
the very image of Maitreya's recitation — the syllable called "Ma," blazing above —
the one who liberates from cyclic existence.
Through this seed, the fruit:
also in the centre of the maṇḍala of the sun,
with many blazing rays of light,
meditate upon the five divine ones.
At the summit of Mount Meru, a celestial palace adorned with every precious jewel —
as a seat, these blue flowers,
which bees consume as food.
Those who quickly consume the flowers are of the same state as honey.
The syllable radiating upward emerges as all buddhas.
The seeds of water, sky, and wind —
with these four seeds, the divine ones.
Their form like the palāśa flower —

With the mind of the colour of lapis lazuli, joined with the goddess Māmakī,
meditate upon the summit of Mount Meru.
The hero Vajreśvara, the protector,
is the very essence of all the gods.
With two mudrās and what is manifest,
the three-pointed one destroys all.
Pressing the earth as the ground,
with two feet one treads it down completely.
From the root syllable of the teeth, taking "Mu" as the base,
the very act of beholding form upon form —
the aspect of the song of Hūṃ,

and its sound too is to be applied there.
With the nectar-drop and the iron hook,
one is to make it sharp at the tip.
From all sides, the mantra of the goddess is to be recited.
The vajra-holder and the lotus seat —
just as the syllables of the third group of three are to be grasped,
so in the song, the vajra staff
is wound around the second below.
This, the seed of the supreme mantrin,
is to be recited throughout and taken up at the outset.
Having fully pleased all the gods,
the substances of this are to be consumed.
With the king's joy and in reliance upon it,
the rite of subjugation is to be undertaken directly.
For those of inferior lineage who have not yet ripened,
the rite is to be applied directly.
For those of equal lineage — with the flower of the sovereign —
the rite of enrichment is to be performed.
For brahmin and kṣatriya lineage,
the rite of pacification is supreme of these.
Through the direct application of the four rites,
the distinctions of lineage are to be engaged.
The yogin of the secret yoga of nectar
is to meditate upon the other substances.
The hand of the lord of the senses, purified and well-refined,
together with the bewilderer, and likewise saffron,
and kutañjara, together with the white moon-conch itself —
with these, one is to apply them fully.
To those who cause harm to the Three Jewels,
the non-dual torma offering is to be given.
With compassion for those who suffer,
the rite is to be undertaken for the benefit of sentient beings.
It is not the mere enjoyment of desire,
nor is it reliance on external enjoyments.
Without anger, without delusion,
one is to train for the benefit of sentient beings.

This is the third chapter, entitled "Controlling from the Seat of Practice."

On the tongue, water is distinctly applied.

To the ears and two nostrils, sky.

Earth is rightly taught to water,

and at the throat, the earth of delusion,

and movement dwells in the heart.

The afflictions (kleśas) are entirely the reins,

and cattle are the root of the herd.

Positioning upon the eight limbs

is to be conjoined with the divine.

The wisdom ḍākinī is to be visualised,

adorned magnificently with all ornaments.

The earth and so forth of the body, properly applied,

are to be rendered as of uniform colour.

The thirty-two complete fingernails

transfer into the interior of consciousness.

At the external, doubled earth-sites,

the activities of breath and so forth are to be performed.

At the navel, meditating upon the fire deity —

that itself is the name of the wisdom ḍākinī.

Into the breath, the nectar dissolves perfectly.

Thoroughly, with the characteristics of the primordial,

to the gods the fire-offering is offered.

In the centre of the maṇḍala of wind,

the maṇḍala of the sun is finely adorned.

From the very centre of the supreme,

the seed arising from the vowel and consonant series —

blazing red in colour —

at the outer limit of earth and the rest,

through the breath of exhalation and inhalation,

at the outer limit of both the union —

the seed is to be visualised at the tip of the arrow.

Blazing black in colour,

the primordial seed of Kaśa, bearing the bindu of Oṃ and the drop,

is to be struck through familiarity with the arrow.

Having aimed the seed at the centre,

the breath is to be drawn away into the nectar.
Having conjoined the nectar with the syllable,
without fear and without harm,
one is to meditate on entity through entity.
Afterwards, in my own rite,
in accordance with the practice of the wisdom ḍākinī:
Om ākarṣaṃ hūṃ svāhā.

Reciting this seed of the great tantra,
the three worlds are swiftly accomplished.

This is the fourth chapter, entitled "Arising from the Seat of Practice and the Chapter on Entry."

The perfectly complete form, with rays of light —
at the forehead, the moon is to be visualised.
In the centre, the seed Hūṃ, by its very nature
of white colour, supremely beautiful, terrifying like the ocean,
of broad and extensive sevenfold colour.

Having subdued all forms in every world-realm of the ten directions, one's own nature is the very sky of space —
all shapes and forms complete,
endowed with all the characteristics of former times.
In the midst of water, a lotus.

The immeasurable palace is to be contemplated,
magnificently adorned with the seven precious substances.
In the centre of the moon-disc,
the form of Hūṃ blazes like fire.

This is to be completed above the crown of the head.

At the chest, the stainless moon,
and the bell at the very surface of the heart.

At the navel, the staff, holder of secrets.

At the foot of the crooked hook-seat,
one assumes a transformed posture on the lotus-seat.

From the perfected form, the vajra —
one calls oneself Vajrasattva.

Bound with silk and crowned with a diadem,

adorned perfectly by the five buddhas,
the supreme colour white blazes brilliantly,
ornamented with all ornaments,
the robe of blue supremely beautiful.
Vajra and bell in the two hands —
by merely visualising in this way,
one calls oneself Vajrasattva.

At the root of the eight extremities, the root-wind;
likewise, at the root, the ra, pha, and so forth.

The third draws them forth.

Above, by the seed of the drop,
the three worlds of this place are terrified.

The yogin, by the seed of the vajra,
draws forth all three realms,
and is the totality that is the nature of wind.

In the centre of the seed, the name of the yakṣa;
likewise, the very name of the god.

In the centre of the seed, all these names
are the very lord of fire.

The yogin who recites three hundred thousand times becomes widely and completely renowned.

By the nature of recitation in meditative equipoise,
accomplishment comes here — of this there is no doubt.

With prostration, fire-offering, and final placing,
one first performs the form of approach practice.

This is the fifth chapter, the extensive explanation of what is called "The Secret Seat."

At four finger-widths, it is space.

Because in space it is star-like,

blazing rays of fire illuminating from all sides, having exhausted all that is born in every world-realm of the ten directions and

the three realms,

the form of fire that blazes completely all around
is likewise exhausted.

This very thing is the particular distinction of the five.

To the east, a white vajra.
To the north, a yellow vajra.
To the west, a red vajra.
To the south, one bearing a blue vajra.
On all sides, the blazing light of the vajra.
In the centre, the colour of equanimity.
Entirely and completely blue,
the form of the lord who holds the vajra.

In the space of four finger-widths,
this is the defining characteristic of Tārā.
The seed arising from that is joined perfectly with the Āli and Kāli.
Tārā is to be placed in the centre;
with this mudrā, one is to make offering.
The flower of the udumbara tree abides at the navel;
it abides standing upright at the heart.
Constantly facing in four directions —
a skilled one is to expand upon this.
It constantly has eight petals,
adorned with the spoken filaments.
In its centre, the white moon;
a milk-moon in the centre of that.
Thus the yogin who knows
— this is the very name of the Secret Seat.

Grasping form and so forth,
it is not a mind of emptiness either.
Form and emptiness likewise in the centre —
one who has wisdom grasps likewise.
Through all the wisdoms of equality,
all ways of seeing are known entirely.
By the path that the guru has taught,
one is always to look with certainty.

Just as a young girl, confused by talk,
encounters those two who are quarrelling and speaks,
but however the path is shown, cannot grasp it —
so too the yogin is like one taught by a youth.

By the yogin merely hearing,
afflictions are abandoned from afar.
Whoever relies on the practice quickly attains the fruit of buddhahood.
Whoever relies on the various methods,
by that all activities are accomplished.
All that is taught in the tantras
is given together with consciousness.

Just as through mind, thoroughly and with diligence,
gnosis is conjoined —

This has been the second chapter, called "The Secret Seat."

In the center of a lunar maṇḍala,
Vajrasattva is clearly to be visualized.
At his heart, the syllable HŪṂ,
white in color, is to be imagined.
Nectar-drops with the bindus,
and the seed of these, are to be conjoined.
One excels in the peaceful and strives for the supreme.
When the time of the peaceful arrives,
one is to perform thoroughly the fire offering of self.
This is the peaceful.

In the center of the heart maṇḍala,
the color is equal to the peaceful.
Nectar, arising from all-awareness,
is to be meditated upon in the center of the moon.
The yogin who has thus meditated becomes extensively renowned.
At the heart, in a solar maṇḍala,
there is a drop with a bindu at the waist.
By imagining it red, deeply red,
one becomes renowned for the rite of enriching.

Again in the center of the heart maṇḍala,
the maṇḍala of wind is to be imagined throughout.
Directly, the seed of wind,
and in the center likewise the name of the enemy —
just as smoke is the color of smoke,

this is renowned as the fierce activity.
Throughout, all is emptiness.
The characteristics of what came before are to be conjoined.

In the center of the wind maṇḍala,
a solar maṇḍala is to be meditated upon.
In its center, the form of HŪṂ —
radiant garlands of blazing light, equal in brilliance.
Encircled by the seed of wind,
one places the name itself in the center.
In the body set in motion by wind,
the practitioner is to imagine:
whatever is imagined shall be expelled.

In the center of the wind maṇḍala,
the fierce ḍākinī is to be imagined.
Knowing all the characteristics of what came before,
she is to be meditated upon according to form and shape.
Her light equal to blazing fire,
she is recited before one and imagined everywhere.
At the mouth of the body of the one to be accomplished,
the seed of wind is the chief element.
At the end, the syllable of destruction,
and, as before, the syllable of fire —
in the center, the name of the one to be accomplished.
By reciting this one hundred thousand times,
since through the preliminary approach-practice
the body is restrained throughout —

Again in the center of the wind maṇḍala,
the yoga of the fierce one is to be practiced.
Dark blue in color, inspiring great terror,
she terrifies with her extreme ferocity.
In her hands, a skull-cup and a khaṭvāṅga staff,
adorned with all ornaments.
With the enemy as one's seat on all sides,
one is to press them down with one's own foot.
The vajra-seed with REPHA, conjoined with the syllable of the iron hook —

at the end, the syllable of destruction:
by one hundred thousand recitations, accomplishment is attained.

This has been the third chapter, called "The Secret Seat."

Homage to the three supreme phenomena — the perfections — bearing the limbs of awakening, through which, by the mind that consumes nectar as two bees consume it from the lotus born of the body,
and through perfect union, awakening is endowed with its branches.

In a charnel ground devoid of people,
where rākṣasīs (she-demons) and vetālinīs (flesh-raising females) dwell,
on the days of pretas and of stars,
the accomplishment is to be performed with a steady mind.

Take the hide of a black goat,
not pierced by a blade, and join it accordingly.
Stretch the cloth and mark it with lines.
It is to be endowed with the five substances.
The non-dual torma is to be consecrated.
Provided with five iron hooks,
it is to be offered as previously taught.
The ḍākinī torma, once consecrated,
and the flesh of that goat —
with these the fire offering is to be performed one hundred and eight times.
A painted image is to be held in place,
and a torma offering made to it, then the drawing made.
Dark black in color, inspiring great terror,
properly dwelling through the force of play.
Adorned with all eight limbs,
the hair disheveled as an ornament.
Three eyes, wrathful, with bared fangs,
adorned fully with four arms.
In the hands, a khaṭvāṅga and a vajra,
likewise a sword and a skull,
clothed openly in elephant hide,
with a tiger-skin lower garment —
such is the rākṣasī, the vetālinī.

One who strives with supreme diligence in yoga should draw it. It is to be provided with a thoroughly complete tormā offering on all sides. In a charnel ground where no people are present, the flesh of a black goat combined with curd and butter is to be used for the fire offering, performed one hundred and eight times. Through this, the messenger — a risen corpse — will be perfectly accomplished.

On the head: HŪṂ. On the crown: HA. On the eyes: HRĪḤ. On the nose: HE. On the ears: HAṂ. On the tongue: HO. On the heart: HŪṂ. This is the mantra to be arranged at the six limbs.

OM HRĪḤ HANA HANA SARVA ŚATRŪN MATHA MATHA BANDHA BANDHA HŪṂ AMUKA SAṂGHĀTAYA GHĀTAYA HŪṂ HŪṂ HŪṂ PHAṬ PHAṬ PHAṬ PHU PHU.
This is the mantra for all accomplishments.

With the mudrā of the third banner, it is to be arranged at the six limbs. With the third banner, one bestows it at the heart center, stretching the shoulders fully outward, combining the sound of snapping the fingers with the form of HŪṂ simultaneously. Dwelling correctly with the right arm extended — this here is the supreme mudrā.

Whoever is stained by the sin of cursing the master, transgressing the sacred commitment, and harming the Three Jewels shall not be defiled by wrongdoing.

Through hundreds of thousands of millions of lifetimes, urged on by the wisdom of the buddhas and by relying upon a spiritual friend of virtue, one encounters the supreme science of yoga.

May all sentient beings be without fault.

May all sentient beings be happy.

Through whichever path beings travel,
may they attain buddhahood.

Those who have not been liberated — may they be liberated.

Those who have not been freed — I shall free them.

For the sake of following after beings with such love,
this treatise on yoga has been composed.

This completes the chapter of the fourth seat, being the explanatory section on the methods of practice from the fourth seat.

This tantra called the Glorious Tantra of All Secrets was newly translated, explained, and definitively established by the paṇḍita Smṛtijñānakīrti. When the scattered chapters of this tantra are gathered together into one place, they number one hundred and four chapters. Subsequently, through the resolute intention of the omniscient Butön, the work was collated against a hundred thousand tantras and old authoritative witnesses, and brought to a state of supreme clarity along with the correction of meter.

Translator's Notes

- The title Sanskrit is slightly unusual in its Tibetan transliteration but is legible as Śrī Caturvīṭhābhikhyā Tantra Rāja, meaning "The Glorious King of Tantras Named the Four Seats (or Courtyards)." The Tibetan renders "catur-vīṭhā" as "gdan bzhi," meaning "four seats" or "four thrones," though "vīṭhā" in Sanskrit more precisely means "a lane, street, or corridor." This slight divergence between the Sanskrit title and Tibetan rendering is a known feature of some tantric title translations and is not consequential to the meaning of the body text.

The passage describes an inner yogic practice involving visualization of channels, fire, drops, and nectars in the body — a standard system of subtle-body yoga (nāḍī, bindu, prāṇa practice) in the Vajrayāna tradition. The enumeration of colors at specific bodily locations and the list of four goddesses surrounding the central deity follow maṇḍala conventions standard to this genre.

The phrase rendered "bathed with nectar" could also be read as "washed" or "anointed"; the doctrinal sense of abhiṣeka-like consecration is preserved either way.

- The term "Sikā" in the east is a transliterated seed syllable whose Sanskrit referent is not entirely transparent from context; it may be a bīja-syllable name specific to this tantric system.

The phrase rendered "the fifth vowel letter belongs to wind" and "the eighth vowel letter is without truth" refers to the Sanskrit vowel series used as seed syllables in tantric maṇḍala practice; the precise doctrinal mapping of these vowels to directions and elements is system-specific and may vary across commentarial traditions.

"White-Robed One" renders Gos-dkar-mo, a goddess-epithet literally meaning "she of white garments," likely corresponding to Pāṇḍaravāsīnī in Sanskrit.

"Buddhalocanā" is kept in Sanskrit as the standard rendering of lha-mo sangs-rgyas-spyan, literally "the goddess with buddha-eyes."

- The passage belongs to a tantric context, likely the Samputatantra or a closely related Yoginī-tantra. Several verses describe sexual yogic practice in ritual-symbolic language; the translation renders this faithfully in a register consistent with the genre without euphemism or over-literalization. The phrase rendered "vital fluid" for ॐ is standard for the male regenerative substance in this tantric context. The "waters of nectar" and "seed-sprout" language throughout follows the standard psycho-physical symbolism of the tradition. The term ॐ rendered as "wisdom's king" could alternatively be read as a proper name or epithet of a specific deity; the generic rendering is adopted given the context.

- The passage contains a dense sequence of ritual mudrā descriptions and Sanskrit mantras embedded in Tibetan transliteration. The mantras are rendered as they appear phonetically in the Tibetan, with standard Sanskrit orthography restored where recognizable. Some mantra syllables (particularly in the Vairocana samādhi mantra sequence) are phonetically irregular or may represent a corrupt or intentionally esoteric transmission; they are given as they appear without emendation.

The term rendered "hermaphrodite" translates ma ning, a Tibetan term for an indeterminate or third gender being, here apparently referring to a specific deity-type whose four seed syllables govern the first four offering goddesses (flower, incense, lamp, perfume). This usage is technical and ritual rather than sociological.

The eight directional goddesses listed follow a standard maṇḍala scheme; the directions "powerful" and "void" render dbang ldan and bden bral respectively, which likely correspond to the intermediate directions Īśāna and Nairṛti in the underlying Sanskrit schema, though the Tibetan here does not make this fully explicit.

- The "four thrones" is a compressed technical reference that may denote the four seats or stations associated with tantric transmission; the precise referent depends on the broader text's system and is not fully determinable from this passage alone.

The phrase "the lord of secrets, great bliss" refers to Vajrapāṇi in his role as lord of secrets in tantric literature; the verse here applies these epithets in praise of Vairocana, which is somewhat unusual and may reflect a syncretic identification within this particular tantra.

The final section beginning "How is the vajra water?" opens a new chapter with a series of questions, presumably posed by the interlocutor to Vajradhara, marking a new dialogue unit.

- The phrase "ālī kālī" refers to the standard tantric classification of Sanskrit vowels as ālī and consonants as kālī, but in this context they are personified and gendered: ālī as male bees or male principle, kālī as the Tathāgatī, the feminine buddha-principle. The rendering preserves the tantric personification.

"Ratnasundara" renders ར་སྐྱུང་ལྷ་མོ་, which may be a name or epithet of the interlocutor king or a yogin being addressed; it is treated here as a proper name or honorific epithet.

The "third syllable of the third group" and the instructions involving the "kunda flower" and the "lasso of sacred commitment" are highly esoteric visualization instructions; their precise referents depend on the specific tantric initiation context and are not further glossed here.

The phrase rendered "five hours" for ལྔ་མུག་ is a unit of traditional time measurement; one Tibetan chu tshod is approximately twenty-four minutes, making five chu tshod approximately two hours. "Five hours" is an approximation for TTS fluency; the note clarifies the precise value.

- The term rendered as "vessel-vein of the eye's sphere" and similar anatomical designations throughout this passage are technical terms from a Tibetan medical-yogic tradition that do not map cleanly onto any standard Sanskrit equivalents; their transliterations such as ampa and masika appear to be loan-terms or technical coinages specific to this text.

The phrase "gnosis born from the egg" translates a term that literally refers to an egg-born or womb-born gnosis; the exact doctrinal referent is specific to this tantric context and has been rendered descriptively.

The final lines of the passage end mid-sentence in the source, indicating the text continues beyond the provided excerpt.

The "eight watches of the night" follows the traditional Indian division of night into eight praharas or watches, used here in a medical-tantric timing context.

- The phrase rendered "the syllable māṇiṃ and the drop" (མ་ཎིལ་མེད་ལྔ་མུག་) in context most likely refers to a specific seed-syllable associated with the wrathful deity in question; "māṇiṃ" here follows the Tibetan syllabically and contextually, though the exact mantra-syllable intended may differ in specific ritual lineages.

The goddess name Norgyün (ནོར་གཡུང་) is a Tibetan epithet meaning "Stream of Wealth," functioning as a form or name of a prosperity deity; no Sanskrit equivalent is recoverable from this passage alone.

The expression "the seventh color" (འཇམ་མཛོད་ཀྱི་ལྗང་མེད་ཀྱི་ལྗང་མེད་) is unusual and may refer to a specific ritual color classification in this tantric context; its precise referent is uncertain.

- The "single letter — the first vowel sign — above it the final consonant group" in the opening verse refers to a Siddhaṃ/Tibetan syllabic construction used as a visualization seed-syllable; the exact syllable intended is not spelled out discursively in this passage and would have been known to initiates from oral instruction.

The phrase rendered "egg-born creature" translates a term that in context refers to a being born from an egg, one of the four modes of birth; its specific application here to the seat or maṇḍala element is a tantric technical usage.

The section on the eight letters and their correspondences to gates, aggregates, elements, and sense faculties is a compressed esoteric encoding of a maṇḍala system; the translation renders the terms as they stand, but the full referential scheme would require a separate commentary to unpack.

- The epithet rendered "son of Mañjughoṣa" (Mañjughoṣa-sras) likely refers to Mañjuśrī himself under one of his bynames; it may alternatively denote a specific emanation or a local designation. The body-placement assignment of deities in this passage appears to be a tantric visualization system placing specific bodhisattvas at corresponding points on the subtle body — the identifications follow directly from the Tibetan.

"Yamāntaka the Destroyer" renders "khro bo'i rgyal po / gshin rje mthar byed," literally "king of the wrathful ones / the one who brings Yama to an end," a well-known epithet of Yamāntaka.

"Māmakī" — the Tibetan reads "lha mo ma mo" which could mean simply "the mother goddess" generically, but in this tantric context Māmakī is the most likely referent; some uncertainty remains.

The mantra syllables "Bhici Vata" are transliterated phonetically from the Tibetan as written; the precise Sanskrit reconstruction is uncertain.

- The final colophon-like verse beginning "The glorious Prajñāpati" is structurally ambiguous: it may be a verse of praise to a specific master or deity rather than a colophon proper. The phrase translated as "Prajñāpati" renders dpal ldan shes rab dbang po sbas pa, literally "the hidden lord of wisdom, the glorious one" — it could refer to a teacher's name or to Prajñāpāramitā conceived as a hidden solar power; the translation preserves the ambiguity.

The term rendered "discus" for se gol in the context of the HŪṢ-form visualization is uncertain; the word can mean a discus-like weapon or circular ornament and appears to be part of a tantric iconographic pairing with the vajra.

The phrase "fourth seat" (gdan bzhi pa) refers to a specific tantric category — the fourth of the four seats or bases (āśana) in the initiation system — and carries technical meaning within the ritual context that cannot be fully unpacked without the broader commentarial tradition.

- The passage is a highly esoteric tantric yogic text dealing with subtle-body (nāḍī) meditation, maṇḍala visualization, and seed-syllable practice. Several verses are telegraphically compressed and their precise referents depend on a living oral commentary. The rendering attempts to preserve the technical vocabulary and structure faithfully while acknowledging that isolated phrases such as "the noose of cattle freed by the cattle" and "the eight ground-parasols" reflect technical tantric terminology whose full meaning would require guru-transmission to unpack. The term རོ་ཁྱེད་ (Rocanā) at the close is the deity Māmakī's alternative name or a distinct deity of the eastern quarter in some maṇḍalas; it is left as Rocanā, the standard Sanskrit form.

- The passage on the four groups of letters — ka, ca, ṭa, and ta — associates each consonant-group with an element or colour (smoke, white, conch, lotus), echoing tantric phonological cosmology where consonant-groups correspond to the four elements. The specific equivalences follow conventions found in related Indian tantric grammatical texts.

The line rendered "Long — yet the mother is not flat" reflects an obscure grammatical-phonological play on vowel length and the term "mother letter" (vowel); the exact doctrinal referent is uncertain but the passage as a whole concerns the paradoxical nature of the primordial vowel as both form and formless, coloured and colourless.

The list of deity-groups with numerical assignments (Cāmuṇḍā seven, wrathful-browed twenty-five, Māmaki eighth group, etc.) reflects a tantric maṇḍala hierarchy; the numbers appear to indicate group-ranks or numerical counts of retinue members within a larger offering assembly, though the precise referential system is text-specific.

- The verse listing karmic functions of syllables follows a pattern familiar from Vajrayāna syllabary exegesis. The Sanskrit syllable names are retained as transliterated phonemes since they function as proper technical identifiers within the mantra system rather than as translatable words.

The phrase rendered "abandoning the limbs of moral discipline, the limbs of conduct, and the yoga treatise" is syntactically ambiguous in the Tibetan; the list may be things to study rather than to abandon. The passage seems to indicate that clinging to these as ends in themselves, or their misapplication in the context of tantric practice, is what is to be abandoned. This is a genuinely consequential doctrinal ambiguity.

The closing passage on embryological development reflects a classical Indian embryology schema found in several Vajrayāna and Abhidharma sources, in which the stages arbuda, and so on, mark successive weeks of fetal development. The rendering follows this reading, though the specific day-counts here deviate slightly from the most common canonical reckonings, which may indicate a textual variant.

- This passage is a dense and technically challenging text concerning embryology, the twelve links of dependent origination, and tantric physiology including channel-winds (nāḍī-prāṇa) and consciousness transference (phowa). Several verses in the second half are highly compressed and likely corrupt or dependent on a lost oral commentary; this is particularly true of the passages concerning the "nine nāgas," "sixty-four births," "the dark engagement," "Rocanā," and the "earth-parasol at the waist." These are rendered as faithfully as the syntax permits, but their precise doctrinal referents cannot be reconstructed with confidence from the text alone.

The counting sequences for embryonic development (seven days, twelve days, eight days, sixteen days, five days — now extended to three months and six months) appear to follow a distinct embryological schema not identical to mainstream Abhidharma accounts; this may reflect a tantric or medical textual tradition. The phrase rendered "the three stainless ones" for "dri med gsum" is opaque without commentary and may refer to three specific channel-winds or subtle-body constituents.

- The term rendered "arsenic" for "a rDza ka'i dog pa" is an interpretation of a substance-name that appears in early Tibetan medical and tantric literature as a fast-acting poison; the precise identity is uncertain, but "arsenic" captures the doctrinal sense of sudden, toxic affliction arising momentarily.

The phrase "nine joints" for "tshigs dgu" is used in the context of consciousness-transference and likely refers to nine articulation-points or nodes in the subtle body through which consciousness is to be drawn out; the exact technical referent is text-specific and not universally standardized across traditions.

"Rohita" is left as a proper name, as it appears to be a technical color-name or code-word within this tantric system rather than the common Sanskrit word for "red."

- The phrase rendered "the seventh ray of light" translates "de nyid od zer bdun pa" and could alternatively mean "the seventh of the rays of suchness." The exact referent is contextually ambiguous in this tantric technical context.

The syllable "ge" mentioned in the seed-syllable passage is a tantric bīja whose precise identity depends on the specific lineage and is not fully determinable from context alone.

The term "gi-wang" (Tibetan gi-wang, a bezoardstone or a particular substance associated with certain cakras or body-points) has been left in transliteration as it functions here as a technical term for a specific anatomical or ritual location.

The phrase "bdun gyi bdun pa" rendered as "the seventh of the seventh" reflects a structural chapter-numbering convention in this tantra; the full meaning of "bca' Inga pa bdun gyi bdun pa" (the seventh of the seventh of the fifteens, or possibly "the fifteenth, the seventh of sevens") is uncertain and may reflect a complex internal organizational scheme.

- This passage is drawn from a Tantric text classifying women by physiognomic type, associated birth lineages, and ritual applications. The four types — lotus-woman, elephant-woman, conch-woman, and spotted-woman — are a standard fourfold typology found in Indian erotic and tantric classificatory literature, though here embedded in a ritual context that associates them with specific rites such as expansion, subjugation, and the like.

The mantric syllables in the fourth chapter are transliterated Sanskrit dhāraṇī fragments and have been left in transliteration as is standard; no translation is attempted for mantra strings.

The term bāḍavā (rendered from the Tibetan ba ḍa ba) likely refers to the mare-fire, the submarine fire of Indian cosmology, and here may denote a female physiognomic subtype. Its precise classification within the system of this particular text is uncertain.

The term pāṛāpa (pa ra pa) is obscure and does not correspond to a well-known Sanskrit category; it has been rendered in transliteration with a gloss indicating it is identified here as a divine lineage type.

- The text contains two passages both labeled "the Sixth Chapter," which almost certainly reflects a numbering error in the source manuscript.

The term "kurume" in the fire-pit instructions is a transliteration of a technical Sanskrit or Prakrit term that has not been clearly identified. Its precise meaning in this ritual context remains uncertain.

"Tsam-ngam" appears to be a transliteration of a deity or spirit name associated with a wrathful protective rite; the Sanskrit original is not recoverable from this passage alone.

The phrase rendered "she is like an empty vessel in her stillness" represents a difficult line in the original; an alternative reading would be "her heart is firm and she is of the empty nature," associating her with emptiness as a doctrinal quality rather than physical stillness.

- The verse beginning "Alas, all formations are impermanent" is a well-known impermanence verse related to the Mahāparinirvāṇa tradition, here embedded as a doctrinal interlude before a chapter on yogic restraint.

The measurements passage (eight finger-widths up to one thousand cubits, then numerical gradations at eight, ten, twelve, fourteen, sixteen) refers to the dimensions or specifications of a ritual implement or ground-plan. The precise referent is not established by context alone; it likely concerns the ritual stake or fire-pit dimensions, and the chapter division into "The Fourth Treatise" suggests this is a section boundary.

Several mantric syllables and Sanskrit strings here are rendered phonetically as they appear; standard reconstructions are not always certain for these tantric seed-syllables and fire-offering mantras.

- The phrase rendered "in the devoid-of-truth direction" follows the same directional idiom used for the southwest earlier in this text, where "devoid of truth" (bden bral) appears to name the southwest or the direction associated with death and deception; the exact directional correspondence may vary by tradition.

The term "marking-nut" renders bha la ta ka, a Sanskritization of the semecarpus anacardium or bhallātaka, used in tantric fire rites.

"Priyangu" is retained as a Sanskrit plant name (a type of millet or panic grass used in ritual); "tāñ-wood" is a direct rendering of thang shing, a wood type not conclusively identified in standard sources.

- The passage is a highly technical tantric text dealing with subtle-body physiology — channels, winds, and seeds in the vajrayāna yogic framework. Several lists contain unusual numeric and anatomical terminology that is terse and at points obscure, possibly indicating a specialized commentary tradition or corrupted transmission. The term rendered "water-tree" for the wood-water combination in the seasonal reckoning may refer to a calendrical system equating elemental seasons. The phrase "firstborn, the karka" likely refers to the zodiacal sign Cancer (karkaṭa, the crab), consistent with an astrological framework. The measurement "dre" is a traditional Tibetan dry/liquid measure; "half-dre" is retained as a technical quantity. The phrase "five great nights" in the breath-counting context is uncertain and may refer to a division of the night-time breathing cycle. The final sentence is incomplete as the passage ends mid-sentence.

- The terms "pha" and "re pha" throughout chapters eight and nine are obscure syllables likely referring to technical measurement units or symbolic body-map coordinates in this astrological or medical tantric context; their precise referent is uncertain and they may be Tibetan phonetic renderings of Sanskrit technical terms no longer identifiable with certainty.

The name "Bhṛdhipāla" is a transliteration of the Tibetan bhrī dhi pa la and may refer to a planetary deity or astrological figure; the identification is not secure.

The phrase rendered "canopy of the earth" (sa gdugs) is a technical astrological or anatomical term whose precise doctrinal meaning in this context is uncertain.

The Tenth Chapter's arithmetic passage involving "three hundred, thirty, seven, two, one, ten, and half" appears to be a technical calculation relating breath-counts to gnosis-arising; the exact computational procedure is not entirely clear from the text alone.

- The text throughout these chapters is highly technical tantric liturgical material, assigning seed-syllables and deity-identifications to specific body-parts and directions. Several mantra syllables and deity-names appear in hybrid Sanskrit-Tibetan transliteration and are retained as-is in accordance with tantric convention.

The term rendered "truth-free one" for དངོས་དྲུག་ (den-dral) in the retinue of goddesses could also be rendered "the one free from truth" or, in tantric context, "the unbound one" — the exact goddess identity is unclear from context alone but likely refers to a specific consort-deity of that name.

The phrase translated "Meru-wood hand-goddess" for འཕྲུལ་ལྷ་མོ་ལྷ་མོ་ (aṣṭa-lā-mo-lā-mo) is uncertain; འཕྲུལ་ལྷ་མོ་ may refer to Bilva wood associated with Mount Meru, or it may be a divine name or offering implement. The doctrinal identity of this figure is not determined with certainty from the text alone.

- The word rendered "chiling-ga" in the eighth chapter is a transliteration of an Indic term whose precise referent is uncertain in this context; it likely denotes a specific ritual substance or subtle-body element, but no confident gloss is available.

The zombie-woman figure described in the fifth chapter is a vetāla (Skt. vetāla), an animated corpse figure used in certain fierce ritual traditions; the Tibetan "ro langs ma" literally means "risen corpse woman." The translation renders this as "zombie-woman" for TTS accessibility, but the technical term is vetāla.

The phrase rendered "mouth offerings, three" (kha khyer gsum) is a technical ritual term for a specific triple offering gesture; interpretation follows standard commentarial usage for this genre of ritual text.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the Tibetan as supplied; the translation faithfully reflects this.

- The text throughout this passage is technically dense and in places formulaically compressed, consistent with a Vajrayāna ritual or yogic instruction manual. Several terms resist full syntactic disambiguation.

The compound "rutabila" in the first chapter renders the Tibetan transliteration of what appears to be a Sanskrit compound for a specific ritual substance or plant ingredient whose precise identity is uncertain.

The sequence "above, below, and likewise above" in the third chapter may reflect a textual repetition or an error in the transmitted text. It has been rendered as it stands.

The phrase rendered "the making of the syllable and with both" is syntactically compressed and may refer to a specific practice of vocalizing a seed-syllable in both ascending and descending sequences; the doctrinal content is preserved but the precise technical detail may warrant consultation of a commentary.

- The mantra syllables in chapters six and seven are transliterated as they appear in the Tibetan, which contains mixed Sanskrit and possibly corrupt or abbreviated forms. The phrase rendered "the sound of emptiness" for སྐྱུང་པ་ལྟ་བུ་ could also mean "the syllable sūnya" in a more technical mantra context. The number "one thousand three hundred and eight" for འཁོར་ལོ་གསུམ་ཅུ་གསུམ་ལྔ་བརྒྱ་ལྔ་བརྒྱ་ is a straightforward reading though its referent within the ritual system is unclear from context alone. The closing passage beginning "Homage to omniscience" appears to be a colophon followed by a recapitulatory verse summary of the text's contents. The text ends mid-sentence in the Tibetan provided, with the description of the space channel incomplete.

- This passage belongs to a tantric physiological text describing a subtle-body channel system. The terminology is highly technical and in places elliptical or formulaic, consistent with tantric rgyud literature where meaning was transmitted through oral commentary. Several phrases are deliberately cryptic and their full interpretation depends on a living commentarial tradition that is not preserved in the text alone.

The term rendered "musk-deer channel" is gi wang, a term for a musk-bearing deer or musk itself, which in tantric body-physiology texts denotes a specific channel type; no single English equivalent captures all its resonances, so the proper name is retained.

The phrase rendered "the turtle" refers to the kūrma, a body-internal structure in traditional Indian medical and tantric physiology, here at a junction-point in the chest region.

The final lines of the passage break off mid-sentence, consistent with the source being an incomplete or transitional segment between sections.

- The passage contains several transliterated Sanskrit proper names embedded in the Tibetan which function as technical yogic or tantric terms for breath-wind states or stations: Rohita, Mohita, Bhadra, Prabhūta, Guru, Kūrma, Makaranda, Randhra, Byākulī (Vyākulī), Svapna, Bheṣava, and Makara. These appear to be a system of twelve named wind-breath stations with associated physical and psychological characteristics. The Tibetan rendering of these names is phonetic and the Sanskrit orthography adopted here is a best approximation; some names, particularly Bheṣava and Byākulī, may represent variants not attested in standard Sanskrit lexica, and their identification is uncertain.

The reference to Viṣṇu in the phrase "as far as Viṣṇu" is a topographic or physiological marker within the subtle body system of the text; its precise anatomical referent is not clarified in this passage.

- This passage belongs to a tantric text of considerable technical obscurity. Several sequences resist fully transparent interpretation. The phrase rendered as "the Victor himself from the bow, striving supremely in the west with moisture" is among the most opaque: the imagery of bow, west, and moisture likely refers to a subtle-body or cosmological symbolism specific to this tantra's commentarial tradition, and no single reading can be offered with confidence. The "thirteen born of the egg" is similarly a technical enumeration whose precise referent within the tantra's system is unclear without access to a root commentary. The mantra syllable "ugu ugu" is retained as a phonetic rendering of the Tibetan, as it appears to be a specific mantra string rather than a translatable term. The chapter colophon "this is called the chapter on emptiness, the fourth" marks a major structural division in the text.

- The term "Sotike" in the phrase rendered "Sotike is the one" is a transliteration of an otherwise obscure technical term or proper name not readily identified in standard commentarial literature; it may be a Sanskrit term, a deity name, or a tantric technical expression whose precise referent is uncertain. This passage belongs to a technically dense tantric yoga text, and several phrases relating to the enumeration of cavities, seeds, gates, channels, and subtle-body topology are difficult to render with full doctrinal precision due to the compressed and elliptical style of the original. The phrase rendered "sovereign ladies of the earth" for "bcu gnyis sa yi dbang phyug ma" refers to twelve earth-sovereign female deities, likely the twelve goddesses associated with directions or stages in a specific maṇḍala system. The final syllable "U with Re" is a reference to specific tantric seed syllables whose graphic and sonic visualization forms part of the prāṇāyāma practice being described.

- The passage "पापं कुरुष्व पापं कुरुष्व" through "पापं कुरुष्व पापं कुरुष्व" is a well-known tantric antinomian passage in which "father," "mother," "king," "priests," and "country" are standard Vajrayāna code-language for internal elements to be destroyed — specifically: father as desire-attachment, mother as ignorance, king as afflictive pride, priests as the two extreme views of eternalism and nihilism, and country as the sense objects. The translation renders the surface literally in keeping with the tantric register, but listeners should understand this as inner yogic symbolism, not literal instruction.

The term "Uttrantra" (Tibetan: དུཏྲན་ཏྲ་) is an unusual compound that does not correspond to a standard Sanskrit technical term; it may be a transliterated name for a specific technique or ritual instrument within this tantra. Its precise referent is uncertain.

The phrase "the two priests" renders śaivabrahmaṇya, literally "the two pure ones" or "the two brahmins," which commentaries on comparable tantric passages typically gloss as the two extreme views or the two secondary downfalls; the translation follows the most natural surface rendering.

- The text throughout these chapters is a tantric instruction manual of exceptional technical density, with many syllables (E, HŪṂ, KṢA, YAM, HA) functioning as seed-syllables whose precise referents depend on the broader ritual system; the translations render them as seed-syllables by name rather than attempting to decode their symbolic registers, which would require access to the root tantra's full commentary.

The phrase rendered "iron-chain vajra" for "rdo rje lcags sgrog gi phyag rgyas" is a mudrā name referring to a specific hand-gesture associated with binding or chaining; the precise mudrā taxonomy here is uncertain without the full ritual context.

The final verse is clearly a simile whose concluding application is cut off in the passage as given; the analogy of the bewildered young girl pointing to something about the difficulty of transmitting realization through words alone is left intentionally open.

- The phrase rendered "the syllable of the cit sound" translates "ci tsa'i yi ge," which likely refers to a specific Sanskrit syllable, possibly "ci" or a related seed syllable. The exact identification is uncertain given context, and "cit" is a plausible reconstruction but not definitive.

"Ajagā" is left as a proper name for what appears to be a medicinal or ritual plant; the Tibetan "a dza ga" is a transliteration of an unidentified Sanskrit or regional plant name.

"Prajñendriya" in the colophon praise section renders "shes rab dbang po," meaning "Lord of Wisdom." This may be an epithet of a teacher or a deity; the colophon's precise referent is uncertain — it may be a human author's epithet or a praise to a deity associated with the text's transmission.

The phrase "fifth of the five" in the chapter colophon is an unusual structural notation, possibly indicating this is the fifth sub-section of a larger five-part division of the text.

- The passage is a dense esoteric tantra with highly compressed verse, likely from a Vajrayāna yoga-tantra or related genre. Several stanzas contain enumerative and correlative statements mapping syllables, elements, sense faculties, and bodily locations in ways characteristic of Indian tantric literature, and the precise referents of many lines depend on commentarial tradition that is not supplied here. The following specific points are noted.

The term rendered "net" in "egg-born, dwelling in a net" renders Tibetan Dzala, which may be the Sanskrit jāla, meaning net or web, or could be a proper name; the correlative context suggests a cosmological or embryological schema.

"The thousand-born becomes the seat itself" renders a phrase in which the Tibetan term for seat (stan) and the compound meaning "born of a thousand" (stong skyes) appear together; the precise doctrinal identification is unclear without a commentary.

"Cattle" as a translation element appears in a correlative list where the Tibetan phyugs seems to function as a syllable-equivalent or symbolic cipher rather than literally meaning livestock; the same applies to several other natural objects in these stanzas, which are almost certainly syllable-correspondences in a hidden-syllable (sandhyābhāṣā-style) register.

"Kappa" renders the Tibetan ka pa, which may here refer to a unit of cosmic time (Sanskrit kalpa) used as a technical cipher, or to the syllable ka; given the surrounding syllable-counting context, the syllabic reading is possible.

"Bdellium" renders gu gul, the aromatic resin Commiphora mukul, standard in tantric ritual prescriptions.

The phrase rendered "the lord of the faculty, the pure meaning of faith" is syntactically ambiguous in the Tibetan; the line may alternatively be parsed as referring to an offering or a deity epithet.

- "Brahmā's door" refers to the brahmarandhra, the aperture at the crown of the head through which consciousness exits at death during the practice of transference; the "nine joints" or "nine knots" likely refers to vertebral or joint-count used in this yogic context.

The expression "slaying of the gods at the untimely moment" is a distinctive and deliberate paradox: transference performed when death has not yet naturally come is described as "untimely," and the metaphor of slaying gods suggests a forcible rupture through the bardos; this is a technical esoteric usage and not a literal instruction.

"Zombie Mother" for ro langa ma renders a term meaning literally "the one who raises corpses" or "she of the risen corpse," a common epithet for a class of wrathful female deity (vetālinī in Sanskrit); "zombie" is an approximation offered for TTS clarity.

"The one who hangs" for 'phyang pa po is uncertain; it may refer to the hanging or pendant form of a specific channel or practice deity in this context.

- The three Sanskrit purification mantras at the opening are kept in transliterated Sanskrit as they appear in the source text; they are liturgical formulae and are not translated. The third reads "yogaśuddhāḥ" whereas the first two read "svabhāva" and "vajra," representing a progression through three modes of purification.

The term rendered "bezoars" for གྱལ་པོ་ (giyang) refers to medicinal animal concretions, here two of them identified with the goddess Māmakī; the identification is esoteric and the precise ritual meaning of the pairing with nectar is not entirely transparent.

"Khaṭvāṅga" is the tantric staff-scepter, a standard implement of wrathful or semi-wrathful tantric deities; kept in Sanskrit as a technical term.

The phrase rendered "the Tathāgatī" for འཇམ་མཛོལ་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་ for kālī identified as the feminine Tathāgata is unusual; the feminine form "Tathāgatī" is used to preserve the gendered identification.

The passage involving the "neuter one, the fourth syllable" and the animals at the corners (lion, tigress, owl, jackal) appears to describe the protective deities of the maṇḍala's corners, linked to syllables and directional assignments; the precise correspondences are encoded in the tantric textual tradition and are not fully decipherable from this passage alone.

- The expression "the five ḍākinīs dissolve into the body of the fivefold self" follows standard Yoginī-tantra meditation practice where visualized ḍākinīs are absorbed into the practitioner's body understood as a fivefold maṇḍala.

The phrase "the third banner" is a technical tantric reference whose precise ritual context is not fully recoverable from this passage alone; the reading is based on straightforward grammatical parsing.

The closing lines form the beginning of a new enumerated list that continues beyond this passage; the translation reproduces the text as it stands, ending mid-enumeration.

- The passage is a dense tantric ritual text enumerating a long list of goddess and deity names, many of which are either epithets, local deity names, or technical mantric designations that resist precise doctrinal identification. Several names such as Gāndhārī, Umā, Devadatta, and Vajreśvarī are retained as proper names following standard tantric usage.

The mantra line containing "śa da da nya" is a syllabic formula whose precise Sanskrit reconstruction is uncertain; it appears to function as a seed-syllable sequence for the

torma-offering rite rather than readable Sanskrit prose.

The phrase rendered "a river that does not sleep" translates a term suggesting a swift or ever-flowing watercourse; the precise technical meaning in the ritual-geographic context is somewhat unclear.

The phrase "the reflection of impairment" in the section on mantra practice refers to the yogic visualization of a degraded or worn form, a known practice in some tantric systems for undermining conceptual attachment to appearance; the Tibetan is terse and the exact referent may vary by tradition.

- The phrase "the vessel-spirit" renders a Tibetan term that may refer to a specific class of yakṣa associated with vessel-like containers in tantric ritual taxonomy; the identification is uncertain and may be a proper name.

The passage "the staff — the lord and protector of the world — bdellium resin — Vajrapāṇi — the limb — Mañjuśrī, the supreme bell — the very image of Maitreya's recitation" is a highly compressed series of symbolic correspondences between physical or ritual objects and deity-names; the syntactic structure in the Tibetan is elliptical, and the rendering preserves the parallelism rather than smoothing it into prose, as the verse form is clearly intentional.

- The passage is a sādhana text from a tantric context with dense technical ritual language, including mantric syllables, body-mapping, and ritual substances. Several terms resist full disambiguation without the broader tantric commentary tradition.

The phrase rendered "vowel and consonant series" reflects ālī-kālī, the standard tantric terms for the Sanskrit vowel and consonant sequences respectively.

"Kutañjara" is a plant name appearing in Sanskrit pharmacological and tantric literature; its precise identification is uncertain but it is used here as one of a list of ritual substances.

"Kaśa" in the phrase "the primordial seed of Kaśa" may refer to a specific syllabic or elemental category in this tantra's system; without access to the commentary, its exact referent is uncertain.

The mantra "Om ākarṣaṃ hūṃ svāhā" is a subjugation or attraction mantra; it is rendered in transliterated Sanskrit as found in the Tibetan.

- The passage is highly technical tantric verse with several condensed and elliptical constructions. The phrase rendered "Āli and Kālī" refers to the standard tantric enumeration of vowels and consonants used in seed-syllable practice. The "udumbara tree flower" (Ficus racemosa) is a traditional symbol of rareness and is here a contemplative object placed at the navel centre. The line "the third draws them forth" in the wind-and-channel section is terse and its exact referent — likely the third of the winds or the third channel — is left implicit in the Tibetan; no gloss has been inserted into the body per instructions. The simile of the young girl and the quarrelling pair is somewhat obscure in its application; the rendering follows the most natural syntactical reading, understanding it as an analogy for the difficulty of transmitting the yogic path to the unprepared. The phrase "lord of fire" for the names in the seed-centre follows the reading of the genitive as an epithet of mastery.

- The phrase rendered "the days of pretas and of stars" refers to specific lunar days associated with tantric practice; the exact calendrical identification is left to a specialist, but the rendering reflects the Tibetan plainly.

The term REPHA in the vajra-seed passage is a tantric technical notation for the syllable R, used as a diacritical element in Indic script, here functioning as part of a seed-syllable complex; it is left untranslated as a proper technical term.

The opening verse of the fourth section is a maṅgala homage in verse; the syntax is deliberately compressed and the referents of "two bees" and "the lotus born of the body" are tantric euphemisms standard in this genre, here rendered straightforwardly without further glossing.

- The phrase rendered "messenger — a risen corpse" translates འགྲུབ་ལྷ་མོ་འཁོར་ལྷ་མོ་, a zombie or reanimated corpse used as a ritual messenger, a recognized category of Tantric siddhi practice.

The "third banner" mudrā refers to a specific hand gesture whose precise technical identity belongs to a living ritual transmission and is not elaborated in the text itself.

The colophon names the translator as Smṛtijñānakīrti and the editor as Butön Rinchendrup, the fourteenth-century encyclopedist of the Tibetan canon. The phrase translated "correction of meter" more literally means "a request for metrical adjustment was made" together with the editing, but the combined phrase refers to the full editorial revision Butön performed.

Colophon

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. These translations are released into the public domain (CC0) in the spirit of spreading the Dharma to all corners of the earth.

Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.