Toh 432 in the Kangyur is a tantric text known in Sanskrit as the Āryācala-kalpa-tantra-rāja and in Tibetan as the Phags pa mi g.yo ba'i rtog pa'i rgyud kyi rgyal po, rendered in English as "The Noble King of Tantras of the Ritual of the Immovable One." It belongs to the class of Buddhist tantras and centers on the deity Acala, the Immovable One, a wrathful protector figure closely associated with the power of mantra and the subjugation of obstructive forces. The text opens in the familiar sūtra style, with the Buddha entering a profound meditative absorption and emanating the foundational mantra Oṃ Āḥ Hūṃ, whereupon a vast assembly of Indian gods, planetary deities, and spirit beings — including Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Śiva, Indra, Gaṇeśa, Mahākāla, and many others — are summoned into the scene, reflecting the text's ritual and cosmological scope. As a king of tantras devoted to Acala and his associated rites and mantras, it represents an important specimen of tantric literature within the Kangyur's collection of esoteric teachings.

In the language of India: Āryācala-kalpa-tantra-rāja. In the language of Tibet:
The Noble King of Tantras of the Ritual of the Immovable One. Homage to the Glorious Lord of Speech.

Thus did I hear at one time. Then, on that occasion, the Blessed One, the Great Sage, having entered into the meditative absorption called "Vajra, Subduer of All Māras," brought forth this king of mantras from the vajra of his own body, speech, and mind: Om Āh Hūm.

The moment he had spoken that, Brahmā, Viṣṇu, the Great Lord (Śiva), Śakra (Indra), the Youth (Kumāra), Bhṛṅgiriṭi, the Lord of the Host (Gaṇeśa), Bhairava, Nandīśvara, Mahākāla, the Great Rākṣasī Harītī, the Sun, the Moon, Aṅgāraka (Mars), Bṛhaspati (Jupiter), Śukra (Venus), Śani (Saturn), Rāhu, Ketu, the twenty-eight lunar mansions, yakṣas, rākṣasas, the god of water, Yama (the god of death), the god of fire, the god of wind, the goddess of the earth, Nanda, Upananda, Sthapati, Ananta, Śaṅkhaṇḍa, Kulika, Padma, Mahāpadma, Rāvaṇa the ten-headed lord of the rākṣasas, sixty thousand divine sons, and all beings of the surface of the earth, the realms above the earth, and the realms below — all of them, in that very instant, assembled at the stūpa of Śrī-Udbhava.

At that time all the māras of the three worlds arrived there and set about obstructing the path to great awakening. They joined their palms together and with one voice spoke these words: "O Blessed One, Teacher, Sugata (the Well-Gone), we beseech you — please pacify and eliminate these classes of māras that obstruct the path to awakening."

Thereupon the Blessed One entered into the meditative absorption called "Supreme Victor over All Māras," and brought forth this very secret mantra from the vajra of his own body, speech, and mind. The moment he uttered Hūṃ Hūṃ Hūṃ, the great wrathful one, the Immovable One (Acala), appeared before him, his body deep dark blue, with a thousand million faces, each laughing a great "Ha Ha!" His thousand million feet were extended and drawn back in a posture of readiness. His thousand million hands held the many fierce weapons: the sword, the curved sword, the flaying knife, the chopper, the dagger, the khaṭvāṅga, the three-pointed weapon, the nine-pointed weapon, the spear, the throwing spear, the iron spear, the arrow, the arrow with a head, the five-bladed arrow, the arrow that splits rock, the single-pointed vajra, the three-pointed vajra, the nine-pointed vajra, the thirteen-pointed vajra, the axe, the battle-axe, the broad axe, the toothed axe, the throwing axe, the paring axe, the staff, the hammer, the pestle, the wheel, the tent peg, the skull, the bījapalas, the bow, the flexible bow, the round skull, the cluster of skulls, the round-bladed knife, the long knife, the curved iron blade, the lasso, the fan, the banner, the mass of fire, the water flask, the rock, the skull filled with blood, the phurba (ritual dagger), the garland of skulls, the plough staff, the mountain of fire, the garland of teeth, the bell, the cymbals, the vīṇā, the flute, the clay drum, the paṭaha drum, the round drum, the narrow waist drum, the conch, the cool garland, hands and feet, the needle, the fan, the Garuḍa, the snake-lasso, and many other weapons besides. Of his remaining hands, those on the right raised swords aloft while those on the left were extended in the threatening gesture of pointing. His thousand million faces were smiling, laughing, crying "Ha Ha!", gnashing their fangs, and chattering their teeth.

Some faces were raised upward, some licking blood, some ferocious, and some even serene. The colors of the faces too were varied. The hair likewise differed, being black, yellow, red, and so on. The upper body was clad in an elephant hide, while the lower body was wrapped in a tiger skin. The ornaments of the hands, faces, and feet each differed as well, being of many jewels, garlands of bones, coils of snakes, garlands of human heads, human skins, lion skins, buffalo skins, and so on. Each individual face bore three eyes, or two, or one.

Then the Blessed One issued this command to that great wrathful king Acala: "Om — hail, Acala! Fierce wrathful one! Great terrifier! Greatly savage! Great hero! Destroy the entire host of māras! Bind them! Fetter them! Strike them! Scatter them! Pierce them! Grind them! Cast them up! Press them down! Crush them! Bore them through! Dye them! Burn them! Reduce them to powder! Annihilate them! Parch them! Shackle them! Devour them! Drink them! Glare at them! Hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ jaḥ jaḥ jaḥ haṃ laṃ traṃ phaṭ!"

When this was declared, the king of the wrathful ones grew enraged, and upon uttering "Hūṃ" he took on three faces and six arms and devoured, without exception, the entire host of nāgas. Then upon uttering "Phaṭ" he took on four faces, four arms, and four legs and annihilated every asura. Taking on the form of a single face and two arms in the guise of an enraged sage, he vanquished all spirit-posessions of the gods and was made lord of the assembly. Assuming the appearance of a youth and pressing the right knee to the ground, he vanquished the māra of the sons of the gods. Pressing the left knee to the ground, he annihilated the Vināyakas.

Then this, which is to be correctly taught:

He despises gods and the rest,
and when enraged he terrifies the wicked.
Manifold and numerous are the combinations he enacts.
He through whom phenomena are not seen as anything at all — body, mind, and speech being pure,
from the pure emptiness of conventional appearance,
he dwells not, but blissfully unites all variety.

This concludes the first chapter, the Chapter of Pure Emanation, from the king of tantras of the conceptual continuum of the noble Acala.

Again, this is to be correctly taught:

The body that gathers all the Sugatas within it,
a many-bodied form of terror —
meditate with a samādhi that fills all of space.
In an instant, perfect the samādhi;
in an instant, arrange the syllables;

in an instant, recite the secret mantra;
in an instant, multiply emanations of a fearful form.
In order to vanquish and overwhelm opponents,
in an instant the wrathful black eyes blaze.
Gazing into the sky, the gods tremble;
gazing at the earth, the nāgas shake with fear.
Bow to the Victor together with his sons,
and also bow to the guru,
always make offerings and generate great joy.
Whatever is the purity of body, speech, and mind —
making offerings to the Three Jewels, seek the welfare of liberation.
Generate a pure and aspiring mind
in which buddhas are present and the Dharma is taught.
Generate the awakening mind,
and the mass of virtue across the three times
dedicate for the benefit of others.
Contemplate loving-kindness and compassion,
aim the mind at the virtue of joy,
and with a mind as vast as the boundless sky
cultivate the great equanimity.

One who is thus endowed with faith and diligence,
free of guile and deception, honoring the guru,
tender-hearted and without laziness,
abandoning the craving of conditioned existence —
in a pleasant grove, at a crossroads,
in a cave, in an empty shrine,
at the foot of a tree, in a forest hermitage —
abide with a mind of ease.

Then the Blessed One, the great Sage (Skt. Muni), perfectly complete, known as Omniscient, entered into the meditative absorption called that, and drew forth this very awareness — its vajra body, speech, and mind.

Abiding in the midst of the expanse of space,
born from the syllable HŪṂ,
the immovable protector in the form of a king —
meditate upon the body of pure yoga.
One face, two arms, a body of dazzling splendor;

to utterly terrify the hosts of gods, demigods, and māras,
the right hand raises a sword to the sky,
the left holds a threatening finger-gesture and a lasso.
Upon a lotus-and-sun seat
he stands above the lord of the assembly, in the posture of dance with the left leg extended, clad in a tiger-skin skirt, adorned with the roaring of eight great nāgas,
reddish-yellow, with upswept hair, red-rimmed eyes,
round-eyed, wrathful in aspect, with bared and gnashing fangs.
He terrifies Brahmā, Śakra (Indra), Viṣṇu,
the Great God (Śiva), and other gods,
and fills all asuras with dread.
In the midst of the blazing fire of the aeon's end,
surrounded by hosts of many wrathful ones,
all of the animate and inanimate within the three realms
are to be recognized as his own emanations.
Thus, with reverence, over a long period,
meditating uninterruptedly without cease,
the ordinary conceptual thought defiled by karma and afflictions is reversed.
If one who desires divine yoga comes to be truly confident in it, then that yogin will become a vessel
for the eight accomplishments beginning with the sword.

Then the Blessed One, the great Sage, entered into the meditative absorption called Indestructible Unbearable, and drew forth the vajra body, speech, and mind of this very awareness.

Abiding in the midst of the expanse of space,
born from the syllable HĀṀ, meditate upon the great king of wrathful ones, supremely fierce — dark blue, three-faced, six-armed.
In the right hands, in order, hold sword, water-knife, and axe;
in the left hands, in order, hold threatening finger-gesture, wheel, and skull-topped staff.
Three eyes, wrathful brow raised high,
hair and beard bristling upward, yellow,
adorned with the ornament of playful nāgas,

a garland of skulls, a tiger-skin skirt,
the upper body wrapped in elephant hide,
fully adorned with bone ornaments.
In the center of a lotus-and-sun seat, he stands in the posture of left leg extended and right drawn in.
HĀṂ PHEṂ resounds in all directions of the sky —
his splendor blazes like the fire of the aeon's end.
Thus, merely by recalling this for an instant
or by knowing its name alone, desires are fulfilled.

Then the Blessed One, the great Sage, entered into the meditative absorption called Unsullied Lord of the World, and drew forth the vajra body, speech, and mind of this very awareness.

Abiding in the midst of the expanse of space,
born from the syllable MĀṂ,
the immovable one, supremely fierce — contemplate the Great Terrifier.
He stands upon a pyre of hungry ghosts.
Four faces, four arms, four legs as well;
the right hands hold sword and vajra,
the left hands hold threatening finger-gesture and blood-filled skull-cup.
The four feet stride above the four māras,
adorned with variegated bone ornaments,
elegantly adorned with a tiger-skin lower garment,
the upper body adorned with a human hide.
Reddish-yellow, hair blazing upward, of terrifying aspect,
he laughs with a HA HA, and his neighing cry resounds.
He emanates clouds of many wrathful ones;
his faces open wide with gnashing fangs.
His twelve eyes are fully wide.
What is fearful he makes yet more fearful.
His hue resembles a rain cloud; his splendor blazes like a great fire.
Even the greatest of aims is accomplished by this one.

Then again the Blessed One, the great Sage, entered into the meditative absorption called Unchanging Vajra, and drew forth the vajra body, speech,
and mind of this very awareness.

Abiding in the midst of the expanse of space,
born from the syllable HŪṂ,
the immovable protector, supremely fierce — meditate upon him who terrifies all māras.
One face, two arms, a body of fearsome aspect,
in the center, upon a white lotus and sun,
he sits with knees pressed to the ground.
The right hand holds a sword —
the left hand holds a lasso with the threatening gesture of the index finger.
Both eyes are red and round.
He has the appearance of a wrathful youth,
adorned throughout with precious ornaments.
A white serpent serves as his necklace.
He wears a lower garment of tiger skin.
From him radiate manifold wrathful ones.
He abides in the midst of the fires of the aeon's end.

Whoever calls him to mind
in the presence of the sun and moon —
all māras without remainder will be exhausted, and the body of great bliss will be obtained.
Flowers of the atasī plant,
radiant — offered by gods to the Blessed One.
Meditate upon him in the heart, or in the center of the heart.
He swiftly brings all wishes to fulfillment.

Then, what is to be correctly set forth:
one face, two arms, the color of smoke —
or perhaps blue, with the luster of lapis lazuli —
he is the destroyer of all māras.

He is seated with the left leg extended and the right drawn in,
or else with the left hand placed upon the ground.
He is adorned with precious ornaments befitting his skillful nature,
the purifier of all misdeeds,
and the one who causes the mass of wisdom to expand.

Then the Blessed One, the great Sage, entered into the meditative absorption called Fully Perfected, Glorious Vajra, and drew forth the vajra body, speech,
and mind of this very awareness.

Meditate upon the wisdom being in the heart,
as though it were the samaya being.
His light blazes forth with fierce splendor, victorious over the cognitive obscuration.

At his heart is the emblematic seed syllable —
to visualize it constantly
is the cause for purifying karmic obscuration,
and for accomplishing activities of karma.

From that seed syllable, rays of light stream forth.
They draw in the wisdom being and introduce him within.
That one does not place ignorance and its habitual tendencies within the mind of the wise.

Contemplating all the Tathāgatas,
the buddhas will confer empowerment.
Imagining at the crown of one's head the seed syllable of one's own family,
the lord of the family will crown the head.

Thus one should strive greatly in this.
By this the Victors are made joyful,
and one will swiftly attain the state of a Victor.

This concludes the second chapter, "The Arising of Deities," from the noble tantra king called the Stream of Thought of the Immovable One.

Then, what is to be correctly set forth:

Auspicious cloth with fortunate designs, productive of virtue, clears away the stain of misdeeds
and grants the supreme to those who accomplish it.

Obtain cloth from a purifying brahmin, or from a king, or from cloth of a good maiden —
soft, and rendered smooth by beating.
Draw upon it as one desires.

Mix rāma or a solution of eye-medicine,
three medicines together with two flowers,
a libation, and three kinds of wood-offerings combined —
and draw it also with various other pigments.

From these, draw the wrathful king Immovable: one face, two arms; the right hand holds a sword; the left hand is connected to the threatening gesture of the lasso of the index finger; adorned with serpents; standing in a posture of prowling upon a lotus and sun above a lord of assemblies, left leg extended — and radiating from within the aeon-fire a multitude of wrathful hosts.

Draw the sovereign lord of gods (Śiva), the protector Immovable: three faces and six arms; the right face white, the left face red; each face endowed with three eyes. Yellow hair blazing upward. The three right hands hold a sword, a knife, and an axe; the three left hands hold the threatening gesture of the index finger, a wheel, and a khaṭvāṅga staff. He is adorned with serpents and has a garland of skulls. He wears a lower garment of tiger skin, an upper garment of elephant hide, and a crown of five skulls. He is adorned with bones. Standing in a prowling posture upon a lotus and sun, left leg extended and right drawn in — radiating from within the brilliant blaze of the aeon-fire ten wrathful ones.

Draw the asura king Immovable: each of the four faces endowed with three eyes. Of the four arms, the two right hold a sword and a vajra; the two left hold the threatening gesture of the index finger and a skull-cup with blood. He wears a human skin over his upper body and a lower garment of tiger skin. His limbs are adorned with bones and serpents. The fires of the aeon blaze, and from them stream forth many clouds of wrathful hosts. His four feet press down upon four māras. Yellow hair blazing upward.

Immovable, the Subduer of All Māras, is fierce, with one face and two arms. The right hand holds a sword, and the left holds a lasso. His hair — black or yellow — blazes upward. He wears a crown of precious jewels, a garland necklace, and ornaments on every limb, together with a lower garment of tiger skin. A white serpent is held at his ear. Within the aeon-fire blazing with multitudes of flames, many wrathful ones swirl in tumult. He is seated with his right knee on a lotus and sun disc in the posture of a warrior at the ready, or alternatively, his left leg is planted in the manner of an executioner while the remaining leg is stretched out and raised into space. Draw him thus in whichever way one prefers.

Then in front of this image, paint a portrait of oneself in many colors. Having made the painter well understand, offer the beautiful image to the left, recite auspicious words, and in the secluded place of one's dwelling, accomplish Immovable as if directly present before one — visibly, unmovingly. Having made excellent offering with flowers and the rest, dissolve the king of gnosis wrathful ones into that very image.

Whoever desires accomplishment and continuously makes offering with incense, flowers, lamps, food, clothing, and the like: it is certain that the secret mantras of all the buddhas will be accomplished. Here, however, certain people are of inferior capacity, and because slandering this would cause them to fall extremely low, it is to be concealed in a secluded place away from such persons.

For pacification, increase, power, slaying, the sword and the other eight rites, and for the supreme accomplishment of all the buddhas — all these are obtained from the image of the Victor.

This is the third chapter, on the painted image, from the Noble Immovable's Tantra-King of Ritual Acts.

Now hear with wonder the explanation of the mantras in their wondrous graduated divisions — those secret mantras that perfectly purify the secret and bring accomplishment swiftly.

Adorned by the mother from the fourteenth vowel;
placed at the first of the second consonants;
beautified by the fifth of the third group nearby;
the third of the third group is placed right there;
at the fifth of the fifth, at the eighth,
beautified by the second vowel;
fire joins with the thirteenth vowel;
the second warmth connects with the fierce ending;
thirty-three joins with the sixth vowel;
adorned by the twenty-fifth;
twenty-two and eleven join;
and to that, sun and moon give full adornment.

The mantra-king of ten syllables —
recited ten thousand, one hundred thousand, or ten million times, or even a million: one will behold the deity.

The essence is free of sin and full of joy;
praised by all the buddhas of the ten directions;
the great bliss that exhausts suffering, generating it for practitioners —
when one recalls this fierce secret mantra,

in this very world too one will become long-lived,
and one will become a buddha — what need to say more?

Om svabhāvaśuddhāḥ sarvadharmāḥ svabhāvaśuddho 'ham.
This is the mantra of wisdom that purifies the apprehended.

Om śūnyatājñānavajrasvabhāvātmako 'ham.
This is the mantra of wisdom that purifies the apprehending mind.

Om vajraśuddhāḥ sarvadharmā vajraśuddho 'ham.
This is the mantra of vajra-wisdom that stabilizes the body.

Om kāyavākcittavajrasvabhāvātmako 'ham.
This is the mantra of wisdom of body, speech, and mind.

Om acalatejasīvajrapuṣpe dhūpe dīpe gandhe naividye sa-parivārebhyaḥ jaḥ hūṃ baṃ hoḥ, sanṭṛptā sarvasattvānāṃ, imaṃ baliṃ gr̥hṇa kha kha khāhi khāhi bhakṣa bhakṣaṇi hūṃ phaṭ.
This is the mantra for offering and torma.

Curd and milk and rice-wine,
white śāli rice and white sesame,
wheat, barley, and millet,
fruits and the like — offer these always.

Om caṇḍamahāroṣaṇa hūṃ, maṇḍalamaddhye āgacchaya, samayastvaṃ.
This is the mantra for inviting.

Om caṇḍamahāroṣaṇa mama śatruṃ amukaṃ śarīraṃ kīlaya hūṃ phaṭ, katimutastambhaya, hṛdayaṃ kīlaya hūṃ phaṭ, pādaṃ kīlaya svāhā.
This is the mantra for nailing with a phurpa.

Namas samanta-kāya-vāk-citta-vajrāṇām. Oṃ acala-kāna caṇḍamahāroṣaṇa sphoṭaya hūṃ trāṃ maṃ haṃ.
This is the mantra for spurring on activity.

Namas samanta-kāya-vāk-citta-vajrāṇām. Oṃ acala-kāna caṇḍa tanata-nata, maṭṭa-maṭṭa, moṭa-moṭa, taṭṭha-taṭṭha, hana-hana, daha-daha, tiṣṭha-tiṣṭha, āveśaya-āveśaya, mahāmantra-bhalaka, dhuna-dhuna, tini-tini, khada-khada, vighnān, mara-mara duṣṭān-duṣṭān-daṣṭān rakṣa haṃ, sarvān kuru-kuru, kiri-kiri, mahāvighnaṃ vajra, sphoṭaya-sphoṭaya, hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ, tribalīṃṭa-raṃgana-rakta, oṃ oṃ oṃ, hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ, acala-teja, sphoṭaya-sphoṭaya, hūṃ hūṃ, amantika, krodha-mahābala, śrotāya, manāya, mantahaṃ maṃ, śuddha-tu-mokṣa, dupya-du, vajra-nāmataṃ, apratihate-bhyaḥ, jvālāya-trāya, asahana, mahāsvāhā.

This is the mantra that accompanies all activities.

Namas samanta-kāya-vāk-citta-vajrāṇām. Oṃ tratra amogha, caṇḍamahāroṣaṇa, sphoṭaya hūṃ phaṭ, tramaya-tramaya hūṃ, tratahaṃ maṃ, oṃ balinṭa-tejo-mālinī svāhā.

This is the mantra that accompanies all rites.

Namas samanta-kāya-vāk-citta-vajrāṇām. Oṃ amogha ehyehi apratihata ehyehi acala-va-teja, anantakana, tiṣṭha-tiṣṭha, curu-curu, taṭi-taṭi, taṭa-taṭa, vighnaṃ ghātaya, mārāya, khādaya, sphoṭaya, tratastam, camena, anubandha, ājñā-kuru, asahada, anagra, kaṭa-kaṭa, maṭa-maṭa, haṃ haṃ, atibala, ehyehi mahākāruṇa, biṣaṇa, nanta-nanta, āveśaya-āveśaya, acala-teja, sarvatra anuttare kicata, taṭa-taṭa, dharma-dharma, phaṭ phaṭ haṃ.

This is the mantra of the supreme protection.

The wrathful king, the Immovable One — whoever knows his secret mantras
can rout the māras by the letters alone;
what need is there to speak of reciting them many times?

This is the fourth chapter of the Tantra King of the Arising of the Secret Mantras, from the Noble Tantra of the Conceptual [Arrangements of] Acala.

Then, to be rightly explained:
from the accomplished secret mantras,
through the distinctions of the methods of activity,
all desired aims are supremely accomplished.

Pure meditation, pure phenomena,
pure wisdom, pure body,
pure self-arising, pure meaning,
pure action, pure doing —
great wisdom like an illusion,
the mechanism resembling magical display,
connected with the reflections of mirages and optical illusions, moving variously like bubbles on water —
by which one conquers the māras:
white mustard, the sovereign, is to be accomplished.
Placed as stars of victory,

a white skull is sprinkled with perfumed water.
This is done for the sake of performing all activities;
in due season it is guarded and generated,
and in due season offerings and torma are made —
one is then victorious over all obstacles.

Alternatively, make an image of a black snake in wax or resin, fumigate it with a great quantity of guggul resin, and recite the mantras forcefully; then sprinkle it on the body of whomever one desires. After bathing, shake a bundle of kuśa grass from below upward, and recite: Nāgarāja samaya duntī, phuṭa phuṭa phaṭ. This will cure one who has been harmed by a nāga.

Alternatively, fumigate with the white mustard described above and with guggul resin while reciting the mantras forcefully, and the nāga will flee and not return.

For one seized by a spirit possession and the like, multiply white mustard through repeated mantra recitation and then cast it — the spirit will be driven away.

To protect a newly born child, hold a bowl inscribed with a design in stone.

Make an effigy in resin four finger-widths in size; insert into its heart a mantra together with the name of the person to be worked upon, and fix thorns in its mouth — thorns will be fixed in the mouth of that person. Fix them in the feet and it will cause lameness. Press them into the heart and it will cause loss of memory.

A phurpa made from the bone of a human lord of men, or —

An iron phurpa — whichever limb it is driven into will become either numb or paralyzed.

Recite the mantra many times over cremation-ground ashes and then drive them under an enemy's threshold, and he will be ruined.

Enter into battle, recite the mantra over a sword and hold it fast — victory will be yours.

Whatever the aim, it will certainly be accomplished through the particular use of the ritual torma offering.

Go to a charnel ground, take a skull-bowl, make a lamp-wick from the stalk of a white lotus and use rendered fat as the oil; light it on the eighth or fourteenth day of the month and smear the smoke upon your eyes — those who see you will be filled with delight.

If it should happen that the sun or moon is seized by an eclipse, fashion an image of the Immovable Protector in resin, make offerings of crystal flowers or blue water-lily blossoms, and recite the mantra and name continuously without interruption — you will be able to sustain life for a thousand years.

Again, at the time of an eclipse of the moon, pour many kinds of blood into a skull that has been split into six pieces, place it upon a black maṇḍala, cover the mouth with a mirror, and set upon it an image of the Immovable One fashioned from resin. Smear your own naked body with the five substances of a great buffalo, recite the mantra and name without interruption — you will come to see the three planes of existence.

Again, at the time of an eclipse of the sun or moon, make a four-sided maṇḍala and plant swords at its four corners. Smear your own naked body entirely with ash and recite the mantra without interruption — the three planes of existence will appear to you with great clarity.

If you wish to open a treasure trove, fashion an image of the Immovable Protector from resin, place it together with all sweet-smelling substances such as the six medicines and the like into a sealed jewelled vessel, set it on a small throne in the center of a white maṇḍala, make offerings three times a day, perform one hundred and eight circumambulations, offer prayers, burn incense such as black aloe-wood, and offer praises — within three months a treasure will certainly be found.

If you wish to bring down rain, go to a place where nāgas dwell, create a nāga maṇḍala, and fashion figures of nāgas and their retinues from monkey fat or dough, coloring them in varied hues, then introduce them into that maṇḍala. Generate the samaya beings, and into the center — together with the Immovable Protector — invite the wisdom deity. Make offerings of molasses, sugar, honey, milk, and the like, and proclaim the root mantra like the roar of a dragon — the nāgas, struck with terror, will send down a continuous stream of rain.

If it does not come down, place the nāga figures inside a single-piece skull and roast them with a fierce fire — without any doubt, rain will fall for seven days as heavily as the wheel of a carriage.

This is the fifth chapter, the chapter on subtle rites, from the king of tantras of the conceptual elaboration of the noble Immovable One.

Now what is to be taught straightforwardly:

That which arises from stable meditative concentration is none other than non-deception, dispelling all harm.
Hear this well, O great king of the three realms!

From the practice of the graduated sequence of expansion and contraction,
for as long a time as one desires,
the mind abides in itself and becomes stable.

Having completely cleared away all conceptual thought and cataracts regarding both what is material and what is immaterial and everything without remainder,
having utterly destroyed all illnesses of the afflictions together with their habitual tendencies,
bliss arises in the very instant.

Expansion is not grasped, contraction is not grasped — a meditative absorption without arising and without cessation,
a dhyāna without coming and without going.

Dwelling in that, one swiftly attains primordial wisdom.
Unsurpassed wisdom, qualities, and great powers —
these are obtained by pleasing the teacher.
Receive their very essence as ambrosia.

If with reverence one continuously practices day and night without ever breaking the stream, one will swiftly become a vessel for the attainment of Mahāmudrā.

Apply yourself — the branches of awakening —
and abandon laziness, sleep, and distraction.

When the mantra is clear, the visualization becomes stable, and once meditative concentration has emerged, take up the construction of the ritual device.

On the daytime of the lunar mansion Gyalwa,
upon birch bark or elm bark,
write in saffron, camphor, and sandalwood
a vajra diagram with a border:

in the center write the name and the mantra expanded,
on the border write the root mantra,
and on every corner write hūṃ and the name
expanded — write it going around from the right.

In the center of a white maṇḍala,
place it upon a white flower,
generate the form of the deity,
and recite one thousand and eight times.
Whoever binds it to their shoulder
or ties it to their body, it will protect them.

Written with a stone stylus on a clay bowl in red chalk, and tied to a door, it protects newly born infants.

Write the mantra together with the name on a charnel-ground shroud, smear it with monkey fat, place it in a charnel-ground vase, seal the mouth with a vajra-cross, and conceal it — this will cause a womb to dry up. Take it out and wash it with milk, and recovery will follow.

If one wishes to kill: upon a black triangular maṇḍala, place a figurine of the target made of clay — the unmoving protector, one-faced and four-armed: in the right two hands holding a sword and a vajra with the threatening gesture, in the left hands holding a skull-cup of blood — adorned with all ornaments.
Then, from the six impure substances and dough, fashion an effigy of the target eight finger-widths in size. Place within its chest a wheel together with the fringe of slaughter, the vajra-cross. Set it at the feet of that deity's image, and oneself abiding in the meditative absorption of the deity, at each of the four corners place a kīla (ritual stake) four finger-widths in size made of human bone, or sappan wood, or iron — and at every session of practice drive it in, contemplating that the target's consciousness swoons. Then rouse the awakened heart of the immovable kīla before you through its rays of light, and from it emanate innumerable wrathful ones bearing iron hooks and lassos.
Setting the target upon a wheel of wind, they come, and in a single instant scatter the aggregates and dissolve the consciousness into the liṅga. Having performed this for twenty-one days, and burned it in a fire pit or suppressed it, it is certain that even the Great God (Śiva) himself will be slain — what need is there to speak of others.

Alternatively: with datura, dog's blood, and fish blood, make a wheel as sharp as the tip of a sword. In its center, within a triangle, write the name of the target together with their lineage. Encircle that with a lasso. On the spokes write the eight syllables of the mantra verse. On the border write the heart-mantra together with the name. On the back border write the all-action mantra. On the third border write alternating vajras and swords. Then place it inside a joined pair of skulls, bind it with silk thread, and possessing the concentration of devouring the target, gaze upon it with the wrathful blood-drawing gaze of one utterly enraged — within twenty-one days, whoever it was done against will vomit blood and die. Concealed in a charnel ground, they will die when a weapon-kalpa descends upon them. Concealed at the root of a single tree, they will become insane. Concealed at a river confluence, they will suffer from fits. Concealed at a crossroads, they will go mad. Concealed at the foot of a sacred image, they will become a fool. Concealed in a place where nāgas dwell, there is no doubt they will be seized by leprosy. Concealed at the foot of one's own bed, a woman who desires them will enter. If attached to the tip of a victory banner, an army will go mad as well. For all of these, visualize a blazing wrathful one of smoky hue, four-armed, four-legged, and three-eyed.

On a charnel-ground shroud, write the name of a military commander together with the expanded mantra at the hub of a vajra-cross, pressing it down with the eight syllables on the perimeter. Outside of that, on the maṇḍala of the Great Lord (Śiva), draw a vajra-cross, place it made of monkey fat in the chest of the lord of the assembly, and set it at the boundary of the place of conflict — the army will go mad. Furthermore, observe the stars and planets, and hurl it. If one wishes to expel: write the aforementioned wheel on birch bark or cloth with the blood of a crow and an owl, and expand it with the syllable UCCĀṬAYA. If one wishes to stop heavy rain or hail: on birch bark make a wheel of four spokes with saffron or civet musk, with three borders, on the four spokes write the mantra of the essence, surrounding the syllable HŪṂ. At the central hub write the syllable KṢIṂ. Around it write the root mantra in a leftward circle. On the first border write the mantra of all actions. On the second, a garland of swords. On the third, an all-encompassing ring of fire. Visualize it thus, make offerings, and then tie it to the top of a victory banner — heavy rain and hail will cease.

Furthermore, if one wishes to kill: on a piece of birchwood write the essence-mantra of the Immovable One with vermilion in a leftward circle, then place it, along with the name of the target, into the chest of the effigy described above, inside a triangular maṇḍala. Turn it face downward, lying flat on its back, and recite the mantra of all actions while performing the rite for sixteen days. Then place it inside a black vase, one cubit tall, made of a stūpa fashioned from charnel-ground earth. Inside the hollow up to the three lower tiers of the stūpa, place five clay votive tablets, close the triangle shut, and set it facing south. By this means, death is certain within two months.

If one wishes to sever another's vidyā-mantra, draw the Lord of the Assembly at the center of the Great God's maṇḍala, mark all the corners with vajra-crosses, and mark all the sides with the syllable LĀṂ. Press a vajra-kīla down upon the effigy of the target — within seven days the vidyā-mantra will be severed. Alternatively, use a yantra of four HŪṂ syllables placed head to head.

Now, using the skin of a civet cat: either inscribe a yantra on it, combined with the rite of inflation, or fashion it into a wick with the fat used as lamp oil, and smear the smoke from it onto the eyes — enemies will not be seen. Alternatively, make a dot on the forehead with it; smear it on the hands, and whoever is touched will certainly come under one's power. Smear it on the feet and one will be able to travel a hundred leagues. Fashion a figure from powdered śāli rice flour and smear it on the enemy — the enemy will be inflated and die. Mix it with charnel-ground ashes and cast it at the enemy's door or army — they will be struck by disease. Write a yantra on the skin of a civet cat, breathe upon it, and recite the mantra one thousand times — that enemy will swell up and die.

The mantra for this is as follows:

tadyathā — namo stu te — mahāgaṇapataye svāhā — oṃ gaṇa gaṇa adhipataye svāhā — oṃ gaṇaḥ gaṇapati prajṛtaye svāhā — namo stu ti mahāgaṇapataye svāhā — oṃ karkaṭrakāṭa maṭamaṭa dāradāra bidārabidāra hana hana gr̥hṇa gr̥hṇa dadhava dāddhava gara gara bhaṃja bhaṃja jaṃbha jaṃbha moha moha dehi dehi dhāpaya dhāpaya dhāyanya dhāyanya siddhi me brayaccha sama sama sama mārayamacusma rāma putrā pacānaya svāhā — oṃ kuru kuru svāhā — oṃ turu turu svāhā — oṃ suru suru svāhā — oṃ muru muru svāhā — oṃ śāntaṃ puṣṭiṃ kuru svāhā — oṃ gatabṛṃdhukṛpitacitta mahāvidhārāgagacchinti mahābhaya parakrama mahāhāsti mahādharkaṇīya pracittayāmi svāhā — oṃ kuru kuru curu curu muru muru — oṃḥ ga ga ga ga ga ga ga ga oṃ namo namaḥ svāhā.

The recitation mantra is: om̐ bṛṭaka svāhā.

Furthermore, from the rites of the Lord of the Assembly: if one wishes to bind the wind, draw on royal cloth, with saffron, civet musk, and yellow turmeric, the form of the Great God's maṇḍala with Mount Meru pressed down by a vajra-cross. Arrange the syllables YĀṂ and LĀṂ in sequence, and in the center depict the Lord of the Assembly mounted on a rat, his color like refined gold, with four arms. The first right hand holds a rosary, the first left hand holds a skull-cup filled with nectar held by the lower two prongs of a trident, looking upward with his nose raised to the sky. In his heart, upon a crescent moon of jade green, written with LĀṂ, YĀṂ, and LĀṂ, a yogin endowed with the meditative absorption that fully pervades the great empowerment of Mahādeva, when he recites the mantra one hundred and eight times, this is the supreme method for binding the wind. Furthermore, if it is placed on a roof or on the tip of a tree, it will bind the wind.

Now shall be explained the accomplishment born of manifold actions belonging to the Lord of the Assembly.

In the center of a double-stacked image of the Great God, marked by a triple-pointed vajra, with one face, four arms, and a trident, holding a vessel called Bhītipāla, a counting rosary, and an Aśoka branch, he abides in the bodhisattva's cross-legged posture upon a rat, wrathful, adorned with blue precious ornaments.

Offering to him regularly: Sāmala, Lalā, Dugdha, milk, yogurt, white honey, butter, alcohol, and pea-flesh, cooked meat, and fruits — through such regular offerings, he bestows treasures. Alternatively, the form of oneself that does not waver: three faces, six arms, in a wrathful body. In the right hands: a sword, an arrow, and a vajra. In the left hands: a lasso, a bow, and a short lance. Arising from a HŪṂ that fills the three realms, this wrathful one of many colors holds numerous weapons and is capable of expanding and withdrawing from himself. Before him stands the Lord of the Assembly, one-faced and two-armed, seated on a lotus, holding a bow and arrow. Having generated and offered cooked meat, and performed a thousand recitations, all activities will be accomplished.

Using the salt of the land and three types of soil, make an image of the Lord of the Assembly and cause it to bear the name of the one to be harmed — in cases of bad years, fearful people, fearful livestock, and so forth. Whoever's name is thus taken hold of, they will be protected from all harm.

This concludes the sixth chapter, on yantra, from the Noble Tantra-King of the Investigation of Acala.

Now shall be accurately explained the fire offering, which is to be held dear as a limb for the accomplishment of activities. There are two kinds of hearth: the rough-surfaced kind and the pleasant kind; the accomplishment is to be performed in one's own home. The type of ground is to be determined according to the category of the activity. One should construct the hearth on ground free from flaws. The width is twenty-four finger-measures, the face of the hearth twelve fingers across. The depth is to be four fingers less than its width, and it is to be made circular. Having gazed upon it, adorned in the shape of a lotus, one should place a blazing sword upon it. At the four corners, four half-vajras; around the opening of the hearth, a clearly drawn garland of vajras. This applies to all activities. Alternatively, one cubit across and triangular inside, three tiers of three and two finger-measures. Inside, draw a vajra-cross. This is praised for the activity of slaying.

Sesame, rice, milk, yogurt, butter, honey, Palāśa wood, Bejuice, and white flowers — these mixed with the three whites and sweetness are supremely auspicious for the activity of pacification. Śāli rice, barley, molasses, Nagula, Sarjagugulu, saffron, tsampa with yogurt, Jujube wood, golden-colored flowers and the like — these are supremely auspicious for the activity of increase. Red sandalwood, saffron, spotted sesame, Chinese peas, Kṛta-grain, Cuṃtsi seeds and the like, the five nectars of the yellow cow, Nāga bark and red sandalwood, red flowers — these are auspicious for the activity of power. For slaying: blood, poison, white mustard seed, three types of salt, and Liṅgara.

White garments, white ornaments too, all implements made white, and with virtuous intention one gazes toward the east — by this the activities of pacification are accomplished. When ornaments, garments, and all implements are yellow, with the mind oriented toward increase, gazing toward the north and circumambulating the maṇḍala with joy — by this the activity of increase is accomplished. When ornaments, garments, and all implements are red and glossy, gazing with a mind like one intoxicated — by this the activities of power are accomplished. When ornaments and garments are black and all implements are black, with a rough mind, gazing while emitting wrathful sounds, looking toward the southern direction — — by this the wrathful activities are swiftly accomplished.

When performing these activities, one should visualize a kīla fashioned from human bone as utterly immovable, and having first completed the approach recitation, press it firmly: the first time at the mouth, the second time at the heart, the third time at the navel, the fourth time at the knees.

Take monkey fat, or ash, or dough, form it into a liṅga, then pound together nettles, a whip, and fish scales, mix with blood, write a vajra-cross on a piece of cloth, inscribe the name and mantra in the center of it, place this at the heart of the figure, and pronounce: "Om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa amukaṃ stambhaya kīlaya hūṃ phaṭ." Then draw the consciousness of the object to be bound onto the breath, and direct it together with the breath. If one wishes to restore the person, remove the kīla, take out the name, pour milk over it, and recite: "Om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa śāntīm kuru kurvantau ye svāhā." Reciting this, the person will recover within seven days.

If one wishes to perform the killing activity, one should meditate upon the one born from hūṃ — the Immovable One (Acala) called "the Blind One" — having one eye of deepest red, holding a sword and a lasso, of a dark greenish-black color, fierce and turbulent, dwelling in a cave of precious rock. Having made continuous, unceasing offerings at all times, and visualizing him at the center of all three triangles, if one burns flesh, blood, poison, and images before his face, death will come swiftly.

If one wishes to cause paralysis, burn the bone of a she-mule with the mantra "Jeta ya jeta ya" one thousand and eight times.

If one wishes to cause muteness, burn goat flesh with "Bha ṭira bha ṭira" thirty thousand times.

If one wishes to cause madness, burn dog flesh, beer, and various poisons with "Unmandunmanda" one thousand and eight times.

If one wishes to blind an enemy, burn barberry wood and donkey dung with "Aṭa kara" one thousand and eight times.

Burning the five meats and the five nectars together with the bone of a she-mule with "Mohaya" one thousand and eight times will cause stupefaction.

Burning hellebore and sandalwood with "Jvara da pa naya" one hundred and eight times will stop an epidemic.

Burning frog bile and the flesh of a black dog with "Citi jvalome pa naya" one thousand times will stop leprosy.

Burning semen, blood, and datura (dhattūra) with "Su tri tsinda" one thousand and eight times will cause barrenness of the womb.

With fierce and wrathful pride,
burning dūrvā grass, civet musk, or rock salt
will turn back epidemic disease, strife, fear, and malignant spirits.

Burning curd, white lotus, and honey, vulture brain, and crow fat —
this turns back madness, dropsy,
and the failure of children to be born.

Ah, but further: by this king of mantras
all manner of activities are accomplished, and the gnosis of the Great Immovable One is swiftly attained beyond compare.

Yet those who desire what is deceptive, craving to wander,
who deceive the guru,
who attend only to words but do not seek their meaning,
who are heedless, distracted, miserly,
filled with covetousness, and without compassion —
for them, though they practice for a hundred or a thousand eons, it will never be accomplished.

The gate of body, speech, and mind means nothing other than toil.

Offering every day, at all three times of day,
all manner of fine foods and drink to all companions —
even that cannot compare to offering the guru even once.

It does not measure even a hundredth part.

Then, at that time, Indra (Śakra), the lord of the gods — Joyful and Sovereign — together with six divine sons praised the Great Wrathful One, the Immovable:

O how wondrous — though you hold a mind of love, you appear turbulent;
though joyful and utterly pure, you are adorned with varied ornaments.
When you brandish your sword throughout all the realms of the gods, the hosts of asuras all faint and appear utterly terrified.

With the threatening finger pointed at all afflictions of existence, the m̄aras faint and flee in terror, crying out from afar.
Even at the half-syllable "Ā He," they shriek and flee in fright.
Your form, O Great One, has become supremely great.

Greatly praised and extolled by the buddhas of the ten directions, adorned as nāgas gather, gracing every side with their bodies, dressed in the finest jeweled ornaments by the daughters of Śakra (Indra, king of the gods) —
to you who gaze wide-eyed, roll your tongue, and grasp the tiger's hide, we offer praise.

Having offered that great hymn of praise, all the divine assemblies — Mahābrahmā (the Great Brahmā) and the rest — rejoiced with delight before the Blessed One.

This is the seventh chapter, the chapter on fire sacrifice, from the Royal Tantra of the Ritual of the Noble Immovable.

Here ends the ritual called "Whence All Siddhis Fully Arise," from the hundred thousand verses of the Royal Tantra of the Ritual of the Noble Immovable.

Translated by the paṇḍita Atula Dāsa Vajra and the Tibetan translator Marpa Bandé, known as Chökyi Wangchuk Drakpa.

Translator's Notes

- The list of divine and planetary figures in the assembly represents a standard late Indian Buddhist tantric enumeration of the Brahmanical and autochthonous pantheon being subordinated to the Buddha's power. Several names in the list require identification: Gzhon nu is Kumāra (Skanda or Kārttikeya); Bhairavasata is Bhairava; Dga' byed dbang phyug is Nandīśvara; Mig dmar through Spen pa and Pa ba sangs are the planets Mars, Jupiter, Venus, Saturn, Rāhu, and Ketu respectively — rendered by their Tibetan planetary equivalents. The stūpa name Dpal 'byung ba, rendered "Śrī-Udbhava," is a Sanskrit back-formation and its exact identification is uncertain. The weapon list is one of the longest such catalogues in the tantric corpus; several terms are technical Sanskrit loanwords preserved in Tibetan transcription, and identification of a few is approximate.
- The closing line of the first chapter's verse and the tantra title present some compression. "Conceptual continuum" renders rtog pa'i rgyud, which could also be read as "tantra of thought" or "tantra of the mental stream"; this is a genuine textual ambiguity in the title, where rgyud carries both the sense of "tantra" as scripture and "continuum" or "stream." Both meanings are likely intentionally layered.

The list of violent imperatives in the dhāraṇī section is rendered functionally into English equivalents; several terms (bkhos, sdoms, zo, sdig) are Tibetan vernacular command-forms for which exact Sanskrit Vorlage equivalents are uncertain, but the semantic register — subjugation, binding, devouring, glaring — is consistent throughout the genre.

The final line "drew forth this very awareness — its vajra body, speech, and mind" renders rig pa 'di nyid kyi sku dang gsung dang thugs rdo rje las phyung ngo. The construction is slightly elliptical; "from the vajra of body, speech, and mind of this very awareness" is the more literal reading, but the intended sense is that the Blessed One's vajra body, speech, and mind of awareness manifested or emanated forth at that moment.

- The passage describes a series of wrathful deity visualizations, each preceded by the Blessed One entering a specific meditative absorption and drawing forth a vidyā. The deities are forms of Acala (the Immovable One) and related wrathful protectors in tantric sādhana context. The term rendered "lord of the assembly" for རྒྱལ་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷ་མོ་ refers to Gaṇapati, upon whom the deity stands. The "eight accomplishments" beginning with the sword refers to the classical set of eight mundane siddhis, the first of which is the sword-siddhi conferring flight and invisibility. The syllable རྩལ་ is rendered as the roaring sound associated with nāgas; the phrase རྩལ་ལྷ་མོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷ་མོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷ་མོ་ is read as "adorned with eight great nāgas who roar PHUḤ." The absorption names — "Indestructible Unbearable," "Unsullied Lord of the World," and "Unchanging Vajra" — are rendered directly from the Tibetan epithets of each samādhi.
- The term "ataṣī" refers to the flax plant, whose flowers are blue-violet. The verse invoking it as an offering seems to be a brief liturgical insertion, somewhat compressed in the original.

The phrase rendered "lord of assemblies" reflects a reading of "རྒྱལ་པོ་འཇམ་དཔལ་ལྷ་མོ་," which in this iconographic context most likely refers to Gaṇapati (Gaṇeśa), upon whom the deity stands. This reading is supported by the iconographic parallel with other Acala depictions.

The distinction between "samaya being" (dam tshig sems dpa', Skt. samayasattva) and "wisdom being" (ye shes sems dpa', Skt. jñānasattva) is a standard tantric technical distinction: the samayasattva is the visualized form, and the jñānasattva is the actual gnosis-being invoked to enter and merge with it.

- The section describing the mantra structure through vowel and consonant positions — "adorned by the mother from the fourteenth vowel," "the first of the second consonants," and so forth — is a traditional cryptographic encoding of a ten-syllable mantra using the Sanskrit phonological alphabet. The text instructs the initiated reader to reconstruct the mantra from these positional clues rather than spelling it out openly. The rendering here follows the text literally without attempting to decode and supply the mantra, as the encoding is intentional and the resolved mantra is a matter for the initiated tradition.

The term translated as "rice-wine" for རྩལ་ལྷ་མོ་ is uncertain; it may refer to a fermented grain beverage or a specific grain type. The offering list otherwise comprises standard items.

- The text shifts between mantra material in hybrid Sanskrit and ritual instructions in Tibetan. The mantras are rendered as close transliterations of the Tibetan phonetic spellings, which do not always permit confident reconstruction of the intended Sanskrit. Where syllables appear corrupt or opaque even by tantric standards, they are reproduced as they stand rather than normalized, consistent with the practice of the preceding passage.

The title of the tantra given at the chapter colophon reads literally "the Noble Tantra King of the Conceptual Arrangements of Acala, the chapter on the arising of the secret mantras, being the fourth." "Conceptual arrangements" renders rtog pa'i rgyud, which may also be read "the continuation of contemplation" or "the tantra of insight"; the precise Sanskrit title is uncertain.

The passage ends mid-sentence with a phurpa made from a human bone; the text is incomplete at this point and continues in a subsequent passage.

- The phrase "five substances of a great buffalo" renders a ritual term for five products derived from a buffalo. The identity of the "six medicines" is a standard Ayurvedic-influenced category in tantric ritual. The lunar mansion "Gyalwa" corresponds to a specific asterism whose Sanskrit equivalent would be determined by the broader astrological context of the text; it is likely Puṣya or another auspicious nakṣatra designated by Tibetan astrological convention. The passage "dum bu drug pa'i thod pa" — a skull split into six pieces — is an unusual ritual specification that may indicate a particular manner of ritual preparation; the translation follows the literal reading. The term rendered "cataracts" for "rab rib" refers literally to visual obscuration and carries the metaphorical sense of mental dimness or cloudedness of perception.

- The term rendered "unmoving protector" is a reference to Acala or Caṇḍaroṣaṇa — the "immovable" wrathful deity standard in kīla and abhicāra (harm-ritual) contexts. The passage's repeated use of this figure alongside the kīla and the triangular black maṇḍala is consistent with Vajrakīla ritual literature.

The word "liṅga" is retained untranslated as it refers here to a ritual effigy or substitute body into which consciousness is dissolved, a technical term in Tibetan abhicāra ritual distinct from its Hindu cultic meaning.

The phrase rendered "wheel-of-wind" reflects the Tibetan practice of visualizing the target placed on a spinning wind-maṇḍala as part of a destruction rite; no significant textual doubt attaches to this reading.

The passage ends mid-sentence, as the source text is incomplete at this point.

- The mantra passage contains numerous Indic syllables that appear in corrupt or highly abbreviated form in the Tibetan transcription. The rendering here follows the phonetic values as closely as the Tibetan orthography permits, without attempting to normalize the Sanskrit beyond what the text clearly supports. The name transcribed as "ṭsutsumdhara" (Tibetan: ཐ་སུ་སུ་མ་དྲ་) likely refers to a civet or similar animal; the identification as "civet cat" is standard in this ritual literature but the precise species is uncertain. The "Immovable One" whose essence-mantra is written is Acalā or Acalanātha, a wrathful deity commonly invoked in such rites.

- The passage contains several terms that appear to be transliterations of Sanskrit or regional ingredient names whose exact botanical or ritual identification is uncertain. "Bhītipāla" is a transliterated name for a vessel or implement; "Sāmala, Lalā, Dugdha" appear to be transliterations of offering substances. "Liṅgara" is a substance used in wrathful rites whose precise identification is uncertain. "Nagula" and "Sarjagugulu" are Sanskrit plant or resin names retained in transliteration. These have been kept as close phonetic renderings since forced identifications could introduce error.

The phrase rendered "blue precious ornaments" translates a term that could also indicate lapis lazuli or simply blue jewels; blue is the dominant sense here and is retained.

- The mantra syllables throughout this passage are rendered as transliterations of the Tibetan phonetic spellings, which represent Sanskrit mantras in corrupt or abbreviated form. The exact Sanskrit originals cannot be reconstructed with certainty in every case, and the transliterations given reflect the Tibetan orthography.

The phrase "Joyful and Sovereign" renders dga' rab dbang phyug, a divine epithet. This may be a Tibetan rendering of a proper name or epithet for Indra, though it is here treated as descriptive.

The term "bone of a she-mule" for rnga mo'i rus pa is retained literally as this is a standard ingredient in this class of ritual literature.

- The colophon names the translator as "Marpa Bandé Chökyi Wangchuk Drakpa," which may refer to a figure distinct from the better-known Marpa Lotsāwa; the identification is not certain from the text alone. The phrase rendered "gracing every side with their bodies" reflects a somewhat compressed Tibetan construction in which nāgas adorn the deity by assembling and arraying themselves around him.
