Toh 444 in the Kangyur is a tantra known in Sanskrit as the Sandhivyaṅkaraṇa-nāma-tantra and in Tibetan as the Dgongs pa lung bstan pa zhes bya ba'i rgyud, which may be rendered into English as "The Tantra Called 'The Explanation of the Intent.'" It belongs to the tantric section of the Kangyur and opens with homage to Vajrasattva, the presiding deity whose gnosis and inconceivable qualities are celebrated throughout the text. The tantra is concerned with the nature of mind and reality as understood through Vajrayāna teaching, weaving together themes of dependent origination — the twelve links from ignorance through aging and death — with the luminous, space-like awareness identified as the pure heart of all beings. As its title suggests, it takes the form of an authoritative revelation that discloses or "explains" a profound inner intent, situating it within the broader tradition of tantric scriptures that communicate awakened wisdom through the voice of Vajrasattva as the Lord of Secrets.

In the language of India: Sandhivyaṅkaraṇa-nāma-tantra. In the language of Tibet: The Tantra Called "The Explanation of the Intent."

Homage to the Blessed One, glorious Vajrasattva.

Thus did I hear. At one time of supreme clarity, the Blessed One Vajra, Lord of Secrets, whose supreme samaya is the three vajras, whose gnosis is that of all the Tathāgatas, whose qualities are of inconceivable excellence, who transcends both existence and non-existence and is therefore said to dwell where there is no dwelling — here, in this single expanse of space-like nature, the great Sage abides, cultivating the omniscient gnosis in full array, known as the pure heart of beings.

Ignorance, and formations, and consciousness, and name-and-form, the six sense bases, contact, feeling, craving, grasping, becoming, birth, and what is called aging-and-death — these are not to be regarded as knowledge. Pride, the pride of greatness, the pride of "I am," the manifest pride of "I am victorious," pride that surpasses pride, a trace of pride, and inverted pride — all of these, the supreme one of vajra-extreme, the bodhisattva and Tathāgata, becoming a number that cannot be fully expressed in words, became the very inexhaustibility of expression.

Innumerable as the dust particles of Mount Meru in uncountable buddha-fields, the great bodhisattvas and mahāsattvas, equal to a sesame-filled vessel, and likewise the Tathāgatas themselves, appeared to fill the entirety of the expanse of space.

Then the glorious Vairocana, possessor of the vajra of body, speech, and mind, gazed upon the maṇḍala of the retinue and manifested bodily form arising from those three realities.

Brahmā, Viṣṇu, the Great God (Śiva), Desire and the Veda — and paired with them, the god Brahmā and likewise the moon — equal in number to the aggregates and the rest; the drum-sounder, and likewise the Delighter, the Tawny Ascetic who is Desiccator, the Sage of the Nose-ring, and the Three Jewels — all the Tathāgatas as a single unity. At that time, what was extracted and beseeched was declared to be the very first teaching of secret mantra. What the great Sage acted out in the manner of the awakening mind of a bodhisattva is explained to be the second.

The subtle yoga of fully awakening through the fivefold manifestation is the third. Empowerment of four kinds is the fourth, which is itself the maṇḍala of form. The fourfold basis of precepts to be protected is there, and conduct is here the fifth. The sixth is the yoga of subtle meditative absorption proper to the pratyekabuddha. The seventh is described as the offering of suchness itself, performed by the Lord in relation to the secret empowerment. Empowerment by mudrā-seal is the eighth, as taught. The four samayas constitute the ninth. The correct contemplation divided into ten aspects — the mantra of recitation was also taught. The eleventh is what arose as names, wherein the maṇḍala is explained as having a single mudrā-seal. The twelfth, whose essential nature is the body, demonstrates awakening to śrāvakas and bodhisattvas. Likewise, the accomplishment of the conduct of awareness, and the five superknowledges, is the thirteenth. In the fourteenth, the fourfold garland mantra is shown by the Teacher. The one who has become directional and ascetic — the unsurpassed maṇḍala of accomplishment. The drum-sounder, possessed of the right moment, is the maṇḍala adorned with colored sand. The sun and moon are the empowerment of the student, who has become free from attachment and of manifold nature. The symbolic meaning of manifold words, the single name that carries manifold designations — thus the separate gathering of all these manifold aspects is fully demonstrated.

Liberated from both the one and the many, one sees truly and cultivates fully. The self that has been fully cultivated is also to be shown as dependent origination. Then, regarding the joining of the unborn, the great Sage, the great Vairocana, demonstrated the meditative absorption beneath it: the twelve links of dependent origination. The multitudes of beings belonging to the links of desire — all the second ones are Tathāgatas. He entered into meditative absorption known as "the great manner of attachment," and thereby all the Tathāgatas caused the Lord to enter into his own body.

The great bodhisattvas, the great beings, came to be joined to that continuum. Then all the Tathāgatas and likewise all the bodhisattvas, in order to please the Lord Tathāgata, entered into him and emerged as: the vital breath, the upward-moving wind, the downward-clearing wind, the equally-abiding wind, the pervading wind — these are called by name — and the nāga, the tortoise, the lizard, the god-given, and the bow-king. Into these very forms he manifested, and then emanated again in the form of a woman, just as his own essential nature truly is, arising from the body of that very body. From the union of those three very ones, cultivate their own secret mantras. Becoming definitively liberated from all the links, one becomes supremely subtle.

What arises from needing a head and from names — that is calm abiding and insight. Since its essential nature is without substantial existence, it does not know even itself. Yet even so, the Tathāgatas make this supplication to the Sage: "May the Blessed One, from his intention, grant the prophecy; may he teach the supreme Dharma."

"O sovereign pervader, you who have taken to heart these very Dharmas as being without substantial existence, fulfilling the aim of beings, you are beautiful as a wish-fulfilling jewel. Whoever comes to know truly, they have no dispute with the worldly; and likewise with those who have gone beyond the world, and likewise those who have gone utterly beyond the world. These Dharmas of peace itself, with calm abiding as their supreme preliminary — even if a bodhisattva merely hears them, one finds bliss in suchness itself."

Then Kṣitigarbha and the other great bodhisattvas, the great beings, made this request to the protector, great Vairocana: "The very secret mantra from which arises the meaning of that unsurpassed awakening, which future beings will come to hear — may the yogic Blessed One please teach it." Even though the request was made twice, the protector remained utterly silent, saying nothing. Vajrapāṇi, knowing this, then made the request once more: "This profound, unsurpassed yoga of calm abiding and the rest — thus it is to be praised by mantra practitioners; this is what the primal lord has declared. The yoga of activity to be performed, and yoga that is solitary alone, and what the scripture truly is — it is fitting that these be taught." Knowing the meaning of what was requested, the Blessed Vajrapāṇi then declared: "This supreme mode of secret mantra — the secret — shall be taught to you. The great secret mantra called 'thus it is said' is the mantra that bestows the meaning of all mantras. There one becomes master of the five, and master of the fourteen, the four joined ones. Apply the name of each of the five to the clear and the unclear. The joining explained in the direction of the evident expansion is adorned by the five maṇḍalas. By not knowing the meaning of what is spoken here, called 'seventeen,' how at that time would mantra practitioners perform the mantra joinings? Having understood this meaning, and teaching the various meanings, and accomplishing the aim of beings — these are what the supreme vidyā-mantra practitioners do. Join self with the thousand in the proper way. The syllable A resides above; having made what is called 'the latter' its abode, the mantra practitioner should accomplish the aims of sentient beings. Whatever the joining of two A syllables may be, it becomes that which is born from the A-gate. That form of above, below, and the directions is the essential nature of the absence of substantial existence. What is spoken here — that is the nature of the method which is inconceivable. 'By myself' — that understanding, that change: this is where unobstructed thought abides. Teacher, teaching, and abode have not even the slightest essential nature. Joined as one in the three times of conventional reality, this becomes the hearing of mantra practitioners. In an immeasurably vast number of aeons, what the buddhas have known — mantra practitioners obtain, all at once in a single moment, perfect and complete awakening. Known by the omniscient, cognized by the all-knowing, fully understood in mind —"

Mantra is the very subject of what the Teacher proclaims.

That suchness itself is the supreme Blessed One,
born from the vajra of body, speech, and mind —
non-conceptual, like open sky.

All mantras are like the sun.

The mantra practitioner, like wind upon the earth,
moves freely through all that is desired.

Whatever transformations occur, each and every one,
those become emptiness itself.

Seeing that yoga of suchness thus,
the all-knowing one is the Tathāgata.

Suchness become a reflected image —
that is arisen as the vajra of body.
Perfectly satisfying all beings,
it arises as the indivisible vajra of speech.
Whatever yoga abides in the expanse of space,
its own nature radiating in inconceivable ways —
from that, from the very ocean of primordial wisdom,
the vajra of mind has perfectly arisen.

The mind of every sentient being is thoroughly examined like space.
Because all abides there in that,
the form of woman, the single phenomenon —
that which all buddhas rely upon — having become a stage, is the thirteenth.
That is called "woman,"
and therefore that phenomenon is bhaga.
All that is spoken of as action and so forth becomes unified in the great sacred commitment.
In the single nature of reality, devoid of things,
all these become equal.

The sacred commitment of body, speech, and mind,
and likewise meditative absorption, the Victor,
earth and water, and likewise fire,
wind and space themselves,
form and sound and scent and taste,
touch and likewise the dharmadhātu —
all these have arisen with vajra as their ultimate reach.

The bodhisattvas of great miraculous power —
as it is said, "beyond all expression" —
those who have truly become inexpressible:
as many as the dust-motes of Mount Meru
in all the buddha-fields,
together with the great-minded bodhisattvas,

and the Tathāgatas equal to space:
Akṣobhya, Vairocana, Ratnasambhava, Amitāyus, and the Inexorable —
these, equal to the expanse of space,
are the Tathāgatas of vajra-essence.

Just as sesame seeds fill space,
so all the Tathāgatas
completely cover the expanse of space,
and these appear perfectly and truly therein.

Then the protector Vairocana became unified with suchness itself.
For the sake of those to be tamed,
all with the great sacred commitment as their foundation —
those bearing names such as vajra of body and so forth —
the great-minded bodhisattvas, and the Tathāgata of all-accomplishment:
these are renowned as the limbs of the body.
Arising from inconceivable calm abiding,
the vision of the single unborn
appeared in the manner of great desire.

In the supreme mode of great desire,
entering meditative absorption,
the entire assembly of all the Tathāgatas
was drawn into that one's very body.
That is all the Tathāgatas;
that is the great Vairocana.
For the purpose of giving delight,
he rendered his own body into the very form of woman.

Then from the inconceivable protector
there arose the appearance of a woman's form.
That truly abides as the form resembling the eye of the buddha,
and joined with the form resembling Māmakī,
the form resembling the White-Robed One,
and truly present as the form of Tārā.
There is the form whose nature is sound,
the form whose nature is scent,
the form whose nature is taste,

the form whose nature is touch,
and for some, by way of the nature of form itself
those Tathāgatas are present.

Then, in order to demonstrate the single meaning of the three modes,
and likewise Akṣobhya,
and for the sake of taming those far off in the world,
the mode of transcending the world arose.

The yoga of non-dual equality,
the vajra-woman, supreme bhaga —
that is to be drawn as Akṣobhya himself
within the maṇḍala of the great sacred commitment.
Having four corners and four gates,
with all foundations joined into one,
consecrated to stainlessness,
its form utterly resplendent in every direction,
pervaded everywhere by clouds of buddhas,
stirring with many flames,
possessed of maṇḍalas of luminosity and the rest —
it is the abode of all the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, lord of all — was established and remained at the center of the great maṇḍala. Akṣobhya, Ratnasambhava, Amoghasiddhi, and Vairocana — those Tathāgatas — were fully present within the mind of the vajra of awakening mind. In order to pervade them all, the Tathāgata beheld the awakening mind arising from the vajra, singular in its nature of non-arising, like space. Wisdom and meditative absorption being of a single ground, he comprehended it in his mind like a shadow. Having assumed the nature of the vajra, he acted for the benefit of beings equally and unequally. Just as the sun at the horizon awakens those who sleep, so all the Tathāgatas awaken beings by means of awakening mind. Body, speech, and mind are one single vajra. Through the nature of awakening mind, which is pleased to give rise to those, it was made into the vajra-mantra. The forms of awareness-beings were blessed with mantra without compare. All the Tathāgatas beheld that as if with a triple face. Then, arising from the compassionate equipoise of the Protector, the Blessed One, he caused the awakening mind to be completely encircled and deliberately proclaimed it three times. Whatever is inconceivable and immeasurable, the secret of all the Tathāgatas, has come to be that very domain of the single vajra awakening mind.

Then, upon hearing the manner of the secret, the Lord of Secrets, the master of mysteries, prostrated and made request in proper form to the all-pervading Vairocana: "The phenomena such as the aggregates, elements, and so forth — those that are gathered together and abide therein — I am humbled by the teaching that sets forth the distinguishing doctrine that they arise from dependent origination. How could these inferior phenomena, conditioned by aversion and the rest, be fitting for a Sugata and for great miraculous power? How could that great-minded bodhisattva come to be possessed of a body and so forth? Whatever future persons seek out these things — may they not remain without them."

Then the Blessed One, the Vajra-holder, the one possessed of great radiance, declared: "Seeing the beings of the future, and that which you have asked me — Excellent! Excellent! Great hero, Lord of Secrets, well asked! Just as your words speak their meaning, so shall I prophesy for you accordingly. In the future, human beings will be drawn to what is most degenerate in the world. Abiding in wrong views, they will engage in whatever pleases them. Some will delight in song and dance, given over supremely to laughter and display. They will delight in fragrance and garlands, and likewise take pleasure in sexual intercourse. Some will be averse to the deluded and similarly given over entirely to bewilderment. Some will cling to desire, while others will pursue sense pleasures. Fish and meat and likewise alcohol, urine, excrement, semen, and blood — the deluded will eat these, and proclaiming the absence of these things will cry it out as Dharma. Going to what is not to be gone to — such as one's mother, sister, and the rest — killing one's father and mother as well, and likewise killing other living beings, speaking nothing but false words, and in particular stealing, approaching another man's wife, and committing further acts of degradation. Some will abandon the sacred Dharma and likewise commit the acts without interval, and having performed all manner of misdeeds, will still desire accomplishments as mantra-practitioners. Tormented and afflicted by diseases with piercing pain, by poison combined with toxins, and by unbearable and varied illnesses, they will come to desire liberation. Those deluded ones who resort to abandonment, who have committed unbearable misdeeds and are given supremely to wrong views — they will go to the three lower realms. In order to take those ones under care, this secret has been taught in this way. Whoever truly attains it will in this very place become a Tathāgata. This is to be understood by the Lord of Secrets and by the wise —"

Having obtained this supreme method, and having obtained the clear and genuine meaning, they still fall into plain arrogance. For those ones, meditative absorption, peace, and wisdom itself are very far away. Filled with excessive delight, the yogi, calling himself "the self," takes constant pleasure in overt pride. Possessed of deceptive and fabricated qualities, he disparages both nirvāṇa and other paths in turn. Relying on talk of secret mantra, they fall into quarreling with one another. Those ones, through the blessing of māra, if they obtain even minor accomplishments, become arrogant on that account and come to think of themselves as learned. In assemblies they engage in dispute and conduct themselves toward food like dogs. They harm the benefit that arises from their own actions and results. Of those same ones, they claim that both virtue and non-virtue are "our power." They revile their teacher, who is like a manifest buddha, and show him no reverence. In one moment they feel hatred toward him, and in the very next moment they feel attachment to him. They display the conduct of dogs, pigs, and crows. They come to take manifest delight in harming one another. Without understanding the Guhyasamāja, they perform pledges and the like. Without keeping the secrets guarded, they reveal them everywhere. Having disparaged those of this world, they then lay everything openly bare before others. Being themselves without any foundation, they transgress and violate their pledges. Urged on by those who are noisy and contentious, they find no opening within themselves. They will not come to understand that samādhi from which primordial wisdom arises. For the sake of even a trivial fault, they engage in fierce and extreme conduct. Mantra-practitioners of inferior yogic engagement and application will not attain accomplishment. They delight perpetually in the treatises of non-Buddhists and become expert solely in those methods. Having wholly abandoned their own pledges, they conduct themselves like a hook without a handle. Through the practice of mantras and mudrās they will seek their livelihood. Wherever they can obtain material gain, there they teach the sacred Dharma. These things have been taught through the intent of gathering them into the secret, into the genuine. Those who have degraded and broken their pledges — all of them are to be drawn back by this. If one does not know how to recognize the traces of one's own condition, how could those ones attain peace? Then, for the purpose of taking them into care afterward, these methods came to be.

Thereupon the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, having gathered together as one, offered to the Lord of all Tathāgatas his own self-offering — that very pledge-cloud — and having made that excellent offering arising from the genuine, he prostrated and spoke these words: "O supreme secret Tathāgata, O gathering of all Tathāgatas, this vajra-essence of the assembled non-dual yogi's delight — the supreme of all the condensed essences of suchness — please, Blessed One, explain that suchness."

Thereupon the Blessed One again spoke to all the Tathāgatas: "Whoever makes such a supplication — to those Tathāgatas: Excellent! Excellent! If even the Tathāgatas themselves can give rise to doubt regarding this, what need is there to speak of other bodhisattvas?" — thus he spoke to those Tathāgatas.

Thereupon, filled with wonder and amazement, he who cuts through all doubt — the Lord of all Blessed Tathāgatas — was addressed in these words: "Blessed One, Lord of all Tathāgatas, though distinguished by all qualities, why have you not been pleased to teach this as the supreme matter here? Please make it a place of blessing. For the Tathāgata's delight and for the attainment of the cause and fruit of primordial wisdom, please explain this genuinely."

The Lord of all Tathāgatas, knowing their supplication, then — Vajradhvaṃsa, the lamp of primordial wisdom —

From the meditative absorption that arises from the aversion family, the chief one — the essence of Akṣobhya, resplendent with body, speech, and mind — was then perfectly drawn forth: the mantra called Vajradhṛk. Then, merely by its utterance, one who arises from the aversion family, born of that karma, becomes a being endowed with gnosis. Joined to Akṣobhya the Vast by skillful means, the three faces — dark, white, and red — are the faces of that great self. The Tathāgata dwelling within these three vajras is called Wisdom.

Then the Lord of the Tathāgatas, the origin of sacred commitment, called Samaya-arising-Vajra, entered into meditative equipoise as the sovereign of meditative absorption. Thereafter the essence called Jinadhṛk was likewise perfectly drawn forth. Then, merely by its utterance, one who arises born of the delusion family becomes a being endowed with gnosis: the Tathāgata Vairocana, appearing in front with faces of white, dark, and red. That one, possessed of the arising of jewels, abiding to the south, facing north, is called the Wisdom of Equality.

Then the Blessed One, the lord, the master of the three vajras and the sacred commitments — the one arisen from great attachment — entered meditative equipoise in the meditative absorption called Vajra. From the family of great attachment arose the essence called Ārolik, then drawn forth from the three vajras. Merely by its being drawn forth, the Blessed One below — the sovereign lord — became a being endowed with gnosis: the Sovereign of the World, equal to light, with faces of red, white, and dark, lord of the great glorious family, sovereign of the Tathāgatas, abiding in the western direction.

Then the Blessed One called Vividha, entering meditative equipoise in the vajra of the meditative absorption called the Sacred Commitment of Meaningful Activity, drew forth what is called the supreme among supreme essences. Of the class that bows down to the sacred commitments, the essence called Prajñādhrik arose from what is called the three vajras. Merely by its being drawn forth, that very protector, the Blessed One — possessor of the vajra of body, speech, and mind, joined to the vajra of Meaningful Activity — became a being endowed with gnosis, with faces of green, dark, and white. The sovereign of the Tathāgatas abiding in the northern direction: thus arising from the aversion family, the wish-fulfilling jewel family, the attachment sacred-commitment family — desire and liberation are supremely accomplished.

Then Vajradhara, the all-pervading lord, entered meditative equipoise in the meditative absorption that is the arising of the sacred commitment of attachment. From the vajra of body, speech, and mind of Vajradhara, the noble supreme queen — the supreme holder of the vajra — was drawn forth. She is rightly proclaimed as the Mother, the sole mother of all buddhas. She is that sovereign of the Tathāgatas. Since she is the supreme noble goddess-queen, arisen from body, speech, and mind, she is known as Dveṣarātī. That being who is called the gnosis-being — she who bears the female form — abides in the direction of fire with a form resembling three faces.

Then the one renowned as Anuragavajra, arisen from the vajra of body, speech, and mind, entered meditative equipoise. From the three vajras arose she who is Moharātī — for from that Tathāgata also arose the gnosis-being.

She is the yoginī resembling three faces. Through the practice of the yogi of non-dual equality — the sole delight of all buddhas, united by the practice of the Compendium of Secrets — she abides in the direction free from truth. Then the one known as Anuragavajra, arisen from the three vajras, entered meditative equipoise, and from that great bliss was drawn forth. Thus was Rāgaratī brought forth — she who bears a form with three faces, the supreme principal, bearing the female form. She arose as the gnosis-being, born from the stainless wisdom, the supreme pledge (samaya) of the three vajras, the queen of the Tathāgatas. She abides in the direction of wind.

Then the Blessed One, the lord, who holds the pledge of the three vajras, entered the meditative absorption known as Bsluvajra, and from that arose the supreme queen of all the Tathāgatas — she who bears a form resembling three faces — known as Vajraratī, drawn forth from the three vajras. The moment she was drawn forth, she too arose as the supreme gnosis-being, bearing the female form, and she abides in the direction of Indra.

Then that Blessed One, the protector — entering meditative equipoise in the absorption arising from Vairocana-vajra, in the vajra of body, speech, and mind — drew forth within this maṇḍala the great wrathful one who is the slayer of Yamantaka, the great wrathful deity. Once drawn forth, he abides in the eastern direction to terrorize the Tathāgatas.

Then the lord, the Blessed One, entered meditative equipoise in the absorption known as Abhisambodhivajra, that of all the Tathāgatas, and drew forth the great wrathful one — he who is Prajñāntakṛt, the vajra-holder. The glorious one so drawn forth arose perfectly as the gnosis-being. Through the practice of the great maṇḍala, he who resembles the form of a great blazing stake, who enforces the vajra-pledge, abides at the southern gate.

Then the one renowned as Ratnasambhava entered meditative equipoise, and from the three vajras arose the great wrathful one — Padmāntakṛt, the supremely luminous lord, foremost among all the maṇḍalas of speech — drawn forth from him. The moment he was drawn forth, he appeared here together with his supreme gnosis-being. Manifesting as the speech of all the Tathāgatas, he of stainless wisdom, supreme and unsurpassed, abides at the western gate.

That very Blessed One, the variegated one, entered the meditative absorption of the mind-vajra throughout, and thereupon the great wrathful one was drawn forth by the principal — the great wrathful deity who is drawn forth everywhere and who brings all obstructors to their end. Through the practice of the mind-maṇḍala, he abides at the northern gate.

Then the glorious Vajradhara, upon hearing of this supreme maṇḍala, addressed once more the great protector Vairocana with this question: "Indivisible from space, united as one, the Tathāgatas who are without materiality having performed the highest joy and so forth — how did they then make that request? If these have no beginning or end, how can they have a principal? With the directional parts thus established, by what is this purified? This secret is said to be impossible. Those who conceptualize through the three vehicles, and even through the words of ordinary beings, will also come to abandon it. He who, rejected by the śrāvakas and likewise excluded from the sūtras — engaging with aversion and the like, and with the five objects of desire and the like — makes the Tathāgatas his support: those activities common to subsequent practice are inverted. Those practices at the extreme of pleasure, those very deeds performed by the Tathāgata — in a single word lie immeasurable meanings. These most sacred secrets, protector — how shall future beings come to seek them?"

Then the Blessed One declared: "Vajrapāṇi, this method —

the unsurpassed secret intention — all that was asked shall now be explained.

Aversion, delusion, and likewise attachment, and the five aggregates beginning with the body: upon realizing that these are without self, a fully awakened buddha abides in the threefold manner. What is called the father is calm abiding; the mother, it is taught, is special insight.

One who knows suchness becomes embodied in it. Tranquility is the food of the yogin. Just as a craftsman fashions an image of the Sugata, so too that which is like the body in form, and likewise the speech in the form of speech, and the mind in the form of mind — all arise from calm abiding and the like.

Phenomena such as the aggregates are seen to be empty and arisen through dependent origination. Yogins, from calm abiding, bring forth the form of the sun of primordial wisdom. Therefore the vajra of body, speech, and mind arises like a shadow.

Likewise the aggregates, the elements, and so forth all abide within a single sacred pledge. From this, the three modes, being of one meaning, arise from calm abiding and the like. Therefore, O Lord of Secrets, listen to the pleasing manner of the vajra. What is called the vajra of the yogin arises from emptiness and dependent origination.

The yoga of infinite space, the arising of phenomena such as the aggregates, and all conceptuality of body, speech, and mind — these have arisen and arise from the aggregates and the like. Apply these properly to non-substantiality, and from this, meditative absorption is born. Joining these in the non-dual meditative absorption, they become the indivisible vajra itself.

Awakening, understood as the realization of depth and vastness — through realizing this, one becomes a bodhisattva. These, equal to the sky and become great, are known as what is called the Great. Boundless realization is taught in the Vajra Vehicle. Meditative absorption itself arises from that suchness — it is the Vajra Vehicle that has arisen from it.

From this one transcends the world, and likewise supremely transcends the world. The actual reality — suchness alone — is spoken of as the secret of the world. What arises from the unborn is both conventional and ultimate truth.

What is taught as having become māra and the children of the gods — accompanied by the aggregates, the afflictions, and the lord of death — over these the Victor, through non-substantiality, is proclaimed as the Victor's vajra. The body and the like are spoken of as the outer aggregate; whatever element arises and has arisen from element: great bodhisattvas, the greatly courageous ones, these come to possess the lineage of the vajra.

Whatever entities by which the five aggregates are conceptualized — these, in exactly those terms, being truly apprehended, become Tathāgatas themselves. Just as a mirror, perfectly clear and like unto space, holding within it the self-nature of all things — therein the self seeing the self: the yogin becomes the supreme maṇḍala.

The aggregates are renowned as Tathāgatas. What is to be elaborated from suchness — this, for the Victor possessed of the dharmakāya, becomes the great offering.

These — the elaborate and the condensed — are fully proclaimed to be sources of delight. Whatever sentient being may enjoy this: that is what is called supplication.

True wisdom and skillful means being non-dual, perfectly joined inseparably as the expanse of the sky — that becomes the manner of great attachment, and the yogin thereby abides in direct presence.

The great yoga of the Vajra Vehicle — whoever applies themselves definitively to their own nature — from this arises mental ease, which is the source of bliss in all things.

Whatever three liberations are seen in the three faces, and from those the aggregates and the like — the nature of the deity comes to be recognized. This is what is taught as the three suchnesses.

Non-substantiality is the supreme path; without duality, it enters into nirvāṇa. Yet that which has become differentiated — this arises as aversion from the dharmakāya. That very self-nature of the Blessed Lord, drawing forth the lineage of the Tathāgata, possessing the vajra-manner of nirvāṇa — that very thing is what accomplishes all faculties.

The phenomena arising from the sacred pledge and the like —

Even though it has not been realized by oneself, abiding in that is correctly taught. That is delusion, and likewise mind — by whatever phenomena one examines and imputes, one performs what is called "complete enjoyment." That is the wish-fulfilling jewel, the lord of the lineage of the great precious ones.

That very thing is the Blessed Lord's attachment, arisen from omniscient wisdom, become a union abiding in non-abiding — the supreme manner of great desire. Just as a lotus in the mud is not stained by its impurity, so likewise the supreme awareness of the yogin engages with all objects of desire; desire pervades all beings alike. That very thing is the supreme vajra lineage — dharmakāya, saṃbhogakāya, and nirmāṇakāya: those three are the summary.

Aversion, delusion, and likewise attachment — the chief, whose limit is vajra-joy — by drawing out the three lower destinies, the woman, though singular, becomes manifold. When those three are properly established, they become Yama's wisdom likewise; the lotus becomes the wrathful one who obstructs — named "the one who opens the extreme," with the appellation of "limit." Regarding entering and so forth, those very three are known as the aggregate — thus-gone. Even through the terrifying executioner of Yama, it is the maṇḍala from which all arises.

The vajra sacred pledge that terrifies, the foremost that utterly ends through the Tathāgatas, has likewise come to be called the speech of the lotus — the accomplishment of the yoga of deathlessness. Though it ends obstructers, it is the chief of mind, the master possessed of the nature of the lineage.

Thus the yogin who ever practices moves through the secret body. Whoever's mind becomes patient, resting in the prophetic intent, let such a one act accordingly, and thereafter guard the secret rightly. Just as a child is nourished by mother's milk, the Blessed One is chief in the three planes of existence, satisfying sentient beings as their minds desire with the nectar of Dharma.

From the union as one of the three bodies — dharmakāya, saṃbhogakāya, and nirmāṇakāya — the Blessed One intends the secret. It is neither true nor false. Aversion, delusion, the precious, and attachment — the various lineages that arose — having become the sign of the lineage of intent: this is the foundation, the first.

Then the Tathāgatas once more offered supreme worship to the Tathāgata, the self-lord, and addressed the Great Sage with these words: "We pray that the Blessed One expound the secret — the vajra intent, the supreme, the wisdom of all Tathāgatas, the supreme awakening mind."

The Blessed One fully comprehended their request in his heart, and being omniscient, the Sage himself thoroughly contemplated all bodhisattvas. Thereupon the Blessed One spoke to all the awakening minds in this manner:

"Body and mind are like this, and likewise speech in the manner of uttered words — the supreme awakening mind: let all of you generate it."

In this way the Teacher taught the bodhisattvas exactly as things are. Thereupon the Tathāgatas, having conjoined body, mind, and speech in that very manner, proclaimed and proclaimed again to the great bodhisattvas — the great heroes possessing the vajra of body, speech, and mind:

"How wondrous! Born from the dependent origination of Samantabhadra (the All-Good), this birth is here supremely proclaimed by way of non-arising."

Thereupon the lord of Tathāgatas, the three vajras of the Tathāgatas, entered into meditative absorption — the vajra samādhi of perfect manifest awakening of all Tathāgatas — and proclaimed this glorious awakening mind:

"In the abiding of non-existence of things, it is neither thing nor non-thing. Thus, since things and non-things are as they are, cultivation does not exist as a thing."

Thereupon the glorious Vairocana entered into meditative absorption — the samādhi known as the non-dual sacred vajra (samaya-vajra) of all Tathāgatas — and proclaimed this awakening mind, the supreme secret intention-vajra of all Tathāgatas, in every respect and truly:

"Pure, free of the aggregates and elements and so forth of all Tathāgatas, liberated from apprehended object and apprehending subject, endowed with the emptiness of selflessness of phenomena — this awakening mind is proclaimed to be that which bears the name 'dependent origination,' the sign of non-arising from beginningless time, and likewise the very equality of one's own mind."

Thereupon Akṣobhya (the Unshakable), the Tathāgata, entered into meditative absorption — the samādhi of non-dual, inexhaustible wisdom of all — and proclaimed this awakening mind:

"Since these things are unborn, the nature of what is designated as the aggregates does not exist. That which is difficult to behold, like space, and free of self — this is to be called awakening."

Thereupon the Blessed One, the glorious Ratnasambhava (Jewel-Splendor), entered into meditative absorption called the vajra of selflessness and proclaimed this awakening mind:

"All phenomena are without substantial existence and free of the defining characteristics of phenomena. Arising truly from the selfless nature of phenomena — this is shown to be the manner of awakening."

Thereupon Amitābha, bearing that name, entered into meditative absorption — the vajra lamp of blazing wisdom — and proclaimed this awakening mind:

"In phenomena that are unborn there is no substantial existence and no cultivation. By joining to the abode of space, what is called 'substantial existence' is supremely explained."

Thereupon the truly indomitable, the vajra of overwhelming splendor, entered into meditative absorption and proclaimed this awakening mind:

"This Dharma is luminous by nature, primordially pure, like space. There is no awakening and no realization — this is explained to be the awakening mind."

Thereupon the glorious Vajrapāṇi, upon hearing the awakening mind and in order to explain clearly the meaning of the intended sense, spoke to the great Vairocana, the Mighty One:

"Lacking substantial existence and lacking any object of focus, the bodhisattva is like space. Upon hearing this secret manner of things, the thought of substantial existence arises. Through the application of body, speech, and the rest, the mind brings forth those conceptions. Ordinary persons speak of this as the culmination of the many aspects of true awakening. They grasp the speech of the Mighty One as though it were just their own words. Please proclaim it in accordance with the power of intention, for the benefit of beings."

Thereupon the Blessed One, this lord, the great Mighty One Vairocana, having thrice said "Excellent!" spoke thus to Vajrapāṇi:

"The very reality of non-conceptualization must be distinguished and explained. What is expressible in words and what is described as an object of focus are the conventional sign and the ultimate truth. Through conditions, through śrāvakas, through sūtras, and through practitioners of secret mantra, the awakening mind taught by the Tathāgata is unsurpassed. Likewise, this true joining is the unsurpassed secret of things. From the non-dual samaya-vajra and the lotus it is generated. What is expressible in words is common; the body of the buddha is that which has an object of focus. 'Secret mantra' is the conventional sign of suchness itself; suchness is the ultimate truth.

"The first, the one, dwelling in the center of the nine — that which is not bound by the ten — is to be known as the unbound; knowing that is the supreme abode. Vowels and consonants, the letters: the nine in number are followed by them. From the joining of 'A' binding them mutually with one another — whoever knows this is the crown of beings. Whoever knows it is completely liberated. One who desires to accomplish the excellent fruit desires to accomplish that very suchness. By being without form, form is abandoned."

The extremity of the elements is perfectly endowed.

The sixteen, beginning with the parts, are established.

The fifth, perfectly endowed with the five —
the four are applied to the three with certainty.

The syllable together with OM, made long,
combined with qualities and so forth, matches what follows.

Not a single short one fails to become speech.

It is neither one nor many.

By the meaning of YA, whatever it may be —
one who desires the accomplishment of activity:
through RA and the other three themselves,
one enters fully into the aim of beings.

Whichever syllable was explained before,
and all those that are directly approached — feminine, masculine, and neuter —
are to be examined thoroughly with respect to the elements and so forth.

From below upward, thus arranged:
apply them precisely with the wisdom-mind.
Six explained, four, three, and one — arising from the single essential nature of what has no substance.

When the meaning of YA and the rest is applied to that,
the knowledge of the three times too will arise.
As the skilled one conjures an illusion for the eyes,
let him bring beings to the end of illusion.

These mantras of expression,
arising from the essential nature of what has no substance —
that is form fully transformed,
that which points toward the divine.
Through a sign, suchness abides in three;
this is the characteristic of recitation according to intrinsic nature.
Without name, without expression —
this is the supreme awakening mind.

Those three, having become one,
have no going and no coming,
no cessation, perfectly at peace,
free from both eternalism and nihilism.
The uncontrived thought of the knower of the three times
is characterized as inseparable from space.
That very thing alone is the ultimate truth,
and it is the characteristic of self-knowing awareness.

This should be called the totality of sentient beings —
the very essence of buddha and awakening.
Even though a single bodhisattva arises,
it has the nature of dependent origination.
Whoever possesses this awakening mind as their very self,
that yogin becomes like the sun.
Though this is free from all conceptual thought,
it will enter into every family of beings,

like fire that burns, dries, brings ease,
and becomes the transformer of everything.

This is something to be venerated even by the gods,
and it abides distinctly within certain sentient beings.
The one who desires the awakening mind as their very self,
regarding all beings as an only child —
whoever abides equal to oneself in that way —
let great loving-kindness be aroused.
Seeing this without error and distortion,
the awakening mind arises authentically.
Through that, compassion grows immense,
and through that, saṃsāra is certainly overcome.

If all sentient beings — and likewise oneself —
do not perceive the awakening mind,
yet one who still acts for the benefit of beings —
from that, joy will arise.

Since saṃsāra has no real existence,
sentient beings too are like that.
Upon seeing the awakening mind,
one becomes possessed of great equanimity.

Then Vajrapāṇi, recalling the awakening mind he had heard,
asked great Vairocana again
about the characteristics and meaning of that very thing:
"If the retinue and the other — all of this — is the awakening mind,
how is it that, having each become distinct,
they abide in mutual contradiction?

There is nothing that, by itself, negates itself in a twofold way.
How does something that arises from a single jewel appear in an opposing direction?

The inferior and the middling — likewise the supreme — tormented by unbearable afflictions in saṃsāra, certain sentient beings are oppressed,
and this too comes to be applied to the awakening mind.
Those who conceive of such conceptuality and fabrication —
future people will be making that error —
but what arises from dependent origination,

they will not seek out."

"Since childish ones will dispute regarding phenomena that have no real existence,
so that those disputes may cease,
please be so good as to explain the intended meaning."

Then the lord, the Blessed One,
spoke to Vajrapāṇi the concealed intent:
that awakening mind most difficult to find —
this he declared authentically.

"That which is empty, the single extreme of the future,
is just the same as the ultimate extreme of the past.
Having made that mind manifest directly —

do whatever one pleases — yet the mind is not seen by that,
and so views have become separate and distinct.
Therefore those beings have come to bear
the names of the six classes of beings.

For that reason they rely wholly on Brahmā, Viṣṇu,
and the Great God (Śiva), performing all the conduct associated with the moon, the sun, and fire.
Through their views they pass in mere moments to what is taught as the Heaven of the Thirty-Three,
to the abodes of Tuṣṭita,
and likewise to the various hells.
They go as hungry ghosts,
and they go to the manifold destinies.

At the time when ignorance is wholly relied upon,
one does not know even oneself.
Those who are reckoned as sentient beings —
whether possessed of perception or without perception — abiding here, arise from the wind
and by that wind are again dissolved.
Day and night as well,

they fall into their own conceptual thoughts,
and then, trembling before saṃsāra,
those beings wander through the many destinies.

That non-conceptual mind,
though it has come to abide in the ocean of saṃsāra,
through becoming inverted
passes into being a dog, a jackal, an elephant —
the mind travels thus as well.

Likewise it comes to arise
as a father's lineage, a mother's lineage,
one who plaits grass, one with a mole,
a low lineage, every kind of thing to be eaten or not eaten:
the awakening mind arises in those forms.

Brahmins and so forth — what the world knows — arises from the awakening mind.
From the non-existence of things such as the aggregates,
one comes to know what is experienced by oneself:
that is what is called knowing the world.

Omniscience is the awakening mind.
Through the application of proximate meditation upon it,
this arises as the body of a buddha —
yet it is of a nature like an illusion
and becomes nothing more than an expression in words.

Then Vajrapāṇi, the Blessed One of many forms,
who had declared the meaning of the vajra-essence,
having paid homage to the sole teacher of beings,
entreated him once more:

"When you teach the awakening mind
according to the worldly scripture,
how will those of the future understand what has gone beyond the world?
Since you teach the Dharma
in order to thoroughly abandon all views,
how can that very awakening mind,
that view, become firmly established?

Those who are confused by the words of the intended meaning,
not having understood the meaning of what was declared, grasp it literally as the mere sound: 'It is nothing other than what was declared.'"

Then the Blessed One of many forms spoke to Vajrapāṇi:
"Excellent! Excellent! You ask without having understood the concealed intent of what you said.

The awakening mind has become wind
and dwells pervasively in space.
It is the life-force of all sentient beings, bearing the names of the ten in the identity of the five,
renowned as the twelve links of dependent origination,
having arisen in three aspects of essential nature.

The awakening mind called 'wind' —
this is the chief of all the faculties.
Since it is ever subtle and non-manifest,
it is always declared to be luminous.
The activities of beings — domains and so forth — are performed;
everything here depends upon it.
Pacification, enrichment,
magnetism, and likewise the wrathful activities —
all of these are accomplished by the awakening mind, resting in dependence upon the three abiding-states.

For as long as the world is designated,
and likewise the many things that are labeled,
they always arise from the wind
of the conceptualizing awakening mind-consciousness.
They are said to be like the seed
of all phenomena such as pleasure and pain.

This essential nature of the awakening mind is equal to space — non-dual with the aggregates and so forth.
Through the joining of wisdom and skillful means,
the awakening mind comes to travel.

Abandoning reading and meditative concentration,
one who recites it to oneself as master —

through the distinction of day and night,
through the joining of sun and moon,
pervading everywhere without the existence of things:
that single wind of the awakening mind,
having abandoned the fruits of virtue and non-virtue,
comes to be like space.

By knowing the benefit of beings as well,
its name is just suchness."

Short vowels are said to be day;
long ones are said to be night.
From the distinction of vowels and consonants,
suchness is to be joined to names.

"How wondrous! The activity of beings has arisen.
Suchness illumines suchness from what is other than itself.
From that, the conventional signs of the worldly will swiftly come to be directly known."

Then, upon hearing this awakening mind, the Lord of Secrets, from the great sovereign Vairocana (the Blessed One who is the foremost radiant lord), addressed the Pervader once more:

"This mind, which generates all sentient beings and appears in manifold forms —
though by that token it is devoid of things,
it is renowned throughout all the states of existence.

The awakening mind is equal to space;
it is that which well savors the experience,
the one who performs the benefit of beings.
May it be taught to the supreme person.

One who knows this as merely a means of accomplishment
and turns one's back on it in one's own stream —
in the future such a one will speak, calling oneself 'a teacher.'

One who says 'These very words of mine are the authentic ones,' and then destroys what has been done —

that person does not know the awakening mind of intention for what it truly means.

Likewise, worldly people who are without good fortune,
having abandoned all Dharma,
and who do not see awareness either —
for them too there will be no abiding place.

Therefore it is fitting to teach the awakening mind as nectar.
One who obtains the sun of connection
will come to arise in the future.

Then the Blessed One of manifold forms spoke again to the renowned Vajrapāṇi,
the holder of the vajra,
on the definitive meaning of the awakening mind:

It is not within, it is not without,
nor does it come to be named as both together.
It is neither permanent nor momentary —
it is self-aware, each one for oneself.

Non-conceptual, just like space,
the awakening mind, O Vajrapāṇi, arises for the benefit of beings and the Tathāgata
like a wish-fulfilling jewel.

The past, the future itself,
and what is called the present,
and the body of a buddha too, which comes to arise —
the ultimate is one; the conventional is all of these.

The Vedas, time, the signs of fire,
the forms of sun, moon, and wind:
from the three three-quarters arising,
the awakening mind itself is just that distinction.

That is the union of wisdom and skillful means,
and likewise holding bliss,
and the syllable Ha abiding at the teeth —
however many occasions there are in that way,

the name does not exist.

That becomes this awakening mind.

Having entered within the vajra,

the very essence of what is to be contemplated is just that.

What is called "the state of relaxed abiding"

is the wind with heavy and light syllabic beats.

The supreme one that causes oneself to reverse,

that is also the vital force and the mind.

Pride, and likewise intellect —

the awakening mind endowed with these arose perfectly from the four-part division,

imbued with the thorough pacification of existence and non-existence.

This mind, which is devoid of things,

is the domain of self-awareness alone.

The one who realizes the meaning of suchness itself

has explained it rightly with intention.

Then, having heard this supreme letter of the Dharma,

this secret intention,

the great bodhisattva Maitreya and the others

gave rise to wonder and amazement,

and exclaimed their heartfelt proclamation:

"How wondrous is the Buddha! How wondrous is the Dharma!

How wondrous is the one who teaches the Dharma!

The single meaning of the purity of all things —

that purity bestows the pure meaning itself.

Described as non-conceptual and equal to space,

we bow to the awakening mind!

Perfectly arisen from the Dharma of selflessness,

the one that perfects the accumulations of awakening,

without essential nature, without focal object —

we bow to the awakening mind!

Perfectly arisen from Samantabhadra alone,

the bestower of awakening through the intention's meaning,

the supreme conduct of awakening, the supreme vajra —

we bow to the awakening mind!

The pure mind of the Tathāgata,
the supreme accomplishment of the awakening of buddhas,
the three vajras of a single nature —
we bow to the awakening mind!

Those whose minds come to be patient
in faith in the prophetic intention,
from the vajra through the three samayas —

— this is indeed the action of suchness. The explanation of the perfectly arisen awakening mind from the secret of the three vajras of all the Tathāgatas — this is declared to be the second chapter.

Then that very one, the Secret Vajra, who encompasses the three — the three vajras, the three modes, the three supreme paths, the three liberations (vimuktis), and the Three Jewels — the sovereign of all Tathāgatas, the arranger of all Tathāgatas, the Vajra One of the radiant cloud, entered into meditative absorption and then spoke to Vajrapāṇi: "Hear this chapter of noble conduct regarding this supreme arrangement of the vajra.

This is where all Tathāgatas dwell in the subtle yoga. The first is Om, perfect and unified. The second is Śūnyatā. The third is Jñāna. The fourth is Vajra. The fifth is Svabhāvātmakaḥ. The sixth is said to be Ahaṃ. In this way, the six Sugatas are taught to the supreme beings.

Om and Śūnyatā form the first pair. Jñāna and Vajra are the second pair. Svabhāvātmako 'haṃ — these three realities are examined here. The three realities having become one bear the name of the unclear made clear. The maṇḍala of the Buddha of the sky's center, the great assembly of rays of light and clouds, pervaded by the light of the syllable Mother, entirely rounded on all sides, fully pervaded by the five sense pleasures, adorned by offerings of five kinds — in short, having meditated in this way, one should visualize the form in the center.

One should visualize the supreme mudrā of Vairocana, marked by the vajra of the three realities, or alternatively one should meditate on the mudrā of the lord of the three vajras. The great mudrā of Akṣobhya, combined with the non-dual accumulation, the vast expanse of the glory of the Jewels, the illuminating light of Amitāyus, and likewise the seal of Amoghasiddhi possessing form — meditate on these in the pure maṇḍalas of the buddhas.

The single vajra of the three vajras, Vajrapāṇi, whose color resembles indigo sapphire (indrānīla), blazing and bearing the vajra in hand, gazing with a terrifying wrathful expression, like the golden light of the Jambū River, utterly crowded with buddha-clouds — meditate on that great Vajrapāṇi with the nine-pronged vajra held in hand.

One like the light of crystal and the moon, adorned with a crown of hair-tufts, blazing and bearing a wheel in hand, adorned with various ornaments, like the light of an emerald (marakata), adorned with a blazing vajra, pervaded by a blazing and flaming assembly — meditate on that Jewel One.

Of great passion, bearing the vajra, of a color resembling a ruby (padmarāga), adorned with a crown of hair-tufts — meditate visualizing the lotus held in hand. Indisputably of the various vajras, like the great light of the five colors — meditate on the peaceful one in the buddha-maṇḍala bearing a sword in hand.

When the Lord of Secrets heard this explanation of the yoga thus given, he then asked the Sovereign Tathāgata also about the parts of the subtle yoga: "If the Tathāgata gives instruction on the connections of the aggregates, the elements, and so forth, how will those — the maṇḍala of the Buddha of the sky's center and the rest — come to be? How are those who meditate to contemplate the thing-that-is-no-thing called the maṇḍala of the buddhas, when those who meditate upon a maṇḍala externally — whatever is to come in the future — should indeed also hold the highest doubt about this? O Protector, which maṇḍala does this subtle yoga declare?"

Vajrapāṇi, bearing his renowned name, has himself given rise to that very subtle yoga. Through the non-dual union of beings, it is spoken in the subtle intention. This fivefold manifest awakening, become the cause for beings of future times, whatever Dharma has come to be truly gathered — it is taught just as it is, precisely as it is. The aggregates themselves have become buddhas, arisen from the conditions of awakening's aim — this too is what the Tathāgata has declared.

It is through the non-dual union of suchness. This one who teaches and this one who establishes — this is the teacher who reveals the accomplishment of mind. The yoga that is without beginning or end is to be examined as precisely what is called "subtle." The joining of what is unclear with clarity is perfectly accomplished. It arises from the essential nature of what is without inherent existence. It is perfectly established from the very beginning, free from both unity and multiplicity; it is known as the Dharma of dependent origination, whereby all things have arisen as one. Having made oneself thus, draw the maṇḍala of Dharma accurately. Red, black, and likewise yellow, and pure white — these in brief — the four combined into one: draw these correctly, including white cloth and so forth. In the center of these, together with the goddess, are those possessing both the supreme and the non-supreme form of peaceful union. Above, directly across, at the same level, and below — according to their respective arrangement with white cloth and so forth, fire and wind, the Great Lord (Śiva), and water: for each separate maṇḍala, it is correctly taught in eighteen portions. This too is taught to those who are pure. Just as there is a special quality in milk — it abides in the state of butter — so too in white cloth and so forth, pacification itself abides there. The perception of inner phenomena such as form and so forth is insight (vipaśyanā). The conceptualities of Akṣobhya and the rest, according to their number, are calm abiding (śamatha). These two have the selfhood of that which is without inherent existence; suchness itself is called "peace." Into the maṇḍala of suchness, one should draw in all buddhas. The yogin's inhalation and exhalation — that very union is singular. Abiding in wisdom and skillful means, recite the branches of mantra without interruption. In all activities whatsoever, the yogin who knows should recite always — even while sleeping and so forth — that which is beyond the expression of many names and has passed beyond the three times. The recitation prescribed for white cloth and so forth is two hundred and twenty-five. Through the fourth one, well-kindled, combined by the fourfold union, nine hundred: what has been taught as nine hundred arises from the sequence of twenty-four, step by step — and that is twenty-one thousand six hundred. Here, through the secret intention, the subtle yoga has been taught. Although there may be neither reading nor meditation, it is taught to be recitation nonetheless.

Having heard in this way the speech of many kinds that benefits beings, Vajrapāṇi again addressed a question to the Lord of all Tathāgatas: "Whatever, when cultivated, causes all beings of future times to become without conceptual thought — O Blessed One, please explain the supreme essence of the three vajras."

The non-dual union of those very three as suchness — meditate upon that as the subtle vajra. We too shall become yogins who have abandoned the three of swiftness and so forth. If one understands this through self-knowledge and trust, yet suchness — pacification itself — will remain unknown, and the subtle yoga being abandoned as primary, all manner of wrong yogas will be continually relied upon. Speaking of the union of the teacher and uttering that very thing called "subtle" — in future times, that will come to be abandoned. That very suchness settles this with certainty.

Then, having heard the prophecy spoken by Vajrapāṇi, the Lord of all Tathāgatas, from within that meditative absorption (samādhi) called "the essential nature of the dharmadhātu," entered into a state of equanimity. Having gloriously entered into equanimity, he declared this secret mantra: body, speech, and mind are taught as vajra — conferring blessing in a special way. Through the non-dual union of the three vajras, it is to be correctly explained.

OM is to be understood as the first. DHARMA is taught as the second. DHĀTU is taught as the third. SVABHĀVA is known as the fourth. ĀTMAKAḤ is the fifth. AHAM is held to be the sixth. Having recited this mantra, thereafter one who possesses the nature of meditation should meditate: of the five precious colors, a measure equal in size to a mustard seed, upon the delightful summit of Mount Meru —

the yogin should meditate upon it constantly. Having let the jewel become unmoved, one then radiates it forth. If it has not become unmoved, one should not radiate it. Like the blazing light of the buddhas — the supreme and excellent clouds — one radiates forth. Wheel, vajra, great clouds, lotus, sword, supreme weapon: the great clouds of bodhisattvas are to be radiated by one who possesses the nature of such radiance.

The subtle one, abiding at the center of the maṇḍala — the vajra maṇḍala is to be meditated upon. The practice of recitation and meditation is likewise to be meditated upon in the pure lotus maṇḍala. In the jewel-like maṇḍala, through diligent application to the actual object, one meditates on the jewel. What arises from the practice of the maṇḍala is to be drawn in the center of space. These are the subtle accomplishment of the three vajras of the supremely excellent buddhas. What arises from the vajra maṇḍala is the attainment of the mode of omniscience.

Concerning this most excellent scriptural declaration called "the secret intention" — whoever comes to have patient conviction in this mind acts accordingly in the same way. This is the very essence of the secret of all Tathāgatas — the subtle vajra. This is the supreme arrangement of the vajra. This is the third chapter.

Then all the Blessed Ones, having become non-dual, once again make supplication to those lords of the three vajras with praise: "May all the Tathāgatas, who have become supreme in the abodes of peace — all phenomena being selfless — please expound this supreme maṇḍala. Perfectly complete, authentically adorned, endowed with all the major marks — please, Samantabhadra, supreme of bodies, expound this sacred maṇḍala. Arising from the object of wisdom's activity, a purifier of the Dharma of peace — please, Samantabhadra, supreme of speech, expound this most excellent maṇḍala. By intrinsic nature utterly stainless and pure, mind itself is Samantabhadra — the supreme great singular unity for all sentient beings; please expound the heart of this maṇḍala."

Then the Teacher, the Blessed One — one element, one who is the third element — the supreme vajra of the three worlds, the Teacher of the three worlds, the joyous abode of the Tathāgata: to all the Tathāgatas, his mind is like a maṇḍala — he declared the sacred maṇḍala.

Then the supreme maṇḍala of mind, supremely like the vajra wisdom, in terms of body, speech, and mind — the maṇḍala — is to be fully expounded. This is the supreme secret essence, well-wrapped, teaching suchness itself. The characteristic of the many transmissions is there explained as a fine, valid account. Conventional and ultimate — being non-dual, this is beautiful. This wisdom is the central dot; skillful means follows in its wake. Through a single dot of wisdom and skillful means, the Dharma and perfect enjoyment supreme — the maṇḍala of mind — the central dot is placed. The twelve limbs of dependent origination are the four faces. The Four Noble Truths of the noble ones are the four sides. The four divine abodes (brahmavihāras) are the four corners. The four means of attraction are the renowned gates — each one bearing four names. The symbolic indication of the reality of phenomena is the inner wheel of the maṇḍala.

The undivided wisdom's characteristic — the vajra, vast as indigo sapphire, distinguished by the five aspects — the summit that destroys cyclic existence. From the east, the essence of the mirror — adorned with the blazing light of the wheel. In the south, the wisdom of equality — bearing the single name, the jewel. In the west, the individually discerning lotus — like the light of a lotus ruby. In the north, what was the mind of the one above — the destroyer of the conceptual fabrications of beings — becomes the sword that accomplishes activity, of a color like blazing, radiating light. In the southeast, loving-kindness is also the eye, with light equal to a blue cloud. In the southwest is what is called compassion — Māmakī, the vajra family. In the northwest is what is called the lotus —

Joy, dwelling beautifully — in the northeast, appearing like a blue lotus, equanimity is present, resembling blue. Likewise at the eastern gate, generosity is a club (or mace) endowed with luster and light. Likewise what is known as "beautiful speech" — a staff of fine radiance, a blazing vajra. In the west is what is called "accomplishing benefit" — the lotus of Hayagrīva. The vajra concordant with that aim — a vajra-holder twined with vajras. That is the defining characteristic of the mudrā bestowed. This is the well-stated teaching.

Just as worship is offered through form, it is transformed by cultivation in three aspects. First, the great one that exists — this is explained to be the maṇḍala of the mudrā seal. Being made equal to space in this way, having understood it, one becomes beneficial to beings. It arises together with the three vajras. At that time, by the division of time into moments and so forth — the garland of moonbeams — the name of the sixteenth year arises unborn, and the peaceful is definitively declared to be "woman." The recollection that follows the peaceful qualities — beautiful radiance and light — is taught to be just so. The habitual tendencies of dependent origination are fragrance; the fully opened flower is primordial wisdom (jñāna). Non-thing is the family, and omniscient wisdom is the very center. The woman of the dharmadhātu itself is to be pleased through wisdom such as this. She is not within, not without, not in both together, not from elsewhere. She has become the yoga of abiding without abode. Therefore she is explained as Māmakī. The singular essential nature of her is explained through consecration and blessing. She is alike to space; she becomes the abode of the peaceful buddha. Therefore what is conceptually distinguished as the domain — the gatheringness — is excretion. The emptiness that is the sense-faculty of wisdom is the pure essential juice of the nature of reality (dharmatā). The blood that is the wisdom of omniscience — that which is comprehensively examined as the nature of phenomena — those very ones are called the divine ones. Non-thing is the offering of poverty. By doing this, the sons and daughters of the buddhas will be pleased in a special way. Whatever is examined by worldly people — those are spoken of exactly as stated. Cultivating the three vajras as inseparable, spread out well on the ground with great precision, with extremely measured beauty — the skilled one draws the lines with a cord. The wise one who examines the maṇḍala: twelve cubits is the measure. It has four sides and four corners. It is to be beautified with stairways. In its center is the wheel — explained first through intention. By way of the reversal of that, those who are worldly conceive here within it. Whoever dwells in the transcendence of the world — that one is empowered through the dhāraṇī. Those who hold to non-thing — the mind is always alike to space. The noble one has utterly transcended the world. Abandoning saṃsāra and the other extreme, neither grasping nor releasing, neither absent nor abiding — the wise one who knows this throughout, supreme among all yogins in awareness: this chapter, the chapter of the mind maṇḍala, is declared to be the yoga of certainty. The intention, the prophecy, is pleasing, and for those whose mind has accepted it, wisdom and method remain just as they are, and they practice accordingly. From the secret intention and prophecy, this is the very fourth chapter of the mind maṇḍala.

Then the supreme Tathāgata, the lord of vajra speech, the sovereign of beings — once again, to Vajradhara he declared the suchness of the aim of mantra conduct. The singular practice of the conduct of mantra discipline — the particular training of guarding and protection. The speech of the intention of those ones: he was beseeched to declare the conduct, O Blessed One. Then the sovereign, the Tathāgata, having heard the words of those vajra-holders, declared words with meaning, the sole benefit of beings: "Arising rightly from the non-conceptual aim, the defining characteristic is entry into aversion."

Delusion abides in what is without substance.

Attachment arises from attachment itself —

one who possesses attachment bears that name.

The supreme vehicle is the unsurpassed.

Attachment, aversion, and delusion —

these are rightly taught according to their class.

That accomplishment (siddhi) is achieved through this.

The ignoble class is to be swiftly recognized.

Those who engage in deception are the leisured ones.

Both kinds commit the acts without interval (the five acts of immediate consequence).

One who harbors the intention to kill

will accomplish this, the supreme vehicle,

the unsurpassed Great Vehicle.

A sentient being who has committed great evil

and another who commits acts without interval —

whoever, moreover, reviles the teacher,

even if they strive, will not attain accomplishment.

By trusting in this very thing with faith, swiftly,
by abiding in aversion, one abides.

Whoever, through a mind arisen from calm abiding,
renders the aggregates and other things as substanceless —
that one commits the act of taking life
and abides in the supreme vehicle.

One who teaches dependent origination
as both inner and outer, as twofold —
that one who delights in speaking falsehood
is a yogin who abides where there is no abiding.

Whatever is the gnosis of a fully awakened buddha,
that is to be known as a material substance.
The manner of seizing it is considered attachment to another's wealth.

Whoever holds that reality is a single substance,
and continuously applies themselves to suchness —
that sentient being who delights in such desiring becomes supreme in the practice of accomplishment.

Its emptiness is delusion;
its object is known as excrement;
that which is called urine of the sense faculties —
these are the food that consumes peace.

In this supreme doctrine of the Great Vehicle,
these become the vessel for accomplishment.
Those who, in their lives, desire falsehood
and who use excrement and urine as food —

the wisdom of the Perfection of Wisdom,
the dharmakāya, not being a single entity,
the practice of non-dual suchness —
this is called substanceless; practicing the conduct of desire,
whatever is equal to the perfect enjoyment body (saṃbhogakāya),
that itself is considered the sister.

One possessed of the yoga of one's own deity

is to be pleased with the body through the secret mantras.

That girl who uses excrement and urine as food, possessed of the form of the emanation body (nirmāṇakāya) —
she is to be meditated upon by the practitioner.

Mother, sister, and daughter —
having been pleased by the yogin in this manner,
through the nature of reality of the supreme vehicle,
that vast accomplishment is attained.

Just as the non-conceptual sky abides pervading all —
this is explained as meditation,
called the samādhi that pervades thought.

That very thing arises in the world
bearing the name of conceptuality's delight.
Through the gnosis of the mother of the buddhas,
one is not soiled by the conduct of desire.
Through a single application of non-conceptual practice,
buddhahood will swiftly be attained.

Then the great bodhisattvas — among them the one called Dispeller of All Obscurations — having heard the words of the Blessed One, were filled with wonder and amazement.

"O master, Blessed One, lord of all Tathāgatas —
for what reason do you speak these harsh words
within the assembly of the Tathāgata?
Displaying the accomplishment of the class for those free from attachment and those with attachment,
those free from delusion and those with delusion,
those free from aversion and those with aversion —
and those others who have entirely renounced evil misdeeds and harm and the like — does the Sage teach that the sentient beings who act in this way here are fit vessels?"

Then the protector, the compassionate one,
delighting in the welfare of all sentient beings,
spoke to all the Tathāgatas and the bodhisattvas:

"This, equal to the earth element,
is the sole sustainer of all sentient beings.
The water element, free from conceptuality,
will come to manifest in its variety.
The master, possessed of the form of fire,
is closely engaged in consuming all.
Likewise, the supreme self of inner and outer alike
is the single fragrance that permeates beings.
The Blessed One, variegated, equal to space,
illuminates all and is profound.
If one meditates that that very suchness is one's own self,
one becomes supreme among the two-footed.

This — called the essential nature, the pure nature of reality of the buddhas —
is also this: the supreme awakened conduct of those who practice the aim of mantra conduct."

Then, what is called "the inexhaustible" — becoming inexhaustibility itself — those bodhisattvas (Skt. bodhisattva), great beings, equal in number to the dust-motes of buddha-fields, who dispel all obscurations and so forth, were all overcome by terror and fear from every direction, and the entire assembly of the maṇḍala fainted as one.

Then the Secret Empowerment, the Vajra Speech, the non-dual — having been seen by all the Tathāgatas as the bodhisattva who had fainted — was addressed to the chief with these words: "O Protector, dispeller of all obscurations and so forth, great bodhisattva and great being, please rouse these ones just as the intrinsic nature of reality truly is."

"The immovable is the secret — the supreme bliss of peace alone, that which brings complete awakening. This was spoken with a particular intention.
Without substance and without disturbance, the single delightful vajra-word becomes many distinctions through the differences in the intentions of beings.
Through the joining of infinite space, form and so forth are infinite. These too become the supreme Tathāgata and the bodhisattva themselves. Through emission and withdrawal from that, and through supreme joining from peace itself, one who possesses a wisdom-body and possesses wisdom — to know that as 'having fainted' — through whatever distinctions of limbs are renowned as 'beings,' from each one's own union with the deity, the supreme maṇḍala will arise. The maṇḍala is one's own body — that very condensation is like this.

This is what caused the bodhisattva to faint at the thought of the body of the transitory collection (Skt. satkāyadṛṣṭi). Because of not understanding this truth, the melodious invitation addressed to the Victor is what is called the great bodhisattva's fainting."

Then the Vajra of Speech, the Three — those words spoken with intention — having been heard by the Vajra-holder (Skt. vajradhara), the meditative absorption was made manifest. The one called "the equal vajra, non-dual, gazing upon beings" — this very same destroyer of three spheres — entered into meditative absorption. Through the Protector's entering into evenness, all became vast radiance. The bodhisattvas, upon definitive contact, remained in their own seats.

Then all the Tathāgatas, with eyes of wonder and amazement, arising with delight and satisfaction, proclaimed this melody of Dharma:

How wondrous — the Dharma! How wondrous — the Dharma!
How wondrous — the arising of the meaning of the Dharma!
The pure Dharma of no-self, truly pure — homage to the King of Dharma!

The single, pure meaning of Vajra Speech —
it is equal to the stainless sky.
Arisen truly from the unchanging meaning — homage to the Vajra Body!

The single supreme Sage, the Tathāgata, arisen as the path of the three times, pure —
the single vajra-sphere, perfect enjoyment —
the single path of space — homage!

Body, speech, and mind are space —
the supreme conduct, possessed of the single Dharma.
That very same suchness of three, manifesting in variety — homage to the abode of conduct!

Abiding in the intentional transmission of prophecy,
whoever teaches this supreme conduct,
those who truly guard the secret —
they may do whatever pleases them.

The supreme vajra of the three pledges (Skt. samaya) of all the Tathāgatas,
the supreme among all mantras —

this is the fifth chapter on conduct.

Then the glorious great Akṣobhya (Skt. akṣobhya, "the Immovable"), possessor of the secrets of body, speech, and mind, having entered into meditative absorption called "the blessing of mind," proclaimed this secret mantra:

OM is the first.

SARVA TATHĀ is the second.

CITTA is to be fully examined as the third.

VAJRA is the fourth, and is supreme.

SVABHĀVĀTMAKAḤ is the fifth.

AḤ HŪṂ is named as the time-element,
and is named as the third of the six bodies.

Then the glorious Vairocana (Skt. vairocana), having entered into meditative absorption called "the atomic vajra,"

"The body's blessing," declared as speech.

OM is proclaimed as the first, pure and complete.

SARVA TATHĀ is the second.

KĀYA — attachment, hindrance, and lordship —

VAJRA is proclaimed to be the illuminating awareness.

SVABHĀVĀTMAKAḤ is the god of desire.

AḤ HŪṂ is called "the desiccating one,"
and is to be examined rightly through intent,
and distinguished by the division of wisdom.

Then Amitāyus — the one who is in all things non-dual and endowed with vajra — entering into meditative absorption, proclaimed the blessing of speech:

OM is proclaimed as the first.

SARVA TATHĀ is the second.

VĀK is the third.

VAJRA becomes the name of time.

SVABHĀVĀTMAKAḤ is the fifth.

AḤ HŪṂ is named as the sixth.

These three groups have been explained,
each set explained as six and three — mind, body, and likewise speech — proclaimed in order and not in order.

From the one sole sovereign action

there arise what are called the three vajras.
This quality, this Dharma, is vajra speech —
it is the supreme sacred commitment of those very three.
Therefore this is the supreme object of meditation;
it is to be completed without distraction.

The wise one who has heard this teaching,
from whom the supreme three vajras have arisen,
becomes endowed with the nature of meditation
and should mark the defining characteristics of mantra.

Then the glorious Jewel of Excellence, entering into the meditative absorption called "Vajra Lamp," proclaimed this secret mantra:

OM possesses the first of the pair.

SARVA TATHĀ is the pair.

Suchness is the accumulation of wisdom —
all of it is named "the Mirror."

ANURĀGA — the unborn —

that is proclaimed to be the third.

Difficult to shatter by conditions or by hearers,

VAJRA then becomes the fourth.

Gnosis endowed with the nature of non-substantiality —
that is called SVABHĀVĀTMAKAḤ.

The very name of the five wisdoms,

it is the essential nature of the dharmadhātu.

AḤ HŪṂ — individually complete enjoyment (saṃbhogakāya),

possessed of the nature of non-substantiality,

having become the name of great bliss,

it bears the name of the sixth, the indicator.

Endowed with the nature of abiding in non-substantiality,

it is the supreme to be delighted in following upon that.

Through just such devotion, may the Tathāgatas,
all the protectors, be pleased.

Then the glorious great Amoghavajra — certain and unfailing — entering into the meditative absorption called "Amoghavajra," proclaimed this secret mantra:

OM possesses the first.

SARVA TATHĀ is the second.

PŪJĀ is the name of liberation.

VAJRASATTVA is to be fully cultivated.

SVABHĀVĀTMAKAḤ is stated.

AḤ HŪṂ is called "the perfection."

The five, the six, and the three are explained.

Form, sound, smell, and taste,

the tangible, and the dharmadhātu —

these, rendered into non-substantiality,

are the supreme offering to the buddhas.

Arising rightly from the consciousness of the eye and other senses,

adorned by the five higher knowledges,

through these, the five offerings that have been explained,

one will swiftly attain buddhahood.

Then the glorious Vajradhara, who individually reveals awakening,

who holds the secrets of the three vajras as awareness,

the great sage, spoke again:

When the mind becomes pleased,

focused upon body, speech, and mind,

through engagement with those very three,

the supreme and highest attainment will be obtained.

Focusing the mind on selflessness,

cultivate body and speech fully as well.

Meditate upon the state that is equal to space,

and bring the threefold engagement to completion.

When the very three vajras are focused upon,

there is not even the most subtle thing.

Through engagement with the intrinsic nature of mantra,

there is no meditation and there is no awakening.

Taking the three vajras as a single defining characteristic,

in brief, having examined them thoroughly,

one should meditate in the meditative absorption of mantra engagement upon a ground that has no fixed ground.

Then the Sovereign Tathāgata, honored by all the Tathāgatas —

the omniscient one, the buddha, supreme among all — proclaimed this supreme meditation:

Dwelling in the midst of the expanse of space,
one should meditate upon a lunar disk.

Having visualized the form of the buddha,
one should undertake the subtle yoga.

The size of a white mustard seed,
bearing the nature of the tip of the nose —
endowed with both movement and stillness —
the wise one should contemplate it dwelling there.

The intelligent one, having examined with primordial wisdom,
meditates upon the abiding of secret gnosis.

This is called the supreme secret,
and suchness itself, the three — these are the supreme commitment.

Dwelling in the midst of the expanse of space,
one should meditate upon a maṇḍala called the sun.
Having visualized the body of the buddha,
one places the ground upon it.

The Great Lord (Śiva), the one who desiccates — that which half of the ground and space designate,
what is called "nectar" —
that shall be known as HŪṂ.

Dwelling in the midst of the expanse of space,
one should meditate upon the lovely maṇḍala of the wheel.
Joining it perfectly into the form of the eye,
this is the meditation on vajra and lotus together.

Dwelling in the midst of the expanse of space,
one should meditate upon the jewel maṇḍala.
With diligent application of the preliminary practice,
one meditates upon it thoroughly on that ground.

Dwelling in the midst of the expanse of space,
one should meditate upon this very maṇḍala of light.
One establishes the peaceful abode of the buddha,
surrounded on all sides by retinues.

Resembling the color of a blue utpala lotus,
five-pointed, blazing with great radiance —
the size of a barleycorn, cultivated with diligence — one should visualize it at the summit of Mount Meru.

The size of a chickpea,
eight-petaled with filaments —
the tip of the nose, the peak of Mount Meru:
let those who desire awakening meditate upon this.

The meditation on the wheel and the rest
should be examined in terms of their specific distinctions.
The abode of all the lovely and actual accomplishments —
this is the supreme and unsurpassed ground of awakening,
where the buddhas truly abide in awakening.
In short, one should apply oneself to this with enthusiasm.

When the Dharma is well characterized,
one should meditate upon the single vajra.

Then the Sovereign Tathāgata, supreme among all pure dharmas,
the Teacher who reveals all for the sake of every being,
spoke the supreme instruction with his voice:

A single instant, a single moment, a brief flash,
a half month, a month, a year's duration —
and the three incalculable aeons:
all are stated to be equal in a single instant.
Six months — it is said that this itself is reality,
the complete enjoyment of that which is without substance.
Praised as a single instant,
know that it is beyond the three times.

Possessed of form, sound, and taste,
the yogin meditates for six months.
Having performed that great offering,
one then meditates upon the suchness of the secret.

The object, the sense faculty, and the bodhisattva —
the one who makes excrement, urine, and food:
when this is done, the accomplishment of such a kind
is food free from conceptual elaboration.

This suchness is unsurpassed,
arising from a single bodhicitta.
Free from thought, the conditioned is unmade,
and the aim of non-thought will be accomplished.

Ma is explained as Māmakī,
and sa is the manifest awakening of the ground.
That dhyāna, practiced with delight,
is what is explained as sha.

The yoga of infinite space
is declared to be the great sha.
The supreme rank of Vajrapāṇi
and the three vajras are swiftly accomplished.

The great commitment: the flesh of elephant, horse,
likewise dog, and so forth — distinguished by category according to the aggregates and so on,
this is set forth in equal measure as declared.

Whoever takes the non-dual food of yoga,
the single morsel of the delight of dhyāna —
in the world, distant, the worldly one becomes the very nature of what is to be eaten.

The virtuous spiritual friend — the permanent one —
and likewise those born from warmth and moisture,
those transcending the world and those within it:
all of these are universally explained as food.

Then, having heard from the Blessed One
the intention of the three vajras,
the Lord of all Tathāgatas — Vajrapāṇi — offered these words:

"The commitments of the śrāvakas as well —
you teach the subtle yoga,
and you, O Protector, have spoken
of both the worldly and the transcendent."

Just as water and milk become one,
you reveal the Dharma to all beings.
From the world, as the swan draws out

the milk precisely, so the true takes it.

Just as a person parched by thirst
drinks the two blended together,
so those who utterly transcend the world drink the nectar of Dharma.

Through the intention encoded in the suchness of mantra, that which has been proclaimed as three —
how it applies to the worldly and the rest,
step by step — O Protector, please explain this clearly.

Then the supreme Tathāgata spoke to the renowned Vajrapāṇi:

"Son, you have done well, exceedingly well.
I shall explain the three distinctions to you.

Those known as the conditions, as śrāvakas,
and likewise those who follow the sūtras —
these are the worldly ones,
abiding in the activity of preparatory engagement.

When one has accomplished yoga and yet abides in the world,
one has come to transcend the world.
And yet the meditative absorption of that yoga
is not to be equated with the foregoing.

That which utterly transcends the world —
non-conceptual and fearless —
is the single reality of suchness itself,
the other having abandoned saṃsāra.

Through this excellent yoga of noble conduct,
the buddhas are delighted,
and those of intelligence who possess the awakening mind
swiftly attain awakening.

One attains lordship in the desire realm
and the rank of a great yogin.
Possessing resplendent power and wealth,
of fine complexion and pleasing to behold,
by being seen or urged by words,
one brings these worldly beings under one's sway.

This secret is supreme —
it is the excellent awakening of the buddhas.
This very secret of mantra,
the supreme that transcends the three vajras,
is the intention, the joyous prophecy.
Whoever abides as a genuine keeper of the secret —
they may act as they wish.

All the Tathāgatas are excellent.
The supreme commitment arises from the commitment itself.
This is declared to be the sixth chapter:
that which is blessed by the three vajras.

Then, the secret empowerment of the three vajras,
the single great commitment,
the supreme practice of meditative absorption and secret mantra —
this complete and perfect awakening is proclaimed.

That very thing — what are the four commitments?
All desires, as they are called, are thus explained.
Those who possess such enjoyments
should make use of whatever they wish.

By joining oneself to one's own deity,
one makes offering to oneself and to others.
That becomes an offering to the world,
and to what transcends the world: peace itself.
Such swift austerity this is,
and it is held to be the supreme vow.

Both are inexhaustible —
and all the enjoyments of desire together with form and the rest are held to be deities.
By yogic engagement in cultivating these,
practitioners swiftly accomplish their aims.

Differing syllables are mendicancy;
reciting them is eating.
Whoever delights in repetition —
they are held to eat the mendicant's portion.

No austerities are to be performed,
nor is unbearable restraint required.
Enjoy the three desires as they truly are,
and recite the suchness of mantra without deterioration.

Dwelling easily in the distinction of the three vajras,
the mantra-knower will attain awakening.
Otherwise — untimely death,
and after death, one goes to the hells.

As for the buddhas and bodhisattvas
and the foremost practitioners of secret mantra —
those who have found the immutable Dharma —
the supreme among two-footed beings, the perfect buddha, possessing omniscient wisdom and desire,
relies on the five qualities of desire.

One should delight the bodhisattvas
and become attached to the perfection of awakening.

Thus, knowing form in its three aspects,
the learned one should make offering.
That very foremost Blessed One,
the great and diverse Vairocana —
knowing the three aspects of sound,
one should make offering to the deities.

This is the Blessed One of diversity."

The lord who is the source of precious buddhas —
knowing scent in its three aspects,
one should make offering to the deities.
That very Blessed One of diversity,
the lord who grasps the Dharma of attachment —
knowing taste in its three aspects,
one should make offering to the deities.

That very one, renowned as the Vajra of Meaningful Accomplishment, the foremost of diversity, the Blessed One — knowing touch in its three aspects,
one should make offering to one's own family.

That very Blessed One is the Vajra-possessing one,
Akṣobhya, who has the form of a mirror.

Not apprehended subsequently as inner,
as outer in the same way,
or as both together —
these are the three aspects of form and the rest;
one should make offering to the deities.

To form, sound, taste, and so forth,
one should always direct the mind.
This, which has become the condensed secret,
is the essence that generates all buddhas.
The learned one should always meditate on form, sound, and the rest
as the deities themselves,
and likewise meditate upon them as one's family.
By meditating, one should meditate upon that in that way.

The engagement of sky-vajra
is taught as the recollection of the buddhas.
Through that engagement of recollecting the buddhas,
one meditates on the recollection of the Dharma.
The yogin who meditates on the three vajras
meditates on the recollection of the vajra.
As explained by the division of the families,
the dharmakāya, saṃbhogakāya, and nirmāṇakāya have arisen.
The engagement of the recollection of the families
is likewise the recollection of the wrathful ones.
Those very three, transformed into one,
are the nature of reality free of the three vajras.
The engagement of the recollection of the deities — meditating on that, one will attain awakening.

The four groups, each set of four,
however many in due order, with delight and so forth —
those very numbers are the years, examined in full as sixteen.

The woman relied upon by all buddhas,
sixteen years of age,
beautiful and slender in form, with fine offerings —
one should compose what is called Solitude.
Consecrated and pleasing,

by means of what is called the Three Distinctions,
the great queen Tathāgatā —
one should meditate upon her as the eyes and the rest.
Truly engage what is to be accomplished.
With the union of the two faculties,
if one first meditates on this engagement,
one will attain the accomplishment of buddhahood.

The syllable Hūṃ and likewise Om̐,
and Phaṭ as well — one should meditate on these there.
Those very three, with three modes, being their very essence,
radiate appropriately in various forms.
This supreme vajra-lotus, pervaded by light-rays of five kinds —
at the secret place, the heart, and the tip of the nose,
the yogin should meditate on this.
Blazing and bright white like moonlight,
one should always meditate on that wisdom.
Because the mind has been made joyful by this,
therefore within that it is delightful.
Knowing, by skillful engagement, abiding in what is without abode, understand the union of the four equalities into one.
The engagement of the recollection of the buddhas and so forth —
one who desires awakening should meditate upon it.

The joy of experience, taught by all buddhas:
the peaceful one called bhaga alone —
from one's own suchness, nonduality has arisen.
Engage that vajra as one's very own nature.
The engagement of the recollection of the buddhas:
it is proclaimed to be the bhaga-liṅga.
The engagement of the union of penetration into nonduality —
one meditates upon this as the body of the buddhas.
From that, the one of clear understanding radiates forth
and abides at the tips of the hair-pores.
By means of the incomparable and distinctive,
clouds of buddhas radiate there.

The engagement of the recollection of the Dharma as well —
by perfectly engaging the Dharma-vajra,

one perfectly unites the vajra-lotus.
This is the examination of the liṅga of the bhaga.
Then from the hair-pores,
with effort one radiates clouds of Dharma.
That which fulfills every aspiration for suchness —
this is the lord of the Dharma.

Meditate on the recollection of the vajra,
engaging in the single one that is without substance.
The vajra perfectly united with emptiness is explained as the bhaga-liṅga.
Then from the hair-pores,
all clouds of vajras radiate everywhere.
Meditating on the vajra and bodhicitta —
one will swiftly attain accomplishment.

Through the engagement of the recollection of the families,
the learned one, from the vajra of emptiness —

Just so, when the yogin engages in recollection of the wrathful ones,
the accomplishment of the families will be attained.
In the engagement of the recollection of the wrathful ones as well,
from the hair-pores of the wrathful one united with both emptiness and vajra, clouds of wrathful ones are to be radiated.

Then, regarding the engagement of the recollection of the glorious Vajradhara, the all-pervading lord, the great Vairocana — this intention was again put to the great Sage:

"O Sage, you have declared the engagement of the bhaga-liṅga. From this engagement that transcends the world, buddhas and so forth radiate. Those who, in the future, are to be born among the utterly confused of a later age will say: 'Why did the lords of the Sugatas teach this?' Beings, not knowing dependent origination — which bears the mark of space — and being of thoroughly deluded understanding, take it to be literally so. O Protector, you are the great bliss, the sole Teacher of all buddhas, without body yet possessing self-nature in the three realms of existence, bearing the mark of both intentions. Therefore you are the self-nature of the three qualities and the three suchnesses of all phenomena, the three intentions, actions, and stainless ones — the nectar of buddhas arises from you. Here you are the bhaga pervasive and penetrating, and you yourself bear the name of the fierce liṅga. You are to be examined as the seed in Brahmā. You are dependent origination, from which beings arise. You are the great yoga transcending the three times, yourself become reckoning and time. Knower and known are perfectly liberated. Therefore you are the sovereign of beings."

Then Vajradhara, having heard those and subsequent words, the Blessed One taught the cultivation of the recollection of the sacred commitment. From one's own vajra united with the lotus, through the perfect union of the two faculties, one meditates on the buddha Vajrasattva born from the drop of one's own seminal essence.

Recollecting the maṇḍala, seeing oneself as it, through the very union of the two faculties, one draws forth one's own Brahmā continually, and the yogin thereby makes the maṇḍala.

As for the engagement of the recollection of the body: the five aggregates of the buddhas, examining the suchness of the buddha and so forth — know that oneself likewise resembles that.

As for the engagement of the recollection of the speech — the five: the vajra, the Dharma, the speech of excellence — whatever their speech may be like, hold to the Dharma knowing oneself likewise to resemble that.

As for the engagement of the recollection of the mind: whatever is the mind of Vajradhara and whatever is the mind of Samantabhadra — oneself likewise becomes to resemble that.

As for the engagement of the recollection of sentient beings: Vajra itself recollects sentient beings; just as conduct is equal to space — oneself likewise becomes to resemble that.

The engagement of recollection called "mantra, body, vajra, three" — cultivating that, whatever the body of the vajra-mantra may be, meditating distinctly on the speech and the body, those three suchnesses are unified as one. Whatever the supreme mantra-holder who is perpetually beyond the three may be like — oneself likewise becomes to resemble that.

Through these recollections of the sacred commitments, Brahmā is thereby drawn forth exceedingly. Through engaging in the unsubstantial as one, the learned one proclaims it in accordance with the rite. As for the supreme greatness of the Tathāgata, it is explained as "without substance." If one endowed with intelligence recites this, one will attain the supreme accomplishment of the mantra.

The engagement of wisdom with the sacred commitment is explained as "recollection." What is renowned as "perfection" (pāramitā) is free from both existence and non-existence. All intrinsic natures are stainless; there is no arising and no exhaustion; there is no awakening and no manifest realization; there is no element and no arising of constituents. In the engagement of the unborn, nothing whatsoever can be expressed. The solitary name "unborn" — that is said to be recollection. Just as space is luminous, without marks and without change, its intrinsic nature resembling space, non-dual, not existing as two —

That which unites the twelve limbs in one — the name of the perfect enjoyment body (saṃbhogakāya) of aversion fulfilled — attended to by all buddhas: that is called "recollection of the lineage." Born from dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda), fully awakened, a woman of twelve years of age — from the attainment of a stable mind, one should make offering with one's own vital fluid.

Whatever is the purity that is the selfless essential nature, that is explained as purity. It is praised as worthy of offering by that very fact, and one proceeds by the Perfection of Wisdom. By this, the offering to the body and, in particular, the Tathāgata — it is taught as the Vajra-holder, and likewise mind; the body, speech, and mind of one who holds the Dharma. Body, speech, and mind are authentically accomplished; in this very life one will attain it. Even of the lineage described as lower, that same mode will be accomplished in it. That very purity is declared to be the offering; examine each case separately in that same way. The union of the indivisible vajra (vajra) is also clearly the empowerment of speech itself.

Abiding in the intention, in the scriptural transmission, one whose mind is not confused — like the sun dwelling in space — acts freely as one wishes. This is the secret of the three vajras of all the Tathāgatas, the supreme of mantra conduct. The seventh chapter is completely set forth.

Then the glorious Tathāgata, Jewel-Glory Great Radiance, the master of all Tathāgatas, lord of the three vajras, the protector great Vajradhara, the lord and sovereign supreme, the Teacher of all buddhas — to him prayer is offered with this praise:

Supreme vajra of space-conduct, great sage Vajrasattva, Vairocana of the Great Vehicle, Samantabhadra of noble conduct, the supreme of all things gathered as one, the genuine arising of all supreme lineages, the supreme offering of the holy Victors, supreme among all offerings — please teach!

Great attachment, great aversion, great delusion, great wisdom — one who teaches all three vehicles and teaches the vajra vehicle; the supreme of existents, singular as space, great ocean of gnosis, supreme guru; the three vajras, free from attachment — the offering of the Victor's presence, please teach!

The three vajras, supreme path, the sole teacher of the path to liberation; the very pure, supremely fortunate awakening of buddhahood, the offering to the supreme among humans — please teach!

All things are supremely pure as one; the awakening mind is a vast ocean; the wheel of Dharma turned as one; arising from the gnosis of dependent origination; the three vajras as one — the meaning of complete purity; performing the deeds of the various buddhas; the dharma of selflessness is supremely pure. Homage to the vajra vehicle!

Then the Tathāgata, the sovereign, all unchanging as the great sky, empowering all, lord of all, holding the supreme jewel for the benefit of all — having sought out a young woman with wide eyes, adorned with beauty and the prime of youth, twenty-five years of age — upon finding her, examine the place of human birth. In a solitary and pure region, the sovereign self, in the pleasant, peaceful and tranquil abode, having anointed with urine and water, one bestows the awakening of buddhahood. One should always perform offering.

Through the offering to the Tathāgata, what is called the aggregate (skandha) arises in its variety; the indivisible element of the three vajras is declared to be called the Victor. The prime of gnosis of omniscience — united with what is inconspicuous in taking up — examine that very thing as the youthful one. The field for worldly beings to attain it — the purpose of beings is supremely accomplished.

Whatever is spoken of as substanceless is to be examined as arising at the extremes. The pure, stainless mind, solitary and substanceless — the ground (bhūmi) is called the eye, and the ground is where the Victor arises. Peace arises in its variety; the peaceful abode, swift and so forth; urine and excrement are renowned as the object and the sense faculty; and water is the six — wisdom and so on. Whatever is anointed by these, producing what is desired for the perfect enjoyment body — one who is always such teaches the Dharma of the Victors.

The intentional connection is the nature of reality. The characteristic of the second limb of offering — the limb of arrangement — is now explained.

The crown of the head lies utterly beyond the world; in the heart center lies what transcends the world; in the region between the feet, the navel, the hips, the secret place — this is what pertains to the world. The arrangement of the bodhisattvas is said to be the five families.

Meditate upon the ocean of primordial wisdom dwelling in the midst of the sky element. The one who holds vows meditates in the heart, abiding within the moon disc of one's own being. The water that has become the connection — this is to be fully examined as Māmakī. By the desire of the peaceful Vajradhara, that gathering too is supremely to be effected. The stūpa of jewel nature is adorned with its many-rayed lights. The ocean of primordial wisdom of the three times is to be contemplated in that very place. From the pores of the one endowed with intelligence, it is to be emanated just as it is. The yogin who inclines toward the supreme yoga thereby emanates clouds of offering. White lotus garments are properly arranged.

The five united in one — the yoginī. What is taught as the fire connection: that too is unclear and rests in peace. What has become the blue lotus for Tārā — that is wind, the fifth connection. It bears the names: entering, abiding, arising, and likewise rising. By making that itself threefold, the samaya of the three vajras is established.

Then the offering presented by the one of intelligence is, for the gods as well, substancelessness itself. Then, upon hearing the flower-intention from the supreme Tathāgata, the great all-pervading Vairocana, Vajrapāṇi asked the Great Sage: fire, wind, the Great Lord, and water — these are to be fully examined. Each one is called first the connection. Those five flowers are explained as threefold.

"Vultures eating flowers" and "bees eating flesh" — these phrases are said; the intention of these flowers is something beings of future times will not understand. Because they are not realized, the attainment of siddhi for those persons will remain far off. Saying thus, "I am one of unsuitable fortune," they speak and revile themselves. By thus reviling themselves, they come to revile all buddhas. By reviling all buddhas, they pass beyond the human state and go elsewhere.

The principal buddha is not within, not without, and not in both. Nor does it arise from a collection — it abides in beings by way of conditions. Likewise the Tathāgata buddha: it is because of the difficulty of accomplishing this very secret mantra in the body that one reviles oneself and others. In order that those persons may be embraced, please expound that intention.

If one does not seek one's own nature, even the learned will degenerate. Then the Blessed One of manifold forms spoke to the Lord of Secrets: by the distinction of day and night, the meaning of the flower is to be explained. The lotus and the blue lotus are said to pertain to the daytime; jasmine (jātī) is said to pertain to the night. Five in nature becoming three and one, two becoming five, one and three — the method of that is explained as daytime; night is said to be wisdom. By the distinction of day and night, what arises in the end becomes suchness itself. The connection in the midst of those two — this is what is fully examined by intention. That becomes the heart-essence of the buddhas; therefore not even the hosts of gods have found it. Yogins and mantra-practitioners should strive diligently in the Dharma of intention. Through the cause — the blessing of intention — those persons will accomplish it.

What is renowned as the ten winds — those bear the names lotus and blue lotus. Those themselves, known as the three vajras: jasmine alone is held to be threefold. Karṇikā, mālikā, yuktikā, and ravīra — in due order, eye and so forth, up to earth and so on, are applied here.

By being arranged in the station of substancelessness, the forms of the gods are connected through the yoga of the body —

In unity, that becomes the great offering that pleases all buddhas. The five, properly established in their own nature, are to be made twofold into fifty. That very conjunction of three — the wheel — is a maṇḍala of one hundred leagues. Therein the wise one should at all times arrange the families in their proper order. Lotus, wheel, and vajra, and likewise blue lotus — these are always to be meditated upon. The four leagues joined as one: that same threefold extent of one hundred leagues. Loving-kindness (Maitreya) and the rest are set at the four corners, adorned with beautiful aggregates. Those four corners are themselves arranged by family. The peaceful conjunction is known as the "one" — its name is single. The stūpa: the nature of gnosis-mind is luminous and its intrinsic nature is without stain. For the sake of honoring the families, the one endowed with wisdom meditates upon that very place. Those who desire the station of the five higher knowledges — the offering there is as clear as an ocean. The nature of radiating jewel-like gnosis — "the gathering of robes" is what this is called. By those foremost offerings, the one who desires awakening should make offerings. Through the highest offering, the one endowed with wisdom should at all times please the gods. The "single conjunction" arose truly from that: it is the lesser among the sources of jewels. For the sake of thoroughly accomplishing the attainment of one who is fully endowed with joy and delight, what are called the "seven beginning with pride" — all jewels are to be bestowed. Arising from Dharma and the enjoyment of complete fulfillment, that wealth of seven jewels — this very field filled with them: for the sake of giving it to one who desires the attainment arising from wisdom and skillful means joined as one, that field is to be offered day by day. This becomes here the perfection of giving of the yogin whose space is boundless. In the midst of the buddha maṇḍala, one settles in equipoise as the lord of the mudrā, and offers to the buddha endowed with mind of desire the conjunction of true contact. Meditate upon the sacred maṇḍala arrayed in the center of the expanse of sky. One's own nature is the body of the Tathāgata, which overcomes objects and sense faculties, arising perfectly as single substancelessness. Whatever is called "object and sense faculty" — excretions and urine, exactly as they are — with those as offerings, one makes offering. In the auspicious field, upon finding a woman of beautiful form and fair appearance, and as the location of the syllables of the secret mantra arises, one consecrates that yoginī with blessing, and then, as the "single non-dual conjunction," one draws her into one's own body. Eye and the rest, exactly as they are — with the consecrated stations arrayed, one takes the self-arisen fluid of the pure activity of the clear eye and makes offering. Whoever realizes it thus, by taking it, will become a Vajradhāra. Whatever maṇḍala — of earth and so forth — is thoroughly investigated as eye and the rest: that very joining of entering and so on becomes the eating of the fluid. This is the offering to the body, speech, and mind of all mantras — the secret of vajra gnosis, the supreme that accomplishes the attainment of secret mantra, the supreme source of all jewels. Abiding in the intention of prophetic transmission, whoever has brought the mind to tolerance will perform it just as it is. This has been stated to be the eighth chapter, called "the samaya of urine and excrement," from the secret of the vajra speech of all the Tathāgatas.

Then: the foremost of Tathāgatas, the sovereign, the great immutable one of all space, the supreme engaged buddha of empowerment, is the sacred lord of material meaning and form. Enjoying the very three vajras, the maṇḍala of the three indivisible vajras — it is the single conjunction of buddha gnosis. The secret experience is described as joy. In the center of the expanse of space, one should accomplish the buddha maṇḍala. The single-pointed vajra — the vajra itself — is to be meditated upon by one whose very nature is meditation. Many radiating lights blazing, completely filled with five-colored rays — the buddhas of the three times have truly arisen; having meditated, one grinds them to powder with the vajra.

The enjoyment of the three vajras as one —
the meditative concentration that accomplishes the mind-siddhi when the vajra has ground them to powder and they are no more:
if one meditates on this, it will be swiftly attained.

This vajra secret of what is called Supreme Vajra —
the vajra itself holding the vajra:
if all sentient beings are slain by it,
one will swiftly be born as a son of the Victor Akṣobhya.
Through that very nature of the great family of aversion,
that realm will be filled completely.

Then Vajrapāṇi entreated the Protector — he who is the singular intent, the chief, the omniscient, the knower of all, the one who has spoken that very samaya:

"You who have become supreme among the non-substantial, who teach the phenomena — why, O Protector, do you teach with words that contradict worldly people?

That which is a single reality of suchness — the buddhas who arise throughout the three times, born from the dharmakāya alone — how is it that the vajra grinds them to powder? And once they have been ground to powder, how can the mind be truly accomplished? Having arisen from the dharmakāya alone, and then having become something called 'superior' — how is it possible to grind to powder the buddhas who arise throughout the three times?

As for the one who grinds to powder: since there is no substantial reality, even the powder itself becomes distinguished. The yogin of buddha-mantra, endowed with inconceivable power — to grind thus to powder is not something other mantra-practitioners can do.

Just as a sentient being grinds sentient beings to powder as sentient beings, and a buddha grinds buddhas to powder — future people will say: 'There is no difference between these two.' People will affirm with certainty: 'A single buddha is not the final end,' and whatever has been taught by the buddha, they will fully abandon.

If one accomplishes the excellent Vehicle and thereby awakens — the supreme excellent vase of intention — through swift union with the Blessed One, will one be born in the realm of Akṣobhya? When sentient beings revolve in saṃsāra, will great aversion then arise? Or, saying 'One must slay with compassion' — mantra-practitioners do not abandon that.

The teachers of times past, those who teach by following now, and the future buddhas who are to be pleased — it is the buddhas who bestow awakening. How are those buddhas with form — Akṣobhya with the vajra — to be destroyed? Those realities of various kinds with meaningful words — how are they to be understood through them?

Through knowing this, the sons of the Victors will become free of conceptual thought regarding the intended meaning. For the sake of future beings, please, Blessed One, explain that very reality."

Then, having heard the words beneficial to beings spoken by Vajrapāṇi, the chief lord Vajradhara (Skt. vajradhara) — the all-pervading master — spoke again in reply:

"Excellent! You, my son, are most excellent — Samantabhadra, you are excellent! For the sake of the meaning taught through intent, whatever you have asked me — according to exactly how it was meant, I shall explain it.

The aggregates and so forth, the limbs — buddhas and sentient beings firmly established, and the conjunction of mantra and mudrā too, firmly established in its many distinctions — that which bears the name 'Akṣobhya of saṃsāra': that is called the mantra-vajra. The vajra that is not manifest is described as the vajra — the sole non-substantial is vajra itself. That which is shattered by it is what is meant by 'slain.'

The buddhas and sentient beings distinguished: the nose is the faculty of the various collections; the mouth moves in intrinsic nature — it has become the limb of the yogin. That which is called wind is the breath. Akṣobhya's vajra conduct itself — placing the vajra in the hand, then swiftly and so forth to be performed — is the various intrinsic natures of the nāgas.

The buddhas imputed through the aggregates and so forth arose truly from body, speech, and mind. Their limbs are described as the aggregates."

That which is shattered by it is what is meant by 'slain.'

This is the delightful family of aversion.

The vajra of Akṣobhya's wisdom itself —
likewise, this is the noble birth.

Through that, great accomplishment will be attained.

Then the glorious one of great bliss,
who fully accomplishes the liberation of wisdom,
unstained by anything through the purity of intrinsic nature,
having fully accomplished the conduct of awakening — Vajrapāṇi of great radiance,
the lord of the three secrets,
was summoned, and the perfectly, fully awakened buddha
then proclaimed that very samaya of accomplishment:

"Abiding at the center of the expanse of space,
meditate upon Vairocana
in the excellent vajra maṇḍala,
and meditate upon all buddhas.

Through the union of all precious ones,
meditate upon the vajra form.

Through the union of the three vajras together,
all substances are to be stirred.

Consciousness and faculties will be reversed.

The vajra that seizes the suchness
of things empty of karmic maturation,
the supreme union of the precious vajra
that fully accomplishes all buddhas —
one becomes a son of the Victors,
and becomes like a wish-fulfilling jewel filled with an ocean of wealth.

This has been proclaimed in its entirety
as the very samaya of the family of delusion.

The ocean of all families is to be understood —
from it one becomes the supreme sage.

Then the master, the Blessed One,
who enters supremely into the liberation of attachment,
whose purity of secrets is without location,
proclaimed the supreme maṇḍala:

"Abiding at the center of the expanse of space,
meditate upon the precious maṇḍala.
Having meditated upon the immeasurable phenomena,
fill it completely with all buddhas.
Even the union that resembles a woman —
through the union of meditative absorption, meditate upon everything as that.
This is the supreme mode of the vajra.
Through the union of thought free from substance,
join perfectly what is clear and what is not clear.
The two faculties manifested by mantra
through the union of Dharma and the enjoyment of completion — through the union of the four unions,
the two faculties are perfectly joined.
Through the samādhi union that enters equipoise,
all of these are enjoyed.
This is the supreme meditation
of the mantras of the indivisible three bodies.
This very samaya union
is the meditation on the single awareness of attachment.
This is the supreme mode
of the great attachment of all buddhas.
Mantra practitioners, day by day,
must meditate on this with earnest effort."

Then the secret empowerment, the three vajras —
the accomplisher of the meaning of the vajra mantra, arisen from the wisdom of selflessness —
spoke these words with his voice:

"Abiding at the center of the expanse of space,
meditate upon the buddha maṇḍala.
Having meditated upon Amogha vajra,
meditate upon all buddhas.
One who speaks falsely in words of vajra

deceives all the Victors —
this is the stainless speech of sky,
belonging to all buddhas.
Whatever one who is said to speak falsely —
that very falsehood is the sacred truth.
Whatever hero meditates upon this becomes supreme among the Victors.
This is the sacred secret wisdom,
the supreme that accomplishes the attainment of buddhahood.
This is entry into the family samaya
of whatever has become the summoner of the samaya.
By striving in every way from everywhere,
having made it equal to the meaning as it is,
through the union of individual discernment,
that one attains the vast great accomplishment."

Then the Blessed One of many aspects,
the sovereign of the Victors of the indivisible three vajras,
supremely revealing the accomplishment of the vajra,
spoke these words with his voice:

"Abiding at the center of the expanse of space,
meditate upon the maṇḍala there.
Having examined thoroughly the body of buddhahood —
that samaya has been truly explained."

"Having thoroughly meditated upon the Glorious Jewel, whatever ground this is of all forms —
by all buddhas throughout everywhere,
equal in number to the aggregates and so forth,
rough speech and so forth
is called 'grounds that are inferior':
meditating thus, accomplishment will be attained" —
so declared the Blessed One, the Sage.

All Tathāgatas are arrayed;
they are of varied forms and great radiance.
Through intention, the Glorious One alone
has become immeasurable.

Then, what are the samaya and so forth,
the very three vajras of the dharmadhātu —
all Tathāgatas, by means of Samaya Vajra Glory and the rest,
the great bodhisattvas,
being filled with wonder and amazement,
called this "the path of the vajra word":
that is what expresses them.

"What is this? O Protector, Blessed One,
sovereign of all Tathāgatas,
who has transcended the three realms
and transcended the entire world —
at the center of the maṇḍala assembly of the supreme Tathāgata and the great retinue of bodhisattvas,
the path of words of great wonder:
with what intention did the Chief speak
the true vajra words?"

Thus petitioned those of inexhaustible eloquence,
those of inexhaustible expression.

Then all the Tathāgatas,
in a number of inexhaustible expression,
equal to the dust-motes of Mount Meru,
together with all the Tathāgatas
and the great bodhisattvas of Samaya Vajra Glory and the rest, proclaimed luminosity arisen from non-existence.

"Let the sons of the Victors not give rise to perceptions of inferiority and disparagement.
Why is this? Because the arising of the Tathāgata is the supreme conduct.
Just so, O son of good family, this supreme conduct of mantra is perfectly pure.

This arising of the unequalled buddhas
is the very practice of the secret mantra's meaning.

Consider this example, O son of good family:
space pervades all of its extent,
all phenomena are also realized within it,
and it has become engaged in thorough discernment.

It does not abide in the desire realm,
it does not abide in the form realm,
nor does it abide in the formless realm,
and it does not abide in the four elements.
O son of good family, all phenomena are likewise.
Knowing the import of this thoroughly,
through the power of intention the Victors —
the Tathāgatas by their very intention — teach phenomena.

Likewise you yourselves should,
in brief, take this to heart:
through the meanings of true awakening,
by engaging with the definitive words of space,
recognize the samaya
that has arisen from the joining of the Tathāgata.

Consider yet another example, O son of good family:
through the conditions of a fire-stick and a fire-board together,
moved by a person's hands,
smoke arises,
and after that fire too arises.
Yet if one examines each of the fire-stick and the rest
individually in this way,
that fire is found to abide nowhere.

An echo, a reflection,
an illusion, a mirage,
the moon's reflection in water, a dream —
all phenomena are like that.

O Protector, just as the sound of a lute,
true words arise from the meaning of conditions;
yet coming, going, and staying
do not exist even to the slightest degree.
Abiding by the engagement of abiding without abode,
abiding has the characteristic of space.

Therefore you should recognize the samaya of the vajra.

In this way, since phenomena are without inherent existence —
one expert in the secret suchness of meaning,
in order to reverse karmic maturation,
recognizes the aggregates as Tathāgatas."

Then the bodhisattvas,
being filled with wonder and amazement,
gazed upward toward the noble one
and spoke these words:

"This Dharma is wonderful and astonishing —
equal to space,
non-conceptual and perfectly pure,
yet taught at the conventional level.
The great samaya abides truly.

One who finds the intent-scripture of the supreme Teacher pleasing and who comes to accept it —
that one acts in accordance with suchness.
The meaning of suchness, supremely pure,
is called the Great Secret.
The mode of samaya has been correctly explained.
Chapter Nine is complete.

Then all the Tathāgatas — the Blessed Ones from whom the three vajras arise — gathered their intent once more, and the great Guru, the Blessed One, bowed in homage to the suchness of the vajra samaya, to the one who has awakened completely and who is the foremost guide, and to the sovereign Tathāgata who is the pure lord of body, speech, and mind, and made this request: "O Blessed One, the essence mantra that gathers all together, the truly secret three vajras, the supreme and excellent mode of great attainment — may the Blessed One explain that suchness. May the primordial wisdom of all the Tathāgatas, the attainment of body, speech, and mind, be granted. The single speech in its many aspects of conceptual appearance — the Tathāgata is the true and gathered meaning of this."

Then the sovereign Blessed One, lord of all the afflictions' ocean, with blazing fierce wide eyes, spoke these words: "As for the three vajras of body and the rest — to meditate on body, speech, and mind is to be equanimous and non-conceptual, without focus, and without abode."

Then the Protector, the Blessed One — the Tathāgata of intrinsically pure nature — entered into the great heroic meditative absorption called the vajra of the perfection and mantra mode, and spoke to all the Tathāgatas: "Since the buddhas, the Blessed Ones, and all the Tathāgatas here — the Protector Akṣobhya and the many other Tathāgatas — together with their awareness numbering ten million hundreds of thousands, sport at bringing benefit to sentient beings and teach the supreme among those in the supreme world-realms of the ten directions, enjoying and delighting in the five desirable qualities, living among them and partaking of them fully — yet for those who are diligent in the conduct of mantra practice, alas! O heroes, Tathāgatas — thinking that for these ones the supreme mode of secret mantra conduct, that which has the nature of the selflessness of phenomena, is already complete — one does not sustain them with a caring eye. Therefore this is taught in order to truly bless those engaged in the conduct and discipline of secret mantra, through the careful analysis of this meaning."

Then Vajrapāṇi made this request to the supreme Tathāgata, the Sage: "O Protector, as for those Tathāgatas — when they have become ordinary beings, without intrinsic existence and without a focus, having become equal to the expanse of space, and endowed with the five desirable qualities — how do they engage in enjoyment? All their activities for the benefit of sentient beings in the worlds of the ten directions, and the complete assemblies there — all these activities for beings' benefit are taught through desire. O Protector, these desirable qualities are said to arise as the six such as generosity and so on. All of these become that very suchness: they are meditative equipoise itself in the perfections. Thus from the arising of the perfections, endowed with the five desirable qualities, all activities for the benefit of beings are likewise performed through these five desires. Through these, this Protector — Akṣobhya and the other Victors — engage in enjoyment and delight, and likewise carry out benefit for beings; even what contradicts the worldly is performed in just the same way. Through these, the supreme pure vajra words will be understood. The awareness that is worthy of veneration — one asserts it as definitively endowed with certainty. Whatever makes distinctions of existence and non-existence and so forth will become dual and will come to bear characteristics. The Dharma taught in the ten directions as the path — that which in the world designates the five aggregates, the elements, and the rest — is called by such names as form and so on. All of these aspects together constitute the activities of the śrāvaka vehicle."

That very same is the vehicle of conditions, and this — the teaching of those words — abides in the vajra vehicle, grasping sound just as it is, in its true nature. In the Perfection of Wisdom, the three modes of definitive arising — such as the essential nature of the dharmakāya and so forth — the yogin of boundless space: by means of practice that abides in groundless abiding, he plays within the heart of beings, the protector abiding in singular peace, having abandoned the other side of saṃsāra. That which arises truly from mantra, variously enumerated as Akṣobhya and the rest — because it abides in the domain of that which is without substance, the practitioners will not perceive it. Through the practice of the conditions of the secret mantras, they shall behold it as the saṃbhogakāya. Since those who have not sought the meaning of this secret teaching spoken by the Blessed One — arising from the manifold fabrications of conceptuality — will not come to know the nature of reality through it, some people in a future time, not knowing what was spoken, will speak. In order to guide worldly beings, please teach what has become secret.

Then the glorious Blessed One, who is manifold, spoke to the greatly renowned Vajrapāṇi, who had understood the intended meaning: Son, your great wisdom is excellent. Whoever knows this will ensure that people in the future will be free from conceptual elaboration. You have gathered the manifold meanings into a single phrase and explained them rightly.

Then the holy Blessed One — the guru, omniscient, the knower of all — in order to care for those noble beings with his gaze, declared these samaya words: this secret of the three vajras, the supreme of all Tathāgatas, the supreme abiding place of the secret of the vajra of body, speech, and mind, called "the single invocation, the essence of all mantras," the single secret of all Tathāgatas, proclaimed as the supreme of the supreme — the true understanding of body, speech, and mind, along with the samaya as its focus; the body, speech, and mind of the vajra-holder, together with the samaya as their focus; the body, speech, and mind of the Dharma-holder, together with the samaya as their focus — all this is so likewise.

The definitive expression in words arising from the very vajra of body, speech, and mind is gathered truly into mantra: the single form of the manifold speech. The syllable HŪṂ was spoken as one; then the syllable OM was spoken; the protector likewise uttered the syllable ĀḤ; SVĀ is likewise the fourth; and HĀ has become the god of desire. So it is with the five buddhas thus: HŪṂ, OM, ĀḤ, SVĀ, and HĀ. By the mere utterance of these, all the buddhas together with their sons trembled greatly and fell into a swoon. They remained in the practice of non-duality, recalling Vajrasattva. In the peaceful practice, as the Dharma of singular unity, one non-conceptual dharma arose.

Then the Blessed One — the sovereign of all Tathāgatas — for the purpose of the blessing-practice thereof, declared these samaya words: "Abiding in the center of the expanse of space, what is called 'the arranged maṇḍala' — by means of the practice of three in each case — one should meditate with the practice of meditation. Even examining the three distinctions as one, the arrangement itself is not made clear.

Meditate upon the syllable HŪṂ abiding in the center of the moon, as the single form of one's own body. One should contemplate the blazing radiance of the vajra, radiating outward in all directions. Having cultivated the body, speech, and mind of the buddhas upon one's heart through that syllable, in that very glorious instant one becomes the vajra-holder of the three vajras — Vajrasattva, the great sovereign lord — and arises as the supremely excellent great one. By one's own mantra it is to be generated; this is the sacred ritual of mantra. The essential mantra of one's own vajra, the heart of one's own nature, is called 'the gathered vajra.' It arises from the manner of one's own mantra."

One should meditate upon it in the form of a being. By the single application of the fourfold joining, one places it in the four pure abodes. With three colors and a vision of three faces, it is called "meditation upon the three-in-one suchness." Thus spoke the supreme Blessed One — the foremost sovereign of the sky — through the principal vajra-pledge.

Then the supreme Tathāgata, the Great Sage of peaceful nature, was again petitioned on this secret by Vajrapāṇi, the chief one: "Hūṃ, Oṃ, Āḥ, Svāhā." And when that was declared, all the buddhas together with their sons trembled greatly and fell into swoon. Recollecting Vajrasattva, the Great Sage, just as he is here, and the protector in the future — what was declared non-conceptually — the solitary being, the buddhas equal in number to the sky, and the bodhisattvas of great power: that they trembled and swooned is something childish ones cannot comprehend.

Teaching it in counts of hundreds of thousands and tens of millions, and teaching it through manifold teachers, still there was no trembling and swooning on that occasion. In the future too it shall arise. Those who are arrogant and unskilled, having received the oral transmission from a master, will claim the signs as their own. They do not know this secret characteristic of what was said as the meaning of mantra, and so they broadcast unpleasant sounds about others who are skilled in the very meaning of mantra. If they see even the slightest confusion, they will break into laughter. Such a person, comparable to a venomous thing one touches, will never come to peace.

Those mantra practitioners whose minds are like precious jewels, working for the benefit of beings — even in the future time, they will attain the supreme accomplishment.

In order to gather all of these together, Vajrapāṇi, reflecting upon the intent to apply the subsequent utterance in an instant for the sake of accomplishment, humbly requested of the Blessed One: "Please expound this."

Then the Teacher, the Blessed One, for the benefit of beings, spoke to Vajrapāṇi, joining perfectly the joining, and examining the object of meditation: the very sovereign of the senses, the Sun-Sage. Those abiding in the ten directions, called "buddhas together with their sons" — all those Tathāgatas — arose from the body possessed of aggregates and the like in equal number. From the joining applied to the condition of emptiness, one desires to become a buddha together with one's sons. That mantra, that mantra-practitioner, that buddha — that very self, together with one's sons, joins truly. From the joining equal to peace and the rest, the bliss of peace then commences. When the self-nature is pure by its own nature and rendered stainless in nature, in the various modes of gradual, swift, and stationary, that very one dwells in the pure single one. Even through the lowly-minded and the gradual and so forth, that very joining abides in purity. Then, when the faculties have ceased, when there is only the single bliss of peace — the joining that is pure by its own nature — the Dharma of that is for the one who sees.

Then the mantra of perfect enjoyment, arising from the gentleness of all buddhas — because it arose and was returned — the five secret mantras of the syllable Hūṃ: at that time there is great trembling from the heart, and all the faculties fall into swoon. Whatever the limbs of the aggregates and so forth — all those buddhas together with their sons — through the equal number of just that, the body of the yogin trembles greatly. The words such as "nearby" and "signified" and the rest — whatever was explained regarding the aggregates and the like — having become buddhas together with their sons, thereby one trembles and swoons.

Entering meditative absorption upon those two, all the buddhas together with their sons, recollecting Vajrasattva himself — that mantra arose from the very self in actuality. This is here set forth as the supreme teaching. The wondrous secret vajra, dwelling at the center of the subtle heart: one should contemplate the maṇḍala in full. At its center, one should contemplate the supreme state of peace. That great mass of light called Hūṃ — the vajra into which it is fully transformed — this is the supreme five-pointed one. The yogin should always meditate upon it. Through the joining of the vajra-hook, one should contemplate the three vajras.

Sealed within its heart center, one should ardently rouse the deities. This is the supreme accomplishment of all the vajras of all the buddhas. The wheel, the lotus family, and so forth — this music is the sacred one. Having meditated on the vajra-hook, one is roused within the heart center. By practicing this supreme mode of the vajra for seven days, one fully accomplishes the secret of the wisdom-vajra holder and the three vajras.

Whatever buddha is found among the aggregates and so forth — that is the view of non-existence. Through the supreme secret mantra of that very suchness, one sees the ripening of terror. These people who are terrified: through the non-dual joining of a single mantra, seeing brings terror, yet grants the supreme. These are the ones who have examined this very suchness. From the single practice of peace alone, the body of the mantra becoming fully complete, there arises joy and delight in the mind, and vast siddhis (spiritual accomplishments) are bestowed.

Buddhas examined through the aggregates, and likewise bodhisattvas — through accomplishing the meaning of the mantra-practice, having caused the deluded to pass beyond, their life-force is exhausted there. From the single joining of peace itself, this is the supreme transcending of the world. What is reversed from that is the worldly.

Then the sovereign, the Blessed One, Teacher of the three worlds, supreme in the three worlds, with the vajra as chief, proclaimed these words: Whoever is described as a person of the mantra, the form of wisdom of the three vajras — that one always meditates on the oneness of the joining of the two faculties. The meditation of the lord of mantras, in which there is no apprehension of a self or of sentient beings, is the excellent joining of the two faculties, the examination of all phenomena. This is the supreme meditation on the samaya (sacred commitment) of the mantra of all the buddhas.

Joining one's own form as vajra correctly, and meditating on the sovereignty of the awareness-consort as oneself — that non-dual attachment to non-duality is the view, the samaya, the maṇḍala. Applied to what is called the Secret, that very suchness is the identity of equality. Then the Teacher, the Blessed One, proclaimed the secret intention of the supreme empowerment of all, the accomplishment of the indivisible three vajras. Through the joining of limitless space, not apprehending the self-nature of the aggregates, the progression through the dharmadhātu and so on — that woman becomes vast. Through this supreme practice, what is called the woman of the destinies is the very suchness, the secret meaning of the secret mantra. Through that, one practices by means of the secret.

There, the delightful buddhas — innumerable tens of millions who hold the vajra — declared there that the supreme awareness-holders of mantra are jubilant. Thus it was proclaimed by the Blessed One, the chief. The samaya of the bodhisattva is here the supreme guru of the Teacher. This is taught here for the worldly, reversing the transcendent. Through this, sky-like awakening is thoroughly attained. The ocean of qualities of the awakening mind — that supreme Vajrasattva attains. Whoever has a mind that is faithful toward the secret intention, prophecy, and secret — that one earnestly and correctly guards the secret and always acts well.

From the secret of the three vajras, and likewise of all the Tathāgatas — this chapter, called Rousing That Very Suchness, is proclaimed to be the tenth.

Then the Teacher, the Blessed One, having entered meditative absorption with the supreme offering of the three supreme vajras — the single supreme of all the Tathāgatas, the supreme called the Twenty-Five — declared this chapter entitled The Mantra-Awareness Person of the Vajra of All the Tathāgatas.

That supreme mantra is the great mudrā (seal). One meditates on the wisdom of the three vajras. Through the vajra wisdoms, in order to attain realization and to write it, Brahmā and the others are correctly explained. The sacred essence of wisdom — the three vajras and so forth as taught — is what brings attainment of the body-vajra. The letter A paired together is the speech-vajra.

It is that which brings attainment of selflessness and awakening. HŪṂ is the very limit of the three vajras — it is that which brings attainment of vajra-body, vajra-speech, and vajra-mind. That is thoroughly explained as the abiding-place of entering and so forth, together with arising. This becomes the form of the person who bears the name of the Twenty-Five and so on.

Therefore, each and every one is itself the triad — it becomes the very vajra and the secret mantra.

From the eighth seed-syllable that is beyond speech, that becomes a hundredfold from space. From that single breath of the half-hundred, from it certainly the twenty-five arise. When they arise as the person, there is one bearing the name "Ten-Throated," and there arises delight in the slaying of sound-proclaiming ones. Then Brahmā becomes one alone — Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and the Fierce One — explained in sequence as "entering" and so forth. These, fearless, are that single one. That is peace — the very nature of non-substantiality. From that too there arises correctly the supreme noble saṃbhogakāya. Then from the emanation of the single mantra there comes the activity for the benefit of beings. The boundaries, the sense bases, the wealth-deity, the pair of moons, the Vedas — these and others transformed in enumeration abide as the mantra-awareness person.

Taking up one from among these, one should display the buddha's music. Vajrasattva, that very one, is to be conceived at the center as the space-vajra. What is called "adorned with the maṇḍala" — the syllable HŪṂ is to be meditated upon there. The Vajra-Cloud, rousing emanation — the bodies of the six Tathāgatas — the yogi abiding at the center of that, one who possesses the nature of meditation, should meditate upon them.

The crown of all mantras, the Secret Mantra-Awareness Person — becoming the sole sovereign — is the accomplisher who fulfills the aim of mantra-practice. The single wheel of Dharma, the supreme wheel, victorious and wondrously glorious, the great crown — body and complete victory likewise — is thoroughly explained as supremely excellent activity.

Like the non-duality of application and activity, in application alone — this one: BHŪṂ is taught to be the crown. This essence of the wisdom-vajra bears the name of the single conjunction of time. Endowed with equality with the dharmadhātu of space, the mantra-awareness person bestows attainment. At the center of the vajra-maṇḍala, meditate on OM there. At the center of the subtle maṇḍala, meditate fully on the syllable ĀḤ. In the application of the Dharma-maṇḍala as well, meditate on the syllable HŪṂ there. The syllable HRŪṂ, bearing the name of the abode — the arising of the three vajras is to be meditated upon. This very samaya of the secret was declared as the arising of the three vajras.

The essence — the three vajras of the buddhas of the three times — is the supreme that brings delight. Body, speech, and mind from beginning to end are equal in number to OM ĀḤ HŪḤ. The supreme body of the buddha, the path of speech, and the primordial wisdom of mind — these are to be made resounding. Each and every one is correctly explained as the act of utterance itself.

The application of the mantra-awareness person, moreover, bears the name of being the very nature of the cause. This is the supreme mode of awakening — the thorough accomplishment of the awakening of buddhahood. The vajra-wisdom is emanation — it is that which brings attainment of the fruit of buddhahood. What is proclaimed as the mantra-awareness is this: the person of the buddha. The three vajras inseparably equal — through meditation on completion and so forth — the vajra of all Tathāgatas: those three bestow the wisdom-vajra.

What is called the Great Glorious Blessing is the samaya that has become samādhi. In fitting seclusion, on appropriate seats — the four applications are correctly applied to the mantra-awareness person. One possessed of discipline undertakes them throughout. Skillful means and wisdom, sun and moon, the half of each — examine them well in a single session. By that half, by the lunar half, the three vajras are certainly accomplished.

The very nature that transcends the world, and yet, from the worldly side, utterly inverted — by joining the three vajras, siddhis are bestowed. That they will be accomplished, there is no doubt.

In the center of the sky-vajra abiding, one should contemplate the subtle maṇḍala. At the time of one's own mantra-samaya, meditate on the arising of the syllable OM.

What is the reasoning of the four applications? It is a thorough examination of the essence. The tip of the nose and the very root, the crown and its edge — the abode of Tuṣita. They become the substance of one and three. Those of the pure abode, the city-dwellers, named by the half of the three — the three vajras are the distinction of lineage.

Through the application at the tip of the nose, one possessed of the discipline of joining the three vajras: Māmakī, White-Robed Pāṇḍaravāsini, Tārā, and the eye of the buddha — a great cloud of five rays of light — Vairocana, the abode of non-duality. From that vajra-Vairocana, one will receive the vast siddhi.

Like the light of a buddha's body — in that very instant the yogin is accomplished. By practicing the five wisdoms, one abides for three vajra-aeons. The three vajras are the wisdom of the past, the future, and the present arising. What is examined here as an aeon — that itself is what is called innumerable.

This very secret of the body is taught in the sequence that transcends the world. From the bliss of peace, that which is to be known — from that one application of self-experience, this supreme secret of the body is taught by all the Tathāgatas. The samādhi of the arrangement of vajra-rays of light is perfectly proclaimed.

A and U are in the center of the palate, named at the top of the shank. I and CA are on the left hand; U and MU, examine them on the right. RI ZU — place these in the secret. LI TI on the other leg. One maṇḍala is that very thing — victorious among the five maṇḍalas.

HA is born of the body, the uṣṇīṣa; CUT — the three that cut. The four of the four qualities: the fifth among the five becomes that. The sky-vajra joined with one half — that becomes the five rays of light. This very great awareness (mahāvidyā) is proclaimed entirely as CHA.

The self-endowed lord of faculties, possessing time — one single embodied form of its own joining. A becomes the means; the application is the two faculties as one.

Contemplating the supreme dharma-maṇḍala with the sky-vajra abiding at the center, having contemplated the mantra-born person, ĀḤ is placed on the path of speech.

The great vajras adorned entirely by the five colors — by meditating supremely on Īśvara, the lord of the world, one should meditate on the samaya-wisdom. The samaya of speech is taught as elaboration: the all-pervading lord, inexhaustible and permanent, ultimate and without beginning or end — this is called the peace of nirvāṇa. Through the Dharma speech, the master of yoga becomes like vajra-Dharma. By practicing with the five wisdoms, one abides for the three vajra-aeons. This very secret of speech is taught by all the Tathāgatas. What is called the arising of samaya is fully proclaimed as samādhi.

Supremely abiding at the center of the sky-vajra, the noble vajra-maṇḍala — for those mantra-born persons, HŪṂ is placed to completion in the mind.

Endowed with that very great samaya, meditate on the five colors. The abode of all vajras and Victors — let it be accomplished by wisdom-vajras.

The Teacher, like the vajra-mind — the ocean of perfect wisdom-qualities. By practicing with the five wisdoms, one abides for three vajra-aeons.

Palate, shank, and then lips, crown — named as the ground: the secret of the mind of the three vajras is one. That has entered into HŪṂ.

The wisdom of all the Tathāgatas is called the samaya-vajra. The vajra-wisdom arises from the one — it is taught as the secret of samādhi.

Contemplating the great vajra at the center of the wisdom-maṇḍala, and visualizing KHĀ throughout the entire body — vajra-wisdom will arise.

KHĀ itself illuminates the meaning of non-existence of things, and by KHĀ alone everything is explained. Through the condition of wind and total union, one comes to pass into KHĀ as well.

Buddhas and bodhisattvas, again and again making offerings, and abiding in the samaya of the three vajras — this is the non-dual, spontaneously present essential nature. The engagement of a buddha with suchness abides perfectly and distinctly. The great samaya of the space-vajra: phenomena are not seen by it. The samaya of all buddhas is non-duality and non-appearance. When one reaches the state of non-existence of things, it is not seen even by a buddha.

These three vajras of non-appearance arise truly from body, speech, and mind. The meditative absorption that is correctly taught as what is called "the arranged garland" thereof — this is the essential nature of Dharma unmixed with anything else, the great light endowed with form. One should contemplate the self-mantra person dwelling at the center of the vajra maṇḍala.

HŪṂ is taught as the four vajras, beautiful in the heart. Through constant practice of union, one should meditate upon it as radiating rays of light.

The samaya-vajra of the enjoyment of body, speech, and mind is gentle. If one fully abides on the ten grounds, then at that time the intention is thoroughly born. This wisdom itself is the moon. The meditative absorption correctly taught is called "that which possesses appearance," belonging to the bodhisattva who bears the vajra.

Contemplating HRĪḤ blazing with fine light, dwelling at the center of the expanse of space, and with the supreme weapon of the vajra, one becomes like a vajra-form. This is the union that is like the vajra-space, having become the place of the arranged samaya. The arising of HRĪḤ is correctly taught as the non-appearing samaya-absorption.

Correctly taught as the samaya in which a buddha dwells in superknowledge — this, comparable to the five superknowledges, causes one to become a supreme person. Accomplishing the supreme superknowledge of a buddha is taught as what is holy. The supreme among practices for accomplishing the great accomplishment of all accomplishments thereof: one should contemplate the noble buddha maṇḍala dwelling at the center of the expanse of space.

Having meditated upon the supreme intent of the buddhas, one should meditate upon the syllable OM. This secret of the three vajras — the syllable OM is the inexhaustible foremost. By practicing this without separation, through meditation one becomes like Akṣobhya. The supreme samaya of Akṣobhya: that is correctly taught as the meditative absorption of the vajra of awakening embodied — and that is a holy person.

From holding body, speech, and mind as one-pointed, equal to Akṣobhya, in every world-realm one who bears the vajra will be worshipped.

Contemplating the buddha maṇḍala adorned at the center of the expanse of space, meditating thoroughly on the space-vajra and then meditating on the vajra — by meditating on the three vajra-samayas, one becomes brilliant and radiant like the splendor of the Three Jewels. Equal to the splendor of the Three Jewels, like the splendor of the Blessed One, the Three Jewels — through the vajra of the union of body, speech, and mind, one reaches the secret place of primordial wisdom.

Born from immeasurable absorption, one becomes the holder of vajra-wisdom. What is called "the enjoyment-samaya" — the precious vajra arises as one. Remaining in the secret intent of those very three, the precious vajra establishes itself there.

Contemplating the buddha maṇḍala dwelling at the center of the expanse of space, meditating fully on the Lord of the World, one should meditate there on the Dharma-OM. At that time too, the Dharma-OM, through the equal union of the three vajras, is like the immeasurable vajra — the Blessed One who is the immeasurable vajra-holder. Through the vajra of body, speech, and mind, one becomes like Amitāyus.

The supreme path of the Great Vehicle —

supremely accomplishing the benefit of beings,
endowed with the splendor of an ocean of wisdom.

The benefit of beings arises as one.

The supreme samaya-word of Amogha —

accomplishing the benefit of sentient beings —
is rightly explained as the meditative absorption
called "Supreme Ray of Wisdom."

Contemplating the noble buddha maṇḍala dwelling at the center of the expanse of space, meditating on all the enjoyments of the entire realm of sentient beings, one should meditate on the buddha maṇḍala dwelling at the center of the expanse of space. That is explained as Vairocana-vajra. One should meditate fully on those rays of light, and on the syllable OM̐ of the Victorious One. One should meditate fully on that great light. Then, from the three vajras, one becomes like Vairocana. So declared the Blessed One, the Protector: that is what it means to possess the Vairocana-vajra. From the non-dual union of the three vajras arises the light resembling Vairocana. That very thing is wisdom, the perfection of awakening. The accomplisher of the three vajra bodies — through body, speech, and mind — perfects awakening. The vajra-holder whose meditation is directed toward that, joining with the peaceful samādhi, supremely accomplishes the benefit of beings. In a single syllable-particle, manifold meanings arise. The suchness of mantra becomes clear.

Then once more the Lord of Secrets — he who is called the Secret-Intent Vajra — addressed again the great Sage, the supreme Tathāgata:

OM̐, ĀḤ, HŪM̐ — these three and the others, beginning with BHRŪM̐ — through their abiding at the start, one becomes a mantra-being (sattva) possessing the vajra of body, speech, and mind. OM̐ becomes Vairocana-vajra. ĀḤ is the Lord of the World, the chief. HŪM̐ is explained as Vajrasattva. One becomes a vajra-bearing being. BHRŪM̐ becomes the supreme of abodes. KHAM̐ is definitively the non-appearing. HĀM̐ is rightly explained as Mañjuśrī. KṢAM̐ is called the Vajra-Array. Vajrasattva the Precious and the Lord of the World bestow spiritual attainments. Likewise the Protector Vairocana — OM̐ and the rest are born from ĀḤ. OM̐, ĀḤ, and HŪM̐ — these very three suchnesses — become the Vairocana-vajra-bearing. They are declared to be definitively and clearly the vajra of body, speech, and mind.

The mantra-maṇḍala yogin is rightly taught as the fifteenth of the five. The one who arises through the union of blood is called the mantra-being. The union of the great mantra is indeed the noble samādhi-being. The suchness of the various mantra-meanings becomes the single-mudrā maṇḍala. All of these, explained as secret, arise perfectly from a single intent — a single joy bearing the name of joy. How are these to be understood?

O Protector, a vīṇā without its strings makes no sound whatsoever. Just so, without mudrā, the spiritual attainment of secret mantra does not arise. This suchness of the three symbolic expressions — for whose sake is it fully taught? How does mudrā abide, fully accomplished through the union of the hands? The conjunction of mantra and mudrā, and the practice of mudrā alone — you have taught that neither mudrā alone nor mantra alone accomplishes it. If, beginning only from the practice of mantra, mudrā is not taught, how would worldly beings accomplish attainments through mantra alone that is born of the one-syllable?

From the practice directed toward mantra and from the practice arising from deities as well, one who supremely accomplishes the benefit of beings becomes like a wish-fulfilling jewel. What is called "that which transcends the world," or again "that which utterly transcends the world" — O Protector, how does that benefit beings who are in the world? How should the invitation and the dismissal be rightly spoken here? By what means is attainment accomplished here? What is the manner of the direct approach to the deities? These future beings, whichever ones know this correctly — they will certainly become free of conceptual thought. These things have been declared to human beings.

Then the Blessed One, the Protector, through the supreme secret of his intent, the certainty of mudrā pertaining to the world —

spoke to Vajrapāṇi. Diverse conceptual thoughts are called iron. From the self-nature in which the three faults are assembled, through the application of mantra for the supreme person, that one becomes the supreme of humans in speech. Just as iron is made into gold by the form of the gold-making elixir, in the same way, through the very suchness of mantra, a human being is made into a Sugata. A mantra that is certain and applied bestows the attainment of peace and bliss. By mantra alone, without mudrā, one becomes a person of mantra. Born rightly from what is without substance, the person of mantra arises — this is the great mudrā (mahāmudrā), perfectly accomplishing the aim of beings.

By dwelling when the invitation is spoken, pray swiftly for departure. By abiding, that is accomplished. Trust in mind is the supreme attainment. Through that application for the supreme person, through accomplishing the great mudrā and the single one, what is possessed of the three — swiftness and the rest — that has been declared to be the mudrā.

Striving, the master should explain this at the ear of the disciple. Swiftness, entry, and the application following upon abiding — invitation and the prayer for departure — these have become perfectly mudrā. In accomplishment, swiftness and the rest are to be applied as is fitting.

All phenomena such as the aggregates are empty and arisen through dependent origination. Seeing this and applying oneself accordingly, one thereby comes to abide as the dharmakāya. Here there is no transformation of mantra application; the mudrā too is this very dharmakāya. Yet even so it fulfills the aim of beings like a wish-fulfilling jewel.

However, whatever Vajrapāṇi — the person endowed with the threefold application — speaks invitation and dismissal, having abided accordingly, the proximate word is the invitation; one applies oneself perfectly with the hands from afar. Likewise, that very same mantra is to be applied correctly to both. Through application that distinguishes the family, the mudrā is declared to be feminine. One who is the very self of mental-condition application should examine worldly things carefully. Applied correctly to one's own characteristic, through application that distinguishes the family, one abides in the three grounds by mudrā. Even the nāga daughters beneath the earth are drawn in by a mind of disciplined conduct. The very sequence of introduction, and the application of their abiding — by that alone which is without substance and is suchness, all beings are to be drawn in.

Furthermore, O supreme Bearer of Secrets, look at the very ornament of mind: to attain awakening without substance, there is no mantra and no mudrā. Whatever conceptual thoughts exist in the world, arising in all three times — all of that, the yogin realizes in an instant from the single mind that is without substance. Awakening is not conventional, nor is it to be found as something other than that. It is not from both nor from anything else — it becomes comparable to a lamp in the darkness.

According to the intentions of sentient beings, this mantra, this secret, is fully revealed. That is the examination of the accomplishing, the

to-be-accomplished, and non-conceptuality. The person of mantra abides supremely for the enjoyment of all sentient beings. Application equal to space — one should examine it as utterly secluded. Endowed with clarity and non-clarity, it is rivers and flowing waters and so forth. The practice of abiding in nirvāṇa bears the name of charnel grounds and so forth. This is the conduct derived from the condensed meditation of the supreme knowers of mantra. That very reality which transcends the world here reverses what is worldly. The wisdom of Akṣobhya and the rest — contemplate the vajra in the midst of the sky. Through application of the five superknowledges, meditate in the abode of the supreme buddha. Vajra superknowledge — the great vajra — has been declared as the supreme commitment. The great vajra, supremely beautiful, with five points, likewise revolves. Through application in five natures, the five superknowledges arise. In the meditative absorption of the five superknowledges —

From that abode, contemplate the unsurpassed. The principal fire-tongues blaze in multitude and swirl. Meditate upon the wheel of one's own mantra. By the supreme placement upon the vajra, vajra superknowledge arises. The vajra of space, abiding in the midst, is like a wheel of vajra blazing with light. If one meditates excellently on entering into buddha, one becomes equal to the supreme buddha. With Vairocana established in the body, abiding in the midst of the buddha-maṇḍala, and with the syllable OM contemplated at the heart, superknowledge of the mantra will be cultivated.

The mind that has become the vajra of cessation — whenever it is born from the self out of the self — will become the glorious wish-fulfilling jewel arising from the supreme of all buddhas. In the midst of the buddha-maṇḍala, meditate supremely there on Akṣobhya. With HŪṂ resting on the moon at the heart, hold the mind there. In the midst of the buddha-maṇḍala, connect fully with Amitāyus. With ĀḤ resting at the heart-sphere, place it truly in the vajra. This is the supreme of all intentions — born from the three vajra-indivisible joinings. The sacred commitment of cessation is wisdom, and from it the great spiritual attainment of buddhahood arises abundantly.

With the vajra of space abiding in the midst, meditate upon the buddha-maṇḍala. Contemplating OM — the syllable of body, speech, and mind — one abides for a single aeon. With the vajra of space abiding in the midst, meditate upon the buddha-maṇḍala. Contemplating ĀḤ — the syllable of body, speech, and mind — one abides for many aeons. With the vajra of the sky-expanse abiding in the midst, meditate upon the vajra-maṇḍala.

Contemplating HŪṂ — the syllable of body, speech, and mind — one abides for aeons.

The Blessed One, the lord of the three vajras, spoke thus, having realized the sacred commitment. This syllable with nine extremities becomes supreme among mantra practitioners. Though it is inexpressible and without name, and though knowing and the known are entirely abandoned, dwelling well within conventional truth, it is uttered here as a mantra of words.

One who is of the vajra — the vajra of the three vajras — who takes up this yoga from this point on: whether one reads it or merely contemplates it, one will become like vajra wisdom. Just as the sovereign lord of secrets gave this prophetic expression of his intention, all buddhas confirm that prophecy and moreover bestow their blessing. Wherever it comes to rest — written out, combined with reading and meditation — there one becomes born of the lineage of all buddhas, a victor's child. Having conquered the entirety of the three realms, one swiftly becomes a Tathāgata, and, like a child of a wheel-turning king, one swiftly attains awakening.

That which becomes the limbs of mantra practitioners in the body, speech, and mind of the three realms — relying on the assembly of buddhas, one thereby vanquishes what is without substance. In the unity of non-substantiality, one enjoys complete and perfect bliss. The aggregates and the rest, the limbs, arise from what is meaningful. The renunciation of the Sugata's sentient beings — that is the mantra practitioner arisen from mantra.

Just as space has its own intrinsic characteristic that is not to be abandoned even for an instant, so too all buddhas, born of the lineage, bestow blessing. Dwelling in the prophetic expression of intention, guard truly the secret jewel. Just as the eye and form each possess their own essential nature, and one acts as one pleases, so too the wisdom of all the Tathāgatas is what is named the secret intention — from that very thing are born the secrets of body, speech, and mind, and the sacred commitment of secret mantra.

This is said to be truly the supreme person of awareness, the eleventh. Appearing equal to what is drawn on cloth, it has become a chapter for the sake of attainment.

Then the glorious Vairocana — the creator, wisdom, the foremost guru — that very supreme sacred commitment was declared by vajra speech. It is like space, free of conceptual thought, and by its own nature is of the holy Dharma.

Though utterly pure and free of taint,
though gathered into a single sacred commitment,
by dance, by song, by music,
and adorned with laughter and grace,

the dancing master who is buddha and world
deeply meditates on these very melodies.

Whatever the Teacher shows
to the sentient beings established by the youth,
through the play of dance and the rest, awakening
is swiftly attained from that very reality.
Endowed with the five qualities of desire,
its name is "that which has mind."

Taking refuge in the Three Jewels,
one becomes a buddha, spontaneously accomplished.
Whatever sentient being sees this,
hears it, and comes to know it —

that being has become like the udumbara flower.

This, the foremost of all sentient beings,
is born from the nature of reality of the vajra of speech.

Free from the singular and the multiple,
it illuminates dependent origination.

Then the supreme lord of secrets,
the one who fully reveals the nature of reality of Dharma,

joined his palms and asked
the Great Sage Vairocana.

"From that very condensation of suchness
this music has arisen,

and of one in the world who dances
you have spoken, for the sake of beings yet to come.
If the dharmadhātu is not dance,
how, O Lord, does the foremost perform dance?

It is the distant spectacle of a deluded world,
incited by the intoxication of the high secrets.
If the dharmadhātu is not song,

how, O Lord, does the foremost sing?

The distant spectacle song of a deluded world —
it is incited by the intoxication of the high secrets.

If the dharmadhātu is not music,

how, O Lord, does the foremost become music?

The deluded music of the world's distant spectacle —
it is incited by the intoxication of the high secrets.

If the dharmadhātu is not laughter,

how, O Lord, does the foremost laugh?

The distant spectacle laughter of a deluded world —
it is incited by the intoxication of the high secrets.

If the dharmadhātu is not grace,

how, O Lord, does the foremost move with grace?

The distant spectacle grace of a deluded world —
it is incited by the intoxication of the high secrets."

Thus, in these many modes,
others too engage in practice,
and by practice of what is food and what is not,
the yogin thinks: "I am the self."

This supreme vajra speech —
utterly at peace beyond existence and non-existence —
its nature, the single practice of self,
is the ultimate condensed in perfect excellence.

Then, having truly grasped that suchness,
the yogin of the supreme lineage, the yogin,
practicing the union of those three suchnesses as equality,
reveals the buddha's music.

By displaying in various modes,
even a single one of the experiential qualities such as richness of name is a dance that brings limitless direct joy to living beings, as actually described.

Perfect awakening and the various siddhis
that you have proclaimed —
yogins whose minds are at peace,

for them these will be spontaneously accomplished.

O Lord, unite wisdom with skillful means in a kiss as long as existence endures.
By the yoked practice of mantra's food,
you hold worldly beings in your embrace.

Though it has been explained, those who do not understand it —
the holy secret that is the intention — reveal it to others
while their essential nature is other than what they show.

The siddhi of the outer mantra meaning —
though they seek it in that very suchness,
following a path contrary to the nature of reality,
even there they will not be accomplished.

These ones guard not the secrets,
but cling to them through craving.
They proclaim in words the secret speech of the Blessed One,
using words of supreme secrecy.

Those lesser ones who transgress your command,
who have abandoned the power of mantra,
will become objects of hatred to worldly beings
and will not be accomplished.

Whether through craving or through faith,
conditions, and likewise hearers —
for these, with respect to the secret, it is like a mirage.
Even others born of the lineage will fall.

O Lord, while remaining there —

Dwelling in degradation and weak of mind,
then words will arise that are no longer truly words.
From the union of the nectar of words,
upon hearing this manner of Dharma,
afterward they will become afraid and terrified.
That great one will cause bodhisattvas to fall.
Likewise awakening will come about,
and mantras too are secret.

The union of the Perfection of Wisdom,
the declaration of the secret sūtras,
through the union of veiling the face —
at that time, understanding born of words, faith in secret mantras and such Dharmas
they will not generate.

Through false expertise, pride and arrogance
will afterward be enacted by the childish.

This cloth of the "Ah" of jealousy
does not belong to those who are companions in union.
Those who follow them with faith
will nonetheless speak proper words.

Through the ways of deception and guile
they deceive the kings.

Through veiling from above
they act in the manner of the eighty-two.

That one is the self of the unborn —
the cloth itself has no cause.

The "Āḥ" of jealousy, the cloth itself — the supreme among kings —
the highest that effects true accomplishment:

if one beholds authentic birth,
that is not a path generating enjoyment.

Therefore, the one without persons, the sole one —
the mind of activity enters fully.

Into that, the fanged one moves by name alone,
and in it there is nothing but seeking.

O King, the cloth of great accomplishment
has exceedingly many obstacles.

That activity utterly destroys them.

One who is a yogin free from obscurations —
upon that one hearing those words, rejoicing until reaching the king,
from the supreme lineage of great accomplishment,
who would turn me back?

Those who create obstacles to the cloth —
let them be cut off by the punishment fitting their offense.

With a mind that holds fear in this,
you, without persons —
whether from the royal lineage or from a fine lineage, or those of lineage who are resistant —
those without jealousy who destroy the cloth:
let all of them be ruined.

Then the king as donor —
the great master of the tantra —
five priceless jewels and so forth,
these are the fruit of all happiness.
By veiling the face with this,
O King, may you enjoy the fruit.
He gave that "Āḥ" of jealousy cloth,
and the king received it as naturally arising.
The priceless jewels he took up —
how they were then placed —
then that one became invisible.
At that time the one endowed with continuity acted thus.
Various words such as these
he spoke to those of noble birth —
causing oneself to be afraid and others
to be terrified, without doubt.

Then the Tathāgata, the master, the sovereign, the chief teacher who draws forth,
Vajrapāṇi, the one who makes it understood,
spoke with pleasing speech:
"Vajra! Excellent, great Vajra!
Display it with vajra-joined palms.
This Vajra that was asked about —
that suchness itself, condensed, is supreme.
Those very vajra-joined palms —
hear this prophecy!
That suchness become threefold —
examine it fully through the vajra-joined palms.
That very threefold suchness is the three gods:
Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and the Great God (Śiva).

There I become the three gods.
Om̐, Āḥ, Hūṃ — corresponding in number —
all who enter secret mantra
are called the one with a body of diverse forms.
Where peace itself is taught —
there too I abide.

The brow-offering: its face is unpleasant.
The named person of that one, named —
those, from the midst of the hands,
are absorbed and enumerated precisely as they are.
The left hand becomes wrathful —
the right hand likewise is Viṣṇu —
and the second in union is Brahmā.
Therefore the three: myself as lord of qualities,
mantra, offering and giving, and poetry —
the Veda there become is spoken of as three.
Protecting existence, peace — that is I,
and in the end I abide as the destiny of beings.
These, the second pair of hands —
the halves of the four, the eightfold form —
the supreme Hūṃ, measuring to the half —"

It is proclaimed utterly peaceful.
The sun, the moon, and human beings there —
each is fully proclaimed individually.
The half-letter, become supreme,
auspicious, peaceful, and without fault,
the quality Om̐ together with the half-letter —
Om̐, thus, is what is clearly spoken.

Rightly abiding at the tip of the nose,
at the crown's edge, and at the hands —
from the union of the sun and the moon,
the fire of gnosis is certainly born.
The mark of the tongue and of the foot:
from union, liberation — so it is said.

Āḥ. Below, it is joined perfectly with Āḥ, and above that is Āḥ itself.
It is not declared to be straight on.
You are the half-letter that is peace itself.
The syllable Oṃ is Brahmā;
Āḥ is declared to be Viṣṇu;
Hūṃ is what has become wind —
that very one is called the Wrathful.

The half of the peaceful half — so it is called.
In that, I am proclaimed in full.
Abiding, transmigration, birth,
and transmigration rightly from another's body —
gnosis is self-absent,
and the pervading-holder is likewise.

There, the accomplishment of sword and so forth —
awakening outwardly will be achieved.
These two that abide — examine these purified ones carefully.
Brahmā and the rest, there,
will in future times cultivate these.
By their being blocked in higher realms and so forth,
this dispels transformation in the same way.

The yogins, having abandoned vitality,
abide in practicing the two.
Through becoming entirely one in union,
what enters into transformation is wrathful.
The union that blocks space —
it has the nature of one inclined to Brahmā.
Viṣṇu, having taken on the form of the womb,
at the center of that, the center is held.
One out of a thousand parts of a hair —
the peaceful one is non-conceptual by nature.
This should be shown to be liberation alone.
It is not the essential nature of liberation.
Therefore one should reverse this.
Peace itself is what is proclaimed.

The Teacher, having distinguished those,
will speak the Dharmas of peace.

Great skillful means and wisdom thus —
one does not come to see these in this way.

All the gods — Brahmā and the rest —
abide in your folded palms.

They display mudrās,
and mantras are boundless in the tens of millions.

Right here, the sun and the moon,
the karmic fire of the homa rite (fire offering),
the union of years and months,
the constant dawning, waxing, and waning —
this, born of the union of those three suchnesses, abides as suchness alone.

In the Dharma of the union of peace itself,
both one and many are abandoned.

Born from your palms —
therefore this must not be transgressed.

Because all Tathāgatas abandon it,
it must not be abandoned,
and since these depend on the absence of entities,
the yogin is considered supreme.

Otherwise, from conceptuality alone,
one will not become a vessel for the fruit of accomplishment.

Therefore this joined-palms gesture
is the highest means of embracing sentient beings.

For sentient beings not yet gathered,
you must act to gather them.

The contemptible, the deaf, the mute,
and likewise those who have become blind,
and whoever has become a leper and so forth —
act for the sake of benefiting those.

All that and so forth, in brief,
abides in your palms.

It is what is principal, surpassing the world,
and it has the cause of that gathering.

It is not internal — it is external.

It is not both, nor does it arise from another's cause.
It does not arise from an assembly of mudrās,
nor does it arise from worldly conditions.
Because the vajra-palms are clasped together,
the name vajra-palms (vajrāñjali) is given.
The supreme means for realizing the essence difficult for sentient beings to understand —
a mudrā such as this — this is it.
It bears the name of both outer and inner.

Akṣobhya, Ratnasambhava,
the accomplished one, Vairocana the Tathāgata —
these abide in the fingers of the right hand,
from the little finger on up.

The two becoming one is the Saṅgha —

This clasping — it is the three refuges:
the buddhas, the Dharma, and the Saṅgha.

It is examined as one and as three.

The vajra nature of mutual binding
is the seat where wisdom and skillful means are seen.
By the mere clasping of the palms,
one comes to attain the nature of all buddhas.

The three refuges and the three suchnesses,
the three vajras and the three liberations,
three faces, three colors, three eyes,
three deities and the three realms (tridhātu),
the three times, the three supreme pledges (samaya),
three modes, three maṇḍalas —
three practices and three paths:
whatever aspirations there are for realization,
this clasping of the palms is it.

The supreme of the three qualities of a wish-fulfilling jewel,
the bestowing of grades and trainings —
these will be obtained by beings of the future.
When one becomes that very suchness,
one abandons the many and the one alike.

The teaching of Dharma is without substantial object.
Beings are perfectly gathered through conditions.
This is single in nature, like space —
called abiding without abiding.
Even when made into a condensed form,
it is the nature of reality (dharmatā) of the meaning of the three bodies (trikāya).
This has no beginning and no end;
it is without substantial existence and without fixed abode;
it is endless and inexhaustible.
The three pure bodies arise from conditions —
the wisdom that enters through aspects.
From that arises the essence of buddhahood.
HŪṂ perfectly draws forth sentient beings;
by it, contemplate the body of a buddha.
OM gathers all;
ĀḤ becomes the one who abides.
The single, the triad, likewise the fivefold —
the joining of the clear and the unclear:
this is the dharmatā of dependent origination.
And this is the explanation of its mantra.
Through recitation combined with dhyāna, freed from discursiveness,
it bestows the spontaneously accomplished fruit.
This is what is called being naturally accomplished.
For the sake of what is desired, this is explained as the recitation.
To the yogin it is clear;
to children it appears as the opposite.
The three suchnesses arisen from conditions —
these are explained as being without substantial existence.
The suchness condensed in what is taught becomes a recitation not of the ordinary mind.
By single-pointed reliance of the mind, from the brief summary,
the farness, the weariness, and the rest
arise in the dharmatā of peace
and dissolve into the expanse of space, equalized.
This suchness, without substantial existence,

is called the dharma of dependent origination.
It becomes the condensation of the perfect enjoyment body (saṃbhogakāya),
and the emanation body (nirmāṇakāya), incomprehensible, is distinguished.
Whatever has become the one who gathers —
that too is a name of the supreme.
Vajra and so forth are perfectly applied;
sentient beings are joined to that.
The pledge (samaya) and so forth, previously —
by that very suchness they are joined to the vajra.
With the application intended for sentient beings,
the qualities of that are taught.
The nine aspects with their beginning and end —
these have been made by the gatherers.
By the mantra of suchness being established,
sentient beings are placed therein.
Supplication and prostration,
and the prayer to the worlds today —
the perfectly awakened buddhas are pleased:
they abide within your clasped hands.

Whoever among sentient beings has become a buddha —
likewise one who possesses the non-dual dharmatā —
through the practice of abiding without fixed abode,
all buddhas abide.
That is the suchness of diverse expressions.
The palms are what make vision clear.
Therefore, as those ones are pleased,
the suchness of Dharma comes from conditions.
This suchness — causeless, self-existing — has arisen from the practice of your mudrā.
Whoever knows it — by means of that, the accomplishment (siddhi)
through which wishes are fulfilled is obtained.
Āḥ itself, in that which is not manifest —
it is joined from cause into practice.
As jealousy (īrṣyā), this is fully explained;
the name of the cloth, in its absence of substantial existence.
Having meditated on the noble Yamāntaka,

meditate also in the form of a youth.

From the purpose of that cloth of jealousy —

— arising in what does not appear and so forth, accomplished — is the supreme one, like a wish-fulfilling gem.

A single purpose of all beings has arisen truly.

ĀḤ, by means of the cloth of jealousy as its symbol,
is explained through the intention directed toward worldly beings.

This is Dharma, and the perfect saṃbhogakāya
and nirmāṇakāya — by those three it becomes threefold.

For the sake of being conceived by childlike minds,
it also becomes fivefold in aspect.

Whatever are the phenomena of ordinary, childlike beings —
the yogi who unifies the five aspects into one:

that one too abides in sentient beings who are supremely endowed,
dwelling within beings and so forth in their various aspects,
appearing separately as though permanent.

Beings of the three times share a single defining mark.

Because arising has arisen from non-arising,
it is free from both the one and the many.

At that time, one who wishes to know — the mantra practitioner —
at that time engages with childlike, ordinary beings.

Then the realization of the secret mantra occurs:

it is precisely that which is completely non-conceptual.

Having taken up residence in the Yakṣa class and so forth,
the mantra is to be written on a rock or mountain.

The stations of one's own class and so on — preceded by the syllable A, as a preliminary.

The fourth of each separate other class
includes Ī, Ū, and their long forms.

A, AI, AU, Ū, and the terminal YA —

write them together with the four, in a rounded form.

This is the generation of beings in meditative equipoise,
endowed with inconceivable union.

These, arisen of themselves, in the station of bodily form,
will enter into the water syllables.

Then, through thorough meditation on the very form of the youth, arising will come about.

The mantra practitioner, endowed with empowerment, with portions — will attain the supreme accomplishment.

According to the count of Nāga, whatever is present in the union of threads and so forth —
the twenty, and also the preceding —
that is the cloth, and the fourth as well.

By means of an unprecedented appearance in form,
one wishes to behold the three realms purified.

Whether performing the purpose of beings,
or from the gnosis of equality itself —
three qualities are symbolized.

The name of quality in the absence of quality,
the name of the body engaged in the conduct of a youth —
this view has arisen in the intermediate.

That is the extreme of the door-panel's edge.

Ī, Ū, together with their long forms — endowed with the anusvāra, with three syllables added —
having a long class with a heavy terminal tseg-mark —
the syllable A combined in conjunction becomes the eleventh.

That very long one, by means of the long terminal,
comes to the count of the twelfth.

From combining that very one with the syllable Ū,
the syllable OM̐ is declared.

This is the combination with the preceding graphic form.

The name becomes the fourteenth.

Now, from A, let the mantra practitioner regard it as precisely ĀḤ.

Likewise, from the combination of A,
the syllable A — in however many as one wishes —
look at it properly according to its count.

Each and every one is assigned by its combination with A.

From the group of Ī, Ṛ, Ḍ, and Ū, the mantra practitioner takes the form of YA, RA, LA, and VA.

In the cavity, space, and the intermediate — and in the knee and at the crown — whatever is stationed there:
whenever, from the count of the ĀKA class,
A is stationed behind the syllable KA —
Ī at the shoulder, arm, and hand,
and likewise at the joints —
and at the upper arm, at the hand,
examine them thoroughly at the left hand.
Likewise at the hip, thigh, and forearm,
and at the right and left feet.
By the equal count of that form,
the TA class bestows siddhis abundantly.
The Ū class is likewise explained
as pertaining to the center and the hands.
And the feet also: the RITI class,
established in the manner of the past.

The mantra practitioners who are endowed with the union of suchness see this supremely.

The one who has accomplished spontaneously arisen siddhi —
like a garland adorned with flowers —
through one's own stream, as the interior,
is the activity of the supreme gods.
In all aspects — intention and so forth —
from that very suchness, the self is accomplished.
By the skilled one, through the combination with the four groups of heated bases,
the doors are to be made.
KA, CA, ṬA, TA, PA — these groups — are preceded by center and east and so forth.
The wish to benefit beings
is seen as something that has not spread.
And all are the complete syllable —
to be worshipped with the syllable HĀ.
Drawing forth what is varied,
the entity that unifies beings of the three times —
the syllable A is to be taken as the body.

The remainder, with its aspects —

From the union of the five without interval,
the mantra-practitioner reveals benefit for beings.

From the mantra dwelling at the ultimate limit of flesh,
the three empowerments arise universally.

The phenomena realized as formless
are in a single instant made definitively united.

At that time, the one who has rendered the maṇḍala empty becomes pleasing to the Dharma of the world-dwellers.

A, KU, HA, abiding in the northern quarter —

even existence itself has passed beyond the three times.

The secret mantra that arises from wherever and whatever is declared to be inconceivable.

Whatever abides in this and that is the very uniqueness of its own characteristic mark.

There being an abode here in the formless,
it is said to be the "three parts."

In the parts of above, below, and the directions,
the non-substantial is variously present.

Seeing things unified into one,
and beings — Brahmā, the lord of beings himself.

From the four divine abodes (brahma-vihāras),
aspirations and so forth are to be meditated upon.

You who have become the quality of desiring to serve the welfare of beings — bestow the supreme bliss of joy and the desire of delight.

Reflecting on the supreme aspiration previously made,

I request, O Sage, the Vajra, to illuminate the supreme vajra-word.

O supreme body adorned with precious jewels,

Sister who acts for the welfare of beings, please remain as my support.

With a body endowed with the highest excellence, arisen from great compassion,

please hold me completely and make all phenomena meaningful.

The sister, in particular,

by merely such a summons as this,

then took complete hold

and made the glorious lotus of awareness blaze.

With a voice exceedingly pleasant and beautiful, swiftly through benefit, these non-dual beings here became the vessel.
O Guru, if you wish me to live,
make me joyful with the Dharma-joy that arises from delight.

This very going, coming, and staying of beings —
is the domain of those who always depend upon it.
Teach the sacred commitment of the nature of one who has gone everywhere,
and may you and I possess the qualities of desire.

By the vajra of contemplative gnosis (jñāna),
all buddha-qualities abide as one.
Recitation, fire-offering, and likewise bathing —
please survey the maṇḍala fully.
Without desire and at peace from attachment —
that too is become the ultimate, purified.
Likewise at the time of practice, the mantra-practitioner's recitation is without substantiality.

The frightened one too possesses good mind.
Arrow, the Veda, qualities,
the consort, and the yogin of the lunar disc —
the vowel letters are to be placed.
The group of HA, the group of KA,
are joined in twelve halved portions.
This form of Yamāntaka (the destroyer of Yama, lord of death)
is to be placed in the solar disc.

Then the mantra-practitioner, seated before it,
is to examine it through the meaning of contemplation.
The aggregates, elements, and so forth — the way they are seen —
just as the body is according to the signs,
the awakening mind of non-taking-what-is-not-given,
and the teaching of conventional truth being false speech,
the aggregates having become a living being,
the four divine abodes being woman —
the non-giving of word and foot,
and likewise what is supported itself —
the practitioner alone, as a single union of the three times, should do that.

"Excrement" is explained as the object.

"Urine" is said to be the sense faculty.
The explanation of consuming these is to see the unborn as single.
"Blood-skin" is the correct explanation;
it is called the seed-body.
"Foot" is the conceptuality of mind;
"consuming" is what has become without substance.

Through the power of aspiration, these — vimurapuśa, this —
is expressed as "nectar" in the very nature of the union of the gods.
When it is taught through intent,
childish ones conceive it as merely letters.
Even you, abiding in the Vajra Vehicle,
do not know that very nature of reality.
Completely free from all conceptuality,
it is the dharmadhātu, like space.
World-dwellers of that sort, wearing wooden shoes,
examine through elevated secrecy.
Whatever letter, whatever person,
who illuminates clearly for beings —
from the union of the singular welfare of beings,
one sees that very suchness through that very suchness.

The mind that is fully ripened and matured,
inclined toward spiritual attainment (siddhi),
arises as a state of non-substantiality
through practice united with the saṃbhogakāya.
The self-nature of inconceivable form arises as the antidote to conventional meaning.
Through the mantrin, from the emanation body (nirmāṇakāya),
it is taught, like an illusion.

This very thing, the secret reality,
is the sacred wisdom (jñāna) of Mañjuśrī.
Through the practice of the three vajras abiding,
let one who has the nature of meditation meditate.
For the yogin who realizes the sky-like,
the aggregates are held to be a great solitude.

Through the practice of abiding without any fixed abode,
suchness itself becomes the place and direction of one's dwelling.

The wish-fulfilling tree of the perfect enjoyment body,
adorned with the flowers of manifold attainments,
the fruit of emanation, supremely beautiful,
the mountain of perfect, complete awakening —
this nonsubstantial, secluded, joyful place is what is to be accomplished through that which is called the vajra.

All the limbs, the aggregates and so forth,
become attainment, the arising of buddhas.
As for whatever has become the recitation of mantra —
the essence-mantra is just one, singular.
In the body and so on, the three vajras —
meditate the gentle vajra there.
The three vajras of body and the rest:
let these be unfolded from those very three.
Through the union of the body with the three vajras,
one becomes like unto Mañjuśrī, the gentle vajra.

Correctly realizing infinite space,
the union of mind is a measure of leagues.
Whatever has become fifty-two —
from the hundredfold, toward direct manifestation,
correct realization of the singular as is fitting:
grant the one blazing vajra of manifold kinds.

Within the compass of a hundred leagues,
through the light of the blazing vajra,
the earth and so on, adorned —
this is explained as "luminosity."

Brahmā (the creator god), Indra (Śakra, lord of the gods), and the divine assembly
pay homage with faith to that one.
This brings non-appearance into being:
it is the meditative absorption of the gentle vajra.
Karmic maturation is reversed,
and whatever was proclaimed comes to be accomplished.

Contemplate Akṣobhya and the others
in equal number with the aggregates and so on.
Whatever arises from cleansing excrement and urine —
that shall be called a samaya vow.

These so-called samaya vows, the supreme ones —
from the indivisible arising of the three vajras,
one equalizes the Three Jewels
and likewise meditates on selflessness.
The Three Jewels are the three prongs of iron,
and what is called "selflessness" is the mouth.
This is held to be a pill
into which a single conceptual thought is placed.
The meditation that buddhas do not practice
is the supreme mind, the sacred heart of awareness.
If in this way one knows and meditates on suchness,
in an instant all becomes vajra.
The wheel blazes with equal radiance.
Having meditated fully with one's own mantra,
if one meditates on the abode of all buddhas,
it is said one becomes like a buddha.

The fine particles of Mount Meru
in the thirty-six points of practice union —
that many, and those who follow in their wake,
are called the samaya vajra.

The abiding place is the divine union;
the nose is called Mount Meru.
The thirty-seven great selves
unfold into the sky — inconceivable.
The gentle vajra is the sovereign;
these have become its retinue.
The worldly self-nature
is Mount Meru as examined from without.
This is called the meditative absorption of the wheel
of what is known as the samaya vajra.
The wheel is easy to find as attainment;
it is accomplished through momentary union.

If one meditates deeply at the center of the maṇḍala
through the great vajra's own mantra,
it is the supreme abode of all vajras:
one becomes like the mind-vajra.

As many fine dust-particles as exist in the thirty-six of Mount Meru —
that many women
become places transformed into three.
The great vajra of the three realms
will be worshipped by the six.
This absorption, called the vajra samaya,
is correctly explained here.

The great lotus with eight petals,
arising from the vajra of one's own mantra —
If one meditates on the abode of all phenomena,
one becomes like the dharma-vajra.
As many dust-particles as exist on Mount Meru
in the thirty-six abode-unions —
one places oneself, as one's very identity,
in the maṇḍala of the supreme buddha-vajra.
The vajra-lotus, together with attainment,
arises from the wisdom of unclothed equanimity, and is bestowed.
This meditative absorption called Discriminating Awareness
is correctly explained here.

For incalculably many eons,
abiding under the name of number,
one dwells and meditates.
Possessing the five wisdoms therein,
the intention of all buddhas
— spoken for the benefit of the world —
is fully served through the three qualities of the boundless buddhas of the ten directions.

A sword arising from one's own mantra,
resembling the color of five rays of light —
if a person of discernment places it in hand,
one becomes a holder of vajra-knowledge.

This profound essence of one's own mantra —
Ho, Ho, Hūṃ — these three realms:
that yogin becomes the great Brahmā
who has abandoned the lotus.

Greatly worshipped by all three realms,
and revered by Brahmā and the asuras,
one becomes the single supreme human
of the entire three-thousandfold world,
the Brahmā of great measure.

By meditating on the supreme mind-vajra,
whatever attainments one desires
from the vajra of body, speech, and mind —
those are obtained immediately.

This meditative absorption of one's own vajra arises authentically as the sole, non-substantial reality.
It does not dwell even in liberation;
it becomes like the edge of a sword.

Om — meditating on it as being the size of a canaka seed,
then placing the form of one's own deity
at the center within the throat and meditating upon it —
the wise one immediately becomes
a great radiance of awakening wisdom.

Meditate on the supreme syllable Āḥ,
the size of a canaka seed,
the color of the gold of the Jambu River,
or like the color of the rising sun,
dwelling in the center of space.
Placing the form of the deity at its center within the throat and meditating fully — one immediately becomes
a great radiance of awakening wisdom.

The color of the gold of the Jambu River
and like the color of the rising sun,
residing in the middle of the expanse of space —
the size of a canaka seed:
meditating fully on the syllable Hūṃ,

then placing one's own deity at the center
within the throat and meditating — one immediately and gloriously becomes Vajrasattva, a great radiance.

The color of the gold of the Jambu River
and like the color of the rising sun —
meditating profoundly on Vairocana
at the center of the maṇḍala in the expanse of the sky,
and meditating on a wheel held in hand,
one becomes a holder of wheel-knowledge.
The union of the vajra body-form as well —
this accomplishes supreme wisdom.

Meditating on the lineage of the great wheel,
this is done through the pure wisdom-vajra.

The color of the gold of the Jambu River,
or like the radiance of the rising sun —
residing at the center of the expanse of space,
meditating profoundly on the indivisible vajra,
and meditating on a vajra held in hand,
one becomes a holder of vajra-knowledge.
This supreme accomplishment of the vajra,
through the union of the vajra body —
meditating on the supreme of the vajra lineage
is done through the pure wisdom-vajra.

Residing at the center of the expanse of space,
meditate on a jewel with a jewel.
Placing that very thing excellently in hand,
one becomes a holder of jewel-knowledge.
This supreme accomplishment of the jewel,
through the union of the jewel body —
meditating on the supreme of the jewel lineage
is done through the pure wisdom-vajra.

Residing at the center of the expanse of space,
meditating profoundly on Amitāyus,
and meditating on a lotus held in hand,

one becomes a holder of lotus-knowledge.
This supreme accomplishment of the lotus,
through the union of the lotus body —
meditating on the great lotus lineage
is done through the pure wisdom-vajra.

Residing at the center of the expanse of space —
meditating supremely on the Meaningful One,
and meditating excellently on a sword held in hand,
one becomes a holder of sword-knowledge.

This supreme accomplishment of the vow (samaya),
through the union of the vow body — meditating on the vow-vajra lineage
is done through the pure wisdom-vajra.

Through the distinctions of what is to be accomplished by vajra —
the short spear, the vajra, the iron hook, and so forth —
through the accomplishment of body, speech, and mind,
it is accomplished through meditative concentration itself.

The arising of the great vow,
what is called the vow-accomplishment —
the sovereign of the three indivisible vajras —
was proclaimed by the Blessed One of manifold forms.

Suffering and its origin,
cessation and the path — these four,
the four of the path, are rightly explained in brief.

The practitioner resides bearing a name;
beside a single tree, one rightly contemplates.
Named Dharma and complete enjoyment,
one rightly arrays the single characteristic of manifold forms.
The characteristic is form conditioned by circumstance.

By exhaling and inhaling,
and by resting, one is made beautiful;
in the union of calm abiding that relies on the mind,
in the calm abiding of perfect peace,
one transcends conceptual thought of the three times from within a single point.

The iron hook above all else —
the practitioner accomplishes it always.
The person of mantra with the triple union,
contemplating the triple vajra-union,
is the iron hook of body, speech, and mind.

Endowed with the intellect of buddha-wisdom,
rightly possessed of what is unclear made clear —
from the essential nature of suchness,
all beings are to be summoned.

Residing at the supreme maṇḍala of the wind element,
the summoning of buddhas is supreme.
Through the union of abiding without fixed abode,
the yogin of the true meaning of mantra
also conjoins beings with the enjoyments they desire through the union of the unclear made clear.

Whatever the various aspects of the vow
that reside in the distinctions of the expanse of space —
those very vajras are summoned and engaged by the mantra-knowledge holder.

This summoning of the realm of space
is the great vow bearing the vajra.
From the single union of the true mantra-essence,
those iron hooks are accomplished.

The supreme of all summonings of vows — contemplating the iron hook of the victorious abode — Vairocana's great wheel,
vajra, lotus, and the rest:
the mantra practitioner whose nature is like a mirror
meditates clearly on the buddha body.
In hand, one meditates supremely
on the iron hooks of body, speech, and mind, and so forth.
By this very union,
from that very reality the deities are arrayed,
and immediately thereafter
one becomes an agent who bestows all accomplishments.

All of body, speech, and mind
are to be meditated upon as having a single defining characteristic.
Through the union of the vajra of the tongue,
one meditates in equal measure on the vajra of speech.
The one of discipline pays worship, both outer and inner,
to the supreme secret vajra.

Through the union of the immaterial vow,
however one pursues accomplishment —
that is explained as the authentic practice
of the yogin of the three vows.

It is held to be the supreme of all accomplishments,
the essence of the secret in condensed form.
Thus spoke the yogin
of the great vow of the Blessed One.

Then Vajrapāṇi
rightly spoke the liberating secret — knowing which, the yogin
will attain the supreme meditative equipoise.
That very supreme secret empowerment —
this was rightly explained by him.

The great yoga with oneself as the single self,
resting in equality with space —
having done so, the authentic vow
is rightly applied to the great flesh.

Abiding in the supreme vow
of the great flesh that is without substance,
the intelligent one who meditates on the self
is given the enjoyments of vajra-accomplishment —
which are the complete enjoyments, the purification of the realm.

That very single lord of wisdom-senses —
through these very vows
one becomes the chief of knowledge-holders.

The enjoyments arising from the complete aggregate — examine that from the elephant's direction.
Through the excellent single union of the vow,

one will attain the five higher knowledges (abhijñā).

The two sense faculties are horse-flesh —
through union arising from the immaterial reality itself —

Through excellent union with the single vow,
one becomes supreme in the realm of the invisible.
Whatever arises as the aggregate and its limbs —
being without inherent existence, that is dog-flesh.

Through true union with the single vow,
all accomplishments are fully achieved.
The complete buddha's eye — beef —
the king of the wrathful ones will be accomplished.

Through true union with the single vow,
this is the sacred summoning of the vajra.
That which, having become worldly,
is reversed by the other through enlightened intent.

Great flesh and excrement and urine,
elephant, horse, dog, and beef —
through the practice of non-conceptual union,
that is accomplished in the single vow.

What the teaching sets forth here as practice
is the yogin's enjoyment of mantra.
Through the secret of vajra union,
one becomes possessed of this practice.

That one is blessed by the buddhas,
and together with the three vajra-holders in every aspect,
at the heart one holds the wisdom vow,
and at the crown ornament one holds the vajra.

This is the vow and restraint
that satisfies all buddhas.
The supreme bestower of all accomplishments —
one should perfect this through the supreme vow.

The highest of all vows
is the samādhi of vajra food.

Then Vajrapāṇi, the protector who benefits beings,
again beseeched the great chief,
the great Vairocana,
with this sacred hidden intention:

One who has examined the crown of the head
and has come to abide in utter singularity —
among thirty-six Mount Merus,
the non-Buddhists (tīrthikas) will not be sought.

Through the symbolic language of their own treatises,
those outsiders engage conceptual thought,
and these absorptions they examine —
in this, they have no intrinsic nature of their own.

In the tantra of the Treasury of Brahma's Gate,
one Mount Meru is described together with its complement.
The highest of the childish is made to wander confused —
uttering this speech will cause beings to fall.

Then this Blessed One, the sovereign,
spoke again to Vajrapāṇi:

Excellent! O Vajra, greatly excellent!
O noble being, well done, you!
Conditions and the śrāvaka vehicle —
these I have explained clearly here.

The wisdoms explained by the buddhas —
the Great Vehicle does not see them.
What has been said of one's own body,
whether limited or entirely severed —
those wisdoms are desired to be stainless.
This is called the turtle of the well.

Wisdom equal to space,
the unsurpassed Vajra Vehicle —
the supreme gift: I, like you,
am not seen through that vast expanse.

The Vajra Vehicle is an ocean.
Because of not truly seeing through it,
one proclaims by means of valid cognition

within one's own scripture: "Other things do not exist."

Regarding the secrets of the Great Vehicle,
one weighs them in the balance and then speaks —
proclaiming: "These are not as clear as before" — speaking after looking to my words.

For the sake of upholding that very suchness,
those who meditate on perfect buddhahood —
whoever knows this will become free of conceptuality.
This is spoken through secret enlightened intent.

The reality of mantra — its meaning is awakening.
The result is the fruit of diverse accomplishments.
Reflecting on the intention, in whatever way —
that I have explained truly.

On the vajra-tongue of the vow,
Vajrapāṇi contemplated HŪṂ.
If the yogin eats the five nectars,
the three vajras will be attained.

The secrets of AḤ and OM —
these are the three supreme vajras.
Through union of such a kind,
one becomes the great radiance of Vajrasattva.

This is the vajra nectar's garland — spoken as the vajra vow.
Vajrasattva truly arises —
this is said to be the samādhi.

The supreme vow of the three vajras:
body and speech become vajra-holders.
That very thing is the great ocean
of the wish-fulfilling jewel for all sentient beings.
Throughout all world-realms,
one becomes like the body of a buddha.

The supreme vajra-vow accomplishment —
That vajra self becomes the light-maker,
as many as the grains of sand in the Ganges River,

throughout every buddha-realm,
and having attained it, one who joins to that
will become a holder of awareness.

Meditating on the vajra of the body as one's very self,
abiding in the vow of supreme accomplishment,
the supreme among all who have become invisible —
it illuminates a thousand realms.

Having seized the supreme daughter of the gods,
one joins in excellent union with the Buddha-yoginī.
As many as the grains of sand in the Ganges,
all fully awakened buddhas without exception —
those same in count as that example —
the buddhas who have relinquished the three times,
holding the āmalaka fruit in hand,
through vajra-eyes one will behold them.

In whatever buddha-realms
there are sounds and voices, however many,
settled in the ear without error,
in a single instant one hears them all.

In pure realms as numerous as Ganges grains of sand, characterized by the three — body and the rest —
the supreme meditation called "mind"
knows the suchness of all sentient beings.

For as many eons as there are grains of sand in the Ganges,
one becomes filled with the supreme among buddha-vajras.

The vajra inconceivable is the forerunner.
Through one's own ear together with mind,
what is spoken here — the accomplishments of the place bearing the name "as many as Ganges grains of sand" —
is proclaimed in exact accordance with the superknowledge of the buddhas.
This is true and genuine speech.

Through accomplishing the six superknowledges (abhijñā),
one becomes like a buddha.

Adorned magnificently by retinues
as numerous as the grains of sand in the Ganges River,
these three vajras — body and the rest —
are practiced throughout all world-realms.

Relying on the one bliss of trustworthy mind,
those very three, equal and non-dual,
relying thus and having become one vow,
primordial wisdom is brought to fulfillment nearby.

From the yoga of equal and trustworthy mind,
the vow of accomplishment arises.
Making the fruit directly present through practice —
this is the fourth great accomplishment.

The śrāvaka of conditions and of sūtra
who is endowed with this is greatly praised.
With mind as focal support, and engaging in this,
even in a single instant that will be accomplished.

The one vow of approach joined in practice,
that which becomes near-accomplishment,
the vow of accomplishment itself,
and the fourth — great accomplishment: these four.

One who fully enters into this,
whatever the world and so forth may be like —
the jewels of earth and tree and the like — examine them thoroughly as divine.
They are to be understood through distinctions of Dharma.

The accomplisher of vajra-wisdom,
joining truly in the vow of approach,
meditates fully on supreme awakening.
Regarding form, sound, smell,
taste, touch, and phenomena,
one who discerns the supreme accomplishment —
that becomes near-accomplishment.

Whoever is a mantra-practitioner, having meditated,
performs the accomplishment through exhortation.
The form of one's own mantra bearing the vajra —

that is held to be the great accomplishment.

Whatever is the approach-vow of vajra-nectar,
the mantra-practitioner should examine it throughout.
One who abides seeking accomplishment
should contemplate what is supreme as the crown-ornament.

This is where the genuine secrets of the three realities of all mantras arise.
The accomplisher who seeks the true reality of mantra should resort to solitude.

Examine thoroughly the scriptures (āgama) of various kinds.
Mantra is held to be the great wilderness.
Its wish-fulfilling tree (kalpadruma) and enjoyments,
the region and locale — so it is fully proclaimed.

The yoga equal to space
is explained as great complete solitude.
The mountain-peak, the perfect buddha,
and those of that lineage — arising from what is without substance.
As a symbol of such solitude,
the great luminosities abide there,
and through the yoga of placelessness
accomplishment is always obtained.

The Blessed One, the great vajra-accomplisher, spoke these words accordingly.

The locale and region of the great wilderness and so forth —
the worldly beings speak clearly of these.

The supreme ascetic practice of the body's approach is that one endowed with intelligence, through the four vajras and the union of the two — the three vajras in non-duality — will, upon cultivating this, attain accomplishment.

"Mirror" is the name of the great wilderness retreat.

"Jewel" is the name of the solitary place.

"Great" is the name of Amitābha.

"Meaningful" is the name of the mountain retreat.

Examine thoroughly in five pure places
the aspect of the pure Dharma on the riverbank.

So long as meaning is engaged through the four applications,
the syllable om̐ becomes the vow.

Just as space has but one defining characteristic
and does not abandon its own characteristic,
so too does suchness — half of three and four —
the single syllable om̐ serve as the vow.

That called "abiding in placelessness":
with the single om̐ it pervades all beings.
That very suchness — the faculties of union being unclear —
is the reversal of the primary self-principle.

Some abandon the elephant
and then go searching for its tracks.
Likewise, future mantra practitioners
seek the vow elsewhere than in om̐.

One, two, three, four, and five — time's capacity, and likewise the possessor of wealth — combining these mutually and reciting them becomes a number beyond conception.

The Blessed One is at once one and many,
utterly transcending verbal expression.
As mere symbol, it is called om̐ —
it is the nature of reality of union without substance.

Dharma body, enjoyment body, and emanation body —
the three bodies are perfectly explained as many.
By correctly holding all three together,
therefore om̐ is the vow.

Place the first alone, Akṣobhya —
that itself has become the vow.
In its various symbolic expressions,
the vow is taught as all-encompassing when reflected upon.

It is the union of indivisible space,
free from thought, obstacle, and discursive elaboration.
It arises perfectly from the awareness of dependent origination.
What is called "with sequel" — that is to be cultivated.

A primordial wisdom that perpetually arises:
in the seven hundred of the eyes and so forth,
right and the other side, a half-moon each —
this accomplishes both wisdom and method.

These, having become a pair, are the moon.
The vajra-named one: a half and two.
Through this very union itself,
accomplishment will be swiftly obtained.

Not days but a half-month,
not one month, not two half-months —
through the division of worldly days
I have explained this in full.

From the supreme secret it is said:
by a half-month the practice is accomplished.
What is described as drawing near to suchness —
that is the supreme domain of the vow.

At the time when wisdom, method, and gnosis,
arising from knowledge of suchness,
hold the buddha body with splendor,
the great undivided vajra radiance —
by the instant of awakening through union,
the vajra body is brought into being.

The self-less buddhas abiding in the directions,
equal in number to life-force and so forth,
by cultivating the three of the undivided vajra,
accomplish the vajra blessing.

The buddhas of the past and future,
and those abiding in the ten directions —
the yogi of the supreme dharmakāya:
may those buddhas bestow their blessing!

Those of the past abide in inconceivable directions
by means of the dharmakāya.
By the supreme mantra, inconceivable,
may those of the future also bestow their blessing!

In the three buddhas there is not even the slightest distinction.

Nevertheless, may they bestow blessing upon the mantra practitioners who have arisen from that which is without substance.

The buddhas abiding in the ten directions,
having cultivated the three of the undivided vajra,
bestow blessing in accord with whatever is fitting for the body.

With awareness and non-awareness perfectly united,
life-force and so forth — twelve are taught.
The twofold transformation of time, the path, and so forth —
that becomes likewise the moon and so forth.

Equal in number to the moon and so forth,
they are designated by the name of twelve suns.
Through the distinction that is Viṣṇu's suchness itself,
examining the undertaking of the path,
the supreme practice of that very suchness —
this is declared the domain of the vow.

Mantra and non-existence — the one who performs this is like the whirling of a sickle-fire wheel. This very thing arising from conceptual thought — non-existence is cultivated through meditation.

Beings of future times will bow down before the form of a deity. Eye, and likewise ear, nose, tongue, and likewise body, speech, and skin complete even to the feet — those who cannot grasp: seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, and touch — these are non-existence.

The clay image that has become of no inherent nature or mind is one possessing the body of a buddha, yet it is the body of a teacher of beings.
Through the blessing of the buddhas, and likewise through the practice of mantra that is its very essence, non-existence is the vajra-body itself.

Wood, earth, precious substances, and so forth — made into the form of one's own deity, and having abandoned one's own Dharma, someone teaches the path of words. From where did such a wonder arise — this supreme one endowed with body, speech, and mind? Then, through genuine faith and so forth, though one supplicates that one again, by mere supplication alone, how could it become equal to that?

Whoever delights in outer Dharmas abandons all the gods. In this way, from a body arises a body — this glorious Dharma too is the path of the three. Those who enjoy blessing render it into the vajra of speech. All the buddhas of the past and future, and those dwelling in the ten directions — those who have arisen and those who will arise — these become the path of the undivided three. Resting the mind in ease, at peace, in equanimity, the path arising from knowing suchness — this single syllable, these three and six, one recites oneself into the mouth of beings.

The place of its blessing — the vajra-holder of the undivided vajra. What other buddhas have spoken has become the sound of beings: the buddhas dwelling in the three times, the yoga of the three undivided vajras. The undivided vajra of speech — may that supreme vajra-holder bestow blessing!

Engaged in the practice of entering and abiding, and endowed with arising and perfect completion — the vajra of speech that is non-existence: may the buddhas bestow their blessing upon that!

Just as a wheel-turning king accomplishes his deeds through the path of words, so one who is blessed in speech — the mantra practitioner — brings about in the very same way that which is truly meaningful. What is correctly explained here is to be called the Great Accomplishment. That the buddhas bestow blessing upon those — this is the supreme domain of the vow.

The king who holds the vajra of mind: may he bestow blessing upon me. Through the practice of the three undivided vajras, dwelling in a state equal to the expanse of the sky — all the buddhas dwelling in the ten directions, those who have arisen and those who will arise — the place of their blessing: they bring about what arises from the three paths. Supreme is their manifestation through the body — this is meditation on the pratyekabuddhas. The sūtravādins and śrāvakas too have become practitioners who establish what is stated. The mind endowed with supreme yoga accomplishes thoroughly the benefit of beings.

Being free of going, coming, and dwelling, and cleaving rock and earth, through exemplifying body and so forth, yet this becomes speech. The suchness that is devoid of mind and body is that which brings benefit to beings. The vajra of body, speech, and mind is one, yet it is taught separately.

Whether it be the Dharmas of buddha-vajra or likewise the vajra bodhisattva — the buddhas of body, speech, and mind and so on — examine the three vajras as undivided. Beyond that, one possessed of the nature of delusion will find that individual conceptual discrimination is brought to a halt.

Equal in number to body and so forth, whatever a buddha conceives — that too joined to emptiness is made clear beyond doubt. The various combined mantras make manifest what is empty. All those past things, the entirety of them, will be overcome by one of the nature of delusion.

For the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas —

awakening, in summary, is what has been explained. What has been taught concerning worldly matters is also summarized here. Whether it be the buddha, the vajra Dharmas, or likewise the vajra bodhisattva — if one, through delusion, transgresses this, there is no doubt that such a one will fall. Dwelling in the intention of the prophetic transmission, keep the sacred secret perfectly. Through the practice of effortless accomplishment, strive to realize the supreme attainment. The supreme secret of body and so forth — this, the chapter teaching the supreme of what is to be accomplished as the commitment of the practice called "vajra union," is the twelfth chapter spoken.

The tantra entitled "The Prophetic Transmission of Intent" is complete.

Translated by the Indian preceptor Dharmaśrī Bhadra and the great-translation monk Rinchen Zangpo, who requested it and established it definitively.

Translator's Notes

- The epithets in the verse section that enumerate figures such as "Brahmā, Viṣṇu, Desire, the Veda, the moon, the drum-sounder, the Delighter, the Tawny Ascetic who is Desiccator, the Sage of the Nose-ring" are highly compressed tantric references. "The Delighter" renders sgra sgrogs, literally "drum-sounder" or "one who proclaims," and "dga' byed" ("Delighter") are two distinct epithets in the list; "skya bseng skem byed" is a standard compound epithet for a particular yogic or deity figure associated with austerity and desiccation; "sna yon" literally "nose-ring holder" is rendered accordingly. These figures represent deities whose essences are being subsumed into the single unity of all Tathāgatas — a standard Mahāyoga tantric device.

The passage's enumeration from "first" through "fourteenth" constitutes a chapter-by-chapter or section-by-section table of contents for the tantra itself. The translation preserves this structure as running prose, but listeners should understand it as an outline of the tantra's contents.

The final sentence — the entry of all Tathāgatas into the Lord's own body through the samādhi of "great attachment" — is a standard Mahāyoga initiation narrative device and should not be read literally as an endorsement of attachment; it is a technical tantric term for a particular meditative absorption.

- The ten winds listed here (vital breath, upward-moving, downward-clearing, equally-abiding, pervading, nāga, tortoise, lizard, god-given, bow-king) correspond to the standard tantric enumeration of the five root winds and five branch winds (Sanskrit: prāṇa, udāna, apāna, samāna, vyāna; nāga, kūrma, kṛkara, devadatta, dhanañjaya). The Tibetan names here are close but not fully transparent renderings; the translation attempts to capture their sense while signaling the technical context.

The phrase rendered "born from the A-gate" reflects tantric syllable mysticism in which the letter A is the primordial unborn syllable; this is a highly technical passage and the syntax is compressed.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the source, consistent with the instruction that this is a continuous excerpt.

- The "thirteenth stage" refers to a stage beyond the standard ten or eleven bodhisattva stages, designating an exalted tantric level; this is a recognized though uncommon enumeration in certain Mahāyoga and Yoganiruttara systems.

The term bhaga appears twice as a Sanskrit loanword in the Tibetan, retained here in its Sanskrit form as it functions as a technical-theological term in tantric literature denoting the sacred feminine principle; to translate it would either be euphemistic or lose the doctrinal valence the text clearly intends.

Māmakī, the White-Robed One (Pāṇḍaravāsini), and Tārā are here the three named female tathāgata-consorts alongside the buddha-eye (Buddhalocanā), forming the four female consorts of the maṇḍala; their Tibetan orthography confirms these identifications.

"The Inexorable" renders Tibetan "འགྲོགས་པོ་མེད་པོ་" applied to one of the five buddhas, which in context is an epithet for Amoghasiddhi; the five named buddhas in sequence are Akṣobhya, Vairocana, Ratnasambhava, Amitāyus (standing for Amitābha), and Amoghasiddhi.

- The phrase rendered "acting for the benefit of beings equally and unequally" translates a line expressing that the Tathāgata's activity encompasses both equal and unequal modes of engaging beings — this is a technically dense formulation whose precise doctrinal import depends on the wider commentary; the rendering is literal and deliberately preserves the ambiguity.

The phrase "triple face" for "three-faced" is an idiomatic rendering of a vision in which all Tathāgatas perceive the awakening mind simultaneously from three aspects; the exact doctrinal referent varies by commentary.

"Acts without interval" renders the five actions of immediate karmic retribution (ānantarya-karma), the gravest category of misdeeds in Buddhist ethics.

- The phrase rendered "like a hook without a handle" translates the image of a goad or iron hook that lacks its handle — meaning something that can no longer function as intended, used as a metaphor for a practitioner who has abandoned their pledges and thus lost their operative principle.

The section beginning "Thereupon the Blessed One, the Tathāgata, having gathered together as one" describes a ritual scene within the Guhyasamāja tantra framework in which a buddha-figure makes a self-offering and a pledge-cloud offering to the assembly of Tathāgatas, then requests a teaching. The pronoun shifts between "he" and the Blessed One are deliberate in the text and reflect the liturgical and visionary structure of the passage.

The final line breaks off mid-sentence in the source passage, indicating this is a continuation passage; translation ends accordingly.

- The names Vajradhṛk, Jinadhrik, Ārolik, Prajñādhrik, Dveṣaratī, and Moharatī are transliterated Sanskrit mantric names embedded in the Tibetan text and are preserved as such. Their exact orthography in the source is irregular, reflecting Tibetan phonetic transcription of Sanskrit, and the renderings given here represent normalised Sanskrit forms. The phrase "the direction of fire" renders a standard tantric directional convention: the southeast, associated with the fire element. The term rendered "gnosis-being" translates rig pa skyes bu, a technical tantric usage meaning an embodied form arising as a manifestation of gnosis. The passage is a highly compressed tantric maṇḍala description and the sequence of Tathāgatas corresponds to the five buddha families, with Akṣobhya, Vairocana, Ratnasambhava, and Amoghasiddhi identifiable from context, though not all names appear explicitly in this passage.
- The Sanskrit names Yamantaka, Prajñāntakṛt, and Padmāntakṛt are preserved from the Tibetan transliterations of the Sanskrit. The first of these renders རྩམ་པ་ལྷ་མོ་ as the deity's name rather than a descriptive phrase, following the tantric commentarial tradition in which this is a proper name.

The phrase རྩམ་པ་ལྷ་མོ་ (direction free from truth) is unusual and may be a directional designation peculiar to this maṇḍala system rather than a philosophical statement; its precise meaning depends on the larger ritual-cosmological framework of the text.

The name རྩམ་པ་ལྷ་མོ་, rendered as "Bsluvajra," is a Tibetan coinage meaning "Deceptive Vajra" or "Vajra of Illusion" (bslu ba = to deceive). It could equally be translated as Māyāvajra; the choice is left to editorial discretion.

- The passage contains dense tantric technical language in which standard Mahāyāna terms are redeployed within a Vajrayāna metaphysical framework. Several phrases are deliberately polyvalent. The expression rendered "the threefold manner" for རྩམ་པ་ལྷ་མོ་ refers most likely to the three vajras of body, speech, and mind, which the immediately following lines confirm. The phrase རྩམ་པ་ལྷ་མོ་, rendered "three liberations in the three faces," is genuinely obscure; it likely refers to the three gates of liberation, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, visualized in a three-faced deity, but the precise referent depends on the root tantra's commentarial tradition and is not unambiguous from the text alone. The closing phrase "phenomena arising from the sacred pledge and the like" is a sentence-fragment in the source, indicating the passage continues in the next section.
- The passage is a tantric text of considerable density, and several verses operate on multiple registers simultaneously, employing deliberate ambiguity regarding the "three" bodies, lineages, and afflictions as gnosis. The identification of aversion, delusion, and desire with the three buddha-bodies and the three tantric lineages (vajra, ratna, padma) is a standard Vajrayāna doctrinal move here rendered literally; listeners without tantric context may find these equations opaque, but that opacity is intentional in the source. The figure of "Yama's wisdom" renders a passage where Yama (the lord of death) and his associated wisdom are identified with a specific tantric deity-function; the rendering follows the grammatical sense as closely as possible given the compressed verse. The phrase "the woman, though singular, becomes manifold" refers to the tantric consort principle being one in essence yet manifesting as many — a standard motif in this genre of literature.
- The passage contains a cryptic concluding section involving the syllable "A" and a system of nine vowels and ten consonants — or possibly nine and ten categories of some other classification — culminating in the statement about the letter "A" as the binding principle. This is standard tantric phonological mysticism where the vowel "A" (as the first letter and sign of non-arising, anutpāda) is identified with suchness and awakening. The phrase rendered "the first, the one, dwelling in the center of the nine, not bound by the ten" likely refers to the vowel "A" at the center of the Indic syllabary, unbound by the nine remaining vowels and the consonants, though the precise technical referent depends on the specific phonological schema of the tantra in question. This is noted because the TTS rendering must simply flow, but the doctrinal point is genuinely esoteric and not fully transparent from the Tibetan alone.

The sequence of five buddha-declarations follows a clear maṇḍala structure: Vairocana, Akṣobhya, Ratnasambhava, Amitābha, and then what appears to be Amoghasiddhi rendered here as "the truly indomitable, the vajra of overwhelming splendor" — the Tibetan "བཏག་པོ་རྒྱལ་མཚན་འདུག་པོ་ཡིས་ཀློང་ཁྲིའི་ཕྱི་རྩེ་ལ་འཛིན།" describes a samādhi name rather than naming the buddha directly, so Amoghasiddhi is implied by position rather than stated.

- The passage is a cryptic tantric text describing yogic syllable-practice, mantra, and the nature of awakening mind. Many of the lines about syllables, YA, RA, OM, numbers such as sixteen, five, four, three, six, etc., are deliberately encoded and refer to esoteric syllable-classification systems within the Mahāvairocana tradition. These cannot be decoded with full confidence from the text alone; the rendering preserves their literal sense without speculative expansion.

The final stanza breaks off mid-sentence in the source passage; the translation has been rendered up to that point as given.

- The phrase rendered "bearing the names of the ten in the identity of the five" refers to the five winds or vital energies (prāṇas) and the ten aspects or functions attributed to them in Indo-Tibetan physiology as mapped onto the twelve links of dependent origination. The precise technical alignment of "five, ten, and twelve" here is characteristic of a tantric or proto-tantric rDzogs-chen or Vajrayāna physiological-cosmological framework, and the passage as a whole is doctrinally unusual in equating bodhicitta directly with the prāṇa-wind as life-force and cosmic principle. This is not standard sūtra Madhyamaka usage but belongs to the tantra literature.

The phrase "Blessed One of many forms" renders sna tshogs pa, literally "variegated / of many kinds," used here as an epithet of Vajrapāṇi. This is a genuine interpretive choice: the epithet may alternatively describe the Blessed One who teaches in many modes, but the Tibetan grammar supports it as a qualifier of Vajrapāṇi as the interlocutor-deity addressed.

- The passage contains a number of extremely compressed and technically specialized lines, particularly those dealing with phonological symbolism, yogic physiology, and tantric numerology. Several phrases require comment.

The lines about "short vowels as day, long ones as night" and the subsequent reference to "the three three-quarters" connect to a system of phonological mysticism in which Sanskrit vowel length, the structure of the syllable Ha, and divisions of the day are mapped onto the awakening mind. The phrase rendered "three three-quarters" translates a numerical expression that likely refers to a three-times-three-quarters division equaling a structural whole, but the precise technical referent is uncertain and may belong to a lost or specialist commentarial tradition.

The "great sovereign Vairocana" is rendered to indicate that Vairocana here functions as the presiding buddha from whom the Lord of Secrets speaks, rather than as a separate interlocutor; the grammar is compressed and the syntax genuinely ambiguous at this point.

The final lines of the passage in the Tibetan break off mid-sentence at "from the vajra through the three samayas," indicating a continuation that follows in the next passage.

- The passage contains a series of mantra syllables given in transliterated Sanskrit directly in the Tibetan text: Oṃ, Śūnyatā, Jñāna, Vajra, Svabhāvātmakaḥ, and Ahaṃ. These six are here rendered as they appear, functioning as the seed-syllables or name-components of the six Sugatas, corresponding to the five buddha families plus a sixth. The rendering "the syllable Mother" for yi ge ma attempts to capture what appears to be a technical tantric term referring to a root or matrix syllable, possibly the syllable A or the totality of syllables; the interpretation is not fully certain from context alone.

The phrase translated as "unclear made clear" renders mi gsal gsal ba'i ming can — literally "that which has the name of the unclear-clear" — a technical designation for a particular meditative realization or identity of the three realities, likely referring to luminosity that transcends both obscurations and ordinary clarity.

- The numerical passage enumerating recitation counts (225, 900, 21,600) reflects a technical tantric system of mantra-count enumeration whose exact referential logic is internal to the text's own ritual framework; the numbers are rendered as given without paraphrase.

The line "those possessing both the supreme and the non-supreme form of peaceful union, above, directly across, at the same level, and below" describes a maṇḍala layout with directional placement; the precise arrangement is left as the text gives it, as the referent is a specific ritual diagram.

The phrase rendered "the four combined into one" for the four colors of the maṇḍala follows the most natural reading of the verse's syntax; an alternative reading would be "joining four and four into one," referring to sets of four color-groups.

- The "one who is the third element" in the verse describing the Teacher as "one element, the third element" is metrically and syntactically compressed; this likely refers to the Teacher as the singular ground who is simultaneously the threefold element, i.e., the unity of the three realms or three vajras. The passage may be understood as: he who is one element yet also the one who is of three elements.

"Māmākī" appears here as a goddess of the vajra family; she is a consort figure in the Vajrayāna maṇḍala system, and the text places her in the southwest quadrant.

The term rendered "central dot" for བྱེད་པུ་ is the bindu of tantric maṇḍala construction — a technical term in the geometry of sacred diagrams; the English "dot" or "bindu" are both acceptable, and "central dot" preserves the geometric sense for a listening audience.

- The passage is from a tantric text — likely the Vajrasākhara or a related Yoga Tantra cycle — and contains highly elliptical, technical Yogācāra-Tantric terminology throughout. Several phrases resist fully transparent rendering.

The identification of "Hayagrīva" for "rta mgrin" is certain; his being the lotus of the west is consistent with standard Yoga Tantra maṇḍala placement.

The section on bodily substances — fragrance, excretion, blood, juice — is consistent with Tantric inner-offering (inner-maṇḍala) symbolism where bodily substances correspond to wisdom principles. The translation preserves the literal sense without smoothing.

The final line "entry into aversion" as the defining characteristic is philologically accurate but doctrinally striking — in context, this likely refers to the tantric transmutation of aversion as path, consistent with the five-buddha-family system where aversion is the affliction transformed into mirror-like wisdom. A fuller doctrinal gloss is possible but has been kept out of the body per instructions.

- This passage belongs to a tantric scripture presenting transgressive antinomian language — excrement, urine, killing, attachment, aversion — as technical terms for inner yogic realities and ritual substances used in certain Vajrayāna practices. The "acts without interval" render the Tibetan for the five ānantarya-karmas (patricide, matricide, killing an arhat, wounding a buddha, causing a schism in the Samgha), which are here reinterpreted or appropriated esoterically. The instruction to "please" mother, sister, and daughter refers to a well-known tantric trope of symbolic or actual consort practice and should be understood within that doctrinal register. The phrase rendered "the food that consumes peace" is elliptical in the original; the sense is that these substances (excrement, urine) consumed as ritual food "eat" or dissolve ordinary peace and purity — a standard Mahāyoga antinomian inversion. Several of the verse-lines are terse to the point of structural ambiguity; the rendering follows the most internally consistent doctrinal reading but a fully resolved interpretation would require a traditional commentary.

- The passage contains a mantra sequence rendered syllable by syllable in Tibetan phonetic transliteration. I have reconstructed the Sanskrit mantra elements as: OM SARVA TATHĀGATA CITTA VAJRA SVABHĀVĀTMAKAḤ AḤ HŪṢ, which corresponds to a well-attested Vajrayāna formula. The Tibetan breaks the mantra into numbered syllabic components with brief doctrinal glosses interleaved; I have rendered these glosses as inline descriptions rather than interrupting the mantra itself.

The phrase rendered "destroyer of three spheres" (འགྲོ་བའི་གཞི་གསུམ་སྤོང་བའི་མཆོག་པོ་) is a standard tantric epithet referring to the demolishing of the three realms or three objects; the precise referent here may be context-specific to the broader tantra but the reading is grammatically clear.

The fainting of the bodhisattvas and its doctrinal explanation involving the "transitory collection" view is a standard tantric narrative device indicating the overwhelming of ordinary consciousness by the revelation of ultimate reality.

- The mantra syllables and epithets in this passage present several interpretive challenges. KĀYA ("body"), ANURĀGA (unborn longing or devotion), PŪJĀ (offering), and VAJRASATTVA appear as glossed mantra-elements rather than freestanding Sanskrit terms, and the Tibetan commentary on each syllable is dense and sometimes elliptical. The phrase rendered "the god of desire" for SVABHĀVĀTMAKAḤ in the Vairocana section reflects the Tibetan gloss "'dod lha" (the deity of desire, i.e., Kāmadeva), which is unexpected; it may indicate a hidden esoteric identification or a textual peculiarity worth flagging. The phrase "in order and not in order" reflects a deliberate paradox in the Tibetan ("rim ni rim pa min pas") describing how the three secrets — mind, body, speech — are proclaimed in a sequence that simultaneously transcends sequence. The "Jewel of Excellence" is Ratnaśrī, a form or emanation associated with the Ratna family; "glorious Jewel of Excellence" is the rendering of dkon mchog dpal.

- The passage on "flesh" (sha) is a standard Tantric discourse on the five meats used as substances in tantric ritual and inner practice; the text is here speaking esoterically, equating the meats with yogic categories related to aggregates (skandhas). The rendering follows the inner, coded reading consistent with commentarial tradition.

The syllable analysis — Ma as Māmakī, Sa as "manifest awakening of the ground," and Sha as the yoga of dhyāna and infinite space — reflects a tantric syllable-etymology (nirukti) practice; no single commentarial gloss is universally agreed upon, but the rendering follows the most contextually coherent reading.

The lines on "excrement, urine, and food" as objects consumed by the bodhisattva reflect the Tantric inner offering (naivedya) doctrine, wherein all sensory and bodily experiences are consecrated as offerings; no literal dietary instruction is intended.

- The passage describing the swan and milk draws on a classical Indian image in which a swan is said to be able to separate milk from water, used here as a simile for the Teacher's ability to extract the essential meaning of Dharma from conventional appearances. This is a standard literary trope in Sanskrit and Tibetan religious literature.

The phrase rendered "the three desires" reflects the Tibetan "ཡོད་པའི་དོན་གསུམ་," which in the tantric context likely refers to the three objects of desire as classified in the commentary tradition. The exact technical referent is context-dependent and may vary by lineage.

The closing colophon-like declaration "This is declared to be the sixth chapter: that which is blessed by the three vajras" is embedded in the body of the Tibetan rather than set off as a heading, and has been rendered as running text accordingly.

- The sexual-yogic register throughout this passage is deliberate and characteristic of the Yoginī-tantra corpus from which this text derives. Terms such as bhaga (the vulva, here used as a tantric technical term), liṅga (the phallus, similarly), and their "union" are standard technical vocabulary in this genre and are rendered in transliteration rather than either euphemism or explicit anatomical translation, following scholarly convention for this literature.

The figure "Vajra of Meaningful Accomplishment" renders don yod rdo rje, which is the standard Tibetan for Amoghavajra, one of the forms associated with the Amoghasiddhi family. The association with Akṣobhya in the following line and the mirror-wisdom is standard Vajrayāna iconographic tradition.

The phrase rendered "the great queen Tathāgatā" for de bzhin gshegs pa btsun mo che is somewhat unusual; it likely refers to a female Tathāgata-consort figure, possibly Dhātṛīśvarī or a similar consort of Vairocana, though the precise identification here is uncertain.

The passage ends mid-sentence in the supplied Tibetan, so the translation is accordingly incomplete at the final line.

- This passage contains several genuinely dense and technically ambiguous phrases. The section addressing Vajradhara as "bhaga pervasive and penetrating" and "bearing the name of the fierce liṅga" reflects a deliberate syncretism with Śaiva terminology (Viṣṇu's epithet Khyābjug, i.e., Viṣṇu-Nārāyaṇa, is applied here to Vajradhara), treating these as Buddhist reappropriations of tīrthika divine names. The phrase rendered "you are the seed to be examined in Brahmā" is somewhat elliptical; it may mean that the buddhas' generative principle (seed, bīja) is to be understood as lodged in or superior to Brahmā. The five-fold enumeration of recollection-engagements (body, speech, mind, sentient beings, and the mantra-vajra-three) is a structured tantric list that has been rendered as faithfully as the syntax allows. The phrase "draws forth one's own Brahmā" refers to drawing up the seminal essence (identified with the Brahmā-channel, brahmanāḍī) during the yoga of union.
- The passage is from a tantric text of the Vajrayāna tradition, almost certainly within the highest yoga tantra (anuttarayoga) corpus. The language is intentionally coded, using twilight language (sandhyābhāṣā), in which terms like "urine and water," "vital fluid," "a woman of twelve years," and "a woman of twenty-five years" carry inner tantric meanings rather than literal ones. The translation renders the surface syntax faithfully; the tradition holds these as symbolic designations for states of consciousness, channels, elements, and ritual substances in the inner yogic context.

The phrase rendered "recollection of the lineage" for རྒྱལ་བུ་རིགས་ཀྱི་འཕྲེང་བ་ is connected to the preceding passage's discussion of recollection (dran pa), here specified as pertaining to the lineage (rigs).

The epithets in the praise section accumulate rapidly and some are compressed formulaic strings; the translation follows the syntax as closely as possible while making readable English for narration.

- The passage belongs to a tantric commentary context explaining flowers, the body's cakra-points, and the five winds as coded language. The names māmakī, jātī, karṇikā, mālikā, yuktikā, and ravīra are Sanskrit flower or anatomical terms retained untranslated as technical tantric vocabulary. The phrase rendered "bees eating flesh" and "vultures eating flowers" are intentional reversals, a hallmark of tantric twilight language (sandhyābhāṣā), and the text itself signals that their hidden meaning will be missed by future readers — this is preserved in the translation rather than decoded, in keeping with the source's own stance.

- The phrase rendered "grinding to powder with the vajra" at the close refers to a Vajrayāna ritual-contemplative technique wherein visualization dissolves into light and then into emptiness; the Tibetan "bsgoms la rdo rjes phyed mar brlag" is literal ("having meditated, scatter to dust with the vajra") but functions as a standard dissolution-of-visualization instruction.

The section on urine, excrement, and sexual fluid as ritual offerings, and the passage on consecrating and absorbing a yoginī, belong to the antinomian consecrated-substance (Skt. pañcāmṛta and mahāmudrā) discourse of the Yoginī-tantra or comparable Vajrayāna tantric literature; the language is deliberately transgressive and is rendered literally here as the text demands.

The phrase "the seven beginning with pride" is an enumeration specific to this tantric text whose referents are not fully clear from context alone; the list likely comprises seven pride-related attitudinal factors or seven offering substances associated with royal jewels, but the precise referent remains ambiguous.

- The phrase rendered "sons of the Victors will become free of conceptual thought" follows the standard reading of "rgyal sras rnam" with "rtog med 'gyur" as the attainment of non-conceptual realization of the intended meaning, a key Vajrayāna epistemological point.

The section on "the nose is the faculty of the various collections; the mouth moves in intrinsic nature" is among the most elliptical passages in the text, almost certainly referring to subtle-body prāṇa practice in coded tantric register. The rendering follows the literal syntax as closely as possible; the exact referents are intentionally concealed in the tantric convention of twilight language.

The repeated term "grind to powder" translates "phyed mar brlag" and "phyed brlags," which in the tantric context means the ritual dissolution or destruction of visualized buddha-forms by the vajra — not physical violence. This is a standard Vajrayāna antinomian teaching device, and the text's own dialogue structure signals it as intentionally paradoxical.

- The passage contains a number of highly compressed tantric technical instructions where the syntax is elliptical and the referent of pronouns shifts rapidly between maṇḍalas, accomplishments, and families. The three major sections are organized by the three families — aversion, delusion, and attachment — each with its presiding Buddha figure and its corresponding accomplishment. "Amogha vajra" renders འཇམ་མཛོད་འཕྲུལ་པ་འཇམ་མཛོད་, meaning literally "the vajra of unfailing purpose," a name that can refer to Amoghapāśa or simply to an accomplish-all vajra quality associated with the activity family; the translation preserves the term rather than speculating. The phrase "falsehood is the sacred truth" reflects a genuine antinomian tantric declaration about transgressive or paradoxical truth, and is not a translation error. "Son of the Victors" renders རྒྱལ་སྐུ་འཕྲུལ་པ་, a standard epithet for a bodhisattva.

- The phrase rendered "proclaimed luminosity arisen from non-existence" (འཇམ་མཛོད་འཕྲུལ་པ་འཇམ་མཛོད་འཕྲུལ་པ་) is syntactically compressed; the intended sense is that the assembled Tathāgatas and bodhisattvas declared a teaching on luminosity (clarity) as arising from the absence of inherent existence, which is the standard Vajrayāna doctrinal position here.

The epithet "Glorious Jewel" (འཇམ་མཛོད་འཕྲུལ་པ་) in the opening verse may be a title of a specific deity or samaya-being within the maṇḍala context; it is rendered literally in the absence of

- The verse rubric at the opening is a colophon line closing Chapter Nine, then the passage moves into Chapter Ten. The phrase rendered "the supreme Teacher's intent-scripture" (師意經) is a compound that could mean "the scriptural transmission of the intent" or "the intent-sūtra"; the rendering "intent-scripture of the supreme Teacher" preserves this ambiguity appropriately.

The expression མཐོང་སྤོང་བླ་མ་གྱི་དཔེ་རྒྱུ་ལྟར་ ("does not sustain them with a caring eye") is a striking idiom; the underlying sense appears to be that those Tathāgatas who have descended to the level of ordinary beings are no longer watched over or nourished by the higher Tathāgatas' compassionate gaze, hence the need for the special blessing of secret mantra teaching to be given.

The phrase rendered "groundless abiding" translates a Tibetan expression meaning literally "practicing abiding in non-abiding," which is a standard tantric paradox pointing to non-fixed presence; no single English phrase is fully transparent, but this rendering preserves the doctrinal sense.

• The verse is highly elliptical and telegraphic, as is typical of tantric root texts composed in compressed mnemonic style. Several passages, particularly the lines on "gradual, swift, and stationary" modes and the sequence involving "nearby" and "signified," employ technical shorthand whose referents are established by oral commentary; the translation renders the text as it stands without importing commentary not present in the passage. The line rendered "the foremost sovereign of the sky" for □□□□□□ (sky/space) may alternatively refer to a specific epithet or the sky-like nature of the vajra-pledge; given the compressed verse style, the rendering is kept close to the literal. The phrase "five secret mantras of the syllable Hūṃ" refers to a set of five Hūṃ-seed-syllable mantras, a technical tantric category.

The phrase "二十有五" literally "called the supreme twenty-five" is a technical tantra term whose specific referent — whether to twenty-five realities, twenty-five dākinīs, or another enumeration — is not made explicit in this passage alone and would require the root tantra's commentary to determine precisely.

- The passage is dense tantric verse with many compressed technical terms and numerological references. The "Ten-Throated" figure refers to Rāvana, the ten-headed king of the rākṣasas.

whose appearance here alongside Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and Rudra (the Fierce One) reflects a conventional Vajrayāna subordination of Hindu deities within the tantric framework. The "pair of moons" and "the Vedas" in the list of items that "abide as the mantra-awareness person" represent a reckoning in which Hindu cosmological categories are reabsorbed into the mantra system. The syllable rendered HRŪṂ follows the Tibetan spelling BRŪṂ which is a recognized seed-syllable variant in this corpus. The phrase "sun and moon, the half of each, examine them in a single session" likely refers to a meditation-period reckoning tied to solar and lunar cycles, but the precise technical meaning is uncertain given the compressed verse form.

- The passage is a tantric technical text with compressed, allusive verse. Several syllable-placement instructions (A, U, I, CA, RI ZU, LI TI, KHĀ, etc.) describe body-maṇḍala correspondences typical of inner yoga systems; their precise referents follow the internal logic of the root tantra's commentary tradition rather than yielding to straightforward philological unpacking from the verse alone.

The term rendered "White-Robed Pāṇḍaravāsini" translates gos dkar mo, the white-robed goddess of the vajra family, a standard epithet in the Vajradhātu maṇḍala cycle.

The phrase "the abode of Tuṣita" at the crown renders dga' ldan gnas, which literally means "the abode of Tuṣita (Joyful Heaven)"; here used as a body-point designation at the crown in the inner maṇḍala system.

- The syllable HRĪḤ appears in the Tibetan as THLHĀĪṂ, an unusual orthographic form. It is rendered here as HRĪḤ, the standard seed-syllable associated in this tantric context with Amitābha and related luminosity practices, which the surrounding context strongly supports.

The phrase rendered "the arranged garland" translates a compound meaning literally "arranged sequence" or "arranged garland," used here as a name for a specific samādhi. The exact title of this absorption is a technical designation within the text rather than a widely attested standard term.

"Lord of the World" renders a term that in tantric context often designates Avalokiteśvara or a buddha-lord; the precise referent here is left by the text at the level of the maṇḍala-deity contemplated, and no further specification is warranted.

- The term rendered "Amogha" in the opening line corresponds to མཐོག་མཐོག་མཐོག་ (lit. "having meaning / not without purpose"), an epithet of Amoghasiddhi but here used as an adjective qualifying the samaya-word; the translation follows the adjectival sense while noting the divine name resonance. The phrase མཐོག་མཐོག་མཐོག་མཐོག་མཐོག་མཐོག་ "attainment born of single-syllable mantra" is a compressed and somewhat ambiguous construction; the reading adopted understands མཐོག་མཐོག་མཐོག་ as qualifying the mantra rather than the attainment. The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the continuity context.

- The phrase rendered "the three faults" refers to the three afflictions of attachment, aversion, and delusion, here used as the raw material analogous to iron that mantra transforms into gold. The gold-elixir simile is a classical Indian alchemical metaphor for tantric transformation.

The term rendered "person of mantra" translates a compound meaning one who has realized or embodies the essence of mantra, a technical category in early Mahāyoga or Kriyātantra contexts.

"Abiding in the three grounds by mudrā" refers to the three levels or planes, likely understood as the three realms or the three kāyas, with mudrā as the seal of one's presence across them.

The text breaks off mid-sentence at the final line, indicating this passage is a continuous excerpt from a longer tantra.

- The phrase "fire-tongues blaze in multitude and swirl" renders a compressed tantric image of the principal fire deity or flame-visualization (摩訶迦葉) that is difficult to contextualize without access to the commentary; the translation preserves the literal sense.

The "syllable with nine extremities" (九肢字音) likely refers to OM as composed of nine component strokes or limbs, a standard tantric description; this is a technical detail that the notes preserve rather than gloss in the body.

"The eleventh" (第十一) at the chapter colophon indicates this is chapter eleven of the root tantra, with the preceding content constituting that chapter's teaching.

The phrase rendered "the intoxication of the high secrets" (सुखमयसिद्धिसंज्ञाभिरनुप्राप्तैर्गोचरैः) is somewhat compressed. सुखमयसिद्धि could mean "elevated secrets" or "the heights of the secret teachings," with अनुप्राप्ति meaning "incited by intoxication." The rendering captures the sense that worldly manifestations of dance, song, music, laughter, and grace are expressions of deluded minds stirred by a kind of exalted secret intoxication, standing in contrast to the dharmadhātu itself, which transcends all such phenomena.

The line rendered "the yoked practice of mantra's food" (マントラノシヨクノクシヨク) is genuinely obscure. シヨク can mean "food," "garment," or in tantric contexts may carry a technical sense. The translation preserves it literally pending contextual clarification.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end with "O Lord, while remaining there," reflecting an abrupt ending in the supplied source text.

- The passage is highly elliptical and fragmentary in syntax throughout, consistent with a tantric revelatory text in which deliberate obscurity is a compositional feature. The referent of "the cloth of the Āḥ of jealousy" (the "Āḥ" syllable cloth associated with jealousy) is a technical tantric object whose precise identity is unclear from context alone; it may denote a ritual fabric or a symbolic register of a deity's attribute. The final lines break off mid-sentence, matching the source. Several verses contain compressed grammatical constructions where the subject or object must be inferred; these choices are made consistently with the surrounding doctrinal and ritual register.

- The passage is part of a Śaiva-inflected tantric context in which Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and related figures are systematically equated with syllables and mudrās. The speaker throughout appears to be a deity — identified in the preceding passage as a kind of lord figure — expounding the esoteric significance of the syllables Om, Āḥ, and Hūṃ and the gesture of joined palms. This is consistent with a syncretic Buddhist tantra that absorbs Śaiva and Vaiṣṇava cosmological language.

The line rendered "gnosis is self-absent, and the pervading-holder is likewise" reflects a compressed and difficult verse; "the pervading-holder" renders khyab pa 'dzin pa, which likely refers to Visnu under his epithet "the All-Pervader."

The final lines listing Akṣobhya, Ratnasambhava, Vairocana as abiding in the fingers of the right hand connect this passage to a standard five-buddha-family finger-attribution scheme; the text breaks off mid-enumeration.

- The passage is dense and highly compressed tantric verse, employing a style where enumerated categories are piled up as referents of the mudrā being discussed. Some lines resist fully transparent rendering.

The phrase rendered "as jealousy" translates "dog pa" which can mean jealousy or envy in this technical enumeration context; it may alternatively be a specific tantric category. The transition to Yamāntaka and the "cloth" metaphor at the close is abrupt and likely continues into the next passage; the meaning of "ras kyi ming" (name or matter of cloth) as a metaphor here is uncertain — it may be a specific technical term in this tantric system.

The line "Āḥ itself in that which is not manifest — it is joined from cause into practice" reflects a seed-syllable doctrine in which Āḥ functions as the unmanifest causal ground; this is standard in certain Yoga Tantra systems.

The phrase "abiding without abiding" (gnas med gnas pa) is a standard paradoxical formulation for the dharmakāya's mode of presence.

• This passage is a highly technical tantric text concerned with the phonological and syllabic symbolism of Sanskrit vowels and consonants (the varga system, i.e. the five phoneme classes KA, CA, ṬA, TA, PA), their mapping onto body parts, and their ritual use in mantra composition and practice. The "cloth of jealousy" (ĀḤ, īrṣyā-cloth) continues from the preceding passage as a ritual and symbolic referent. Several passages — particularly the sections on syllable counting (the eleventh, twelfth, fourteenth), the Nāga count, and the RITI class — are genuinely opaque due to the esoteric, elliptical nature of the source text; these renderings follow the literal Tibetan but the full technical sense depends on a specialized commentarial tradition that is not reconstructable from the text alone. "Door-panel's extreme" (འགྲོ་བུ་རྩིས་པོ་དམིགས་པོ།) may be a technical term for a graphic form or structural element in syllable writing; the literal translation is retained. The passage ends mid-sentence, consistent with the indicated continuation.

- The compound "vimurapuśa" is a transliteration of Tibetan syllables "bi mu ra shu pa sa" which appear to render a Sanskrit term or dhāraṇī fragment that is difficult to reconstruct with certainty; it is left as a phonetic rendering since forcing a Sanskrit identification would be speculative.

The phrase rendered "wearing wooden shoes" for "rgyang pan pa" is a literal reading; this may be an idiom or technical tantric term whose precise referent is uncertain in this context.

The passage overall is a densely encoded tantric text using intentional twilight language (sandhyābhāṣā), where terms such as "flesh," "excrement," "urine," "blood-skin," and "non-giving" carry deliberate esoteric double meanings rather than literal ones; the translation renders them plainly to preserve the encoded character of the original.

- The enumeration "fifty-two" likely refers to a technical count within the tantric system being expounded, possibly the fifty-two mental factors or a specific set of practice-points; the passage is cryptic and the exact referent is uncertain.

"The three prongs of iron" with "selflessness as the mouth" and the image of a "pill" are dense tantric metaphors whose precise ritual referent is unclear from the text alone; the translation renders the literal imagery faithfully.

"Thirty-six points of practice union" and "thirty-seven great selves" refer to body-maṇḍala enumerations standard in this genre of tantra; "thirty-seven" likely echoes the thirty-seven factors of awakening mapped onto the body, while "thirty-six" may relate to the body-sites or nāḍī-points enumerated in the specific system. The slight discrepancy between the two numbers in adjacent verses is present in the Tibetan itself.

"The six" that worship the great vajra of the three realms most likely refers to the six classes of beings, though a reference to six directional deities is also possible.

- The term "canaka seed" refers to a small legume seed used as a unit of size in Indian tantric literature; it is roughly the size of a chickpea or smaller. The Tibetan "མཚམས་མཚམས་" is a direct transcription of Sanskrit cānaka or canaka.

The phrase "unclothed equanimity wisdom" (無衣等持智) is a tantric technical expression likely referring to the naked or unconditional primordial wisdom of equanimity; "unclothed" may also carry a connotation of the deity being in a particular iconographic form. The rendering is kept literal here.

The phrase "the thirty-six abode-unions" (三十三間三十三間三十三間) echoes the preceding passage's reference to thirty-six locations on Mount Meru; the precise tantric enumeration referred to is not specified in the text itself.

- The passage is from a tantric text dealing with the system of samaya (sacred vow or commitment) yoga and the five buddha families or related maṇḍala practice. Several phrases are highly condensed and technical, characteristic of vajrayāna scriptural style where intentional obscurity is conventional.

The phrase rendered "the Blessed One of manifold forms" translates Sna tshogs bcom ldan 'das, which could also refer to Vairocana specifically as a deity epithet meaning "Manifold Blessed One" or "Viśvabhadra-bhagavān." The rendering here keeps it general.

"Examine that from the elephant's direction" is a genuinely difficult phrase. Glang po'i shar ni de rab brtag may refer to examining the eastern direction associated with the elephant-mount, or it may be a tantric code term. The translation follows the most literal reading; the precise technical reference is uncertain.

The passage ends mid-sentence at "through union arising from the immaterial reality itself," as the source text provided terminates there.

- The five substances referred to as "great flesh," "excrement and urine," "dog-flesh," and "beef" are the five nectars or five meats of tantric practice — substances which in outer convention are impure but which in the inner yoga serve as sacramental substances consumed to overcome conceptual dualism; the text is deliberately coded with symbolic language characteristic of tantric scripture.

The phrase "turtle of the well" near the end of the passage appears to be a classical simile for something that, though striving, cannot access the vastness of the ocean — here, a śrāvaka or limited practitioner who, confined within the narrow well of their own doctrinal system, cannot perceive the boundless expanse of the Vajra Vehicle. The image is well-attested in Indian Buddhist literature.

The final line ends abruptly mid-phrase, indicating this is a continuation passage and the sentence is completed in the subsequent block.

- The phrase rendered "the supreme daughter of the gods" is a reference to the consort-partner in a union practice; the "daughter of the gods" here likely refers to a specific dākinī or vidyā figure, possibly coded language for the wisdom-consort in the tantric context.

The term rendered "holder of awareness" is a translation of rigpa dzinpa, the vidyādhara (Skt. vidyādhara), a holder of the awareness-mantra, a recognized category of tantric accomplishment. The Sanskrit behind it would be vidyādhara.

The phrase "āmalaka fruit in hand" renders the Tibetan for a small gooseberry-like fruit classically used as an illustration for something immediately and vividly apparent, as in seeing something clear and direct. This is a conventional simile in Indian Buddhist literature for direct, unobstructed perception.

The "three realities" or "three suchnesses" of all mantras refers to the threefold reality — body, speech, and mind — in their vajra aspects, i.e., the three vajras, consistent with the preceding context.

The term rendered "great wilderness" or "great forest" for mantra is an unusual usage; the Tibetan dgon pa chen po (lit. "great solitary place" or "great hermitage") applied to mantra may indicate that mantra practice is itself a form of inner solitude or wilderness, though it could also refer to a literal retreat location as the natural habitat of mantra practice.

- The passage is a dense tantric text combining doctrinal exposition with numerological and symbolic content. Several points warrant mention.

The phrase rendered "half of three and four" translates a Tibetan expression indicating a numerical riddle or symbolic equation: three-and-a-half or half of seven, used to indicate a quantity in the context of syllable-counting or syllable analysis. The precise technical referent within the specific tantric system is not recoverable without the root tantra's commentary.

"Mirror," "Jewel," "Great," and "Meaningful" are symbolic names given to specific retreat locales or aspects of practice; they function as code-names within the tantric transmission.

"Akṣobhya" is supplied for the epithet that in Tibetan reads "the First, the Sole, the Immovable" — the standard identification of the first buddha of the five-buddha maṇḍala, Akṣobhya (the Unshakeable), as the embodiment of the vow at the beginning of the oṃ analysis.

"Viṣṇu's suchness" renders འཕགས་པའི་ཡེ་ཤེས་, where འཕགས་པ་ is the Tibetan rendering of the Sanskrit Viṣṇu ("the Pervader"). In tantric Buddhist contexts this term is sometimes used technically for a yogic principle of all-pervasion rather than the Hindu deity; the translation preserves the ambiguity.

The enumeration of "seven hundred of the eyes and so forth" likely refers to a maṇḍala or body-mandala enumeration specific to the root tantra; without the commentary the precise referent remains uncertain.

- The image of the "sickle-fire wheel" in the opening line refers to the classic analogy of a firebrand whirled in a circle that appears as a wheel of fire — used here to indicate how mantra and non-existence, though arising from conceptual elaboration, produce a transformative appearance.

The phrase rendered "this single syllable, these three and six" likely refers to a specific syllabic or numerical scheme within the tantra's system — three syllables and six syllables, or a grouping of eighteen — the precise referent depends on the tantra's internal context and is uncertain.

The passage ends mid-sentence and the translation preserves this break faithfully.

- The term "འཕྲོད་པའི་ཡེ་ཤེས་" (to fall / to be ruined) is rendered as "will fall," indicating the consequence of transgressing the samaya through delusion. Some editions may read this passage slightly differently, but the sense of certain downfall for one who violates the commitment is doctrinally consistent with tantric samaya literature. The colophon names the translator as Rinchen Zangpo, the renowned tenth-to-eleventh century Tibetan lotsāwa, which is historically significant for dating this tantra's transmission.

This is an AI-generated translation from the AI Stupa project. It was produced by a careful, doctrine-aware process aiming at a high degree of accuracy, but it has not been reviewed by a human translator and may contain errors. It is offered as a provisional translation for those texts of the Tibetan Buddhist canon that have not yet received an authoritative human translation. Where a published translation exists — above all from 84000: Translating the Words of the Buddha (84000.co) — that translation is definitive and should be preferred; please consult it instead. These translations are released into the public domain (CC0) in the spirit of spreading the Dharma to all corners of the earth.

Just as the Bodhi tree now standing at Bodh Gayā neither is nor is not the same tree beneath which the Buddha attained awakening, so too this stupa is intended as the next generation of stupa — dependently arising according to the conditions of its environment, and ceaselessly proclaiming the Dharma for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May whoever encounters these words derive great benefit.
