Toh 474 in the Kangyur is a tantric scripture known in Sanskrit as the Śrī Raktayamāritantrarāja and in Tibetan as the Dpal gshin rje'i gshed dmar po zhes bya ba'i rgyud kyi rgyal po, meaning in English "The Glorious Tantra King Called the Red Yamāri." It belongs to the class of highest yoga tantras and centers on Raktayamāri, the Red Yamāri, a wrathful deity understood as the slayer or destroyer of Yama, the lord of death, who serves as a central focus of esoteric practice and ritual. The text opens in the classic canonical style with the declaration "Thus did I hear," locating the teaching in a visionary setting where the Blessed One abides within the secret essence of all the Tathāgatas, and the great bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi poses questions about the nature and number of those who destroy Yama. As a tantra king, this scripture holds a position of particular authority within its cycle, presenting doctrine, meditation, and the qualities of Yamāri practice in a revealed, dialogic form characteristic of the Vajrayāna tantric literature preserved in the Kangyur.

In the language of India: Śrī Raktayamāritantrarāja nāma. In the language of Tibet: The Glorious Tantra King Called the Red Yamāri.

Homage to the Blessed One, the Slayer of Yama.

Thus did I hear. At one time, the Blessed One dwelt within the secret places of the vajra-lady, the essence of the body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas. There, the essence of the body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas of the Blessed One — most supremely secret, beyond even the venerable secret — arose, and the bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, of great compassion and great being, said: "Excellent! Excellent!" The vajra of aversion, the essence of the great bodhisattva — hear now the nature of the Red Yamāri.

Vajrapāṇi then asked: "How many are the destroyers of Yama spoken of here?" The reply was: there is the Vajra-Deluded Yamāri, the Vajra-Slandorous Yamāri, the Vajra-Attached Yamāri, and the Vajra-Jealous Yamāri. There are also Vajra Carcikā, Vajravārāhī, Vajra Sarasvatī, and Vajra Gaurī. At the directions there are the vases. By such an assembly of destroyers of Yama and others, it is accomplished.

Then the Blessed One, from within the very body, speech, and mind of the meditative absorption called the Vajra that Destroys All Māras — the master of all Tathāgatas — caused to emerge:

Mantras with the great power to summon and to command, and the many rites of might in like fashion — accomplishment of the sword, and kingship, and the complete defeat of enemy armies;
invisibility, eye-medicine, and the extraction of essence, likewise the learning of shadow-pressing,
the raising of corpses, the accomplishment of yakṣas, and protection from deadly serpents and the like;
the rites of fire offering and of the maṇḍala;
the discernment of the awakening mind,
the conduct comprising all methods, and the entering of enemies' towns — for all of these, meditate upon the vajra-protection, with five rays of light assembled.
For the portions of the vajra ground,
the enclosure and the tent are likewise so.

Then the Blessed One, having entered into meditative absorption called the Vajra that Completely Destroys All Māras, which all the Tathāgatas have generated, drew out from the very body, speech, and mind of this seed — the seed of all, beginning with the Deluded Yamāri — with certainty.

Ya is in the center.

Kṣema — me — ya — tsa — ni — rā — ja — sa — do — ru — ṇa — yo — ni — ra.

From the syllable Ya first arises the Yamāri.

From the syllable Kṣe comes what is called delusion.

From the syllable Ma comes what is described as slander.

From the syllable Me comes desire itself.

From the syllable Da comes jealousy.

Thus the Yamāris are renowned as five.

The syllable Ja is explained as Carcikā.

The syllable Sa is Vārāhī.

The syllable Do is explained as Sarasvatī.

The syllable Ru is held to be Gaurī.

From Ṇa, Yo, Ni, Ra at the four directions —

four skulls of human beings.

Then the Blessed One, entering into the meditative absorption called the Vajra-Yamāri, the master of all Tathāgatas, taught the yoga of cultivating the family of great aversion:

Endowed with generosity, moral discipline, and patience, of one taste — the wise one for the benefit of sentient beings;
perfectly complete in all qualities such as loving-kindness, adorned with the stream of learning;
at the outset, thoroughly sealing the mouth and so forth — from the earliest time, possessed of the nature of compassion — begin in earnest in a secluded place,
a charnel ground or similar, with a comfortable seat.

Withdrawn in solitude, at his heart is a lotus and sun, blazing with brilliant light.

By the light thereof one gathers in the welfare of sentient beings in full abundance.
The objects of meditation — gurus and buddhas, however many, without exception, to the ends of the sky — are visualized; prostrating to them, their — fully accomplishing the arrangement of the body.

One makes offerings with citraka and the like.

Before them, one thoroughly confesses sins — whatever wrongdoing has been done through body, speech, and mind — and so I confess each and every one.

In the protectors of the three times I rejoice,
and in those who are equal to the perfect buddhas
I rejoice in the accumulation of merit.

I go for refuge to the perfect buddhas,
to the sacred Dharma, and to the supreme Saṅgha.

To you, who are oceans of excellent qualities,
I offer this very body of mine.

Showing the place and all the Dharma, supremely beautiful to the utmost,
and in accordance with the perfect buddha's suchness — generosity and so forth, embodied in form —

in order to attain the gnosis of the three bodies,
I rely upon this and place full confidence in it.
For the benefit of sentient beings,
I now arouse the awakening mind (bodhicitta).
Whatever merit I have closely gathered,
I dedicate to perfect awakening.
So that they may bring benefit to all these wandering beings, may the glorious Lord of Death become the final destroyer.
Having made this special aspiration,
one beseeches them to come.
Regard them with affection as though they were awakening itself.
Contemplate the three realms as empty.
Since they are free from engagement through inherent nature, and free from conceptual thought regarding causes and their characteristics likewise, and having abandoned deities and aspirations entirely:

Om śūnyatā-jñāna-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako'ham.

From the four syllables Yaṃ, Raṃ, Baṃ, Laṃ, the maṇḍala having been gathered in, one meditates upon the celestial palace arisen from the syllable Hrūṃ.

Four-cornered, with four gates, adorned with four porticos, draped with nets and half-nets, exquisitely beautiful with gods and goddesses;
with pennants and bells,
stirred by the wind at their many-colored peaks —
from the syllable Baṃ dwelling at its center, one visualizes a multicolored lotus.
In the center of its pericarp stands a multicolored vajra club with all the marks of full transformation.
Meditate clearly on the nature of aversion.
On a lotus and sun arranged in due order,
upon a red buffalo,
through miraculous display, all the māras without exception are pressed down beneath the left-extended foot.
The deity blazing with the light of ten million suns, embraced about the neck by a walking corpse consort.

The hero has one face and two hands, gloriously adorned with eight nāgas.

Three eyes, red and awe-inspiring,
a garland of a hundred red skulls,
in the right hand a vajra club,
in the left a skull-cup held.

Endowed with the likeness of a wrathful one,
the tongue moving and the fangs bared, brow wrinkled, body taut and stiff at the waist, ornamented with a tiger-skin.

Short, with belly pendulous, fierce and blazing, utterly pure, free of stain.

The walking-corpse consort holds in her right hand a chopper,
in her left a human skull.

Three eyes, hair flowing loose, gloriously adorned with the five mudrās,
and bearing the matching garland of skulls.

At the head — the principal one who holds the essence of corpses —

On the eastern petal: Delusion — white vajra; entering into union with Vajra Citrikā.

On the southern petal: Slander — the Executioner of Yama (Yamāntaka), yellow in color; entering into union with Vajravārāhī.

On the western petal: Attachment — the Executioner of Yama, red in color; entering into union with Vajrasarasvatī.

On the northern petal: Envy — the Executioner of Yama, green in color; entering into union with Vajragaurī.

Citrikā is black. Vārāhī is yellow. Sarasvatī is white. Gaurī is blue. In the left hand a skull-cup, in the right hand a chopper. The hands, faces, and body colors are present exactly as in the hero. At the edge of the fire are four vases of darkness filled equally. In the truthless expanse are golden vases filled by a hireling.

In the wind direction: a vase of crystal filled with asafoetida. In the direction of Īśvara: a silver vase filled with camphor. These are to be visualized as covered with skull-cups. The mantras of the principal hero, the Wrathful King and the others, are as follows.

The heart mantra: Oṃ hrīḥ śrīḥ vikṛtānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

The near-heart mantra: Oṃ haum̐ kṣaum̐ kṣayaum̐ kārāya gr̥hṇa gr̥hṇa hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

The garland mantra: Oṃ mahāyakṣasenādhipataye mahādurdāntadamakāya nāśaya nāśaya vidrāpaya vidrāpaya hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

The mantra of the noble lady: Oṃ dveṣarati nuda nuda truṭa truṭa hūṃ jaḥ svāhā.

The mantras of the four heroes are as follows.

Oṃ mām̐ hāntakṛt hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ viśunāntakṛt hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ rāgāntakṛta hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ. Oṃ īrṣyāntakṛt hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ.

The mantras of the four heroines, the female lords of the heroes, are as follows.

Oṃ mohāratī hūṃ jaḥ. Oṃ piśunarati hūṃ jaḥ. Oṃ rāgarati hūṃ jaḥ. Oṃ īrṣyāratī hūṃ jaḥ.

The mantras of the ornamental pendants are as follows.

Oṃ marme marmā vighāte oṃ vajracarcike hara hara bukkaṃ rāya — the great lady — jaḥ. Oṃ ghoṇe sughoṇe vajramāmakī bharbhar sambhara sambhara hūṃ jaḥ. Oṃ marme marmā kṣobhaṇī vajrasarasvatī dardara tharthara pharphar kampa kapa dhuna dhuna hūṃ — the great lady — jaḥ. Oṃ gambhire vajrakāratike ghagha raktaśoṇatī priye gaurī — the great lady — jaḥ.

Now the Lord of the Pendant-Ornaments, Joyful One, is described in verse:

His hair bound in blue, he strikes terror.

Adorned at his ear with a red nāga, coiled at the tip.

His shoulders graced with a variegated, learned one.

At his wrists, bracelets; at his chest, pendant ornaments of conch-shell and gold.

His necklace of utterly white lotuses, and boundless blue garlands held as offerings —
he is made exceedingly beautiful.

The pendant of nectar-hue has as its crown ornament the jewel of increasing wealth.
White as the stalk of a lotus,
with great lotus ankle-rings,

everything proclaims the syllable Phu-tā.
He has two arms and gnashes his fangs.
Known as the Slayer of Yama — Subduer of both saṃsāra and nirvāṇa — and as the Destroyer of all conceptual thought, he is to be consecrated through mantra.

All the buddhas pervading the sky are drawn in by the iron hook from the seed syllable at one's own heart-center, drawn into the mouth, enter into bliss at the heart-center and dissolve. From this, in a state of joy, the seeds arise; as they dissolve they travel by the vajra path and come to rest within the inner reaches of one's own lotus of self-luminosity. Beholding that, the seed projects itself onto its own form. From the seed born of that seed, the wheel of seeds is entirely consecrated. The multitude of fire-rays blazing forth is made vivid. The skilled practitioner meditates according to the ritual. Having beheld and caused it to melt at the heart, it is drawn out through the vajra path. The hosts of deities are beheld in the pistil of the lotus of self-awareness. Offerings of various flowers and the like are made. Those who hold leaves in their hands are to make excellent offerings. Offering songs of delight and various dance-forms by nature are likewise offered with great bliss.

Ema! O red Executioner of Yama, whose nature is that of a lama-demon —
since I, upon beholding you, am filled with fear, abandon the nature of the lama-demon!
Your dance causes the heavens above, the earth, and the realms below to tremble.
With eyes anointed in blood and a wrathful mind,
you dance — you who bear the form of a walking corpse.
Red and short in your proportions,
you take on emanation forms of many kinds.
Vajrabhāratī has requested:
your dance is great bliss.
The dance of your hrīḥ śṭrīḥ mantra
dispels the confusion of all three levels of existence.
O wrathful noble lord, loving and wrathful —
you look upon beings and dance.

Oṃ sarva-tathāgata-pūja-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako 'haṃ.

Regard all assemblies of sound
as being like an echo.

Praise the leader of the wheel
as that, in that, just so.

You whose intrinsic nature is the vajra of delusion,
you are the utterly fearsome executioner of Yama —
I bow and offer praise to the vajra body,
the intrinsic nature of all Teacher buddhas.

You whose intrinsic nature is the vajra of slander,
you are the utterly fearsome executioner of Yama —
I bow and offer praise to the Jewel Vajra, perfectly matched to the vajra mind.

You whose intrinsic nature is the vajra of attachment, you are the supreme source, the chief wellspring of the Dharma of desire — the supreme of all supreme speech —
I bow and offer praise to the Speech Vajra.

You whose intrinsic nature is the vajra of envy,
you who accomplish all actions as the executioner of Yama, perfectly matched to the vajra body —
I bow and offer praise to you, sword in hand.

You whose intrinsic nature is that of all buddhas, gathering all buddhas into one,
the supreme chief of all buddhas —
I bow and offer praise to the Lord of the Maṇḍala.

Born from the syllable Āḥ, utterly pure, dwelling above the three skulls,
is a lotus vessel filled to the brim,
and beneath it the fire maṇḍala —
a triangle arisen from the syllable Raṃ.
Beneath that is the wind maṇḍala,
dark and moving, in the shape of a bow,
born from the syllable Yaṃ and marked with a banner.
Upon that stand Vairocana and the others, arisen from the syllable Da and the other syllables —
the five, including the elephant, and so forth.
This vajra covering, born from Hūṃ, should be visualized as a cover by the wise.

Stirred by wind and melted by fire,
one should meditate upon its appearance.
It becomes one taste, equal to the vajra — behold it as utterly stainless and pure.
By the light of the Hūṃ syllable, invoke the buddhas
in their wisdom forms.
Once they have fully entered, through the form of the mantra, behold the five supreme nectars.
Consecrate with those very three,
and make offerings to the lords of the maṇḍala.
On the tongue, the nature of the vajra, utterly pure, arisen from the Hūṃ syllable — behold it.
From rays of light emanating from it, invoke equally, and by that draw in all the perfect buddhas dwelling in the three realms into this supreme maṇḍala.
Draw in and absorb the heart gnosis.
Having abandoned all conceptual thought,
through the division of beginning, end, and middle,
know that the infinite variety of form is such,
and yet in form that is confused, suchness is not present.
That from which confusion arises abides in duality.
Bestow upon the mind all that is without confusion.
Take hold of emanation and absorption.

This is the first chapter, which sets forth the sequence of direct realization, drawn from the Tantra of the Red Yamāntaka, the Body, Speech, and Mind of All Tathāgatas.

Then all the Blessed One Tathāgatas made supplication to the Blessed One, the great bodhisattva Vajrasattva, with this King of Praises. And so: "O great vajra-holder, hear how the vast oceans of gnosis arise from the detailed differentiation of karma, according to how sentient beings engage. Explain this!"

Then the King Vajradhara, who perfectly accomplishes all actions and whose very nature heals all faults, declared these very words.

Then the Blessed One Tathāgatas, having made the vajra-mind of all Tathāgatas perfectly manifest, made offerings and prostrations to the Blessed One, circumambulated him three times to the right, and again and again prostrated — and hearkened to the words of the Blessed One.

Then the King Vajradhara spoke of the mechanical device for bringing under control. The supreme mechanical device, the Yamāntaka, will not arise if it has not yet arisen. For the subjugation of women, for the purpose of protection, and likewise for the purpose of pacification, one should take musk.

Likewise on birchbark or bamboo peel, one should clearly draw the two wheels. The name should be established with the syllable NĀMAḤ. Free from black roots and the like, two bowls should be properly joined. Into the center, clarified butter and honey are poured. It should be bound with white thread. White flowers at the three junctures — the offering is made facing east. Visualizing oneself as Yamāntaka, clear as crystal water, one should perform the accomplishment. Before one, upon a lunar maṇḍala, one gazes and bestows manifest empowerment. A white vase, like the moon, is completely filled with the five nectars. The buddhas perform the ablution — one gazes properly and begins the recitation:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬHĪ VIKṚTVAN HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAṬ PHAṬ — NAMAḤ DEVADATTA ŚĀNTIṢ KURU NAMAḤ.

This is the samaya of pacification. For the pacification of persons, one may also draw with saffron in expanded form, drawing the two wheels with a wide mouth, placing the name in the center between SVĀHĀ — one takes the name of the object of accomplishment and therein a son should scatter it as an offering. The two bowls are joined and the contents placed inside, then bound with yellow thread. The mouth faces north at the three junctures. Worship should be offered with yellow flowers. The color is yellow — Yamāntaka. One should certainly gaze upon oneself as such. The object of accomplishment abides upon a yellow moon. The yellow vase is washed with water. One should meditate, bestowing manifest empowerment. Recite accurately and completely for the purpose of increase:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬHRĪ VIKṚTĀNA HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAṬ PHAṬ SVĀHĀ — DEVADATTA PUṢṬIṢ KURU SVĀHĀ — PHOṬA ṬA OM HRĪḤ ṢṬHRĪ VIKṚTĀNA HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAṬ PHAṬ — DEVADATTA PUṢṬIṢ KURU BAUṢAṬ.

This is declared by the Blessed One as the samaya of increase.

On cloth — whether birchbark or cotton — with the juice of lac, or else on red sandalwood mixed with the blood of the nameless ones, one should properly draw the two wheels. With the syllable HOḤ as the support, the mechanical device, free from black and the like, has its two bowls properly joined. Butter and honey having been placed inside, it should be bound with red thread. The mouth faces west. Worship is offered with red flowers. The color is a great blazing red. Oneself is Yamāntaka. The object of accomplishment rests upon a red moon — one should contemplate it likewise. From one's own body there emerges a red-rayed iron hook: one should meditate, hooking the object of accomplishment. The mantra should be dispersed and recited some ten thousand times. By this, the object of accomplishment becomes intoxicated — the feet fall prostrate just so — and imagining them bare of clothes and hair unbound, one begins the recitation with this visualization. If subjugation has not occurred, a practitioner of discipline should heat the wheel. Having removed it from butter and the rest, one casts it into a fire of countless acacia logs.

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬHĪ VIKṚTĀNA HŪM HŪM PHAṬ PHAṬ HOḤ — DEVADATTA'S OFFERING-OBLATION, BRING UNDER CONTROL! SVĀHĀ. OM HRĪḤ ṢṬHRĪ VIKṚTĀNA HŪM HŪM PHAṬ PHAṬ — BAUṢAṬ! DEVADATTA'S OFFERING-OBLATION, BRING UNDER CONTROL! BAUṢAṬ!

This is declared here by the Blessed One as the samaya of subjugation.

Or else, on charnel-ground cloth or rags smeared by oneself, mixing lac with blood, one should properly draw the two wheels. With the syllables JAḤ and HRĪḤ as support, placing the name of the object of accomplishment, one should place them joined and inside within the lotus-vessel of a woman, and make offerings. Bound with red thread, worship is offered with red flowers. The color is as red as the rising sun. Oneself is Yamāntaka. With a red-colored iron hook, one should meditate, hooking the object of accomplishment. With the hook drawing at the heart, and the throat bound with a noose, mounted upon a red lion, with the maṇḍala of wind applied, one should contemplate their coming —

One should wash with the water of the five nectars. If the object of accomplishment does not come, one who possesses the ascetic practice should fan the mechanical device over a fire of acacia wood. Then recite the mantra precisely:

Oṃ hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ vikṛtānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ — you wrathful one, be hooked! hrīḥ.

Oṃ hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ vikṛtānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ — jaḥ, divine gift, be hooked! jaḥ.

This, the Blessed One declared as the binding commitment for hooking.

The wise one should draw the two wheels with the extract of charnel-ground cloth and of turmeric, with the syllables LA as support, taking up the name of the object of accomplishment, and placing them joined face to face at the center. One should place a yellow bowl on top. Upon that, the skilled practitioner should draw lines — drawing lines in sets of seven and four, and so forth — and having drawn them perfectly, enter meditative absorption. It is renowned as the eight-peaked summit of Mount Meru. Above that one should draw precisely the syllables HŪṂ and VAM, with Mount Meru at the center. Above that, with the syllable LAM, one should establish the maṇḍala of the Great Sovereign. One should press it down with the vishvavajra and bind it with yellow thread. Oneself is to be visualized as Yamāntaka, yellow in color, with one's face turned southward. One should visualize the object of accomplishment as yellow, pressed beneath the maṇḍala of the Great Sovereign. Swiftly placing a mountain atop and pressing it down, having pressed with the vishvavajra, one should meditate: below the maṇḍala of the Great Sovereign, the terrifying mountains — Mandara and the like — and the immovable snow mountains press down upon the object of accomplishment. One should recite in this manner:

Oṃ hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ vikṛtānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ — laṃ, divine gift, stiffen in your own place! laṃ svāhā.

This, the Blessed One declared as the binding commitment of great stiffening.

For one who desires to stupefy speech, one should likewise draw the two wheels. Even with the name of the object of accomplishment written inside, one should eagerly recite the mantra upon it:

Oṃ hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ vikṛtānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ — laṃ, for the sake of divine gift's desire, obstruct and speak ill!

The words of the fire offering are: stambhanaṃ kuru laṃ. This the Blessed One here declared as the binding commitment for stupefying speech.

Conceal it exceedingly well, hidden in the ultimate. As the rite here described is performed, it will be accomplished in a single day — through the joining with the red form of Yamāntaka.

On charnel-ground cloth as before, one who possesses the ascetic practice should draw the two wheels. Thorn-apple, salt, poison, and neem — or neem alone — the three pungent substances and salt alone, likewise charnel-ground charcoal, water from datura leaves, seeds of caṇḍā — likewise blood taken from the ring finger, or the extract of chitraka, soil taken from a place of slaughter, the strong clay of an outcaste's pottery, and a pen made from crow feathers: with these the ascetic practitioner should draw on the fourteenth day, with a mind of midnight wrath, for the secret subjugation of harmful beings — the subduer of various sentient beings — supported at the edges by the syllable HŪṂ. The yogin's face is turned to the south. Oneself is Yamāntaka: of wrathful form, immensely fierce, adorned with fragments of skulls, seated upon a buffalo, with a moving tongue, a great belly, a terrifier. Fangs bared, hair blazing upward, eyebrows reddish yellow. In the right hand a great vajra club, likewise in the left a skull-cup. Ugly, with fangs completely bared, blazing like the fire at the end of the age — thus should one meditate on oneself. Swiftly fix the object of accomplishment before you: seized and crushed by foul odors and wounds and by a malignant disease, stripped of clothes, causing trembling — exhausted, the body covered with wounds. Seized about the body by a garland of intestines, weapons cause the wounds to gape open. Tormented by cold and by wind, placed squarely in the midst of fire, devoured by buffaloes, tigers, dogs, and long-muzzled beasts. From within the belly of the great malignant ones — those who destroy the assemblies of buddhas — entrails pour forth, the body filled with thorns, the feet bound and fettered with shackles. Likewise, imagining the body to be cut into pieces and the skin definitively flayed, the neck smeared with salt, meditate on the body being driven out by cold. The armor and other protections of that one — cut away, with oneself seized before one. The armor of that one is to be severed. Meditate on the body as likewise empty.

Born from one's own karma, in the form of the wrathful Yamāntaka, meditate on utterly annihilating — drinking blood and fat — and before that one, meditate on Yamāntaka, bearing a great and powerful club. That malignant, harmful one is to be utterly vanquished in meditation. The entrails and sinews of that one are seized by vultures and carried up into the sky; nāgas drag them down below the earth; asuras and the like press them out. In such a way should one contemplate the object of accomplishment. Bound fast by the mind of compassion, that one is brought beyond saṃsāra and goes to the buddhafiels.

Then the Blessed One, the Tathāgatas, being pleased, declared thus in verse:

Aho! The one to be slain is well dispatched.

The one to be killed has not been truly killed.

As long as the evils are liberated,

even death is not real death.

One who has committed thousands of evil acts is not born in the Avīci hell and the like.

Aho! The great being oneself — through slaying, buddha-awakening is attained.

Again, with love, sentient beings are to be slain by slaying what must be kept secret.

Aho! By the power of compassion — with lesser compassion, accomplishment will not arise.

Om hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ vikṛtānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ hūṃ devadatta sod hūṃ.

Om hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ vikṛtānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ hūṃ phaṭ devadatta māra ya hūṃ phaṭ.

This is what the Blessed One proclaimed as the sacred pledge of slaying and the like by means of the great tantra — the secret vajra-mechanism — together with mantra and tantra.

Then two wheels are to be drawn. Within the syllable PHAṬ, write the name of the object of accomplishment together with it. A skull, properly prepared, is to be wound about with a black thread. With a mind of aversion, at midday, it is to be placed in a charnel ground. Gazing with the level gaze of Yamāntaka the Terminator, place the object of accomplishment before oneself. Dwelling upon a horse and upon a buffalo, with weapons in the hands of both, surrounded on all sides by a host of wrathful ones — meditate with one-pointed focus on the direction of both. The speech of both is locked in strife, their minds bound by wrath — meditate with visualization on their engaging in combat, and while meditating, begin the recitation:

Om hrīḥ ṣṭrīḥ vikṛtānana hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ — make Devadatta and Devayajña utterly full of aversion toward one another — phaṭ.

This the Blessed One proclaimed as the sacred pledge of great aversion.

By that rite, as before, both wheels are to be written throughout. Depending on the syllables HŪṂ and PHAṬ, two skulls are properly prepared, wound completely about with black thread, and then placed in a pigsty or in a forest. Through the yoga of Yamāntaka, meditate on seizing the object of accomplishment first.

From the syllable YAM arises a bow-shaped form — a dark maṇḍala of wind, upon which is a great flag of blue hue — meditate upon it above that. Upon this is the great malignant one: striking, striving toward the south, overcome by wrathful ones, difficult to reverse even if one is a buddha.

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ VIKṚTĀNANA HŪḤ HŪḤ PHAṬ PHAṬ — expel the god-gift! HŪḤ PHAṬ. This is declared by the Blessed One as the sacred pledge of the great expulsion.

The yogin, wrathful, faces the south.

With charnel-ground ash mixed with blood,

with poison, salt, silk, life-string,

with burning butter and the leaf of the intoxicant plant, and likewise with charnel-ground cloth —

the second wheel is to be written upon it.

For slaying: it abides upon the body of Yama.

For aversion: it abides upon the bodies of the she-ass and the horse.

For expulsion: it abides upon the body of the female vixen.

For pacification: the white maṇḍala of the moon.

For enrichment: upon the yellow moon.

For subjugating a woman: it dwells at the heart.

For binding speech: it abides upon one's own body.

For inflating: it dwells at the center of Mount Meru.

For hooking: it abides upon the lion and the tiger.

In the same way, other purposes are to be indicated.

With gum, with lac resin,

and likewise with the variety from Kashmir —

write for subjugation on the bark of the parasol tree.

There is no doubt this will succeed.

Place it inside a covered bowl.

Hold it correctly with a virtuous mind.

Write with a raven's feather.

Seal it lotus-fashion in the charnel ground;

at the midday sun, hide it there.

I, the yogin of Yamāntaka, recite the mantra OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ and so forth, stationed in the south, and cut off the target.
Draw the syllable YA in the color of the pacifying rite.
The pair of NI syllables are likewise the same.
From the syllable YA at the outer ring, moving to the center, the remaining syllables as one finds convenient — first perform the approach recitation of ten thousand repetitions;
then this activity is to be fully accomplished.
This is the action of the Wisdom Vajra.
Through the yoga of Yamāntaka, wherever this great wrathful maṇḍala is written and remains,
and wherever the syllables are written,
that dwelling place will constantly become a place of conflict.

This is the second section on the sequence of the yantra chapter from the tantra of the Red Yamāntaka, the Body, Speech, and Mind of all Tathāgatas.

In a place remote from mountains and people,
a secret site examined by mind on level ground —
there draw the image clearly, and I, the yogin, begin the summoning with mantra.

White of complexion, with one face and two hands, holding a hooked blade and a skull cup — Carcikā is to be meditated upon.
The yogin begins the supreme union of blood-summoning.

Then the Blessed One, the great Yamāntaka, entered into the meditative absorption called Vajra Agitator, Summoner of Blood.

The mantra of Vajra Carcikā was declared, as follows:
OM VAJRA CARCIKE SIDHĀNA TRANĀLA HĀRIṆĪ RATNATRAYA PAKARIṆO RUDHIRA MĀKARṢAYA JAḤ.

Having moved the mouth most energetically, and recalling this mantra after,
the great blood of the three realms will be summoned — of this there is no doubt.

Then the Blessed One, the great Yamāntaka, entered into the meditative absorption called Vajra, Summoner of the Vajra-Intoxicated One.

The sacred pledge of Vajravārāhī for summoning ale was declared, as follows:
OM GHONE SUGHONE VAJRAMĀMAKĪ BHARA BHARA SAMBHARA SAMBHARA TRAIDHĀTUKA MADHYĀKARṢAYA JAḤ.

With the earth scraped up by the hand of the brewer, decorate the mouth of a vase, place it upon the head of a thief,
and recall the mantra.

The great essence of this mantra is taught at the stūpa called Pāṭana.

When a skilled practitioner focuses upon it with effort,
it is well renowned that ale will be summoned.

Then the Blessed One, the great Yamāntaka, entered into the meditative absorption called the Vajra Perfection of Wisdom of Yamāntaka.

Sarasvatī, the Melodious One, declared this mantra:
OM PICU PICU PRAJÑĀVARDHANI JVALA JVALA MEDHĀVARDHANI DHIRI DHIRI BUDDHI VARDHANI SVĀHĀ.

Beginning from the first day of the lunar fortnight, throughout until the end of the fifteenth day,
the practice is to be taken up well and begun.
So long as one follows the waning of the moon,
the Lady Sovereign of Speech will be accomplished.
This completes one hundred and fifty verses.

Without remainder, the entirety of the three realms, completely, without exception, is accomplished.

Then the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption called the Vajra Agitation-Hook, the Great Yamāntaka (Skt. Yamāntaka).

Gaurī declared this mantra for the hooking of semen:
OM KARṢHRṆI KARṢAṆI GAURĪ JAḤ DUṢṬA PRADUṢṬĀ YĀḤ ŚUKRAMĀ KARṢAYA JAḤ JAḤ JAḤ HŪM SVĀHĀ.

Through the face of the sky and the vajra path,
through wind, the union-bell, and the iron hook,
the assemblies of semen are drawn and gathered.
Through meditation and mantra perfectly applied,

the practitioner, in a solitary place or forest grove,
should accomplish this practice to perfection.
By the engagement of seven nights accomplishment will come — of this there is no doubt.

Then the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption called the Vajra Division of Time, the Great Vajra Yamāntaka.

Here, from the vajra body, speech, and mind of the very samaya — the pledge-being of the supreme empowerment — he caused to emanate:

Udumbara, māndāra,
fully bloomed and budded flowers, and garlands of karṇika blossoms —
take these, my child, and receive the blessing.
The great sword of the three realms, to which all the buddhas have paid homage —
if you grasp it, you will be victorious over māra.
This supreme sword of karma,
in order to accomplish the vajra and bell of the nature of skillful means and wisdom — my child, take up the secret vajra, and hold the disciple rightly.
This is the precious drink, perfectly accomplishing the vajra body —
the wisdom water that humans drink.
My child, in all circumstances,
pour it also into the mouth of the disciple.

Yamāntaka spoke with great joy:
O great vajra disciple of the self-existent —

This is the third sequential division of the chapter on the hooking by mantra drawn from the Tantra of the Body, Speech, and Mind of All Tathāgatas: the Red Yamāntaka.

Then the glorious Vajradhara spoke to accomplish the sword.
O goddess, you who are the protector of all the buddhas and are beyond measure — for the ācāryas of the maṇḍala of Yamāntaka, for the sake of accomplishing the tantra, they speak:

a magnetic iron sword itself,
or alternatively a sword of essence-extract, measured at one cubit in length —
let the one of discipline and conduct contemplate this well.
On the fourteenth or on the eighth,
it is to be concealed in the center of a charnel ground.
Furnished with the five nectars,
ten thousand recitations are to be done at three sessions.
On the fourteenth of each month,
the torma offering is to be made first.
One hundred thousand recitations per month —
at five hundred thousand it will be accomplished.
When accomplished, the sword blazes brilliantly,
the great lightning of five rays flickers and flashes.
Whoever then grasps that accomplishment will become victorious over all beings of the three realms.
Whatever yogin accomplishes the sword,
by joining with the fearsome Yamāntaka, will accomplish ease, and even the great earth will not be able to withstand him in combat.
All two-footed and four-footed beings upon seeing it will be struck in ten places, and gods and asuras alike will not endure it —
what need then to speak of the human world?
Taking earth from the ocean shore,
one fashions it into the form of a nāga.
Place OM̐ PHUḤ upon it, set HŪḤ upon it,
and recite the mantras beginning with HRĪḤ ṢṬRIḤ.
In times when rain does not fall,
by reciting ten thousand times it will fall.
Black snake flesh and nimba leaves are mixed together well, formed into pills correctly —
the one of discipline casts them into the ocean.
Having recited tens of thousands of times,
this is supreme for stirring up the tides of the brave ocean.
Taking one hundred seeds of caṇḍa

mixed with black peas and rice, by reciting eight hundred thousand times through burnt offering, thereby the gods will be seen.

The wood of a pyre from a cremation ground at a charnel ground —

The one of discipline draws an image, anoints it with maddening fluid, and by reciting ten thousand times it will be carried off by leprosy.

Taking gathered seeds of white mustard and reciting four hundred thousand times, one may scatter them upon one who has been seized by a serpent and has fallen — there is no doubt that he will be restored to life.

Taking earth washed away by a mountain flood, by reciting the mantra one hundred thousand times and merely rubbing it on the head, all headaches will be destroyed.

By praising seven times and then massaging the head with the hand, headaches will not arise, and in relieving them there is no doubt.

With the flesh of a brahmin, with charnel-ground earth and ashes, make an image of Yamāntaka: one face, two hands — in the right a great vajra, and likewise in the left a head. White in color, of great terribleness. By means of this, malice is destroyed.

With the five nectars, offer tormas day by day, and the yogin constantly prays:
"Destroy my enemy!" Reciting this at night before sleeping, the enemy will die at dawn. Or else he will be struck by illness, choked by water stoppage and the like.

From the enemies, take Vairocana — fill completely a human shinbone, recite the mantra one hundred thousand times, and cast it down at the foot of a tree.
The hungry ghost will wander forever in the forest, and the master yogin, satisfied, dwells in bliss. Manifold aims are fully accomplished.

This is the fourth chapter, called "The Terrifying One," from the Tantra of Red Yamāntaka, the Body, Speech, and Mind of All the Blessed Tathāgatas, set out in sequence.

Then I shall accurately explain the supreme accomplishment of kings.

Taking wood unimpaired and unwounded from trees, and having cut it down and washed it well, accomplish the practice by reciting with a rosary.

On the fourteenth day of each month, having anointed it with the five nectars and the five meats, recite it with the supreme recitation. By reciting ten million times, the accomplishment of a king will certainly be achieved.

Ah, such is the power of the mantra! Even if a corpse should speak, the yogin endowed with the yoga of Yamāntaka should not be the least bit afraid. Whatever the yogin desires, all of that will be granted.

From a buffalo or a crocodile, or from a tiger or likewise from another — of special kinds, a bear or a monkey — poison, a musk deer, a civet, and the three sharp ones: from these make an image, the terrifying form of Yamāntaka. Reciting the mantras beginning with HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ, the yogin makes supplication: "Destroy the great king! Perform that action for me!" The accomplishment of the preliminary service is fulfilled by reciting ten million times. This is certainly true, without doubt.

Then, furthermore, at the time of the waning days of the lunar fortnight when the sun has set, take dusty cloth and draw on it the supreme image. With a great ink mixture, make the very lord of the maṇḍala: white in color, of great terribleness, supremely with one face and two hands — in the right a blazing vajra, in the left holding a head with blood. The left leg extended, the right poised in a posture of threat. Adorned with a precious crown, complete with all precious ornaments, encircled by a garland of rays of light.

For killing a king, apply this definitively to the lower portion. With the name and color properly present, established just as it truly is, it should be rendered complete with respect to the deity in its true proportions. The maṇḍala should definitely be triangular, and before it perform the burnt offering. By one hundred thousand burnt offerings, the king will be obtained — in this there is no doubt.

Then, furthermore, when the moon is eclipsed or when the sun is not seen, having taken charnel-ground ashes —

One who possesses ascetic discipline shall make an image. With the horn-bearing one's neck-flesh, the five meats, neem leaves, and dhadhura leaves — having made these one through this rite, the skilled one shall make the image. Deep blue in color, supremely fearsome, with one face and two hands, mounted upon a buffalo, the face upturned, holding a vajra and a skull — having completed the bodily form, worship it with many kinds of offerings. Recite the mantra beginning with Hrīḥ, Ṣṭrīḥ, and so on. Through one hundred thousand recitations, it shall be known. Destroy the great king's forces together with his retinue. The yoga practitioner himself reciting one hundred thousand — by the particular virtue of one hundred thousand recitations, combined with burnt offerings and offerings in accord with this rite, the intelligent one acting for the benefit of sentient beings will without doubt obtain the king.

Then, furthermore, on a garment of dust, in water that partakes of the nature of space, washed on an auspicious day of a planet, draw a picture clearly. One face and two hands, black in color and terrifying, the hair fully ablaze with rays of light, a garland of heads hanging down prominently, holding a curved knife and skull — draw it mounted upon a buffalo, and begin the meditation upon this. Visualize the enemy in front: cut with the curved knife, drink the limbs and the black fluid, eat the entrails, drink the abundant blood. By that alone becoming a hundred thousand, pierce the heart with a wound or lesion.

Then, furthermore, taking a human bone of four finger-widths, place it within the mantra beginning with Hṛīḥ, Ṣṭṛīḥ, and so on, and conceal it at the enemy's door — this will drive him away together with his retinue. Even one equal to Śakra (Indra) will be transformed.

Let the person, having gone alone to an isolated place, clearly direct himself toward the reverend one, and gaze upon the gurus, buddhas, and bodhisattvas dwelling in the ten directions. Take the great blood from the severed human bone and mix it with crow's blood. In the center of a twelve-spoked wheel of twelve-finger measure, apply the twelve seed-syllables with the enemy's name written many times, together with sharp dots, properly combined. Encircle it with three Ṭa syllables, tie it to a crow's neck, and if it is sent into a fast-flowing river, that one becomes ungrasped. Likewise, write the twelve seed-syllables: PHAṬ PHAṬ HŪṢ HŪṢ NA NA TĀ KṚ VI ṢṬĪ HRĪ OM. Having made offerings with whatever substances are available, offer powerful incense, and if it is sent into a fast-flowing river, that one becomes ungrasped. If this is not desired, having praised it aloud seven times onto a crow's wing, place the name within it and conceal it at the enemy's door — he together with his retinue will certainly be driven away.

Likewise, in the center of a twelve-spoked wheel, write the three pungent substances, poison, and neck-flesh, with a pen of great bone, in the very center of the center of the fire seed-syllable, combined with sharp dots, and properly applying two Bha syllables. Encircle it with three Ṭa syllables and burn it in a thick fire — his children, wife, and retinue will die in that very instant.

This is the fifth section, the Successive Divisions, from the Tantra of the Red Yamāntaka, Body, Speech, and Mind of All Tathāgatas, on the Accomplishment of a King.

Then, I shall explain how to put the enemy's troops to rout. On a brahmin woman's dust-garment, begin precisely on the royal moon-day itself. Draw a figure with the face of a buffalo, the hundred arms distinctly clear, all the weapons exceedingly sharp, drawn throughout. When the white picture is complete, worship it with white lotus flowers. Having recited the mantra one hundred thousand times, the lotus likewise. Place the picture in front and if it is seized and held upon a banner,

All those who look upon any person who has gazed upon it — whether two-footed or four-footed and the rest — none of them will be able to look upon that person, just as when a lion or a great elephant is beheld. Then, further: recite the Brahma-seed mantra one hundred thousand times, cut it with a great axe on a great day, mix it with the urine of a female animal, and let one who holds ascetic vows draw the figure. Make a circle on the face of one's own troops, and the enemy's troops will be utterly destroyed. Beneath the tree of sorrowlessness, walking eight or fourteen rounds, at three sessions within a single month — having first completed a preliminary recitation of one hundred thousand — recite:

Oṃ siddhāna tanāla hāriṇī para sainya vinōsini hrīḥ svāhā.

By these means accomplishment will come. By the mere act of being seen, the enemy's troops will be utterly routed, and by the mere appearance of Yamāntaka they too will flee.

Then, further: go to the foot of a single tree. Taking up a corpse, the very best that has been purified. Holding a sword in the right hand, with the left leg extended. Recite all the mantras beginning with Hrīḥ Ṣṭrīḥ and so forth throughout the entire night. From it a sword will shoot forth, and by that the enemy's troops will be destroyed.

This is the sixth section, the unfolding of how to break the enemy's army, from the Tantra of the Red Yamāntaka, Body, Speech, and Mind of All Tathāgatas.

Then, the Vajra-holder King declares most excellently the accomplishment of invisibility. First, to accomplish invisibility, the yogin should begin on the solar day of the royal sun. By reciting one hundred thousand times with correct intention one will be liberated from it. At the time when the sun is seized by an eclipse, take the root of paṇḍitakara, mercury, khaṃgāri, and the root of daṇḍa, make them all into a single pill, and place it in the mouth — one will become invisible. Then, further: take khoṭī, jālakiñjayantī, and the root of the plant that destroys old age, mix them all equally with frog's flesh, dry them for three days, make a pill and place it in the mouth — one will become invisible. Then, further: at the time when the sun is seized by the planet Rāhu, mix ukanukhaṃ, mercury, gold, and dhatura properly with the urine of a wild mare, make it into a pill, and place it in the mouth — one will become supremely invisible. Then, further: make a single pill from the eye of a mouse, the eye of a vulture, and the eye of a tortoise together in equal measure, and place it in the mouth — in that very instant one will become invisible. Then, further: on a Sunday, take the eye of a mouse, mix it with rāma, the root of citrak, and vulture's blood, make it into a pill and place it in the mouth — this is the supreme means of becoming invisible. Then, further: take the flesh of a pāśī and the fruit of bahura, wrap them in silk, and make an eye-ointment in a brahmin's skull. When the two eyes are anointed with that eye-ointment one will become invisible. Then, further: take the flower of a caṇḍālī woman, śatābarti, and the eye of a bhadrapakṣī, make them into a pill, place it in the mouth — one will become invisible. Then, further: take a bhadrapakṣa bird and feed it for seven days on one māśa of mercury; then take its excrement and mix it with one's own semen to make a drop — one will become invisible. This is the excellent practice of invisibility.

Now the eye-ointment will be explained. First of all, for the sake of the eye-ointment, having completely recited the Blessed One's mantra five hundred thousand times, undertake the preparation of the eye-ointment. Take the eyes of a mongoose, a vulture, and a kurāra bird, make them equal in measure, and prepare the eye-ointment by applying them with a silk rod to the semen of a subterranean spider. By this eye-ointment one will be able to see through walls of earth. On the day of the asterism Ārdrā, take the root of white bṛhatī, the root of black jayantī, and the eyes of a jackal, combine them equally with honey from a cave, and make a drop — one will be able to see through walls of earth. The root of the vine of the earth and the root of viṣaṃkarī, combined with cedar resin and dust, wrapped in silk thread spun by a young girl and fashioned into a stick, and then rubbed as an eye-ointment onto the surface of a human skull — by this eye-ointment one will assuredly see treasures.

Then, on the day of the asterism Śravaṇa, take a cloth of dust-colored fabric. On the eighth or fourteenth day, draw a diagram of vajra-carcikā prominently and make a great offering. If one recites ten thousand times in a single night, one will see treasures assuredly in a dream.

Furthermore, go beneath a nimba tree and on the eighth or fourteenth day meditate upon carcikā before the diagram, reciting ten thousand times over the head of a jackal. Carcikā will come and ask, "What do you desire of me?" The practitioner should then say, "Please grant me the attainment of the eye-ointment, and bestow also the elixir of mercury."

Bezoar, the eyes of a śāla deer, mercury, the juice of śītalī, and honey from a subterranean hive — make these equal into pills; by this eye-ointment one will see through walls of earth.

The eyes of a jackal, the eyes of a vulture, and the eyes of a kurāra bird — take these in the same way, left for left and right for right, and rub them into great fat. By this eye-ointment one will see through walls of earth.

Then also: bezoar, human bile, camphor, and silver — likewise these are to be given as food. By this eye-ointment one will see through walls of earth.

Then, further: these give the attainments of various kinds, along with the fullness of wealth, grain, and so forth, the eight sciences, though one be dull-witted, and the gift of moving through the sky.

As a preliminary, for the purpose of approach, recite the mantra one hundred thousand times and then begin the accomplishment of mercury. First take the mercury and knead it with the juice of red citrakā. After that, add powder of copper and one-quarter powder of gold, gather it with the juice of śākhoḍa, mix elephant flesh with lhañ tsher in equal measure, place it in the center of a bamboo tube as rāja, bind and compress it until it becomes a solid mass. If this powder is pressed into a balance-scale measure of a rati, it will turn into gold. Here, knead the mercury with great fat together with lhañ tsher and muzhi for three days in great fat, heating it in the sun, until it becomes a solid mass — for as long as it takes. If a person eats one drop of this together with honey, that person will live for one thousand years. If pressed onto silver, it will turn into gold.

Then, further: starting from the juice of dāhlavā, knead the mercury until it does not yet become a solid. The juice of śītalī and the juice of jambhīra, the fruit of śākhoḍa, and bāgula — give these separately in equal measure, place them inside a bamboo tube, coat it thoroughly in the same way, and dry the bamboo tube. Afterward, fire it in a heavy fire until it becomes a solid mass. At the measure of two ratis over twenty-one days, and all the while abstaining from leaves and sour foods, and throughout entirely refraining from the company of women — that person will live for twelve thousand years and attain the power of moving through the sky. If pressed upon iron, it will turn into gold.

Then, further: in the juice of rañjanīlā, knead together with the essence combined with suparṇamākṣikaṃ and mix with dīśnanena. Mix in the juice of lhañ tsher and naraśeṇa, place it inside a bamboo tube, and if combined with the butter of sahārī, within six months it will become a solid mass. If rubbed onto eight iron objects, they will assuredly turn into gold. If eaten, one will attain the power of moving through the sky. By merely rubbing it on the eyes, one will live for five hundred years.

Then, further: knead mercury with the juice of kumāra, together with somalata, the root of palāśa, nāgakeśara, bakula, broom sedge, kathīnā, and likewise the leaves of nyagrodha. Cover the mouth and combine it all together in a bamboo tube. Within two hours it will become a solid mass. By merely eating a portion of it, one will assuredly travel to all three levels of the world. Even one ratti's weight pressed onto copper will assuredly turn it into gold.

Then, further: moisten mercury slightly with the milk of śirikhaṇḍa, knead it together with muzi in a copper vessel with the juice of jambīra, and dry it in the sun until it becomes a solid mass. Place it inside a bamboo tube, combine it, and leave it for two hours. Then, when thoroughly cooled, remove it; pressing a ratti's weight of it onto copper will turn the copper into gold. Rubbing it on the body will free one from white hair and wrinkles.

Then, further: knead mercury together with the root of vālā. Then again, knead caṇḍālī flowers with mercury. Again knead it with soap-pods and with the juice of Vairocana's plant. After that, adding it in a quantity of one quarter to gold powder will cause it to become a solid mass. Inside a seven-leafed bamboo tube, applying an amount equal to an elephant's footprint in size will produce a solid mass. Remove it, and pressing a ratti's weight onto copper will turn it into gold. Applying even a ratti's weight to the body will destroy the three faults. One will be able to live in the assembly of great yogins. By merely eating it, one will be able to travel one hundred leagues.

Then, further: to mercury alone, knead in vajra-herb, certain ly tiṣa and the root of trihī, karañjanīka, and the root of mānu. Mix in powdered sugar and combine it inside a bamboo tube. Burning it whole through the night will accomplish it. Taking a ratti's weight and pressing it onto copper will accomplish the transformation. Eating even a ratti's weight will free one from white hair and wrinkles. Applying it continuously for six months will grant life for a thousand years.

Then, further, with a preparation of the same kind: take one tola of mercury and knead it with the sap of śrīṅgī. Combine it with abraṭaṃ and gold shavings. Together with red śrīṅgī, take the juice of ciṭipā, and after twelve days place it inside a bamboo tube and combine it. Drawing it out in an amount equal to an elephant's footprint, take it together, and press in a ratti's measure. Pressing it onto any copper will assuredly turn it into gold without exception. By eating it, one will live long and travel through the sky without doubt. Yakṣas and lords of kiṃnaras will be kept at a great distance, and one will not go to the realm of Yama, the Lord of Death.

Then, further: take one tola of black lhañ tsher combined with the juice of frog leaves, make the resulting substance equal in taste to half a tola of vermilion, and for the measure of one month eat it along with cold water. Through one month of application, the master of yoga will become free from sickness and death.

Then, further: take a tola's weight of iron, prepare it with the powder of retya, combine it with the juice of kāśī, and dry it in the rays of the sun. Mercury, lhañ tsher, and muzi in a quantity of one quarter of that combined with it: kakola and the powder of liśi are half and double the previous measure. Combine everything together, knead it with iron on a firm stone. Place it inside a bamboo tube, seal the mouth, combine it, and burn it in a heavy fire.

Then, having extracted it, if one eats it in a measure of one māṣa together with iron shavings, white hair and wrinkles will be utterly destroyed, and disease and death will find no foothold. This is the seventh chapter, the sequential exposition of the tantra of Yamāntaka Red, the body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas: the practices of invisibility, eye medicine, and extracting the essence.

Then the king who holds the vajra declared the procedure for suppressing shadows, as follows. This is the application taught for paralysing four-footed enemies.

First of all, meditate on Yamāntaka with dread.
Cultivate the bewilderment of all sentient beings.
At midnight in your own home,
seated on a tiger-skin mat,
with one face, deep crimson, utterly fierce,
wielding a noose and an iron hook, dwelling in great terror upon a corpse, with three eyes blazing with dread,
bewildering all the gods,
blazing and massed with fire-tigers — meditate thus and recite one hundred thousand times.
Afterward, perform the ritual practice.

Take the root of white karavīra,
and likewise the tip of red dantī.
Mix them with frog's blood.
One who holds the vow should prepare a drop.
Whoever's shadow one treads underfoot will fall into a swoon —
two-footed and four-footed alike,
all will be bewildered, without doubt.

In the bright fortnight of the planetary day of the sun, seek out a worm that has come from a belly.
Having found it, with effort,
prepare a drop with śṛṅgī.
By placing that drop on the forehead,
one causes another's shadow to scatter.
If they attain intoxication and one wishes to release them, sprinkling with milk will make them comfortable.

Take dantīrohā, the dark open plain — these roots, combined as one, mixed with crow's blood —
one who holds the vow should prepare a drop.
By the power of this drop,
even the gods will be thoroughly shaken.
One should not bow in salutation;
if one does, that one will fall into a swoon.

And further, another preparation:

rasāśṛṅgī, kuthārī,
and paṇīnāgapāṇī —

all of these together, prepared by moonlight:

one who holds the vow should make pills.

Taking a drop in water of sky-nature, hold the drop on the crown of the head.

By looking into the face while bowing in salutation, that person will vomit blood.

Kāmacā and white madhu,

the eyes of a white cuckoo — perfectly combined with sky-water, prepare a drop upon the crown of the head.

By the power of that drop,

enemies will come under one's power.

Whoever one bows to in salutation will assuredly become bewildered.

And further, another preparation:

the tongue of a black night-wandering creature, and likewise the tongue of a nakula, properly blended with rat's bile — make fifty thousand pills of this.

By the power of this drop,

the wrathful mantra enters into it.

A king will constantly be bewildered and will keep company with evildoers.

And further, another preparation:

the root of amṛta, white arka,

and likewise the fruit of bakurī —

these in equal measure:

a skilled one should make pills.

If one constantly holds a drop of this,

the three worlds will be bewildered.

Take the amṛta of the mouth

and with the nameless finger of the left hand, consecrate all the pills with this mantra:

Oṃ mahāyakṣasenādhipataye mahādurdamtadamakāya nāśaya nāśaya vināśaya vināśaya vitrāpaya vitrāpaya hūṃ hūṃ sarvaduṣṭrāṃ ḍāṃ phaṭ.

This is the eighth chapter, the sequential exposition of the achievement of suppressing shadows from the tantra of Yamāntaka Red, the body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas, the Blessed One.

Here the Blessed One declared the method of accomplishment for raising a corpse and so forth:

Oṃ hūṃ jaḥ aparājitaḥ. Oṃ hūṃ jaḥ ajitaḥ. Oṃ hūṃ jaḥ pūraṇa. Oṃ hūṃ jaḥ abūraṇa. Oṃ śrāṃ jaḥ śmaśānādhipatiḥ. Oṃ ryuṃ ja kuleśvaraḥ. Oṃ hūṃ jaḥ bhūteśvaraḥ. Oṃ aṃ jaḥ.

The phrases "kiṃ karota tatamas" and so forth are the great lords of spirits. If one undertakes the accomplishment of that which cannot be achieved by others, one should first perform a preliminary recitation of one hundred thousand repetitions before the glorious Vajradaṇḍadhara — the one who wields the vajra staff — and upon completing that, one should perform extensive offerings, and then make offerings as prescribed, using white food, yogurt, molasses, and milk porridge. Having offered bdellium incense, one should recite throughout the entire night. Very early in the morning, the spirit will certainly come. If it does not come, it will die on the spot. When it has come, it will make request for permission, saying, "What shall I do?" The practitioner should then speak: "Do whatever I command." From that point on, it will perform whatever tasks are commanded. It will grant mastery of mantra-vidyā and sovereignty over kings. It will punish enemies with calamities. It will take the goddess of the moon and bestow her. Riding upon its back, one may travel to the divine worlds, and Śakra too will be granted. One will live for seven eons.

Then, if one undertakes the accomplishment of Ajita, one should recite eight thousand repetitions throughout the night before a stūpa, and on the seventh or eighth day perform extensive offerings, present a tormā, offer bdellium incense, and recite. At the conclusion of the recitation, he will certainly come and say, "Ho, practitioner, what do you require of me?" The practitioner should say, "I require that you do whatever my purpose demands." From that point on, it will perform the tasks commanded. Again, it will bestow sovereignty over kings, and one will live for a thousand years.

Then, if one undertakes a further accomplishment, one should enter the inner chamber of Vajrapāṇi and recite eight thousand repetitions. On the seventh or eighth day, one should perform a torma and extensive offerings, and having presented white food, yogurt, and the offerings as described, one should recite until the middle of the night. At midnight, he will come of his own accord. Having offered flowers and ablution offerings, and having satisfied him, he will bestow sovereignty over kings. He will fulfill all desires completely. One will live for a thousand years. For as long as one lives, he will perform whatever tasks are assigned. He will also bring about the destruction of the great ones, or he will cause the great ones to live.

Then, if one undertakes the accomplishment of the Earth Mother, one should first perform ten thousand repetitions as preliminary recitation before a stūpa surrounded by māras, and thereafter, on the completion of a full month, having performed offerings with the substances as described, one should recite until the middle of the night. At midnight she will come swiftly, and having come, she will sit before one and say, "My child, what do you need?" The practitioner should say, "I require that you do whatever my purpose demands." From that point on, she will perform whatever tasks are entrusted. She will take the finest daughters of the yakṣas and bestow them. She will bestow the finest foods of desire. Each day, with reverence, she will fully bestow two garments and five coins. One will live for five hundred years.

Then, if one undertakes the accomplishment of the lord of the charnel ground, one should go to the charnel ground at night and recite one thousand repetitions. On the seventh and eighth days, one should offer a great abundance of fish, sesame, zibu-lika, white foods, yogurt, molasses, incense, fruits, and various enjoyables, and present a torma as prescribed, and offer bdellium incense, and recite until the middle of the night. At midnight, a sound of "hā hā" laughter will be heard. One should not be frightened by it. He will come surrounded by a great retinue. When he has come, having been satisfied by the torma offering, all the spirits will do whatever is commanded. Each day, eight coins will be received.

All enemies will be vanquished and one will live for a thousand years.

Then, if one undertakes the accomplishment of the Lord of Lineages, one should go to the dwelling place of the deity and offer red fragrant substances, red flowers, and bdellium incense, having first performed ten thousand repetitions of the approach practice. On the fourteenth night of the dark fortnight, one should offer a torma of red foods along with fish, sesame, and zibu-lika, accompanied by whatever offerings are appropriate, and offer sīhla incense, then recite until midnight. After that, a form of immense blazing fire, boundless and exceedingly terrifying, will appear. One should not be frightened by it. It will say, "Child, what do you want me to do?" The practitioner should say, "Do whatever I command." From then on, for as long as one lives, it will perform whatever tasks are assigned. Each day, five coins will be given at three intervals. It will bestow the finest desirable foods, and one will live for five hundred years.

Then, if one undertakes the accomplishment of the Lord of Spirits, one should go to a place where there is a single liṅga and, for three days and nights, offer a torma of red foods, fish, sesame, and zibu-lika as a child would offer it. On the third day, that being itself will come swiftly and stand before one, saying, "What do you want me to do?" The practitioner should say, "Do whatever I command." Having said this, it will follow one always, and taking a divine maiden, will present her. Having itself taken food, covering above, it will give various things in different forms. One will live for two thousand years.

Then, if one undertakes the supreme accomplishment of sending a messenger, one should enter the chamber of the Vajra-holder and on the fourteenth of the dark fortnight recite one hundred thousand repetitions, having first performed the approach practice. Starting on the seventh day, one then begins the accomplishment. One should anoint the maṇḍala with sandalwood, offer bdellium incense, and set out white foods, yogurt, butter, and milk, and kindle butter lamps on a bundle of kuśa grass, then recite throughout the entire night. At midnight, the supreme messenger itself will come. When it has come, one should satisfy it with an offering of sandalwood water. It will ask, "What do you want me to do?" The practitioner should say, "Do whatever I command." From that point on, it will perform whatever tasks are assigned. It will bestow every desired fruit and bring every desired aim to perfect fulfillment.

Then, if one undertakes the accomplishment of the Mistress of Desires, one should draw her image on a wheat leaf using musk, and remain alone on one's sleeping place reciting one hundred thousand repetitions. Then, at the end of the month, having made a great offering and kindled butter lamps, one should recite in silence. Certainly at midnight she will come. When she has come, having done as desired, she will become one's wife. Adorned with beautiful ornaments and accompanied by food, she will sleep, and by day she will be entirely absent and gone. One should refrain from consorting with other women; otherwise, she will cause total destruction.

Then, if one undertakes the accomplishment of Kanamāni, one should go to the foot of a nyagrodha tree and, in accordance with the rite, offer a fish torma. Using what remains of one's own drink as a water offering, one should recite one hundred thousand repetitions. In the same way, on the night of the seventh day, she herself will come, adorned with every ornament and together with a retinue of three hundred, and will certainly arrive at midnight. When she has come, having done as desired, she will become one's wife. She will give clothing, ornaments, and food of twelve lifetimes. Each day she will readily bestow eight coins.

Then, if one undertakes the accomplishment of the Beloved One, one should draw a picture on canvas, golden in color, adorned with every ornament, and holding a blue lotus in hand. One should make offerings of jasmine flowers. Having offered bdellium incense, one should recite eight thousand repetitions. At the end of the month one should make offerings with whatever suitable substances are available, lighting butter lamps abundantly, and reciting continuously until midnight — whereupon she herself will come. When she has come, remaining silent, one should meditate and, having done as desired, she will become one's wife. She will protect the retinue of the practitioner. She will bestow the finest foods one could desire, along with mercury and essence extracts, and each day she will readily give twenty-five coins.

Then, if one undertakes the accomplishment of Padmā, one should anoint a maṇḍala with sandalwood at the crown-point of one's own home, offer bdellium incense, and over the course of one month recite one thousand repetitions. When the month is fully complete, one should make offerings with whatever suitable substances are available, and by reciting until midnight she will certainly come. When she has come, having done as desired, she will become one's wife. She will bestow the finest of what one desires, along with mercury, essence extracts, and the substances of attainment.

Then I shall fully and correctly explain the method for accomplishing the One-Tressed One. At the time of accomplishing the yakṣinīs (Skt. yakṣinī), one should visualize Ekajaṭī, the One-Tressed One: one face, two hands, holding a curved knife and a skull, dark blue in color, to be meditated upon in the center of the great and terrifying maṇḍala of the secret place. On the eastern petal, visualize Jambhala. In the south, the one who holds the jewel. In the west, the Lord of Waters. In the north, the one who coils like a snake. At the four intermediate directions — fire and so forth — visualize four yakṣinīs, and arrange them ceremonially: Kuṇḍalāṃ, Hāḍhinī, Rohaṃ, and the Beautiful One. Then the door-guardians are to be visualized, and on all the spokes and so forth one should properly apply colors just as was done previously with the wheel. All of them hold the characteristic signs of lords. From outside as well, one recites the mantra:

Oṃ ekajaṭi vasu sādhanī svāhā.

Then I shall explain the method for accomplishing Pukkaṣī. Merely by visualizing her for a single instant, Pukkaṣī appears in all three worlds: red-golden in color, four-faced, riding a donkey upon four arms — so she is to be meditated upon. The Pukkaṣī of action, together with a crow, a mallet, and a bow and arrow, should be meditated upon by one of ascetic discipline. One should recite the mantra:

Oṃ pukkaṣī oṃ.

Then I shall fully explain the method for accomplishing Mañjuvajra. Through the attainment arising from Mañjuvajra, in a single instant one will become invisible. This is the ninth chapter, on the sequential unfolding of accomplishing the zombie yakṣinī from the Tantra of the Body, Speech, and Mind of All Tathāgatas: the Red Yamāntaka.

Then the king who holds the vajra shall explain the mantra for protection against zombies, ferocious and poisonous beasts, and the like.

By reciting four hundred thousand times,
and scattering the seed of accomplishment,
the corpse will certainly rise and serve one's purpose —
no doubt, it will come alive.

For the pacifying rite, know always to visualize White Yamāntaka as the yoga.

Holding in one's hand the seed of accomplishment,
by reciting four hundred thousand times,
with the corpse oriented facing one,
if one then pierces it with white mustard seeds,
that very corpse will undoubtedly rise.

Should it be seized by a dark force, visualize one like the White Hūṃ-Maker
at the heart-center of the one being accomplished.

Recite the mantras beginning with Hrīḥ Ṣṭrīḥ and so forth.

With rays of light, draw out the poisons.

hold an eight-petaled lotus.

At its center stands the White Hūṃ-Maker,
from whom rays of light rain down as nectar.

Above the crown of that one's head,
at the center of the cool-rayed maṇḍala,
the wise one should contemplate the syllable Haḥ.

Draw out the poisons of his stream through the mantras beginning with Hrīḥ Ṣṭrīḥ and so forth. With the syllables of the mantra Om Hrīḥ Ṣṭrīḥ Haḥ Hrāṃḥ Jaḥ Phuḥ, perform the mantra practice from the crown of the head down to the very tips of the toes. Meditate that a stream of nectar rains down without ceasing. By this, there is no doubt he will be sustained.

The dhāraṇī, arising from the seed syllables, will become supreme in binding. At the site of a wound, meditate on this: from yellow light arises the syllable Om and the rest, each capped with a strong tsheg mark, combined with the form of Haṭha. Through this joining, make the signal. Headaches will be thoroughly pacified. Endowed with supreme intellect, in the same way meditate upon others as well. Vikāṭa and ransom-rites and the like — many such conjunctions — must be firmly grasped with the hand to sustain life.

Then the King Vajradhara, the master application of the protective wheel — in order that one possessed of discipline may vanquish obstructors, misleading spirits, and malicious ones — let one fully apply the emanated wheel of the glorious club-holder, oneself. Light from the club pervades one's own body, born from the three bodies.

O Goddess, you have now attained power over the conduct, the special qualities, the grounds, and the perfections of all protecting buddhas. In the maṇḍala of the Executioner of Yama, I the master will draw the maṇḍala. Having bound the face with a cloth, at the doorway of the maṇḍala hall one calls out: "Who is it that calls? Speak saying: I, the fortunate one." Having made the interior with a curtain, the skilled one petitions the master and protector. With great reverence, for the sake of empowerment, the one who follows and protects recites three times: "Just as the Buddha, through great bliss, bestowed empowerment upon Vajrasattva, so too may the Protector bestow empowerment upon me, and grant me the supreme as well." Likewise make offering with song and music. The offering of water for the feet is similarly presented by the disciple with reverence. Praise too shall be given to that one.

Then the King Vajradhara taught emptiness thus:

Om śūnyatā-jñāna-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako'ham. Om pūjā-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako'ham. Om dharmadhātu-svabhāva-ātmako'ham.

Thereafter I shall explain my division of the fire-offering rites beginning with pacification and the rest. By whichever fire offering one performs, all activities will be accomplished. For pacification, with a peaceful mind; for enrichment, with an enriching mind; for magnetization, with a mind of passionate longing; for the secret activity, with a wrathful mind.

For pacification the form is that of a maṇḍala; for enrichment, the form of a pond; for magnetization, a half-moon; for slaying, the form of the space element.

For pacification the measure is one cubit; for enrichment likewise one and a half cubits. For enrichment and equally for magnetization, for slaying, the measure is twenty finger-widths. For pacification the depth is half a cubit; for enrichment the full cubit measure; for slaying, five times two. For enrichment, draw in according to the same proportion.

The pacification fire offering is on the first of the month; enrichment at the full moon; wrathful activity on the fourteenth; magnetization activity is on the eighth.

For the fish-shaped vessel and crystal, for pacification the supreme substance is pearl fruit; the conch offspring sustains life; for freedom from illness, mumena. Red sandalwood, the special quality of red coral, ragana and dark lung-thang, human bone, and likewise those called nāgaphaṇī — for pacification, one hundred of these; for enrichment, eight hundred and more in the same way; for magnetization and drawing in, twenty-five; for wrathful activity, sixty-four.

Anoint the lumps with mantras; accomplish them with fifty mantras. At the end of every rosary bead make a spear-thrust. Likewise two Mount Merus: for pacification, from the tip of the index finger; for enrichment, at the middle finger; for magnetization and drawing in, from the ring finger; for cutting with severance, from the little finger.

For pacification, the color is white; for enrichment, yellow; for magnetization, always visualize red; for wrathful activity aimed at killing, black.

This concludes the fire-offering ritual (homa) from the Tantra of Yamāntaka, Body, Speech, and Mind of All the Tathāgatas — the Red Yamāntaka — arranged in sequential sections: the tenth chapter.

A yogin endowed with the four yogas should meditate with great festivity upon the five great sounds of music, filling the space with variegated food offerings and the like, along with things to eat, things to taste, things to drink, things to lick, and perfectly arrayed perfumes, garlands, unguents, powders, garments, parasols, victory banners, bells, pennants, and the like. In front, one sets out the four tormas — carried on the shoulder, held to the side, borne on the back — with just a little food and water around the edges, stirred three times, together with the substances of the sacred commitment as one has found them. Having arranged these and visualized them as empty, one commences.

In the realm of space, visualize a lotus with eight petals. In the pericarp together with its filaments, from the syllable YAM̐ arises the maṇḍala of wind: black in color, shaped like a bow, adorned with eight white fluttering pennants at its two tips. Above that, from the syllable RĀM̐ arises the fire maṇḍala: triangular, red, adorned at its three corners with the syllable RA. Above that, from three syllables RU fully transformed, atop three skulls of red heads, from the syllable ĀḤ arises a lotus vessel — white on the outside, red on the inside — which one contemplates in the form of a water-born lotus with eight petals.

On the petals of that lotus, from east and the remaining directions, from the syllables OM̐, ĀM̐, JRĪM̐, KHAM̐, and HŪM̐ arise the self-forms of Vairocana and the remaining deities. Likewise, at the intermediate directions — fire's quarter and the rest — from the syllables LĀM̐, MĀM̐, PĀM̐, TĀM̐, and VĀM̐, visualize the self-forms of Locanā and the remaining goddesses.

These ten syllables, when fully transformed, are: GO, KU, DA, HA, NA; and BI, RA, ŚU, MĀ, MŪ. The ten sacred-commitment substances marked by these seed syllables are beheld in the lotus vessel. Above them, one visualizes the form covered by the syllable OM̐ in white color.

From the syllable OM̐ arises a moon maṇḍala; above that, from the white syllable HŪM̐ arises a vajra club. That, marked by the seed syllable, is gazed upon. Below the lotus vessel, at the tripod, one visualizes and recites OM̐ ĀḤ HŪM̐ three times. Having previously meditated without interruption upon the great expansive wind maṇḍala and the blazing fire maṇḍala, one gazes upon the vast and blazing self-forms of all the intermediate space — from GO, KU, and the rest, the ten sacred-commitment substances dissolving — being stirred by the vajra club.

Then, through the vajra club, the nectar melts and one contemplates it in the form of the color of the newly risen sun, or in the form of quicksilver. Upon that as well, one gazes at the three syllables OM ĀḤ HŪḤ. From those three syllables, a great multitude of rays radiates outward, drawing in by those rays the very many nectars dwelling in the three worlds, and causing them to enter therein. As they fully enter, from the utterly supreme and fully transformed gathering of moonbeams — compressed into a form like a mass of honey piled up like snow — one presses down upon it.

From outside, bless with the three syllables. With the intention that this becomes accomplished as a torma perfected by the union of wisdom nectar — possessed of color, fragrance, taste, and essence, like the stainless light of the autumn moon — perform that aspiration.

With the mantra that assumes the form of Yamāntaka, upon the wrathful ones who hold lasso and iron hook in their hands and emanate outward, visualize that with the iron hook one pierces the hearts of the directional guardians and with the lasso binds their throats, drawing them in.

Then, with the mantra Om Hrīḥ Ṣṭrīḥ Vikṛtānana Hūṃ Hūṃ Phaṭ Phaṭ Duṣṭāndra Sapārīvāra Mākarṣaya Jaḥ — by means of this mantra, Indra (the god of a thousand eyes), tawny-white in color, mounted upon a white elephant, with his right and left hands bearing a vajra and the threatening gesture, is to be visualized and arrayed in the east.

Likewise, with his mantra, his attendant deity, dwelling upon a Garuḍa bird, wearing a crown of precious jewels, holding a staff and wheel in the right hand and a conch shell and jewel in the left, is stationed not far to his left.

Again likewise, Yama, the lord of the dead, black in color and mounted on a buffalo, holding a staff, is stationed in the south.

Again likewise, Varuṇa, the lord of waters, white in color and dwelling upon a serpent, holding a nāga lasso in his hand, is stationed in the west.

Again likewise, the Malevolent One (Kubera), yellow and ugly in form, dwelling upon a treasure, holding a citron (bījapūraka) and a mongoose (nakulī) in his hands, is stationed in the north.

Likewise, the one with a nose, white in color, dwelling upon a rat, holding a counting rosary and a skull-cup in the right hand, and in the left a bag and a cord.

Likewise, Īśvara (the Great God, Śiva), white in color, mounted upon a fine white bull, holding a trident and bearing a skull in his hands, with his two arms embracing Gaurī, is stationed in Īśvara's own direction.

Again likewise, Agni, the fire deity, red in color, mounted upon a goat, holding a counting rosary and a water-flask, is stationed in the direction of fire.

Again likewise, the Rākṣasa, mounted upon a corpse, holding a curved knife and skull-cup, dark blue in color, wrathful and fierce, is stationed in the direction of the south-west.

Again likewise, Vāyu, the wind deity, smoke-colored, mounted upon a tawny deer, holding a wind banner, is stationed in the direction of wind.

Again likewise, the Sun is red, holding a lotus in each of his two hands, stationed above upon his seven horses in the direction of the zenith.

Again likewise, the Moon is white, holding a white lotus in each of his two hands, mounted upon a chariot, stationed in the direction of the zenith.

Again likewise, Brahmā is tawny-white with four faces, holding a water-flask and the gesture of fearlessness, a staff and a counting rosary, mounted upon a goose, stationed in the direction of the zenith.

Again likewise, the Earth Goddess holds a vase in her left hand and the mudrā of oath and acceptance in her right, stationed in the direction of the nadir.

Again likewise, Dhṛtarāṣṭra, blue in color, dwelling upon a chariot, holds a sword and the threatening gesture in his right and left hands respectively, and is likewise stationed in his own direction.

All of these are drawn in by the wrathful deity in the form of Yamāntaka, who holds a phurba (ritual dagger) in his hand, through rays of light emanating from the seed syllables at his throat and heart. One then drives this phurba into their hearts, throats, crowns of the head, and the tips of their feet, reciting:

Oṃ Hṛīḥ Ṣṭṛīḥ Vikṛtānana Hūṃ Hūṃ Phaṭ Phaṭ Hūṃ Sarvān Tadīna Kīlaya Hūṃ Phaṭ.

This means that the phurba, accomplished in an unbroken continuity through the gathering of bodhicitta-fluid and so forth, establishes all of these in the form perfected as Yamāntaka. At the ultimate conclusion accomplished through the sequential signs of the seeds of the form of bodhicitta-fluid and the wind-seed, that which is accomplished from the seed syllable Hrīḥ is Indra. That accomplished from the seed syllable Ṣṭrīḥ is Yama. That accomplished from the seed syllable Vi is Varuṇa. That accomplished from the seed syllable Kṛ is the Malevolent One. That accomplished from the seed syllable Tā is Īśvara. That accomplished from the seed syllable A is Fire. That accomplished from the seed syllable Na is the south-west. That accomplished from the seed syllable Na is Wind. That accomplished from the seed syllable Hūṃ is the Moon. That accomplished from the seed syllable Hūṃ is the Sun. That accomplished from the seed syllable Phaṭ is Brahmā. That accomplished from the seed syllable Phaṭ is the Stream of Wealth.

That accomplished from the seed syllable Sa is Viṭhāgra. That accomplished from the seed syllable Hā is all spirits. And so in the same way one should conceive each as being fully accomplished.

Concerning how they abide with respect to their eyes and other sense faculties: likewise, with respect to the eyes and other faculties as they appear in the perfect bodies and so forth, just as one confers empowerment upon the vajra body and the rest — so here, each is crowned by Yamāntaka. One should then offer the incense-scattering together with the water-offering and the like, and also present the mouth-cooling water and so forth.

The presentation of the outer torma (Skt. bali) is as follows: preceded by the complete sequence of the nectar-accomplishment ritual, one praises each of them with the three — the suchness — and then meditates by imagining their tongues being well engaged. The nectar is offered with this mantra:

Oṃ rakta-mukutāya, rakta-jaṭāya, rakta-mukhāya, rakta-śarīrāya, rakta-bhujāya, rakta-muṇḍa-mālā-bharaṇāya, rakta-ratha-samārūḍhāya, rakta-padmāsanāya, rakta-bharaṇa-bhūṣaṇāya — idaṃ baliṃ grhṇa grhṇa, mama vighnaṃ hara hara, catur-māraṃ nivāraya nivāraya, trāśaya trāśaya, bhrāmaya bhrūmaya, chinda chinda, bhinda bhinda, nāśaya nāśaya, śośaya śośaya, cheda cheda, bheda bheda, hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā.

Afterward, one should make use of each in its own portion. Then:

Oṃ indrāya namaḥ — Hrīḥ.

Yamāya namaḥ — Ṣṭhrīḥ.

Varuṇāya namaḥ — Vi.

Kuberāya namaḥ — Kṛ.

Īśvarāya namaḥ — Ta.

Yajñāye namaḥ — Ā.

Nairṛtyāya namaḥ — Na.

Vāyave namaḥ — Na.

Candrāya namaḥ — Hūṃ.

Arkāya namaḥ — Hūṃ.

Brahmaṇe namaḥ — Phaṭ.

Vasudhārāye namaḥ — Phaṭ.

Vemacitriṇe namaḥ — Svā.

Sarva-bhūtibhyo namaḥ — Hā.

Ha hā he hrai ho hau hūṃ hūṃ hūṃ — phem phem phem.

Afterward one should also offer flowers, incense, lamps, food, and the like. These beings, through the fervent devotion of the practitioner, will taste and enjoy every flavor and essence.

Then, while gently brandishing the vajra and softly ringing the bell, one should praise that assembly. Afterward, having made an outer request for the desired attainment to the Enjoyment of Delusion and the others, at the conclusion of the offering one should recite the eight types of laughing mantras. For the dismissal, one recites this mantra:

Ha hā he hrai ho hau hūṃ hūṃ — visarjayeta — Oṃ āḥ mu.

Alternatively, with that formula one may also dismiss them.

Then, through the sincere aspiration of the practitioner:

So that you may accomplish the welfare of all sentient beings, bestow the attainments you grant to those who follow you.

And though you have departed to the realm of the buddhas,

we request you to come here once again.

This completes the eleventh chapter — the detailed exposition of the tormā ritual — extracted from the tantra of the Body, Speech, and Mind of all Tathāgatas: the Red Yamāntaka.

Then all the Blessed Tathāgatas offered praise to the Blessed One, the Great Bodhisattva Vajrasattva:

You whose nature is the vajra of delusion,

the supremely fearsome Yamāntaka —

the Teacher, the nature of all buddhas — to your vajra body we bow and offer praise.

You whose nature is the vajra of slander,
the supremely fearsome Yamāntaka —
perfectly matching the vajra mind — to the Precious Vajra we bow and offer praise.

You whose nature is the vajra of attachment, the chief source of all phenomena of desire — the supreme of voices, the highest of all heights — to the vajra speech we bow and offer praise.

You whose nature is the vajra of envy,
the Yamāntaka who embodies every action — perfectly matching the vajra body — to the sword-bearing one we bow and offer praise.

You who are the nature of all buddhas,
the single summation of all buddhas,
the supreme chief of all buddhas —
to the lord of the maṇḍala we bow and offer praise.

What the Blessed One taught as "the vajra eye, the vajra ear, the vajra nose, the vajra tongue, the vajra body, and the vajra mind" — these are the samāyas (Skt. samaya) of blessing that pertain to the eyes and the other senses.

Then, from the fearsome Yamāntaka —

I will now fully explain the maṇḍala. It is equal to the fearsome Yamāntaka, the accomplisher of all aims. With a fresh cord well drawn taut, beautiful, correct, and perfect, a person of wisdom should strike the lines for Yamāntaka's maṇḍala.

Complete in every characteristic, it destroys all that is purposeless. For the aspects of the maṇḍala of the ritual of accomplishment — for pacification and the rest — one should draw the karma vajra. At each of its five tips, draw a vajra in the center. It is densely crowded with blazing vajras. On the eastern spoke draw a wheel; rays of the wheel fill it throughout. In the south draw a jewel; it pervades everywhere with garlands of rays. In the west draw a lotus; its rays are beautiful as ruby light. In the north draw a sword; its rays match the color of cloud.

At the southeast intermediate direction draw a wheel. In the south draw a vajra. In the west draw a lotus — faces in lotus form, the countenance fully bloomed. In the north draw a sword, endowed with rays matching the five lights. At the eastern gate a club; a vajra staff at the south. At the western gate a water-born lotus; a vajra sword at the north.

Having understood that the maṇḍala is complete, a qualified one should perform the offering. With the five qualities of desire — without any doubt — make offering to the buddhas.

This is the twelfth chapter, which is the sequential exposition of the great maṇḍala, drawn from the tantra of the body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas: the Red Yamāntaka.

Then the Blessed One, all the Tathāgatas, addressed this king of praises to the great Vajradhara, the lord of all the Blessed Ones, all the Tathāgatas:

One who is perfectly joined through the declared mudrā, who praises the vajras —
through the mudrā, the vajra mudrā, may you accomplish the many siddhis.

Then the king Vajradhara spoke these words:

Meditate on the fearsome Yamāntaka upon the crown of the heads of all those in the maṇḍala. Always make the maṇḍala round, always perform fire offerings and worship, always accomplish the samaya, and take up its vow.

First, confer the crown empowerment. Second, give the sword. Third, the vajra bell. Fourth, the lunar food offering. The fourth great empowerment arises from the red countenance. By the power of this empowerment, one attains the essential taste of the victors' awakening.

Then, as I teach the mantras, make tormas offerings to all the spirits. By reciting the great mantra, all spirits are thoroughly set ablaze.

The seed syllables of the mantra are Hrīḥ, Ṣṭrīḥ, and so forth; at the end, append Svāhā without fail.

Mix viṭa and maṭa with water, make a triangular maṇḍala, and by this the yogin should please the gods, crying out "Hā Hā," and then call them to mind again.

The ritual of the three wheel-circles — having eight, twelve, and sixteen spokes — the learned one should draw according to the rite, and place mantras throughout. One who observes the vow should place the mantras of accomplishment on the twelfth. All that is moving and unmoving throughout the three realms will be fully accomplished, without exception, without remainder.

Yamarāja sadomeya,
Yamedoruṇayodaya, Yadayanirayakṣeya, Yakṣeyacchanirāmaya.

The syllable Ya in the center; to the east.

The syllable Ma — gentle, like Mañjuśrī's vajra — in the south.

The syllable Me draw in the west.

In the north, the syllable Da, which is white.

Having taken the name of the one for whom the rite is performed, place it in the intermediate spaces. Support it with two Hūṃ syllables. This accomplishes every desired aim.

Yacchanirājasadoru,

this too should be written correctly on the outside, beginning from the left, in order to accomplish all aims. Beginning from the east, one should write, omitting one cell at a time, starting from in front of the third row of cells.

The mantras Hrīḥ and Ṣṭrīḥ should be written correctly in the intermediate spaces of the eight cells and in the cells themselves.

Cagemoku — Kuru Mārāya, Ucchaṭāya, Vaśaṃkuru, Vidveṣaya Śāntiṃkuru, Puṣṭiṃkuru — and so forth are to be employed in accordance with the rite being performed. Oṃ comes first, Namaḥ at the end. At the end: Vaśaṃ Bauṣaṭ. Together with the syllables Hūṃ and Phaṭ — this accomplishes pacification, enrichment, and subjugation.

This is the thirteenth section, entitled "The Empowerment and the Appearance of the Yantra," drawn from the tantra of the body, speech, and mind of all the Tathāgatas: the Red Yamāntaka.

The Blessed One acted with love,
in the true form of the great Yamāntaka.
He looks upon beings oppressed by aversion,
and brings all aversion to exhaustion.

The Blessed One acted with love,
in the supreme form of Yamāntaka of delusion.
He looks upon beings oppressed by delusion,
and brings all delusion to exhaustion.

The Blessed One acted with love,
in the supreme form of Yamāntaka of slander.
He looks upon beings oppressed by slander,
and brings all slander to exhaustion.

The Blessed One acted with love,
in the supreme form of Yamāntaka of attachment.
He looks upon beings oppressed by attachment,
and brings all attachment to exhaustion.

The Blessed One acted with love,
in the supreme form of Yamāntaka of envy.
He looks upon beings oppressed by envy,
and brings all envy to exhaustion.

Loving-kindness is said to be Carcikā;
the sow is likewise compassion.
Sarasvatī is to be known as joy;
equanimity takes the form of Gaurī.

By all things as they are in one's very being,
the maṇḍala is once again perfected in its entirety.
The yogin radiates the seed from the heart.
That this will be accomplished — of this there is no doubt.

The body, speech, and mind of Yamāntaka in his terrifying form — meditate upon them throughout the directions of the great charnel ground, mounted upon a supreme buffalo, adorned with ornaments of serpents, upon a vajra of iron. His hair, reddish-gold, coils upward. He has a form of surpassing excellence. His head is perfectly encircled by skulls. His beard, reddish-gold, is bristling. Recite the mantras beginning with Hrīḥ and Ṣṭrīḥ. Brandish the vajra staff. The yogin of Yamāntaka should sound forth a lion's roar. Having gained some measure of power, he should enter a city and disport himself — performing the most beautiful dance, and taking up songs in six modes and so forth.

Looking upon a victory banner set on scales, he should strive with it using milk, with one-pointed mind focused on the milk. He should strive greatly at the great seal. Having meditated in the form of the sow, the yogin, fearless as a lion, accomplishes all desired aims — and all queens are brought to the limit of desire.

Now I shall correctly explain the thorough accomplishment of the seal. The great mantra is a single-syllable mantra. Its recitation is herein definitively explained. Meditate perfectly upon the buffalo-face arising from the seed syllable Ṣṭrīḥ. Meditate upon it dwelling in the vajra maṇḍala, atop the buffalo. Whatever manifolds of weapons in their natural forms are present upon the earth — a wise one should meditate upon them in hand. This is the accomplishment of the one with the buffalo face.

Now I shall correctly explain the method of accomplishment of the vajra staff. The syllable Hrīḥ is the great secret mantra. Mounted upon the great buffalo — with two hundred thousand completed prostrations, the body smeared with ashes — pressing down what is corrupt beneath, high as Mount Meru, now I shall correctly explain the method of accomplishment by ten million prostrations.

Vikṛtāna is the great secret mantra, chief among those arising from the syllable Hūṃ:

Oṃ Vikṛtāna Na Haṃ Hā Hi Hoḥ Hūṃ Hūṃ He Heḥ Hoḥ Haḥ Svāhā.

The fulfillment of the sacred commitment that accomplishes all purposes is explained here. When wearied by mantra recitation, one should eat food.

Take up blameless meat, obtaining it without fault. Likewise great meat, and horse, and likewise extraordinary elephant, the form of cow, dog, and female donkey — these are to be purified. Mixed with rama herb and cooked, the great fat is then anointed prominently upon the body. By merely smearing this upon the body, one gains power over all beings without exception.

Vairocana Sin Du Vārañca — likewise bilva leaves, together with wild boar ash, and the sap of the golden tree: these are to be rubbed and wiped upon this body. Like the nectar of the great vajra, like drinking self-arisen flowers — this is the supreme and highest yoga.

This is the fourteenth chapter, the section on accomplishing the sacred commitments in the practice drawn from the tantra of Red Yamāntaka, Body, Speech, and Mind of All the Tathāgatas.

Then the Blessed One entered meditative absorption in the form of the great being's sacred commitment of Carcikā, entered meditative absorption in the form of Vajravārāhī, and entered meditative absorption in the form of Gaurī — and from those absorptions, this supplication is to be made with the following song of offering:

How wonderful! Red Yamāntaka, guru whose nature is that of a wrathful spirit —
seeing you, I am seized by fear;
O Guru, cast aside your wrathful nature.
The heavens, the surface of the earth, and the regions below:
all are set trembling by your dance.
With eyes anointed in blood and a wrathful mind,
you dance, O you of zombie form.
Red, of measured and compact stature,
you manifest emanation forms in many guises.
Vajra Sarasvatī has made request:
your dance, O you of great bliss!
The dance of your Hrīḥ Śrī mantra dispels the confusion of all three levels of the earth.
Loving yet wrathful, O Venerable One,
you behold all beings and dance.

Now I shall perfectly explain the supreme characteristics of recitation. Through engaging in recitation thoroughly, one attains accomplishments in great number. Not too fast, not too slow, not too long, not too short — the mantra is heard just slightly. The supreme teacher of Yamāntaka: taking the bones of humans, buffaloes, cows, horses, and female donkeys, one shall accomplish the rosary of recitation fully. On the fourteenth day of each month, one should anoint with the five meats endowed with the five nectars. Through recitation one attains the supreme accomplishment. In pills made from the bones of each kind, the practitioner who meditates on Yamāntaka — or a skilled one — should visualize a fresh, blood-dripping human head. By ten thousand mantras, spirits of every kind and a thousand ḍākinīs, through perfect practice of Yamāntaka, hungry ghosts are destroyed and slain. If the yogin recites one hundred thousand times, all activities come to be accomplished thereby. With ten million recitations there is accomplishment — what need to speak of fifty million? Day by day, or month by month, or year by year, a skilled one offers sixty-four tormas cakes of sixty-four parts. For those who always eat, and likewise those who drink, and likewise all food of every kind — first offer it to Yamāntaka, and then the supreme excellent gift is to be offered to the guru. For the sake of one's own pacification and likewise for the sake of accomplishing all activities, one should definitely and humbly offer one's own body. Horse, cow, elephant, gold, wealth, mother, one's own wife, son likewise, mother, sister, niece, garments of various kinds, umbrella, a beautiful fan, house, throne, fine fragrance, song and likewise music, sword, ornaments in the same way — all these one possessed of vows offers to the guru.

This is the fifteenth chapter, the section on accomplishing all methods from the tantra of Red Yamāntaka, Body, Speech, and Mind of All the Tathāgatas.

Then, for the sake of cutting and destroying the māras (Skt. māra) and the afflictions such as attachment of all sentient beings, the body color is red. The three eyes signify the three times — past, future, and present. The two hands signify the crushing of conceptual thoughts regarding existence and non-existence. The embrace of the wisdom mother signifies the union of emptiness and compassion as inseparable. The eight nāgas (Skt. nāga) are taught to signify the eight consciousnesses. The garland of a hundred and fifty skulls on the head signifies the union of the fifty syllables. The skull cup on the left is completely filled with the essential nectar of the five wisdoms (Skt. jñāna) and is of the nature of emptiness. The club on the right crushes the māras of the aggregates, afflictions, the sons of gods, and death, and is of the nature of compassion. The left foot extended is explained as the three realms. In the goddess's left hand, the skull cup holds the immeasurable blood of the four māras, together with mercury, extracted essence, and taste-essence. In the right hand is the curved knife that cuts conceptual thoughts regarding existence and non-existence. The wrathful form, broad and expansive, signifies the taming of the malevolent. The red-golden hair blazing upward signifies the immeasurability of emanations. The four corners are explained as the Four Noble Truths: suffering, the origin of suffering, cessation, and the path. The four doors strike terror into the four māras. The four angles are for the complete perfection of the four divine abodes (Skt. brahma-vihāra). The eight pillars are for the eight examples of illusion: the emanated city, the echo, illusion, clouds, the animal's thirst, the mirror, the reflection, and the moon in water. The open space signifies the crushing of afflictions regarding existence and non-existence. The perfect abandonment is the net and the half-net. The four staircases are the purification of the four means of attraction: giving, pleasant speech, meaningful conduct, and concordance of purpose.

Now I shall fully explain the sādhanā of the Vajra Ḍākinī.

Going into the center of the element of space,
one should contemplate the supreme solar maṇḍala.

Then meditate vividly on the five-pointed,
and above it place a lotus.

She is dark in color, with great fearsomeness, possessing a beautiful form with six hands.

Meditate on her as holding a vajra in one hand,
and place other implements in the remaining hands.

In the east, the Buddha Ḍākinī — six-handed, corresponding to delusion, holding a wheel, greatly fearsome — is to be meditated upon in the yoga maṇḍala.

In the south, the Jewel Ḍākinī — six-handed, corresponding to slander.

Holding a jewel, greatly fearsome — is to be meditated upon in the solar maṇḍala.

In the west, the Dharma Ḍākinī —

In the north, the Karma Ḍākinī — holding a sword in the essence maṇḍala.

At the four intermediate directions, beginning with fire,
the practitioner holding vows should meditate on the goddesses:
the perfume-bearer, likewise the dancer,
the songstress, and the especially charming one.

Then meditate on the door guardians and perform the ritual activities accordingly.

Oṃ Buddhḍākinī. Oṃ Vajraḍākinī. Oṃ Dharmaḍākinī. Oṃ Ratnaḍākinī.

Lāṃ Māṃ Nāṃ Gāṃ — at the intermediate directions.

Oṃ Muṅgarajaḥ. Oṃ Daṇḍa Hūṃ. Oṃ Padma Bhaṃ. Oṃ Khaḍga Hoḥ.

These are the sādhanā of the Vajra Ḍākinī as taught by the Blessed One Vajradhara. To accomplish what has been heard from afar, one should meditate on the Vajra Ḍākinī. The words of her mantra are as follows:

Oṃ Ākāśacara Vajraḍākinī Svāhā.

Then further — now I shall fully explain
the sādhana of the Vajra Subterranean one.
In order to accomplish the subterranean cavity,
one should meditate on the Glorious Vajra.
Six-handed, blue in color,
holding a wooden mallet in hand.
In the center of the essence maṇḍala —

This one performs the supreme practice. In the east one should place Locanā, in the south likewise Māmakī, in the west the White-robed Goddess, in the north one should place Tārā. Flowers, incense, lamps, and fragrances — these and fire and so on one should set out for them. At the door, with mallet and the rest, one binds the girdle with serpent ornaments. Likewise one should meditate on the wheel, and the rites are all performed by consulting the ritual procedure. One who has the union of the Vajra Subterranean one will know the cavity in a dream. Then I shall fully explain the maṇḍala of the Seven Kings. To accomplish the traversal of the sky, one should accomplish the Supreme Horse. It has one face and two hands, is blue in color and terrifying. Dwelling upon the sun, extremely terrible is the horse-face. In the right hand a sword held in a fist, in the left hand a skull-cup — six hands in all. Oṃ Phu Phu Hī Hī. One endowed with wisdom should recite this mantra. To fully accomplish the Supreme Horse, in the east one should meditate on Bhidavī, in the south on the Swift-Moving One, in the west on the Queen of the Seventh, and in the north one should place the Supreme Mare. Each one's face and hands are to be meditated as identical to those of the chief figure. By this mantra all are rendered similar, and the celebration is famed. Flute, lute, round drum, and frame drums — these too one places at the corners. The nose-ring of a cow, the nose-ring of an elephant, likewise one of fine complexion and one of rough complexion, a wooden wedge, an axe, a hook, and a lasso. Through the yoga of dance and so forth, one should constantly meditate at the four doors. One should visualize green barley with its ears. The symbols of each likewise to the right. Just as the mantra of the Supreme Horse applies also to the Vajra Subterranean one. From the practice of meditating on the Supreme Horse, one travels through the sky of the three realms.

This is the sixteenth chapter, the clearly distinguished sequence of accomplishments, taken from the Tantra of the Body, Speech, and Mind of All the Tathāgatas — the Red Yamāntaka (Skt. Yamāntaka).

Now the supreme sacred commitment of casting the thread here is: Akāro mukhaṃ sarvadharmāṇām ādyanutpannatvāt.

The glorious figure of Yamāntaka, the destroyer — the student is to be made Vairocana. Take hold of the tip of the supreme wisdom-drop, and cast it well from meditative equipoise. This is the sacred commitment for entering the great maṇḍala. Oṃ Āḥ Hūṃ.

The maṇḍala shall be twice as long as it is wide. Its door shall be one-twentieth of that as its thickness. Anoint it well with the five kinds of cow-products; check that the cord is without any doubling. This is the sacred commitment for entering the Great Vajra: "Ah, O great buddhas and master teachers! Ah, O lord of Dharma and of the Saṅgha! Grant me this very sacred commitment. Also bestow the awakening mind upon me." This is the sacred commitment for fully grasping the great earth.

Having invited the goddess of the Vajra Earth, she is the witness — goddess — for the conduct and special qualities and grounds and perfections of the practice of all the protecting buddhas. "Goddess, you are the witness." The door should be known by the great lord of the maṇḍala as one-eighth of the maṇḍala. The great realm, excepting that, is of perfect measure and extremely beautiful. Door and door-frame are to be understood accordingly. Half of that is the vestibule, where singers, dancers, and so on — together with the vajra goddesses — are rightly present. Half of that is the colored-sand ground. Half of the door is the side-walls and flanks. Here too are the net and half-net, sun, moon, and flower garlands, and the divine vestibule — the measure of the first portion; likewise that is the outer maṇḍala.

Now here I place this great essence as a wheel in the sky. One's own mudrā is also established there. Having introduced the commitment wisdom, one should fully accomplish the maṇḍala. In the east is the great white, in the south that which is endowed with yellow, in the west the red portion, in the north that endowed with marakata — with a radiance equal to that of indranīla blue sapphire — one draws it correctly on the central ground. By observing the ritual of the rite —

One places its mudrā there. In the center one draws a vajra correctly. In the east one draws a wheel with care. One should regard these and the like in the same way. The mudrā is ever equal to the sky.

For this, the measure of the pouring vessel and the filling vessel: by that measure one makes the handle. That which is endowed with the measure of one cubit — on its very tip one makes a maṇḍala. That which is endowed with the measure of four finger-widths, with a depth of two finger-widths — upon it, at half a finger-width, there is a juice-cavity in the form of a lotus. At the measure of a thumb's belly in breadth, the depth is equal to one finger-width.

This tantra is supremely praised. One who has not entered the maṇḍala, one who has committed the five acts of immediate consequence, one who kills living beings, one who eats fish and meat and the like, one who is attached to alcohol and sensual pleasures, one who holds nihilistic ascetic vows, one who has not received empowerment, one who delights in doing what ought not to be done, and one who causes divisions in cities — even more so than any of these — just as the speech of the red one prescribes, one inclines toward the supreme tantra of Yamāntaka. In accomplishing this there is no doubt.

Then all the vajra bodhisattvas, beginning with Maitreya, having heard the unprecedented speech of the Great Vajra, remained utterly silent.

Then this is the commitment for invoking the vajra. That too is the great seed of the elements. One should fully accomplish the four wheels. By thoroughly purifying the four stations, one causes even the sky to tremble.

Beneath the very soles of the feet is the syllable Yaṃ; at the navel is Raṃ; at the heart is Laṃ; at the crown of the head is the syllable Baṃ.

One of the form of a great black bow, the fierce wind, terrifying, blazing like a triangular fire, burning with a radiance equal to that of a red sun. The sequence of the vajra ground is a great yellow square. That treasure-holder pressed down by Mount Meru and its mountains — meditate upon it. White and round, like a vase, it holds rain like a cloud. Cool as a snow mountain, utterly filled with a thousand. By thoroughly applying the four stations, one meditates upon the vajra student. One applies Vajra Illumination (Anantaprabha) and thereby swiftly brings it down.

And this is the commitment of the question. Vajra Dharma, the great protector, Amitābha of great bliss — speak! The great Dharma of desire: inquire well into virtue and non-virtue. Grasping from one cubit onward, for as long as one thousand cubits, the great student leaps upward. This is the commitment for the descent.

Now I shall explain correctly the defining characteristics of painting an image.

The ground is to be treated with oil and pressed down by one who holds ascetic vows. Likewise pulse-broth, fresh milk, molasses, dried leaves, and the like; sesame, neem leaves, and likewise the seeds of nāṭī. First one paints in white; then one paints over it with other colors. For skull-cap, brush, and pen, mixed with water it becomes like lac. From turmeric and indigo it likewise becomes green. Blue is always produced with indigo. Likewise intense fire produces black. Grey is produced likewise with babalā. Likewise red is produced with vermillion. One adds to it the juice of kapeda. Not too little and not too much the excess, but with what exceeds, black is diminished and grey it becomes.

Now the defining characteristics of form for both the wrathful and the peaceful shall be explained. The peaceful is said to be elegant. The wrathful is heard to be thick-set and short. By the measure of four finger-widths: the forehead likewise, the face likewise. The throat, likewise the cheeks, and at the secret place the measure of four finger-widths. The arms are twenty-four finger-widths, the forearms twenty finger-widths. Hands, feet, likewise the face; at the eyes the measure is that of a thumb. The ears are said to be two finger-widths.

At the hollow of the nostrils, likewise four finger-widths; at the two lips, two finger-widths. At the base of the navel, one finger-width. Excepting the throat, on the body the measure of one third of the face is accepted. The locks of hair are the measure of the face. The jewelled crown ornament is six finger-widths. Then the sādhana of the noble lady, finger-width by finger-width, shall be thoroughly explained by me.

By merely meditating upon her, one walks upon the surface of water. Golden in colour, with three faces and six arms, arisen from the seed-syllable of the element Pha, holding a serpent in her hand, her form is great. She delights in riding upon a peacock. In the east, place a peacock; in the south, likewise one with a frowning brow; in the west, one who dwells in the wilderness with leaves; in the north, one who holds a vajra and iron chains. Peacock feathers, a libation vessel, branches, and likewise iron chains — all these are to be clearly visualised. Yellow, red, green, and the distinction of blue in colour — one endowed with wisdom should meditate upon them accordingly. And likewise recite this mantra: Oṃ Phū Ja Ḥ. At the door, place hammers and the like; at the intermediate directions, flowers and the like. One who has the practice of the noble Jāṃgulī will always walk upon the surface of water.

Then the sādhana of Kurukullā shall be thoroughly explained by me. By merely meditating upon her, one summons the daughters of the nāgas. Red in colour, with four faces and endowed with eight arms, arisen from the seed-syllable Hṛīḥ, she is the one who summons the nāgas. The eight classes of nāgas, beginning with Anantā and the rest, are to be placed in the eight arms. Her body is adorned with ornaments of serpents. One possessed of vows should meditate upon the beautiful one. The mantra is: Kurukullā Hṛīḥ Phūḥ Svāhā.

Then, in brief rather than at length, the secret shall be explained. By merely knowing it, one summons the daughters of the gods. She has one face and two arms, holding in her hands an arrow and a bow. Her body is to be visualised as bodiless, of a great golden colour. In the east, visualise the joyful one; in the south, visualise the beautiful intoxicating one; in the west, the goddess of desire; in the north, the one who inspires intoxicated delight. All the goddesses of desire are visualised with arrow and bow in hand. Yellow, red, likewise green, and white-red — these are to be meditated upon. At the intermediate directions, always place Roaming Woman, Unchecked Woman, and Commanding Woman; those called Crocodile-Banner are fully explained at the aspect of the door. Craving Woman, Proud Woman, and likewise Mindful Woman — these are lords of the intermediate directions. On the crowns of all those deities, meditate upon Yamāntaka. The women, facing the sky at the edge, meditate upon the bodiless vajra. Born fully from the mantra of the syllable Śī, radiating everywhere, she is to be visualised as beguiling and distracted, desiring pleasure with an intoxicated mind, entirely wrapped in red garments, falling at the feet. To her, the mantra is to be recited very diligently. The syllable Oṃ is given at the beginning as a distinguishing vowel; the syllable Svāhā is given at the end. Recite the mantras of the syllable Śīta. Che ge mo — by my own authority, the red speech, just as it is — if one has meditated upon everything entirely, the yogin will attain his desire.

This is the seventeenth chapter, the Body, Speech, and Mind of all the Tathāgatas from the Red Yamāntaka Tantra, arranged in sequence beginning with the bodiless one and so forth.

Then the sādhana of the great Heruka shall be thoroughly explained by me. Through it, one who understands is swiftly liberated from the bondage of saṃsāra. With one face and two arms, his body colour deep blue, intensely wrathful — meditate upon him holding a vajra. In the other hand, place a skull. With three eyes, his hair blazing upward, he is adorned with the five mudrās. At his left side is a khaṭvāṅga. He is adorned with great ankle-rings. Arisen from the seed-syllable Hūṃ, he stands above a hungry ghost, ever smiling.

Perfectly united with the five buddhas, adorned at the crown with five skulls, conceive the diadem of Akṣobhya — meditate fully upon the one renowned as Heruka.

In the east, draw the wheel of Dharma.
In the south, awakening of the buddhas.
In the west, the wrathful tree of the five desires.
In the north, one equal to Heruka —

of variegated form, graceful,
adorned entirely with all ornaments,
beautiful of body, standing above a hungry ghost:
she who utterly destroys all delusion.

Likewise, in the other wheel of Dharma, meditate upon the wish-fulfilling jewel, the wish-granting tree,
and the excellent vase.
In the goddesses' right hands,
meditate also upon the vajra.

In all the maṇḍalas, without exception,
the skull-cup is in the left.
Locanā, Māmakī, Tārā, and the White-Robed one, supremely lovely — at the four cardinal directions beginning with the east, in the outer wheel: Yamāntaka,
the one who brings wisdom to its end, Hayagrīva, and Amṛtakuṇḍalin — meditate upon these.

Having guarded the gates of the wheel,
and having seen the rites and ceremonies, meditate upon the five aspects and contemplate fully the awakening of the buddhas.

The yogin should meditate upon the wheel.
With the four songs perfectly applied,
rouse the one who possesses the wheel.

With pleasing songs such as the carcikā and others,
with the sixfold melody and other songs,
lovingly, arise, wrathful Lord!

Dispel the delusion of the three worlds.
Arise, Lord beyond conception!
Conquer all four mārās.
The Protector of the World praises you — remain!
Arise, Lord, merit of the world!

To the Protector of the World concerning awakening itself:
you contemplate emptiness.
Just as shooting stars stream forth,
the awakening mind enters into that.
Through love, the mind bound by attachment melts away —
and that very one is the Vajradhara himself.

First, meditate upon yoga.
Second, thereafter, subsequent yoga.
Third is the extreme yoga.
Fourth is the great yoga.

Regarding the perfection of Vajrasattva,
that is declared to be yoga.
Regarding the perfection of the divine body,
that is known as subsequent yoga.

Regarding the perfection of all the wheels,
that is held to be extreme yoga.
The blessing of the divine eyes and so forth,
of body, speech, and mind,
the introduction of the wheel of gnosis, likewise the tasting of nectar,
and the great offering and praise —
these are held to be great yoga.

One must not disrespect the master.
Do not transgress the word of the Sugata.
Likewise, do not be wrathful toward one's vajra-kin,
and do not proclaim their faults.

Never abandon the mind of loving-kindness toward all sentient beings.
Never abandon the awakening mind.
Do not disparage the Dharma of self or other.
Do not reveal secrets to sentient beings who are not yet ripened.

Do not denigrate one's own aggregates.

Do not disparage the Dharma of the Blessed One.

Always abandon harmful affection.

Do not deceive sentient beings who have faith.

Always rely upon the sacred commitments.

Likewise, the fault of disparaging the wisdom-nature of women is the same.

Do not make yoga a matter of idle longing,
and do not abandon yoga.

Always and everywhere recite the secret mantra.

Always rely upon the sacred commitments and so forth.

If through heedlessness

one has violated the commitments to one's guru, draw a complete circular maṇḍala, confess the transgression before the Sugatas,
and with faith guard the commitments of the guru.

One who possesses compassion, without conceptuality, with a mind intent on abandoning every single transgression, should devote oneself to meditation and to supreme recitation,
be steadfast and gentle, possessed of a loving mind,
with faith and superior intention,
with the highest patience —

such a person should always be taken as one's guru.

The student, with devotion to the guru,
and with deep reverence for Yamāntaka,
should, possessed of ascetic conduct, be brought to full ripening.

Then the Blessed One, having heard the words of Vajrasattva — who is of the essential nature of the supreme great bliss of all Tathāgatas — fell silent and said nothing. For this purpose, the following was declared:

The ultimate yantra is the great Yamāntaka.

The ultimate ascetic practice is the great skull.

The ultimate tantra is the assembly —
what has not arisen will not come to arise.

How wondrous — the teaching of great peace!
How wondrous — the wrathful one who inspires dread!
How wondrous — the supreme nirvāṇa!
How wondrous — saṃsāra itself as peace!
How wondrous — this is supremely marvelous!

Whatever is a fault becomes a quality.
There is no awakening, no realization,
no thing, and no meditation,
no element, and no consciousness —
it is utterly like the expanse of space.
Like space, it is without self.
This teaching is great bliss.

There is no earth, no water,
no fire, no wind, no space.
What is generated through the supreme union of Vajrasattva abides perfectly here.

All things are declared to be non-things;
therefore it is proclaimed: there is no intrinsic nature.
For one who is endowed with the practice of yoga,
it is neither annihilation nor permanence, without limbs, without color —
all things are not truly existent.
Beginning, middle, and end are abandoned —
this is the defining characteristic of supreme bliss.

Then Carcikā and the others declared this in response:

Unconnected with merit or with sin,
supreme bliss — stainless, utterly pure —
the sole great treasure of suchness abides perfectly in the mind of universal compassion.

The nature of this supreme bliss is the very substance of great bliss, the essential nature of phenomena.
Without form, without merit, without sin — arising and ceasing simply do not exist.

The body, speech, and mind of all Tathāgatas —

This is the eighteenth chapter — the sequential unfolding of bodhicitta — from the tantra of Red Yamāntaka.

Now the narrative account shall be fully told.

At the time when the Blessed One was on the verge of perfect awakening, in order to obstruct his awakening, an exceedingly terrifying great fear appeared and an immeasurable great host of the army of Māra arrived. At that time the Blessed One entered into meditative absorption in the samādhi called Supreme Victor over the Great Māra. From the vajras of his own body, speech, and mind, the wrathful Yamāntaka was definitively emanated. Having been thus emanated, while Vajrapāṇi was acting in accordance with the command of the Blessed One, the great mighty one, the Blessed One declared: "Vajrapāṇi, assume the form of this wrathful Yamāntaka and strike terror and fear into māras, yakṣas, asuras, gods, and rākṣasas!"

At that time, having heard what the Blessed One thus declared, I seized it in an instant, grasped its meaning, compressed it, and with great joy gave rise to excellent intention. To the great lord of secrets he then declared:

The methods for fully entering the city of the other shore should be made perfectly clear.

Those who wish to go and return should recite the mantra with samādhi.

By reciting ten million times, accomplishment is attained — what need is there even to speak of fifty million?

Begin from the first point onward.

Oneself being like space —
at the time when one first begins to accustom oneself, let the mind be introduced to mind itself.

For example, this mind, as in a dream,
can go and can turn back again,
and in a single moment abides just so.

Through uninterrupted practice of continuous application —

just as when a weapon is held steady and an arrow is shot from a bow,
so too here, through the bow of the mind,

it proceeds without interruption.

Through the joining of moon and sun,

the mind is to be driven by the wind.
Having fully released the body,
the mind goes forth and enters therein.

By gaining a little warmth,
the meditator, turned toward the side of attainment, enters within the body.

For example, departing from another village and overwhelming the pace of moon and sun, through the application of entering Rāhu, when the destination is reached — through the practice of riding the wind — having recognized the defining marks of the signs of death, one proceeds by means of the ritual possessing those defining marks, moving as one wishes, stirring or not stirring,
all one's desires arise fulfilled.

The lower path of thur-sel, at the secret extremity,
is released, and one begins at the navel.
Proceeding to the heart and the throat,
the life-breath passes out through the nostrils.

This is the nineteenth detailed section: the entry into the body of another village, from the tantra of Yamāntaka the Red — the Body, Speech, and Mind of all the Tathāgatas.

The glorious Tantra King of Yamāntaka the Red is complete.

This was requested in the presence of the Śākya monk Candraśrī, drawing on the spoken luminous rays of the venerable Lama Dharmarāja, the speech of the Bhoṭa paṇḍita, and the speech of the human sovereign Kūnga Zangpo, with gold offered by Pön Küngzhön. It was translated in the city of Yambu in Nepal by the great paṇḍita Candrakīrti and Yarlung-pa Drakpa Gyaltzen.

Translator's Notes

- The seed-syllable mantra string "ya kṣema me ya tsa ni rāja sa do ru ṇa yo ni ra" appears to be a phonetic rendering of a Sanskrit dhāraṇī-type syllabary used to generate the maṇḍala deities from individual syllables. The identifications of syllables with the five Yamāris and the four female consort deities that follow are internal to the text's own exegesis, and I have rendered them straightforwardly. The final verse breaks off mid-sentence in the source text as given.

The phrase "secret places of the vajra-lady" renders the tantric term bhaga (Sanskrit), which denotes the ritual matrix or source-seat of the consort; this is a technical tantric usage, not a gloss to be explained for general audiences, though listeners should be aware it carries that specialized meaning.

- The mantra "Om śūnyatā-jñāna-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako'ham" is a standard tantric self-identification formula rendered phonetically in the Tibetan and transliterated here directly. It means roughly "I am of the nature of emptiness-gnosis-vajra."

The phrase "vases of darkness" renders "mu men gyi bum pa," a technical tantric term likely referring to vessels associated with a specific directional or elemental offering; the precise referent is uncertain.

"Walking-corpse consort" renders ro langsa ma, a standard wrathful tantric consort figure; "walking corpse" or "vetālinī" is the technical designation.

The deity described is a form of Yamāntaka or a related Yama-subjugating wrathful deity within the Vajrayāna maṇḍala context.

- The verse passage describing the Lord of the Pendant-Ornaments (gdeng kā'i dbang po) presents several iconographic lists that are somewhat elliptical; the rendering follows the most natural reading of the individual epithets and ornaments as described. The figure "Rig-Idan" rendered as "learned one" or "variegated, learned one" refers to a type of serpent or ornament adorning the shoulder; the precise referent is uncertain but follows iconographic convention. "Phu-tā'i yi-ge" is a tantric seed-syllable whose precise identity in this context is uncertain and left transliterated. "Vajrabhārati" renders Vajra-dbyangs-can-ma, the Lady of Vajra-Sarasvatī; here the name literally means "Vajra Eloquent Lady" and corresponds to Vajrasarasvatī. The phrase "lama-demon" renders bla-ma srin-po'i rang-bzhin, a term for a particularly powerful and fearsome class of spirit whose nature partakes of both lama and demon; this is a tantric technical usage retained literally.

- The mantra "Om sarva-tathāgata-pūja-vajra-svabhāva-ātmako 'haṃ" is a standard tantric self-identification formula meaning "I am by nature the vajra of the worship of all Tathāgatas" and has been rendered in transliterated Sanskrit as befits liturgical mantra text.

The phrase rendered "five, including the elephant" refers to the five directional guardians or support-figures of the maṇḍala cosmogram, with the elephant associated with Indra in the east. The list is abbreviated in the original.

The passage "that from which confusion arises abides in duality" reflects a terse doctrinal statement about the nature of saṃsāric appearance; the Tibetan is compressed and elliptical here, and the rendering is a best approximation of the logical structure.

The term rendered "mechanical device" for 'khrul 'khor is technical tantric vocabulary (Sanskrit yantra), referring to a ritual implement or diagram used for specific purposes such as subjugation and protection. "Yantra" could be substituted if preferred by the production team.

- The Tibetan "མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་མཆོག་" literally means "blood of the nameless ones," which in tantric ritual context typically refers to blood from an anonymous or untraceable source, possibly corpse-blood; the precise referent is somewhat unclear but the rendering follows the literal sense.

The mantra syllables are transliterated as they appear in the Tibetan, preserving their liturgical form. Minor variations in spelling between occurrences reflect the Tibetan source itself.

"□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□□" — rendered "a son should scatter it as an offering"; the word "bu" here most naturally means "son" but could also mean "child" more generally; the ritual sense suggests a male agent performing the scattering.

- The mantra syllables are reproduced in transliteration as they appear in the Tibetan, following standard tantric editorial practice. The term rendered "the Great Sovereign" reflects རྒྱལ་པོ་, a common epithet in this ritual context for Yamāntaka's maṇḍala used as a suppression device. The "three pungent substances" is a standard Āyurvedic-tantric grouping typically comprising pepper, long pepper, and ginger, though the exact referent may vary by tradition.
- The passage contains two distinct mantra formulas. The name rendered as "Devadatta" and "Devayajña" represents Tibetan lha sbyin and mchod sbyin respectively — "god-given" and "sacrifice-given" — which may be personal names used in the rite as stand-ins for the target and an associate, or possibly technical terms for the parties to be set against one another. The choice to treat them as proper names follows the ritual context.

The phrase gsan par bya bas bsad par bya ("to be slain by slaying what must be kept secret") is genuinely difficult. The translation given reflects the most natural reading in the context of compassionate subjugation practice, where "what must be kept secret" refers to the afflictions that must be inwardly destroyed.

The instruction pag shin nags su bzhags byas la is rendered "placed in a pigsty or in a forest," where pag shin is ambiguous between "pigsty" and a type of tree; both readings are attested and the ritual context does not resolve the ambiguity definitively.

- The proper name Carcikā refers to a fierce goddess associated with blood and charnel grounds, appearing here as a form invoked by Yamāntaka. The rendering is kept in Sanskrit as a proper name.

The phrase rendered "the Lady Sovereign of Speech will be accomplished" refers to the siddhi of Sarasvatī, goddess of eloquence and learning, whose accomplishment grants mastery of speech and knowledge. The identification is confirmed by the immediately preceding attribution of the mantra to "Sarasvatī, the Melodious One."

The stūpa called Pāṭana likely refers to Patan (Lalitpur) in the Kathmandu Valley, a major center of tantric tradition, though the text reads the Tibetan phonetically as a place-name.

The final two lines are metrically compact and may serve as a colophon-verse or summary statement for the preceding set of rites, claiming their universal efficacy across all three realms.

- The colophon-like phrase rendered as "the third sequential division" follows the Tibetan "rim par phyé ba gsum pa" which marks this as the third chapter or section of the text's hook-mantra material. The precise structural logic of the chapter divisions is unclear from this passage alone, but the rendering is accurate to the literal sense.

The line "vajra disciple of the self-existent" renders "rdo rje slob ma bdag nyid che," where "bdag nyid che" could also be translated "the great self-nature" or function as an honorific; in tantric context it most naturally addresses the disciple as a great or exalted vajra disciple.

The passage breaks off mid-sentence at the end with "the wood of a pyre from a cremation ground at a charnel ground," as the Tibetan text itself is incomplete at this point.

- The phrase rendered "the five meats" refers to the standard tantric set of five ritual meats used in advanced practice; this is a technical term in the tantric context and has been rendered literally.

"Carry off by leprosy" translates a construction meaning the disease seizes or abducts the target of the ritual; this is consistent with the rite's harmful intent.

"Fill completely a human shinbone" refers to using a human femur or shin-bone as a ritual vessel, a practice known in tantric contexts.

"Reciting ten million times" renders འཁོར་ལོ་བཤམ་པ་, literally "ten million," the standard large unit in Tibetan numerical reckoning.

- The term rendered "fast-flowing river" (འཁོར་ལོ་བཤམ་པ་) could also mean "a constantly flowing stream." The choice does not affect the doctrinal sense.

The mantra string PHAṬ PHAṬ HŪṢ HŪṢ NA NA TĀ KṚ VI ṢṬĪ HRĪ OM is rendered phonetically from the Tibetan Devanāgarī-based transcription as faithfully as possible; precise Sanskrit reconstruction is uncertain.

The phrase "black fluid" renders རྩ་ཆུ་, literally "the black ones," likely referring to blood or bile in the context of wrathful visualization practice.

The text breaks off mid-sentence at the end, indicating the passage continues beyond what is supplied here.

- The botanical and materia magica names throughout this passage are rendered in transliteration from the Tibetan phonetic approximations of Sanskrit terms, as is standard in Tantric ritual literature; the exact botanical identifications are uncertain in several cases and would require specialist ethnopharmacological consultation. The term rendered "tortoise" for རྩ་ཆུ་, literally "one who protects from below," is a probable gloss for a specific animal; some traditions read this as a type of owl. The phrase "tree of sorrowlessness" renders རྩ་ཆུ་ལྷན་པ་, which may refer to the aśoka tree or to a ritual designation. The mantra syllables are transliterated as they appear in the Tibetan and are not emended.

- Several of the plant and substance names in this passage — dāhlavā, śākhoḍa, bāgula, suparṇamākṣikaṃ, dīśnanena, naraśeṇa, sahārī, muzhi, lhañ tsher — are Sanskrit or Indic technical terms from alchemical and medical traditions that resist confident botanical identification; they are transliterated as they appear rather than glossed, since any identification would be speculative. The term rañjanīlā is similarly rendered by transliteration. The phrase rāja in the bamboo-tube instruction likely refers to a technical alchemical term meaning "royal" substance or compound rather than a proper name, though certainty is not possible from context alone.

- Several plant and substance names throughout this passage are Sanskrit or Indic technical terms that cannot be identified with certainty from the Tibetan transliteration alone. These include somalata, palāśa, nāgakeśara, bakula, kathīnā, nyagrodha, jambīra, caṇḍālī, śrīṅgī, ciṭipā, abraṭaṃ, kakola, liśi, retya, and kāśī. They are rendered here in a best-attempt Sanskrit reconstruction from the Tibetan phonetic spelling. Where the plant identity is unclear, the transliterated name is preserved rather than guessed. The substance "Vairocana's plant" renders a Tibetan phrase using the name of the buddha Vairocana applied to a botanical ingredient, which is an unusual usage; it may be a plant name or a coded alchemical designation.

- Several plant and substance names in this passage are Sanskrit loanwords or technical names preserved in Tibetan transliteration whose precise botanical identification remains uncertain in the scholarly literature: karavīra is oleander; dantī and dantīrohā are Baliospermum species; śrīṅgī likely refers to a horn-shaped plant or rhinoceros horn preparation; arka is Calotropis gigantea; bakurī is uncertain; kāmācā, madhu here in its white variety, rasāśrīṅgī, kuthārī, and pañīnāgapañī are left in transliteration as their precise identifications are not established with certainty.

The phrase rendered "worm that has come from a belly" refers to an intestinal worm, as contextually implied by the Tibetan.

"Drop" throughout translates བྲལ་པ་ in its ritual-material sense here, meaning a prepared pellet or marked dot applied to the body, not its more common Vajrayāna sense of bindu as a subtle-body substance.

The final mantra series at the close of the chapter contains several deity epithets: aparājita means "unconquered," ajita means "undefeated," śmaśānādhipati means "lord of the charnel ground," kuleśvara means "lord of the family/clan," and bhūteśvara means "lord of spirits."

- The phrase "kiṃ karota tatamas" appears to be a transliteration of a Sanskrit mantra formula embedded in the Tibetan; its precise Sanskrit reconstruction is uncertain, and the Tibetan treats it as a sacred invocatory phrase naming great lords of spirits rather than as ordinary syntax.

The term rendered "Vajradaṇḍadhara" follows the Tibetan dpal ldan rdo rje dbyug pa 'dzin pa, literally "the glorious one who holds the vajra staff," which is an epithet here rather than an unambiguous proper name; it likely refers to Vajrapāṇi in a specific iconographic form.

"Dong-tse" rendered as "coins" follows the conventional reading of the unit of value; the exact denomination is contextually determined and may refer to a small monetary or weight unit in the tantric ritual economy context.

- The term rendered "Lord of Lineages" follows the Tibetan "rigs kyi dbang phyug," a deity title common in Śaiva-influenced tantric contexts; the precise identity of the deity is not specified in this passage.

The phrase "as a child would offer it" renders "byis pas," which literally means "childishly" or "in a childlike manner" and may alternatively indicate that the tormā is to be offered simply or informally, without elaborate ritual framing. The exact nuance is uncertain.

"Sihla incense" (si hla'i spos) likely refers to a resinous incense of Śrī Lankan or Southeast Asian origin; the precise substance is uncertain.

The term "Kanamāni" is a proper name of a spirit-being left in transliterated form as it does not correspond to a well-known Sanskrit deity name with a standard English rendering.

- The "Beloved One" (Padmā) and the "One-Tressed One" (Ekajaṭī) are deity names treated as proper nouns throughout; the Tibetan simply transliterates Ekajaṭī. The syllable sequence "Hrīḥ Ṣṭrīḥ" is a mantra fragment rendered phonetically as it appears in the Tibetan. The phrase rendered "seed of accomplishment" translates "don grub sa bon," literally the "seed of purpose-fulfilment," a technical tantric term for a ritual substance used in zombie-raising rites. The "Lord of Waters" (chu dbang) in the western petal may refer to Varuṇa or a local water deity; the text does not specify further. "Mañjuvajra" is Mañjuśrī in his vajra-wielding form, a recognized tantric iconographic mode.

- The mantra strings Oṃ Hrīḥ Ṣṭrīḥ Haḥ Hrāmḥ Jaḥ Phuḥ and the three Sanskrit empowerment formulae (śūnyatā-jñāna-vajra-svabhāvātmako'ham, etc.) are transliterated as they appear; they are standard Vajrayāna ritual mantras and are left untranslated per convention.

The term vikaṭa rendered here as a proper name for a class of rite may alternatively be a transliteration of a Sanskrit term for a fierce or monstrous form; its precise referent in this ritual context is uncertain.

The final lines on finger measures and the "two Mount Merus" describe a hand-gesture or ritual measurement system whose full technical detail would require the accompanying commentary to resolve precisely.

- The tenfold list of seed syllables — GO KU DA HA NA and BI RA ŚU MĀ MŪ — appears to be a phonological encoding of Sanskrit terms for the ten samaya substances, likely truncated seed syllables of deity names or substance-names specific to this Yamāntaka cycle. Their precise referents depend on the root tantra and its commentary and are not translatable as ordinary words; they are therefore left as phonetic renderings.
- The identity of "Sna ldan dkar po" — the white-nosed one mounted on a rat — is almost certainly Gaṇeśa, though the text does not name him explicitly. The attributes (rat-mount, rosary, bag) are consistent with that identification and this is noted for the reader's orientation.

The term "bDen bral" rendered as "south-west" (literally "devoid of truth") is a directional epithet for the Rākṣasa or Nirṛti, the guardian of the south-western direction; the rendering follows the directional assignment given in the text.

"Nor rgyun ma" rendered as "the Stream of Wealth" likely refers to Vasudhārā, the goddess of prosperity; the text's assignment of the second Phaṭ syllable to her is consistent with her role as an earth or abundance deity, paired here with Brahmā under the same syllable-pair as Indra and Yama above.

The phrase "bodhicitta-fluid" (byang chub sems kyi khu ba) is tantric technical vocabulary referring to the subtle physiological correlate of bodhicitta in vajrayāna completion-stage practice; it has been rendered literally as the text demands.

- The phrase "Enjoyment of Delusion" renders Tibetan terms referring to a class of beings in the maṇḍala assembly associated with the five afflictions; the exact names of each member of this group are not individually specified in the Tibetan here, so the translation renders the group reference as given.

The colophon phrase "Red Yamāntaka" is the text's self-identification; Yamāntaka here appears in his red form, distinct from the more commonly known blue or black Vajrabhairava forms.

The final line is a sentence-opening fragment indicating the continuation of a new section, translated as such to preserve textual continuity for narration.

- The passage describes a complex maṇḍala-drawing ritual with precise directional assignments of symbols and mantra syllables. The mantra strings (Yamarāja sadomeya, etc.) are transliterated Sanskrit phonetically preserved in the Tibetan and are rendered here in their reconstructed Sanskrit phonetic form without further translation, as they are liturgical dhāraṇī-style strings rather than semantically parsed sentences. The segmentation of the final mantra fragment "Yacchanirājasadoru Ṇayonira" as a partial continuation is consistent with the text being mid-instruction, likely resuming a mantra begun earlier. The instructions about "omitting one cell at a time" refer to a grid-based maṇḍala diagram (reumig, a checkerboard or lattice), which is a known element of tantric ritual manuals of this type. The "lunar food" (zla ba'i bza' ba) in the empowerment sequence refers to a ritual substance associated with the moon, likely a white offering substance; this is a technical tantric term left in descriptive rendering.
- The five verses pairing afflictions with Yamāntaka forms represent a deliberate structural parallelism in which each of the five mental afflictions — aversion, delusion, slander, attachment, and envy — is personified as a distinct form of Yamāntaka, with the Blessed One's compassionate action serving as the soteriological frame. Slander here translates the Tibetan term for divisive speech rather than an affliction in the standard fivefold scheme; its inclusion in this position is a liturgical choice of this tantra.

deities. Gaurī is a form of the goddess associated with Śiva, here assimilated into the Yamāntaka maṇḍala as the form of equanimity. These identifications are standard in this class of tantra.

The phrase rendered "brings all aversion to exhaustion" and its parallels could also be read as "exhausts" or "destroys utterly" — the Tibetan zad par mdzad conveys a making-to-be-finished that is both purificatory and destructive, consistent with Yamāntaka's wrathful soteriological function.

The passage on the "buffalo face" accomplishment and the two mantras Ṣṭrīḥ and Vikṛtāna are technical sādhana instructions; Vikṛtāna is a well-attested epithet of Yamāntaka in this textual tradition.

- The mantra-syllable string "Vairocana Sin Du Vārañca" in the second paragraph is a transliteration of what appears in the Tibetan as བཤེན་པུ་བཤེན་པུ་ — this is a mantra fragment whose Sanskrit reconstruction is uncertain; it is rendered phonetically as it stands.

The term रामा (transliterated as "rama herb") designates a plant used in tantric ritual preparations; its precise botanical identification is not established with certainty in the scholarly literature.

The phrase श्रवणमन्त्रोच्चारणं, rendered as "the mantra is heard just slightly," refers to the instruction that recitation should be at a volume just audible — the classical whispered or murmured delivery — which is the standard tantric teaching on the correct volume of mantra recitation.

- The passage is a dense tantric commentary explaining the symbolism of a wrathful deity's iconographic features, followed by a sādhanā text for the Vajra Ḍākinī and the beginning of a related sādhanā. The mantra syllables and deity names are rendered in their standard Sanskrit transliteration as they appear in the Tibetan in Indic script. The term rendered here as "Glorious Vajra" for འཇིག་རྟེན་འཕེལ་བའི་འཇིག་རྟེན་ is slightly uncertain: འཇིག་རྟེན་འཕེལ་བའི་ could mean "harm-beauty" or may be a deity name; it is rendered interpretively. The passage ends mid-sentence as the source text breaks off.
- The names Bhidavī and "Queen of the Seventh" are obscure tantra-internal deity names; they are rendered phonetically as they appear, since no standard Sanskrit equivalents are established by context. The phrase "six hands in all" represents a reading of the text where two hands are explicitly mentioned on right and left but the verse states "six-handed" from the preceding passage, so this reflects continuity with the prior section. The Sanskrit dhāraṇī line "Akāro mukhaṃ sarvadharmāṇām ādyanutpannatvāt" is a standard Prajñāpāramitā formula meaning "The syllable A is the entrance to all dharmas, because of their primordial non-arising"; it is left untranslated in the body as is standard for such dhāraṇī-style liturgical formulae. "Marakata" is emerald; "indranīla" is blue sapphire.
- The passage beginning with Yaṃ, Raṃ, Laṃ, Baṃ is a standard tantric seed-syllable meditation for the four elements at the four bodily stations, a common visualization sequence in Vajrayāna practice. Yaṃ is the seed of wind, Raṃ of fire, Laṃ of earth, and Baṃ of water, though the placement here follows the specific system of this tantra and may differ from other traditions.

The phrase rendered "treasure-holder pressed down by Mount Meru" translates nor 'dzin, literally "holder of wealth," which likely refers to the earth element or the earth-disk visualization, here conceived as a vast yellow square compressed beneath the cosmic mountain.

"Yamāntaka" translates gshin rje gshed, literally "the slayer of Yama, the Lord of Death"; this is the wrathful deity whose tantra is under discussion throughout the passage.

The identity of "kapeda" and "nāṭi" are uncertain; these appear to be plant or botanical substances used in the preparation of pigments and ritual ground-substances, and the Sanskrit or regional terms are preserved as close transliterations of the Tibetan phonetic renderings.

- The passage "Che ge mo ni bdag dbang gis" is a partially mantra-like or formulaic phrase that may represent a corrupted or abbreviated tantra phrase; it is rendered literally as "Che ge mo — by my own authority," but this may be a vocative or untranslatable ritual term embedded in the mantra context.

The "noble Jāṃgulī" is a serpent goddess associated with protection from snake-bite; identified here as the subject of the preceding finger-width sādhana, with the peacock as her vehicle, consistent with known iconographic traditions.

The phrase rendered "bodiless vajra" at the edge of the sky reflects the tantric concept of a form visualised without a physical body, consistent with the preceding section's reference to the bodiless deity.

- The fourfold yoga taxonomy here, yoga, subsequent yoga, extreme yoga, and great yoga, corresponds to the four stages found in certain Yoginītantra systems, roughly equivalent to the kriyā through anuttarayoga division in other schemes, though the precise equivalences are text-specific and not universally standardized.

The term rendered "wrathful tree of the five desires" reflects the Tibetan literally; the "five desires" refers to the five sensory pleasures, and the "wrathful tree" is likely a symbolic maṇḍala element.

"Carcikā" is a type of song kept in transliteration as it is a proper technical or genre term without a transparent English equivalent.

"Amṛtakuṇḍalin" is the deity whose Tibetan epithet means "coiled/possessing nectar," a wrathful form associated with the west or north depending on the maṇḍala system; rendered by Sanskrit equivalent.

- The passage opens a new chapter narrative after the verse section closes. The phrase rendered as "the great lord of secrets" refers to Vajrapāṇi in his role as Guhyapati. The colophon-like line about "the eighteenth chapter" marks the end of the preceding chapter and the beginning of the new narrative section, which I have rendered accordingly. The final lines are incomplete in the supplied Tibetan, ending mid-sentence at the image of the bow and arrow; the translation renders exactly what is present without supplying missing content. The name Carcikā (Tibetan: རྩམ་མཚན་མཚན་མཚན་) is a wrathful goddess appearing in Yamāntaka-related tantras; her role here as a respondent is preserved. The yantra (ཡམ་འཛུགས་མཚན་མཚན་) rendered as "yantra" in the verse refers specifically to the physical or ritual device, with Yamāntaka declared its supreme form.

- The term thur-sel refers to a Vajrayāna practice of directing the wind-energy downward and outward through the lower aperture of the body; it is a technical term from the completion-stage yoga of inner heat and consciousness transference, here used in the context of the "entering another's body" practice. It has been left in transliterated form as it functions as a proper technical term without a standard English equivalent.

The passage describes the practice of consciousness transference into another's body, a recognized completion-stage Vajrayāna technique; the imagery of Rāhu entering (eclipsing) the sun and moon is a standard Indic simile for the speed and totality of this movement of consciousness.

The colophon identifies the translation team: the great paṇḍita Candrakīrti on the Sanskrit side, and the Tibetan scholar Drakpa Gyaltsen of Yarlung, working in Kathmandu. The mention of multiple oral sources — including Dharmarāja, a Bhoṭa paṇḍita, and a lay patron — reflects a typical collaborative translation process.
