Toh 475 in the Kangyur is a tantric scripture known in Sanskrit as the Śrī Māmṛakta Yamāri Tantra Rāja and in Tibetan as the Dpal Idan gshin rje gshed dmar po'i rgyud kyi rgyal po, rendered in English as The Glorious King of Tantras of the Red Yamāri. It belongs to the class of highest yoga tantras and is dedicated to Raktayamāri, the red wrathful deity who embodies the destruction of death and is a fierce manifestation central to the Yamāri cycle of practice. The text opens in the classical sūtra-style framing of a teaching given by the Blessed One, but quickly establishes its tantric character by invoking figures such as Hevajra and referencing related tantras like the Saṃpuṭa, situating it within a broader network of Vajrayāna scriptural traditions. As a king of tantras concerned with ritual methods ranging from the attainment of sovereign power to healing and the full range of worldly and liberating aims, it stands as an important canonical example of the Yamāri tantric literature preserved in the Kangyur.

In the language of India: Śrī Māmṛakta Yamāri Tantra Rāja Nāma. In the language of Tibet: The Glorious King of Tantras of the Red Yamāri. Homage to Red Yamāri, the Destroyer of the Lord of Death.

Thus did I hear at one time. The Blessed One, the Tathāgata, having merged all tathāgatas into one, dwelt within the lotus of Selflessness herself. He who clasped her tightly at the throat, who himself had entreated her for the sake of sentient beings, spoke to Hevajra, and then equally set forth the vow of liberation; and likewise, though he spoke at length again and again in the Saṃpuṭa and other tantras to fulfill the entire aspiration of sentient beings, now I shall explain this excellently.

Some desire sovereign power; some desire long life, freedom from illness, and abundance. Peaceful rites and the rest, up through the most expansive activities, have been taught in various tantras. And those actions done openly, the defeat of enemy forces, the driving away, the summoning, the slaying — the wheels of mechanical means (yantravidyā) that are difficult to find throughout the three worlds, and that are not yet spoken of in the many tantras — in order to take hold of the method that benefits you, I shall now explain them. Goddess, with reverence, listen!

By the power and strength of whichever wheel of means, one may continually attain sovereign power for as long as the sun and moon endure — if one wishes to live so. Now, within the domain called by name: the raising of vital essence, the summoning of hosts, sky-faring, and the supremely swift — the remedy for these I shall explain.

First, loving-kindness is to be cultivated. Second, compassion likewise. Third, joy is to be cultivated. Fourth, equanimity is to be thoroughly cultivated. The eight worldly concerns are to be completely relinquished, and one is to contemplate them as empty. Again, emptiness is awakening; into the second, gather the seed-syllable; and into the fourth, the letter is established.

From the syllable raṃ there arises the sun; from hūṃ there arises the variegated vajra. By that same means — a vajra fence, and likewise the ground bound by vajras.

First, meditate on emptiness. Then, from the red syllable āṃ completely transformed, arises the solar maṇḍala. Above that stands the red syllable hūṃ. Above that, at the center of a club adorned with a dripping head, stands a red hūṃ. On that too, a hūṃ on the sun. From it, rays of light stream forth in all directions of the sky, gather all three worlds into the form of the hero, draw them back and dissolve them into that very same reality, and one is to conceive of oneself as the glorious form of Red Yamāri.

His body is red. His left leg is extended and his face is in a wrathful expression, his fangs bared, his tongue curled, inspiring dread. He is adorned with the eight nāgas. His hair, red and golden, blazes upward. He is adorned at his hips with a dripping tiger skin. A dwarf's corpse hangs at his side, terrifying. He has three eyes, which are supremely dreadful, red with unceasing blazing light and every kind of ray thoroughly stirring. In his left hand he holds a skull-cup full of the blood of Nirṛti and others; in his right he holds a white club and is adorned with nāga ornaments and so forth, by which he conquers the four māras. He embraces at his shoulder a vajra vetāla. His form is that of the venerable lord who is the single and definitive full blossoming of great desire.

The venerable lady is similar to him, with the special distinction of being adorned with a dry head. The Blessed One is adorned with the ornament of a dripping head and a waistband that has come undone. He stands with the left leg extended upon a red buffalo. Externally, within the center of the white three-pointed club born from the Blessed One, one is again to conceive of a red seed-syllable.

Externally, the Blessed One's vajra is likewise born from the syllable HŪṂ. Then again, the secret lotus of the Blessed Lady is directly marked in its entirety with the eight-petaled lotus by the syllable ĀḤ.

Following this, the one who embodies the sovereign of secret mantra is: OM SARVA TATHĀGATA ANURĀGAṆA VAJRA SVABHĀVA ĀTMAKO'HAM. Below the navel is a red lotus of eight petals, red in color. Within it, the red syllable HRĪḤ is to be distinctly visualized. The white streak that is visualized at the crown is once more to be conceived of, and then inserted into the crown of the Blessed One's head. Again, with a sound mind, one is to visualize that streak entering by way of the vajra path. Through the mutual union of the two with one another, it has the form of a seed of equal taste. That seed is then taken by the four goddesses as their own form: those who dwell in the four directions beginning with the east gaze upon and rouse their own lord, and all the goddesses are seen to offer song as an offering in order to receive it.

Arise, O venerable wrathful one of compassion!
Dispel the darkness throughout all three worlds!
By the vajra carcikā!

The lord is victorious over the four māras.
The mind is distracted — arise, O venerable one!
By the Sow!

Does the lord of the world dwell in the hospitality of emptiness?
O venerable one, arise through the merit of the world!
By Sarasvatī!

From the nature of awakening, O host of the world,
You who contemplate emptiness — in what do you remain?
By Gaurī!

Having been fully roused, the Blessed One once again comes fully to rest therein. Then, below, from the gathering of the essences that arise there, one who has the nature of a deity, residing upon a red buffalo, with the nature of the self — that one too is possessed of the nine moods of dance, fierce like the bandhūka flower, with a single face, two arms, fangs bared, three eyes round and red, a fearsome reddish-yellow beard, with a stocky short body, pendulous and terrifying, reddish-yellow hair swept upward, tongue curled and dripping blood, brow furrowed and laughing fiercely, holding in the right hand a white club marked with a head, holding in the left a skull-cup filled with intoxicant and blood, with a radiance equal to ten million suns, standing with the left leg extended, causing Yama, the lord of death, to tremble and quake, dwelling behind the buffalo with a form that measures eight-and-two spans, adorned with eight nāgas, a garland of heads bound at the crown with further garlands of heads hanging freely, wearing a tiger-skin lower garment, embraced by Vajravārāhī.

Similar in form and color to the Blessed One, bearing a hooked knife and skull-cup, with a body adorned by the five mudrās, one is to meditate upon this with a mind earnestly directed downward; and then, once divine pride has been assumed, there is no doubt that the self will be realized as accomplished.

Following this, the mantra VAJRA SVABHĀVĀTMAKO'HAM is to be recited.

Then, with great attachment, the Blessed Lady gazes upon all the limbs and appendages, presses the vajra into the lotus, and one is to meditate upon both their tiger-skin garments being swept up. Thinking "these are what generate attachment in her," the vajra and lotus are given to the mind, and one is to fully visualize the vajra at its tip consecrated by the yellow syllable OM̐. The red syllable ĀḤ consecrates the pollen of that lotus with the syllable AḤ. Then, having recited OM̐ SARVA TATHĀGATA ANURĀGAṆA VAJRA SVABHĀVA ĀTMAKO'HAM, one is to meditate upon oneself as arisen from the equal union of vajra and lotus — just as in the external case of the two with one another. Then, at the moment of transference, one is to meditate upon the two essences dripping simultaneously flowing together within the lotus of the goddess whom one has visualized as oneself.

Through the complete transformation of those white and red essences, one is to meditate upon delusion's Yamāntaka and the others exactly as they are, imagining them within the center of the lotus, and to cultivate the vision of their being born from the Blessed Lady. After that, one imagines them turning to face forward and each abiding in their respective places.

Then, on the solar disc of the eastern petal, delusion's Yamāntaka is embraced by the black Carcikā. On the solar disc of the southern petal, slander's Yamāntaka — the yellow one — is united with the yellow Vārāhī, she who bears the face of a sow. On the solar disc of the western petal, desire's Yamāntaka — the red one — is united with the white Sarasvatī. On the solar disc of the northern petal, envy's Yamāntaka — the dark blue one — enters into union with Gaurī.

Or alternatively, all of them may be meditated upon as the red Yamāntaka, equal to a zombie-risen corpse. The four vases of Merumunen are filled to the brim by being brought together equally. The golden vase of truth-dissolution is filled with resin. Likewise, a crystal vase for the wind is filled with siḥla. And the silver vase for power is filled with camphor, exactly as described. One looks upon a skull filled to the brim — complete with both sun and moon. This very thing, entering into union with great bliss, is nothing other than the highest.

Then, from the syllable HŪṂ abiding on the lotus and solar disc at one's own heart-center, its rays of light make offerings to the entire maṇḍala wheel with every conceivable offering. Then, with JAḤ HŪṂ BAṂ HOḤ, one truly invokes, introduces, and so forth, and makes offerings. All sentient beings are as they are in accordance with the guru's oral instructions — this is the second yoga.

Then, in verse:

The yogi who dwells in the ten directions,
And those assemblies of yoginīs —
With intelligence, as before, invite them,
Make offerings, confer empowerment, and so forth.

Thus, while the Tathāgatas confer empowerment, Locanā and the others, with minds of delight, sing varied songs and perform dances, and with vases filled with the five nectars:

Grant the great precious empowerment,
Worshipped by beings of the three realms —
What arises from the place
Of the secret triad of all buddhas.

So reciting and praising, one imagines that from the heads of all those in the maṇḍala there flows forth the vital essence, and that the seal of Vajrasattva is set upon them. This is the rite.

Now, delusion, slander, desire, and envy make supplication:

Hail, hail, red Yamāntaka —
Guru, whose nature is that of a demon-lord.
I behold you and am utterly terrified.
Guru, abandon the nature of wrath.

Your dance shakes the surface of the earth,
The space above the earth, and the earth below.
You, the wrathful one adorned with passion's flame,
Who dances — you are the zombie-risen one.

Your body is stocky and short, red in color,
Manifesting in many forms and emanations.
Vajra Sarasvatī bows before you —
You who dance are the great bliss.

With the secret mantras HRĪḤ and ŚRĪḤ
You dispel the delusions of the three worlds.
Venerable wrathful one of compassion,
You who dance — look upon all beings with care.

OM SARVA TATHĀGATA PŪJA VAJRA SVABHĀVA ĀTMAKO'HAM.

Then, as before, above the wind maṇḍala is the fire maṇḍala, and above that, above the three secret maṇḍalas arisen from the complete transformation of the syllable OM, one is to meditate upon a skull arisen from the complete transformation of the syllable ĀḤ. In its center, the five nectars, the five meats, yogurt, milk, flesh, fish, and so forth are stirred together with a stick until the flavors are equalized, cooked, and viewed as resembling the fluid of lac-resin. Having cooled this with OM ĀḤ HŪḤ, one imagines a tongue in the form of a hollow tube arisen from the complete transformation of the syllable HŪḤ, and one drinks.

Each one is to offer from their own mouth into the mouth of the goddess. The maṇḍala participants too are to contemplate this and partake of it universally. Then, having tasted the nectar and become perfectly delighted, one is to recite the secret mantra aloud. Having displayed the seed syllable and the emblem dwelling at the heart, one is to recite the secret mantra:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ BIKṚTĀNANA HŪḤ HŪḤ PHAṬ PHAṬ SVĀHĀ

One is to recite this as many times as one wishes while meditating. If one wishes to rise, one performs the welfare of sentient beings through the rays of light from one's own body, absorbs everything into oneself, and through the yoga of the co-emergent Yamāntaka, one is to abide in ease as one pleases.

As for the phase of the yoga of the co-emergent Yamāntaka: one is to declare one's pride as Yamāntaka who is naturally established, resembling one's own form, saying: "I am none other than Yamāntaka — one-faced, two-armed — who is naturally established." This is the great yoga.

By this declaration of the four yogas, whether in three sessions or in four sessions as well, one is to continue in this way at all times, from the moment of manifest aspiration, until perfect completion.

Then, at the conclusion of one hundred thousand recitations, the mantra is to be recited with direct application of the syllable, and one will have accomplished the approach. Then, for the ritual of the method for all activities, one performs a fire offering of ten thousand with butter, honey, and red flowers, reciting the secret mantra one at a time:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ BIKṚTĀNANA MANTRA SIDDHI ME DEHI TĪ HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAṬ
PHAṬ SVĀHĀ

After this, there will be the attainment of the mantra's siddhi. This is the siddhi of all activities.

This concludes the first chapter, on the deity called the Red One and so forth.

Here a question is posed to the Blessed One:

O Blessed One — please tell us how the attainment of great seal (mahāmudrā) is obtained, and by what means it is to be accomplished.

With mouth pressed to mouth, embracing one another tightly, in the form of supreme bliss —
now hear what is not to be spoken of openly.

The form of the yogins who are the source of that movement — the supreme Blessed One — flows down uninterruptedly, like the continuous flow of a river current.

Here, one is to recite the flaw-mantra for as long as one has meditated. The form of the Blessed One will swiftly be accomplished — not otherwise. For as long as it continues, the attainment here is none other than the attainment of great seal itself. These too are all accomplished through familiarization with yoga alone, not through anything else.

As for that which becomes the practice of familiarization: for the born, the arisen, the not-yet-arisen, and those who have previously abided, the attainments of the aims of liberation and of desire in their various forms, and even the attainment of buddhahood itself, are to be obtained in this very life. Having thoroughly abandoned all activities and turned one's mind toward that goal, one comes forth oneself and speaks: "Ho, ho! O supreme practitioner, whatever it may be, I shall bestow it." Then, having offered worship and made prostration, one receives the attainment and bestows it.

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ BIKṚTĀNANA ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪḤ HŪḤ PHAṬ PHAṬ SVĀHĀ

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the Vajra-zombie (vetāla) without a female zombie-spirit, one makes an image of the Vajra-zombie woman, fashioned on cloth or on fruit, dwelling at the outset perfectly in the color and shape of the noble lady. One performs worship with whatever offerings are available, and one recites for as long as all of them are seen with their own individual forms, undistorted and unmixed. Until she comes and embraces the practitioner and says, "O practitioner, what is your command?" — the practitioner then offers worship and speaks.

"She shall become my wife" — and by that declaration she becomes his wife. By enjoying union with her, one becomes accomplished in the form of Yamāntaka (the Destroyer of Death).

OM DVEṢARATI ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA NUDA NUDA TRUṬA TRUṬA HŪḤ JAḤ SVĀHĀ

Or alternatively: OM VAJRA VETĀLI ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪḤ JAḤ SVĀHĀ

One takes as a bride a young woman of sixteen years with beautiful limbs, or else one generates a child and, making her a fortunate one, worships her fully in the manner of a yoginī consecrated with empowerment and contemplated through mantra, embracing her with the left arm and visualizing her as a yoginī, and one recites for as long as she blazes. Then, by holding her in that way, one becomes accomplished in the form of Yamāntaka.

OM VAJRA VETĀLI JVALAḤ HŪḤ JAḤ SVĀHĀ — this is to be recited.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the Yamāntaka of Delusion, one dresses in the guise of Yamāntaka of Delusion and, pressing upon the lotus with the sole of one foot and the sole of the other, one recites until she calls out, "O practitioner!" and speaks the words, "What is your command?" and "What shall I do?" Then from that point on, she bestows even sovereign dominion over all three worlds. As for other attainments, what need is there even to mention them?

In the same way, if one wishes to accomplish the Yamāntaka of Slander, the Yamāntaka of Attachment, and the Yamāntaka of Envy, the secret mantras for churning out the fruit are in exactly the same way:

OM MOHĀYAMĀNTAKṚTA ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAṬ PHAṬ
OM PIŚUNĀYAMĀNTAKṚTA ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAṬ PHAṬ
OM RĀGĀYAMĀNTAKṚTA ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAṬ PHAṬ
OM ĪRŚYĀYAMĀNTAKṚTA ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAṬ PHAṬ SVĀHĀ

These are to be recited.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the Beloved of Delusion, one imagines the previously described form of the goddess who is the Beloved of Delusion — riding a buffalo, together with oneself — and presses as before, reciting until she comes and speaks the words "What shall I do?" From that point on, all the practitioner's desires become fully accomplished, it is said. In the same way one accomplishes the Beloved of Slander, the Beloved of Attachment, and the Beloved of Envy. The mantras for these are:

OM MOHĀRATI ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪṢ JAḤ
OM PIŚUNĀRATI ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪṢ JAḤ
OM RĀGĀRATI ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪṢ JAḤ
OM ĪRŚYĀRATI ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪṢ JAḤ

These are to be recited. Or alternatively:

OM VAJRACARCIKE ĀGACCHA ĀGACCHA HŪṢ JAḤ

And likewise: VAJRAVĀRĀHĪ, VAJRASVARASVASTI, VAJRAGAURĪ — these are to be recited.

Then, if one wishes to accomplish a yakṣa, at that time one makes an image of a yakṣa with the perception of accomplishing a worldly attainment, presses upon it, and performs the accomplishment. All commands become fully fulfilled. In the same way one may accomplish a yakṣiṇī, a nāga (male), a nāgiṇī (female), a hungry ghost, a hungry ghost-woman, a flesh-eater (rākṣasa), a flesh-eating woman, a god, a goddess, a man, and a woman as well.

Furthermore, for manifest accomplishment one recites:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ VIKṚTĀNANA CHE GE MO SĀDHAYA SĀDHAYA HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAṬ
PHAṬ SVĀHĀ

Then, if one wishes to accomplish the Vajra Staff, under the asterism Puṣya (the Victorious Star) one makes a wooden vajra staff thirty finger-breadths long, anoints it with the five products of the cow, adorns it beautifully with sandalwood and garlands of flowers, holds it from the outset in the manner of a sword, and recites for as long as it blazes. Then the staff will be grasped, and one will overcome adversaries just like Yamāntaka.

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ VIKṚTĀNANA VAJRADAṆḌA JVĀLAYA JVĀLAYA HŪḤ HŪḤ PHAṬ
PHAṬ SVĀHĀ

Thus one recites. Then, if one wishes to accomplish the skull, one makes a skull-shaped form of the wood of Yamāntaka, thirty-two finger-breadths in size, holds it from the outset with the left hand and covers it with the right hand, and recites for as long as it blazes. The result is just as before. The distinctive element of the mantra is the addition of the phrase KAPĀLAḤ JVĀLAYA. Then one is to accomplish the staff mudrā: at that time one makes a fist with the right hand and extends the index finger. Having bound this mudrā, one recites for as long as it blazes. Then one will obtain the manifest accomplishment of the form of Yamāntaka. The distinctive element of the mantra is the addition of DAṆḌAḤ MUDRĀḤ JVĀLAYA.

This teaching declares that through the very act of enjoying all five desired objects, one may accomplish everything. Whatever samaya substances one has obtained, one is to eat and drink them for the purpose of bringing one's intention to perfect completeness. And again and again, whatever there may be, all of it without exception one is to eat and drink. Every first portion one offers to Yamāntaka.

All of the foregoing is the second chapter: the chapter on the ritual for accomplishing great manifest attainment.

Now, if one wishes to accomplish minor accomplishments, one is to accomplish pacification and the like. On a barley cake, one writes out twelve letters, each separate and distinct, inscribing them manifestly in a wheel of twelve spokes using milk that has been empowered one hundred and eight times. Beginning from the eastern door of the wheel, one writes the twelve letters going clockwise:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ VIKṚTĀNANA HŪḤ HŪḤ PHAṬ PHAṬ

In the center, one writes the seed syllable of water, VAM, and between the two VAM syllables facing each other, one writes the name of the person to be accomplished. On the outside one encircles it with the letters. Then, having joined the two together face to face, one wraps them in white thread, then binds them with an intoxicant plant, consecrates them one hundred and eight times, places them in a vase filled with milk, and recites the mantra. Having made offerings according to one's means, one recites:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ VIKṚTĀNANA VADEVA DATTASYA ŚĀNTIṢ KURU HŪṢ HŪṢ
PHAT PHAT SVĀHĀ

Reciting this, pacification will occur.

For the harms that afflict worldly beings, such as negative actions, sickness, and so forth, in the ten directions of the village, one consecrates seven times with this mantra:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ VIKṚTĀNANA GRĀMA AMUKA SARVOPĀDRAVA ŚĀNTIṢ KURU
KURU HŪṢ HŪṢ BALIṢ GRHṆA GRHṆA PHAT PHAT SVĀHĀ

and one offers it through the torma ritual. Having first performed the external rites and so forth, and having performed a fire offering with milk throughout the entire village, all harms will be pacified.

Then, if one wishes to perform increase, one writes the two wheels as before, and in the center of the twelve letters one writes BHŪṢ, the seed syllable of the maṇḍala wheel. In the center of that, one writes the two BHAUṢAṬ syllables facing each other, with the name of the person to be accomplished between them. On the outside one encircles it with three square designs drawn in saffron. One wraps this in yellow thread, consecrates it one hundred and eight times, places it in a vase filled with butter and honey, and recites the mantra. Having made offerings according to one's means, one recites:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ VIKṚTĀNANA BHŪṢ BHAUṢAṬ LHAJIN GYI PUṢṬIṢ KURU
BHAUṢAṬ HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAT PHAT SVĀHĀ

One recites this until wealth has increased and multiplied. Without interrupting the mantra recitation, one performs a fire offering with curd-rice.

Then, if one wishes to perform subjugation, one writes the twelve letters on the two wheels as before, using the juice of fingernail plant,

In the center is the seed-syllable HRĪḤ, which is the seed of Kurukullā. In the center are two HO syllables written face to face. On the outside, these are encircled with a triangular design. Then one wraps this entirely in red thread, consecrates it one hundred and eight times, and writes it with the juice of lac resin on a vase filled with butter and honey, placing it inside. Having made offerings according to one's means, one recites the mantra:

OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ VIKṚTĀNANA HRĪḤ HOḤ LHAJIN GYI LHAJIN LA VAŚAMĀNAYA
HOḤ HŪṢ HŪṢ PHAT PHAT SVĀHĀ

One recites this until subjugation has been accomplished. At the conclusion of the mantra recitation, one performs a fire offering using red flowers combined with salt.

Then, if one wishes to summon a person, one places the mantra and that very person's name, cut apart, in the center of a charcoal form of a burial ground and an earth effigy. Pressing it down with the big toe, one recites: "This alone is the person to be accomplished" — and one continues reciting until the person comes. As for the mantra, the distinction is that in place of VAŚAMĀNAYA one says ĀRṢAYA HŪṂ, and in place of HOḤ one says JAḤ.

OM MARME MARMA AVIGHATE OM CARTSIKE HARA HARA BUKKAṂ MĀRAYA MĀRAYA — and for the purpose of the fierce goddess: JAḤ. OM GAMBHĪRI CARTSIKE PA HŪṂ ŚOṆITA PRĪYE GAMBHĪRA — and toward the fierce goddess: JAḤ.

At a single tree, at a charnel ground, or on a mountain, one goes there naked, facing south, and recites one hundred and eight times. After that there is no doubt that success will be achieved.

The Blessed One then declared how the ritual procedure of the mantra should be performed. Going alone to a solitary place, one visualizes directly before oneself the gurus, buddhas, and bodhisattvas dwelling in all ten directions in the clearly vivid form of the venerable painted image. Then, in the center of a twelve-spoked wheel drawn in the form of twelve spokes using human bone fragments, great quantities of blood, and the blood of a large raven, one places the seed of wind. Within that, one folds together the enemy's name written in fragmented form, binds it to the throat of a raven, and if it has not been released, at that time the enemy is destroyed. If at that time the enemy has not been destroyed, one writes the twelve seed-syllables on it:

PHAṬ PHAṬ HŪṂ HŪṂ NA NA TĀKR VIṢṬRĪḤ HRĪḤ OM

Having made offerings according to one's means, one strikes it forcefully with venom and dispatches it in a stream. If that does not work, one praises a crow's wing seven times and, calling the enemy by name at the door of his house, one immediately drives him out and destroys him.

Likewise, in the center of a twelve-spoked wheel, at the center of the seed of fire composed of the three hot substances, poison, scorpion, great bones, and the firewood of a fuel-wood tree — with the two YA syllables written in fragmented form and facing each other, and the two THA syllables encircling them on the outside — one burns this in a fire of fuel-wood. If this is seized upon a young boy, he will die in that very instant. If that does not work, one praises a human bone of four finger-widths seven times, then conceals it at the enemy's doorway. This will drive him from his house.

Likewise, when the twelve seed-syllables are completely formed, in the center of a twelve-spoked wheel — with sandalwood, jīva, kaṣṭhikā, and that which others cannot withstand, or the seed of the water of the garuḍa vine tree, with those two written facing each other at the center, and the two THA syllables encircling them on the outside — one recites one hundred and eight times. While filling with milk, one uses one hundred thousand rājāta and one hundred thousand red flowers: there is no death, and apart from this, that very rājāta substance does not go elsewhere. At that time, even one who commits the five acts of immediate retribution will be freed from them.

Alternatively, using the red flowers of the tree bearing the fruit of the sepha together with twelve seeds filling a bowl completely, one places it thus and recites over it.

This causes gods, asuras, kiṃnaras, great serpents, venomous snakes, ḍākas, ḍākinīs, yakṣas, rākṣasas, difficult-to-tame humans, human lords and kings, and the like to act as male and female servants.

This concludes the third chapter of the tantra of the Red Yamāntaka, the chapter on the ritual procedures of the common pacification rite and the like.

Then the sovereign, embracing and pressing his lips together in thought, was asked by Nairātmyā on behalf of sentient beings for their benefit:

"Blessed One, how do sentient beings come to be as kings?"

The Blessed One declared: "Goddess, since your understanding is not yet complete, listen, for I shall explain it to you."

Apart from the syllables A and BA, one causes another to perform the lāvaṭika practice at the base of the lunar mansion Jyeṣṭhā, and from Jyeṣṭhā one accomplishes the three earths. In five households of the kṣatriya lineage one recites one hundred thousand mantras. The Vajrayoginī's fumigation offering and torma, and the accomplishment of one's own mantra, come from a prior retreat practice of one hundred thousand recitations. One performs fire-offerings of a tenth part of one hundred thousand approaches with gold, silver, coral, lapis lazuli, and mālikā. On the vajra ground, exerting oneself further, the syllables TṢ, BṢ, RTSHM, BHM, and RṢ are to be arranged in the directions. In the center, a yogin adorned with all ornaments, devoted to mantra and established in meditative equipoise, offers the five enjoyment offerings to all who embody the deities of the mantra; in the four directions, tormas fully filling skull-cups, and a directional torma cast outside — and likewise striking the obstructors with a phurba and with sticks made from the wood of the offering fire, one recites the mantra. Outside it is the same. On the outside of the four faces: PṚṂ, PHṂ, GHṂ, ŚṂ. With the torma offering going before, one rings a bell; and thus the reader who recites and the four practitioners exert themselves in performing the dance. This is called diminishment and cessation. One is to know the four aspects of merit as: with the five foods such as śāli rice and the rest, along with what is not food — it is said there is none. How it is to be distinguished is not to be known in the usual way; into a full skull-cup one pours a small amount of beer as a drink. Into the fire, too, one who possesses wisdom performs the fire-offering. Just as one accomplishes lordship over the hero through mantra placed in equipoise — then, having performed one hundred thousand fire-offerings, if one wishes, the outer common sovereignty of a wheel-turning ruler is obtained. By this very means, whether it turns once or twice, there is no doubt about this transformation.

Then the goddess asked: "When one obtains the minor sovereignty of a petty kingdom, enemies arise. By what many methods does the lord of gods — Indra — perfectly complete the mind's chariot?"

The Blessed One declared: "If one possesses compassion and fully fulfills the intentions of sentient beings, and if one also follows through daily in providing food for the assembly that honors the Saṅgha, then for that purpose as well one acts to honor sentient beings. Being devoted to the meditative concentration of mantra, one first confers empowerment, and the secret mantra of one's own heart-essence and the subsidiary heart-essence is to be fully bestowed."

At three sessions each day, sixty-four torma offerings are to be given, and one acts accordingly. By that activity's very nature, the honoring of sentient beings comes to be fulfilled just as it should be.

Five arrangements are to be made. Having done so in secret, at the conclusion of one's own fire-oblation offering, the torma is to be presented. Being zealous in the meditative concentration of mantra, one is further to perform many offerings and conferrals of empowerment together with the four yoginīs.

Adorned with the five ornaments,
Accompanied by many who constantly intoxicate,
Bearing a curved knife and a skull-cup,
Wearing a skirt of tiger-skin throughout,
Filling the mouth with rice grains,
She gives from mouth into mouth.
One practitioner is adorned with every ornament;
With the left hand one rings a bell,
With the right hand one brandishes a vajra.
Make the five painted images
Measuring five cubits each.
Paint them divided by color
According to delusion, slander, attachment,
And envy.
White, yellow, red, and blue:
Each is to be painted on its own corresponding form.
In the center, paint Yamāntaka (the Foe of Death, the wrathful deity).
One who is supremely devoted to mantra,
Using great bees' ink,
Shall write with a supreme bone.
The syllable A and the syllable Va —
Four hundred thousand in full completion.

In the center of a triangular fire-pit,
One who is supremely devoted to the fire-oblation mantra —
And the four ācāryas (ritual masters) from outside — Likewise with three-petaled offerings in the fire-pit:
From outside, write the twelve seeds
And likewise upon the twelve wheels with mantra.
Also upon barley of sixteen finger-widths,
Mixed with the blood of one who is nameless,
Using nail-paint,
Or alternatively with lac-resin juice:

Yamārāja-sadomeya, yamedomu-ruṇayodaya, yadayoni-rāyakṣeya, yakṣeyacani-rāmaya.

This secret mantra of the goddess, difficult to find —
I have taught it complete and correct.
By the power and might of this mantra

I accomplish buddhahood itself,
And travel as the lord of the three worlds.
If one who is diligent in secret mantra applies it,
One's own retinue and company
Will travel through the sky — of this there is no doubt.

The red Yamāntaka yogin —
Some always strive in sacred commitment.
Those who have also devoted themselves to the five families
Shall write it by reciting one hundred thousand times.

Through a messenger, in the eastern maṇḍala,
Between two bowls placed there — filled properly with butter and bee-honey — one is to perform a fire-oblation with yogurt-rice, white mustard seeds, and salt.

On the western petal, in a bowl equal to those, mixed with red flowers, nail-paint, and lac-resin juice, one is to perform a fire-oblation.

On the northern petal, with a bowl filled properly with great bee-honey placed there, in a triangular fire-pit, one is to perform a fire-oblation using the wood siṭṭhaka, the wood saṃkocha, the wood kaṇḍika, poison, and aconite.

Having taken the vow first, with earnest effort of ninefold nature,
Adorned with the five ornaments,
The yoginī likewise adorned in the same way,
Decked with jewels of various kinds,
Beautified with a white tail-fan:
With both hands holding vajra and bell,
Again and again she gives torma offerings.
Just as some present offerings and thereby Bring about satisfaction —

In the center it is to be done likewise,
And at the four corners it is to be done in the same way.

The Saṅgha is also to be fed.
With affection for the lowly and the weak,
I individually honor the sacred commitment.
Endowed with wisdom and merit,
By means of the five families —

Thereafter, with the fire-oblation of food accompanied by yogurt,

The fire-oblation is to be performed.
The good-minded one, with earnest effort, is not to remain still.
Together with a staff, at the four gates,
The sound of a great drum is to be made.
Wherever the sound is heard,
The army of the dead is utterly driven away,
Making the ears clear and distinct.
Though not seen by the eyes,
It brings the companies under control,
Causes piercing pain in the head,
And drives them away in flight.
Alternatively, it is to be bound to a bird's wing and pronounced:

Wherever one goes, in that very place, the enemy's forces abandon even their own wives and go mad. They themselves become supremely inclined toward battle. Elephants and horses and the like turn back, and one's own forces advance. When three divisions engage in battle, the enemy is made to fall in pieces. A single messenger stationed there subsists on the bare minimum and lives on. The ash of that fire-oblation scatters the enemy's forces or, encompassing them on all sides, obstructs them. It suddenly causes boulders the size of elephants to fall, and a great rain to fall. By practice in the manner of the nāga rite, with a hundred thousand fire-oblations, one attains what one desires. Even beyond death those enemies become one's subjects. This, through the triple transformation, grants power over the earth and the three worlds.

Then, through one hundred thousand fruits of the sebal tree, one obtains that fruit — so it is stated in the chapter on the abundance of minor accomplishments in the tantra of the Red Executioner of Yama, being the fourth chapter.

Then the Blessed Lady asked: "Now, regarding this semen (bindu) to be properly joined with the marks of the bhaga — for greatly increasing the breasts, there are the practices for healing illness; the practices for making the mind not fall under the power of women; and the practices for binding them. Kindly explain the practice of protecting and guarding the breasts by means of semen." Then the Blessed One declared: "You have asked me well," and granted this:

First the aggregates are to be purified.
Then begin the extensive outer work.
Take the powder of the three fruits.
Yakṣarāpālāśa —
after eating it, drinking molasses, insects and lice are utterly destroyed.
The juice of sesame oil and kaṭuka,
the juice of hīlamocī,
and with rock salt drunk and applied — worms, lice, and the like are destroyed.
The juice of sesame oil and kaṭuka,
with picaṇḍarīvaṇa properly combined,
by the application of fierce brāhmaṇī — nivaṇa is completely destroyed.
The juice of hīlamocī
combined with a small amount of rock salt, applied to the shadow,
destroys the picapitu.
The juice of sesame oil and kaṭuka —
if it be buried at the root of the indigo plant, by the drink-preparation sesame oil is destroyed.
Kuṣmāṇḍa, khurkāṇa oil,
with picaṇḍarīvaṇa properly combined —
if the serpent's powder be drunk, the phlegm's honey is destroyed.
One is to do this day by day.
Afterward the medicine is to be prepared.
Thereby one abides in granting fruit.
Otherwise one delights without fruit.
Śāli rice husks as powder are to be eaten with tapte essence.
With the seven praises, at dawn,
it is proper to eat the edible food,
and once again, for as long as I live, blood and semen will increase.
Om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa imaṃ divyam amṛtaṃ me kuru hūṃ phaṭ.

Sātitaṃ, and buffalo, and also coconut —
with the essence of wāśī properly combined, with the fat that arises from pig — the marks, the ears, the breasts, and the bhaga are thus delighted.
By delighting the whole body,
there is no doubt it will increase.
Certainly, having stroked with the fingernails and having anointed with that very substance, insert it well into the center of the birth-place.
By what is old, the birth-place will increase.
The dregs of pomegranate skin, white mustard cooked in sesame oil —
by pleasurably anointing the breasts, they increase.
White mustard, clean śu, perfume made into pleasant-smelling hātī —
by means of the dregs, the penis increases.
The breasts and ears will increase.
The white that others cannot overcome, made with pippalī in the hand — with fresh buffalo butter, drunk, the penis increases.
The juice of daddhura, tābona — inserted at the root, mixed with fresh buffalo butter, and the fruit of daddhura, goḍaka —
both day and night it is to be tormented.

Then, by pleasurably anointing with buffalo saṃguḍa in the manner described before, applying it three times at night, it will increase. The powder of crystal mixed with butter is to be applied inside the vaginal passage. By means of śīthila it will become tight. The seeds of lotus, the seeds of blue lotus, the rootlets of lotus, puśelaze, and costus — these are to be cooked in sesame oil. By means of this, for the purpose of making the vaginal organ difficult to penetrate, it defeats such things as laxity and slackness. The vaginal area is to be washed with a decoction of neem bark. It is to be fumigated with neem bark. A fine young woman will become possessed of pleasant fragrance, good fortune, and the like as qualities.

Five parts of bābla mixed with one part of the transforming agent of lac wood, moistened with water — by merely anointing with this, the hairs of the vaginal area, the armpits, and the bodily marks are made to fall away. Halāhala mixed with gold-froth in hot sesame oil, together with śaptā wood and hāsthāpi wood — by anointing the penis and such with these, the hairs will grow back again.

By anointing with the rendered fats of buffalo, pig, elephant, and domestic fowl, the breasts and the like will increase. By applying sesame oil of jātī flowers, the vaginal area will increase. Fresh buffalo butter, clean śu, and kuṭa wood — these are to be pleasurably applied at the navel, and the breasts will increase. It is similar to how washing with mare's urine causes the penis to increase.

The root of daṇḍodpala drunk with butter made from cow's milk will cause pregnancy. Bālā, atibālā, śīta, śarkarā, sesame oil, honey from bees, and water — drinking this defeats menorrhagia.

Barley flour, cow's urine, and hard resin — if these are kneaded together with honey and butter and applied, the entire body becomes excellent. At the time of the menstrual period, binding the root of pig-suppressing plant to the ear will cause pregnancy.

Eating kalambī-pāka increases semen. Eating the powder of āmalakī, likthi, and yogurt increases semen. Eating semen and blood increases semen. Drinking a woman's excrement and a woman's urine, filtered, increases semen.

The powder of āmalakī together with water, butter, and honey is to be eaten at the prescribed time. It also gives sharpness of eyesight and produces wisdom. Eating the powder of āmalakī together with milk and the like — through the preparation of a year, one lives a hundred years. One sho of āmalakī juice together with one sho of powder of vāgucī in yogurt is to be drunk.

Eating the thick portion each morning for one month makes the lifespan five hundred years. One sho of vāgucī yogurt together with buttermilk, water, whey, or milk — whichever is drunk, within six months one will be endowed with youthful bloom and the like.

Eating the powder of muṇḍirī with butter — within twenty-one days it makes one appear sixteen years old. One sho of the powder of the seeds of śaṇa, one sho of red śālu grain, and two bowls of milk from a cow of a single color are to be eaten. First, one full bowl of milk is to be drunk, then the śaṇa and the rest are to be dissolved in it and drunk. Then it is to be eaten. The thick portion is to be drunk with milk — within seven or three days, as long as it takes, wind and fever are abandoned. By the manner of the previous actions and the manner of subsequent actions, the hair and the like of that one will fall out. Thereafter, white hair and wrinkles having been abandoned, one lives for five hundred years.

The root of khragskrod, with butter and honey, is to be eaten in an amount the size of a cat's paw — the result is exactly as stated. Āmalakī, ārusī, the king of bees, and Pippilī, naleśam, and iron filings are to be made into pills the size of an udumbara fruit with honey and sugar. These pills are then to be eaten. Over months, one's lifespan increases to thirty years. One sraṇ of kumārī eaten together with butter and yogurt produces great strength. Bhatrālī, and āru mixed in a threefold preparation of ligature with āru, eaten with a measure of water and the like, produces great strength. In all cases, one should eat these in a divine manner. They are to be pleased and consecrated with mantra.

This is the fifth chapter, on the foam of semen.

Then the root of the sandal tree is to be tied with a cord and massaged on the head — this dispels headache. Honey, butter, and eye medicine together applied at night destroys night blindness. Eating the root of the fruit of the sindhuvāra plant destroys hide-disease. The seeds of laphug, priyaṅgu, red sandalwood, and ruta are to be tied and formed into a powder paste — this completely destroys monkeys and the like. Dried venison and goat's milk are to be drunk — this destroys planetary afflictions. Āmalakī, pippilī, citraka, ginger, old molasses, butter, and honey eaten in equal portions destroys untimely cough and respiratory distress. Ginger and black cumin, or alternatively buttermilk, may be drunk together with salt — this completely destroys blood parasites. Likhara and yakṣāra are to be eaten in equal portions. A decoction of black antimony is to be drunk, or alternatively a stone-crushing drink is to be drunk. The water of āru and citraka is to be drunk — this destroys liver disease. Black cumin and molasses eaten destroys circular fever. Yakṣāra or buttermilk drunk completely destroys wind disease. The essence of warm sesame oil, with bitaṅka and rock salt added and heated slightly, is to be drunk — this completely destroys inflammation and worms. Āru eaten with molasses destroys ill-repute. Āru eaten together with white ginger destroys wind disease. The root of dūrvā grass, tied with ginger and applied as a paste, destroys dog bite. The same remedy destroys dog bite, shingles, pustules, and related conditions. Molasses and warm sesame oil drunk completely destroys respiratory distress. Arjuna, cinnamon, butter, and the like eaten together destroys heart pain. Bel fruit, burned and eaten with molasses, destroys blood-fever. Molasses and butter eaten destroys wind, bile, phlegm, leprosy, and related conditions. The powder of the three fruits together with butter and honey drunk destroys all illness. The powder of āru, together with butter and honey, eaten at all three times of day, completely destroys wind and phlegm. The five limbs of vāśaka, śuddha, brahma wood, and dried pippilī made into powder, formed into a wadi with rock salt and honey, and then eaten — this destroys untimely wind and phlegm. The bark of white Śālmāli wood made into powder and combined together with lotus seeds and the fruit of kumuda, then bound, and the root mantra recited one thousand times, and pills made the size of a dove's pill, and dried in the shade, then dried in the moisture of tanaya — eaten at dawn, drunk as much and as long as one desires, one becomes free of urinary disease. The voice becomes melodious. Brahma wood, śuddha, white ginger, pippilī, āru, vāśaka, and Śeṇḍeṇ — made into pills with honey and eaten; the fruit is exactly as described. Gśinrjemo, āru (āruṣkara), white ginger, rock salt, and mānasāmana — eaten together, these destroy all congestion. The juice of śletreś drunk with honey destroys urinary disease. Mātrala with milk, pippilī powder, butter, and honey drunk together utterly destroys fever, cold, and the like. Ngotshacan, āśara, and the roots of bumkhaya tied with vāṇi water and applied as an ointment. The root of śletreś also eaten — this heals wounds of the root-veins. White ginger and yakṣara eaten together — the passage of the belly becomes comfortable. The seeds of jayantī drunk together with naleśam destroy the disease of constipation. The three fruits, black melika, earth-clay, bhṛṅgarāja, the seeds of sahakāra, iron powder, and tsammo — these are bound together. Then guggulu is smoked over the hair and the mixture is massaged in. Then for seven days it is heated by fire — this is a collyrium for the hair. The bile of a peacock and the juice of bhṛṅgarāja cooked in butter derived from cow-milk and applied — this too is a collyrium for the hair. Female pig and the three heating spices, ground in equal measure, placed in the middle of a wick and burned; then by the sequence of the downward-facing wick, taking one hundred measures of sesame oil from a monkey, and by a compound of two drops — wrinkles and white hair are eliminated. Massaged with the juice of this, applied to leprosy with the liquid, it becomes pacified. Massaged with fresh butter immediately, and together with gantaka and masākā — in a rasatolakī, with rice sālū, and with a ball of cilonisa placed inside the vessel of the water-machine's pot, covered with mṛṣikā, placed in fire together with vāluka — this makes an astringent taste. From what is eaten — taking the dung of a young sun-bird and forming it into pills. Tie it with the root of Chinese incense and wrap it around. Eating one pill at a time, one eats poison — but the poison will utterly vanish.

Now, the Blessed One (the Buddha) was requested: "Blessed One, please teach the rites for bringing others under one's power." The Blessed One declared: "The root of the white plant that cannot be subdued by others — made into a waḍi with its juice, and by a drop it brings a woman under one's power. Brahmā's staff, śuddha, ruṣṭa, and honey — tied together and made into a pill, whoever one desires is brought under one's power. To the enclosure of the ḍaṇḍōdapāla, give the ground of tambula. Likewise, Brahmā's staff, śuddha, ruṣṭa, nagakeśara, and tambula given — one brings another under one's power. By a drop of gīvaṃ and of a spontaneously occurring flower, one who has fortune is brought under one's power. Gīvaṃ, śīśulola, and bhṛṅgarāja together — formed in the manner of a waḍiga under the asterism Puṣya — by a drop one brings another under one's power. With the root of bhṛṅgarāja, apply one's own fluid as a collyrium. Likewise, the crest-feather of a peacock, a garland from a corpse, and the powder of a dried crow's tongue — placed on whomever's head, that one is brought under one's power. Tied onto the tooth of a cow as food and drink and given — one brings another under one's power. The root of viṣṇukrānta tied and applied — similarly one is brought to joy. Under the asterism Puṣya, taking the root of dattūra, under the asterism Anurādhā — the bark of the waḍa tree: to fire, the leaf; to the south, the flower; to the west, the root; to the north, the flower. In equal measure powdered and made into a waḍika with honey. Wrapped in cloth and dried. Given in tambula, with conch-shell powder one brings another under one's power. The charcoal of arka wood, datura, the eye of a dog, and writing the name of whomever one wishes on the sole of one's foot with the big toe, and saying "Come, so-and-so!" causes that person to come. One should then fumigate over a smokeless fire.

Under the asterism Kṛttikā, extracting the root of the plant known as methī, anointing it with butter made from mother's milk, and then drinking the smoke from a skull causes it to act as an eye-medicine — and that eye-medicine brings both women and men under one's power.

Agaru, white sandalwood, and the sheath of the acacia: given as an eye-medicine, they overcome unwillingness. Priyaṅgu, giwam, Idong ros, and the saffron of the north: made into an eye-medicine and applied to the eyes, they bring one under power.

Musk, costus, datura, and saḥā — sesame oil prepared from these brings one under power.

Namaḥ Caṇḍālī — come, subjugate me — svāhā. Having first performed the preliminary approach practice by reciting ten thousand times, one performs the approach session. Then, in a cremation ground, having emphatically praised the ashes one hundred and eight times over the fourteenth day, if placed upon a woman's head she comes under power, and ever after, with a mind that is continually resolved, she is possessed of a joyful disposition.

For causing seminal retention: the eye of a śimśapā tree-creeper, the root of a dead horse, and datura — and furthermore, a muktaśikhā from the north tied around the waist causes seminal retention.

Śarāṭiboga, vāmadhāti, and furthermore white śara grass and the resin of bukhā — engaging in union with these causes seminal retention.

Having hollowed out a myrobalan fruit, filling it with mercury and tying it at the waist with a thread retains the semen.

Noble sesame oil, lac, rañjita, and the pith of white arka wood — burned together cause seminal retention.

Powder of the kuril tree and the central pith — to be burned in sesame oil — causes seminal retention.

Sesame oil with powdered kuril tree, or the butter of camphor flowers — to be drunk. Applied to the sole of the foot, it causes seminal retention.

The root of the red-crested white raven, the filament of a white lotus, and honey — applied to the navel, cause seminal retention.

Wrapping the root of the plant that overcomes Viṣṇu in its own petals, wound with petals and fashioned into a vajra-shaped binding, causes seminal retention.

An eye-medicine made from cat semen, mercury, long pepper, rock salt, costus, and pigeon droppings — made into an ointment for the liṅga — causes seminal retention.

Guṣṭha, uddhāvali, bṛddha, and śrīga — applied, they cause erection.

The root of kapeta wood, darbhī grass, and goat's urine — tied and smeared all over the liṅga, and the lotus spread open — three times it causes erection. Washing with warm water thoroughly pacifies it.

Filling a hollow vessel with mercury and placing it mouth-downward causes seminal retention.

The organ soaked in goat's urine with the Yakṣiṇī of the Water for seven days — applying the ointment made thereby causes the liṅga to become erect.

The root of datura, the root of kāmaraśā, the root of oṣaṇā, bound with camphor juice and applied to the liṅga — causes a desirous woman to flow.

Rock salt, pepper, camphor, and the powder of ghoṣa, bound with honey and applied to the liṅga — likewise.

Pigeon droppings bound with honey, applied to the liṅga, cause a desirous woman to flow.

The root of kāmācī — when a woman eats it in tambula (betel) at a time of great desire, causes her to flow.

Pakva, tiṇḍī, and mallikā mixed with rock salt — inserted on one's own ring finger, and then placed into her bhaga, moving to the root of the Sovereign Lady of the Vajra-Realm for as long as she continues to flow.

Camphor, mercury, pepper, śiṃhāti, long pepper, and honey — applied, cause a woman to flow.

The root of jayantī wood, bound, and a thick rice porridge together with — — mixed with water and applied thoroughly to her birthplace at the center of the monthly sign, a woman will undoubtedly become aroused. The seeds of the pālāśa tree, bound and applied — and from drinking ghee and honey, a woman bearing the sign of blood will become aroused. Chakaba flour and flat-bread flour, applied afterward to the birthplace, cause it to become firm.

This is the seventh chapter: "On the Arising of Semen."

Lifting the throat and embracing closely,
again and again crying out to the god, one who has been made into the substance of a king —
how does one become a wheel-turning ruler?

One who has not entered into proximity,
in a single place, comes to royal sovereignty.
The enemy becomes motionless, rejoices and bows at one's feet,
and is drawn and led entirely.
Recite likewise to the lord of dominion — tell me this for the benefit of sentient beings.

The Blessed One declared:

Having worshipped a painted image or a statue with the five articles of offering, offer a torma fully complete with sixty-four portions,
three times at the appointed sessions.
A golden vase, likewise eight bowls, with the extensive practice of the mechanical device (yantra), praising likewise and inclining toward the supreme — again, a chariot, bowls, and so forth, filled with ghee and honey:
at the dwelling of the glorious sovereign (Śrī), bind them firmly in a wheel of the syllable Aḥ.
The secret mantra and vidyā beginning with HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪ and so on — the intelligent one worships at the three times.

Upon what is above the gaṭaka, having made the five maṇḍalas,
having well wound and offered them,
one should purify all the ground with effort.
Having fully taken possession of the ground,
the supreme maṇḍala is to be performed — drawn with beautiful colored powders, or alternatively with thick cooked rice, likewise possessing the five colors.

Likewise, the five masters, having drunk a little of what causes intoxication, upon the design above —
the maṇḍala of the lord of nine, pleasing, with skulls at its four corners.

Endowed with the yoga of one's own deity of desire, possessed of wisdom and knowing how to draw lines with thread, the very extensive maṇḍala of the goddess is to be drawn openly according to its appearance.

To be drawn likewise at the four petals —
the distinctive mark is the white staff.

In the center, the white staff is to be drawn in the form of a many-splendored vajra.

The five lineages are to be made equal;
having apportioned them, train well.

Here, by the practice of tantra and the like, bestow the empowerment with great effort.

The master of secrets and wisdom — and the fourth, again likewise.

The four masters themselves again and again offer the tormas.

Bell and vajra rest in equanimity;
adorned with various ornaments, entirely in yellow garments, adorned with human ornaments.

With the four of gold, silver, copper, and iron, correctly arrange the vases of the maṇḍala.

In the center, also a golden vase, beautifully adorned with various precious things.

From gold, silver, copper, and iron — the four mechanical devices (yantras), and in the center a golden device, beautifully adorned with red flowers.

Again, further, at the outer four maṇḍalas, one should recite with effort: arranging trees and so on.

Outside, those gathered rest over the offering of food;
enjoyments likewise, seven for others.

The Saṅgha's honoraria and enjoyments also — the wise one should accomplish with effort.

To the east: vaḍa; to the south: aśvattha; to the west: vakula;
to the north: nāgakeśara.

To the east: white flowers; to the south: yellow;
likewise to the west: red; and to the north: green;
likewise above as well.

Marulaḍa of the vajra lineage, brahmin, vajra, jewel, and so on — in order to give abundantly to the eastern direction, these persons — where on earth — adorned with all the various ornaments — the lord of humans, on his four sides, with the four guide-women, gathered together for the offering assembly:
having offered abundantly one hundred and eight,
with the right knee placed on the ground,
hands joined in reverence, adorned with jewels and so forth — reciting these words over a vessel filled with various ornaments, gold, and so forth:

"Grant me sovereignty over all the divine realms throughout the earth, free from all harm.

Grant me too the sovereignty of a wheel-turning king, and lordship itself."

Then, to the glorious Yamāntaka (the destroyer of Yama, lord of death), the red teacher, in truth:

"O great kings, bring this mind-chariot to completion.

You who are yogins of Yamāntaka, intent upon mantra and supreme meditative concentration — listen with wisdom and devotion for a moment:

recite the Perfection of Wisdom;

make water-offerings to Jambhala;

likewise perform the hungry-ghost torma offering;

sustain the world with the nature of loving care —

today these and the others are to be recited.

O lord of men, speak truly to me;

O sovereign, since there is nothing other than truth,
the lord of men shall speak truth.

Touch the vajra to the head and to the heart three times, and thus establish sovereignty.

One shall rely upon the maṇḍala.
As for speaking to me in this place:
today, along with the fruit of birth,
I shall perfectly attain the human destiny."

Then: "I, the yogin of the glorious red Yamāntaka, having established sovereignty over the three worlds, shall thereafter repel Indra and the rest.
Likewise, having again established Kailāsa as the queen's realm — taking up sovereignty with great wealth and perfect accomplishment in abundance, bearing sovereignty throughout — like the moon seizing the lord of men, all buddhas and all spiritual attainments — whatever swiftly comes to arise — in that divine treasury, bestow the supreme upon me, the sovereign."

Likewise, with truth upon truth, exactly so, having bowed to the ground in that place,
and having begged forgiveness, depart for home.

Likewise, with various songs and music and so forth, joyfully perform the fire offering.
Each day, with the requisite daily practices,
and from midnight on, with the assembly circle, combined with wisdom and with offerings — through this sequence, with twenty days and six months, the oblation offering is complete.

Likewise, having come there in every case, as a gift of dancing elephants, horses, and the like,
one receives the supreme.

At that time, again and again, whoever the lord of men may be — one dispatches them elsewhere as an emissary, and seizes sovereignty oneself.
If they do not comply, one places them under the punishment of annihilation and drives them out.
One causes the swift ones bearing various precious things and so forth to stumble.

If one desires the highest benefit for oneself and one's own share, by this one bestows sovereignty.

If one does not come when summoned by name, one shall cause that person to be tormented in the fire of the acacia-wood mechanical device.

In that very instant they become bewildered and go off to another's domain.

The ash from the cooking hearth — when given for diseases and so forth — pacifies those conditions.

If the poṣadha (the restoration ceremony) is to be performed, one thereby attains lordship itself.

These four things arise through the fire offering.

O Blessed Lady, I have spoken to you in sincere truth.
Even a fraction of that supreme mantra is difficult to find in the three worlds.

O Lady of Glory, Hevajra, the teaching, liberation supreme — and in the Śrī Cakrasaṃvara Tantra as well — the widespread yoginī of vast scope;
the glorious Lady in the Saṃpuṭa, and extensively in the Yoginī Tantra as well — spiritual attainments most joyful in great abundance, as many as the sands of the river Gaṅgā —
O glorious red tantra of Yamāntaka,
O Lady, hear this with reverence.

O Lady, I have passed into nirvāṇa and am not seen by Indra and the others.

Through the power of yogic practice in which the eye is not faulty, one comes to be born in the brahma realm.

Possessed of the power of great diligence and great strength, one therefore becomes a teacher of the Dharma.

By means of this, having been sustained, one obtains the tantra well concealed.

Having recited one hundred thousand secret mantras, one accomplishes oneself through them and comes to engage fully in the practice.

In Jambudvīpa it bestows abundantly all manner of attainments (siddhis).

The seed-syllables of summoning — Gaṃ, Saṃ, Kaṃ — by a yogin performing these seven the pleasure grove will come to be found.

Again, through yogins such as Kanaujayuga, Bālagotṭala, Gomacārālābhṛti, and others of their kind —

Kaliṅga and Vaṅga, Gaurī and Magadha,
Suraka, the victorious Ubhikṛ, Biṭacakalara and the like,
Godermakam, Gilidge, Vimoji and others, victorious —

these are accomplished by the yogin of the glorious red tantra of Yamāntaka.

Whoever speaks and proclaims, whoever is possessed of great diligence, whoever greatly overcomes adversaries —
some here, together with the world and so forth, again turn supremely toward mantra,
and again become sovereigns and lords of royal dominion, becoming wheel-turning monarchs (cakravartins).

The great secret mantra, well concealed,
is not to be shown to the yoga of the childish.
It is to be taught to one who enters the tantra and who genuinely desires to become a buddha.
When reciting this tantra from this text,
one must first receive empowerment,
and only thereafter is it to be taught.

The king of tantras, supreme among tantras, though brief in its mantras and in what it says of meditative concentration, will be accomplished by the mere act of reading it.

One who delights in sinful actions and is of weak faith will not accomplish it.
Yet even one who performs misdeeds,
if they take hold of the training, will without effort come to accomplish attainment itself — of this there is no doubt here.

Beginning with the ten virtues,
the Dharma is thereafter to be made fully clear.
Likewise, all activities related to it will come to pass accordingly.

This is the eighth chapter: the chapter on the training of royal dominion.

O Blessed One, one will arise as a king and will become possessed of the Dharma.
Speak to me the suchness of the Dharma.
Without the suchness of mantra, without meditative concentration — from this very state, for the sake of liberating all sentient beings,
the suchness of mantra, fully illumined,
will be accomplished without meditative concentration.
Without meditative concentration, from that suchness, one will come to take a different form.

For the childish who perform that mudrā:
first, taking the form of a deity,
the body is to be thoroughly purified.
Second is the recitation of the secret:
reciting the vowels and consonants (ālikāli), and, through the division of body, speech, and mind,
the intelligent one recites the three syllables.
Likewise, the intelligent one recites twenty thousand and one thousand six hundred times.
By the count of day and night,
the recitation of the secret mantra is performed.

Then, at that point, at the tip of the nose alone, the sequential visualization of the seed-syllable mark —

one should also contemplate it as a mustard seed.
From the engagement of the vajra cross-legged posture, having rendered the mind stable,
one will also come to bless oneself.

Just as with illusion, just as with a dream, so too again as with the moon in water —
one comes to take a form such as this.
Just as, from the oral instructions of the guru, water and water gather and become one,
through the engagement of the union of illusion and emptiness,
by practicing these two together,
one accomplishes union (yuganaddha) to the highest degree.

One should not reflect even slightly on the yoga —
it becomes supremely equanimity.
One should not reflect even slightly on the deity —
the suchness of oneself will become clear.
That which is without an object of thought and without thought — that too is not present here.
That is here declared to be beyond thought.

Like the trunk of the tree of existence:
some remain in agitation and speech,
some are to be drawn fully in.
The capacity of meditation in the mind —
just as one does not know how to make distinctions — so likewise, through the stages of yoga, it bestows all manner of attainments.

With one's own mind in the world of saṃsāra, through desire one takes birth in the higher realms.
All consorts are made joyful.
The supreme sun of protection and so forth — some anoint their limbs with moonlight, some adorn their limbs smeared with clay, various ones bring others to ripeness.
Therefore, dwelling thus, with suffering and with pleasure, there is no harm.

There is great joy, and there is doubt.

Those yogins who have desires — let them do so without base conduct.

Enjoying the five desires, possessing the five qualities of desire,
they are ever to sport and play.

Released from saṃsāra, they are freed — freed entirely from what is substantial and insubstantial.

All conduct born of shame is abandoned.

The commitment of intelligence transcends all karma.

All actions — the supreme of awareness.

This is the ninth chapter, the chapter on suchness.

Now a question was put: "O Blessed One, what exactly is empowerment called? Lord, tell me this. The empowerment of the consort, the four varieties — listen now, for this is what leads sentient beings into entry. As for the scattering that makes one stainless — all of these cause movement. Then, seated in vajra posture, filled with the bliss of non-emission and the rest: as long as these have become stainless, the bodhicitta is what abandons. As long as the yogin does not perform it, the bodhicitta is what is released. Whoever has accomplished attainments proceeds accordingly. As long as the supreme of universal joy exists, by that very form of bliss is the form of the buddha endowed with perfect purity. As long as semen has been displayed, one should always cultivate the self. That is known as true in the world. Or else, in what is now without purpose — the fourth, again, is just like this. Here, whatever wisdom and gnosis there is — in the fourth empowerment, an ordinary person would speak of it. That is again called 'likewise.' The fourth itself, as the third — what has been done in the same way is not confirmed. From the first limb, again in repetition — whatever is said becomes a fault, in just the same way. The third of the causes belonging to the childish: whatever that is, the fourth is the fruit. Because there is no distinction between cause and fruit, the fourth also is established as the third — this is the meaning of ultimate truth, as stated before, from which, by means of the three mudrās, three fruits are accomplished. In this mantra approach, the fruit of fire-offering is devoid of the three mudrās. Wondrous! In accomplishing the three mudrās, the karma mudrā and the wisdom mudrā do not become the cause" — so it is said. From having thoroughly abandoned the cultivation of the karma mudrā and the wisdom mudrā, one is to meditate definitively on the great seal, the mahāmudrā. Here, the union of the two faculties is called the bliss of practicing all desires. The characteristic of emission and non-emission — through the practice of the essential nature — does not become bliss. The third, not arisen in the cause — the emission of the clan, the fruit of the third — does not become the fourth in the ultimate. Let this be understood and fully internalized.

This is the tenth chapter, the chapter on the rite of empowerment.

A request was made: "O Blessed One, please speak the rite of painted images." The Blessed One declared: One should strive to worship that woman who is red and white. One should begin at the asterism Puṣya, and she should be given empowerment. For her, a veil of red and white, woven with thread through great effort together with the fiber, should be given to her. Each day, maintaining the sacred commitments together with wisdom, it is to be tied, and that cloth should be given as a bedsheet to the red-and-white woman at the time when she is dusty. After three days, a painter who holds the sacred commitments is to be praised and celebrated — whatever he, who speaks as a merchant of heroes, says is to be given to him. Making ink from great honey, one should write with a pen made of human bone. For as long as one is to inquire into it, after drinking a little of an intoxicant, each day at the four session-intervals one should recite offerings and one hundred recitations of the secret mantra. The sacred commitment of the families is certainly to be made as one, without fail. By means of the sequence of heroes, it is deeply secret and supremely to be dwelt in — this too is said.

Furthermore, the yogin of Yamāntaka who holds the sacred commitments should make twelve volumes at the cuckoo. Thus it is said. This concludes the eleventh chapter, on the ritual of painted images and volumes.

The sovereign lord spoke to me of the joining of the winds. The Blessed One declared: at the heart center, the life-wind and the downward-clearing wind are described. At the region of the navel dwells the equalizing wind. At the region of the throat moves the upward-flowing wind. The all-pervading wind permeates the entire body. Among these, which is the chief, the central one? It is the life-wind, dwelling at the heart center.

Through the distinction of exhalation and inhalation, the winds of vitality and movement are sixteen. By means of the joining practice, for each one individually there are four maṇḍalas, and by each single stroke descending, there are one million six hundred thousand. By touching and descending from the right side, the maṇḍala of fire is to be declared. From touching both left and right, it becomes the wheel of the great sovereign. Having attained stability and leisure, it becomes the maṇḍala of rest.

The left channel and the right channel abide on the left and on the right. The all-moving one is at the center, and it follows upon the co-arisen. There is entering, exiting, and remaining — unmoved in its essential nature. The wind called the All-Vanquishing, the wind of the thread, enters for as long as life continues. The entering is called the vase-bearing. From holding it, there is the filled one. The lifting is called the rétsaka. The unmoved becomes the vase-bearing.

The assembly of winds fully entering — numbering hundreds of thousands and so forth — in accord with the words of the Buddha, the protector, is accomplished in that very instant. Whatever the winds are, having become unified, by embracing wisdom, it is accomplished in approximately half a month.

By practicing the joining with one's own superior deity, one comes to possess the buddha's gnosis perfectly and to know the five superknowledges. By practicing the joining with one's own superior deity, one embraces one's own consort. Heart center to heart center, secret joined to secret in perfect union. Mouth also made to mouth — taking earnestly to that which is without contrivance — one should meditate that the four seeds dwelling at the heart center pervade everywhere. Through that very abiding, whatever it is, one comes to know all persons completely. Simply by reflecting in all directions on what has arisen, is arising, and is arising now, one also comes to know the minds of others, and causes truth to be spoken as truth.

Likewise, through that very same joining, one should cultivate the practice with respect to the ears. Whatever sounds there are present nearby, one hears all teachings. Likewise, having well cultivated the practice with the eyes, one perceives even all three worlds. With the nose, having likewise contemplated, one comes to know all scents. With the tongue, having likewise contemplated, one fully discerns experiences even at great distances. Likewise contemplate upon the tip of one's own mark — one comes to know all tangible objects. Likewise, having contemplated upon the center of the crown of the head, one causes all capacities to greatly increase.

Wherever and in whichever wind abides, having made the tastes equal and stopped — in that very location and by that very means, one distinctly realizes the suchness of each. Pacification, enrichment, magnetization, likewise hooking, slaying, expelling — all of these are perfectly accomplished through meditation alone.

By perfectly applying the vase-bearing and so forth, the four modes of gazing are to be definitively joined. The gazing look that gazes to the left: the vase-bearing brings it under control. The hooking from the right side: the filled one definitively joins it. Whatever gaze abides at the forehead: the rétsaka performs the slaying. The gaze abiding at the tip of the nose: the vase-bearing causes arousal. The vase-bearing for flowers of the jâ plant; the rétsaka for a moist tree as well; the rétsaka for what has been eaten together; the vase-bearing for a wavering root. The gaze is to be definitively joined beforehand.

One should contemplate for six months. The application of the power of all things is accomplished through the cessation of mind. From the cessation of mind, the wind is stopped; and from that stopping, the mind too becomes stopped. Each penetrating the other, they are bound together. Wisdom and method as one — the vajra and the lotus understood as equal — one who has tasted the bliss of cessation is held to accomplish all things perfectly. Brahmā, Viṣṇu (Skt. Viṣṇu), and the other gods together with that mantra-holder: whatever all beings of the world do and whatever they will do, it shall be made to be. What the omniscient one has taught in the tantra of yogins and yoginīs is to be supremely practiced in the age of strife, and it should not be regarded as without accomplishment. For the fully endowed, the triply endowed, and the doubly endowed, and also for the age of strife, it is truly accomplished. Once again the supreme accomplishment together with the gods is to be taught. You whose domain is the secret, the all-knowing — to that I, the Blessed One, have explained it. The great being who is the slayer of Yamantāka (Skt. Yamāntaka): the fruit of that one's effort is without exhaustion. So it is said. This is the twelfth chapter, entitled "The Reality of Wind," in the tantra of the Red Yamāntaka.

The person of the Blessed One who is Yamāntaka, bearing the name "the Red" — what is declared by the syllable ya? Likewise by the syllable ma? And again by the syllable a of that name? What is to be declared by the syllable ri? What is the name of rakta itself? May the sovereign lord speak truly. Excellent! Excellent! What has been asked — that I shall explain; listen. By the syllable ya: wind; it is to be declared as the Red Yamāntaka. After that, the syllable ya is the first joy. The syllable ma is to be declared as the second. Ā-ri is the third joy. Rakta is the name of the fourth. And in the case of one possessed of wind, the method for that is the syllable a; the syllable e is the sense faculty of touch. Rakta is the union of non-duality. Or else: rakta is the king of attachment (rāga); wind urges the taste, and into that enters the mind of union. Ā-ri is emptiness and compassion as one. Rakta — declare it as Yamāri. The five names of the four joys are to be known in four moments. Then the names of delusion and so forth — sovereign lord, please speak them. Delusion: it is Yamāntaka who is Vairocana (Skt. Vairocana), the subtle. Yamāntaka is Ratnasambhava (Skt. Ratnasambhava). Attachment: Yamāntaka is Amoghasiddhi (Skt. Amoghasiddhi) at the periphery of appearance, envy, Yamāntaka. At the center is the immovable Akṣobhya (Skt. Akṣobhya). Yamāntaka is the Red one. As for Carcikā (Skt. Carcikā) and so forth — what are their natures? Of the earth element: Locanā (Skt. Locanā), Carcikā. Of the water element: Māmakī (Skt. Māmakī), the sow. Of the fire element: the White One, Sarasvatī (Skt. Sarasvatī). Of the wind element: Tārā, Gaurī (Skt. Gaurī). Of the space element: the Vajra Vetālī (Skt. Vetālī). She embraces the Blessed One. From the passion following great desire, by the taste of great bliss, the hero who is of non-dual nature — like the moon complete in sixteen parts.

This is the thirteenth chapter, entitled "A Brief Presentation of Names," in the tantra of the Red Yamāntaka.

The Vetālī, drawing him into her pledge-embrace, making the sound o, seized his lips with a needle, and for the benefit of sentient beings made a great torma (Skt. bali). Together with the goddesses she made supplication to him. The Blessed One declared: Having assumed the pride of glorious Red Yamāntaka, above place a canopy and a white yak-tail fan, and outside adorn it beautifully with dance and song. Adorned with all ornaments, with the left hand and the other hand full of the sound of bells and vajras, blazing, brilliant, and expansive — offer a torma in a vessel, and set out two vessels. In one vessel, fill it completely with the meat of go, ku, da, ha, na, and bi, ra, śu, mā, mu together with the five nectars, and with milk and fish flesh. In the other, place the household gods and the rest of the deities.

With the mantra "Om Hrīḥ Ṣṭhrīḥ Bikṛtānana Hūṃ — draw here, together with your retinue, all the hosts of obstacle-makers: Jaḥ!" — with this mantra one commands the directional guardians of the east. Then one should visualize going forth oneself and binding the assembled obstacle-makers (vighnagaṇas) by the throat with a lasso, hooking them in the heart with an iron hook, and drawing them in.

The lord of the eastern petal, yellow in color, with a thousand eyes, holding a vajra, rides a white horse.

In the south, the black Yama, holding a staff, rides a buffalo.

In the west, the white water deity, holding a white lotus, rides a makara.

On the northern petal, the yellow yakṣa, riding a human, holds a jeweled fruit.

All of these are adorned with every ornament and wear jeweled crowns. Yama has a solar seat and solar radiance. The remaining ones have lunar seats and lunar radiance.

On the petal of the lord of power, the master of spirits, white in color, three-eyed, wearing a crown of matted hair, rides a fine horse. He holds a spear and wears a garment of tiger-skin, his body smeared with ash, adorned with all bone ornaments. He has a lunar seat and lunar radiance.

On the fire petal, the yellow fire deity, short of limb and with drooping belly, rides a goat. He holds a rosary and a water-flask with sprinkler, and wears a crown of matted hair. His seat is solar, his radiance solar, and his garment is that of a hero.

On the rakṣasa petal, a rakṣasa with loose-hanging hair holds a curved knife and skull-cup. Wrathful, with furrowed brows and a scowling expression, black in color, he stands above a corpse. His seat is solar and his radiance solar.

On the wind petal, the greenish-red wind deity holds a banner and wears a jeweled crown. He rides a deer, and has a lunar seat and lunar radiance, adorned with all ornaments.

On the central point, the goddess of the earth, yellow in color, is adorned with divine robes and all ornaments. She abides with a lunar seat and lunar radiance, surrounded on all sides by hungry ghosts and earth deities.

Indra and the other directional lords each hold a nāga-lasso in the left hand, and all stand with the left leg extended.

Above, resting on a dharmodaya lotus with eight petals, on the eastern petal is the Moon, white in color, riding a horse, with a white jeweled crown and lunar radiance. On the southern petal is the Sun, red in color, with two hands holding a lotus, riding a green horse, adorned with a jeweled crown and all ornaments, with a blue and clear radiance. On the western petal is the planet Jupiter, yellow in color, riding a fine horse, with a solar seat and solar radiance, holding a trident. On the wind petal is Rāhu with a long tail, with a solar seat and solar radiance, very dark and smoke-colored, grasping with a wheel that lures and swallows — this is the long-tailed Rāhu holding his palms joined together.

In the center, on the central point of that lotus, is Brahmā, four-faced and four-armed. With three of his hands he holds a staff and the gesture of fearlessness, and with the remaining hands he holds a rosary and a water-flask. He is yellow in color, rides a goose, and has a lunar seat and lunar radiance. He holds offerings and has yellow matted hair. He is short of stature and is surrounded by the sons of Brahmā — namely the gods of the Brahmā heavens, together with those bearing the names Brahmā Purohita, the Brahmapāriṣadya, Trāyastriṃśa, Nirmāṇarati, Paranirmitavaśavartin, Akaniṣṭha, and so forth.

Below, on the petals in the direction of the dharmodaya, are the following: the son of Vaiśravaṇa, yellow; the nāga Padma, white; the nāga Śaktihetū, red; the nāga Sthāvara, black; and the nāga Duṅskyong, with a human face, bearing all ornaments and marked with a crest-ornament upon his head. He abides together with asuras and the beings of the hells.

On the remaining petals in the remaining directions are nāgas, each with a human face and wearing a crown of precious gems.

Having thus displayed these confident forms, they are all thereupon transformed, and the maṇḍala is completed through the form of the glorious Yamāntaka, the destroyer of the Lord of Death. With respect to the arrangement of body, speech, and mind: what abides above is to be regarded as the aspect of body; what abides in the center is again the aspect of Akṣobhya; and what abides below is to be regarded as the aspect of vajra speech. For the sake of all activities, the pride appropriate to the hands and faces as they are is to be adopted accordingly. Or alternatively, in every respect it is just as the form of oneself appears.

After that, one offers water for the feet at the feet by means of the mudrā of the fangs, with the mantra:

Oṃ arghaṃ pratīccha svāhā.

Then, having savored the previously recited nectar, one performs the conduct of the torma offering.

Oṃ rakta mukuṭāya rakta jaṭāya rakta mukhāya rakta bhujaḥ rakta śarīrāya rakta muṇḍamālābharaṇāya rakta padmāsanāya rakta bharaṇabhāṣaṇāya

You whose intrinsic nature is delusion's vajra,
most terrifying Yamāntaka —
the intrinsic nature of all buddhas, all teachers — to you, vajra of body, I bow.

You whose intrinsic nature is slander's vajra,
most terrifying Yamāntaka —
vajra of mind, supremely radiant, Vajraratna — to you I bow.

You whose intrinsic nature is desire's vajra, sovereign source of the arising of passionate phenomena — supreme melody, most excellent of the excellent — to you, vajra of speech, I bow.

You whose intrinsic nature is envy's vajra, who performs all deeds of Yamāntaka — vajra of body, supremely radiant, sword in hand — to you I bow.

You who are the intrinsic nature of all buddhas, all buddhas gathered into one,
most supreme among all buddhas — lord of the maṇḍala — to you I bow.

Ho bhagavante nopatibja dṛḍho me bhava, sutoṣyo me bhava, anurakto me bhava, sarvasiddhim me prayaccha sarvakarmasu ca me cittaṃ śriyaḥ kuru hūṃ, ha ha ha ha ho bhagavān.

The Blessed One — may the four bodies of the Blessed One be spoken.

The Blessed One then declared:

Hear this, O Bhagara, you who have gone beyond the world.
The body of the buddhas, for the sake of benefit to those who are worldly — it is this that I, Heruka, have taught.

Those who are lesser through the instructions of a sacred teacher, who have abandoned the body of the buddhas as normally taught,
those who are lesser through the vajra vehicle — such ones turn their face away from this tantra.

Whoever does not know the syllable He,
the yogin gathered into worldly existence, following after the explained tantra —
O yogin, you are Yamāntaka.

This great Red Tantra in few words, which he who is utterly without fatigue has spoken as great bliss — it is the gathering of all bliss.

The sixty-four-petaled lotus:
the yoginī with her causes deliberately attains bliss from the perfect enjoyment body, and engaging in that practice, she delights therein.

In a single instant, full and manifest awakening.

Otherwise it is the activity of the three worlds. This is the fourth body, and it is not the domain even of buddhas. Through the conventions that transcend the world, it is shown in the form of the supreme yogin. Through the form of the four wheels, I have taught it as the Hevajra vajra.

In the gathering of the practice of meditation, all the channels and ḍākinīs, through Hevajra, the method of accomplishment for the fruit — wherever the practice of the winds is carried out, in the full division of day and night, at the sixty-four petals there is the rod. These things are to be explained by way of the common classification.

She who possesses the nature of the divine form — again, through the division of body, speech, and mind, the meditative equipoise of the three syllables themselves is to be understood inwardly by the mind.

By the syllable OM̐, there is entry; by the syllable ĀḤ, dwelling in that very same state; by the syllable HŪṂ, the withdrawal as well — the yogin is to carry this out from the pith instructions.

What is called OM̐ ĀḤ HŪṂ — this will reveal what has cause and what is without cause. From that again, the seed with its marks is to be contemplated above, at the tip of the nose, as supreme.

Let its nature be luminosity. Likewise, self and other are brought into equality. Without agent — in the rosary of forms, again and again, moment to moment, for the purpose of rising once more from the one — the mantra practitioner, thinking of it everywhere as like a shadow or an illusion, with that distinction, is to contemplate this.

Through this pure body, whatever one meditates upon with diligent wisdom, all sentient beings are made into the nature of reality. This very divine yoga is to be understood from the pith instructions of the lama.

Again, the mantra practitioner, for the benefit of the world, is again to meditate upon the syllables. At the stage of the saṃbhogakāya, bound with the bond of total certainty in each session, with the hands firmly joined at the top — from the mechanical device taught through syllables, through the right channel (Rasanā) and the left channel (Lalanā), bring it to enter the center without movement.

Having firmly joined it in body, speech, and mind, contemplate it as the supreme seal. In that very instant, the innate arises. There is no doubt about what is to be meditated here. Whoever knows this meaning — the excellent mind is placed in equanimity, knowing all phenomena. It is the pith instruction of the path of buddhas.

You have been bathed in the great washing place of entry, and the Tathāgata has bestowed empowerment. Moreover, wherever and whenever one goes, there the buddhas will come. Throughout, as a bodhisattva, one benefits sentient beings of every kind.

By laughing out loud — Ha Ha! — those abiding in the ten directions cause all the māras to flee entirely. With palms joined, all bow down at your feet.

Women bearing various forms — know them as stirred by manifold desires. Bringing them forth — oil-jar vessels, sesame, and the like, those of the highest quality — one enjoys them fully and completely.

With this, the chapter on the suchness of the winds in the Red Tantra of Yamāntaka, chapter fourteen, is complete.

Then, the synonyms of wind — the Blessed One was requested to teach them. Having distinguished them, listen as I explain. In the thirty-two rods of the lineage, there come to be four sessions. By twice sixteen there is transformation. For one and a half sessions beyond one session, there are four rods of the half-session — thus it is transformed in sequence accordingly.

For day and night, in sequence, sixteen transferences are expressly stated.

The four — fire, wind, water, and the great sovereign maṇḍala — by their flow are well known as the four rods. From the fourfold development of the four winds, it is expressly stated as four wheels.

From the division of four aspects such as the various kinds, and the distinctions of instant, duration, and the rest, those four are described there in four aspects.

Likewise, the four joys are also expressly stated as the four sessions. The three bodies together with the fourth body — likewise all things also as four. The outer sequence is likewise. The four yogas and the fourth — the body is rightly expressed as four. By this it becomes four rods.

By their thorough division, sixty-four. In the Hevajra Tantra and here, likewise, in the explicit teaching on the body, below there are four wheels. That too is the fourth body. With reference to the four joys as well, these are expressly stated as the four bodies.

This is the brief presentation of the glorious Yamāntaka Red One Tantra, Chapter Fifteen.

The Blessed One (the Buddha) declared: What is to be spoken of as the wheel of existence? Asked this most secret of divine secrets — sentient beings bewildered in the three realms of existence, hear this essence that corrupts: "Always striving to accomplish buddhahood itself, māras have emanated this" — in this way the yogin wanders in saṃsāra. From wandering in saṃsāra, one comes to cherish cyclic existence above all else. Like a lotus petal upon water, nothing whatsoever stains it with flaw. This wheel of twelve aspects abides supremely as the twelve meanings. This very wheel is also well known as the twelve limbs.

Whoever comes to know this wheel, through it comes to know without remainder all the phenomena acclaimed by all buddhas, and turns the wheel of Dharma. Therefore, hear me explain the turning of the wheel of Dharma with twelve limbs.

Ignorance, formations, consciousness, name-and-form, the six sense sources, contact, feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, birth, and aging-and-death — these are the twelve limbs.

Ignorance is the afflictions of the past. Formations are the actions of the past. Consciousness is the individual conceptualization of the past. Name-and-form are the five embryonic stages: the gelatinous, the viscous, the oval, the solid, and the stage in which the limbs take shape. The six sense sources are the six faculties — eye and the rest — that are complete upon emergence from the womb. Contact arises from the meeting of three: object, faculty, and consciousness. Feeling is distinguished in three aspects according to its characteristics: pleasure, suffering, and equanimity. Craving is attachment born of desire for union. Clinging is the thorough grasping of desired objects. Becoming is the karmic fruit arising from the existence that is to come. Birth is the rejoining to the aggregates once again. Aging-and-death comprises the four limbs beginning with name-and-form.

Through the distinctive analysis of the twelve limbs,
the Sage (Śākyamuni) taught dependent origination.
As long as there is affliction, action, and suffering, those twelve are gathered under three.

The first, the eighth, the ninth — affliction.
The second and the tenth become action.
The remaining seven are suffering.
Because the twelve gather into three,
the three dharmas will be taught.
Their recitation divides into two parts,
each becoming a group of seven.
That itself cycles again and again,
and by this cycling it is the wheel of existence.

Beings serve as causes and effects for one another;
there are no sentient beings that are absent here, even one.
From emptiness thus constituted, phenomena abundantly arise, yet from phenomena there is no actual transmigration.
Read well: a lamp's flame spreading, a mirror's reflection, the transmission of sound, the transference of sunlight — from a seed, these aggregates arise in continuity, yet there is no linking and no transmigration.

The habitual conduct of the mind goes on to taming.

The twelve limbs spoken of here are the distinctive teaching of the Sage.
Just as they arise through dependent origination, know them in their summary.

One who desires to hear the separate, definitive teaching — all that is called the domain of the buddhas, the master here has spoken as it abides.

"Afflictions, actions, and sufferings" — by this they are summarized.

Now, with regard to those two, the ten that are set forth separately in the superior manner —

These limbs, as spoken of here, are distinguished by their particular aspects.
For example, the distinction of the entity called aṅgabhaṅga is praised. Here, aṅga means "distinction." The Sage — one who has mastered body, speech, and mind through that very mastery — has set forth the teaching, and "proclaimed it with perfect clarity" is a synonym for this.

These limbs are not to be understood as having a supreme lord, an intrinsic nature, a sovereign power, a guardian of the quarters, an essential identity, or anything of that sort. They are distinguished simply as the twelve limbs.

Nevertheless, concerning how the afflictions, actions, and sufferings mutually support one another, these three proceed together in summary — in the manner of three staves leaning upon one another — just as water flows on.

Again, one may ask: how exactly do these afflictions, actions, and sufferings, when gathered into this triad, proceed? This must be explained.

"The first, eighth, and ninth become afflictions." Among the distinct limbs of these twelve, the three — namely the first, ignorance; the eighth, craving; and the ninth, grasping — are to be understood as each individually summed up under affliction.

"The second and the tenth are karma." That is, the second is formations, and the tenth is becoming. These two are to be understood as summed up under karma.

"The remaining seven are suffering." The seven remaining distinct limbs — those left over after what has been subsumed under affliction and karma — are to be understood as summed up under suffering. These are: consciousness, name-and-form, the six sense sources, contact, feeling, birth, and old age and death as well. The particle "as well" functions here as an inclusive connector, properly gathering together all those from ignorance onward and subsuming them under suffering.

Thus, all twelve of these phenomena are gathered into three — affliction, karma, and suffering — for the purpose of making known that there is nothing lesser or greater than this. The particle "indeed" in this context conveys the meaning: "So long as these are definitively set forth in the sūtra, this enumeration stands supreme."

One may further ask: how do these become karma-and-affliction, and then karma-and-suffering? This must be explained.

"The three turning in alternation arise from the turning in alternation." The seventh, called affliction, turns in alternation through these three. What is called karma turns in alternation and arises entirely from that same turning in alternation. "The seventh with three, called suffering, arises" — that is, from the seven as definitively set forth before, these three arise. The very pair called "affliction and suffering" is what causes the wheel to revolve perpetually, and so it is the wheel of existence. Within that, becoming, in the form of karma, is the spoke. And this wheel — arising here with that triple name — causes the seven worlds to revolve continually. The particle "indeed" here carries the sense of certainty. Just as the moon revolves perpetually to the east, so this is the wheel of existence. Yet it does not arise in a perfectly complete and determined manner, for certainty is absent in the sense of the particle "not."

Now, one may ask what it is that makes all embodied beings subject to a lord and an agent. This must be explained. In the movement of all beings, there is no cause and effect between them whatsoever, nor is there any such thing here. What is attributed to sentient beings as something other than themselves arises from mere imputation. Even with respect to causes, it is merely a proximate imputation to a cause that produces any given result. Therefore, it is asserted that a sentient being is genuinely real relative to other substances.

Now, one may ask what it is that passes from this present world to the world beyond. This must be explained. Even as regards that next world — phenomena exist, but there is no transmigration.

And yet, from emptiness alone, empty phenomena arise — and there is no transmigration. From phenomena in which there is no self, the five whose names are affliction and karma arise; and from those five, the seven phenomena whose names are results, empty of self and what belongs to self, arise — and there is no transmigration. Thus those who abide in selfhood as an intrinsic nature to be grasped: from those very ones, the seven empty phenomena free of intrinsic nature arise — and there is no transmigration.

Now, what is it that all this is meant to illustrate? This is to be explained here. The verse runs:

Reading aloud from a teacher, a lamp, a seal,
A mirror, a sound, the sun's movement,
A seed, and the eye's definite demonstration —

This verse points to the fact that in suchness there is no going, and that there is no self by nature; yet conventionally, the world beyond exists.

Consider, for example, the act of reading aloud from a teacher: there is no transmigration. The teacher's act of reading is not impaired, and the student's act of reading is not impaired — and yet the student's reading is not something other than the teacher's. Likewise, if things arose altogether without cause, that would entail the fault of causelessness. In the same way, the mind at the moment of death does not travel to the world beyond — for that would entail the fault of permanence. Nor does the world beyond arise from something entirely different from itself. Just as the reason for the student's reading lies in the teacher's reading, and that which has the capacity to do so declares, "It is precisely that, not other than that" — so too it is here. In the same way, depending on the mind that has reached its final point in death, the mind that partakes of birth is itself not something other. Here too that capacity is explicitly declared.

Consider these examples: a lamp from a lamp; a reflection back from a seal; an image from a mirror reflecting a face; an echo from a sound; fire from sunlight, a jewel's rays, and tinder; a sprout from a seed. And consider how, when someone eats the fruit of a chilli plant and thereby causes another to salivate, one should understand: it is not something other than that. In the same way, wise ones should examine thoroughly that the aggregates do not transmigrate from one set of aggregates to another.

The aggregates are these — those bearing the names form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. These junctions of aggregates connecting one lifetime to the next are to be examined carefully as pertaining to the five aggregates. They are neither without cause nor do they arise from something entirely other. They are not from this world to the world beyond. Accordingly, the eye too involves no actual transmigration of substance. For as long as this continues, it is the sequential revolving of formations in cyclic existence. The word "also" here marks a reversal; therefore one must not understand it in a distorted way.

Because things are always of the nature of suffering and empty of self, one will not become thoroughly confused regarding individually conceptualized things. The mind free of confusion will not continually take birth. Without bewilderment, there will be no transgression through negligence. Without malice, one will not constantly engage in sinful actions. One will not take up anything as an object of action. Without grasping and without active conditioning, there is no imputation of things as existing or non-existing. The minds will not fall into sufferings with regard to the aggregates that are unborn. In the same way, from these five modes of providing causal nourishment, seven kinds of fruit are obtained here — they do not arise from anything other than that absence of other. And that is to be called liberation.

Likewise, wrong and deluded views regarding faith, permanence, annihilation, transmigration, and the like do not continually arise. The Blessed One also spoke a verse here:

Not seen as arising from a condition,
And by reality itself there is no feeling —
Birth and cessation too —
By what do they arise? One examines.
Here there is nothing whatsoever to be removed,
Not even a fraction to be purified.
To see reality truly, with a true view —
When one sees truly, one is fully liberated.

This was the sixteenth chapter, on dependent origination.

Remaining in the mode of conjunction, there is the bliss of the defiling pleasure of the world of Jambudvīpa. Those are the lifetimes of a hundred years, lives lasting one hundred years.

The Blessed One asks: without a woman, how could semen rise? Without the rising of semen, long life does not follow.

Therefore, by restraining the movement of the wind downward and upward, the life-force is made firm, and aging and death do not occur in the body. First the body is to be purified, and then the Dharma mudrā is to be fully accomplished. Whatever is similar to outer joy, one should cultivate something similar to that.

Likewise, again, as the yogin begins the joy of the body mudrā, he presses the Brahmā-thread entirely with his left foot, turns it upward, and contemplates the syllable HA. Then, forming the syllable SĪ, the syllable HŪṂ abides in the heart. The syllable ĀḤ and the syllable AḤ are again to be meditated upon. In the center of the eight-petaled lotus with its anthers, the blazing syllable HRĪḤ is present, together with its rays of light. From that, the white luminous pattern that emerges is again to come, and one should visualize it entering into the center of a lotus of sixty-four petals. Again the syllable A is to be contemplated, and the yogin once more binds the life-breath. In that direction, the Brahmā-knot, clear as a goddess, definitely emerges, and one should visualize it as present in both the bhaga and the heart. The eight-petaled lotus is to be visualized as red in all directions. At the corner of fire there is fire, and likewise again there is wind. In the direction of power there is also blue. Likewise at the corner of the rākṣasas. In the center of that, the syllable HŪṂ, which has entered in, is black in color with red rays of light. The luminous pattern that emerges from that, which has entered the crown of the head, is to be fully visualized. Above and below, the syllable HŪṂ, black in color together with its rays of light, having entered there, is to be visualized. The blazing of the luminous pattern is again and again the same. At that time, the meditation of the twisting movement comes from the guru's personal instructions. At that time, the blazing of the caṇḍālī burns all the Tathāgatas, and the dripping of the moon causes great bliss and happiness in the lower bhaga. Again, for the purpose of moving upward in pairs, by stopping the prāṇa and the apāna, one applies the mind to emptiness with certainty and becomes intoxicated. Again, as long as the mind has become intoxicated, by the practice of binding the coiling, at that time one causes it to rotate completely from saṃsāra to the right without interruption, and again the sound of the khoḍa remains nearby. By the sound of the syllable HŪṂ at the dharma wheel, one again draws it fully into place, and having caused the two channels at the wheel of perfect enjoyment to vibrate intensely, one again binds them firmly. When the two left ones have melted at that point, the flow will arrive. And it will be fully refined there. Again, the churning of the wisdom wheel and the making of the milk come from the guru's personal instructions. Again, one should train by the practice that intoxicates the three wheels. That which has moved upward — great bliss becomes stable there. These are the supreme path, the domain not accessible to even the most excellent gods. Whoever possesses the knowledge of merit will be venerated by all three worlds together. By practicing for one year, the body will become extremely subtle. One will speak of the nature of great sound. Likewise, of the nature of subtle mind, one ranges through all desired objects, and for the sake of those to be tamed one goes even to the ocean and the sky. Whatever one desires, that one does.

The Blessed Lady petitioned: O Blessed One, please be so gracious as to speak on spectacles and the like, on all the varieties of practice, on the characteristics of the times, and on the mechanical devices of one's own form-body.

Then the Blessed One declared:

Goddess, excellent! Excellently done.

What else you have done, now speak of that.

Om jvāla karāla padane sarvā satva hā lā hā lā vajre su vajre sphāra sphāra sphāya sphāya sarva meghavāta bṛṣṭi stambhaya sphoṭaya sphoṭaya ghaḥ ghaḥ ghaḥ sarva pānīyaṃ śoṣaya hūṃ phaṭ.

Having recited hrīḥ, seven particles of divine essence are to be given, and thereby serpents are made to flee.

Om yamāntaka hrīḥ śṭrī hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ trāsaya trāsaya caṇḍa caṇḍa pracaṇḍa pracaṇḍa hūṃ phaṭ.

By this, buffaloes are made to flee.

Om mama mardane mardaya mardaya caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa hūṃ phaṭ.

By this, diseases arising from evil are destroyed.

This is the eighteenth chapter, the chapter on the limitless mantra activities in the king of tantras, the Tantra of the Red Yamāntaka.

The Goddess petitioned: O Blessed One, please speak on the limitless mantra activities of that Great Wrathful Lord known as the Great Fierce Enraged One.

The Blessed One declared: Taking on the pride of the Great Fierce Enraged One — the great hero who is immovable, who makes the terrifying yet more terrifying, who is adorned with all ornaments, holding sword and threatening gesture — recite the mantra.

Om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa hūṃ phaṭ.

Whoever carries this great secret mantra upon their shoulder and abides there shall certainly be victorious over all māras.

Om krodhane saṃkroṣaṇe bhedane hūṃ phaṭ.

This is to be praised aloud over water and then offered; it removes splitting headaches.

Om santrā āsane mohāya hūṃ phaṭ.

If this is bound to the crown of one's head, one becomes invisible.

Om acale sañcale che ge mo's mukhaṃ kīlaya hūṃ phaṭ.

Make an image of the one to be intoxicated, write the name on a barley-husk parchment, insert it into the mouth of the image, strike it with a kīla nail, and conceal it at a crossroads. Then strike the opponent's mouth with the kīla.

Om sarva māra bhañjane che ge mo's pādau kīlaya hūṃ phaṭ.

As before, insert into the heart area, then strike the feet with the kīla. The coming and going of wanderers is thereby paralyzed.

Om bikṛtānane sāra bala bhañjane jambhaya jambhaya stambhaya stambhaya vajra pāśena che ge mo senaṃ bandha bandha. Om hūṃ phaṭ khaḥ ṣaḥ hā hā hī hī pheṃ pheṃ om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa hūṃ phaṭ.

As before, insert it, then strike the garment of the enemy army's chief with the kīla, turn the image face downward, and conceal it. The approaching enemy army is thereby paralyzed.

Om daha daha paca paca matha matha jvāla jvāla jvālaya jvālaya gr̥ṇṇa gr̥ṇṇa jvala jvala hūṃ om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa hūṃ phaṭ.

On a charnel-ground cloth, at a measure of eight finger-widths, draw the figure of the deity-offering in a form that cannot be overcome by others, encircle it with a mantra garland, insert it into the heart of the intoxication image, and place it upon a wooden support.

Then, reciting Om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa cegemo la jvareṇa gr̥ṇṇāpaya hūṃ phaṭ, burn it in a charnel-ground fire — specifically in a fire of acacia and cypress wood. This causes plague among enemies.

Om jaya jaya parājaya nirjitāyantra hī hī sphoṭaya sphoṭaya ucchaṭaya ucchaṭaya ucchaṭaya. Śīghraṃ karma kuru caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa hūṃ phaṭ. Draw this on a charnel-ground cloth, wrap it with blue thread, and wear it on the shoulder, around the neck, on the head, or at the waist — the mantras of others will then be utterly unable to arise against one.

Om caṇḍa mahāsenā gr̥sa gr̥sa kha kha khāhi khāhi. Śoṣaya śoṣaya. Mara mara mārāya mārāya cegemo om phaṭ. Draw this on a charnel-ground cloth, insert it into the image as before, strike it with a bone kīla of a finger's measure or an iron kīla, place it face downward in a charnel ground and conceal it — within seven days it causes death.

Om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa cegemo ucchaṭaya hūṃ phaṭ. Take wood from a neem tree that stands in a crow's nest and burn it in a charnel-ground fire. The resulting ash, having been praised one hundred and eight times, is scattered upon a house and garments and left there.

Visualize a woman riding a female dog, bound with a noose that hobbles her to the left, and being dragged toward the south — this drives enemies away.

Om dveṣe dveṣe vajre cegemo yi bi dveṣaya om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa hūṃ phaṭ. Take dust from fighting elephants, fashion an image of the target from it, and thrust it between the two — this causes mutual hatred.

Om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa hrīḥ hrīḥ hrīḥ hrom gorā rūpeṇa caṭa caṭa pracaṭa pracaṭa. Hana hana ghātaya ghātaya ākaḍḍhya ākaḍḍha praspura praspura. Praspārāya praspārāya. Kīlaya kīlaya. Jambhaya jambhaya. Stambhaya stambhaya cegemo la hūṃ phaṭ. With a pen of galata-wood, draw a tortoise at the measure of six finger-widths in meditative equipoise, with the syllable hrīm̐ at each of the four legs and the syllable śrīḥ at the center of the mouth — it causes hatred. Then, encircling the drawn image of the target entirely with a mantra garland on the reverse side and making offering — from that point onward the target's desires are utterly exhausted and many people trample upon the target as upon a tortoise.

Wrap it completely with red thread, draw the feet tightly together so they cannot be raised, and stamp upon it with the left foot. Reciting cegemo me bā samānya seven times causes the enemy's mouth to gape open.

Om cili cili. Mili mili nalite hūṃ phaṭ. This impairs the blinking of the eyes.

Om śrīṃ śrīṃ śrīṃ. Śoṣaya śoṣaya dhara dhara. Bandha bandha. Om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa hūṃ phaṭ. A corpse-bone kīla of seven finger-widths' measure, having been praised one hundred and eight times and concealed in a cattle pen, causes the milk to cease flowing.

Om balipatraṃ vataya sura parimāññāpayati jvālaya jvālaya. Om caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa hūṃ phaṭ. A clod of earth from an anthill, having been praised one hundred and eight times and concealed in a merchant's house, causes goods not to be given out in trade.

Om hrīṃ hrīṃ hrīṃ praṃ ya mama thani ākaḍḍhya ākaḍḍhya kṣobhaya kṣobhaya. Sarvākāmaprasādhane hūṃ hūṃ phaṭ phaṭ svāhā. On the petal of a blue lotus, using saffron mixed and properly prepared, draw a two-armed deity holding a noose and a hook, fierce with desire and terrifying. Then extend the syllables with the mantras of elephant spirits, lunar marks, and flowers. Om at the crown — ro; hūṃ at the heart — ro; hrīṃ at the navel — ro; taṃ at the eyes. Encircle it with a mantra garland, fill it entirely with blood, grind it into powder, place it inside the skulls of a man and a woman, fill those with butter and honey along with an intoxicant, wrap with red thread, and conceal it at the site of the head — this causes infatuation.

Om ākaḍḍhya ākaḍḍhya mohaya mohaya chegemome bava śāṃbhavatu svāhā.

Make a preparation using the powder of small intestinal worms mixed with semen and the blood of an unnamed person, consecrate it with the mantra, and administer it in food and drink to bring someone under one's power.

Using the powder ground from upward-spiraling leaves, bee wings, the teeth of two kings, and a garland fashioned from the dead, one causes all embodied beings, one after another in succession, to run.

Om śvete gr̥dhriṇī khāhi biṣaṅca rubiṇī khaḥ khaḥ ati mṛttva dvāre cīrka pābāsa bttā veśaḥ haḥ haḥ saḥ saḥ saḥ caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa sena ājñāpayati svāhā.

Or alternatively: Om saṃkāriṇi caṃpaṃ hām haṃ hūṃ hā — this destroys all poisons.

Om nāgāri vāmane hara ha phaṭ phaṭ.

Namo vitāgāya maitri siddha loca svāhā — recite over water and wash the eyes with it to cure cataracts.

Om savana kha kha cūrṇa khānāta na prabhavati. Ādirya ratha vegena vāsudeva balena ca. Garuḍa pakṣi sadena phūmyā gaccha viṣaṃ svāhā — this destroys the poison of snakes, scorpions, crabs, and the like.

Om cāmuṇḍe ajite aparājite aparājiti phu phu rakṣa rakṣa svāhā — recite seven times over ashes and scatter them in the four directions. Likewise, one portion is to be kept in place.

Om jambhani stambhani mohani sarva duṣṭa praśāmani svāhā — robbers will not appear.

Om namaś caṇḍa krodhāya hulu hulu tiṣṭha tiṣṭha bandha bandha mohaya mohaya hana hana hūṃ phaṭ — recite fully over flowers and the like, and giving them to someone brings that person under one's power.

Namo ratnatrayāya om ṭaḥ suḥ pismare svāhā — tying a petal of the ketakī plant to the body destroys all fevers.

This concludes the nineteenth chapter, on the sādhana of the solitary hero and the associated ritual diagrams and mantras, from the tantra of the Red Yamāntaka (the Destroyer of the Lord of Death).

The Blessed One's Lady then requested: Blessed One, I wish to hear something wondrous.

Combining the root of śākoḍaka with the root of barura and placing them in a house will cause quarreling. Placing the guṇḍaka that dwells within a dhatura flower inside a fragrant flower causes headaches to arise in the one against whom it is directed. Destroying the root by chewing it provides release.

Fumigating with the bedding from the womb of a bitch and then circumambulating while sweeping with a peacock's tail feather — circumambulating to the right steals the horoscope; circumambulating to the left releases it.

Writing the form of a person with the heart-blood of a crow onto a leaf of a mango tree in the manner of drawing a portrait, and then placing it on that person's excrement — the crow will eat it.

Making a cavity in the shape of a vagina, filling it with a woman's excrement mixed with poison and a strip of cloth, and smearing it on someone's path harms that person.

Sesame oil prepared from sesame that has been soaked in the milk of the śnehi tree, when applied, causes white hair to grow on the head. Shaving off the hair provides release.

Fumigating with the fingernails of a female cat and the fingernails of a woman causes the lunar marks to become invisible. Fumigating with honey provides release.

Taking a female antelope's skull, a white stick, and a thread wound with wool, wrapping them about one's hand and holding them up in the sun — the marks become visible. Washing the hand provides release.

Fumigating with a woman's fingernails conceals the marks. Fumigating with guggul provides release.

Applying frog-rendered butter as an eye salve causes one to see snakes connected to one's house.

Throwing the powder of the mushroom known as muzi onto a sleeping lamp's flame causes it to blaze up. Eating the root of the plant shinuhi together with molasses renders one sleepless. Binding the root of kāmāci to the crown of the head renders one sleepless.

For taming nāgas: take the root of the droṇa flower, turmeric, and a large rice-ball, bind them together, shake them, then wipe — one is victorious over all exhaustion of water.

Eating the root of the śalmali tree combined with red lead causes flowers to fall. Administering kāṅguṣṭha and madirā, or else separating the dust with betel, causes separation. Eating the leaves of the shinuhi plant, the seeds of markandī, and the powder of guṇa together with molasses causes bleeding.

Applying the powder of cuṭcuṭindara to a horse's nose causes it to refuse food. Washing with sandalwood provides release.

Bind the root of the ketaka plant to the head; bind the root of the śmṛkhaṭa plant to the hand; apply the root of the tāla plant to the right elbow. Then, facing north, naked, with hair unbound, tie small amounts of all three together and drink — one will not be harmed by weapons.

Rubbing together the seeds of śoṇāka and the two substances called būrakapāduka in the skin of a deer's hide, placing them on the underside of the tongue and eating the fruit of the laṭṭapa — one will not be burned.

This concludes the twentieth chapter, the chapter on general medicine, in the tantra of the Red Executor of Yamāntaka.

Now then: O Blessed One, please teach the causes and reasons for what the seasons bring about and what is determined to befall sentient beings.

Blowing into the feet and ankles and then inserting into the eye — this is accomplished in three months. Blowing into the ear — in four months. Inserting into the armpit — in one day. Blowing into the feet and ankles and then inserting into the navel — one dies within three months. Blowing into the feet and ankles and then inserting into the nose — three months. When faintness arises simultaneously with the onset of flowing discharge, one year. If faintness arises simultaneously with a sudden extreme of intense joy and there is pricking in all the small toes — one month. Pricking in the heart and throat — three quarters. Simultaneously pricking three times in the ankle — three days. Pricking from the base of the great toe up to and reaching the edge of the navel — six months. If something like the moon appears at the tip of the nose, when that has occurred, it signals the time of death in seven nights. The sound of bells in the ears — three months. Pricking separately in each of the two ears, the space between the eyebrows, and the crown of the head, one by one — one day. Seeing an extreme redness on the nails — six months. Dryness of the teeth — six months.

Now verses:

The vajra-born, who has come to know all that is done,
let him offer this to me.

I see the lotus born of mud with three petals,
its filaments adorned with honey.

How wonderful — a field endowed with bliss,
beautified by the buddha of attachment nearby.
Those possessed of desire bring bliss to peace, abandoning all conceptual thought.

The mind, stirred by desire,
lays a woman on her back,
raises her legs to the shoulders,
and examines carefully above and below.

Into the unfolded lotus of that one,
into the hollow of the lotus, one enters.
At the petal of the lotus is the essence of flesh —
the vajra is inserted there with that essence.

Just as my own fluid,
by twenty thousand hundred millions,
in the center, the mind is supremely honored.

From the essence of the wind, the embrace, the quintessence within me, at the unsurpassed tip of the vajra, possessed of raktabandhukā —
the wise one speaks and recites there and then.

Again one should meditate on a single hero:
the supreme mind of bliss, unmoved.

From that, granting the supreme one by one,
the moment of joy becomes twofold.
For as long as one thus recites with eloquence,
one should contemplate the form body for just an instant.

The woman who has been made to arise as a painted image is, for beings, also threefold.
Know that she grants bliss and brings peace.
Here one contemplates just a little.

For the sake of fierce force she abides in sinful acts —
she of that kind is one whose depth is difficult to fathom.
She is always beaten until she cries out, burned in many ways, screaming and wailing.
Her body remains for three aeons.

What need is there to speak of the qualities of women?

She who fully embraces all sentient beings — more than making day of compassion — is a woman who dwells distinctly in mind.
She knows well what has declined,
and makes all knowledge expansive.

If such a form of a beggar-woman is none other than a vajra yoginī, then seeing her and her decline — ranging from ground to ground — by the mere act of remembering her,
in that very instant bliss is experienced.

The direction itself, the place, and the woman herself abide perfectly in the body of a deity.
Having rendered benefit to that mudrā,
one dwells with that mind-endowed one.

Therefore one is thoroughly liberated from faults, skilled in all supreme qualities, and possessing great, great, great merit,
with excellence and action brought to perfection.

Therefore, gazing steadily upon her,
pressing her lips and teeth together,
the yogin makes the sound "śīt,"
and at that spot a lateral pressing is to be made.
The arising of one's own bliss is to be bound.
Sambhaka itself, too,
is called the named assembly that transcends binding.
The web of bees that is bound — from above the legs, a wheel of mechanism.
Likewise, precisely so, the tortoise-binding is the finest of all bindings.

In the center of that, in a cross-legged posture,
on a cushion of five-by-three folded layers, having done this, the shoulders of both are held.
Then the Blessed Lady firmly embraces the Blessed One,

and having fully extended the lotus and the vajra,
she offers this supplication:

"What kind of meditation should arise in the yoga of the completion stage?
For the benefit of the yogins,
please give this petition with its fruit."

The Blessed One declared:

Whatever the yoga of the completion stage may be,
the yogin devoted to yoga should cultivate it with single-minded awareness in a manner that is equal through day and night.

Whatever virtue and excellence one cultivates, one should constantly apply;
it is definitively expanded by the nature of existence.
Through being exceedingly stable and through direct application, it will become clearly manifest just as it truly is.

Then one's mother, or daughter, or yoginī, niece,
or any other female relative — the fierce woman (caṇḍālī), likewise a brahmin woman, and these assemblies of women — all are given.
All should be attended with proper ritual.

Just as one does not know the distinction,
a venerable master who knows the distinction through distinctions leads the practitioner to Avīci hell.
Here, indeed, there is worldly contradiction.
The truth of the world beyond is destroyed.
Therefore, exerting oneself thoroughly, with fine and excellent intelligence, one undertakes it properly.

Having concealed it like the mantra of a ḍākinī, just as the buddhas have taught,
in a direction concordant with the mind, abandoning all harm to those nearby, one's own mind as the goddess of joyful desire — these are to be properly taken up, the highest.

Having made it secluded and free of fatigue, and whatever clothing is at hand,
the two should cultivate stability in meditation.
From the excellent mutual union,
the woman is made to face toward oneself.
Having entered, the two, mutually, should examine with desire, dwelling in steadiness.

Then gazing and speaking into the mouth,
one should dwell with one-pointed mind.
Likewise, from that very reality one should declare — this produces the splendor of truth in the highest degree.

"Her son and householder — you;
to me: brother and farmer-father;
you are my mother and my wife,
my yoginī and niece —"

"I am the servant of the seven men;
you are the servant and bondwoman of the one with a face.
Speak and recite just such words — this is the supreme that produces the splendor of bliss.

You are my mother, my wife,
my yoginī and my niece;
I am your servant at all times —
lean supremely toward the sharp short lance.

Let the loving mother gaze upon me;
from intimate gazing, with certain understanding,
seeing me, that person,
again and again, having exclaimed 'O!' — bestows the three letters.

The blood, equal to the vajra's nectar, should be made to terrify the lotus ground;
seeing it, the eyes are utterly bewildered.
The face too, having been anointed with fragrance,
then one should press upon the breasts.
Showing it, universally, in that very mouth — touching it, one gives it into the mouth, causing it to move, and one should speak.

By that, one should declare as follows:

'My Aruṇḍhatī —

seeing her, Vairocana's food turned upside down;
for the navel gone topsy-turvy six months,
it is for the sake of seeing all the openings.'

From touching and seeing the letter HA — through the three directions.

From seeing the dark marks at the rootless root — from that.

When, right after bathing, it has dried — within ten days.

From the urine circling to the left — within three nights.

From seeing the body as thin — within six months.

From not seeing the tip of the nose — within one day.

For the sake of knowing these signs in their directions, likewise the yogī should meditate,

and with diligent concentration recite mantra.

The yogī should read with effort;

the reading of the five guardians and so forth

may be done by oneself or by another.

Each day, for the assembly, food,

and likewise food for the Saṅgha, and other such things;

with loving care for the lowly and the weak,

one should always act for the sake of sentient beings."

Thus it was spoken in the Tantra of the Variegated.

This is the twenty-first chapter of the Tantra of Yamāntaka, the Red.

Kyé! Blessed One, with compassion arising in mind toward those — all tīrthikas — who are without lovingkindness and who take the purpose of desire as their chief concern, and those who pursue the killing of all with a toxic mouth — since the Lord has become compassionate toward the intentions of such beings, may the Lord speak this to me.

First, give the restoration ceremony (poṣadha);

Train with effort in the tenets of the Vaibhāṣika;

likewise the Sautrāntika as well.

Having become habituated to the ten virtues,
show reverence to the teacher, take delight in the Vinaya.
Having had one introduced to the Middle Way as well,
one should then enter comprehensively into mantra.

A tantra more secret than the secret —
the swift cause of perfection and accomplishment — through this ritual preparation, swiftly, having heard the training, one's domain of conduct becomes excellent.
Abandoning the four mārās, the yogī should abide through divine practice.

Having cut with an axe and shaken with a skull-drum at the time of a solar eclipse, Akṣobhya scatters it; then, pressing down with both feet, one should recite the mantra. If one recites one hundred thousand secret mantras, the bindhu is bound. One goes into the power of Yamāntaka, and that is made luminous. This is the oral instruction for meditating at one's own navel.

Whatever one begins from the very moment — accomplish it through that day's [practice].
Bring it to its culmination within five days.
From the world of false speakers,
what is excellently and most clearly revealed — that is the supreme yoga of assembled suchness.
Teach that very suchness to all yoginīs.
Recite one hundred thousand recitations;
the steadfast practitioner: five hundred thousand;
whoever has been spoken of in their own tantra —
from one's own nature: four hundred thousand.
Then this most subtle one —
the goddess reveals it all clearly.

This is the twenty-second chapter, the King of Tantras, of the glorious Tantra of Yamāntaka, the Red.

Whoever does not know this very tantra,
yet asserts definitively, tantra by tantra —
If with the intention of making a living one wanders in the land of emptiness —

This completes the King of Tantras of the glorious Tantra of Yamāntaka, the Red.

This was translated, revised, and definitively established at the hermitage of Gnas-gsar monastery, the seat of the Dharma Lord Khro-phu Lotsāwa, by the great bilingual translator Thar-pa Lotsāwa, through whose kindness it was sustained, and by the Tibetan translator, the Śākya monk Rin-chen-grub.

By the merit of striving in the translation of this tantra, may every root and branch of darkness be utterly vanquished, may the activity of the Teaching be accomplished just as one wishes, and may we ultimately become Mañjuśrī himself.

Translator's Notes

- The phrase "dwelt within the lotus of Selflessness herself" renders a standard Yoginī-tantra union-framework: the Tathāgata-assembly resides in the bhaga (lotus, i.e. the womb-maṇḍala) of Nairātmyā, the female consort embodying selflessness. This is standard anuttarayoga tantra cosmology and is not an error in the text.

The figure Nirṛti in "the blood of Nirṛti and others" renders Sred med kyi bu, literally "son of Nirṛti," a demonic figure associated with the lord of the southwest direction in Indian mythology, here representing the kind of being whose blood fills the skull-cup.

The term "wheel of means" for "krul khor" renders the Sanskrit yantra, mechanical or ritual devices here understood as esoteric ritual instruments or configurations rather than physical machines.

The section with seed-syllables, colored letters, and their transformations into maṇḍala discs is standard Vajrayāna visualization sequence and has been rendered as literally as possible while preserving readability.

- The passage contains several Sanskrit seed-syllables and mantras embedded directly in the Tibetan; these have been rendered as they appear in the text. The mantra "OM SARVA TATHĀGATA ANURĀGAṆA VAJRA SVABHĀVA ĀTMAKO'HAṀ" occurs twice and is kept consistent throughout.

The figure described — red, single-faced, with fangs, three eyes, tiger skin, skull-cup, buffalo mount, clubs, nāga ornaments, and eight-and-two spans tall — is recognizable as a wrathful deity in the Cakrasaṃvara or Hevajra cycle, closely associated with Mahākāla or a related krodha-deity; the text does not give this figure a proper name here, so none has been supplied.

The term rendered "eight-and-two spans" reflects the Tibetan "brgyad gnyis lon pa'i rnam pa," which could also be read as "possessing a form of eighty-two" or as "measuring [a height of] eight-and-two [units]"; the reading adopted fits the iconometric convention of measuring deity height in spans (vitasti), but this is genuinely uncertain.

- The term "Merumunen" in the vase passage is a transcription of a ritual name or obscure technical term for which the Tibetan "མེརུམུན་" does not yield a transparent meaning. It may be a corrupt or phonetically transcribed Sanskrit term for a type of ritual vessel or its location; the translation preserves it as a proper name pending identification.

The zombie-risen corpse rendering of "འགྲོ་བ་མིའི་སྐད་ཀྱི་མཆོད་པོ་" refers to the vetāla, a reanimated corpse figure well-attested in tantric iconography; the translation renders the functional sense rather than the Sanskrit term to keep the narrative clear for listeners.

The mantra in the supplication section reads in the Tibetan as OM SARVA TATHĀGATA PŪJA VAJRA SVABHĀVA ĀTMAKO'HAM, which differs slightly from the version given in the preceding passage (ANURĀGAṆA instead of PŪJA); this appears to be a distinct mantra variant within the same ritual sequence and is rendered as it stands.

- The term rendered "Vajra-zombie" translates rdo rje ro langs ma, literally "vajra-zombie woman," a female vetāla spirit figure common in certain tantric sādhana contexts. The phrase "flaw-mantra" renders skyon sngags, a mantra recited to repair errors or omissions in practice; it is a technical term for a corrective mantra within the session. The passage "OM HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪḤ BIKṚTĀNANA MANTRA SIDDHI ME DEHI TĪ HŪḤ HŪḤ PHAṬ PHAṬ SVĀHĀ" contains a minor textual difficulty: TĪ is likely a rendering of DEHI TĪ as "dehi tī" which may be corrupt or dialectal; it is reproduced as found. The chapter colophon "the first chapter, on the deity called the Red One" refers to a section heading in the source tantra classifying deity-types by color.
- The phrase rendered "the Beloved of Delusion" and its cognates (Yamāntaka of Delusion, etc.) translates compound epithets of wrathful deity-forms distinguished by the poison-natures: delusion (moha), slander/piśuna, attachment (rāga), and envy (īrṣyā). The Sanskrit embedded in the mantras confirms these identifications.

The phrase "pressing upon the lotus with the sole of one foot and the sole of the other" is a ritual posture; "lotus" here likely refers to a visualized or drawn lotus diagram, not an anatomical reference.

"Che ge mo" in the mantra appears to be a transliterated Tibetan epithet (a wrathful goddess name) embedded within an otherwise Sanskrit mantra; it is left as found.

The "five products of the cow" (ba byung Inga) is the standard ritual unction mixture of milk, curd, butter, urine, and dung.

- The phrase rendered "LHAJIN GYI" within the increase mantra represents a Tibetan divine name or epithet embedded in the Sanskrit mantra string — likely meaning "given by the god" or "god-given," corresponding to Sanskrit devadatta. It has been left in a transliterated form as it appears to be a proper name functioning within the mantra rather than prose to be translated.

The "འགྲོ་བ་མིའི་སྐད་ཀྱི་མཆོད་པོ་" at the close, rendered "juice of fingernail plant," refers to a plant whose name literally means "nail-plant" or possibly henna; the precise botanical identification is uncertain but the ritual function is clear.

- The term rendered "fierce goddess" for "che ge mo" is a somewhat obscure epithet; it likely refers to Kurukullā or an associated wrathful feminine deity in the ritual context. The Tibetan "che ge mo" is an honorific form meaning roughly "the great female one" and is left in functional translation rather than transliterated, as its referent in context is a wrathful goddess associated with the rite.

The phrase "rājāta" has been retained untranslated as it appears to be a Sanskrit term for silver or a particular ritual substance; its precise ritual meaning here is uncertain.

The "seed of wind," "seed of fire," and "seed of water" refer to bīja-syllables associated with those elements in tantric ritual systems.

- The passage is a ritual manual of considerable technical density. Several syllable-strings such as TṢ, BṢ, RTSHM, BṢ, RṢ and PṢ, PHṢ, GHṢ, ŚṢ are seed-syllables transliterated as they stand; their precise phonetic reconstruction from the Tibetan approximations is uncertain but the rendering faithfully reflects the forms given. The term lāvaṭika is a Sanskrit loanword preserved in the Tibetan; its precise ritual meaning in this context is uncertain. The phrase rendered "minor sovereignty of a petty kingdom" translates phra mo'i rgyal srid, literally "the small royal domain," contrasted implicitly with the "common sovereignty of a wheel-turning ruler" mentioned just before.

- The four ritual wood-types — siṭṭhaka, saṃkocha, kaṇḍika — are Sanskrit botanical names retained as transliterated terms; their precise botanical identification is uncertain in the scholarly literature. The phrase rendered "write the twelve seeds" and "write upon the twelve wheels with mantra" follows the Tibetan closely but the precise ritual referent of "twelve wheels" is not entirely transparent from this passage alone and may refer to a specific maṇḍala configuration explained in a corresponding commentary. The closing line "bound to a bird's wing and pronounced" is a common ritual injunction in this genre, implying the mantra or text is attached to a bird for dispersal, but the passage breaks off mid-sentence.

- The text is a ritual-medical compendium in the style of a Tantric minor-accomplishments (siddhi) chapter, and the botanical and pharmacological terms throughout are Sanskrit loanwords or technical Indic terms transliterated into Tibetan. Many of the plant names — kaṭuka, hilaṃcī, picaṇḍarīvaṇa, kuṣmāṇḍa, daddhura, pippalī, and so on — are rendered in anglicized Sanskrit approximations of the Tibetan phonetic transcriptions; precise botanical identification is not always certain, but contextually they are Āyurvedic medicinals. The term "bhaga" refers to the female genitalia, a standard Sanskrit technical term in this tantric-medical context. The phrase "Blessed Lady" renders Tibetan བཀའ་འཕྲིན་ལྷ་མོ་ (the feminine form of Bhagavān, i.e., a goddess or female tantric deity), who here poses the question to the Blessed One. The "triple transformation" in the battle section is a technical term whose exact referent is not specified in this passage and may depend on context in the wider tantra. The medical instructions throughout mix ritual and pharmaceutical procedures in a manner typical of Tantric siddhi literature.

- Several plant names and pharmaceutical terms in this passage are rendered in phonetic transliteration from Sanskrit-derived Tibetan transcriptions, as the underlying Sanskrit originals cannot always be determined with certainty. "Samguḍa" (བཀའ་འཕྲིན་ལྷ་མོ་) appears to be a preparation from buffalo. "Bābla" (བཀའ་འཕྲིན་, here spelled བཀའ་འཕྲིན་) is likely the Indian Acacia. "Halāhala" is a medicinal or poisonous substance. "Śaṇa" is likely hemp seed (Cannabis). "Daṇḍodpala" (བཀའ་འཕྲིན་) is uncertain botanically. "Śithila / śithila" transliterated from Tibetan བཀའ་འཕྲིན་ / བཀའ་འཕྲིན་ probably denotes a relaxant or tonic substance. The term "khragskrod" (མཁའ་སྒྲུབ་མཁའ་སྒྲུབ་) means literally "blood-expelling root" and may refer to a specific medicinal plant not yet conclusively identified. The overall context is a medical-technical text on sexology and bodily enhancement, in the tradition of Indian kāmaśāstra literature transmitted into Tibetan.

- The chapter colophon "on the foam of semen" renders a technical Āyurvedic subject heading; the phrase signals a section of a medical tantra dealing with seminal and vitality topics.

Several plant names in this passage are Sanskrit or Indic technical terms for which no standard Tibetan equivalents are given in the text; they are rendered by their closest identifiable Sanskrit forms: naleśam, bhatrālī, priyaṅgu, citraka, ligature-āru, sindhuvāra, laphug, likhara, yakṣāra, vāśaka, bitaṅka, arjuna, Śālmālī, kumuda, and tanaya. Some of these identifications are uncertain and the botanical equivalents remain debated in Āyurvedic scholarship.

The term "wadi" renders a preparation form in Indian pharmacy denoting a small formed cake or lozenge.

- Several Sanskrit plant and substance names embedded in the Tibetan are transliterated approximations of Sanskrit terms that remain only partially identifiable; these are rendered as close phonetic equivalents. "Gśinrjemo" is a Tibetan plant name not yet firmly identified in Sanskrit equivalence. The passage on directional ritual assignments (fire, south, west, north) is somewhat elliptical in the original and the rendering follows the most grammatically natural reading. "Śletreś" is a phonetic Tibetan rendering of a Sanskrit botanical term (possibly śleṣmātaka) that remains uncertain. The chapter colophon "sixth chapter, Overcoming Old Age" marks the end of a named section of the medical or ritual text being translated.
- The text throughout this passage is a ritual-medical compendium typical of a tantric subsidiary section dealing with erotic and aphrodisiac rites. Many of the plant names and pharmacological ingredients are Sanskrit technical terms transliterated into Tibetan; where the identification is uncertain (such as "śārāṭiboga," "vāmadhāti," "rañjita," "ghoṣa," and several others), standard transliteration has been retained rather than speculative identification. The phrase rendered "Sovereign Lady of the Vajra-Realm" for རྒྱལ་བོད་སྐྱིད་ཀྱི་རྩེ་གློ་བུ་མོ་ corresponds to Sanskrit Vajradhātuvīśvarī, a Tantric deity name; the passage is using the root nerve or channel associated with her. The mantra Namaḥ Caṇḍālī is retained in transliteration as it appears in the source. The passage ends mid-sentence as supplied.
- The passage presents significant technical vocabulary from a tantra context, likely a ritual manual associated with a maṇḍala empowerment ceremony. Several proper nouns appear to be Sanskrit loanwords transliterated into Tibetan, including gaṭaka, vaḍa, aśvattha, vakula, nāgakeśara, and marulaḍa, which are names of trees or ritual substances; these have been rendered in their reconstructed Sanskrit forms. The syllables HRĪḤ ṢṬRĪ are seed-syllables (bīja-mantras) of a deity, likely Śrī Devī or a related goddess, and are retained untranslated as is conventional. The phrase rendered "lord of nine" translates dgu bdag, which in mandala ritual typically refers to the central deity of a nine-deity maṇḍala. The "Sovereign Lady of Śrī" renders gtso bo dpal, which may refer to Śrī Lakṣmī or a tantric equivalent. The chapter heading and the verses that follow it appear to mark a transition from the aphrodisiac section to a section on royal consecration and maṇḍala ritual, which is an unusual juxtaposition that reflects the encyclopedic character of the source tantra.
- The phrase rendered as "mind-chariot" translates a compound meaning literally "the chariot of mind" — a metaphor for the mental vehicle or the chariot-of-mind yoga, likely denoting a visualization or contemplative vehicle within the Yamāntaka cycle; its precise technical referent is uncertain.

The expression "the swift ones" renders a term that can also mean "messenger" or "courier"; in context it seems to indicate swift-moving ritual agents or emissaries bearing offerings, and the nuance of "causing them to stumble" suggests a ritual of obstruction or subjugation.

"Kailāsa as the queen's realm" renders a phrase meaning literally "having made Kailāsa the woman's sovereignty." The referent may be Śiva's paradise Mount Kailāsa, here being claimed as conquered territory in a ritual subjugation context.

"Mechanical device of acacia wood" translates a compound involving seng Ideng (Skt. khadira, acacia/cutch) and 'khrul 'khor (yantra, a mechanical device or ritual implement); this appears to be a fire-ritual apparatus used in a punitive or coercive rite.

- The proper names in the middle section — Kanaujayuga, Bālagotṭāla, Gomačārālābhṛti, Kaliṅga, Vaṅga, Gaurī, Magadha, Suraka, Ubhikṛ, Biṭacakalara, Godermakam, Gilidge, Vimoji — are a mixture of recognizable Indian geographical names (Kaliṅga, Vaṅga, Magadha) and what appear to be tantric place-names or corrupted proper names for which standard Sanskrit reconstructions are uncertain. They are rendered here in approximate phonetic form from the Tibetan transliteration as given.

The phrase rendered "the moon in water" follows the standard Buddhist simile of the reflected moon as an image of the illusory body.

The term "ālikāli" refers to the standard tantric recitation of the Sanskrit vowel and consonant series, a well-known preliminary practice.

The final lines of this passage are syntactically compressed and possibly fragmentary at the point of transition into the next section; the rendering follows the most doctrinally coherent reading.

- The passage belongs to a Vajrayāna tantric context involving the doctrine of the four empowerments and discussions of the three and four mudrās. The relationship between the "third" and "fourth" empowerment, and the identification of cause and fruit, reflects technical Highest Yoga Tantra scholasticism that is notoriously compressed in the Tibetan; the rendering follows the grammatical structure but doctrinal precision here may depend on the specific commentarial tradition to which the text belongs.

The term rendered "karma mudrā and wisdom mudrā" refers to two of the standard four mudrās of Highest Yoga Tantra: karma mudrā (action seal, a physical consort) and jñāna mudrā (wisdom seal, a visualized consort); the text's argument that these do not serve as the cause points toward the primacy of the mahāmudrā.

The asterism "Puṣya" renders Tibetan "skar ma rgyal," which is the standard Tibetan name for the nakṣatra Puṣya (also known as Tiṣya), an auspicious lunar mansion frequently specified for tantric ritual commencement.

- The term here rendered "rétsaka" is a technical wind-yoga term appearing in the text as a transliteration rather than a standard Tibetan philosophical term. It likely corresponds to a Sanskrit technical term from the prāṇāyāma tradition, possibly recaka, meaning "exhalation" or a specific phase of breath-retention practice. The context — contrasted with the "vase-bearing" (kumbhaka-type) wind — supports this identification, though the precise correspondence remains uncertain.

The phrase "twelve volumes at the cuckoo" is genuinely obscure; the cuckoo may refer to a specific time-indicator (the cuckoo's call marking a season), a place name, or a scribal convention, and its exact meaning in this ritual context cannot be determined with confidence from the text alone.

The "four seeds dwelling at the heart center" likely refers to the four syllables or seed-syllables (bīja) associated with the winds or channels in tantric physiology, though the text does not specify them here.

- The syllable-analysis passage (ya-mā-ri rakta) is an esoteric etymological gloss of the name Yamāri/Rakta-Yamāntaka by decomposition into seed-syllables correlated with wind, joy-states, and tantric principles. The correlations follow standard Yoginī-tantra conventions. The five names of the four joys being known "in four moments" refers to the four moments of bliss in highest yoga tantra experience.

The food substances in the torma vessel — go, ku, da, ha, na, bi, ra, śu, mā, mu — appear to be phonetic transcriptions of Sanskrit or vernacular ingredient names whose precise identification is uncertain; they are rendered as transliterations rather than guesses.

"Vetālī" in the context of the five-element goddesses and the union passage is the fierce zombie-goddess form; she is distinct from ordinary vetāla beings.

- The mantra transliteration is rendered faithfully as given in the Tibetan; it corresponds to a standard Yamāntaka-cycle mantra for summoning and binding obstacle-makers.

The term rendered "on the rakṣasa petal" is literally "on the petal of the one without truth" (𑖀𑖩𑖪𑖫𑖬𑖭𑖮𑖯𑖰𑖱𑖲𑖳𑖴𑖵𑖶𑖷𑖸𑖹𑖺𑖻𑖼𑖽𑖾𑗀𑖿𑗁𑗂𑗃𑗄𑗅𑗆𑗇𑗈𑗉𑗊𑗋𑗌𑗍𑗎𑗏𑗐𑗑𑗒𑗓𑗔𑗕𑗖𑗗𑗘𑗙𑗚𑗛𑗜𑗝𑗞𑗟𑗠𑗡𑗢𑗣𑗤𑗥𑗦𑗧𑗨𑗩𑗪𑗫𑗬𑗭𑗮𑗯𑗰𑗱𑗲𑗳𑗴𑗵𑗶𑗷𑗸𑗹𑗺𑗻𑗼𑗽𑗾𑗿𑘀𑘁𑘂𑘃𑘄𑘅𑘆𑘇𑘈𑘉𑘊𑘋𑘌𑘍𑘎𑘏𑘐𑘑𑘒𑘓𑘔𑘕𑘖𑘗𑘘𑘙𑘚𑘛𑘜𑘝𑘞𑘟𑘠𑘡𑘢𑘣𑘤𑘥𑘦𑘧𑘨𑘩𑘪𑘫𑘬𑘭𑘮𑘯𑘰𑘱𑘲𑘳𑘴𑘵𑘶𑘷𑘸𑘹𑘺𑘻𑘼𑘽𑘾𑘿𑙀𑙁𑙂𑙃𑙄𑙅𑙆𑙇𑙈𑙉𑙊𑙋𑙌𑙍𑙎𑙏𑙐𑙑𑙒𑙓𑙔𑙕𑙖𑙗𑙘𑙙𑙚𑙛𑙜𑙝𑙞𑙟𑙠𑙡𑙢𑙣𑙤𑙥𑙦𑙧𑙨𑙩𑙪𑙫𑙬𑙭𑙮𑙯𑙰𑙱𑙲𑙳𑙴𑙵𑙶𑙷𑙸𑙹𑙺𑙻𑙼𑙽𑙾𑙿𑚀𑚁𑚂𑚃𑚄𑚅𑚆𑚇𑚈𑚉𑚊𑚋𑚌𑚍𑚎𑚏𑚐𑚑𑚒𑚓𑚔𑚕𑚖𑚗𑚘𑚙𑚚𑚛𑚜𑚝𑚞𑚟𑚠𑚡𑚢𑚣𑚤𑚥𑚦𑚧𑚨𑚩𑚪𑚫𑚬𑚭𑚮𑚯𑚰𑚱𑚲𑚳𑚴𑚵𑚷𑚶𑚸𑚹𑚺𑚻𑚼𑚽𑚾𑚿𑛀𑛁𑛂𑛃𑛄𑛅𑛆𑛇𑛈𑛉𑛊𑛋𑛌𑛍𑛎𑛏𑛐𑛑𑛒𑛓𑛔𑛕𑛖𑛗𑛘𑛙𑛚𑛛𑛜𑛝𑛞𑛟𑛠𑛡𑛢𑛣𑛤𑛥𑛦𑛧𑛨𑛩𑛪𑛫𑛬𑛭𑛮𑛯𑛰𑛱𑛲𑛳𑛴𑛵𑛶𑛷𑛸𑛹𑛺𑛻𑛼𑛽𑛾𑛿𑜀𑜁𑜂𑜃𑜄𑜅𑜆𑜇𑜈𑜉𑜊𑜋𑜌𑜍𑜎𑜏𑜐𑜑𑜒𑜓𑜔𑜕𑜖𑜗𑜘𑜙𑜚𑜛𑜜𑜝𑜞𑜟𑜠𑜡𑜢𑜣𑜤𑜥𑜦𑜧𑜨𑜩𑜪𑜫𑜬𑜭𑜮𑜯𑜰𑜱𑜲𑜳𑜴𑜵𑜶𑜷𑜸𑜹𑜺𑜻𑜼𑜽𑜾𑜿𑝀𑝁𑝂𑝃𑝄𑝅𑝆𑝇𑝈𑝉𑝊𑝋𑝌𑝍𑝎𑝏𑝐𑝑𑝒𑝓𑝔𑝕𑝖𑝗𑝘𑝙𑝚𑝛𑝜𑝝𑝞𑝟𑝠𑝡𑝢𑝣𑝤𑝥𑝦𑝧𑝨𑝩𑝪𑝫𑝬𑝭𑝮𑝯𑝰𑝱𑝲𑝳𑝴𑝵𑝶𑝷𑝸𑝹𑝺𑝻𑝼𑝽𑝾𑝿𑞀𑞁𑞂𑞃𑞄𑞅𑞆𑞇𑞈𑞉𑞊𑞋𑞌𑞍𑞎𑞏𑞐𑞑𑞒𑞓𑞔𑞕𑞖𑞗𑞘𑞙𑞚𑞛𑞜𑞝𑞞𑞟𑞠𑞡𑞢𑞣𑞤𑞥𑞦𑞧𑞨𑞩𑞪𑞫𑞬𑞭𑞮𑞯𑞰𑞱𑞲𑞳𑞴𑞵𑞶𑞷𑞸𑞹𑞺𑞻𑞼𑞽𑞾𑞿𑟀𑟁𑟂𑟃𑟄𑟅𑟆𑟇𑟈𑟉𑟊𑟋𑟌𑟍𑟎𑟏𑟐𑟑𑟒𑟓𑟔𑟕𑟖𑟗𑟘𑟙𑟚𑟛𑟜𑟝𑟞𑟟𑟠𑟡𑟢𑟣𑟤𑟥𑟦𑟧𑟨𑟩𑟪𑟫𑟬𑟭𑟮𑟯𑟰𑟱𑟲𑟳𑟴𑟵𑟶𑟷𑟸𑟹𑟺𑟻𑟼𑟽𑟾𑟿𑠀𑠁𑠂𑠃𑠄𑠅𑠆𑠇𑠈𑠉𑠊𑠋𑠌𑠍𑠎𑠏𑠐𑠑𑠒𑠓𑠔𑠕𑠖𑠗𑠘𑠙𑠚𑠛𑠜𑠝𑠞𑠟𑠠𑠡𑠢𑠣𑠤𑠥𑠦𑠧𑠨𑠩𑠪𑠫𑠬𑠭𑠮𑠯𑠰𑠱𑠲𑠳𑠴𑠵𑠶𑠷𑠸𑠺𑠹𑠻𑠼𑠽𑠾𑠿𑡀𑡁𑡂𑡃𑡄𑡅𑡆𑡇𑡈𑡉𑡊𑡋𑡌𑡍𑡎𑡏𑡐𑡑𑡒𑡓𑡔𑡕𑡖𑡗𑡘𑡙𑡚𑡛𑡜𑡝𑡞𑡟𑡠𑡡𑡢𑡣𑡤𑡥𑡦𑡧𑡨𑡩𑡪𑡫𑡬𑡭𑡮𑡯𑡰𑡱𑡲𑡳𑡴𑡵𑡶𑡷𑡸𑡹𑡺𑡻𑡼𑡽𑡾𑡿𑢀𑢁𑢂𑢃𑢄𑢅𑢆𑢇𑢈𑢉𑢊𑢋𑢌𑢍𑢎𑢏𑢐𑢑𑢒𑢓𑢔𑢕𑢖𑢗𑢘𑢙𑢚𑢛𑢜𑢝𑢞𑢟𑢠𑢡𑢢𑢣𑢤𑢥𑢦𑢧𑢨𑢩𑢪𑢫𑢬𑢭𑢮𑢯𑢰𑢱𑢲𑢳𑢴𑢵𑢶𑢷𑢸𑢹𑢺𑢻𑢼𑢽𑢾𑢿𑣀𑣁𑣂𑣃𑣄𑣅𑣆𑣇𑣈𑣉𑣊𑣋𑣌𑣍𑣎𑣏𑣐𑣑𑣒𑣓𑣔𑣕𑣖𑣗𑣘𑣙𑣚𑣛𑣜𑣝𑣞𑣟𑣠𑣡𑣢𑣣𑣤𑣥𑣦𑣧𑣨𑣩𑣪𑣫𑣬𑣭𑣮𑣯𑣰𑣱𑣲𑣳𑣴𑣵𑣶𑣷𑣸𑣹𑣺𑣻𑣼𑣽𑣾𑣿𑤀𑤁𑤂𑤃𑤄𑤅𑤆𑤇𑤈𑤉𑤊𑤋𑤌𑤍𑤎𑤏𑤐𑤑𑤒𑤓𑤔𑤕𑤖𑤗𑤘𑤙𑤚𑤛𑤜𑤝𑤞𑤟𑤠𑤡𑤢𑤣𑤤𑤥𑤦𑤧𑤨𑤩𑤪𑤫𑤬𑤭𑤮𑤯𑤰𑤱𑤲𑤳𑤴𑤵𑤶𑤷𑤸𑤹𑤺𑤻𑤼𑤽𑤾𑤿𑥀𑥁𑥂𑥃𑥄𑥅𑥆𑥇𑥈𑥉𑥊𑥋𑥌𑥍𑥎𑥏𑥐𑥑𑥒𑥓𑥔𑥕𑥖𑥗𑥘𑥙𑥚𑥛𑥜𑥝𑥞𑥟𑥠𑥡𑥢𑥣𑥤𑥥𑥦𑥧𑥨𑥩𑥪𑥫𑥬𑥭𑥮𑥯𑥰𑥱𑥲𑥳𑥴𑥵𑥶𑥷𑥸𑥹𑥺𑥻𑥼𑥽𑥾𑥿𑦀𑦁𑦂𑦃𑦄𑦅𑦆𑦇𑦈𑦉𑦊𑦋𑦌𑦍𑦎𑦏𑦐𑦑𑦒𑦓𑦔𑦕𑦖𑦗𑦘𑦙𑦚𑦛𑦜𑦝𑦞𑦟

The name "Duṅskyong" (Tibetan: དུངསྐྱོང་) appears to be a proper nāga name; no confident Sanskrit reconstruction is available from context alone, so it is left in its transliterated form.

- The mantra strings in this passage are rendered phonetically as they appear in the Tibetan transliteration. Several syllables in the longer offering mantra appear corrupt or non-standard in the source, and the readings given follow the Tibetan faithfully rather than emending to a reconstructed Sanskrit. The line "Om vajragaurye se svāhā" contains an anomalous "se" that may be a scribal error for "svā" or a name-element, and is retained as transmitted.

The phrase rendered "Bhagara, you who have gone beyond the world" represents a vocative in the Tibetan that is ambiguous: it could be a personal name or an epithet. It is treated here as an epithet meaning one who has transcended the world, in keeping with the tantric context.

The verse section on Yamāntaka contains compressed tantric-doctrinal content: each verse salutes a different aspect of Yamāntaka identified with a different buddha-family, affliction-turned-vajra quality, and buddha-body. The last verse's reference to "sixty-four petals" and the yoginī attaining bliss from the saṃbhogakāya reflects standard Yoginītantra soteriology.

- The passage contains a number of highly compressed technical instructions characteristic of Hevajra tantra literature. Several phrases bear comment.

The "fourth body" mentioned at the opening and recapitulated later refers to the svābhāvīkakāya or the saḥajākāya — the innate body beyond the standard trikāya — which is a doctrinal marker of nondual tantric systems. The text's claim that it "is not the domain even of buddhas" is a standard antinomian rhetorical gesture pointing to an ineffable register beyond conceptual formulation.

The phrase rendered "rod" throughout for "dbyug gu" is a technical counting unit used in the context of breath and wind practice, apparently measuring intervals or strokes of wind movement; "rod" follows the most natural philological rendering of the term in this context, though it may also be read as "staff" or "wand" in some commentaries.

The channels Rasanā (right, often associated with solar energy) and Lalanā (left, lunar) are standard yogic terminology in the Hevaira and related tantric systems.

The phrase rendered "Women bearing various forms" in the closing section, followed by reference to oil-jar vessels and sesame, is almost certainly a passage concerned with tantric consort practice and the use of substances in ritual; the precise allocation of meaning here is genuinely uncertain given the terse symbolic idiom.

- The five embryonic stages rendered here follow the classical Abhidharma enumeration of fetal development: kalala, arbuda, peśī, ghana, and praśākhā. The Tibetan terms nur nur po, mer mer po, gor gor bo, nar nar po, and rkang lag 'gyus pa correspond to these stages. The fifth stage, "the stage in which the limbs take shape," is sometimes enumerated separately in tantric contexts.

The closing prose sentence is deliberately left open, as the passage breaks off mid-sentence introducing the subsequent detailed exposition of the ten items distinguished by two categories — this is a structural marker indicating the continuation of the text, not a translation deficiency.

- The opening term rendered "aṅgabhaṅga" follows the Tibetan འུག་པ་མཐུ་མཐུ་, which is a phonetic rendering of Sanskrit. The passage appears to be glossing a Sanskrit compound, likely aṅgabhaṅga or a related term, as an example of distinction or excellence among parts. The precise Sanskrit compound is uncertain and the gloss here is interpretive.

The phrase "seven worlds" in the middle section renders འུག་པ་མཐུ་མཐུ་, which could mean "the seven" of those limbs, or "the seven worlds." In context the text seems to be making a cosmological analogy, drawing on the seven limbs classified as suffering, but the passage is technically compressed and the reading is not entirely certain.

- The verse quoted mid-passage ("Reading aloud from a teacher, a lamp, a seal...") is a mnemonic summary of the eight analogies for rebirth-without-transmigration that the text then proceeds to unpack. The Tibetan འུག་པ་མཐུ་མཐུ་, literally "reading well" or "reading clearly," is rendered as "reading aloud" to capture the pedagogical, oral context implied by the teacher-student analogy that follows immediately.

The final verse is clearly incomplete as transmitted in this passage; only the first two lines appear before the excerpt ends. This is noted for editorial awareness but does not affect the translation of what is present.

The term འུག་པ་མཐུ་མཐུ་ (five named ones) and འུག་པ་མཐུ་མཐུ་ (seven named ones) refer to technical enumerations in the source doctrine — five affliction-and-karma categories and seven result categories — whose precise referents depend on the broader doctrinal context of the treatise being translated; they are rendered accordingly without speculative over-specification.

- This passage is a tantra chapter colophon followed by a section of tantric yogic instruction — specifically a description of caṇḍālī (inner heat) practice and subtle-body yoga in the style of the Yoginītantras or an associated explanatory tantra. Several terms are highly technical and contextual. The terms bhaga and bhaga at the heart are left transliterated as they appear in the original without gloss in the body, as they function as technical anatomical and maṇḍala designations in this context. The phrase "moon" rendering ri bong can (literally "hare-bearer," a standard Indic epithet for the moon) is resolved in translation without parenthetical gloss as the metaphor is transparent in context. The term khoḍa is a technical tantric sound or term left as transliterated because its precise referent is uncertain; it may denote a specific vibratory sound or a technical yogic term whose precise identity cannot be confidently determined from context alone. The phrase translated "two left ones" for gyon pa gnyis po is uncertain; it may refer to two specific channels, and the commentary tradition would need to be consulted for a definitive identification.

- "Che ge mo" appearing in several mantras is a rendering of the Tibetan honorific for a great female figure, likely "the Great Lady," functioning within the mantra body as a vocative address. It is left in transliteration as it forms part of the mantra text proper and its phonetic form is what is transmitted.

The term translated as "splitting headaches" for gzer sel renders literally "removing the spike," which in Tibetan medical idiom refers to a piercing headache. This is the standard interpretation in commentarial usage.

The figure identified as "the Great Fierce Enraged One" (Tibetan gtum po khros pa chen po) refers to Caṇḍa Mahāroṣaṇa, the wrathful deity whose mantra seed syllable appears throughout this passage.

- The term cegemo appearing throughout is a phonetic rendering of what appears to be a feminine epithet or name associated with caṇḍa mahāroṣaṇa; it is left untranslated as it functions as part of the mantra proper rather than meaningful Tibetan prose.

The phrase rendered "extend the syllables with the mantras of elephant spirits, lunar marks, and flowers" is cryptic;

The phrase rendered "galata-wood" for גלגלית is uncertain; it appears to be a specific wood or plant name that I have transliterated rather than forced into a conjectural identification.

- The passage is a ritual-technical section filled with mantras largely preserved in transliterated Sanskrit within the Tibetan; these are rendered in standard romanized Sanskrit as they appear. Several mantras contain corrupted or uncertain syllables, but as this is a practical ritual text rather than a philosophical one, the rendering follows the phonetic sequences as they stand without emendation.

The term rendered "horoscope" (ri mo, literally "diagram" or "marks") in the context of the peacock-tail circumambulation ritual most likely refers to a drawn astrological or magical diagram; this rendering reflects that probable meaning.

"Śākoḍaka" and "guṇḍaka" are plant names left in transliteration as they are technical botanical-ritual terms whose identification is uncertain; "barura" is likely Terminalia bellirica.

- The botanical and pharmacological terms throughout this passage are Sanskrit loanwords rendered phonetically in the Tibetan. Several plant names — muzi, shinuhi, kāmāci, śālmali, śoṇāka, būrakapāduka, laṭṭapa, ketaka, and others — are technical Āyurvedic or regional terms not all precisely identifiable; the transliterations given reflect the Tibetan phonetic rendering as faithfully as possible.

The chapter colophon identifies this as part of a text called the "tantra of the Red Executor of Yamāntaka," a wrathful tantric cycle associated with the deity Yamāntaka, the destroyer of Yama, lord of death.

The final verse section shifts abruptly into explicitly tantric sexual yoga terminology. The language of "lotus," "vajra," "hero," and "essence" is the standard Vajrayāna symbolic register for the union of wisdom and method in highest yoga tantra practice, and the passage as a whole belongs to the explanatory genre of such tantras. The rendering follows the literal sense while preserving the technical register.

The line rendered "the buddha of attachment nearby" is ambiguous; it may refer to a specific deity of the desire realm or be a figurative expression. The "Red Executor of Yamāntaka" in the colophon likely refers to a specific yi-dam cycle not yet definitively catalogued in standard reference works.

• The term rendered "fierce woman" in the list of women is caṇḍālī, the outcast or fierce woman figure, which in Vajrayāna contexts carries the additional meaning of the inner heat (Sanskrit: caṇḍālī, Tibetan: gtum mo); both meanings may be operative here simultaneously. The passage is from a Vajrayāna completion-stage tantra with explicit sexual yoga instructions; the women listed are ritual partners whose enumeration deliberately transgresses conventional social categories, a recognized antinomian feature of this genre.

The line "leads the practitioner to Avīci hell" presents a paradox: the text first states that those who do not know the distinction and those who do know it through distinctions both lead the practitioner to the lowest hell. This is likely an intentional doctrinal inversion — a deliberate paradox meaning that conventional moral categories are subverted at this level of tantra. The exact referent of "not knowing the distinction" versus "knowing through distinctions" is genuinely ambiguous and may require consultation of a commentary.

The line "great, great, great merit" reflects the Tibetan's triple repetition of bsod nams, which is unusual and emphatic.

- The name Aruṇḍhatī appears in Tibetan transliteration as a feminine figure invoked in the ritual exchange of declarations. In classical Indian tradition Aruṇḍhatī is the devoted wife of the ṛṣi Vasiṣṭha, held as an ideal of wifely union; her appearance here as a ritual partner-figure fits the antinomian role-reversal logic of this tantric passage.

The passage containing the signs of death or prognostication — seeing the body as thin, inability to see the tip of the nose, urine circling left, and so forth — is a classic Tibetan prognostic list (āyuhparyanta-nimitta), indicating imminence of death at varying time intervals. The translation renders these as straightforwardly as the Tibetan allows, though their precise ritual function within this tantra's context remains somewhat opaque.

The phrase rendered "rootless root" for རྩ་མེད་རྩ་མེད་ is genuinely unusual; it may be a technical esoteric anatomical designation without a clear standard gloss.

- The colophon names two translators: Thar-pa Lotsāwa, described as a "great bilingual speaker" (skad gnyis smra ba chen po), who supervised and sustained the project, and Rin-chen-grub, a Śākya monk serving as the Tibetan lotsāwa proper. The work was completed at Gnas-gsar monastery, associated with Khro-phu Lotsāwa's seat. The final dedication verse names Mañjuśrī (Jam-pa'i rdo-rje, literally "the Gentle Vajra"), consistent with Yamāntaka being Mañjuśrī's wrathful emanation, making the aspiration to become Mañjuśrī doctrinally fitting in this context. The opening couplet of this passage appears to be the conclusion of the verse from the preceding chapter, completing the thought: one who acts from worldly motives merely wanders aimlessly even within the teaching of emptiness.
